Norma Jean works at the Rexall drugstore, and she has acquired an amazing amount of information about cosmetics. When she explains to Leroy the three stages of complexion care, involving creams, toners, and moisturizers, he thinks happily of other petroleum products—axle grease, diesel fuel. This is a connection between him and Norma Jean. Since he has been home, he has felt unusually tender about his wife and guilty over his long absences. But he can’t tell what she feels about him. Norma Jean has never complained about his traveling; she has never made hurt remarks, like calling his truck a “widow-maker.” He is reasonably certain she has been faithful to him, but he wishes she would celebrate his permanent homecoming more happily. Norma Jean is often startled to find Leroy at home, and he thinks she seems a little disappointed about it. Perhaps he reminds her too much of the early days of their marriage, before he went on the road. They had a child who died as an infant, years ago. They never speak about their memories of Randy, which have almost faded, but now that Leroy is home all the time, they sometimes feel awkward around each other, and Leroy wonders if one of them should mention the child. He has the feeling that they are waking up out of a dream together—that they must create a new marriage, start afresh. They are lucky they are still married. Leroy has read that for most people losing a child destroys the marriage—or else he heard this on Donahue. He can’t always remember where he learns things anymore.

10 At Christmas, Leroy bought an electric organ for Norma Jean. She used to play the piano when she was in high school. “It don’t leave you,” she told him once. “It’s like riding a bicycle.”

1. American World War II bomber.

The new instrument had so many keys and buttons that she was bewildered by it at first. She touched the keys tentatively, pushed some buttons, then pecked out “Chopsticks.” It came out in an amplified fox-trot rhythm, with marimba sounds.

The organ had a pecan-look finish and eighteen preset chords, with optional flute, violin, trumpet, clarinet, and banjo accompaniments. Norma Jean mastered the organ almost immediately. At first she played Christmas songs. Then she bought The Sixties Songbook and learned every tune in it, adding variations to each with the rows of brightly colored buttons.

“I didn’t like these old songs back then,” she said. “But I have this crazy feeling I missed something.”

“You didn’t miss a thing,” said Leroy.

Leroy likes to lie on the couch and smoke a joint and listen to Norma Jean play “Can’t Take My Eyes Off You” and “I’ll Be Back.”² He is back again. After fifteen years on the road, he is finally settling down with the woman he loves. She is still pretty. Her skin is flawless. Her frosted curls resemble pencil trimmings.

Now that Leroy has come home to stay, he notices how much the town has changed. Subdivisions are spreading across western Kentucky like an oil slick. The sign at the edge of town says “Pop: 11,500”—only seven hundred more than it said twenty years before. Leroy can’t figure out who is living in all the new houses. The farmers who used to gather around the courthouse square on Saturday afternoons to play checkers and spit tobacco juice have gone. It has been years since Leroy has thought about the farmers, and they have disappeared without his noticing.

Leroy meets a kid named Stevie Hamilton in the parking lot at the new shopping center. While they pretend to be strangers meeting over a stalled car, Stevie tosses an ounce of marijuana under the front seat of Leroy’s car. Stevie is wearing orange jogging shoes and a T-shirt that says CHATTAHOOCHEE SUPER-RAT. His father is a prominent doctor who lives in one of the expensive subdivisions in a new white-columned brick house that looks like a funeral parlor. In the phone book under his name there is a separate number, with the listing “Teenagers.”

“That’s for me to know and you to find out,” Stevie says. He is slit-eyed and skinny.

“What else you got?”

“What you interested in?”

“Nothing special. Just wondered.”

Leroy used to take speed on the road. Now he has to go slowly. He needs to be mellow. He leans back against the car and says, “I’m aiming to build me a log house, soon as I get time. My wife, though, I don’t think she likes the idea.”

“Well, let me know when you want me again,” Stevie says. He has a cigarette in his cupped palm, as though sheltering it from the wind. He takes a long drag, then stomps it on the asphalt and slouches away.

Stevie's father was two years ahead of Leroy in high school. Leroy is thirty-four. He married Norma Jean when they were both eighteen, and their child Randy was born a few months later, but he died at the age of four months and three days. He would be about Stevie's age now. Norma Jean and Leroy were at the drive-in, watching a double feature (Dr. Strangelove and Lover Come Back),³ and the baby was sleeping in the back seat. When the first movie ended, the baby was dead. It was the sudden infant death syndrome. Leroy remembers handing Randy to a nurse at the emergency room, as though he were offering her a large doll as a present. A dead baby feels like a sack of flour. "It just happens sometimes," said the doctor, in what Leroy always recalls as a nonchalant tone. Leroy can hardly remember the child anymore, but he still sees vividly a scene from Dr. Strangelove in which the President of the United States was talking in a folksy voice on the hot line to the Soviet premier about the bomber accidentally headed toward Russia. He was in the War Room, and the world map was lit up. Leroy remembers Norma Jean cataatonically beside him in the hospital and himself thinking: Who is this strange girl? He had forgotten who she was. Now scientists are saying that crib death is caused by a virus. Nobody knows anything, Leroy thinks. The answers are always changing.

When Leroy gets home from the shopping center, Norma Jean's mother, Mabel Beasley, is there. Until this year, Leroy has not realized how much time she spends with Norma Jean. When she visits, she inspects the closets and then the plants, informing Norma Jean when a plant is droopy or yellow. Mabel calls the plants "flowers," although there are never any blooms. She always notices if Norma Jean's laundry is piling up. Mabel is a short, overweight woman whose tight, brown-dyed curls look more like a wig than the actual wig she sometimes wears. Today she has brought Norma Jean an off-white dust ruffle she made for the bed; Mabel works in a custom-upholstery shop.

"This is the tenth one I made this year," Mabel says. "I got started and couldn't stop."

"It's real pretty," says Norma Jean.

30 "Now we can hide things under the bed," says Leroy, who gets along with his mother-in-law primarily by joking with her. Mabel has never really forgiven him for disgracing her by getting Norma Jean pregnant. When the baby died, she said that fate was mocking her.

"What's that thing?" Mabel says to Leroy in a loud voice, pointing to a tangle of yarn on a piece of canvas.

Leroy holds it up for Mabel to see. "It's my needlepoint," he explains. "This is a Star Trek pillow cover."

"That's what a woman would do," says Mabel. "Great day in the morning!"

"All the big football players on TV do it," he says.

35 "Why, Leroy, you're always trying to fool me. I don't believe you for one minute. You don't know what to do with yourself—that's the whole trouble. Sewing!"

"I'm aiming to build us a log house," says Leroy. "Soon as my plans come."

3. A 1963 satire on nuclear war and a 1961 Rock Hudson–Doris Day romantic comedy satirizing the advertising business, respectively.

“Like heck you are,” says Norma Jean. She takes Leroy’s needlepoint and shoves it into a drawer. “You have to find a job first. Nobody can afford to build now anyway.”

Mabel straightens her girdle and says, “I still think before you get tied down y’all ought to take a little run to Shiloh.”

“One of these days, Mama,” Norma Jean says impatiently.

Mabel is talking about Shiloh, Tennessee. For the past few years, she has been urging Leroy and Norma Jean to visit the Civil War battleground there.⁴ Mabel went there on her honeymoon—the only real trip she ever took. Her husband died of a perforated ulcer when Norma Jean was ten, but Mabel, who was accepted into the United Daughters of the Confederacy in 1975, is still preoccupied with going back to Shiloh.

“I’ve been to kingdom come and back in that truck out yonder,” Leroy says to Mabel, “but we never yet set foot in that battleground. Ain’t that something? How did I miss it?”

After Mabel leaves, Norma Jean reads to Leroy from a list she has made. “Thing you could do,” she announces. “You could get a job as a guard at Union Carbide, where they’d let you set on a stool. You could get on at the lumberyard. You could do a little carpenter work, if you want to build so bad. You could—”

“I can’t do something where I’d have to stand up all day.”

“You ought to try standing up all day behind a cosmetics counter. It’s amazing that I have strong feet, coming from two parents that never had strong feet at all.” At the moment Norma Jean is holding on to the kitchen counter, raising her knees one at a time as she talks. She is wearing two-pound ankle weights.

“Don’t worry,” says Leroy. “I’ll do something.”

“You could truck calves to slaughter for somebody. You wouldn’t have to drive any big old truck for that.”

“I’m going to build you this house,” says Leroy. “I want to make you a real home.”

“I don’t want to live in any log cabin.”

“I don’t care. It looks like a cabin.”

“You and me together could lift those logs. It’s just like lifting weights.”

Norma Jean doesn’t answer. Under her breath, she is counting. Now she is marching through the kitchen. She is doing goose steps.

Before his accident, when Leroy came home he used to stay in the house with Norma Jean, watching TV in bed and playing cards. She would cook fried chicken, picnic ham, chocolate pie—all his favorites. Now he is home alone much of the time. In the mornings, Norma Jean disappears, leaving a cooling place in the bed. She eats a cereal called Body Buddies, and she leaves the bowl on the table, with soggy tan balls floating in a milk puddle. He sees things about

4. Where, in April 1862, more than twenty-three thousand troops of the North and South, one-quarter of those who fought there, died. This was the first real indication of how bitter and bloody the war was to be. When Union reinforcements arrived, General Ulysses S. Grant drove the Confederate forces, who had gained an initial victory by a surprise attack, back to their base in Corinth, Mississippi.

Norma Jean that he never realized before. When she chops onions, she stares off into a corner, as if she can't bear to look. She puts on her house slippers almost precisely at nine o'clock every evening and nudges her jogging shoes under the couch. She saves bread heels for the birds. Leroy watches the birds at the feeder. He notices the peculiar way goldfinches fly past the window. They close their wings, then fall, then spread their wings to catch and lift themselves. He wonders if they close their eyes when they fall. Norma Jean closes her eyes when they are in bed. She wants the lights turned out. Even then, he is sure she closes her eyes.

55 He goes for long drives around town. He tends to drive a car rather carelessly. Power steering and an automatic shift make a car feel so small and inconsequential that his body is hardly involved in the driving process. His injured leg stretches out comfortably. Once or twice he has almost hit something, but even the prospect of an accident seems minor in a car. He cruises the new subdivisions, feeling like a criminal rehearsing for a robbery. Norma Jean is probably right about a log house being inappropriate here in the new subdivisions. All the houses look grand and complicated. They depress him.

One day when Leroy comes home from a drive he finds Norma Jean in tears. She is in the kitchen making a potato and mushroom-soup casserole, with grated-cheese topping. She is crying because her mother caught her smoking.

"I didn't hear her coming. I was standing here puffing away pretty as you please," Norma Jean says, wiping her eyes.

"I knew it would happen sooner or later," says Leroy, putting his arm around her.

"She don't know the meaning of the word 'knock,'" says Norma Jean. "It's a wonder she hadn't caught me years ago."

60 "Think of it this way," Leroy says. "What if she caught me with a joint?"

"You better not let her!" Norma Jean shrieks. "I'm warning you, Leroy Moffitt!"

"I'm just kidding. Here, play me a tune. That'll help you relax."

Norma Jean puts the casserole in the oven and sets the timer. Then she plays a ragtime tune, with horns and banjo, as Leroy lights up a joint and lies on the couch, laughing to himself about Mabel's catching him at it. He thinks of Stevie Hamilton—a doctor's son pushing grass. Everything is funny. The whole town seems crazy and small. He is reminded of Virgil Mathis, a boastful policeman Leroy used to shoot pool with. Virgil recently led a drug bust in a back room at a bowling alley, where he seized ten thousand dollars' worth of marijuana. The newspaper had a picture of him holding up the bags of grass and grinning widely. Right now, Leroy can imagine Virgil breaking down the door and arresting him with a lungful of smoke. Virgil would probably have been alerted to the scene because of all the racket Norma Jean is making. Now she sounds like a hard-rock band. Norma Jean is terrific. When she switches to a Latin-rhythm version of "Sunshine Superman," Leroy hums along. Norma Jean's foot goes up and down, up and down.

"Well, what do you think?" Leroy says, when Norma Jean pauses to search through her music.

65 "What do I think about what?"

His mind has gone blank. Then he says, "I'll sell my rig and build us a house." That wasn't what he wanted to say. He wanted to know what she thought—what she really thought—about them.

"Don't start in on that again," says Norma Jean. She begins playing "Who'll Be the Next in Line?"

Leroy used to tell hitchhikers his whole life story—about his travels, his hometown, the baby. He would end with a question: "Well, what do you think?" It was just a rhetorical question. In time, he had the feeling that he'd been telling the same story over and over to the same hitchhikers. He quit talking to hitchhikers when he realized how his voice sounded—whining and self-pitying, like some teenage-tragedy song. Now Leroy has the sudden impulse to tell Norma Jean about himself, as if he had just met her. They have known each other so long they have forgotten a lot about each other. They could become reacquainted. But when the oven timer goes off and she runs to the kitchen, he forgets why he wants to do this.

The next day, Mabel drops by. It is Saturday and Norma Jean is cleaning. Leroy is studying the plans of his log house, which have finally come in the mail. He has them spread out on the table—big sheets of stiff blue paper, with diagrams and numbers printed in white. While Norma Jean runs the vacuum, Mabel drinks coffee. She sets her coffee cup on a blueprint.

"I'm just waiting for time to pass," she says to Leroy, drumming her fingers on the table. 70

As soon as Norma Jean switches off the vacuum, Mabel says in a loud voice, "Did you hear about the datsun dog that killed the baby?"

Norma Jean says, "The word is 'dachshund.'"

"They put the dog on trial. It chewed the baby's legs off. The mother was in the next room all the time." She raises her voice. "They thought it was neglect."

Norma Jean is holding her ears. Leroy manages to open the refrigerator and get some Diet Pepsi to offer Mabel. Mabel still has some coffee and she waves away the Pepsi.

"Datsuns are like that," Mabel says. "They're jealous dogs. They'll tear a 75 place to pieces if you don't keep an eye on them."

"You better watch out what you're saying, Mabel," says Leroy.

"Well, facts is facts."

Leroy looks out the window at his rig. It is like a huge piece of furniture gathering dust in the backyard. Pretty soon it will be an antique. He hears the vacuum cleaner. Norma Jean seems to be cleaning the living room rug again.

Later, she says to Leroy, "She just said that about the baby because she caught me smoking. She's trying to pay me back."

"What are you talking about?" Leroy says, nervously shuffling blueprints. 80

"You know good and well," Norma Jean says. She is sitting in a kitchen chair with her feet up and her arms wrapped around her knees. She looks small and helpless. She says, "The very idea, her bringing up a subject like that! Saying it was neglect."

"She didn't mean that," Leroy says.

"She might not have thought she meant it. She always says things like that. You don't know how she goes on."

“But she didn’t really mean it. She was just talking.”

85 Leroy opens a king-sized bottle of beer and pours it into two glasses, dividing it carefully. He hands a glass to Norma Jean and she takes it from him mechanically. For a long time, they sit by the kitchen window watching the birds at the feeder.

Something is happening. Norma Jean is going to night school. She has graduated from her six-week body-building course and now she is taking an adult-education course in composition at Paducah Community College. She spends her evenings outlining paragraphs.

“First you have a topic sentence,” she explains to Leroy. “Then you divide it up. Your secondary topic has to be connected to your primary topic.”

To Leroy, this sounds intimidating. “I never was any good in English,” he says.

“It makes a lot of sense.”

90 “What are you doing this for, anyhow?”

She shrugs. “It’s something to do.” She stands up and lifts her dumbbells a few times.

“Driving a rig, nobody cared about my English.”

“I’m not criticizing your English.”

Norma Jean used to say, “If I lose ten minutes’ sleep, I just drag all day.” Now she stays up late, writing compositions. She got a B on her first paper—a how-to theme on soup-based casseroles. Recently Norma Jean has been cooking unusual foods—tacos, lasagna, Bombay chicken. She doesn’t play the organ anymore, though her second paper was called “Why Music Is Important to Me.” She sits at the kitchen table, concentrating on her outlines, while Leroy plays with his log house plans, practicing with a set of Lincoln Logs. The thought of getting a truckload of notched, numbered logs scares him, and he wants to be prepared. As he and Norma Jean work together at the kitchen table, Leroy has the hopeful thought that they are sharing something, but he knows he is a fool to think this. Norma Jean is miles away. He knows he is going to lose her. Like Mabel, he is just waiting for time to pass.

95 One day, Mabel is there before Norma Jean gets home from work, and Leroy finds himself confiding in her. Mabel, he realizes, must know Norma Jean better than he does.

“I don’t know what’s got into that girl,” Mabel says. “She used to go to bed with the chickens. Now you say she’s up all hours. Plus her a-smoking. I like to died.”

“I want to make her this beautiful home,” Leroy says, indicating the Lincoln Logs. “I don’t think she even wants it. Maybe she was happier with me gone.”

“She don’t know what to make of you, coming home like this.”

“Is that it?”

100 Mabel takes the roof off his Lincoln Log cabin. “You couldn’t get me in a log cabin,” she says. “I was raised in one. It’s no picnic, let me tell you.”

“They’re different now,” says Leroy.

“I tell you what,” Mabel says, smiling oddly at Leroy.

“What?”

“Take her on down to Shiloh. Y’all need to get out together, stir a little. Her brain’s all balled up over them books.”

Leroy can see traces of Norma Jean's features in her mother's face. Mabel's face has the texture of crinkled cotton, but suddenly she looks pretty. It occurs to Leroy that Mabel has been hinting all along that she wants them to take her with them to Shiloh. 105

"Let's all go to Shiloh," he says. "You and me and her. Come Sunday."

Mabel throws up her hands in protest. "Oh, no, not me. Young folks want to be by themselves."

When Norma Jean comes in with groceries, Leroy says excitedly, "Your mama here's been dying to go to Shiloh for thirty-five years. It's about time we went, don't you think?"

"I'm not going to butt in on anybody's second honeymoon," Mabel says.

"Who's going on a honeymoon, for Christ's sake?" Norma Jean says loudly. 110

"I never raised no daughter of mine to talk that-a-way," Mabel says.

"You ain't seen nothing yet," says Norma Jean. She starts putting away boxes and cans, slamming cabinet doors.

"There's a log cabin at Shiloh." Mabel says, "It was there during the battle. There's bullet holes in it."

"When are you going to shut up about Shiloh, Mama?" asks Norma Jean.

"I always thought Shiloh was the prettiest place, so full of history," Mabel goes on. "I just hoped y'all could see it once before I die, so you could tell me about it." 115
Later, she whispers to Leroy, "You do what I said. A little change is what she needs."

"Your name means 'the king,'" Norma Jean says to Leroy that evening. He is trying to get her to go to Shiloh, and she is reading a book about another century.

"Well, I reckon I ought to be right proud."

"I guess so."

"Am I still king around here?"

Norma Jean flexes her biceps and feels them for hardness. "I'm not fooling around with anybody, if that's what you mean," she says. 120

"Would you tell me if you were?"

"I don't know."

"What does your name mean?"

"It was Marilyn Monroe's real name."

"No kidding!" 125

"Norma comes from the Normans. They were invaders," she says. She closes her book and looks hard at Leroy. "I'll go to Shiloh with you if you'll stop staring at me."

On Sunday, Norma Jean packs a picnic and they go to Shiloh. To Leroy's relief, Mabel says she does not want to come with them. Norma Jean drives, and Leroy, sitting beside her, feels like some boring hitchhiker she has picked up. He tries some conversation, but she answers him in monosyllables. At Shiloh, she drives aimlessly through the park, past bluffs and trails and steep ravines. Shiloh is an immense place, and Leroy cannot see it as a battleground. It is not what he expected. He thought it would look like a golf course. Monuments are everywhere, showing through the thick clusters of trees. Norma Jean passes the log cabin Mabel mentioned. It is surrounded by tourists looking for bullet holes.

“That’s not the kind of log house I’ve got in mind,” says Leroy apologetically.
 “I know that.”

130 “This is a pretty place. Your mama was right.”

They burst out laughing together.

At the park museum, a movie on Shiloh is shown every half hour, but they decide that they don’t want to see it. They buy a souvenir Confederate flag for Mabel, and then they find a picnic spot near the cemetery. Norma Jean has brought a picnic cooler, with pimienta sandwiches, soft drinks, and Yodels. Leroy eats a sandwich and then smokes a joint, hiding it behind the picnic cooler. Norma Jean has quit smoking altogether. She is picking cake crumbs from the cellophane wrapper, like a fussy bird.

Leroy says, “So the boys in gray ended up in Corinth. The Union soldiers zapped ‘em finally. April 7, 1862.”

135 They both know that he doesn’t know any history. He is just talking about some of the historical plaques they have read. He feels awkward, like a boy on a date with an older girl. They are still just making conversation.

“Corinth is where Mama eloped to,” says Norma Jean.

They sit in silence and stare at the cemetery for the Union dead and, beyond, at a tall cluster of trees. Campers are parked nearby, bumper to bumper, and small children in bright clothing are cavorting and squealing. Norma Jean wads up the cake wrapper and squeezes it tightly in her hand. Without looking at Leroy, she says, “I want to leave you.”

Leroy takes a bottle of Coke out of the cooler and flips off the cap. He holds the bottle poised near his mouth but cannot remember to take a drink. Finally he says, “No, you don’t.”

“Yes, I do.”

140 “I won’t let you.”

“You can’t stop me.”

“Don’t do me that way.”

Leroy knows Norma Jean will have her own way. “Didn’t I promise to be home from now on?” he says.

“In some ways, a woman prefers a man who wanders,” says Norma Jean. “That sounds crazy, I know.”

145 “You’re not crazy.”

Leroy remembers to drink from his Coke. Then he says, “Yes, you are crazy. You and me could start all over again. Right back at the beginning.”

“We have started all over again,” says Norma Jean. “And this is how it turned out.”

“What did I do wrong?”

“Nothing.”

150 “Is this one of those women’s lib things?” Leroy asks.

“Don’t be funny.”

The cemetery, a green slope dotted with white markers, looks like a subdivision site. Leroy is trying to comprehend that his marriage is breaking up, but for some reason he is wondering about white slabs in a graveyard.

“Everything was fine till Mama caught me smoking,” says Norma Jean, standing up. “That set something off.”

“What are you talking about?”

“She won’t leave me alone—you won’t leave me alone.” Norma Jean seems to be crying, but she is looking away from him. “I feel eighteen again. I can’t face that all over again.” She starts walking away. “No, it wasn’t fine. I don’t know what I’m saying. Forget it.”

Leroy takes a lungful of smoke and closes his eyes as Norma Jean’s words sink in. He tries to focus on the fact that thirty-five hundred soldiers died on the grounds around him. He can only think of that war as a board game with plastic soldiers. Leroy almost smiles, as he compares the Confederates’ daring attack on the Union camps and Virgil Mathis’s raid on the bowling alley. General Grant, drunk and furious, shoved the Southerners back to Corinth, where Mabel and Jet Beasley were married years later, when Mabel was still thin and good-looking. The next day, Mabel and Jet visited the battleground, and then Norma Jean was born, and then she married Leroy and they had a baby, which they lost, and now Leroy and Norma Jean are here at the same battleground. Leroy knows he is leaving out a lot. He is leaving out the insides of history. History was always just names and dates to him. It occurs to him that building a house out of logs is similarly empty—too simple. And the real inner workings of a marriage, like most of history, have escaped him. Now he sees that building a log house is the dumbest idea he could have had. It was clumsy of him to think Norma Jean would want a log house. It was a crazy idea. He’ll have to think of something else, quickly. He will wad the blueprints into tight balls and fling them into the lake. Then he’ll get moving again. He opens his eyes. Norma Jean has moved away and is walking through the cemetery, following a serpentine brick path.

Leroy gets up to follow his wife, but his good leg is asleep and his bad leg still hurts him. Norma Jean is far away, walking rapidly toward the bluff by the river, and he tries to hobble toward her. Some children run past him, screaming noisily. Norma Jean has reached the bluff, and she is looking out over the Tennessee River. Now she turns toward Leroy and waves her arms. Is she beckoning to him? She seems to be doing an exercise for her chest muscles. The sky is unusually pale—the color of the dust ruffle Mabel made for their bed.

The Jewelry¹

Born Henri René Albert in Normandy, France, Maupassant was expelled at sixteen from a Rouen seminary and finished his education at a public high school. After serving in the Franco-Prussian War, he worked as a government clerk in Paris for ten years. A protégé of Flaubert, he published during the 1880s some three hundred stories, half a dozen novels, and plays. The short stories, which appeared regularly in popular periodicals, sampled military and peasant life, the decadent world of politics and journalism, prostitution, the supernatural, and the hypocrisies of solid citizens; with Chekhov, Maupassant may be said to have created the modern short story. His life ended somewhat like one of his own stories: He died of syphilis in an asylum. His novels include Une Vie (A Life, 1883), Bel Ami (Handsome Friend, 1885), and Pierre et Jean (1888).

Having met the girl one evening, at the house of the office-superintendent, M. Lantin became enveloped in love as in a net.

She was the daughter of a country-tutor, who had been dead for several years. Afterward she had come to Paris with her mother, who made regular visits to several bourgeois families of the neighborhood, in hopes of being able to get her daughter married. They were poor and respectable, quiet and gentle. The young girl seemed to be the very ideal of that pure good woman to whom every young man dreams of entrusting his future. Her modest beauty had a charm of angelic shyness; and the slight smile that always dwelt about her lips seemed a reflection of her heart.

Everybody sang her praises; all who knew her kept saying: "The man who gets her will be lucky. No one could find a nicer girl than that."

M. Lantin, who was then chief clerk in the office of the Minister of the Interior, with a salary of 3,500 francs a year,² demanded her hand, and married her.

5 He was unutterably happy with her. She ruled his home with an economy so adroit that they really seemed to live in luxury. It would be impossible to conceive of any attentions, tenderesses, playful caresses which she did not lavish upon her husband; and such was the charm of her person that, six years after he married her, he loved her even more than he did the first day.

There were only two points upon which he ever found fault with her—her love of the theater, and her passion for false jewelry.

Her lady-friends (she was acquainted with the wives of several small office holders) were always bringing her tickets for the theaters; whenever there was a performance that made a sensation, she always had her loge secured, even for first performances; and she would drag her husband with her to all these entertainments, which used to tire him horribly after his day's work. So at last he begged her to go to the theater with some lady-acquaintances who would consent to see her home afterward. She refused for quite a while—thinking it would not look very well to go out thus unaccompanied by her husband. But finally she yielded, just to please him; and he felt infinitely grateful to her therefore.

Now this passion for the theater at last evoked in her the desire of dress. It was true that her toilette remained simple, always in good taste, but modest; and her sweet grace, her irresistible grace, ever smiling and shy, seemed to take fresh charm from the simplicity of her robes. But she got into the habit of suspending in her pretty ears two big cut pebbles, fashioned in imitation of diamonds; and she wore necklaces of false pearls, bracelets of false gold, and haircombs studded with paste-imitations of precious stones.

Her husband, who felt shocked by this love of tinsel and show, would often say—"My dear, when one has not the means to afford real jewelry, one should appear adorned with one's natural beauty and grace only—and these gifts are the rarest of jewels.”

But she would smile sweetly and answer: “What does it matter? I like those things—that is my little whim. I know you are right; but one can't make oneself over again. I've always loved jewelry so much!”

And then she would roll the pearls of the necklaces between her fingers, and make the facets of the cut crystals flash in the light, repeating: “Now look at them—see how well the work is done. You would swear it was real jewelry.”

He would then smile in his turn, and declare to her: “You have the tastes of a regular Gypsy.”

Sometimes, in the evening, when they were having a chat by the fire, she would rise and fetch the morocco box in which she kept her “stock” (as M. Lantin called it)—would put it on the tea-table, and begin to examine the false jewelry with passionate delight, as if she experienced some secret and mysterious sensations of pleasure in their contemplation; and she would insist on putting one of the necklaces round her husband's neck, and laugh till she couldn't laugh any more, crying out: “Oh! how funny you look!” Then she would rush into his arms, and kiss him furiously.

One winter's night, after she had been to the Opera, she came home chilled through, and trembling. Next day she had a bad cough. Eight days after that, she died of pneumonia.

Lantin was very nearly following her into the tomb. His despair was so frightful that in one single month his hair turned white. He wept from morning till night, feeling his heart torn by inexpressible suffering—ever haunted by the memory of her, by the smile, by the voice, by all the charm of the dead woman.

Time did not assuage his grief. Often during office hours his fellow-clerks went off to a corner to chat about this or that topic of the day—his cheeks might have been seen to swell up all of a sudden, his nose wrinkle, his eyes fill with water—he would pull a frightful face, and begin to sob.

He had kept his dead companion's room just in the order she had left it, and he used to lock himself up in it every evening to think about her—all the furniture, and even all her dresses, remained in the same place they had been on the last day of her life.

But life became hard for him. His salary, which, in his wife's hands, had amply sufficed for all household needs, now proved scarcely sufficient to supply his own few wants. And he asked himself in astonishment how she had managed always to furnish him with excellent wines and with delicate eating which he could not now afford at all with his scanty means.

He got a little into debt, like men obliged to live by their wits. At last one morning that he happened to find himself without a cent in his pocket, and a whole week to wait before he could draw his monthly salary, he thought of selling something; and almost immediately it occurred to him to sell his wife's “stock”—for he had always borne a secret grudge against the flash-jewelry that used to annoy him so much in former days. The mere sight of it, day after day, somewhat spoiled the sad pleasure of thinking of his darling.

He tried a long time to make a choice among the heap of trinkets she had left behind her—for up to the very last day of her life she had kept obstinately buying them, bringing home some new thing almost every night—and finally he resolved to take the big pearl necklace which she used to like the best of all, and which he thought ought certainly to be worth six or eight francs, as it was really very nicely mounted for an imitation necklace.

He put it in his pocket, and walked toward the office, following the boulevards, and looking for some jewelry-store on the way, where he could enter with confidence.

Finally he saw a place and went in; feeling a little ashamed of thus exposing his misery, and of trying to sell such a trifling object.

“Sir,” he said to the jeweler, “please tell me what this is worth.”

The jeweler took the necklace, examined it, weighed it, took up a magnifying glass, called his clerk, talked to him in whispers, put down the necklace on the counter, and drew back a little bit to judge of its effect at a distance.

25 M. Lantin, feeling very much embarrassed by all these ceremonies, opened his mouth and began to declare—“Oh! I know it can’t be worth much” . . . when the jeweler interrupted him saying:

“Well, sir, that is worth between twelve and fifteen thousand francs; but I cannot buy it unless you can let me know exactly how you came by it.”

The widower’s eyes opened enormously, and he stood gaping—unable to understand. Then after a while he stammered out: “You said? . . . Are you sure?” The jeweler, misconstruing the cause of this astonishment, replied in a dry tone—“Go elsewhere if you like, and see if you can get any more for it. The very most I would give for it is fifteen thousand. Come back and see me again, if you can’t do better.”

M. Lantin, feeling perfectly idiotic, took his necklace and departed; obeying a confused desire to find himself alone and to get a chance to think.

But the moment he found himself in the street again, he began to laugh, and he muttered to himself: “The fool!—oh! what a fool; If I had only taken him at his word. Well, well!—a jeweler who can’t tell paste from real jewelry!”

30 And he entered another jewelry-store, at the corner of the Rue de la Paix. The moment the jeweler set eyes on the necklace, he examined—“Hello! I know that necklace well—it was sold here!”

M. Lantin, very nervous, asked:

“What’s it worth?”

“Sir, I sold it for twenty-five thousand francs. I am willing to buy it back again for eighteen thousand—if you can prove to me satisfactorily, according to legal prescriptions, how you came into possession of it.”—This time, M. Lantin was simply paralyzed with astonishment. He said: “Well . . . but please look at it again, sir. I always thought until now that it was . . . was false.”

The jeweler said:

35 “Will you give me your name, sir?”

“Certainly. My name is Lantin; I am employed at the office of the Minister of the Interior. I live at No. 16, Rue des Martyrs.”

The merchant opened the register, looked, and said: “Yes; this necklace was sent to the address of Madame Lantin, 16 Rue des Martyrs, on July 20th, 1876.”

And the two men looked into each other’s eyes—the clerk wild with surprise; the jeweler suspecting he had a thief before him.

The jeweler resumed:

“Will you be kind enough to leave this article here for twenty-four hours only—I’ll give you a receipt.” 40

M. Lantin stuttered: “Yes—ah! certainly.” And he went out folding up the receipt, which he put in his pocket.

Then he crossed the street, went the wrong way, found out his mistake, returned by way of the Tuileries, crossed the Seine, found out he had taken the wrong road again, and went back to the Champs-Élysées without being able to get one clear idea into his head. He tried to reason, to understand. His wife could never have bought so valuable an object as that. Certainly not. But then, it must have been a present! . . . A present from whom? What for?

He stopped and stood stock-still in the middle of the avenue.

A horrible suspicion swept across his mind. . . . She? . . . But then all those other pieces of jewelry must have been presents also! . . . Then it seemed to him that the ground was heaving under his feet; that a tree, right in front of him, was falling toward him; he thrust out his arms instinctively, and fell senseless.

He recovered his consciousness again in a drug-store to which some bystanders had carried him. He had them lead him home, and he locked himself into his room. 45

Until nightfall he cried without stopping, biting his handkerchief to keep himself from screaming out. Then, completely worn out with grief and fatigue, he went to bed, and slept a leaden sleep.

A ray of sunshine awakened him, and he rose and dressed himself slowly to go to the office. It was hard to have to work after such a shock. Then he reflected that he might be able to excuse himself to the superintendent, and he wrote to him. Then he remembered he would have to go back to the jeweler’s; and shame made his face purple. He remained thinking a long time. Still he could not leave the necklace there; he put on his coat and went out.

It was a fine day; the sky extended all blue over the city, and seemed to make it smile. Strollers were walking aimlessly about, with their hands in their pockets.

Lantin thought as he watched them passing: “How lucky the men are who have fortunes! With money a man can even shake off grief—you can go where you please—travel—amuse yourself! Oh! if I were only rich!”

He suddenly discovered he was hungry—not having eaten anything since the evening before. But his pockets were empty; and he remembered the necklace. Eighteen thousand francs! Eighteen thousand francs!—that was a sum—that was! 50

He made his way to the Rue de la Paix and began to walk backward and forward on the sidewalk in front of the store. Eighteen thousand francs! Twenty times he started to go in; but shame always kept him back.

Still he was hungry—very hungry—and had not a cent. He made one brusque resolve, and crossed the street almost at a run, so as not to let himself have time to think over the matter; and he rushed into the jeweler’s.

As soon as he saw him, the merchant hurried forward, and offered him a chair with smiling politeness. Even the clerks came forward to stare at Lantin, with gaiety in their eyes and smiles about their lips.

The jeweler said: "Sir, I made inquiries; and if you are still so disposed, I am ready to pay you down the price I offered you."

55 The clerk stammered: "Why, yes—sir, certainly."

The jeweler took from a drawer eighteen big bills,³ counted them, and held them out to Lantin, who signed a little receipt, and thrust the money feverishly into his pocket.

Then, as he was on the point of leaving, he turned to the ever-smiling merchant, and said, lowering his eyes: "I have some—I have some other jewelry, which came to me in the same—from the same inheritance. Would you purchase them also from me?"

The merchant bowed, and answered: "Why, certainly, sir—certainly. . . ." One of the clerks rushed out to laugh at his ease; another kept blowing his nose as hard as he could.

Lantin, impassive, flushed and serious, said: "I will bring them to you."

60 And he hired a cab to get the jewelry.

When he returned to the store, an hour later, he had not yet breakfasted. They examined the jewelry—piece by piece—putting a value on each. Nearly all had been purchased from that very house.

Lantin, now, disputed estimates made, got angry, insisted on seeing the books, and talked louder and louder the higher the estimates grew.

The big diamond earrings were worth 20,000 francs; the bracelets, 35,000; the brooches, rings and medallions, 16,000; a set of emeralds and sapphires, 14,000; solitaire, suspended to a gold neckchain, 40,000; the total value being estimated at 196,000 francs.

The merchant observed with mischievous good nature: "The person who owned these must have put all her savings into jewelry."

65 Lantin answered with gravity: "Perhaps that is as good a way of saving money as any other." And he went off, after having agreed with the merchant that an expert should make a counter-estimate for him the next day.

When he found himself in the street again, he looked at the Column Vendôme⁴ with the desire to climb it, as if it were a May pole. He felt jolly enough to play leapfrog over the Emperor's head—up there in the blue sky.

He breakfasted at Voisin's⁵ restaurant, and ordered wine at 20 francs a bottle.

Then he hired a cab and drove out to the Bois.⁶ He looked at the carriages passing with a sort of contempt, and a wild desire to yell out to the passers-by: "I am rich, too—I am! I have 200,000 francs!"

The recollection of the office suddenly came back to him. He drove there, walked right into the superintendent's private room, and said: "Sir, I come to give you my resignation. I have just come into a fortune of three hundred thousand francs." Then he shook hands all round with his fellow-clerks; and told them all about his plans for a new career. Then he went to dinner at the Café Anglais.

Finding himself seated at the same table with a man who seemed to him quite genteel, he could not resist the itching desire to tell him, with a certain air of coquetry, that he had just inherited a fortune of four hundred thousand francs.

For the first time in his life he went to the theater without feeling bored by the performance; and he passed the night in revelry and debauch.

Six months after he married again. His second wife was the most upright of spouses, but had a terrible temper. She made his life very miserable.

HERMAN MELVILLE
(1819–91)

Bartleby, the Scrivener:
A Story of Wall Street

When his father died in debt, twelve-year-old Herman Melville's life of privilege became one of struggle. At eighteen, he left his native New York to teach in a backwoods Massachusetts school, then trained as a surveyor; finding no work, he became a sailor in 1839. After five years in the South Seas, he wrote Typee (1846) and Omoo (1847), sensationalized and wildly popular accounts of his voyages. They proved the pinnacle of Melville's career in his lifetime, however; Mardi (1849) was judged too abstruse, the travel narratives Redburn (1849) and White-Jacket (1850) too listless. Melville's magnum opus, Moby Dick (1851), was alternately shunned and condemned. His later novels—Pierre (1852), Israel Potter (1853), and The Confidence-Man (1856)—as well as his poetry collection Battle-Pieces (1866) were all but ignored. Melville's reputation as one of the giants of American literature was established only after his death; the novella Billy Budd, Sailor (not published until 1924), like Moby Dick, is judged a masterpiece.

I am a rather elderly man. The nature of my avocations for the last thirty years has brought me into more than ordinary contact with what would seem an interesting and somewhat singular set of men, of whom as yet nothing that I know of has ever been written:—I mean the law-copyists or scriveners. I have known very many of them, professionally and privately, and if I pleased, could relate divers histories, at which good-natured gentlemen might smile, and sentimental souls might weep. But I waive the biographies of all other scriveners for a few passages in the life of Bartleby, who was a scrivener the strangest I ever saw or heard of. While of other law-copyists I might write the complete life, of Bartleby nothing of that sort can be done. I believe that no materials exist for a full and satisfactory biography of this man. It is an irreparable loss to literature. Bartleby was one of those beings of whom nothing is ascertainable, except from the original sources, and in his case those are very small. What my own astonished eyes saw of Bartleby, that is all I know of him, except, indeed, one vague report which will appear in the sequel.¹

Ere introducing the scrivener, as he first appeared to me, it is fit I make some mention of myself, my employées, my business, my chambers, and general surroundings; because some such description is indispensable to an adequate understanding of the chief character about to be presented.

Imprimis:² I am a man who, from his youth upwards, has been filled with a profound conviction that the easiest way of life is the best. Hence, though I belong to a profession proverbially energetic and nervous, even to turbulence, at times, yet nothing of that sort have I ever suffered to invade my peace. I am one of those unambitious lawyers who never addresses a jury, or in any way draws down public applause; but in the cool tranquillity of a snug retreat, do a snug business among rich men's bonds and mortgages and title-deeds. All who know me, consider me an eminently safe man. The late John Jacob Astor,³ a personage little given to poetic enthusiasm, had no hesitation in pronouncing my first grand point to be prudence; my next, method. I do not speak it in vanity, but simply record the fact, that I was not unemployed in my profession by the late John Jacob Astor; a name which, I admit, I love to repeat, for it hath a rounded and orbicular sound to it, and rings like unto bullion. I will freely add that I was not insensible to the late John Jacob Astor's good opinion.

Some time prior to the period at which this little history begins, my avocations had been largely increased. The good old office, now extinct in the State of New York, of a Master in Chancery⁴ had been conferred upon me. It was not a very arduous office, but very pleasantly remunerative. I seldom lose my temper; much more seldom indulge in dangerous indignation at wrongs and outrages; but I must be permitted to be rash here and declare, that I consider the sudden and violent abrogation of the office of Master in Chancery, by the new Constitution, as a—premature act; inasmuch as I had counted upon a life-lease of the profits, whereas I only received those of a few short years. But this is by the way.

5 My chambers were up stairs at No. — Wall Street. At one end they looked upon the white wall of the interior of a spacious skylight shaft, penetrating the building from top to bottom. This view might have been considered rather tame than otherwise, deficient in what landscape painters call "life." But if so, the view from the other end of my chambers offered, at least, a contrast, if nothing more. In that direction my windows commanded an unobstructed view of a lofty brick wall, black by age and everlasting shade; which wall required no spyglass to bring out its lurking beauties, but for the benefit of all near-sighted spectators, was pushed up to within ten feet of my window panes. Owing to the great height of the surrounding buildings, and my chambers being on the second floor, the interval between this wall and mine not a little resembled a huge square cistern.

At the period just preceding the advent of Bartleby, I had two persons as copyists in my employment, and a promising lad as an office-boy. First, Turkey; second, Nippers, third, Ginger Nut. These may seem names the like of which are not usually found in the Directory.⁵ In truth they were nicknames, mutually conferred upon each other by my three clerks, and were deemed expressive of their respective persons or characters. Turkey was a short, pursy⁶ Englishman of about my own age, that is, somewhere not far from sixty. In the morning, one might say, his face was of a fine florid hue, but after twelve o'clock, meridian—his dinner hour—it blazed like a grate full of Christmas coals; and continued blazing—but, as it were, with a gradual wane—till 6 o'clock, P.M. or thereabouts, after which I saw no more of the proprietor of the face, which gaining its meridian with the sun, seemed to set with it, to rise, culminate, and decline the following day, with the like regularity and undiminished glory. There are many singular coincidences I have known in the course of my life, not the least among which was the fact, that exactly when Turkey displayed his fullest beams from his red and radiant countenance, just then, too, at that critical moment, began the daily period when I considered his business capacities as seriously disturbed for the remainder of the twenty-four hours. Not that he was absolutely idle, or averse to business then; far from it. The difficulty was, he was apt to be altogether too energetic. There was a strange, inflamed, flurried, flighty recklessness of activity about him. He would be incautious in dipping his pen into his inkstand. All his blots upon my documents were dropped there after twelve o'clock, meridian. Indeed, not only would he be reckless and sadly given to making blots in the afternoon, but some days he went further, and was rather noisy. At such times, too, his face flamed with augmented blazonry, as if cannel coal had been heaped on anthracite.⁷ He made an unpleasant racket with his chair; spilled his sand-box; in mending his pens, impatiently split them all to pieces, and threw them on the floor in a sudden passion; stood up and leaned over his table, boxing his papers about in a most indecorous manner, very sad to behold in an elderly man like him. Nevertheless, as he was in many ways a most valuable person to me, and all the time before twelve o'clock, meridian, was the quickest, steadiest creature too, accomplishing a great deal of work in a style not easy to be matched—for these reasons, I was willing to overlook his eccentricities, though indeed, occasionally, I remonstrated with him. I did this very gently, however, because, though the civilest, nay, the blandest and most reverential of men in the morning, yet in the afternoon he was disposed, upon provocation, to be slightly rash with his tongue, in fact, insolent. Now, valuing his morning services as I did, and resolved not to lose them; yet, at the same time made uncomfortable by his inflamed ways after twelve o'clock; and being a man of peace, unwilling by my admonitions to call forth unseemly retorts from him; I took upon me, one Saturday noon (he was always worse on Saturdays), to hint to him, very kindly, that perhaps now that he was growing old, it might be well to abridge his labors; in short, he need not come to my chambers after twelve o'clock, but, dinner over, had best go home to his lodgings and rest himself till tea-time. But no; he insisted upon his afternoon devotions. His countenance became intolerably fervid, as he oratorically assured me—gesticulating with a long ruler at the other end of the room—that if his services in the morning were useful, how indispensable, then, in the afternoon?

“With submission, sir,” said Turkey on this occasion, “I consider myself your right-hand man. In the morning I but marshal and deploy my columns; but in the afternoon I put myself at their head, and gallantly charge the foe, thus!”—and he made a violent thrust with the ruler.

“But the blots, Turkey,” intimated I.

“True,—but, with submission, sir, behold these hairs! I am getting old. Surely, sir, a blot or two of a warm afternoon is not to be severely urged against gray hairs. Old age—even if it blot the page—is honorable. With submission, sir, we both are getting old.”

10 This appeal to my fellow-feeling was hardly to be resisted. At all events, I saw that go he would not. So I made up my mind to let him stay, resolving, nevertheless, to see to it, that during the afternoon he had to do with my less important papers.

Nippers, the second on my list, was a whiskered, sallow, and, upon the whole, rather piratical-looking young man of about five and twenty. I always deemed him the victim of two evil powers—ambition and indigestion. The ambition was evinced by a certain impatience of the duties of a mere copyist, an unwarrantable usurpation of strictly professional affairs, such as the original drawing up of legal documents. The indigestion seemed betokened in an occasional nervous testiness and grinning irritability, causing the teeth to audibly grind together over mistakes committed in copying; unnecessary maledictions, hissed, rather than spoken, in the heat of business; and especially by a continual discontent with the height of the table where he worked. Though of a very ingenious mechanical turn, Nippers could never get this table to suit him. He put chips under it, blocks of various sorts, bits of pasteboard, and at last went so far as to attempt an exquisite adjustment by final pieces of folded blotting-paper. But no invention would answer. If, for the sake of easing his back, he brought the table lid at a sharp angle well up towards his chin, and wrote there like a man using the steep roof of a Dutch house for his desk:—then he declared that it stopped the circulation in his arms. If now he lowered the table to his waistbands, and stooped over it in writing, then there was a sore aching in his back. In short, the truth of the matter was, Nippers knew not what he wanted. Or, if he wanted any thing, it was to be rid of a scrivener’s table altogether. Among the manifestations of his diseased ambition was a fondness he had for receiving visits from certain ambiguous-looking fellows in seedy coats, whom he called his clients. Indeed I was aware that not only was he, at times, considerable of a ward-politician, but he occasionally did a little business at the Justices’ courts, and was not unknown on the steps of the Tombs.⁸ I have good reason to believe, however, that one individual who called upon him at my chambers, and who, with a grand air, he insisted was his client, was no other than a dun,⁹ and the alleged title-deed, a bill. But with all his failings, and the annoyances he caused me, Nippers, like his compatriot Turkey, was a very useful man to me; wrote a neat, swift hand; and, when he chose, was not deficient in a gentlemanly sort of deportment. Added to this, he always dressed in a gentlemanly sort of way: and so, incidentally, reflected credit upon my chambers. Whereas with respect to Turkey, I had much ado to keep him from being a reproach to me. His clothes were apt to look oily and smell of eating-houses. He wore his pantaloons very loose and baggy in summer. His coats were execrable; his hat not to be handled. But while the hat was a thing of indifference to me, inasmuch as his natural civility and deference, as a dependent Englishman, always led him to doff it the moment he entered the room, yet his coat was another matter. Concerning his coats, I reasoned with him; but with no effect. The truth was, I suppose, that a man with so small an income, could not afford to sport such a lustrous face and a lustrous coat at one and the same time. As Nippers once observed, Turkey's money went chiefly for red ink. One winter day I presented Turkey with a highly-respectable looking coat of my own, a padded gray coat, of a most comfortable warmth, and which buttoned straight up from the knee to the neck. I thought Turkey would appreciate the favor, and abate his rashness and obstreperousness of afternoons. But no. I verily believe that buttoning himself up in so downy and blanket-like a coat had a pernicious effect upon him; upon the same principle that too much oats are bad for horses. In fact, precisely as a rash, restive horse is said to feel his oats, so Turkey felt his coat. It made him insolent. He was a man whom prosperity harmed.

Though concerning the self-indulgent habits of Turkey I had my own private surmises, yet touching Nippers I was well persuaded that whatever might be his faults in other respects, he was, at least, a temperate young man. But indeed, nature herself seemed to have been his vintner,¹ and at his birth charged him so thoroughly with an irritable, brandy-like disposition, that all subsequent potations were needless. When I consider how, amid the stillness of my chambers, Nippers would sometimes impatiently rise from his seat, and stooping over his table, spread his arms wide apart, seize the whole desk, and move it, and jerk it, with a grim, grinding motion on the floor, as if the table were a perverse voluntary agent, intent on thwarting and vexing him; I plainly perceive that for Nippers, brandy and water were altogether superfluous.

It was fortunate for me that, owing to its peculiar cause—indigestion—the irritability and consequent nervousness of Nippers, were mainly observable in the morning, while in the afternoon he was comparatively mild. So that Turkey's paroxysms only coming on about twelve o'clock, I never had to do with their eccentricities at one time. Their fits relieved each other like guards. When Nippers' was on, Turkey's was off; and vice versa. This was a good natural arrangement under the circumstances.

Ginger Nut, the third on my list, was a lad some twelve years old. His father was a carman,² ambitious of seeing his son on the bench instead of a cart, before he died. So he sent him to my office as student at law, errand boy, and cleaner and sweeper, at the rate of one dollar a week. He had a little desk to himself, but he did not use it much. Upon inspection, the drawer exhibited a great array of the shells of various sorts of nuts. Indeed, to this quick-witted youth the whole noble science of the law was contained in a nutshell. Not the least among the employments of Ginger Nut, as well as one which he discharged with the most alacrity, was his duty as cake and apple purveyor for Turkey and Nippers. Copying law papers being proverbially a dry, husky sort of business, my two scribes were fain to moisten their mouths very often with Spitzenbergs³ to be had at the numerous stalls nigh the Custom House and Post Office. Also, they sent Ginger Nut very frequently for that peculiar cake—small, flat, round, and very spicy—after which he had been named by them. Of a cold morning when business was but dull, Turkey would gobble up scores of these cakes, as if they were mere wafers—indeed they sell them at the rate of six or eight for a penny—the scrape of his pen blending with the crunching of the crisp particles in his mouth. Of all the fiery afternoon blunders and flurried rashnesses of Turkey, was his once moistening a ginger-cake between his lips, and clapping it on to a mortgage for a seal. I came within an ace of dismissing him then. But he mollified me by making an oriental bow, and saying—“With submission, sir, it was generous of me to find you in⁴ stationery on my own account.”

15 Now my original business—that of a conveyancer and title hunter,⁵ and drawer-up of recondite documents of all sorts—was considerably increased by receiving the master’s office. There was now great work for scribes. Not only must I push the clerks already with me, but I must have additional help. In answer to my advertisement, a motionless young man one morning stood upon my office threshold, the door being open, for it was summer. I can see that figure now—pallidly neat, pitiably respectable, incurably forlorn! It was Bartleby.

After a few words touching his qualifications, I engaged him, glad to have among my corps of copyists a man of so singularly sedate an aspect, which I thought might operate beneficially upon the flighty temper of Turkey, and the fiery one of Nippers.

I should have stated before that ground glass folding-doors divided my premises into two parts, one of which was occupied by my scribes, the other by myself. According to my humor I threw open these doors, or closed them. I resolved to assign Bartleby a corner by the folding-doors, but on my side of them, so as to have this quiet man within easy call, in case any trifling thing was to be done. I placed his desk close up to a small side-window in that part of the room, a window which originally had afforded a lateral view of certain grimy backyards and bricks, but which, owing to subsequent erections, commanded at present no view at all, though it gave some light. Within three feet of the panes was a wall, and the light came down from far above, between two lofty buildings, as from a very small opening in a dome. Still further to a satisfactory arrangement, I procured a high green folding screen, which might entirely isolate Bartleby from my sight, though not remove him from my voice. And thus, in a manner, privacy and society were conjoined.

At first Bartleby did an extraordinary quantity of writing. As if long famishing for something to copy, he seemed to gorge himself on my documents. There was no pause for digestion. He ran a day and night line, copying by sunlight and by candlelight. I should have been quite delighted with his application, had he been cheerfully industrious. But he wrote on silently, palely, mechanically.

It is, of course, an indispensable part of a scrivener's business to verify the accuracy of his copy, word by word. Where there are two or more scriveners in an office, they assist each other in this examination, one reading from the copy, the other holding the original. It is a very dull, wearisome, and lethargic affair. I can readily imagine that to some sanguine temperaments it would be altogether intolerable. For example, I cannot credit that the mettlesome poet Byron would have contentedly sat down with Bartleby to examine a law document of, say, five hundred pages, closely written in a crimped hand.

Now and then, in the haste of business, it had been my habit to assist in comparing some brief document myself, calling Turkey or Nippers for this purpose. One object I had in placing Bartleby so handy to me behind the screen, was to avail myself of his services on such trivial occasions. It was on the third day, I think, of his being with me, and before any necessity had arisen for having his own writing examined, that, being much hurried to complete a small affair I had in hand, I abruptly called to Bartleby. In my haste and natural expectancy of instant compliance, I sat with my head bent over the original on my desk, and my right hand sideways, and somewhat nervously extended with the copy, so that immediately upon emerging from his retreat, Bartleby might snatch it and proceed to business without the least delay.

In this very attitude did I sit when I called to him, rapidly stating what it was I wanted him to do—namely, to examine a small paper with me. Imagine my surprise, nay, my consternation, when without moving from his privacy, Bartleby, in a singularly mild, firm voice, replied, "I would prefer not to."

I sat awhile in perfect silence, rallying my stunned faculties. Immediately it occurred to me that my ears had deceived me, or Bartleby had entirely misunderstood my meaning. I repeated my request in the clearest tone I could assume. But in quite as clear a one came the previous reply, "I would prefer not to."

"Prefer not to," echoed I, rising in high excitement, and crossing the room with a stride. "What do you mean? Are you moon-struck?⁶ I want you to help me compare this sheet here—take it," and I thrust it towards him.

"I would prefer not to," said he.

I looked at him steadfastly. His face was leanly composed; his gray eye dimly calm. Not a wrinkle of agitation rippled him. Had there been the least uneasiness, anger, impatience or impertinence in his manner; in other words, had there been anything ordinarily human about him, doubtless I should have violently dismissed him from the premises. But as it was, I should have as soon thought of turning my pale plaster-of-paris bust of Cicero⁷ out-of-doors. I stood gazing at him awhile, as he went on with his own writing, and then reseated myself at my desk. This is very strange, thought I. What had one best do? But my business hurried me. I concluded to forget the matter for the present, reserving it for my future leisure. So calling Nippers from the other room, the paper was speedily examined.

A few days after this, Bartleby concluded four lengthy documents, being quadruplicates of a week's testimony taken before me in my High Court of Chancery.

6. Crazy.

7. Marcus Tullius Cicero (106–43 BCE), pro-republican Roman statesman, barrister, writer, and orator.

It became necessary to examine them. It was an important suit, and great accuracy was imperative. Having all things arranged I called Turkey, Nippers and Ginger Nut from the next room, meaning to place the four copies in the hands of my four clerks, while I should read from the original. Accordingly Turkey, Nippers and Ginger Nut had taken their seats in a row, each with his document in hand, when I called to Bartleby to join this interesting group.

“Bartleby! quick, I am waiting.”

I heard a slow scrape of his chair legs on the uncarpeted floor, and soon he appeared standing at the entrance of his hermitage.

“What is wanted?” said he mildly.

30 “The copies, the copies,” said I hurriedly. “We are going to examine them. There”—and I held towards him the fourth quadruplicate.

“I would prefer not to,” he said, and gently disappeared behind the screen.

For a few moments I was turned into a pillar of salt,⁸ standing at the head of my seated column of clerks. Recovering myself, I advanced towards the screen, and demanded the reason for such extraordinary conduct.

“Why do you refuse?”

35 With any other man I should have flown outright into a dreadful passion, scorned all further words, and thrust him ignominiously from my presence. But there was something about Bartleby that not only strangely disarmed me, but in a wonderful manner touched and disconcerted me. I began to reason with him.

“These are your own copies we are about to examine. It is labor saving to you, because one examination will answer for your four papers. It is common usage. Every copyist is bound to help examine his copy. Is it not so? Will you not speak? Answer!”

“I prefer not to,” he replied in a flute-like tone. It seemed to me that while I had been addressing him, he carefully revolved every statement that I made; fully comprehended the meaning; could not gainsay the irresistible conclusion; but, at the same time, some paramount consideration prevailed with him to reply as he did.

“You are decided, then, not to comply with my request—a request made according to common usage and common sense?”

He briefly gave me to understand that on that point my judgment was sound. Yes: his decision was irreversible.

40 It is not seldom the case that when a man is browbeaten in some unprecedented and violently unreasonable way, he begins to stagger in his own plainest faith. He begins, as it were, vaguely to surmise that, wonderful as it may be, all the justice and all the reason is on the other side. Accordingly, if any disinterested persons are present, he turns to them for some reinforcement for his own faltering mind.

“Turkey,” said I, “what do you think of this? Am I not right?”

“With submission, sir,” said Turkey, with his blandest tone, “I think that you are.”

“Nippers,” said I, “what do you think of it?”

8. Struck dumb; in Genesis 19.26, Lot's wife, defying God's command, “looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt.”

“I think I should kick him out of the office.”

(The reader of nice perceptions will here perceive that, it being morning, Turkey’s answer is couched in polite and tranquil terms, but Nippers replies in ill-tempered ones. Or, to repeat a previous sentence, Nippers’s ugly mood was on duty, and Turkey’s off.)

“Ginger Nut,” said I, willing to enlist the smallest suffrage⁹ in my behalf, “what do you think of it?”

“I think, sir, he’s a little lunny,” replied Ginger Nut, with a grin.

“You hear what they say,” said I, turning towards the screen, “come forth and do your duty.”

But he vouchsafed no reply. I pondered a moment in sore perplexity. But once more business hurried me. I determined again to postpone the consideration of this dilemma to my future leisure. With a little trouble we made out to examine the papers without Bartleby, though at every page or two, Turkey deferentially dropped his opinion that this proceeding was quite out of the common; while Nippers, twitching in his chair with a dyspeptic nervousness, ground out between his set teeth occasional hissing maledictions against the stubborn oaf behind the screen. And for his (Nippers’s) part, this was the first and the last time he would do another man’s business without pay.

Meanwhile Bartleby sat in his hermitage, oblivious to everything but his own peculiar business there.

Some days passed, the scrivener being employed upon another lengthy work. His late remarkable conduct led me to regard his ways narrowly. I observed that he never went to dinner; indeed that he never went anywhere. As yet I had never of my personal knowledge known him to be outside of my office. He was a perpetual sentry in the corner. At about eleven o’clock though, in the morning, I noticed that Ginger Nut would advance toward the opening in Bartleby’s screen, as if silently beckoned thither by a gesture invisible to me where I sat. The boy would then leave the office jingling a few pence, and reappear with a handful of ginger-nuts which he delivered in the hermitage, receiving two of the cakes for his trouble.

He lives, then, on ginger-nuts, thought I; never eats a dinner, properly speaking; he must be a vegetarian then; but no; he never eats even vegetables, he eats nothing but ginger-nuts. My mind then ran on in reveries concerning the probable effects upon the human constitution of living entirely on ginger-nuts. Ginger-nuts are so called because they contain ginger as one of their peculiar constituents, and the final flavoring one. Now what was ginger? A hot, spicy thing. Was Bartleby hot and spicy? Not at all. Ginger, then, had no effect upon Bartleby. Probably he preferred it should have none.

Nothing so aggravates an earnest person as a passive resistance. If the individual so resisted be of a not inhumane temper, and the resisting one perfectly harmless in his passivity; then, in the better moods of the former, he will endeavor charitably to construe to his imagination what proves impossible to be solved by his judgment. Even so, for the most part, I regarded Bartleby and his ways. Poor fellow! thought I, he means no mischief; it is plain he intends no insolence; his aspect sufficiently evinces that his eccentricities are involuntary. He is useful to me. I can get along with him. If I turn him away, the chances are he will fall in with some less indulgent employer, and then he will be rudely treated, and perhaps driven forth miserably to starve. Yes. Here I can cheaply purchase a delicious self-approval. To befriend Bartleby; to humor him in his strange wilfulness, will cost me little or nothing, while I lay up in my soul what will eventually prove a sweet morsel for my conscience. But this mood was not invariable with me. The passiveness of Bartleby sometimes irritated me. I felt strangely goaded on to encounter him in new opposition, to elicit some angry spark from him answerable to my own. But indeed I might as well have essayed to strike fire with my knuckles against a bit of Windsor soap.¹ But one afternoon the evil impulse in me mastered me, and the following little scene ensued:

“Bartleby,” said I, “when those papers are all copied, I will compare them with you.”

55 “I would prefer not to.”

“How? Surely you do not mean to persist in that mulish vagary?”

No answer.

I threw open the folding-doors near by, and turning upon Turkey and Nippers, exclaimed in an excited manner—

“He says, a second time, he won’t examine his papers. What do you think of it, Turkey?”

60 It was afternoon, be it remembered. Turkey sat glowing like a brass boiler, his bald head steaming, his hands reeling among his blotted papers.

“Think of it?” roared Turkey; “I think I’ll just step behind his screen, and black his eyes for him!”

So saying, Turkey rose to his feet and threw his arms into a pugilistic position. He was hurrying away to make good his promise, when I detained him, alarmed at the effect of incautiously rousing Turkey’s combativeness after dinner.

“Sit down, Turkey,” said I, “and hear what Nippers has to say. What do you think of it, Nippers? Would I not be justified in immediately dismissing Bartleby?”

“Excuse me, that is for you to decide, sir. I think his conduct quite unusual, and indeed unjust, as regards Turkey and myself. But it may only be a passing whim.”

65 “Ah,” exclaimed I, “you have strangely changed your mind then—you speak very gently of him now.”

“All beer,” cried Turkey; “gentleness is effects of beer—Nippers and I dined together today. You see how gentle I am, sir. Shall I go and black his eyes?”

“You refer to Bartleby, I suppose. No, not today, Turkey,” I replied; “pray, put up your fists.”

I closed the doors, and again advanced towards Bartleby. I felt additional incentives tempting me to my fate. I burned to be rebelled against again. I remembered that Bartleby never left the office.

“Bartleby,” said I, “Ginger Nut is away; just step round to the Post Office, won’t you? (it was but a three minutes’ walk,) and see if there is anything for me.”

70 “I would prefer not to.”

1. Scented soap, usually brown.

“You will not?”

“I prefer not.”

I staggered to my desk, and sat there in a deep study. My blind inveteracy returned. Was there any other thing in which I could procure myself to be ignominiously repulsed by this lean, penniless wight?—my hired clerk? What added thing is there, perfectly reasonable, that he will be sure to refuse to do?

“Bartleby!”

No answer.

“Bartleby,” in a louder tone.

No answer.

“Bartleby,” I roared.

Like a very ghost, agreeably to the laws of magical invocation, at the third summons, he appeared at the entrance of his hermitage.

“Go to the next room, and tell Nippers to come to me.”

“I prefer not to,” he respectfully and slowly said, and mildly disappeared.

“Very good, Bartleby,” said I, in a quiet sort of serenely severe self-possessed tone, intimating the unalterable purpose of some terrible retribution very close at hand. At the moment I half intended something of the kind. But upon the whole, as it was drawing towards my dinner-hour, I thought it best to put on my hat and walk home for the day, suffering much from perplexity and distress of mind.

Shall I acknowledge it? The conclusion of this whole business was, that it soon became a fixed fact of my chambers, that a pale young scrivener, by the name of Bartleby, had a desk there; that he copied for me at the usual rate of four cents a folio (one hundred words); but he was permanently exempt from examining the work done by him, that duty being transferred to Turkey and Nippers, one of compliment doubtless to their superior acuteness; moreover, said Bartleby was never on any account to be dispatched on the most trivial errand of any sort; and that even if entreated to take upon him such a matter, it was generally understood that he would prefer not to—in other words, that he would refuse point-blank.

As days passed on, I became considerably reconciled to Bartleby. His steadiness, his freedom from all dissipation, his incessant industry (except when he chose to throw himself into a standing revery behind his screen), his great stillness, his unalterableness of demeanor under all circumstances, made him a valuable acquisition. One prime thing was this,—he was always there;—first in the morning, continually through the day, and the last at night. I had a singular confidence in his honesty. I felt my most precious papers perfectly safe in his hands. Sometimes to be sure I could not, for the very soul of me, avoid falling into sudden spasmodic passions with him. For it was exceeding difficult to bear in mind all the time those strange peculiarities, privileges, and unheard of exemptions, forming the tacit stipulations on Bartleby’s part under which he remained in my office. Now and then, in the eagerness of dispatching pressing business, I would inadvertently summon Bartleby, in a short, rapid tone, to put his finger, say, on the incipient tie of a bit of red tape with which I was about compressing some papers. Of course, from behind the screen the usual answer, “I prefer not to,” was sure to come; and then, how could a human creature with the common infirmities of our nature, refrain from bitterly exclaiming upon such perverseness—such unreasonableness? However, every added repulse of this sort which I received only tended to lessen the probability of my repeating the inadvertence.

85 Here it must be said, that according to the custom of most legal gentlemen occupying chambers in densely-populated law buildings, there were several keys to my door. One was kept by a woman residing in the attic, which person weekly scrubbed and daily swept and dusted my apartments. Another was kept by Turkey for convenience sake. The third I sometimes carried in my own pocket. The fourth I knew not who had.

Now, one Sunday morning I happened to go to Trinity Church, to hear a celebrated preacher, and finding myself rather early on the ground, I thought I would walk round to my chambers for a while. Luckily I had my key with me; but upon applying it to the lock, I found it resisted by something inserted from the inside. Quite surprised, I called out; when to my consternation a key was turned from within; and thrusting his lean visage at me, and holding the door ajar, the apparition of Bartleby appeared, in his shirt sleeves, and otherwise in a strangely tattered dishabille, saying quietly that he was sorry, but he was deeply engaged just then, and—preferred not admitting me at present. In a brief word or two, he moreover added, that perhaps I had better walk round the block two or three times, and by that time he would probably have concluded his affairs.

Now, the utterly unsurmised appearance of Bartleby, tenanting my law-chambers of a Sunday morning, with his cadaverously gentlemanly nonchalance, yet withal firm and self-possessed, had such a strange effect upon me, that incontinently I slunk away from my own door, and did as desired. But not without sundry twinges of impotent rebellion against the mild effrontery of this unaccountable scrivener. Indeed, it was his wonderful mildness, chiefly, which not only disarmed me, but unmanned me, as it were. For I consider that one, for the time, is sort of unmanned when he tranquilly permits his hired clerk to dictate to him, and order him away from his own premises. Furthermore, I was full of uneasiness as to what Bartleby could possibly be doing in my office in his shirt sleeves, and in an otherwise dismantled condition of a Sunday morning. Was anything amiss going on? Nay, that was out of the question. It was not to be thought of for a moment that Bartleby was an immoral person. But what could he be doing there?—copying? Nay again, whatever might be his eccentricities, Bartleby was an eminently decorous person. He would be the last man to sit down to his desk in any state approaching to nudity. Besides, it was Sunday; and there was something about Bartleby that forbade the supposition that he would by any secular occupation violate the proprieties of the day.

Nevertheless, my mind was not pacified; and full of a restless curiosity, at last I returned to the door. Without hindrance I inserted my key, opened it, and entered. Bartleby was not to be seen. I looked round anxiously, peeped behind his screen; but it was very plain that he was gone. Upon more closely examining the place, I surmised that for an indefinite period Bartleby must have ate, dressed, and slept in my office, and that too without plate, mirror, or bed. The cushioned seat of a ricketty old sofa in one corner bore the faint impress of a lean, reclining form. Rolled away under his desk, I found a blanket under the empty grate, a blacking box² and brush; on a chair, a tin basin, with soap and a ragged towel; in a newspaper a few crumbs of ginger-nuts and a morsel of cheese. Yes, thought I, it is evident enough that Bartleby has been making his home here, keeping bachelor's hall all by himself. Immediately then the thought came sweeping across me, What miserable friendlessness and loneliness are here revealed! His poverty is great; but his solitude, how horrible! Think of it. Of a Sunday, Wall Street is deserted as Petra;³ and every night of every day it is an emptiness. This building too, which of weekdays hums with industry and life, at nightfall echoes with sheer vacancy, and all through Sunday is forlorn. And here Bartleby makes his home; sole spectator of a solitude which he has seen all populous—a sort of innocent and transformed Marius brooding among the ruins of Carthage!⁴

For the first time in my life a feeling of overpowering stinging melancholy seized me. Before, I had never experienced aught but a not-unpleasing sadness. The bond of a common humanity now drew me irresistibly to gloom. A fraternal melancholy! For both I and Bartleby were sons of Adam. I remembered the bright silks and sparkling faces I had seen that day, in gala trim, swan-like sailing down the Mississippi of Broadway; and I contrasted them with the pallid copyist, and thought to myself, Ah, happiness courts the light, so we deem the world is gay; but misery hides aloof, so we deem that misery there is none. These sad fancyings—chimeras, doubtless, of a sick and silly brain—led on to other and more special thoughts, concerning the eccentricities of Bartleby. Presentiments of strange discoveries hovered round me. The scrivener's pale form appeared to me laid out, among uncaring strangers, in its shivering winding sheet.

I mean no mischief, seek the gratification of no heartless curiosity, thought I; besides, the desk is mine, and its contents too, so I will make bold to look within. Everything was methodically arranged, the papers smoothly placed. The pigeon-holes were deep, and removing the files of documents, I groped into their recesses. Presently I felt something there, and dragged it out. It was an old bandanna handkerchief, heavy and knotted. I opened it, and saw it was a savings' bank.

I now recalled all the quiet mysteries which I had noted in the man. I remembered that he never spoke but to answer; that though at intervals he had considerable time to himself, yet I had never seen him reading—no, not even a newspaper; that for long periods he would stand looking out, at his pale window behind the screen, upon the dead brick wall; I was quite sure he never visited any refectory or eating house; while his pale face clearly indicated that he never drank beer like Turkey, or tea and coffee even, like other men; that he never went anywhere in particular that I could learn; never went out for a walk, unless indeed that was the case at present; that he had declined telling who he was, or whence he came, or whether he had any relatives in the world; that though so thin and pale, he never complained of ill health. And more than all, I remembered a certain unconscious air of pallid—how shall I call it?—of pallid haughtiness, say, or rather an austere reserve about him, which had positively awed me into my tame compliance with his eccentricities, when I had feared to ask him to do the slightest incidental thing for me, even though I might know, from his long-continued motionlessness, that behind his screen he must be standing in one of those dead-wall reveries of his.

Gaius (or Caius) Marius (157–86 BCE), Roman consul and general, expelled from Rome in 88 BCE by Sulla; when an officer of Sextilius, the governor, forbade him to land in Africa, Marius replied, "Go tell him that you have seen Caius Marius sitting in exile among the ruins of Carthage," applying the example of the fortune of that city to the change of his own condition. The image was so common that a few years after "Bartleby," Dickens apologizes for using it: "like that lumbering Marius among the ruins of Carthage, who has sat heavy on a thousand millions of similes" ("The Calais Night-Mail," in The Uncommercial Traveler).

Revolving all these things, and coupling them with the recently discovered fact that he made my office his constant abiding place and home, and not forgetful of his morbid moodiness; revolving all these things, a prudential feeling began to steal over me. My first emotions had been those of pure melancholy and sincerest pity; but just in proportion as the forlornness of Bartleby grew and grew to my imagination, did that same melancholy merge into fear, that pity into repulsion. So true it is, and so terrible too, that up to a certain point the thought or sight of misery enlists our best affections; but, in certain special cases, beyond that point it does not. They err who would assert that invariably this is owing to the inherent selfishness of the human heart. It rather proceeds from a certain hopelessness of remedying excessive and organic ill. To a sensitive being, pity is not seldom pain. And when at last it is perceived that such pity cannot lead to effectual succor, common sense bids the soul be rid of it. What I saw that morning persuaded me that the scrivener was the victim of innate and incurable disorder. I might give alms to his body; but his body did not pain him; it was his soul that suffered, and his soul I could not reach.

I did not accomplish the purpose of going to Trinity Church that morning. Somehow, the things I had seen disqualified me for the time from churchgoing. I walked homeward, thinking what I would do with Bartleby. Finally, I resolved upon this;—I would put certain calm questions to him the next morning, touching his history, &c., and if he declined to answer them openly and unreservedly (and I supposed he would prefer not), then to give him a twenty-dollar bill over and above whatever I might owe him, and tell him his services were no longer required; but that if in any other way I could assist him, I would be happy to do so, especially if he desired to return to his native place, wherever that might be, I would willingly help to defray the expenses. Moreover, if, after reaching home, he found himself at any time in want of aid, a letter from him would be sure of a reply.

95 The next morning came.

“Bartleby,” said I, gently calling to him behind his screen.

No reply.

“Bartleby,” said I, in a still gentler tone, “come here; I am not going to ask you to do anything you would prefer not to do—I simply wish to speak to you.”

Upon this he noiselessly slid into view.

100 “Will you tell me, Bartleby, where you were born?”

“I would prefer not to.”

“Will you tell me anything about yourself?”

“I would prefer not to.”

“But what reasonable objection can you have to speak to me? I feel friendly towards you.”

He did not look at me while I spoke, but kept his glance fixed upon my bust of Cicero, which as I then sat, was directly behind me, some six inches above my head. 105

“What is your answer, Bartleby?” said I, after waiting a considerable time for a reply, during which his countenance remained immovable, only there was the faintest conceivable tremor of the white attenuated mouth.

“At present I prefer to give no answer,” he said, and retired into his hermitage.

It was rather weak in me I confess, but his manner on this occasion nettled me. Not only did there seem to lurk in it a certain calm disdain, but his perverseness seemed ungrateful, considering the undeniable good usage and indulgence he had received from me.

Again I sat ruminating what I should do. Mortified as I was at his behavior, and resolved as I had been to dismiss him when I entered my office, nevertheless I strangely felt something superstitious knocking at my heart, and forbidding me to carry out my purpose, and denouncing me for a villain if I dared to breathe one bitter word against this forlornest of mankind. At last, familiarly drawing my chair behind his screen, I sat down and said: “Bartleby, never mind then about revealing your history; but let me entreat you, as a friend, to comply as far as may be with the usages of this office. Say now you will help to examine papers tomorrow or next day: in short, say now that in a day or two you will begin to be a little reasonable:—say so, Bartleby.”

“At present I would prefer not to be a little reasonable,” was his mildly cadaverous reply. 110

Just then the folding-doors opened, and Nippers approached. He seemed suffering from an unusually bad night’s rest, induced by severer indigestion than common. He overheard those final words of Bartleby.

“Prefer not, eh?” grittled Nippers—“I’d prefer him, if I were you, sir,” addressing me—“I’d prefer him; I’d give him preferences, the stubborn mule! What is it, sir, pray, that he prefers not to do now?”

Bartleby moved not a limb.

“Mr. Nippers,” said I, “I’d prefer that you would withdraw for the present.”

Somehow, of late I had got into the way of involuntarily using this word “prefer” upon all sorts of not exactly suitable occasions. And I trembled to think that my contact with the scrivener had already and seriously affected me in a mental way. And what further and deeper aberration might it not yet produce? This apprehension had not been without efficacy in determining me to summary means. 115

As Nippers, looking very sour and sulky, was departing, Turkey blandly and deferentially approached.

“With submission, sir,” said he, “yesterday I was thinking about Bartleby here, and I think that if he would but prefer to take a quart of good ale every day, it would do much towards mending him and enabling him to assist in examining his papers.”

“So you have got the word too,” said I, slightly excited.

“With submission, what word, sir?” asked Turkey, respectfully crowding himself into the contracted space behind the screen, and by so doing making me jostle the scrivener. “What word, sir?”

120 “I would prefer to be left alone here,” said Bartleby, as if offended at being mobbed in his privacy.

“That’s the word, Turkey,” said I—“that’s it.”

“Oh, prefer? oh yes—queer word. I never use it myself. But, sir, as I was saying, if he would but prefer—”

“Turkey,” interrupted I, “you will please withdraw.”

“Oh certainly, sir, if you prefer that I should.”

125 As he opened the folding-door to retire, Nippers at his desk caught a glimpse of me, and asked whether I would prefer to have a certain paper copied on blue paper or white. He did not in the least roguishly accent the word prefer. It was plain that it involuntarily rolled from his tongue. I thought to myself, surely I must get rid of a demented man, who already has in some degree turned the tongues, if not the heads of myself and clerks. But I thought it prudent not to break the dismissal at once.

The next day I noticed that Bartleby did nothing but stand at his window in his dead-wall revery. Upon asking him why he did not write, he said that he had decided upon doing no more writing.

“Why, how now? what next?” exclaimed I, “do no more writing?”

“No more.”

“And what is the reason?”

130 “Do you not see the reason for yourself,” he indifferently replied.

I looked steadfastly at him, and perceived that his eyes looked dull and glazed. Instantly it occurred to me, that his unexampled diligence in copying by his dim window for the first few weeks of his stay with me might have temporarily impaired his vision.

I was touched. I said something in condolence with him. I hinted that of course he did wisely in abstaining from writing for a while; and urged him to embrace that opportunity of taking wholesome exercise in the open air. This, however, he did not do. A few days after this, my other clerks being absent, and being in a great hurry to dispatch certain letters by the mail, I thought that, having nothing else earthly to do, Bartleby would surely be less inflexible than usual, and carry these letters to the post office. But he blankly declined. So, much to my inconvenience, I went myself.

Still added days went by. Whether Bartleby’s eyes improved or not, I could not say. To all appearance, I thought they did. But when I asked him if they did, he vouchsafed no answer. At all events, he would do no copying. At last, in reply to my urgings, he informed me that he had permanently given up copying.

“What!” exclaimed I; “suppose your eyes should get entirely well—better than ever before—would you not copy then?”

135 “I have given up copying,” he answered, and slid aside.

He remained, as ever, a fixture in my chamber. Nay—if that were possible—he became still more of a fixture than before. What was to be done? He would do nothing in the office: why should he stay there? In plain fact, he had now become a millstone⁵ to me, not only useless as a necklace, but afflictive to

5. Heavy stone for grinding grain. See Matthew 18.6: “But whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.”

bear. Yet I was sorry for him. I speak less than truth when I say that, on his own account, he occasioned me uneasiness. If he would but have named a single relative or friend, I would instantly have written, and urged their taking the poor fellow away to some convenient retreat. But he seemed alone, absolutely alone in the universe. A bit of wreck in the mid-Atlantic. At length, necessities connected with my business tyrannized over all other considerations. Decently as I could, I told Bartleby that in six days' time he must unconditionally leave the office. I warned him to take measures, in the interval, for procuring some other abode. I offered to assist him in this endeavor, if he himself would but take the first step towards a removal. "And when you finally quit me, Bartleby," added I, "I shall see that you go not away entirely unprovided. Six days from this hour, remember."

At the expiration of that period, I peeped behind the screen, and lo! Bartleby was there.

I buttoned up my coat, balanced myself; advanced slowly towards him, touched his shoulder, and said, "The time has come; you must quit this place; I am sorry for you; here is money; but you must go."

"I would prefer not," he replied, with his back still towards me.

"You must."

He remained silent.

Now I had an unbounded confidence in this man's common honesty. He had frequently restored to me sixpences and shillings⁶ carelessly dropped upon the floor, for I am apt to be very reckless in such shirt-button affairs. The proceeding then which followed will not be deemed extraordinary.

"Bartleby," said I, "I owe you twelve dollars on account; here are thirty-two; the odd twenty are yours.—Will you take it?" and I handed the bills towards him.

But he made no motion.

"I will leave them here then," putting them under a weight on the table. Then taking my hat and cane and going to the door I tranquilly turned and added—
"After you have removed your things from these offices, Bartleby, you will of course lock the door—since everyone is now gone for the day but you—and if you please, slip your key underneath the mat, so that I may have it in the morning. I shall not see you again; so good-bye to you. If hereafter in your new place of abode I can be of any service to you, do not fail to advise me by letter. Good-bye, Bartleby, and fare you well."

But he answered not a word; like the last column of some ruined temple, he remained standing mute and solitary in the middle of the otherwise deserted room.

As I walked home in a pensive mood, my vanity got the better of my pity. I could not but highly plume myself on my masterly management in getting rid of Bartleby. Masterly I call it, and such it must appear to any dispassionate thinker. The beauty of my procedure seemed to consist in its perfect quietness. There was no vulgar bullying, no bravado of any sort, no choleric hectoring, and striding to and fro across the apartment, jerking out vehement commands for Bartleby to bundle himself off with his beggarly traps.⁷ Nothing of the kind. Without loudly bidding Bartleby depart—as an inferior genius might have done—I assumed the ground that depart he must; and upon that assumption built all I had to say. The more I thought over my procedure, the more I was charmed with it. Nevertheless, next morning, upon awakening, I had my doubts,—I had somehow slept off the fumes of vanity. One of the coolest and wisest hours a man has is just after he awakes in the morning. My procedure seemed as sagacious as ever,—but only in theory. How it would prove in practice—there was the rub. It was truly a beautiful thought to have assumed Bartleby's departure; but, after all, that assumption was simply my own, and none of Bartleby's. The great point was, not whether I had assumed that he would quit me, but whether he would prefer so to do. He was more a man of preferences than assumptions.

After breakfast, I walked downtown, arguing the probabilities pro and con. One moment I thought it would prove a miserable failure, and Bartleby would be found all alive at my office as usual; the next moment it seemed certain that I should see his chair empty. And so I kept veering about. At the corner of Broadway and Canal Street, I saw quite an excited group of people standing in earnest conversation.

"I'll take odds he doesn't," said a voice as I passed.

150 "Doesn't go?—done!" said I, "put up your money."

I was instinctively putting my hand in my pocket to produce my own, when I remembered that this was an election day. The words I had overheard bore no reference to Bartleby, but to the success or non-success of some candidate for the mayoralty. In my intent frame of mind, I had, as it were, imagined that all Broadway shared in my excitement, and were debating the same question with me. I passed on, very thankful that the uproar of the street screened my momentary absent-mindedness.

As I had intended, I was earlier than usual at my office door. I stood listening for a moment. All was still. He must be gone. I tried the knob. The door was locked. Yes, my procedure had worked to a charm; he indeed must be vanished. Yet a certain melancholy mixed with this: I was almost sorry for my brilliant success. I was fumbling under the door mat for the key, which Bartleby was to have left there for me, when accidentally my knee knocked against a panel, producing a summoning sound, and in response a voice came to me from within—"Not yet; I am occupied."

It was Bartleby.

I was thunderstruck. For an instant I stood like the man who, pipe in mouth, was killed one cloudless afternoon long ago in Virginia, by summer lightning; at his own warm open window he was killed, and remained leaning out there upon the dreamy afternoon, till some one touched him, when he fell.

155 "Not gone!" I murmured at last. But again obeying that wondrous ascendancy which the inscrutable scrivener had over me, and from which ascendancy, for all my chafing, I could not completely escape, I slowly went downstairs and out into the street, and while walking round the block, considered what I should next do in this unheard-of perplexity. Turn the man out by an actual thrusting I could not; to drive him away by calling him hard names would not do; calling in the police was an unpleasant idea; and yet, permit him to enjoy his cadaverous triumph over me,—this too I could not think of. What was to be done? or, if nothing could be done, was there anything further that I could assume in the matter? Yes, as before I had prospectively assumed that Bartleby would depart, so now I might retrospectively assume that departed he was. In the legitimate carrying out of this assumption, I might enter my office in a great hurry, and pretending not to see Bartleby at all, walk straight against him as if he were air. Such a proceeding would in a singular degree have the appearance of a home-thrust.⁸ It was hardly possible that Bartleby could withstand such an application of the doctrine of assumptions. But upon second thoughts the success of the plan seemed rather dubious. I resolved to argue the matter over with him again.

"Bartleby," said I, entering the office, with a quietly severe expression, "I am seriously displeased. I am pained, Bartleby. I had thought better of you. I had imagined you of such a gentlemanly organization, that in any delicate dilemma a slight hint would suffice—in short, an assumption. But it appears I am deceived. Why," I added, unaffectedly starting, "you have not even touched that money yet," pointing to it, just where I had left it the evening previous.

He answered nothing.

"Will you, or will you not, quit me?" I now demanded in a sudden passion, advancing close to him.

"I would prefer not to quit you," he replied, gently emphasizing the not.

"What earthly right have you to stay here? Do you pay any rent? Do you pay 160 my taxes? Or is this property yours?"

He answered nothing.

"Are you ready to go on and write now? Are your eyes recovered? Could you copy a small paper for me this morning? or help examine a few lines? or step round to the post office? In a word, will you do anything at all, to give a coloring to your refusal to depart the premises?"

He silently retired into his hermitage.

I was now in such a state of nervous resentment that I thought it but prudent to check myself at present from further demonstrations. Bartleby and I were alone. I remembered the tragedy of the unfortunate Adams and the still more unfortunate Colt in the solitary office of the latter;⁹ and how poor Colt, being dreadfully incensed by Adams, and imprudently permitting himself to get wildly excited, was at unawares hurried into his fatal act—an act which certainly no man could possibly deplore more than the actor himself. Often it had occurred to me in my ponderings upon the subject, that had that altercation taken place in the public street, or at a private residence, it would not have terminated as it did. It was the circumstance of being alone in a solitary office, up stairs, of a building entirely unhallowed by humanizing domestic associations—an uncarpeted office, doubtless, of a dusty, haggard sort of appearance;—this it must have been, which greatly helped to enhance the irritable desperation of the hapless Colt.

But when this old Adam¹ of resentment rose in me and tempted me concern- 165 ing Bartleby, I grappled him and threw him. How? Why, simply by recalling the divine injunction: “A new commandment² give I unto you, that ye love one another.” Yes, this it was that saved me. Aside from higher considerations, charity often operates as a vastly wise and prudent principle—a great safeguard to its possessor. Men have committed murder for jealousy’s sake, and anger’s sake, and hatred’s sake, and selfishness’ sake, and spiritual pride’s sake; but no man that ever I heard of, ever committed a diabolical murder for sweet charity’s sake. Mere self-interest, then, if no better motive can be enlisted, should, especially with high-tempered men, prompt all beings to charity and philanthropy. At any rate, upon the occasion in question, I strove to drown my exasperated feelings towards the scrivener by benevolently construing his conduct. Poor fellow, poor fellow! thought I, he don’t mean anything; and besides, he has seen hard times, and ought to be indulged.

I endeavored also immediately to occupy myself, and at the same time to comfort my despondency. I tried to fancy that in the course of the morning, at such time as might prove agreeable to him, Bartleby, of his own free accord, would emerge from his hermitage, and take up some decided line of march in the direction of the door. But no. Half-past twelve o’clock came; Turkey began to glow in the face, overturn his inkstand, and become generally obstreperous; Nippers abated down into quietude and courtesy; Ginger Nut munched his noon apple; and Bartleby remained standing at his window in one of his profoundest dead-wall reveries. Will it be credited? Ought I to acknowledge it? That afternoon I left the office without saying one further word to him.

Some days now passed, during which, at leisure intervals I looked a little into “Edwards on the Will,” and “Priestley on Necessity.”³ Under the circumstances, those books induced a salutary feeling. Gradually I slid into the persuasion that these troubles of mine touching the scrivener, had been all predestinated from eternity, and Bartleby was billeted upon me for some mysterious purpose of an all-wise Providence, which it was not for a mere mortal like me to fathom. Yes, Bartleby, stay there behind your screen, thought I; I shall persecute you no more; you are harmless and noiseless as any of these old chairs; in short, I never feel so private as when I know you are here. At least I see it, I feel it; I penetrate to the predestinated purpose of my life. I am content. Others may have loftier parts to enact; but my mission in this world, Bartleby, is to furnish you with office-room for such period as you may see fit to remain.

I believe that this wise and blessed frame of mind would have continued with me, had it not been for the unsolicited and uncharitable remarks obtruded upon me by my professional friends who visited the rooms. But thus it often is, that the constant friction of illiberal minds wears out at last the best resolves of the more generous. Though to be sure, when I reflected upon it, it was not strange that people entering my office should be struck by the peculiar aspect of the unaccountable Bartleby, and so be tempted to throw out some sinister observations concerning him. Sometimes an attorney having business with me, and calling at my office, and finding no one but the scrivener there, would undertake to obtain some sort of precise information from him touching my whereabouts; but without heeding his idle talk, Bartleby would remain standing immovable in the middle of the room. So after contemplating him in that position for a time, the attorney would depart, no wiser than he came.

Also, when a Reference⁴ was going on, and the room full of lawyers and witnesses and business was driving fast; some deeply occupied legal gentleman present, seeing Bartleby wholly unemployed, would request him to run round to his (the legal gentleman's) office and fetch some papers for him. Thereupon, Bartleby would tranquilly decline, and yet remain idle as before. Then the lawyer would give a great stare, and turn to me. And what could I say? At last I was made aware that all through the circle of my professional acquaintance, a whisper of wonder was running round, having reference to the strange creature I kept at my office. This worried me very much. And as the idea came upon me of his possibly turning out a long-lived man, and keep occupying my chambers, and denying my authority; and perplexing my visitors; and scandalizing my professional reputation; and casting a general gloom over the premises; keeping soul and body together to the last upon his savings (for doubtless he spent but half a dime a day), and in the end perhaps outlive me, and claim possession of my office by right of his perpetual occupancy: as all these dark anticipations crowded upon me more and more, and my friends continually intruded their relentless remarks upon the apparition in my room; a great change was wrought in me. I resolved to gather all my faculties together, and forever rid me of this intolerable incubus.⁵

Ere revolving any complicated project, however, adapted to this end, I first 170 simply suggested to Bartleby the propriety of his permanent departure. In a calm and serious tone, I commended the idea to his careful and mature consideration. But having taken three days to meditate upon it, he apprised me that his original determination remained the same; in short, that he still preferred to abide with me.

What shall I do? I now said to myself, buttoning up my coat to the last button. What shall I do? what ought I to do? what does conscience say I should do with this man, or rather ghost. Rid myself of him, I must; go, he shall. But how? You will not thrust him, the poor, pale, passive mortal,—you will not thrust such a helpless creature out of your door? you will not dishonor yourself by such cruelty? No, I will not, I cannot do that. Rather would I let him live and die here, and then mason up his remains in the wall. What then will you do? For all your coaxing, he will not budge. Bribes he leaves under your own paperweight on your table; in short, it is quite plain that he prefers to cling to you.

Then something severe, something unusual must be done. What! surely you will not have him collared by a constable, and commit his innocent pallor to the common jail? And upon what ground could you procure such a thing to be done?—a vagrant, is he? What! he a vagrant, a wanderer, who refuses to budge? It is because he will not be a vagrant, then, that you seek to count him as a vagrant. That is too absurd. No visible means of support: there I have him. Wrong again: for indubitably he does support himself, and that is the only unanswerable proof that any man can show of his possessing the means so to do. No more then. Since he will not quit me, I must quit him. I will change my offices; I will move elsewhere; and give him fair notice, that if I find him on my new premises I will then proceed against him as a common trespasser.

Acting accordingly, next day I thus addressed him: "I find these chambers too far from the City Hall; the air is unwholesome. In a word, I propose to remove my offices next week, and shall no longer require your services. I tell you this now, in order that you may seek another place."

He made no reply, and nothing more was said.

175 On the appointed day I engaged carts and men, proceeded to my chambers, and having but little furniture, everything was removed in a few hours. Throughout, the scrivener remained standing behind the screen, which I directed to be removed the last thing. It was withdrawn; and being folded up like a huge folio, left him the motionless occupant of a naked room. I stood in the entry watching him a moment, while something from within me upbraided me.

I re-entered, with my hand in my pocket—and—and my heart in my mouth.

"Good-bye, Bartleby; I am going—good-bye, and God some way bless you; and take that," slipping something in his hand. But it dropped upon the floor, and then,—strange to say—I tore myself from him whom I had so longed to be rid of.

Established in my new quarters, for a day or two I kept the door locked, and started at every footfall in the passages. When I returned to my rooms after any little absence, I would pause at the threshold for an instant, and attentively listen, ere applying my key. But these fears were needless. Bartleby never came nigh me.

I thought all was going well, when a perturbed-looking stranger visited me, inquiring whether I was the person who had recently occupied rooms at No. — Wall Street.

180 Full of forebodings, I replied that I was.

"Then sir," said the stranger, who proved a lawyer, "you are responsible for the man you left there. He refuses to do any copying; he refuses to do anything; he says he prefers not to; and he refuses to quit the premises."

"I am very sorry, sir," said I, with assumed tranquillity, but an inward tremor, "but, really, the man you allude to is nothing to me—he is no relation or apprentice of mine, that you should hold me responsible for him."

"In mercy's name, who is he?"

"I certainly cannot inform you. I know nothing about him. Formerly I employed him as a copyist; but he has done nothing for me now for some time past."

185 "I shall settle him then,—good morning, sir."

Several days passed, and I heard nothing more; and though I often felt a charitable prompting to call at the place and see poor Bartleby, yet a certain squeamishness of I know not what withheld me.

All is over with him, by this time, thought I at last, when through another week no further intelligence reached me. But coming to my room the day after, I found several persons waiting at my door in a high state of nervous excitement.

"That's the man—here he comes," cried the foremost one, whom I recognized as the lawyer who had previously called upon me alone.

“You must take him away, sir, at once,” cried a portly person among them, advancing upon me, and whom I knew to be the landlord of No. — Wall Street. “These gentlemen, my tenants, cannot stand it any longer; Mr. B——” pointing to the lawyer, “has turned him out of his room, and he now persists in haunting the building generally, sitting upon the banisters of the stairs by day, and sleeping in the entry by night. Everybody is concerned; clients are leaving the offices; some fears are entertained of a mob; something you must do, and that without delay.”

Aghast at this torrent, I fell back before it, and would fain have locked myself 190 in my new quarters. In vain I persisted that Bartleby was nothing to me—no more than to anyone else. In vain:—I was the last person known to have anything to do with him, and they held me to the terrible account. Fearful then of being exposed in the papers (as one person present obscurely threatened) I considered the matter, and at length said, that if the lawyer would give me a confidential interview with the scrivener, in his (the lawyer’s) own room, I would that afternoon strive my best to rid them of the nuisance they complained of.

Going upstairs to my old haunt, there was Bartleby silently sitting upon the banister at the landing.

“What are you doing here, Bartleby?” said I.

“Sitting upon the banister,” he mildly replied.

I motioned him into the lawyer’s room, who then left us.

“Bartleby,” said I, “are you aware that you are the cause of great tribulation to 195 me, by persisting in occupying the entry after being dismissed from the office?”

No answer.

“Now one of two things must take place. Either you must do something, or something must be done to you. Now what sort of business would you like to engage in? Would you like to re-engage in copying for someone?”

“No; I would prefer not to make any change.”

“Would you like a clerkship in a drygoods store?”

“There is too much confinement about that. No, I would not like a clerkship; 200 but I am not particular.”

“Too much confinement,” I cried, “why you keep yourself confined all the time!”

“I would prefer not to take a clerkship,” he rejoined, as if to settle that little item at once.

“How would a bartender’s business suit you? There is no trying of the eye-sight in that.”

“I would not like it at all; though, as I said before, I am not particular.”

His unwonted wordiness inspired me. I returned to the charge. 205

“Well then, would you like to travel through the country collecting bills for the merchants? That would improve your health.”

“No, I would prefer to be doing something else.”

“How then would going as a companion to Europe, to entertain some young gentleman with your conversation,—how would that suit you?”

“Not at all. It does not strike me that there is anything definite about that. I like to be stationary. But I am not particular.”

“Stationary you shall be then,” I cried, now losing all patience, and for the 210 first time in all my exasperating connection with him fairly flying into a passion.

"If you do not go away from these premises before night, I shall feel bound—indeed I am bound—to—to—to quit the premises myself!" I rather absurdly concluded, knowing not with what possible threat to try to frighten his immobility into compliance. Despairing of all further efforts, I was precipitately leaving him, when a final thought occurred to me—one which had not been wholly unindulged before.

"Bartleby," said I, in the kindest tone I could assume under such exciting circumstances, "will you go home with me now—not to my office, but my dwelling—and remain there till we can conclude upon some convenient arrangement for you at our leisure? Come, let us start now, right away."

"No: at present I would prefer not to make any change at all."

I answered nothing; but effectually dodging everyone by the suddenness and rapidity of my flight, rushed from the building, ran up Wall Street toward Broadway, and jumping into the first omnibus was soon removed from pursuit. As soon as tranquillity returned I distinctly perceived that I had now done all that I possibly could, both in respect to the demands of the landlord and his tenants, and with regard to my own desire and sense of duty, to benefit Bartleby, and shield him from rude persecution. I now strove to be entirely carefree and quiescent; and my conscience justified me in the attempt; though indeed it was not so successful as I could have wished. So fearful was I of being again hunted out by the incensed landlord and his exasperated tenants, that, surrendering my business to Nippers, for a few days I drove about the upper part of the town and through the suburbs, in my rockaway;⁶ crossed over to Jersey City and Hoboken, and paid fugitive visits to Manhattanville and Astoria. In fact I almost lived in my rockaway for the time.

When again I entered my office, lo, a note from the landlord lay upon the desk. I opened it with trembling hands. It informed me that the writer had sent to the police, and had Bartleby removed to the Tombs as a vagrant. Moreover, since I knew more about him than anyone else, he wished me to appear at that place, and make a suitable statement of the facts. These tidings had a conflicting effect upon me. At first I was indignant; but at last almost approved. The landlord's energetic, summary disposition had led him to adopt a procedure which I do not think I would have decided upon myself; and yet as a last resort, under such peculiar circumstances, it seemed the only plan.

215 As I afterwards learned, the poor scrivener, when told that he must be conducted to the Tombs, offered not the slightest obstacle, but in his pale unmoving way, silently acquiesced.

Some of the compassionate and curious bystanders joined the party; and headed by one of the constables arm in arm with Bartleby, the silent procession filed its way through all the noise, and heat, and joy of the roaring thoroughfares at noon.

The same day I received the note I went to the Tombs, or to speak more properly, the Halls of Justice. Seeking the right officer, I stated the purpose of my call, and was informed that the individual I described was indeed within. I then assured the functionary that Bartleby was a perfectly honest man, and greatly to be compassionated, however unaccountably eccentric. I narrated all I knew, and closed by suggesting the idea of letting him remain in as indulgent confinement as possible till something less harsh might be done—though indeed I hardly knew what. At all events, if nothing else could be decided upon, the alms-house must receive him. I then begged to have an interview.

Being under no disgraceful charge, and quite serene and harmless in all his ways, they had permitted him freely to wander about the prison, and especially in the inclosed grass-platted yards thereof. And so I found him there, standing all alone in the quietest of the yards, his face towards a high wall, while all around, from the narrow slits of the jail windows, I thought I saw peering out upon him the eyes of murderers and thieves.

“Bartleby!”

“I know you,” he said, without looking round,—“and I want nothing to say to you.” 220

“It was not I that brought you here, Bartleby,” said I, keenly pained at his implied suspicion. “And to you, this should not be so vile a place. Nothing reproachful attaches to you by being here. And see, it is not so sad a place as one might think. Look, there is the sky, and here is the grass.”

“I know where I am,” he replied, but would say nothing more, and so I left him.

As I entered the corridor again, a broad meat-like man, in an apron, accosted me, and jerking his thumb over his shoulder said—“Is that your friend?”

“Yes.”

“Does he want to starve? If he does, let him live on the prison fare, that’s all.” 225

“Who are you?” asked I, not knowing what to make of such an unofficially-speaking person in such a place.

“I am the grub-man. Such gentlemen as have friends here, hire me to provide them with something good to eat.”

“Is this so?” said I, turning to the turnkey.

He said it was.

“Well then,” said I, slipping some silver into the grub-man’s hands (for so they called him). “I want you to give particular attention to my friend there; let him have the best dinner you can get. And you must be as polite to him as possible.” 230

“Introduce me, will you?” said the grub-man, looking at me with an expression which seemed to say he was all impatience for an opportunity to give a specimen of his breeding.

Thinking it would prove of benefit to the scrivener, I acquiesced; and asking the grub-man his name, went up with him to Bartleby.

“Your sarvant, sir, your sarvant,” said the grub-man, making a low salutation behind his apron. “Hope you find it pleasant here, sir;—spacious grounds—cool apartments, sir—hope you’ll stay with us some time—try to make it agreeable. May Mrs. Cutlets and I have the pleasure of your company to dinner, sir, in Mrs. Cutlets’ private room?”

“I prefer not to dine today,” said Bartleby, turning away. “It would disagree with me; I am unused to dinners.” So saying he slowly moved to the other side of the inclosure, and took up a position fronting the dead-wall. 235

“How’s this?” said the grub-man, addressing me with a stare of astonishment. “He’s odd, ain’t he?”

"I think he is a little deranged," said I, sadly.

"Deranged? deranged is it? Well now, upon my word, I thought that friend of yours was a gentleman forger; they are always pale and genteel-like, them forgers. I can't help pity 'em—can't help it, sir. Did you know Monroe Edwards?"⁷ he added touchingly, and paused. Then laying his hand pityingly on my shoulder, sighed, "he died of consumption at Sing Sing. So you weren't acquainted with Monroe?"

"No, I was never socially acquainted with any forgers. But I cannot stop longer. Look to my friend yonder. You will not lose by it. I will see you again."

240 Some few days after this, I again obtained admission to the Tombs, and went through the corridors in quest of Bartleby; but without finding him.

"I saw him coming from his cell not long ago," said a turnkey, "may be he's gone to loiter in the yards."

So I went in that direction.

"Are you looking for the silent man?" said another turnkey passing me. "Yonder he lies—sleeping in the yard there. 'Tis not twenty minutes since I saw him lie down."

The yard was entirely quiet. It was not accessible to the common prisoners. The surrounding walls, of amazing thickness, kept off all sounds behind them. The Egyptian character of the masonry weighed upon me with its gloom. But a soft imprisoned turf grew under foot. The heart of the eternal pyramids, it seemed, wherein, by some strange magic, through the clefts, grass seed, dropped by birds, had sprung.

245 Strangely huddled at the base of the wall, his knees drawn up, and lying on his side, his head touching the cold stones, I saw the wasted Bartleby. But nothing stirred. I paused; then went close up to him; stooped over, and saw that his dim eyes were open; otherwise he seemed profoundly sleeping. Something prompted me to touch him. I felt his hand, when a tingling shiver ran up my arm and down my spine to my feet.

The round face of the grub-man peered upon me now. "His dinner is ready. Won't he dine today, either? Or does he live without dining?"

"Lives without dining," said I, and closed the eyes.

"Eh!—He's asleep, ain't he?"

"With kings and counsellors,"⁸ murmured I.

250 There would seem little need for proceeding further in this history. Imagination will readily supply the meager recital of poor Bartleby's interment. But ere parting with the reader, let me say, that if this little narrative has sufficiently interested him, to awaken curiosity as to who Bartleby was, and what manner of life he led prior to the present narrator's making his acquaintance, I can only reply, that in such curiosity I fully share, but am wholly unable to gratify it. Yet here I hardly know whether I should divulge one little item of rumor, which came to my ear a few months after the scrivener's decease. Upon what basis it rested, I could never ascertain; and hence, how true it is I cannot now tell. But inasmuch as this vague report has not been without a certain strange suggestive interest to me, however sad, it may prove the same with some others; and so I will briefly mention it. The report was this: that Bartleby had been a subordinate clerk in the Dead Letter Office at Washington, from which he had been suddenly removed by a change in the administration. When I think over this rumor, I cannot adequately express the emotions which seize me. Dead letters! does it not sound like dead men? Conceive a man by nature and misfortune prone to a pallid hopelessness, can any business seem more fitted to heighten it than that of continually handling these dead letters, and assorting them for the flames? For by the cartload they are annually burned. Sometimes from out the folded paper the pale clerk takes a ring;—the finger it was meant for, perhaps, molders in the grave; a banknote sent in swiftest charity:—he whom it would relieve, nor eats nor hungers any more; pardon for those who died despairing; hope for those who died unhoping; good tidings for those who died stifled by unrelieved calamities. On errands of life, these letters speed to death.

Ah Bartleby! Ah humanity!

EUDORA WELTY
(1909–2001)

Why I Live at the P.O.

Known as the “First Lady of Southern Literature,” Eudora Welty was born and raised in Jackson, Mississippi, attended Mississippi State College for Women, and earned a BA from the University of Wisconsin. Among the countless awards she received were two Guggenheim Fellowships, six O. Henry Awards, a Pulitzer Prize, the French Legion of Honor, the National Medal for Literature, and the Presidential Medal of Freedom. Although she wrote five novels, including The Robber Bridegroom (1942), Ponder Heart (1954), and The Optimist’s Daughter (1972), Welty is best known for her short stories, many of which appear in The Collected Stories of Eudora Welty (1980). Among her non-fiction works are One Writer’s Beginnings (1984), A Writer’s Eye: Collected Book Reviews (1994), and five collections of her photographs, including One Place, One Time (1978) and Photographs (1989). In 1998 the Library of America published a two-volume edition of her selected works, making her the first living author they had published.

I was getting along fine with Mama, Papa-Daddy, and Uncle Rondo until my sister Stella-Rondo just separated from her husband and came back home again. Mr. Whitaker! Of course I went with Mr. Whitaker first, when he first appeared here in China Grove, taking “Pose Yourself” photos, and Stella-Rondo broke us up. Told him I was one-sided. Bigger on one side than the other, which is a deliberate, calculated falsehood: I’m the same. Stella-Rondo is exactly twelve months to the day younger than I am and for that reason she’s spoiled.

She's always had anything in the world she wanted and then she'd throw it away. Papa-Daddy give her this gorgeous Add-a-Pearl necklace when she was eight years old and she threw it away playing baseball when she was nine, with only two pearls.

So as soon as she got married and moved away from home the first thing she did was separate! From Mr. Whitaker! This photographer with the popeyes she said she trusted. Came home from one of those towns up in Illinois and to our complete surprise brought this child of two.

Mama said she like to make her drop dead for a second. "Here you had this marvelous blonde child and never so much as wrote your mother a word about it," says Mama. "I'm thoroughly ashamed of you." But of course she wasn't.

5 Stella-Rondo just calmly takes off this hat, I wish you could see it. She says, "Why, Mama, Shirley-T.'s adopted, I can prove it."

"How?" says Mama, but all I says was, "H'm!" There I was over the hot stove, trying to stretch two chickens over five people and a completely unexpected child into the bargain without one moment's notice.

"What do you mean—'H'm'?" says Stella-Rondo, and Mama says, "I heard that, Sister."

I said that oh, I didn't mean a thing, only that whoever Shirley-T. was, she was the spit-image of Papa-Daddy if he'd cut off his beard, which of course he'd never do in the world. Papa-Daddy's Mama's papa and sulks.

Stella-Rondo got furious! She said, "Sister, I don't need to tell you you got a lot of nerve and always did have and I'll thank you to make no future reference to my adopted child whatsoever."

10 "Very well," I said. "Very well, very well. Of course I noticed at once she looks like Mr. Whitaker's side too. That frown. She looks like a cross between Mr. Whitaker and Papa-Daddy."

"Well, all I can say is she isn't."

"She looks exactly like Shirley Temple to me," says Mama, but Shirley-T. just ran away from her.

So the first thing Stella-Rondo did at the table was turn Papa-Daddy against me.

"Papa-Daddy," she says. He was trying to cut up his meat. "Papa-Daddy!" I was taken completely by surprise. Papa-Daddy is about a million years old and's got this long-long beard. "Papa-Daddy, Sister says she fails to understand why you don't cut off your beard."

15 So Papa-Daddy l-a-y-s down his knife and fork! He's real rich. Mama says he is, he says he isn't. So he says, "Have I heard correctly? You don't understand why I don't cut off my beard?"

"Why," I says, "Papa-Daddy, of course I understand, I did not say any such a thing, the idea!"

He says, "Hussy!"

I says, "Papa-Daddy, you know I wouldn't any more want you to cut off your beard than the man in the moon. It was the farthest thing from my mind! Stella-Rondo sat there and made that up while she was eating breast of chicken."

But he says, "So the postmistress fails to understand why I don't cut off my beard. Which job I got you through my influence with the government. 'Bird's nest'—is that what you call it?"

Not that it isn't the next to smallest P.O. in the entire state of Mississippi. 20

I says, "Oh, Papa-Daddy," I says, "I didn't say any such a thing, I never dreamed it was a bird's nest, I have always been grateful though this is the next to smallest P.O. in the state of Mississippi, and I do not enjoy being referred to as a hussy by my own grandfather."

But Stella-Rondo says, "Yes, you did say it too. Anybody in the world could of heard you, that had ears."

"Stop right there," says Mama, looking at me.

So I pulled my napkin straight back through the napkin ring and left the table.

As soon as I was out of the room Mama says, "Call her back, or she'll starve 25 to death," but Papa-Daddy says, "This is the beard I started growing on the Coast when I was fifteen years old." He would of gone on till nightfall if Shirley-T. hadn't lost the Milky Way she ate in Cairo.

So Papa-Daddy says, "I am going out and lie in the hammock, and you can all sit here and remember my words: I'll never cut off my beard as long as I live, even one inch, and I don't appreciate it in you at all." Passed right by me in the hall and went straight out and got in the hammock.

It would be a holiday. It wasn't five minutes before Uncle Rondo suddenly appeared in the hall in one of Stella-Rondo's flesh-colored kimonos, all cut on the bias, like something Mr. Whitaker probably thought was gorgeous.

"Uncle Rondo!" I says. "I didn't know who that was! Where are you going?"

"Sister," he says, "get out of my way, I'm poisoned."

"If you're poisoned stay away from Papa-Daddy," I says. "Keep out of the 30 hammock. Papa-Daddy will certainly beat you on the head if you come within forty miles of him. He thinks I deliberately said he ought to cut off his beard after he got me the P.O., and I've told him and told him and told him, and he acts like he just don't hear me. Papa-Daddy must of gone stone deaf."

"He picked a fine day to do it then," says Uncle Rondo, and before you could say "Jack Robinson" flew out in the yard.

What he'd really done, he'd drunk another bottle of that prescription. He does it every single Fourth of July as sure as shooting, and it's horribly expensive. Then he falls over in the hammock and snores. So he insisted on zigzagging right on out to the hammock, looking like a half-wit.

Papa-Daddy woke with this horrible yell and right there without moving an inch he tried to turn Uncle Rondo against me. I heard every word he said. Oh, he told Uncle Rondo I didn't learn to read till I was eight years old and he didn't see how in the world I ever got the mail put up at the P.O., much less read it all, and he said if Uncle Rondo could only fathom the lengths he had gone to get me that job! And he said on the other hand he thought Stella-Rondo had a brilliant mind and deserved credit for getting out of town. All the time he was just lying there swinging as pretty as you please and looping out his beard, and poor Uncle Rondo was pleading with him to slow down the hammock, it was making him as dizzy as a witch to watch it. But that's what Papa-Daddy likes about a hammock. So Uncle Rondo was too dizzy to get turned against me for the time being. He's Mama's only brother and is a good case of a one-track mind. Ask anybody. A certified pharmacist.

Just then I heard Stella-Rondo raising the upstairs window. While she was married she got this peculiar idea that it's cooler with the windows shut and locked. So she has to raise the window before she can make a soul hear her outdoors.

35 So she raises the window and says, "Oh!" You would have thought she was mortally wounded.

Uncle Rondo and Papa-Daddy didn't even look up, but kept right on with what they were doing. I had to laugh.

I flew up the stairs and threw the door open! I says, "What in the wide world's the matter, Stella-Rondo? You mortally wounded?"

"No," she says, "I am not mortally wounded but I wish you would do me the favor of looking out that window there and telling me what you see."

So I shade my eyes and look out the window.

40 "I see the front yard," I says.

"Don't you see any human beings?"

"I see Uncle Rondo trying to run Papa-Daddy out of the hammock," I says. "Nothing more. Naturally, it's so suffocating-hot in the house, with all the windows shut and locked, everybody who cares to stay in their right mind will have to go out and get in the hammock before the Fourth of July is over."

"Don't you notice anything different about Uncle Rondo?" asks Stella-Rondo.

"Why, no, except he's got on some terrible-looking flesh-colored contraption I wouldn't be found dead in, is all I can see," I says.

45 "Never mind, you won't be found dead in it, because it happens to be part of my trousseau, and Mr. Whitaker took several dozen photographs of me in it," says Stella-Rondo. "What on earth could Uncle Rondo mean by wearing part of my trousseau out in the broad open daylight without saying so much as 'Kiss my foot,' knowing I only got home this morning after my separation and hung my negligee up on the bathroom door, just as nervous as I could be?"

"I'm sure I don't know, and what do you expect me to do about it?" I says. "Jump out the window?"

"No, I expect nothing of the kind. I simply declare that Uncle Rondo looks like a fool in it, that's all," she says. "It makes me sick to my stomach."

"Well, he looks as good as he can," I says. "As good as anybody in reason could." I stood up for Uncle Rondo, please remember. And I said to Stella-Rondo, "I think I would do well not to criticize so freely if I were you and came home with a two-year-old child I had never said a word about, and no explanation whatever about my separation."

"I asked you the instant I entered this house not to refer one more time to my adopted child, and you gave me your word of honor you would not," was all Stella-Rondo would say, and started pulling out every one of her eyebrows with some cheap Kress tweezers.

50 So I merely slammed the door behind me and went down and made some green-tomato pickle. Somebody had to do it. Of course Mama had turned both the Negroes loose; she always said no earthly power could hold one anyway on the Fourth of July, so she wouldn't even try. It turned out that Jaypan fell in the lake and came within a very narrow limit of drowning.

So Mama trots in. Lifts up the lid and says, "H'm! Not very good for your Uncle Rondo in his precarious condition, I must say. Or poor little adopted Shirley-T. Shame on you!"

That made me tired. I says, "Well, Stella-Rondo had better thank her lucky stars it was her instead of me came trotting in with that very peculiar-looking child. Now if it had been me that trotted in from Illinois and brought a peculiar-looking child or two, I shudder to think of the reception I'd of got, much less controlled the diet of an entire family."

"But you must remember, Sister, that you were never married to Mr. Whitaker in the first place and didn't go up to Illinois to live," says Mama, shaking a spoon in my face. "If you had I would of been just as overjoyed to see you and your little adopted girl as I was to see Stella-Rondo, when you wound up with your separation and came on back home."

"You would not," I says.

"Don't contradict me, I would," says Mama. 55

But I said she couldn't convince me though she talked till she was blue in the face. Then I said, "Besides, you know as well as I do that that child is not adopted."

"She most certainly is adopted," says Mama, stiff as a poker.

I says, "Why, Mama, Stella-Rondo had her just as sure as anything in this world, and just too stuck up to admit it."

"Why, Sister," said Mama. "Here I thought we were going to have a pleasant Fourth of July, and you start right out not believing a word your own baby sister tells you!"

"Just like Cousin Annie Flo. Went to her grave denying the facts of life," I 60 reminded Mama.

"I told you if you ever mentioned Annie Flo's name I'd slap your face," says Mama, and slaps my face.

"All right, you wait and see," I says.

"I," says Mama, "I prefer to take my children's word for anything when it's humanly possible." You ought to see Mama, she weighs two hundred pounds and has real tiny feet.

Just then something perfectly horrible occurred to me.

"Mama," I says, "can that child talk?" I simply had to whisper! "Mama, I wonder if that child can be—you know—in any way? Do you realize?" I says, "that she hasn't spoke one single, solitary word to a human being up to this minute? This is the way she looks," I says, and I looked like this. 65

Well, Mama and I just stood there and stared at each other. It was horrible!

"I remember well that Joe Whitaker frequently drank like a fish," says Mama. "I believed to my soul he drank chemicals." And without another word she marches to the foot of the stairs and calls Stella-Rondo.

"Stella-Rondo? O-o-o-o-o! Stella-Rondo!"

"What?" says Stella-Rondo from upstairs. Not even the grace to get up off the bed.

"Can that child of yours talk?" asks Mama. 70

Stella-Rondo says, "Can she what?"

"Talk! Talk!" says Mama. "Burdyburdyburdyburdy!"

So Stella-Rondo yells back, "Who says she can't talk?"

"Sister says so," says Mama.

"You didn't have to tell me, I know whose word of honor don't mean a thing 75 in this house," says Stella-Rondo.

And in a minute the loudest Yankee voice I ever heard in my life yells out, "OE'm Pop-OE the Sailor-r-r-r Ma-a-an!" and then somebody jumps up and down in the upstairs hall. In another second the house would of fallen down.

"Not only talks, she can tap-dance!" calls Stella-Rondo. "Which is more than some people I won't name can do."

"Why, the little precious darling thing!" Mama says, so surprised. "Just as smart as she can be!" Starts talking baby talk right there. Then she turns on me. "Sister, you ought to be thoroughly ashamed! Run upstairs this instant and apologize to Stella-Rondo and Shirley-T."

"Apologize for what?" I says. "I merely wondered if the child was normal, that's all. Now that she's proved she is, why, I have nothing further to say."

80 But Mama just turned on her heel and flew out, furious. She ran right upstairs and hugged the baby. She believed it was adopted. Stella-Rondo hadn't done a thing but turn her against me from upstairs while I stood there helpless over the hot stove. So that made Mama, Papa-Daddy, and the baby all on Stella-Rondo's side.

Next, Uncle Rondo.

I must say that Uncle Rondo has been marvelous to me at various times in the past and I was completely unprepared to be made to jump out of my skin, the way it turned out. Once Stella-Rondo did something perfectly horrible to him—broke a chain letter from Flanders Field—and he took the radio back he had given her and gave it to me. Stella-Rondo was furious! For six months we all had to call her Stella instead of Stella-Rondo, or she wouldn't answer. I always thought Uncle Rondo had all the brains of the entire family. Another time he sent me to Mammoth Cave with all expenses paid.

But this would be the day he was drinking that prescription, the Fourth of July.

So at supper Stella-Rondo speaks up and says she thinks Uncle Rondo ought to try to eat a little something. So finally Uncle Rondo said he would try a little cold biscuits and ketchup, but that was all. So she brought it to him.

85 "Do you think it wise to disport with ketchup in Stella-Rondo's flesh-colored kimono?" I says. Trying to be considerate! If Stella-Rondo couldn't watch out for her trousseau, somebody had to.

"Any objections?" asks Uncle Rondo, just about to pour out all of the ketchup.

"Don't mind what she says, Uncle Rondo," says Stella-Rondo. "Sister has been devoting this solid afternoon to sneering out my bedroom window at the way you look."

"What's that?" says Uncle Rondo. Uncle Rondo has got the most terrible temper in the world. Anything is liable to make him tear the house down if it comes at the wrong time.

So Stella-Rondo says, "Sister says, 'Uncle Rondo certainly does look like a fool in that pink kimono!'"

90 Do you remember who it was really said that?

Uncle Rondo spills out all the ketchup and jumps out of his chair and tears off the kimono and throws it down on the dirty floor and puts his foot on it. It had to be sent all the way to Jackson to the cleaners and re-pleated.

"So that's your opinion of your Uncle Rondo, is it?" he says. "I look like a fool, do I? Well, that's the last straw. A whole day in this house with nothing to do, and then to hear you come out with a remark like that behind my back!"

"I didn't say any such of a thing, Uncle Rondo," I says, "and I'm not saying who did, either. Why, I think you look all right. Just try to take care of yourself and not talk and eat at the same time," I says. "I think you better go lie down."

"Lie down my foot," says Uncle Rondo. I ought to of known by that he was fixing to do something perfectly horrible.

So he didn't do anything that night in the precarious state he was in—just played Casino with Mama and Stella-Rondo and Shirley-T. and gave Shirley-T. a nickel with a head on both sides. It tickled her nearly to death, and she called him "Papa." But at 6:30 A.M. the next morning, he threw a whole five-cent package of some unsold one-inch firecrackers from the store as hard as he could into my bedroom and they every one went off. Not one bad one in the string. Anybody else, there'd be one that wouldn't go off.

Well, I'm just terribly susceptible to noise of any kind, the doctor has always told me I was the most sensitive person he had ever seen in his whole life, and I was simply prostrated. I couldn't eat! People tell me they heard it as far as the cemetery, and old Aunt Jep Patterson, that had been holding her own so good, thought it was Judgment Day and she was going to meet her whole family. It's usually so quiet here.

And I'll tell you it didn't take me any longer than a minute to make up my mind what to do. There I was with the whole entire house on Stella-Rondo's side and turned against me. If I have anything at all I have pride.

So I just decided I'd go straight down to the P.O. There's plenty of room there in the back, I says to myself.

Well! I made no bones about letting the family catch on to what I was up to. I didn't try to conceal it.

The first thing they knew, I marched in where they were all playing Old Maid and pulled the electric oscillating fan out by the plug, and everything got real hot. Next I snatched the pillow I'd done the needlepoint on right off the davenport from behind Papa-Daddy. He went "Ugh!" I beat Stella-Rondo up the stairs and finally found my charm bracelet in her bureau drawer under a picture of Nelson Eddy.¹

"So that's the way the land lies," says Uncle Rondo. There he was, piecing on the ham. "Well, Sister, I'll be glad to donate my army cot if you got any place to set it up, providing you'll leave right this minute and let me get some peace." Uncle Rondo was in France.

"Thank you kindly for the cot and 'peace' is hardly the word I would select if I had to resort to firecrackers at 6:30 A.M. in a young girl's bedroom," I says to him. "And as to where I intend to go, you seem to forget my position as postmistress of China Grove, Mississippi," I says. "I've always got the P.O."

Well, that made them all sit up and take notice.

I went out front and started digging up some four-o'clocks to plant around the P.O.

"Ah-ah-ah!" says Mama, raising the window. "Those happen to be my four-o'clocks. Everything planted in that star is mine. I've never known you to make anything grow in your life."

1. Opera singer (1901–67) who enjoyed phenomenal popularity in the 1930s and 1940s when he costarred in numerous film musicals with Jeanette MacDonald. The two were known as "America's Singing Sweethearts."

“Very well,” I says. “But I take the fern. Even you, Mama, can’t stand there and deny that I’m the one watered that fern. And I happen to know where I can send in a box top and get a packet of one thousand mixed seeds, no two the same kind, free.”

“Oh, where?” Mama wants to know.

But I says, “Too late. You ’tend to your house, and I’ll ’tend to mine. You hear things like that all the time if you know how to listen to the radio. Perfectly marvelous offers. Get anything you want free.”

So I hope to tell you I marched in and got that radio, and they could of all bit a nail in two, especially Stella-Rondo, that it used to belong to, and she well knew she couldn’t get it back, I’d sue for it like a shot. And I very politely took the sewing-machine motor I helped pay the most on to give Mama for Christmas back in 1929, and a good big calendar, with the first-aid remedies on it. The thermometer and the Hawaiian ukulele certainly were rightfully mine, and I stood on the step-ladder and got all my watermelon-rind preserves and every fruit and vegetable I’d put up, every jar. Then I began to pull the tacks out of the bluebird wall vases on the archway to the dining room.

110 “Who told you you could have those, Miss Priss?” says Mama, fanning as hard as she could.

“I bought ’em and I’ll keep track of ’em,” I says. “I’ll tack ’em up one on each side of the post-office window, and you can see ’em when you come to ask me for your mail, if you’re so dead to see ’em.”

“Not I! I’ll never darken the door to that post office again if I live to be a hundred,” Mama says. “Ungrateful child! After all the money we spent on you at the Normal.”²

“Me either,” says Stella-Rondo. “You can just let my mail lie there and rot, for all I care. I’ll never come and relieve you of a single, solitary piece.”

“I should worry,” I says. “And who you think’s going to sit down and write you all those big fat letters and postcards, by the way? Mr. Whitaker? Just because he was the only man ever dropped down in China Grove and you got him—unfairly—is he going to sit down and write you a lengthy correspondence after you come home giving no rhyme nor reason whatsoever for your separation and no explanation for the presence of that child? I may not have your brilliant mind, but I fail to see it.”

115 So Mama says, “Sister, I’ve told you a thousand times that Stella-Rondo simply got homesick, and this child is far too big to be hers,” and she says, “Now, why don’t you just sit down and play Casino?”

Then Shirley-T. sticks out her tongue at me in this perfectly horrible way. She has no more manners than the man in the moon. I told her she was going to cross her eyes like that some day and they’d stick.

“It’s too late to stop me now,” I says. “You should have tried that yesterday. I’m going to the P.O. and the only way you can possibly see me is to visit me there.”

So Papa-Daddy says, “You’ll never catch me setting foot in that post office, even if I should take a notion into my head to write a letter some place.” He says, “I won’t have you reachin’ out of that little old window with a pair of shears and cuttin’ off any beard of mine. I’m too smart for you!”

2. That is, normal school (teachers’ college).

"We all are," says Stella-Rondo.

But I said, "If you're so smart, where's Mr. Whitaker?"

So then Uncle Rondo says, "I'll thank you from now on to stop reading all the orders I get on postcards and telling everybody in China Grove what you think is the matter with them," but I says, "I draw my own conclusions and will continue in the future to draw them." I says, "If people want to write their innermost secrets on penny postcards, there's nothing in the wide world you can do about it, Uncle Rondo."

"And if you think we'll ever write another postcard you're sadly mistaken," says Mama.

"Cutting off your nose to spite your face then," I says. "But if you're all determined to have no more to do with the U.S. mail, think of this: What will Stella-Rondo do now, if she wants to tell Mr. Whitaker to come after her?"

"Wah!" says Stella-Rondo. I knew she'd cry. She had a conniption fit right there in the kitchen.

"It will be interesting to see how long she holds out," I says. "And now—I am leaving."

"Good-bye," says Uncle Rondo.

"Oh, I declare," says Mama, "to think that a family of mine should quarrel on the Fourth of July, or the day after, over Stella-Rondo leaving old Mr. Whitaker and having the sweetest little adopted child! It looks like we'd all be glad!"

"Wah!" says Stella-Rondo, and has a fresh conniption fit.

"He left her—you mark my words," I says. "That's Mr. Whitaker. I know Mr. Whitaker. After all, I knew him first. I said from the beginning he'd up and leave her. I foretold every single thing that's happened."

"Where did he go?" asks Mama.

"Probably to the North Pole, if he knows what's good for him," I says.

But Stella-Rondo just bawled and wouldn't say another word. She flew to her room and slammed the door.

"Now look what you've gone and done, Sister," says Mama. "You go apologize."

"I haven't the time, I'm leaving," I says.

"Well, what are you waiting around for?" asks Uncle Rondo.

135

So I just picked up the kitchen clock and marched off, without saying, "Kiss my foot," or anything, and never did tell Stella-Rondo good-bye.

There was a girl going along on a little wagon right in front.

"Nigger girl," I says, "come help me haul these things down the hill, I'm going to live in the post office."

Took her nine trips in her express wagon. Uncle Rondo came out on the porch and threw her a nickel.

And that's the last I've laid eyes on any of my family or my family laid eyes on me for five solid days and nights. Stella-Rondo may be telling the most horrible tales in the world about Mr. Whitaker, but I haven't heard them. As I tell everybody, I draw my own conclusions.

But oh, I like it here. It's ideal, as I've been saying. You see, I've got everything cater-cornered, the way I like it. Hear the radio? All the war news. Radio, sewing machine, book ends, ironing board and that great big piano lamp—peace, that's what I like. Butter-bean vines planted all along the front where the strings are.

Of course, there's not much mail. My family are naturally the main people in China Grove, and if they prefer to vanish from the face of the earth, for all the mail they get or the mail they write, why, I'm not going to open my mouth. Some of the folks here in town are taking up for me and some turned against me. I know which is which. There are always people who will quit buying stamps just to get on the right side of Papa-Daddy.

But here I am, and here I'll stay. I want the world to know I'm happy.

And if Stella-Rondo should come to me this minute, on bended knees, and attempt to explain the incidents of her life with Mr. Whitaker, I'd simply put my fingers in both my ears and refuse to listen.

POETRY

Reading, Responding, Writing

Ways of reading poetry and reasons for doing so differ almost as widely as poems themselves, and in ways we can perhaps best appreciate by considering poetry's functions in other times and places. Though you might be aware, for example, that medieval noblemen paid courtly "bards" to commemorate their achievements and thereby help them to maintain their own prestige and power, you might be surprised to learn that since 2007 millions of people across the Middle East have tuned in to watch Prince of Poets, a reality show in which poets rather than pop singers compete for audience votes.

Such phenomena might come as a surprise to us simply because today, at least in the West, we don't tend to think of poetry as having great popular appeal or political potency. Millions of us may be moved by the way hip-hop artists use rhyme and rhythm to boast about, or "celebrate and sing," themselves; to show us the danger and excitement of life on the streets; or even to get out the vote. Yet "poetry" seems to many of us a thing apart, something either to suffer, to cherish, or to simply be baffled and intimidated by precisely because it seems so arcane, so different and difficult, so essentially irrelevant to the rest of our lives. Though one rarely hears anyone say of all fiction either "I hate it" or "I love it" or "I just don't get it," if you're like most people, you've probably said, thought, or heard someone else say at least one of these things about poetry.

This chapter and the ones that follow welcome poetry-lovers. But they neither require you to be one nor aim to convert you. They do, we hope, demonstrate a few key points:

- Poetry itself isn't all one thing: Poems differ as much as the people who write and read them, or as much as music and movies do. They can be by turns goofy, sad, or angry; they can tell a story, comment on current events, or simply describe the look of a certain time of day. Deciding that you "love," "hate," "get," or "don't get" all poetry based on your experience of one poem or of one kind of poetry is a little like either deciding you love all music because Mozart moves you or giving up on music entirely because Lady Gaga leaves you cold.
- A good poem is not a secret message one needs a special decoder ring or an advanced degree to decipher. Any thoughtful person who's willing to try can make sense of it, though some poems certainly do invite us to rethink our idea of what "making sense" might mean. Poetry has spoken to millions of ordinary people across the centuries and around the world, so at least some poems can speak to us, too, if we give both them and ourselves a chance. By the same token, even the most devoted, experienced poetry lovers among us can become better, more responsive, more thoughtful readers by simply reading more and different kinds of poetry and by exploring, as the following chapters do, the various elements and techniques with which poetry is made.

- People around the world have often turned to poetry to express their feelings and longings precisely because poetry is, in certain vital ways, distinct from other forms of writing. Each genre plays by its own rules and has its own history and traditions, so reading poetry effectively, like succeeding in a video game, does involve learning and playing by certain rules. Any one poem may open itself to multiple responses and interpretations, just as a game may allow you many ways of advancing to the next level. But in both cases there are limits. Neither is a free-for-all in which “anything goes.” (In both cases, too, some difficulty can be essential to the fun.) A poem wouldn't mean anything if it could mean everything.
- Yet the questions we ask of a poem and the techniques we use to understand it are simply variations of the same ones we use in reading fiction or drama. Indeed, some poems narrate action just as a short story does; others work much like plays.
- Finally, poems aren't nearly as fragile as we take them to be when we worry about “over-reading” or “analyzing them to death.” You can't kill a poem. But a poem does experience a sort of living death if it's not read, re-read, and pondered over. Poems need you. Not only can they bear the weight of your careful attention, but they also deserve it: the best of them are, after all, the result of someone else's. William Wordsworth may have done much to shape our contemporary ideas about poetry when he famously described it as “the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings,” but his own poems were, like most great poems, the result of weeks, even years, of writing and revision.

DEFINING POETRY

But what, after all, is poetry? Trying to define poetry is a bit like trying to catch a snowflake; you can do it, but at the very same moment, the snowflake begins to melt and disappear. With poems, as with fiction, one can always come up with particular examples that don't do what the definition insists they must, as well as numerous writers and readers who will disagree. Yet to claim that poetry eludes all definition is merely to reinforce the idea that it is simply too mysterious for ordinary mortals. Without being all-sufficient or entirely satisfying, a dictionary definition can at least give us a starting point. Here are two such definitions of poetry:

1. Writing that formulates a concentrated imaginative awareness of experience in language chosen and arranged to create a specific emotional response through meaning, sound, and rhythm. (Merriam-Webster)
2. Composition in verse or some comparable patterned arrangement of language in which the expression of feelings and ideas is given intensity by the use of distinctive style and rhythm[. . .]. Traditionally associated with explicit formal departure from the patterns of ordinary speech or prose, e.g., in the use of elevated diction, figurative language, and syntactical reordering. (The Oxford English Dictionary)

Different as they are, both of these definitions stress four elements: 1) the “patterned arrangement of language” to 2) generate “rhythm” and thereby both 3) express and evoke specific “emotion[s]” or “feelings” in 4) a “concentrated” way, or with “intensity.”

But what does all that really mean? To test drive this definition, let's look at an example. And let's pick a tough one: HEAD, HEART, taken from The Collected Stories of Lydia Davis, is usually classified as a work of fiction, and it certainly does have the elements of one, including characters and some action arranged into a plot brought to us by a narrator. Yet one reviewer of Davis's Collected Stories tellingly describes this one as "a poem of a story." What specific features of the following story might make it work like a poem? Which, if any, of the features essential to poetry might it lack?

LYDIA DAVIS

Head, Heart

- Heart weeps.
 Head tries to help heart.
 Head tells heart how it is, again:
 You will lose the ones you love. They will all go. But even the earth will go, someday.
- 5 Heart feels better, then.
 But the words of head do not remain long in the ears of heart.
 Heart is so new to this.
 I want them back, says heart.
 Head is all heart has.
- 10 Help, head. Help heart.

If difficulty were essential to poetry, "Head, Heart" would not seem to qualify. It's hard to imagine less formal, even less elementary, diction or syntax. And the whole seems relatively easy to paraphrase (often a helpful thing to do when first encountering a poem): When we're sad about losing someone we love, we reason with ourselves that loss is inevitable because everything earthly, even the earth itself, can't last forever. Such rational explanations give us comfort, but that comfort is itself temporary; we still miss those we've lost and have to keep calling on our heads to help our hearts cope.

We do have emotion here, then, as well as a conflict between emotion and reason—and even when they lack plots, most poems do explore conflicts, just as stories and plays do. But do we have a poem? Does it matter that "Head, Heart" depends entirely on two figures of speech—metonymy, the use of the name of one thing for another closely associated thing (here, "head" for "reason," and "heart" for "emotion"), as well as personification, the representation of an object or an abstraction (here, "head" and "heart") as a person (capable of weeping and talking, for example)? Though fiction and drama both use figurative language, we often describe such language as "poetic," even when it occurs in a story or play, because poems do tend to depend much more on it (as we discuss further in ch. 14).

Does it matter that "Head, Heart" is short—just seventy-one words? Though poems come in every size, many poems are short or at least shorter than the typical work of fiction. Brevity is one way that some poems achieve the "concentration" and "intensity" the dictionaries take to be essential. Such concentration invites, even requires, ours. As poet Billy Collins puts it, "Poetry offers us the possibility of modulating our pace." The very brevity of a poem can teach us simply to slow down for a moment and pay attention—not only to the details within the poem, but also, through them, to whatever in the world or in ourselves the poem attends to. Sometimes that’s all a poem does—simply invites us to pay attention to something we wouldn’t notice otherwise.

Regardless of their overall length, moreover, almost all poems concentrate our attention and modulate our pace by doling out words a few at a time, arranging them not just into sentences (as in prose), but into discreet lines. One result is much more blank space and thus more silences and pauses than in prose. For this reason alone, “Head, Heart” looks and works like a poem. And the deliberateness with which it does so is signaled by the fact that one of its sentences is divided so as to span multiple lines. (Line 3 ends with a colon, not a period.) By arranging words into lines and, often, into stanzas, the poet, not a typesetter or printer, determines where words fall on the page. And that perhaps is the most important aspect of that arrangement of language that has differentiated poetry from prose since poetry became a written, as well as spoken, art (an issue discussed further in ch. 18). All printings of a poem, if accurate, reproduce exactly the same breaks and space the words precisely the same way on the page.

AUTHORS ON THEIR CRAFT

BILLY COLLINS ON THE POET AS “LINE-MAKER”

From “A Brisk Walk: An Interview with Billy Collins” (2006)*

I’m a line-maker. I think that’s what makes poets different from prose-writers. [. . .]
 We think not just in sentences the way prose writers do but also in lines. [. . .]
 When I’m constructing a poem, I’m trying to write one good line after another. [. . .]
 I’m not thinking of just writing a paragraph and then chopping it up. I’m very conscious of the fact that every line should have a cadence to it. It should contribute to the progress of the poem. And that the ending of the line is a way of turning the reader’s attention back into the interior of the poem.

*“A Brisk Walk: An Interview with Billy Collins.” Interview by Joel Whitney. Guernica, 14 June 2006, www.guernicamag.com/interviews/a_brisk_walk/.

One result is that line endings and beginnings inevitably get more of our attention, bear more oomph and meaning. Notice how many of the lines of “Head, Heart” begin with head and heart and how these words repeat in a pattern (Heart, Head, Head, Heart, Heart, Head—and then Help), as if the line-beginnings themselves enact the same interplay between “head” and “heart” that the sentences describe. Conversely, certain end-words reverberate: again, for example, suggests the repetitive familiarity of this conflict, one that paradoxically seems all the more difficult or poignant because it’s both repetitive (each person goes through this again and again) and familiar (all of us go through this); then alerts us to the temporariness of the comfort head offers heart, preparing us for the But in the next line.

Again and then also reverberate in us and with each other because they rhyme, just as head, heart, and help alliterate. These words share a special aural, as well as spatial and visual, relationship to each other. Though prose writers certainly make their appeal to us in part through sound, poetry remains, as it has been for thousands of years, a more insistently aural form—one that appeals through aural patterning to what Davis here humorously, but not wrongly, calls “the ears of heart” (line 6). As poet Mary Oliver puts it, “To make a poem, we must make sounds. Not random sounds, but chosen sounds.”

But are there qualities essential to poetry that “Head, Heart” lacks? Is it, for example, sufficiently aural in its appeal? Does it have genuine rhythm? Perhaps so, perhaps not. As you work your way through the rest of the chapters in this section and read more poems, we encourage you to keep thinking critically about our definitions in order to hone your own sense of just what poetry is, how it works, and what it does.

POETIC SUBGENRES AND KINDS

All poems share some common elements, use some of the same techniques, and thus require us to ask some of the same questions. Later in this chapter, we’ll outline some of the steps you can follow and some of the questions you can pose as you read, respond to, and write about any poem. But different sorts of poems also work by slightly different rules and thus invite somewhat different responses and questions.

Poems may be classified into subgenres based on various characteristics, including their length, appearance, and formal features (patterns of rhyme and rhythm, for example); their subject; or even the type of situation and setting (time and place) they depict. (A sonnet, for example, has fourteen lines. Defined broadly, an elegy is simply any poem about death.) A single poem might well represent multiple subgenres or at least might contain elements of more than one. (One could write an elegy that is also a sonnet, for instance.)

Since Aristotle’s time, however, readers and writers have also often divided poems into three broad categories or subgenres—narrative, dramatic, or lyric—based upon their mode of presentation. Put simply, poems that have a plot are either narrative poems (if they feature a narrator) or dramatic poems (if they don’t), and many poems that lack a plot are lyrics. The rest of this section describes each of these subgenres in more detail, starting with the one that most resembles fiction and ending with the dramatic monologue, a sort of hybrid that combines features of both dramatic and lyric poetry.

As the dramatic monologue demonstrates, the borders between narrative, dramatic, and lyric poetry are fuzzy, contestable, and shifting. Some poems will cross those borders; others will resist these categories altogether. And the very definition of lyric poetry has not only changed over time, but also remains contested today. The ultimate goal isn’t to definitively pigeonhole every poem but rather to develop a language through which to recognize, describe, and explore different poetic modes. Knowing which mode dominates in a particular poem can help ensure that we privilege the right questions as we read and write about it. Learning the conventions of particular subgenres and kinds allows us to better adjust to individual poems, to compare them to each other, and to appreciate how each creatively uses and reworks generic conventions.

Narrative Poetry

Like a work of prose fiction, a narrative poem tells a story; in other words, it has a plot related by a narrator, though its plot might be based on actual rather than made-up events. Comprising the same elements discussed in the Fiction section of this book, a narrative poem encourages us to ask the same questions—about character, plot, narration, and so on—that we do when reading a short story or novel. (See “Questions about the Elements of Fiction” in “Fiction: Reading, Responding, Writing.”)

In centuries past, narrative poetry was a—even the—dominant subgenre of poetry. As a result, there are many different kinds of narrative poems, including book-length epics like Homer’s Iliad; chivalric romances like Thomas Malory’s Le Morte d’Arthur; grisly murder ballads, often rooted in actual events; and a range of harder-to-classify works of varying lengths such as the relatively short example below.

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON

Richard Cory

Whenever Richard Cory went down town,
We people on the pavement looked at him:
He was a gentleman from sole to crown,
Clean favored, and imperially slim.

5 And he was always quietly arrayed,
And he was always human when he talked;
But still he fluttered pulses when he said,
“Good-morning,” and he glittered when he walked.

And he was rich—yes, richer than a king—
10 And admirably schooled in every grace:
In fine,¹ we thought that he was everything
To make us wish that we were in his place.

So on we worked, and waited for the light,
And went without the meat, and cursed the bread;
15 And Richard Cory, one calm summer night,
Went home and put a bullet through his head.

- How does the poem characterize Richard Cory? What is the effect of the first-personal plural narration?
- What details in the poem’s first three stanzas might make its final stanza simultaneously surprising, ironic, and predictable?

1. In conclusion, in sum.

Dramatic Poetry

For centuries, plays were written exclusively or mainly in verse; as a result, drama itself was understood not as a genre in its own right (as we think of it today) but rather as a subgenre of poetry. “Dramatic poetry” thus meant and still can mean actual plays in verse (or verse drama). But any poem that consists wholly of dialogue among characters, unmediated by a narrator, counts as a dramatic poem. And we might even apply that label to poems like the following in which narration is kept to the barest minimum. Indeed, this narrator’s only words are “said she,” and since every other word in the poem is spoken by one female character to another, the poem essentially reads like a scene from a play. Notice, though, that the poem also depends on techniques of formal organization and patterning unique to poetry: In each of the poem’s six stanzas, for example, one woman speaks the first lines, while her companion gets the last line (or two).

THOMAS HARDY

The Ruined Maid

“O ’Melia,² my dear, this does everything crown!
Who could have supposed I should meet you in Town?
And whence such fair garments, such prosperi-ty?”—
“O didn’t you know I’d been ruined?” said she.

5 —“You left us in tatters, without shoes or socks,
Tired of digging potatoes, and spudding up docks;³
And now you’ve gay bracelets and bright feathers three!”— “Yes: that’s how we dress when we’re ruined,” said she.

—“At home in the barton⁴ you said ‘thee’ and ‘thou,’
10 And ‘thik oon,’ and ‘theäs oon,’ and ‘t’other; but now
Your talking quite fits ’ee for high compa-ny!”— “Some polish is gained with one’s ruin,” said she.

—“Your hands were like paws then, your face blue and bleak
But now I’m bewitched by your delicate cheek,
15 And your little gloves fit as on any la-dy!”—
“We never do work when we’re ruined,” said she.

—“You used to call home-life a hag-ridden dream,
And you’d sigh, and you’d sock;⁵ but at present you seem
To know not of megrims⁶ or melancho-ly!”— 20 “True. One’s pretty lively when ruined,” said she.

—“I wish I had feathers, a fine sweeping gown,
And a delicate face, and could strut about Town!”—

2. Short for Amelia. 3. Spading up weeds. 4. Farmyard. 5. Sigh (English dialect).
6. Migraine headaches.

“My dear—a raw country girl, such as you be,
Cannot quite expect that. You ain’t ruined,” said she.

1866

When we read and write about dramatic poems, we can usefully bring to bear the same questions we do in reading drama. (See “Questions to Ask When Reading a Play” in “Drama: Reading, Responding, Writing.”) But when it comes to short poems like THE RUINED MAID, questions about sets, staging, and even plot will usually be much less relevant than those related to character and conflict, as well as setting, tone, language, symbol, and theme. In Hardy’s poem, for example, how are each of the two speakers characterized by how they speak, as well as what they say? How is our view of them, and especially of ‘Melina, “the ruined maid,” affected by the formal pattern mentioned earlier, which ensures (among other things) that she gets the last line? How might this pattern, along with rhythm and rhyme, also add irony to the poem?

Lyric Poetry

For good historical reasons, lyric poems probably best fulfill your expectations of what poetry should be like. Yet lyric poetry has been and still is defined in myriad ways. The word lyric derives from the ancient Greeks, for whom it designated a short poem chanted or sung by a single singer to the accompaniment of a stringed instrument called a lyre (hence, the word lyric and the fact that we today also use the word lyrics to denote the words of any song). Scholars believe that the earliest “lyrics” in the Greek sense were likely associated with religious occasions and feelings, especially those related to celebration, praise, and mourning. Ever since, the lyric has been associated with brevity, musicality, a single speaker, and the expression of intense feeling. Not surprisingly, at least a few specific kinds of lyric, including the ode and the elegy, originated in the ancient world.

Over the centuries, the lyric’s boundaries have expanded and become less clear. Few lyrics are intended to be sung at all, much less to a lyre. But everyone agrees that relatively short poems that focus primarily on the feelings, impressions, and thoughts—that is, on the subjective, inward experience—of a single first-person speaker are lyrics.

Below are two examples very different from each other in subject matter and tone. Yet with these, as with all lyrics, our initial questions in both reading and writing will likely focus on each speaker’s situation and inward experience of it. What is each speaker experiencing, feeling, and thinking, and how exactly does the poem make that state of mood and mind at once vivid and relevant to us?

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH [I wandered lonely as a cloud]

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o’er vales and hills,
When all at once I saw a crowd,
A host, of golden daffodils;

5 Beside the lake, beneath the trees,
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle on the milky way,
They stretched in never-ending line

10 Along the margin of a bay:
Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

The waves beside them danced; but they
Out-did the sparkling waves in glee:

15 A poet could not but be gay,
In such a jocund company:
I gazed—and gazed—but little thought
What wealth the show to me had brought:

For oft, when on my couch I lie

20 In vacant or in pensive mood,
They flash upon that inward eye
Which is the bliss of solitude;
And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils.

- According to the speaker, what is “the bliss of solitude” (line 22)? Why and how does “solitude” become less “lonely” for him (line 1)?
- What about the relationship between human beings and nature might be implied by the speaker’s description of his particular experience?

FRANK O’HARA

Poem

Lana Turner⁷ has collapsed!
I was trotting along and suddenly it started raining and snowing and you said it was hailing

5 but hailing hits you on the head hard so it was really snowing and raining and I was in such a hurry to meet you but the traffic was acting exactly like the sky

10 and suddenly I see a headline
LANA TURNER HAS COLLAPSED!
there is no snow in Hollywood
there is no rain in California
I have been to lots of parties

15 and acted perfectly disgraceful

7. American actress (1921–95); in 1958, Turner’s lover was stabbed to death by her daughter, who was determined to have acted in self-defense.

but I never actually collapsed
oh Lana Turner we love you get up 1962

- What or whom exactly does this poem seem to make fun of? Does the poem also convey more serious sentiments?
- What current celebrity seems to you like the best potential substitute for Lana Turner? What about both this celebrity's public persona and the poem itself make your choice seem especially appropriate?

What makes these lyrics different from narrative and dramatic poems? Though both include action (“wander[ing],” “trotting,” and so on), that action doesn't quite add up to a plot; what we have might be better described as a situation, scene, or incident. Similarly, though the poems vividly describe external things, from “golden daffodils” to “traffic,” greater emphasis ultimately falls on how the “I” experiences and feels about them—the internal, subjective experience or state of mind and mood that those outward things inspire or reflect. Both poems thus encourage us to focus almost exclusively on the complex emotional experience and thoughts of a particular speaker in a specific situation, but ones that we can, if the poem is effective, ultimately understand as having a much wider, sometimes even universal, resonance and relevance.

Most lyrics require us to infer a general theme from a specific experience, but some offer more explicit reflection, commentary, even argument. As you read the following example, notice what happens in line 5 (exactly halfway through the poem), as the speaker turns from personal statements to more impersonal, argumentative ones. How does personal reflection relate to, even enable, argument here?

PHILLIS WHEATLEY

On Being Brought from Africa to America

’Twas mercy brought me from my Pagan land,
Taught my benighted soul to understand
That there’s a God, that there’s a Saviour too:
Once I redemption neither sought nor knew.
5 Some view our sable race with scornful eye,
“Their colour is a diabolic die.”
Remember, Christians, Negroes, black as Cain,⁸
May be refin’d, and join th’ angelic train.

1773

- What do the poem's first four lines imply about how the speaker feels about “being brought from Africa to America” and about what motivates these feelings?
- What two “view[s]” of Africans are contrasted in the last four lines (line 5)? According to the entire poem, which is the right view, and why and how so?

8. One of Adam's sons, who killed his brother Abel. (See Gen. 4.)

Descriptive or Observational Lyrics

As Wheatley's poem demonstrates, lyrics come in many varieties. Quite a few are more exclusively descriptive or observational than the examples above, insofar as they describe something or someone to us without bringing much attention to the speaker's personal state of mind or feelings. As we've noted, after all, some poems simply give us the opportunity to look more closely and carefully at something in the world around us. Nineteenth-century poet Percy Bysshe Shelley suggested, in fact, that all poetry's major purpose is just that—helping us see in a new way. Poetry, he said, “strips the veil of familiarity from the world, and lays bare [its] naked and sleeping beauty” and “wonder.” Over a century later, American poet James Dickey expressed a similar idea somewhat differently when he defined a poet as “someone who notices and is enormously taken by things that somebody else would walk by.”

Obviously, any descriptive poem inevitably reflects its speaker's point of view. Yet lyrics of this type invite us to focus more on what they describe than on the subjective, internal experience or feelings of the speaker doing the describing. As a result, our focus in reading and writing will probably be how the poem characterizes, and encourages us to see, think, and feel about, whatever it describes—whether a moment, a person, an object, or a phenomenon. What is described in each of the poems that follow? What figures of speech are used, and with what implications and effects?

EMILY DICKINSON

[The Sky is low—the Clouds are mean]

The Sky is low—the Clouds are mean.

A Travelling Flake of Snow
Across a Barn or through a Rut
Debates if it will go—

- 5 A Narrow Wind complains all Day
How some one treated him
Nature, like Us, is sometimes caught
Without her Diadem—

1866

- Whom does the speaker seem to mean by “Us,” and what might this poem imply about the similarity between “Nature” and “Us” (line 7)?

BILLY COLLINS

Divorce

Once, two spoons in bed, now tined forks

across a granite table and the knives they have hired.

2008

- This poem consists almost entirely of metaphor (implied comparison). What is compared to what here? How would you describe the poem's tone? (Is it funny, sad, bitter, or some combination of these?) Why and how so?

The Dramatic Monologue

Finally, we come to the dramatic monologue, a subgenre of poem that—by residing somewhere in between lyric and dramatic poetry—can teach us more about both. Robert Browning, the nineteenth-century British poet often credited with inventing this kind of poem, tellingly labeled his own works “dramatic lyrics,” describing them as “dramatic in principle,” “lyric in expression.” On the one hand, the dramatic monologue is “lyric in expression” or like a lyric poem because it features a single speaker who discusses him- or herself. On the other hand, it is “dramatic in principle” or resembles a scene from a play for at least two reasons. First, the poem’s primary focus is characterization, an obviously fictional or historical speaker’s often unintentional revelation of his or her personality, outlook, and values. Such poems tend to offer us a window into an entire, complex psychology and even life history rather than simply one experience or feeling of a speaker we otherwise discover little about (as in lyrics). Often, too, dramatic monologues invite us to see their speakers and situations somewhat differently than the speakers themselves do, much as does fiction narrated by unreliable narrators. Second, the speaker of a dramatic monologue often addresses one or more silent auditors whose identity we can only infer from the speaker’s words to them. The questions we pose in reading and writing about such poems thus often center on character and characterization and on the gap between our perception of the speaker and his or her situation, on the one hand, and the speaker’s own self-representation, on the other.

Invented in the nineteenth century, this subgenre remains as popular with contemporary songwriters as with contemporary poets. Bruce Springsteen’s albums Nebraska (1982) and The Rising (2002), for instance, consist mainly of dramatic monologues. Below, you will find the lyrics to one of these, followed by a poem that takes the form of an imaginary letter, thus putting an interesting twist on the conventions regarding “speakers” and “auditors.”

BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN

Nebraska

I saw her standin’ on her front lawn just twirlin’ her baton
 Me and her went for a ride, sir, and ten innocent people died

- 5 From the town of Lincoln, Nebraska, with a sawed-off .410 on my lap
 Through the badlands of Wyoming I killed everything in my path

- I can’t say that I’m sorry for the things
 10 that we done

At least for a little while, sir, me and her we had us some fun

The jury brought in a guilty verdict and the judge he sentenced me to death

15 Midnight in a prison storeroom with leather straps across my chest

Sheriff, when the man pulls that switch, sir, and snaps my poor head back
 You make sure my pretty baby is sittin’

20 right there on my lap

They declared me unfit to live, said into that great void my soul’d be hurled
 They wanted to know why I did what I did
 Well, sir, I guess there’s just a meanness in this world⁹

1982

- What different motives and explanations for the speaker’s actions might NEBRASKA provide by means of what he says, how he speaks, and how his speech is rendered on the page? Might the song as a whole offer explanations that the speaker doesn’t offer, at least consciously or directly?

ROBERT HAYDEN

A Letter from Phillis Wheatley

(London, 1773)

Dear Obour¹

Our crossing was without event. I could not help, at times, reflecting on that first—my Destined—

5 voyage long ago (I yet have some remembrance of its Horrors)² and marvelling at God’s Ways.

Last evening, her Ladyship³ presented me to her illustrious Friends.

10 I scarce could tell them anything of Africa, though much of Boston and my hope of Heaven. I read my latest Elegies to them.
 “O Sable Muse!” the Countess cried,

9. Allusion to words spoken by a murderer in Flannery O’Connor’s “A Good Man Is Hard to Find” (par. 134).

1. Obour Tanner, a Rhode Island slave and Wheatley’s intimate friend and frequent correspondent.

2. Born in Africa c. 1753–54, Wheatley was taken at around age eight on the slave ship Phillis to America, where she was purchased by Boston merchant John Wheatley. In 1773, John Wheatley sent her to London with his son, Nathaniel, a visit at least partly motivated by concerns about her health.

3. Selina Hastings, Countess of Huntingdon (1707–91), helped arrange publication of Wheatley’s first book of poems, which appeared in London just months after the poet’s return to the United States.

15 embracing me, when I had done.
 I held back tears, as is my wont,
 and there were tears in Dear
 Nathaniel's eyes.
 At supper—I dined apart
 20 like captive Royalty—the Countess and her Guests promised signatures affirming me
 True Poetess, albeit once a slave.⁴
 Indeed, they were most kind, and spoke,
 25 moreover, of presenting me at Court (I thought of Pocahontas)⁵—an Honor, to be sure, but one,
 I should, no doubt, as Patriot decline.
 My health is much improved;
 30 I feel I may, if God so Wills, entirely recover here.
 Idyllic England! Alas, there is no Eden without its Serpent. Beneath chiming Complaisance I hear him hiss;
 35 I see his flickering tongue when foppish would-be Wits murmur of the Yankee Pedlar and his Cannibal Mockingbird.
 Sister, forgive th'intrusion of 40 my Sombreness—Nocturnal Mood
 I would not share with any save your trusted Self. Let me disperse, in closing, such unseemly Gloom
 by mention of an Incident
 45 you may, as I, consider Droll:
 Today, a little Chimney Sweep,
 his face and hands with soot quite Black,
 staring hard at me, politely asked:
 “Does you, M'lady, sweep chimneys too?”
 50 I was amused, but Dear Nathaniel (ever Solicitous) was not.
 I pray the Blessings of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ will Abundantly be yours.

55

Phillis
 1977

4. Wheatley's Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (1773) was prefaced by a letter, signed by seventeen eminent Bostonians, attesting to the poems' authenticity.

5. Daughter of an Algonquian Indian chief (c. 1595–1617), Pocahontas famously befriended Virginia's first English colonists, led by Captain John Smith; she died while visiting England, where she had been presented at the court of King James I.

- What internal and external conflicts seem to be revealed here? What conflict does Wheatley herself seem aware of? Why might Hayden have chosen both this particular moment in Wheatley's life and this particular addressee (Obour Tanner)?
- How does Hayden's portrayal of both Wheatley's feelings and others' views of her compare to Wheatley's own characterization of these in ON BEING BROUGHT FROM AFRICA TO AMERICA?

RESPONDING TO POETRY

Not all poems are as readily accessible as those in this chapter, and even those that are take on additional meanings if we approach them systematically, bringing to bear specific reading habits and skills and some knowledge of poetic genres and traditions. Experience will give you a sense of what to expect, but knowing what to expect isn't everything. As a reader of poetry, you should always be open—to new experiences, new feelings, new ideas, new forms of expression. Every poem is a potential new experience, and you will often discover something new with every re-reading.

Steps to Follow, Questions to Ask, and Sample Reading Notes

No one can give you a method that will offer you total experience of all poems. But because individual poems share characteristics with other poems, taking certain steps can prompt you both to ask the right questions and to devise compelling answers. If you are relatively new to poetry, encounter a poem that seems especially difficult, or plan to write about a poem, you may need to tackle these steps one at a time, pausing to write even as you read and respond. With further experience, you will often find that you can skip steps or run through them quickly and almost automatically, though your experience and understanding of any poem will be enriched if you slow down and take your time.

Try the first step on your own, then we will both detail and demonstrate the others.

1. Listen to a poem first. When you encounter a new poem, try reading it through once without thinking too much about what it means. Try to simply listen to the poem, even if you read silently, and much as you might a song on the radio. Or better yet, read it aloud. Doing so will help you hear the poem's sound qualities, get a clearer impression of its tone, and start making sense of its syntax, the way words combine into sentences.

How strongly does my passion flow,
 Divided equally twixt⁶ two?
 Damon had ne'er subdued my heart

6. Between.

Had not Alexis took his part;
 5 Nor could Alexis powerful prove,
 Without my Damon's aid, to gain my love.

When my Alexis present is,
 Then I for Damon sigh and mourn;
 But when Alexis I do miss,
 10 Damon gains nothing but my scorn.
 But if it chance they both are by,
 For both alike I languish, sigh, and die.

III

Cure then, thou mighty wingèd god,⁷
 This restless fever in my blood:
 15 One golden-pointed dart take back:
 But which, O Cupid, wilt thou take?
 If Damon's, all my hopes are crossed;
 Or that of my Alexis, I am lost.

Now that you've read Behn's poem, read through the remaining steps and see how one reader used them as a guide for responding. Later, return to these steps as you read and respond to other poems.

2. Articulate your expectations, starting with the title. Poets often try to surprise readers, but you can appreciate such surprises only if you first define your expectations. As you read a poem, take note of what you expect and where, when, and how the poem fulfills, or perhaps frustrates, your expectations.

The title of Aphra Behn's "On Her Loving Two Equally" makes me think the poem will be about a woman. But can someone really "love two equally"? Maybe this is the question the poem will ask. If so, I expect its answer to be "no" because I don't think this is possible. If so, maybe the title is a sort of pun—"On Her Loving Too Equally."

3. Read the syntax literally. What the sentences literally say is only a starting point, but it is vital. You cannot begin to explore what a poem means unless you first know what it says. Though poets arrange words into lines and stanzas, they usually write in complete sentences, just as writers in other genres do. At the same time and partly in order to create the sort of aural and visual patterns discussed earlier in this chapter, poets make much more frequent use of inversion (a change in normal word order or syntax). To ensure you don't misread, first "translate" the poem rather than fixing on certain words and free-associating or leaping to conclusions. To translate accurately, especially with poems written before the twentieth century, you may need to break this step down into the following smaller steps:

7. Cupid, who, according to myth, shot darts of lead and of gold at the hearts of lovers, corresponding to false love and true love, respectively.

- a. Identify sentences. For now, ignore the line breaks and look for sentences or independent clauses (word groups that can function as complete sentences). These will typically be preceded and followed by a period (.), a semicolon (;), a colon (:), or a dash (—).

The eighteen lines of Behn's poem can be broken down into nine sentences.

1. How strongly does my passion flow, Divided equally twixt two?
2. Damon had ne'er subdued my heart, Had not Alexis took his part;
3. Nor could Alexis powerful prove, Without my Damon's aid, to gain my love.
4. When my Alexis present is, Then I for Damon sigh and mourn;
5. But when Alexis I do miss, Damon gains nothing but my scorn.
6. But if it chance they both are by, For both alike I languish, sigh, and die.
7. Cure then, thou mighty wingèd god, This restless fever in my blood;
8. One golden-pointed dart take back: But which, O Cupid, wilt thou take?
9. If Damon's, all my hopes are crossed; Or that of my Alexis, I am lost.

- b. Reorder sentences. Identify the main elements—subject(s), verb(s), object(s)—of each sentence or independent clause, and if necessary rearrange them in normative word order. (In English, this order tends to be subject-verb-object except in the case of a question; in either case, dependent clauses come at the beginning or end of the main clause and next to whatever element they modify.)
- c. Replace each pronoun with the antecedent noun it replaces; if the antecedent is ambiguous, indicate all the possibilities.

In the following sentences, the reordered words appear in italics, nouns substituted for pronouns appear in parentheses:

1. How strong does my passion flow, Divided equally twixt two?
2. Damon had ne'er subdued my heart Had not Alexis took (Alexis's or Damon's) part;
3. Nor could Alexis prove powerful to gain my love Without my Damon's aid.
4. When my Alexis is present, Then I sigh and mourn for Damon;
5. But when I do miss Alexis, Damon gains nothing but my scorn.
6. But if it chance both (Damon and Alexis) are by, I languish, sigh, and die For both (Damon and Alexis) alike.
7. thou mighty wingèd god, Cure then This restless fever in my blood;
8. take back One golden-pointed dart: But which wilt thou take, O Cupid?
9. If Damon's, all my hopes are crossed; Or that (dart) of my Alexis, I am lost.

- d. Translate sentences into modern prose. Use a dictionary to define unfamiliar or ambiguous words or words that seem to be used in an unfamiliar or unexpected way. Add any implied words necessary to link the parts of a sentence to each other and one sentence logically to the next. At this stage, don't move to outright paraphrase; instead, stick closely to the original.

Below, added words appear in brackets, substituted definitions in parentheses:

1. How strongly does my passion flow [when it is] divided equally between two [people]?
2. Damon would never have (conquered or tamed) my heart if Alexis had not taken (Damon or Alexis's) (portion) [of my heart].
3. Nor could Alexis [have] prove[n] powerful [enough] to gain my love without my Damon's aid.
4. When my Alexis is present, then I sigh and mourn for Damon;
5. But when I miss Alexis, Damon doesn't gain anything (except) my scorn.
6. But if it (so happens) that both (Damon and Alexis) are [near]by [me], I languish, sigh, and die for both (Damon and Alexis) alike.
7. [Cupid], (you) mighty god (with wings), cure then this restless fever in my blood;
8. Take back one [of your two] darts [with] pointed gold [tips]: But which [of these darts] will you take, O Cupid?
9. If [on the one hand, you take away] Damon's [dart], all my hopes are (opposed, invalidated, spoiled); Or [if, on the other hand, you take away] Alexis's [arrow], I am (desperate, ruined, destroyed; no longer claimed or possessed by anyone; helpless or unable to find my way).

- e. Note any ambiguities in the original language that you might have ignored in your translation. For example, look for modifiers that might modify more than one thing; verbs that might have multiple subjects or objects; words that have multiple relevant meanings.

In the second sentence, "his" could refer either to Damon or Alexis since both names appear in the first part of this sentence; in other words, this could say either "Alexis took Damon's part" or "Alexis took his own part." But what about the word part? I translated this as portion, and I assumed it referred back to "heart," partly because the two words come at the ends of lines 3 ("heart") and 4 ("part") and also rhyme. But two other definitions of part might make sense here: "the role of a character in a play" or "one's . . . allotted task (as in an action)," and "one of the opposing sides in a conflict or dispute," which in this case could be the "conflict" over the speaker's love. On the one hand, then, I could translate this either "Alexis took his own portion of my heart"; "Alexis played his own role in my life or in this three-way courtship drama"; or "Alexis defended his own side in the battle for my love." On the other hand, I could translate it as "Alexis took Damon's part of my heart"; "Alexis played Damon's role"; or even "Alexis defended Damon's side in the battle for my love."

4. Consult reference works. In addition to using a dictionary to define unfamiliar or ambiguous words, look up anything else to which the poem refers that you either don't understand or that you suspect might be ambiguous: a place, a person, a myth, a quotation, an idea, etc.

According to Britannica.com, Cupid was the “ancient Roman god of love” and “often appeared as a winged infant carrying a bow and a quiver of arrows whose wounds inspired love or passion in his every victim.” It makes sense, then, that the speaker of this poem would think that she might stop loving one of these men if Cupid took back the arrow that made her love him. But the poem wasn’t written in ancient Rome (it’s dated 1684), so is the speaker just kidding or being deliberately “poetic” when she calls on Cupid? And what about the names “Damon” and “Alexis”? Were those common in the seventeenth century? Maybe so, if a poet could be named “Aphra Behn.”

5. Figure out who, where, when, and what happens. Once you have gotten a sense of the literal meaning of each sentence, ask the following very general factual questions about the whole poem. Remember that not all of the questions will suit every poem. (Which questions apply will depend in part on whether the poem is narrative, dramatic, or lyric.) At this point, stick to the facts. What do you know for sure?

Who?

- Who is, or who are, the poem’s speaker(s)?
- Who is, or who are, the auditor(s), if any?
- Who are the other characters, if any, that appear in the poem?

The title suggests that the speaker is a woman who loves two people. In the poem, she identifies these as two men—Damon and Alexis. The speaker doesn’t seem to address anyone in particular (certainly not the two men she talks about) except in the third stanza, when she addresses Cupid—first through the epithet “mighty winged god” (line 13) and then by name (line 16). (Because Cupid isn’t present, this is an apostrophe.)

Where? When?

- Where is the speaker?
- Where and when do any actions described in the poem take place? That is, what is the poem’s setting?

No place or time is specified in Behn’s poem. The poem is dated 1684, and the antiquated diction (“twixt,” line 2; “wilt,” line 16) seems appropriate to that time. But nothing in the poem makes the situation or feelings it describes specific to a time or place. The speaker doesn’t say things like “Last Thursday, when Damon and I were hanging out in the garden . . .,” for example. She seems to describe situations that keep happening repeatedly rather than specific incidents.

What?

- What is the situation described in the poem?
- What, if anything, literally happens over the course of it, or what action, if any, does it describe?
- Or, if the poem doesn’t have a plot, then how would you describe its internal structure? Even when a poem seems less interested in telling a story than in simply capturing a feeling or describing something or someone, you can still usually read in it some kind of progression or development or even an argument. When and how does the subject matter or focus or address shift over the course of the poem?

The basic situation is that the speaker loves two men equally. In the second stanza she describes recurring situations—being with one of the men and not the other or being with both of them at once—and the feelings that result. Then, in the third stanza, she imagines what would happen if she stopped loving one of them. The topic or subject essentially remains the same throughout, but there are two subtle shifts. First is the shift from addressing anyone in stanzas one and two to addressing Cupid in stanza three. Second, there are shifts in verb tense and time: The first stanza floats among various tenses (“does,” line 1; “took,” line 4), the second sticks to the present tense (“is,” “sigh,” “mourn,” etc.), and the third shifts to future (“wilt,” line 16). As a result, I would say that the poem has two parts: in one, the speaker characterizes her situation in the present and recent past; in the other she explores a possible alternative future (that she ends up not liking any better).

6. Formulate tentative answers to the questions, Why does it matter? What does it all mean?

- Why should the poem matter to anyone other than the poet, or what might the poem show and say to readers?
- What problems, issues, questions, or conflicts does the poem explore that might be relevant to people other than the speaker(s) or the poet—to humanity in general, to the poet’s contemporaries, to people of a certain type or in a certain situation, and so forth?
- How is each problem or conflict developed and resolved over the course of the poem, or how is each question answered? What conclusions does the poem seem to reach about these, or what are its themes?

The title and first two lines pose a question: How strong is our love if we love two people instead of one? We tend to assume that anything that is “divided” is less strong than something unified. The use of the word flow in the first line reinforces that assumption because it implicitly compares love to something that flows: A river, for example, “flows,” and when a river divides into two streams, each is smaller and its flow less strong than the river’s. So the way the speaker articulates the question implies an answer: Love, like a river, isn’t strong and sure when divided.

But the rest of the poem undermines that answer. In the first stanza, the speaker points out that each lover and his love has “aided” and added to the “power” of the other: Neither man would have “gain[ed her] love” if the other hadn’t. The second stanza gives a more concrete sense of why: Since we tend to yearn for what we don’t have at the moment, being with one of these men makes her miss the other one. But if both men are present, she feels the same about both and perhaps even feels more complete and satisfied.

As if realizing she can’t solve the problem herself, she turns in the third stanza to Cupid and asks him to help by taking away her love for either Damon or Alexis. As soon as she asks for this, though, she indicates that the result would be unhappiness. In the end, the poem seems to say (or its theme is) that love doesn’t flow or work like a river because love can actually be stronger when we love more than one person, as if it's multiplied instead of lessened by division.

Clearly, this is the opposite of what I expected, which was that the poem would ask whether it was possible to love two people and conclude it wasn't. The conflict is also different than I expected—though there's an external conflict between the two men (maybe), the focus is on the speaker's internal conflict, but that conflict isn't over which guy to choose but about how this is actually working (I love both of them equally; each love reinforces the other) versus how she thinks things should work (I'm not supposed to love two equally).

7. Consider how the poem's form contributes to its effect and meaning.

- How is the poem organized on the page, into lines and/or stanzas, for example? (What are the lines and stanzas like in terms of length, shape, and so on? Are they all alike, or do they vary? Are lines enjambéd or end-stopped?)
- What are the poem's other formal features? (Is there rhyme or another form of aural patterning such as alliteration? What is the poem's base meter, and are there interesting variations? If not, how else might you describe the poem's rhythm?)
- How do the poem's overall form and its various formal features contribute to its meaning and effect? In other words, what gets lost when you translate the poem into modern prose?

The stanza organization underscores shifts in the speaker's approach to her situation. But organization reinforces meaning in other ways as well. On the one hand, the division into three stanzas and the choice to number them, plus the fact that each stanza has three sentences, mirror the three-way struggle or "love triangle" described in the poem. On the other hand because the poem has 18 lines and 9 sentences, every sentence is "divided equally twixt two" lines. Sound and especially rhyme reinforce this pattern since the two lines that make up one sentence usually rhyme with each other (to form a couplet). The only lines that aren't couplets are those that begin the second stanza, where we instead have alternating rhyme—is (line 7) rhymes with miss (line 9), mourn (line 8) rhymes with scorn (line 10). But these lines describe how the speaker "miss[es]" one man when the other is "by," a sensation she arguably reproduces in readers by ensuring that we twice "miss" the rhyme that the rest of the poem leads us to expect.

- ## 8. Investigate and consider the ways the poem both uses and departs from poetic conventions, especially those related to form and sub-genre. Does the poem use a traditional verse form (such as blank verse) or a traditional stanza form (such as ballad stanza)? Is it a specific subgenre or kind of poem—a sonnet, an ode, a ballad, for example? If so, how does that affect its meaning? Over time, stanza and verse forms have been used in certain ways and to certain ends, and particular subgenres have observed certain conventions. As a result, they generate particular expectations for readers familiar with such traditions, and poems gain additional meaning by both fulfilling and defying those expectations. For example, anapestic meter (two unstressed syllables followed by a stressed one, as in Tennessee) is usually used for comic poems, so when poets use it in a serious poem they are probably making a point.

9. Argue. Discussion with others—both out loud and in writing—usually results in clarification and keeps you from being too dependent on personal biases and preoccupations that sometimes mislead even the best readers. Discussing a poem with someone else (especially someone who thinks very differently) or sharing what you’ve written about the poem can expand your perspective and enrich your experience.

WRITING ABOUT POETRY

If you follow the steps outlined above and keep notes on your personal responses to the poems you read, you will have already begun writing informally. You have also generated ideas and material you can use in more formal writing. To demonstrate how, we conclude this chapter with two examples of such writing. Both grow out of the notes earlier in this chapter. Yet each is quite different in form and content. The first example is a relatively informal response paper that investigates the allusions in Aphra Behn’s ON HER LOVING TWO EQUALLY, following up on the discoveries and questions generated by consulting reference works (as in step 4 above). The second example is an essay on the poem that defends and develops as a thesis one answer to the questions, Why does it matter? What does it all mean? (as in step 6 above) by drawing on discoveries made in earlier and later steps.

As these examples illustrate, there are many different ways to write about poems, just as there are many different things to say about any one. But all such writing begins with a clear sense of the poem itself and your responses to it. Effective writing also depends on a willingness to listen carefully to the poem and to ask genuine questions about how it works, what it says and means, and how it both fulfills and challenges your expectations about life, as well as poetry.

From bardic chronicles to imaginary letters, brief introspective lyrics to action-packed epics, “poetry” comes in many sizes, shapes, and varieties; serves myriad purposes for many diverse audiences; and offers pleasures and rewards both like and unlike those we get from fiction, drama, music, or any other art form. In part, though, that’s because poetry is something of a trickster and a trespasser, crossing in and out of those other generic domains and trying on their clothes, even as it inhabits and wears very special ones all its own. Poetry speaks to head, as well as heart; ears, as well as eyes. If you keep yours open, it just might speak to you in ways you never expected.

SAMPLE WRITING: RESPONSE PAPER

The following response paper investigates the allusions in Aphra Behn's ON HER LOVING TWO EQUALLY by drawing upon information from reference works. Not all response papers involve research, but we have included one that does in order to demonstrate both how you can use information from credible secondary sources to test and deepen your personal response to a poem and how you can develop reading notes into a thoughtful informal response paper.

Names in "On Her Loving Two Equally"

Aphra Behn's "On Her Loving Two Equally" is dated 1684, but refers to an ancient, pagan god. That seems weird and made me curious about what he was doing in the poem. According to the Encyclopedia Britannica Online, Cupid was the "ancient Roman god of love," "often appeared as a winged infant carrying a bow and a quiver of arrows whose wounds inspired love or passion in his every victim," and "was sometimes portrayed wearing armour like that of Mars, the God of war, perhaps to suggest ironic parallels between warfare and romance" ("Cupid"). It makes sense, then, that the speaker of this poem would think that she might stop loving one of these guys if Cupid took back the arrow that made her love him. And the reference to Cupid also reinforces the association in the poem between "warfare" or at least conflict "and romance." (The speaker is internally conflicted, and there is also an external conflict between the two male lovers.)

I'm still not sure whether the speaker is kidding or being deliberately "poetic" by talking to an ancient Roman god. But either way, this reinforces the idea I had when I was reading, that the poem isn't very specific about time or place. The poem makes the speaker's situation seem like something that has happened or could happen anytime, anywhere.

But what about the names Damon and Alexis? Were these real names in seventeenth-century England, which is apparently where Behn was from? According to the Oxford Dictionary of First Names, "Damon" is "a classical Greek name" that was made famous in antiquity by the story of Damon and Pythias. In the early 4th century BC Pythias was condemned to death by Dionysius, ruler of Syracuse. His friend Damon offered to stand surety for him, and took his place in the condemned cell while Pythias put his affairs in order. When Pythias duly returned to be executed rather than absconding and leaving his friend to his fate, Dionysius was so impressed by the trust and friendship of the two young men that he pardoned both of them. ("Damon")

This doesn't tell me for sure whether there were really men named "Damon" in seventeenth-century England, but it's now clear that using the name "Damon" is another way of alluding to "antiquity" and maybe making this situation and poem seem "antique." But the story of Damon and Pythias seems even more relevant. When I was translating this poem, I noticed that it could imply that Damon and Alexis were actually helping each other, not just fighting over the speaker (especially because "his," in line 4, could refer to either man). Does the fact that the most famous Damon was willing to sit in prison and even be executed to help his best friend give me more evidence that I'm right? On the other hand, does it matter that the name comes from a word meaning "'to tame, subdue' (often a euphemism for 'kill')" ("Damon")?

I couldn't find anything nearly this interesting about "Alexis," except that it is a Latin form of a Greek name that originally came from a word that means "to defend" ("Alexis").

To sum up, I think two things are important: (1) by referring to Cupid and naming her boyfriends Damon and Alexis, Behn makes her poem and her speaker's situation seem "antique," even for the seventeenth century, and implies her situation could happen anytime anywhere; and (2) the fact that the men's names mean "to tame, subdue," even "kill," and "to defend" makes the conflict in the poem more intense, but the fact that the world's most famous Damon sacrificed himself for his friend might add fuel to the idea that these rivals are also friends who are helping each other. Maybe there's even more "loving two equally" going on here than I thought at first? If the speaker loves each of these guys more because she loves the other one, is that true of them, too? This poem is crazy!

SAMPLE WRITING: ESSAY

The following sample essay develops the observations about Aphra Behn's ON HER LOVING TWO EQUALLY in this chapter, demonstrating how you can turn notes about a poem into a coherent, well-structured essay. As this essay also shows, however, you will often discover new ways of looking at a poem (or any literary text) in the very process of writing about it. (For guidelines on correctly quoting and citing poetry, see "Writing about Literature," chapter 31.)

The writer begins by considering why she is drawn to the poem, even though it does not express her ideal of love. She then uses her personal response to the poem as a starting point for analyzing it in greater depth.

Multiplying by Dividing in Aphra Behn's "On Her Loving Two Equally"

My favorite poem in "Reading, Responding, Writing" is Aphra Behn's "On Her Loving Two Equally"—not because it expresses my ideal of love, but because it challenges conventional ideals. The main ideal or assumption explored in the poem is that true love is exclusive and monogamous, as the very titles of poems like "How Do I [singular] Love Thee [singular]?" or "To My Dear and Loving [and One and Only] Husband" insist (emphasis added). The mere title of Behn's poem upsets that idea by insisting that at least one woman is capable of "Loving Two Equally." In fact, one thing that is immediately interesting about Behn's poem is that, though it poses and explores a question, its question is not "Can a woman love two equally?" The title and the poem take it for granted that she can. Instead, the poem asks whether equally loving two people lessens the power or quality of love—or, as the speaker puts it in the first two lines, "How strongly does my passion flow, / Divided equally twixt two?" Every aspect of this poem suggests that when it comes to love, as opposed to math, division leads to multiplication.

This answer grabs attention because it is so counterintuitive and unconventional. Forget love for just a minute: It's common sense that anything that is divided is smaller and weaker than something unified. In math, for example, division is the opposite of multiplication; if we divide one number by another, we get a number smaller than the first number, if not the second. Although Behn's use of the word flow to frame her question compares love to a river instead of a number, the implication is the same: When a river divides into two streams, each of them is smaller than the river, and its flow less strong; as a result, each stream is more easily dammed up or diverted than the undivided river. So the way the speaker initially poses her question seems to support the conventional view: Love is stronger when it “flows” toward one person, weaker when divided between two.

However conventional and comforting that implied answer, however, it’s one the poem immediately rejects. In the remaining lines of the first stanza, the speaker insists that each of her two lovers and the love she feels for him has not lessened the strength of her feelings for the other, but the reverse. Each lover and each love has “aid[ed]” (line 6) the other, making him and it more “powerful” (5). Indeed, she says, neither man would have “subdued [her] heart” (3) or “gain[ed her] love” (6) at all if the other hadn’t done so as well.

In the second stanza, the speaker gives us a somewhat more concrete sense of why this might be the case. On the one hand, being with either one of these men (“When Alexis present is,” 7) actually makes her both “scorn” him (10) and “miss” (9) the man who’s not there (“I for Damon sigh and mourn,” 8). This isn’t really a paradox; we often yearn more for the person or thing we don’t have (the grass is always greener on the other side of the fence), and we often lose our appreciation for nearby, familiar things and people. What is far away and inaccessible is often dearer to us because its absence either makes us aware of what it means to us or allows us to forget its flaws and idealize it.

Perhaps because all of this makes the speaker feel that she can’t possibly solve the problem by herself, the speaker turns in the third stanza to Cupid—the deity who is supposed to control these things by shooting a “golden-pointed dart” (15) into the heart of each lover. She asks him to solve her dilemma for her by “tak[ing] back” her love for either Damon or Alexis (15). As with her question in the first stanza, however, this plea is taken back as soon as it’s formulated, for if she loses Damon, “all [her] hopes are crossed”; if she loses Alexis, she is “lost” (17-18).

Here and throughout the poem, the speaker’s main preoccupation seems to be what she feels and what this situation is like for her—“my passion” (1), “my heart” (3), “my Damon’s aid, . . . my love” (6), “my Alexis” (7), “I . . . sigh and mourn” (8), “I do miss” (9), “my scorn” (10), “I languish, sigh, and die” (12), “This restless fever in my blood” (14), “my hopes” (17), “my Alexis” and “I am lost” (18). Yet the poem implies that the payoff here is not hers alone and that her feelings are not purely selfish. Both times the word gain appears in the poem, for example, her lovers’ gains and feelings are the focus—the fact that Alexis is able “to gain [her] love” thanks to “Damon’s aid” (6) and that “Damon gains nothing but my scorn” when she is missing Alexis (10). Moreover, ambiguous wording in the first stanza suggests that the men here may be actively, intentionally helping to create this situation and even acting in contradictory, selfish and unselfish, ways. When the speaker says that “Damon had ne’er subdued my heart / Had not Alexis took his part” (3-4), his could refer to Alexis or Damon and part could mean “a portion” (of her “heart,” presumably), “a role” (in her life or in this courtship drama), or a “side in a dispute or conflict” (over her love). Thus, she could be saying that Alexis (unselfishly) defended Damon’s suit; (selfishly) fought against Damon or took a share or role that properly belonged to Damon; and/or (neutrally) took his (Alexis’s) own share or role or defended his (Alexis’s) own cause. Perhaps all of this has been the case at various times; people do behave in contradictory ways when they are in love, especially when they perceive that they have a rival. It’s also true that men and women alike often more highly prize something or someone that someone else prizes, too. So perhaps each lover’s “passion” for her also “flow[s]” more strongly than it would otherwise precisely because he has a rival.

In the end, the poem thus seems to say that love doesn’t flow or work like a river because love isn’t a tangible or quantifiable thing. As a result, love is also different from the sort of battle implied by the martial language of the first stanza in which someone wins only if someone else loses. The poem attributes this to the perversity of the human heart—especially our tendency to yearn for what we can’t have and what we think other people want, too.

Through its form, the poem demonstrates that division can increase instead of lessen meaning, as well as love. On the one hand, just as the poem’s content stresses the power of the love among three people, so the poem’s form also stresses “threeness” as well as “twoness.” It is after all divided into three distinctly numbered stanzas, and each stanza consists of three sentences. On the other hand, every sentence is “divided equally twixt two” lines, just as the speaker’s “passion” is divided equally between two men. Formally, then, the poem mirrors the kinds of division it describes. Sound and especially rhyme reinforce this pattern since the two lines that make up one sentence usually rhyme with each other to form a couplet. The only lines that don’t conform to this pattern come at the beginning of the second stanza where we instead have alternating rhyme—is (7) rhymes with miss (9), mourn (8) rhymes with scorn (10). But here, again, form reinforces content since these lines describe how the speaker “miss[es]” one man when the other is “by,” a sensation that she arguably reproduces in us as we read by ensuring we twice “miss” the rhyme that the rest of the poem leads us to expect.

Because of the way it challenges our expectations and our conventional ideas about romantic love, the poem might well make us uncomfortable, perhaps all the more so because the speaker and poet here are female. For though we tend to think all true lovers should be loyal and monogamous, this has been expected even more of women than of men. What the poem says about love might make more sense and seem less strange and even objectionable, however, if we think of other, nonromantic kinds of love: After all, do we really think that our mother and father love us less if their love is “divided equally twixt” ourselves and our siblings, or do we love each of our parents less because there are two of them? If we think of these familial kinds of love, it becomes much easier to accept Behn's suggestion that love multiplies when we spread it around.

The Art of (Reading) Poetry

AN ALBUM

It is difficult to get the news from poems yet men die miserably every day for lack of what is found there.

—WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS, The Greeny Flower

Poets obviously have a keen, even vested, interest in offering their own answers to the questions of what poetry is and why and how it needs to be written and read. Not surprisingly, many poets have found poetry itself the best medium through which to tackle those questions. Such poems, as well as prose works devoted to the same topic, constitute a genre of sorts—the “Ars Poetica,” a Latin phrase meaning “The Art of Poetry” that many writers also use in the titles of individual works of this kind. In so doing, these writers deliberately insert themselves into a conversation that began many centuries ago, by alluding directly to a treatise on poetry with just that name by the Roman poet Horace (65–8 BCE).

You won’t find any quotations from Horace in this album. But it does gather a range of more recent “Ars Poetica” poems and invite you to compare their visions of the art of poetry, both to each other and with your own ideas and experience. As you read the poems, be sure to consider the relationship between the vision of poetry that the poems explicitly articulate (by virtue of what they say) and implicitly enact (by virtue of how they say it)—that is, to the relationship between content and form, theory and practice. Does each poem manage to be or to do the things it suggests poetry must? Does the poem invite the sort of readerly response it envisions as ideal? How so or not? Which poems found elsewhere in this book do you think each of the poets in this album might like or admire the most? the least? Why and how so?

- This poem never addresses the topic of poetry directly. Nor does it use the word poetry. Why might it be helpful (or not) to read “I dwell in Possibility” as an “ars poetica” poem?

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

Ars Poetica²

A poem should be palpable and mute
 As a globed fruit,

 Dumb
 As old medallions to the thumb,
 5 Silent as the sleeve-worn stone
 Of casement ledges where the moss has grown—

 A poem should be wordless
 As the flight of birds.

 A poem should be motionless in time
 10 As the moon climbs.

 Leaving, as the moon releases
 Twig by twig the night-entangled trees,

 Leaving, as the moon behind the winter leaves,
 Memory by memory the mind—
 15 A poem should be motionless in time
 As the moon climbs.

 A poem should be equal to:
 Not true.

 For all the history of grief
 20 An empty doorway and a maple leaf.

 For love
 The leaning grasses and two lights above the sea—

 A poem should not mean
 But be.

- How can a poem “be wordless” (line 7)? “not mean / But be” (lines 23–24)? How does or doesn’t this poem manage that?

CZESLAW MILOSZ

Ars Poetica?

I have always aspired to a more spacious form that would be free from the claims of poetry or prose and would let us understand each other without exposing the author or reader to sublime agonies.

- 5 In the very essence of poetry there is something indecent:
a thing is brought forth which we didn't know we had in us, so we blink our eyes, as if a tiger had sprung out and stood in the light, lashing his tail.

- That's why poetry is rightly said to be dictated by a daimonion,³ 10 though it's an exaggeration to maintain that he must be an angel.
It's hard to guess where that pride of poets comes from,
when so often they're put to shame by the disclosure of their frailty.

- What reasonable man would like to be a city of demons, who behave as if they were at home, speak in many tongues, 15 and who, not satisfied with stealing his lips or hand, work at changing his destiny for their convenience?

- It's true that what is morbid is highly valued today, and so you may think that I am only joking or that I've devised just one more means 20 of praising Art with the help of irony.

There was a time when only wise books were read,
helping us to bear our pain and misery.
This, after all, is not quite the same as leafing through a thousand works fresh from psychiatric clinics.

- 25 And yet the world is different from what it seems to be and we are other than how we see ourselves in our ravings.
People therefore preserve silent integrity,
thus earning the respect of their relatives and neighbors.

- The purpose of poetry is to remind us 30 how difficult it is to remain just one person, for our house is open, there are no keys in the doors, and invisible guests come in and out at will.

- What I'm saying here is not, I agree, poetry,
as poems should be written rarely and reluctantly, 35 under unbearable duress and only with the hope that good spirits, not evil ones, choose us for their instrument.

3. Internal mentor conceived to be like, or inspired by, a demon.

- How might this poem explain or justify the question mark in its title? What does the poem suggest about where poems come from, what they are or should be like, and why they might be useful, even necessary (and to whom)?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

CZESLAW MILOSZ (1911–2004)

From “Czeslaw Milosz, The Art of Poetry No. 70” (1994)*

My poetry has been called polyphonic, which is to say that I have always been full of voices speaking; in a way I consider myself an instrument, a medium. [. . .] Am I alone in this? I don't think so. [Russian novelist Fyodor] Dostoyevsky was one of the first writers, along with [German philosopher] Friedrich Nietzsche, to identify a crisis of modern civilization: that every one of us is visited by contradictory voices, contradictory physical urges. I have written about the difficulty of remaining the same person when such guests enter and go and take us for their instrument. But we must hope to be inspired by good spirits, not evil ones. [. . .]

I suppose, looking back, that everything was dictated to me, and I was just a tool. Of what I don't know. I would like to believe that I am a tool of God, but that's presumptuous. So I prefer to call whatever it is my “daimonion.”

“Poetry Makes Nothing Happen”?

 one lonesome night when the bathroom cabinet still held her husband’s meds, May Quinn reached out for a book by Yeats instead and fell asleep cradling “When You Are Old,” not the poet’s best, which was good, given what May had in mind.

6. Yeats, Ideas of Good and Evil (A. H. Bullen, 1903), p. 182. “The limitation of [William Blake’s] view was from the very intensity of his vision; he was a too literal realist of imagination, as others are of nature; and because he believed that the figures seen by the mind’s eye, when exalted by inspiration, were ‘eternal existences,’ symbols of divine essences, he hated every grace of style that might obscure their lineaments” [Moore’s note]. The phrase “imaginary [. . .] in them,” in the next stanza, has no known source.

 there's a list as long as an epic poem of folks who'll swear a poem has never done a thing for them . . . except . . . perhaps adjust which made them see themselves or see the world in a different light—degrees of change so small only a poem registers them at all.

 That's why they can be trusted, why poems might

- How does this poem answer the question in its title: what, if anything, does poetry “make happen” or keep from happening? What is the effect of the poem’s specificity about names and situations? of the way each stanza differently plays on the word happens?

BILLY COLLINS

Introduction to Poetry

I ask them to take a poem and hold it up to the light like a color slide or press an ear against its hive.

 and watch him probe his way out, or walk inside the poem's room and feel the walls for a light switch.

I want them to water-ski
 10 across the surface of a poem waving at the author's name on the shore.

But all they want to do is tie the poem to a chair with rope and torture a confession out of it.

15 They begin beating it with a hose to find out what it really means.

- Who is “them” (line 1), and what is the effect of the speaker’s choice to refer to “them” and “they” (12) in this way? What different approaches to reading poetry come into conflict here? Why and how?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Both Billy Collins's INTRODUCTION TO POETRY and Elizabeth Alexander's ARS POETICA #100: I BELIEVE can be interpreted as exploring, from a teacher's perspective, what happens among teachers, students, and poems in a classroom. Write a response paper in which you reflect on how either of those poems characterizes that situation and how that depiction compares to your own classroom experience.
2. Consider your responses to all the poems in this album. Which one most accurately expresses your view of what poetry is, what it does, and how we should read it? Why and how so? What does your choice say about you? Write an essay in which you reflect on how at least two of these poems express, reinforce, refine, or perhaps challenge your views of poetry.
3. Pick any poem in this album and write an essay that both explains what qualities it attributes to good poetry and then demonstrates whether, why, and how any other poem in the anthology has those qualities. Be sure to use concrete evidence from both poems to make your case.

SPEAKER: WHOSE VOICE DO WE HEAR?

Poems are personal. The thoughts and feelings they express belong to a specific person, and however general or universal their sentiments seem to be, poems come to us as the expression of an individual human voice. That voice is often a voice of the poet, but not always. Poets sometimes create characters just as writers of fiction or drama do. And the speaker of a poem may express ideas or feelings very different from the poet's own.

Usually there is much more to a poem than the characterization of the speaker, but often it is necessary first to identify the speaker and determine his or her character before we can appreciate what else goes on in the poem. And sometimes, in looking for the speaker of the poem we discover the gist of the entire poem.

NARRATIVE POEMS AND THEIR SPEAKERS

In the following narrative poem, the poet has created two speakers, each of whom has a distinctive voice. The first speaker here acts as a narrator, setting the scene and introducing the second speaker. As you read the poem, notice how your impressions of “the lady in skunk” (line 2) are shaped by both her words and the narrator's.

X. J. KENNEDY

In a Prominent Bar in Secaucus One Day

To the tune of “The Old Orange Flute” or the tune of “Sweet Betsy from Pike”

In a prominent bar in Secaucus¹ one day
Rose a lady in skunk with a topheavy sway,
Raised a knobby red finger—all turned from their beer—
While with eyes bright as snowcrust she sang high and clear:

- 5 “Now who of you'd think from an eyeload of me
That I once was a lady as proud as could be?
Oh I'd never sit down by a tumbledown drunk
If it wasn't, my dears, for the high cost of junk.

- “All the gents used to swear that the white of my calf
10 Beat the down of a swan by a length and a half.

1. Small town on the Hackensack River in New Jersey, a few miles west of Manhattan.

In the kerchief of linen I caught to my nose
 Ah, there never fell snot, but a little gold rose.

“I had seven gold teeth and a toothpick of gold.
 My Virginia cheroot was a leaf of it rolled 15 And I’d light it each time with a thousand in cash—
 Why the bums used to fight if I flicked them an ash.

“Once the toast of the Biltmore,² the belle of the Taft,
 I would drink bottle beer at the Drake, never draft,
 And dine at the Astor on Salisbury steak
 20 With a clean tablecloth for each bite I did take.

“In a car like the Roxy³ I’d roll to the track,
 A steel-guitar trio, a bar in the back,
 And the wheels made no noise, they turned over so fast,
 Still it took you ten minutes to see me go past.

25 “When the horses bowed down to me that I might choose,
 I bet on them all, for I hated to lose.
 Now I’m saddled each night for my butter and eggs
 And the broken threads race down the backs of my legs.

“Let you hold in mind, girls, that your beauty must pass
 30 Like a lovely white clover that rusts with its grass.
 Keep your bottoms off barstools and marry you young
 Or be left—an old barrel with many a bung.

“For when time takes you out for a spin in his car
 You’ll be hard-pressed to stop him from going too far 35 And be left by the roadside, for all your good deeds,
 Two toadstools for tits and a face full of weeds.”

All the house raised a cheer, but the man at the bar
 Made a phonecall and up pulled a red patrol car
 And she blew us a kiss as they copped her away

We learn about the singer in this poem primarily through her own words, although we may not believe everything she tells us about her past. From her introduction in the first stanza we get some general notion of her appearance and condition, but it is she who tells us that she is a junkie (line 8) and a prostitute (lines 27, 32) and that her face and figure have seen better days (lines 32, 36). That information could make her a sad case, and the poem might lament her state or encourage us to lament it, but instead she presents herself in a light, friendly, and theatrical way. The comedy is bittersweet, perhaps, but she is allowed to present herself, through her own words and attitudes, as a likable character—someone who has survived life's disappointments and retained her dignity. The self-portrait accumulates almost completely through how she talks about herself, and the poet develops our attitude toward her by allowing her to recount her story herself, in her own words—or rather in words he has chosen for her.

SPEAKERS IN THE DRAMATIC MONOLOGUE

Like all dramatic monologues, the following poem has no narrator at all. Rather, it consists entirely of the words of a single, fictional speaker in a specific time, place, and dramatic situation, very like a character in a play.

ROBERT BROWNING Soliloquy of the Spanish Cloister

- Gr-r-r—there go, my heart's abhorrence!
 Water your damned flower-pots, do!
 If hate killed men, Brother Lawrence,
 God's blood, would not mine kill you!
 5 What? your myrtle-bush wants trimming?
 Oh, that rose has prior claims—
 Needs its leaden vase filled brimming?
 Hell dry you up with its flames!
- At the meal we sit together:
 10 *Salve tibi!*⁴ I must hear
 Wise talk of the kind of weather,
 Sort of season, time of year:
Not a plenteous cork-crop: scarcely
*Dare we hope oak-galls,*⁵ I doubt:
 15 What's the Latin name for "parsley"?
 What's the Greek name for Swine's Snout?
- Whew! We'll have our platter burnished,
 Laid with care on our own shelf!
 With a fire-new spoon we're furnished,
 20 And a goblet for ourself,
 Rinsed like something sacrificial
 Ere 'tis fit to touch our chaps⁶—
 Marked with L. for our initial!
 (He-he! There his lily snaps!)
- 25 Saint, forsooth! While brown Dolores —Squats outside the Convent bank
 With Sanchicha, telling stories,
 Steeping tresses in the tank,
 Blue-black, lustrous, thick like horsehairs,

4. Hail to thee (Latin). Italics usually indicate the words of Brother Lawrence here mockingly reproduced by the speaker. 5. Abnormal growth on oak trees, used for tanning. 6. Jaws.

- 30 —Can't I see his dead eye glow,
Bright as 'twere a Barbary corsair's?⁷
(That is, if he'd let it show!)
- When he finishes refection,
Knife and fork he never lays
- 35 Cross-wise, to my recollection,
As do I, in Jesu's praise.
I the Trinity illustrate,
Drinking watered orange-pulp—
In three sips the Arian⁸ frustrate;
- 40 —While he drains his at one gulp.
Oh, those melons? If he's able
We're to have a feast! so nice!
One goes to the Abbot's table,
All of us get each a slice.
- 45 How go on your flowers? None double?
Not one fruit-sort can you spy?
Strange!—And I, too, at such trouble,
—Keep them close-nipped on the sly!
- There's a great text in Galatians,
50 Once you trip on it, entails
Twenty-nine distinct damnations,⁹
One sure, if another fails:
If I trip him just a-dying,
Sure of heaven as sure can be,
- 55 Spin him round and send him flying
Off to hell, a Manichee?¹
- Or, my scrofulous French novel
On gray paper with blunt type!
Simply glance at it, you grovel
- 60 Hand and foot in Belial's gripe.²
If I double down its pages
At the woeful sixteenth print,
When he gathers his greengages,
Ope a sieve and slip it in't?
- 65 Or, there's Satan!—one might venture
Pledge one's soul to him, yet leave
Such a flaw in the indenture
—As he'd miss till, past retrieve,
Blasted lay that rose-acacia
- 70 We're so proud of! *Hy, Zy, Hine . . .*³

Not many poems begin with a growl, and this harsh sound turns out to be fair warning that we are about to meet a real beast, even though he is in the clothing of a religious man. In line 1 he shows himself to hold a most uncharitable attitude toward his fellow monk, Brother Lawrence, and by line 4 he has uttered two profanities and admitted his intense feelings of hatred and vengefulness. His ranting and roaring is full of exclamation points (four in the first stanza!), and he reveals his own personality and character when he imagines curses and unflattering nicknames for Brother Lawrence or plots malicious jokes on him. By the end, we have accumulated no knowledge of Brother Lawrence that makes him seem a fit target for such rage (except that he is pious, dutiful, and pleasant—perhaps enough to make this sort of speaker despise him), but we should have discovered much about the speaker's character and habits.

The speaker characterizes himself; the details accumulate into a fairly full portrait, even though here we do not have either a narrator's description (as in Kennedy's IN A PROMINENT BAR) or another speaker to give us perspective. Except for the moments when the speaker mimics or parodies Brother Lawrence (usually in italic type), we have only the speaker's own words and thoughts. But that is enough; the poet has controlled them so carefully that we know what he thinks of the speaker. The whole poem has been about the speaker and his attitudes; the point has been to characterize the speaker and develop in us a dislike of him and what he stands for.

In reading a poem like this aloud, we would want our voice to suggest all the speaker's unlikable features. We would also need to suggest, through tone of voice, the author's contemptuous mocking of them, and we would want, like an actor, to create strong disapproval in the hearer. The poem's words (the ones the author has given to the speaker) clearly imply those attitudes, and we would want our voice to express them.

THE LYRIC AND ITS SPEAKER

With narrative poems and dramatic monologues, we are usually in no danger of mistaking the speaker for the poet. Lyrics may present more of a challenge. When there is a pointed discrepancy between the speaker of a lyric and what we know of the poet—when the speaker is a woman, for example, and the poet is a man—we know we have a fictional speaker to contend with and that the point (or at least one point) of the poem is to observe the characterization carefully.

Sometimes even in lyrics poets “borrow” a character from history and ask readers to factor in historical facts and contexts. In the following poem, for example, the Canadian poet Margaret Atwood draws heavily on facts and traditions about a nineteenth-century émigré from Scotland to Canada. The poem is a lyric spoken in the first person, but its speaker is a fictional character based on a real woman.

The poem comes from a volume called The Journals of Susanna Moodie: Poems by Margaret Atwood (1970). A frontier pioneer, Moodie (1803–84) herself wrote two books about Canada, Roughing It in the Bush and Life in the Clearings, and Atwood found their observations rather stark and disorganized. She wrote her Susanna Moodie poems to refocus the “character” and to reconstruct Moodie’s actual geographical exploration and self-discovery. To fully understand these thoughts and meditations, then, we need to know something of the history behind them. Yet even without such knowledge, we can appreciate the poem’s powerful evocation of the speaker’s situation and feelings.

4. Opening words of the Ave Maria, here reversed: “Full of grace, Hail, Virgin” (Latin).

MARGARET ATWOOD

Death of a Young Son by Drowning

He, who navigated with success the dangerous river of his own birth once more set forth

on a voyage of discovery
5 into the land I floated on but could not touch to claim.

His feet slid on the bank,
the currents took him;
he swirled with ice and trees in the swollen water

10 and plunged into distant regions, his head a bathysphere;⁵
through his eyes’ thin glass bubbles

he looked out, reckless adventurer on a landscape stranger than Uranus
15 we have all been to and some remember.

There was an accident; the air locked,
he was hung in the river like a heart.
They retrieved the swamped body,

cairn of my plans and future charts, 20 with poles and hooks from among the nudging logs.

It was spring, the sun kept shining, the new grass
leapt to solidity;
my hands glistened with details.

25 After the long trip I was tired of waves.
My foot hit rock. The dreamed sails collapsed, ragged.

I planted him in this country like a flag.

Even when poets present themselves as if they were speaking directly to us in their own voices, their poems present only a partial portrait, something considerably less than the full personality and character of the poet. Though there is not an obviously created character—someone with distinct characteristics that are different from those of the poet—strategies of characterization are used to present the person speaking in one way and not another. As a result, you should still differentiate between the speaker and the poet.

BILLY COLLINS AND SHARON OLDS ON “FINDING YOUR OWN VOICE”

From “A Brisk Walk: An Interview with Billy Collins” (2006)*

[. . .]here’s this pet phrase about writing that is bandied around [. . .] “finding your own voice as a poet,” which I suppose means that you come out from under the direct influence of other poets and have perhaps found a way to combine those influences so that it appears to be your own voice. But I think you could also put it a different way. You, quote, find your voice, unquote, when you are able to invent this one character who resembles you, obviously, and probably is more like you than anyone else on earth, but is not the equivalent to you.

It is like a fictional character in that it has a very distinctive voice, a voice that seems to be able to accommodate and express an attitude that you are comfortable staying with but an attitude that is flexible enough to cover a number of situations.

From “Olds’ Worlds” (2008)

[. . .]Once a poem is written, and [. . .] it’s rewritten, and maybe published, and I’m in front of people, reading it aloud—I’m not too embarrassed by that [. . .] It doesn’t feel personal. It feels like art—a made thing—the “I” in it not myself anymore, but, I’d hope, some pronoun that a reader or hearer could slip into. But how much can a poem reflect or embody a life anyhow? You can want to come close, but it’s so profoundly different—the actual body, the flesh, the mortal life.

Although the poet is probably writing about a personal, actual experience in the following poem, he is also making a character of himself—that is, characterizing himself in a certain way, emphasizing some parts of himself and not others. We can call this character a persona.

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

She Dwelt among the Untrodden Ways

- She dwelt among the untrodden ways
 Beside the springs of Dove,⁶
 A Maid whom there were none to praise
 And very few to love:
- 5 A violet by a mossy stone
 Half hidden from the eye!
 —Fair as a star, when only one
 Is shining in the sky.
- She lived unknown, and few could know
 10 When Lucy ceased to be;
 But she is in her grave, and, oh,
 The difference to me!

1800

Did Lucy actually live? Was she a friend of the poet? We don't know; the poem doesn't tell us, and even biographers of Wordsworth are unsure. What we do know is that Wordsworth was able to represent grief very powerfully. Whether the speaker is the historical Wordsworth or not, that speaker is a major focus of the poem, and it is his feelings that the poem isolates and expresses. We need to recognize some characteristics of the speaker and be sensitive to his feelings for the poem to work.

Analyzing Speakers: An Exercise

In the following poem, we do not get a full sense of the speaker until well into the poem. As you read, try to imagine the tone of voice you think this person would use. Exactly when do you begin to know what she sounds like?

DOROTHY PARKER

A Certain Lady

- Oh, I can smile for you, and tilt my head,
 And drink your rushing words with eager lips,
 And paint my mouth for you a fragrant red,
 And trace your brows with tutored finger-tips.
- 5 When you rehearse your list of loves to me,
 Oh, I can laugh and marvel, rapturous-eyed.
 And you laugh back, nor can you ever see
 The thousand little deaths my heart has died.
 And you believe, so well I know my part,

6. Small stream in the Lake District in northern England, near where Wordsworth lived.

10 That I am gay as morning, light as snow,
 And all the straining things within my heart
 You'll never know.
 Oh, I can laugh and listen, when we meet,
 And you bring tales of fresh adventurings—
 15 Of ladies delicately indiscreet,
 Of lingering hands, and gently whispered things.
 And you are pleased with me, and strive anew
 To sing me sagas of your late delights.
 Thus do you want me—marveling, gay, and true—
 20 Nor do you see my staring eyes of nights.
 And when, in search of novelty, you stray,
 Oh, I can kiss you blithely as you go . . .
 And what goes on, my love, while you're away,
 You'll never know.

To whom does the speaker seem to be talking? What sort of person is he? How do you feel about him? Which habits and attitudes of his do you like least? How soon can you tell that the speaker is not altogether happy about his conversation and conduct? In what tone of voice would you read the first twenty-two lines aloud? What attitude would you try to express toward the person spoken to? What tone would you use for the last two lines? How would you describe the speaker's personality? What aspects of her behavior are most crucial to the poem's effect?

The poems we have looked at in this chapter—and those that follow—all suggest the value of beginning the reading of any poem with three simple questions: Who is speaking? What do we know about him or her? What kind of person is she or he? Putting together the evidence that the poem presents in answer to such questions can often take us a long way into the poem. For some poems, such questions won't help a great deal because the speaking voice is too indistinct or the character too scantily presented. But starting with such questions will often lead you toward the central experience the poem offers.

POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

WALT WHITMAN

[I celebrate myself, and sing myself]

I celebrate myself, and sing myself,
 And what I assume you shall assume,
 For every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you.
 I loafe and invite my soul,
 5 I lean and loafe at my ease observing a spear of summer grass.

My tongue, every atom of my blood, form'd from this soil, this air, Born here of parents born here from parents the same, and their parents the same,
 I, now thirty-seven years old in perfect health begin,
 Hoping to cease not till death.
 10 Creeds and schools in abeyance,
 Retiring back a while sufficed at what they are, but never forgotten,
 I harbor for good or bad, I permit to speak at every hazard,
 Nature without check with original energy.

LANGSTON HUGHES

Ballad of the Landlord

Landlord, landlord,
 My roof has sprung a leak.
 Don't you 'member I told you about it
 Way last week?

5 Landlord, landlord,
 These steps is broken down.
 When you come up yourself
 It's a wonder you don't fall down.

Ten Bucks you say I owe you?
 10 Ten Bucks you say is due?
 Well, that's Ten Bucks more'n I'll pay you
 Till you fix this house up new.

What? You gonna get eviction orders?
 You gonna cut off my heat?
 15 You gonna take my furniture and Throw it in the street?

Um-huh! You talking high and mighty.
 Talk on—till you get through.
 You ain't gonna be able to say a word
 20 If I land my fist on you.

Police! Police!
Come and get this man!
He's trying to ruin the government
And overturn the land!

25 Copper's whistle!
 Patrol bell!
 Arrest.

Precinct Station.
 Iron cell.

[next to of course god america i]

“next to of course god america i love you land of the pilgrims' and so forth oh say can you see by the dawn's early my country 'tis of centuries come and go 5 and are no more what of it we should worry in every language even deafanddumb thy sons acclaim your glorious name by gorry by jingo by gee by gosh by gum
 why talk of beauty what could be more beaut-10 iful than these heroic happy dead who rushed like lions to the roaring slaughter they did not stop to think they died instead then shall the voice of liberty be mute?”

- Except for the last line, this poem works much like a dramatic monologue. What can you discern about the situation in which the quoted words are spoken? about the speaker and his or her audience? about the poem's attitude toward the speaker?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

GWENDOLYN BROOKS (1917–2000)

From “An Interview with Gwendolyn Brooks” (1970)*

Q[UESTION:] Are your characters literally true to your experience or do you set out to change experience?

A[NSWER:] Some of them are, are invented, some of them are very real people.

Q[UESTION:] How about the seven pool players in the poem “We Real Cool”?

A[NSWER:] They have no pretensions to any glamor. They are supposedly drop-outs, or at least they’re in the poolroom when they should possibly be in school, since they’re probably young enough, or at least those I saw were when I looked in a poolroom [. . .]. First of all, let me tell you how that’s supposed to be said, because there’s a reason why I set it out as I did. These are people who are essentially saying, “Kilroy is here. We are.” But they’re a little uncertain of the strength of their identity. [. . .]

The “We”—you’re supposed to stop after the “We” and think about their validity, and of course there’s no way for you to tell whether it should be said softly or not, I suppose, but I say it rather softly because I want to represent their basic uncertainty, which they don’t bother to question every day, of course.

Q[UESTION:] Are you saying that the form of this poem, then, was determined by the colloquial rhythm you were trying to catch?

A[NSWER:] No, determined by my feeling about these boys, these young men.

- At what point and how did you begin to figure out just who the speaker of this poem is? What is the effect of the shifts between plural and singular, “we” and “I”?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Several of the poems in this chapter create characters and imply situations, as in drama. Write an essay in which you describe and analyze the main speaker of any poem in this chapter.
2. Write an essay in which you compare the speakers in any two poems in this chapter. What kinds of self-image do they have? In each poem, what is the implied distance between the speaker and the poet?
3. Choose any of the poems in this or the previous chapter and write an essay about the way a poet can create irony and humor through the use of a speaker who is clearly distinct from the poet himself or herself.
4. Write a poem, short story, or personal essay in which the speaker or narrator is a character mentioned by a speaker in any of the poems in this chapter—for example, someone who hears the song sung in X. J. Kennedy’s IN A PROMINENT BAR IN SECAUCUS ONE DAY, the lover in Dorothy Parker’s A CERTAIN LADY, or Ben and Jemima in CREAM OF WHEAT. How might the same situation, as well as the main speaker of these poems, look and sound different when viewed from another speaker’s point of view and described in another speaker’s voice?

Exploring Gender

AN ALBUM

As far as I'm concerned, being any gender is a drag.

—PATTI SMITH

In poetry, as in life, the meaning of what is said to us depends in great part on who says it. In both contexts, too, our sense of who a speaker (or any person) is has much to do with gender, even when we aren't aware of it. Is this person a he or a she? Those little pronouns make all the difference.

As an experiment, look back at one or two of the poems in the last chapter. At what point, and for what reason, did you first decide that a poem's speaker was male or female? Did you ever change your mind? Does any speaker's gender seem more ambiguous now, on a second reading of the poem, than it did on the first reading? What difference does the speaker's gender make to your response? How might your response relate to the ways the poem does or doesn't conform to your expectations of men and women? What is the effect of the correspondence (or lack thereof) between the author's gender and the speaker's?

Despite all we have said about the danger of confusing the author of a poem with its speaker(s), in practice we usually use our knowledge of an author's gender in determining a speaker's gender, particularly when the latter is ambiguous. For example, consider William Wordsworth's poem SHE DWELT AMONG THE UNTRODDEN WAYS (ch. 10). The title tells us that the poem describes a "she," whom we later learn is "A Maid"—that is, an unmarried woman, probably young and virginal, named Lucy (lines 3, 10). But what about the speaker? On the one hand, we know that Lucy's death and burial make all "[t]he difference" to this person (line 12), and the poem also gives us plenty of reasons to suspect that the speaker is among the "very few" who "love[d]" Lucy (line 4), at the very least finding her flowerlike and "[f]air" (lines 5, 7). On the other hand, you might be surprised to discover that nothing in the poem establishes the speaker's gender beyond a reasonable doubt. Yet based on these few cues—on the fact that the poem is written by William Wordsworth, on our experience of the ways men and women tend to feel and talk about each other, and on the ways a lyric is likely to portray the lost beloved—we almost inevitably assume as we read that the speaker is a man.

In the absence of definitive textual cues about a speaker's gender, such assumptions are perfectly acceptable and conventional, perhaps even inevitable. But it is nonetheless important (and just plain interesting) to notice that when we assign gender to the speaker of some poems, we are making an assumption—one that greatly affects our reading and response. Notice, too, that in assigning gender we often draw on assumptions about sexuality as well, often taking it for granted that people are heterosexual. When it comes to gender we need to pay attention to all the details that a poem gives us, as well as to those it withholds. We also need to be ready for surprises and to look for evidence that might overturn, or at least complicate, our assumptions. For example, Shakespeare's sonnets famously include some addressed to a young man, others addressed to a woman, and still others that are ambiguous, especially when read independently of the rest of the sonnets in the sequence. In some cases, the erotic charge of the poems, combined with our own tendency to believe that love poems must be addressed from a man to a woman or vice versa, might well lead us to make problematic assumptions about the gender of the speaker or the lover.

To help you think more about these issues, this album gathers poems whose speakers vary widely. In one way or another, however, all of these poems invite us to explore our ideas and feelings about gender and, to a lesser extent, sexuality. What does it mean to be a man or a woman? What has it meant in other times and places? Might gender be more complex than the phrases man or woman and he or she suggest? When, where, and how do we acquire our ideas about gender-appropriate roles, qualities, behavior, and appearance? Are some or all of these "ideas" not learned at all, but rather innate or instinctual? When and why might having a gender be a burden? a pleasure? How does gender shape our experience? our sense of ourselves and others? our interactions with, and our emotional responses to, poems and people?

RICHARD LOVELACE

Song: To Lucasta, Going to the Wars

Tell me not, sweet, I am unkind,
 That from the nunnery
 Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind
 To war and arms I fly.

- 5 True: a new mistress now I chase,
 The first foe in the field;
 And with a stronger faith embrace
 A sword, a horse, a shield.

- Yet this inconstancy is such 10 As you too shall adore;
 I could not love thee, dear, so much,
 Loved I not honor more.

1649

- What might this poem imply about men's and women's attitudes toward love and war?

MARY, LADY CHUDLEIGH

To the Ladies

Wife and servant are the same,
 But only differ in the name:
 For when that fatal knot is tied,
 Which nothing, nothing can divide,

- 5 When she the word Obey has said,
 And man by law supreme has made,
 Then all that's kind is laid aside,
 And nothing left but state¹ and pride.
 Fierce as an eastern prince he grows,
 10 And all his innate rigor shows:
 Then but to look, to laugh, or speak,
 Will the nuptial contract break.
 Like mutes, she signs alone must make,
 And never any freedom take,
 15 But still be governed by a nod,
 And fear her husband as her god:
 Him still must serve, him still obey,
 And nothing act, and nothing say,
 But what her haughty lord thinks fit,
 20 Who, with the power, has all the wit.
 Then shun, oh! shun that wretched state,
 And all the fawning flatterers hate.
 Value yourselves, and men despise:
 You must be proud, if you'll be wise.

1703

- What might the speaker mean when she says a husband “with the power, has all the wit” (line 20)? How might that statement multiply the meanings of the poem’s last line?

WILFRED OWEN

Disabled

- He sat in a wheeled chair, waiting for dark,
 And shivered in his ghastly suit of grey,
 Legless, sewn short at elbow. Through the park
 Voices of boys rang saddening like a hymn,
 5 Voices of play and pleasure after day,
 Till gathering sleep had mothered them from him.
- About this time Town used to swing so gay
 When glow-lamps budded in the light blue trees,
 And girls glanced lovelier as the air grew dim,—
 10 In the old times, before he threw away his knees.
 Now he will never feel again how slim
 Girls' waists are, or how warm their subtle hands;
 All of them touch him like some queer disease.
- There was an artist silly for his face,
 15 For it was younger than his youth, last year.
 Now, he is old; his back will never brace;

1. Social position.

He's lost his color very far from here,
 Poured it down shell-holes till the veins ran dry,
 And half his lifetime lapsed in the hot race,
 20 And leap of purple spurted from his thigh.

One time he liked a blood-smear down his leg,
 After the matches,² carried shoulder-high.
 It was after football, when he'd drunk a peg,³
 He thought he'd better join.—He wonders why.
 25 Someone had said he'd look a god in kilts,
 That's why; and may be, too, to please his Meg;
 Aye, that was it, to please the giddy jilts
 He asked to join. He didn't have to beg;
 Smiling they wrote his lie; aged nineteen years.

30 Germans he scarcely thought of; all their guilt,
 And Austria's, did not move him. And no fears
 Of Fear came yet. He thought of jeweled hilts
 For daggers in plaid socks; of smart salutes;
 And care of arms; and leave; and pay arrears;
 35 Esprit de corps; and hints for young recruits.
 And soon, he was drafted out with drums and cheers.

Some cheered him home, but not as crowds cheer Goal.
 Only a solemn man who brought him fruits
Thanked him; and then inquired about his soul.

40 Now, he will spend a few sick years in Institutes,
 And do what things the rules consider wise,
 And take whatever pity they may dole.
 Tonight he noticed how the women's eyes
 Passed from him to the strong men that were whole.
 45 How cold and late it is! Why don't they come
 And put him into bed? Why don't they come?

- How might you respond differently to this poem if the soldier himself were the speaker? if the poem described the events of his life in the order in which they happened? if the poem lacked its last two lines?

- The speaker in this poem uses the first-person plural (“we,” line 4; “our,” line 5; “us,” line 8). Who might “we” be? How might your response to the poem change if the speaker instead used the first-person singular (“I”) or the third-person plural (“they”)?

DAVID WAGONER

My Father's Garden

On his way to the open hearth where white-hot steel
Boiled against furnace walls in wait for his lance
To pierce the fireclay and set loose demons
And dragons in molten tons, blazing
5 Down to the huge satanic caldrons,
Each day he would pass the scrapyard, his kind of garden.

4. Literally, “husbandless.” 5. Infernal.

In rusty rockeries of stoves and brake drums,
 In grottoes of sewing machines and refrigerators,
 He would pick flowers for us: small gears and cogwheels
 10 With teeth like petals, with holes for anthers,
 Long stalks of lead to be poured into toy soldiers,
 Ball bearings as big as grapes to knock them down.

He was called a melter. He tried to keep his brain
 From melting in those tyger-mouthed mills
 15 Where the same steel reappeared over and over
 To be reborn in the fire as something better
 Or worse: cannons or cars, needles or girders,
 Flagpoles, swords, or plowshares.

But it melted. His classical learning ran 20 Down and away from him, not burning bright.⁶
 His fingers culled a few cold scraps of Latin
 And Greek, magna sine laude,⁷ for crosswords
 And brought home lumps of tin and sewer grills
 As if they were his ripe prize vegetables.

1987

- What facts do we learn here about the speaker's father and his life? What are the speaker's feelings about both?

JUDITH ORTIZ COFER

The Changeling

As a young girl
 vying for my father's attention,
 I invented a game that made him look up from his reading and shake his head
 5 as if both baffled and amused.

In my brother's closet, I'd change into his dungarees—the rough material molding me into boy shape; hide my long hair under an army helmet
 10 he'd been given by Father, and emerge transformed into the legendary Che⁸ of grown-up talk.

Strutting around the room,
 I'd tell of life in the mountains,
 15 of carnage and rivers of blood, and of manly feasts with rum and music to celebrate victories para la libertad.⁹

6. Like "tyger-mouthed" (line 14), an allusion to William Blake's poem "The Tyger" (1790).

7. Without great distinction; a reversal of the usual magna cum laude.

8. Ernesto "Che" Guevara (1928–67), Argentinian-born Cuban revolutionary leader.

9. For freedom (Spanish).

He would listen with a smile to my tales of battles and brotherhood
 20 until Mother called us to dinner.

She was not amused
 by my transformations, sternly forbidding me from sitting down with them as a man.
 She'd order me back to the dark cubicle
 25 that smelled of adventure, to shed my costume, to braid my hair furiously with blind hands, and to return invisible, as myself,
 to the real world of her kitchen.

1993

- Why do you think the speaker's father is amused by her "transformations" (line 22), and why does her mother forbid them? What does this poem imply about all three characters?

MARIE HOWE

Practicing

I want to write a love poem for the girls I kissed in seventh grade, a song for what we did on the floor in the basement of somebody's parents' house, a hymn for what we didn't say but thought:
That feels good or I like that, when we learned how to open each other's mouths

5 how to move our tongues to make somebody moan. We called it practicing, and one was the boy, and we paired off—maybe six or eight girls—and turned out the lights and kissed and kissed until we were stoned on kisses, and lifted our nightgowns or let the straps drop, and, Now you be the boy:
 concrete floor, sleeping bag or couch, playroom, game room, train room, laundry.

10 Linda's basement was like a boat with booths and portholes instead of windows. Gloria's father had a bar downstairs with stools that spun,
 plush carpeting. We kissed each other's throats.
 We sucked each other's breasts, and we left marks, and never spoke of it upstairs outdoors, in daylight, not once. We did it, and it was 15 practicing, and slept, sprawled so our legs still locked or crossed, a hand still lost in someone's hair . . . and we grew up and hardly mentioned who the first kiss really was—a girl like us, still sticky with the moisturizer we'd shared in the bathroom. I want to write a song for that thick silence in the dark, and the first pure thrill of unreluctant desire,

 20 just before we made ourselves stop.

1998

- What does the speaker of this poem imply about why her memories of “practicing” matter to her now that she is an adult? What does she imply about how being a girl compares to being a woman?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

MARIE HOWE (b. 1950)

From “Marie Howe” (1997)*

M[ARIE] H[OWE]: [. . .] I was interested in what it means to be a woman, what it means to be a man. [. . .]

In this culture, our mothers don't tell us about their first sexual experience, they don't tell us about their marriage, their lives, their sexual life in marriage, they don't tell us anything. My mother told us nothing [. . .] So, I've been really aware lately, at 46 years old, that I still need my sisters and my friends to teach me and help me figure out how to be a “girl.”

[INTERVIEWER]: So much of our time as girls and women is spent trying to figure out what is allowed, by men and by other women as well. What is not talked about and what is talked about. How we can have an authentic sexuality.

MH: In learning how to be a girl in this culture, we are learning how to be objects. [. . .]

So in the poems, I was trying to find places in my young life where I was actually the subject, and I found it was in practicing how to kiss, which I did with other girls. I got to be a boy-girl and a girl-girl—I got to kiss the girl and kiss the boy. I loved that.

From “The Complexity of the Human Heart: A Conversation with Marie Howe” (2004)

[INTERVIEWER]: I was interested in your saying you don't want to write personal poems anymore. Is one of the dangers having people confuse your poetry with your life? Once I heard someone say to Sharon Olds, “Tell me, how old are your son and daughter now?” And she said, “I have no son or daughter. Those are fictitious children.”

MH: I understand what she means. For example, with that poem “Practicing,” [. . .] the New Yorker legal department called up and said, “Are those girls identifiable?” I said, well, Linda's basement was like a boat and Gloria's father did have a bar downstairs with plush carpeting, but I didn't kiss those girls. So, yes, they're identifiable, because the poem has great, great details from my childhood, but that to me is the answer to the question of whether it is autobiographical. It's all constructed. I didn't kiss those two girls. They were my best friends when I was a kid. I kissed other girls, but how could you give up those gorgeous details with those basements, and it poured into the poems. They still made me change the names. But what comes together in a poem isn't true [. . .].

[. . .] I'm making something, like [the artist] Joseph Cornell makes his boxes and everyone looks into them, but it's the box you look into; it's not the man or the woman. It's alchemy of language and memory and imagination and time and music and sounds that gets made, and that's different from "Here is what happened to me when I was ten." That poem is a good example. Linda's boat basement and Gloria's plush carpeting were there, but they weren't there there.

- How does the poem characterize Mr. T and the speaker's feelings about him? Why might it matter that the speaker uses the first-person plural ("we") versus the singular ("I")?

1. Stage name of bodyguard-turned-actor Laurence Tureaud (b. 1952), who first rose to fame as a star of the 1980s action-adventure series The A Team and the film Rocky III (1982). His boast "I pity the fool" became a popular catchphrase.

2. Born Lincoln Theodore Perry (1902–85), "Stepin Fetchit" is often described as the first African American movie star; he became famous and controversial in the 1930s by repeatedly playing the same stereotypically simpleminded character.

3. Hip-hop dancers or "breakers." John Henry: American folk hero portrayed as an enormously strong railroad worker who died from exhaustion after winning a contest against a steam-powered drill.

BOB HICOK

O my pa-pa

Our fathers have formed a poetry workshop.
 They sit in a circle of disappointment over our fastballs and wives. We thought they didn't read our stuff, whole anthologies of poems that begin, My father never,
 5 or those that end, and he was silent as a carp, or those with middles which, if you think of the right side as a sketch, look like a paunch of beer and worry, but secretly, with flashlights in the woods, they've read every word and noticed 10 that our nine happy poems have balloons and sex and giraffes inside, but not one dad waving hello from the top of a hill at dusk. Theirs is the revenge school of poetry, with titles like
 "My Yellow Sheet Lad" and "Given Your Mother's Taste 15 for Vodka, I'm Pretty Sure You're Not Mine."
 They're not trying to make the poems better so much as sharper or louder, more like a fishhook or electrocution, as a group
 they overcome their individual senilities, 20 their complete distaste for language, how cloying it is, how like tears it can be, and remember every mention of their long hours at the office or how tired they were when they came home, when they were dragged through the door
 25 by their shadows. I don't know why it's so hard to write a simple and kind poem to my father, who worked, not like a dog, dogs sleep most of the day in a ball of wanting to chase something, but like a man, a man with seven kids and a house to feed, whose absence 30 was his presence, his present, the Cheerios, the PF Flyers, who taught me things about trees,
 that they're the most intricate version of standing up, who built a grandfather clock with me so I would know that time is a constructed thing, a passing, ticking fancy.
 35 A bomb. A bomb that'll go off soon for him, for me, and I notice in our fathers' poems a reciprocal dwelling on absence, that they wonder why we disappeared as soon as we got our licenses, why we wanted the rocket cars, as if running away from them 40 to kiss girls who looked like mirrors of our mothers wasn't fast enough, and it turns out they did start to say something, to form the words hey or stay, but we'd turned into a door full of sun, into the burning leave, and were gone
 45 before it came to them that it was all right to shout, that they should have knocked us down with a hand on our shoulders, that they too are mystified by the distance men need in their love.

- What does the speaker seem to discover about fathers, sons, and men by imagining the poems “Our fathers” might write (line 1)? What does the poem imply about the relationship between poetry, “language” (line 20), and gender?

STACEY WAITE

The Kind of Man I Am at the DMV

“Mommy, that man is a girl,” says the little boy pointing his finger, like a narrow spotlight, targeting the center of my back, his kid-hand learning to assert what he sees, his kid-hand 5 learning the failure of gender’s tidy little story about itself. I try not to look at him because, yes that man is a girl. I, man, am a girl.

I am the kind of man who is a girl and because the kind of man I am is patient with children 10 I try not to hear the meanness in his voice, his boy voice that sounds like a girl voice because his boy voice is young and pitched high like the tent in his pants will be years later because he will grow to be the kind of man 15 who is a man, or so his mother thinks.

His mother snatches his finger from the air, of course he’s not, she says, pulling him back to his seat, what number does it say we are?
she says to her boy, bringing his attention
20 to numbers, to counting and its solid sense.

But he has earrings, the boy complains now sounding desperate like he’s been the boy who cries wolf, like he’s been the hub of disbelief before, but this time 25 he knows he is oh so right. The kind of man I am is a girl, the kind of man
I am is push-ups on the basement floor, is chest bound tight against himself, is thick gripping hands to the wheel
30 when the kind of man I am drives away from the boy who will become a boy except for now while he’s still a girl voice,
a girl face, a hairless arm, a powerless hand.
That boy is a girl that man who is a girl 35 thinks to himself, as he pulls out of the lot, his girl eyes shining in the Midwest sun.

- According to the poem, what is wrong with “gender’s tidy little / story about itself,” or what is its “failure” (lines 5–6)? How does the speaker characterize and seem to feel about the little boy? his mother? Why and how so?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Identify the poem in this album that moves you the most, whether to anger, frustration, sadness, delight, or any other emotion. Write an essay exploring why and how the poem evokes the emotions it does, focusing especially on the way your emotional response relates, on the one hand, to the poem’s representation of gender and, on the other hand, to either your own experience of being a certain gender or your own ideas about gender. Alternatively, choose any poem in the album that you find especially good or interesting, and write an essay exploring what it shows about gender and how it does so.
2. Some of the poems in this album explore the relationship between adults and children from the grown-up child’s perspective (David Wagoner’s MY FATHER’S GARDEN, Judith Ortiz Cofer’s THE CHANGELING, Elizabeth Bishop’s EXCHANGING HATS, Bob Hicok’s O MY PA-PA). Write an essay comparing the way at least two of these poems portray either these relationships or the role of parents in teaching their children what it means to be a boy or a girl, a man or a woman. What feelings do the poems express about these relationships or roles?
3. Richard Lovelace’s SONG: TO LUCASTA, GOING TO THE WARS, Wilfred Owen’s DISABLED, and Judith Ortiz Cofer’s THE CHANGELING all deal with war and men’s and women’s relationship to it. Write an essay in which you compare these poems and their implications about the role of war in defining masculinity and femininity.
4. Elizabeth Bishop’s EXCHANGING HATS, Judith Ortiz Cofer’s THE CHANGELING, and Marie Howe’s PRACTICING all describe games or experiments that involve trying on different roles, sometimes by trying on different clothes. Write an essay in which you compare at least two of these poems and the games they describe. What does each game and each poem illustrate about social roles and rules? about the difference between “play” and “real life” or between childhood and adulthood? If you focus on PRACTICING, feel free to draw on the excerpts from the Howe interviews, as well as the poem.
5. Choose any poem from another chapter or album in this book, and write an essay exploring how the poem’s meaning and emotional impact are affected by the fact that its speaker either is or is not clearly male or female.

SITUATION AND SETTING: WHAT HAPPENS? WHERE? WHEN?

Questions about the speaker in a poem (Who? questions) lead to questions about What? and Why? as well as Where? and When? First you identify the imagined situation in the poem: To whom is the speaker speaking? Is there an auditor in the poem? Is anyone else present or referred to in the poem? What is happening? Why is this event or communication occurring, and why is it significant? As soon as you zoom in on answers to such questions about persons and actions, you also encounter questions about place and time. (Where and when does the action or communication take place?) In other words, situation entails setting.

The place involved in a poem is its spatial setting, and the time is its temporal setting. The temporal setting may be a specific date or an era, a season of the year or a time of day. Temporal or spatial setting often influences our expectations, although a poet may surprise us by making something very different from what we had thought was familiar. We tend, for example, to think of spring as a time of discovery and growth, and poems set in spring are likely to make use of that association. Similarly, morning usually suggests discovery—beginnings, vitality, the world fresh and new.

Not all poems have an identifiable situation or setting, just as not all poems have a speaker who is easily distinguishable from the author. Poems that simply present a series of thoughts and feelings directly, in a reflective way, may not present anything resembling a scene with action, dialogue, or description. But many poems depend crucially on a sense of place, a sense of time, and scenes that resemble those in plays or films. And questions about these matters will often lead you to define not only the “facts” but also the feelings central to the design a poem has on its readers.

To understand the dialogue in Hardy’s THE RUINED MAID, for example, we need to recognize that the two women are meeting after an extended period of separation (the situation) and that they meet in a town rather than the rural area in which they grew up together (the setting). We infer (from the opening lines) that the meeting is accidental and that no other friends are present for the conversation. The poem’s whole “story” depends on their situation: After leading separate lives for a while, they have some catching up to do. We don’t know what specific town they are in or what year, season, or time of day it is—and those details are not important to the poem’s effect.

More specific settings matter in other poems. In Browning’s SOLILOQUY OF THE SPANISH CLOISTER, the setting, a monastery, adds to the irony because of the gross inappropriateness of the speaker’s sentiments and attitudes in a supposedly holy place.

Situation and setting may be treated in various ways in a poem, ranging from silence to the barest hints of description to full photographic detail. Often it is relatively easy to identify the situation at the beginning of a poem, but the implications of setting, and what happens as the poem unfolds, may be subtler. Poets often rely on readers to fill in the gaps, drawing on their knowledge of circumstances and familiar experiences in the present or in the past. The poem may specify only a few aspects of a kind of setting, such as a motel room in the afternoon.

SITUATION

Both of the poems below involve motherhood, but each portrays an entirely different situation. How would you summarize each?

RITA DOVE

Daystar

She wanted a little room for thinking:
but she saw diapers steaming on the line,
a doll slumped behind the door.
So she lugged a chair behind the garage
5 to sit out the children's naps.

Sometimes there were things to watch—
the pinched armor of a vanished cricket, a floating maple leaf. Other days
she stared until she was assured 10 when she closed her eyes she'd see only her own vivid blood.

She had an hour, at best, before Liza appeared pouting from the top of the stairs.
And just what was mother doing 15 out back with the field mice? Why, building a palace. Later that night when Thomas rolled over and lurched into her, she would open her eyes and think of the place that was hers 20 for an hour—where she was nothing,
pure nothing, in the middle of the day.

1986

To a Daughter Leaving Home

When I taught you
at eight to ride
a bicycle, loping along beside you
5 as you wobbled away

on two round wheels,
 my own mouth rounding
 in surprise when you pulled ahead down the curved 10 path of the park,
 I kept waiting for the thud of your crash as I
 sprinted to catch up, 15 while you grew smaller, more breakable with distance,
 pumping, pumping
 for your life, screaming 20 with laughter,
 the hair flapping
 behind you like a handkerchief waving goodbye.

The mother in Dove's DAYSTAR, overwhelmed by the demands of young children, needs a room of her own. All she can manage, however, is a brief hour of respite. The situation is virtually the whole story here. Nothing really happens except that daily events (washing diapers, picking up toys, looking at crickets and leaves, explaining the world to children, having sex) surround her brief private hour and make it precious. Being "nothing" (lines 21 and 22) takes on great value in these circumstances.

The particulars of time and place in Pastan's TO A DAUGHTER LEAVING HOME are even less specific; the incident the poem describes happened a long time ago, and its vividness is a function of memory. The speaker here thinks back nostalgically to a moment when her daughter made an earlier (but briefer) departure. Though we learn very little about the speaker, at least directly, we may infer quite a bit about her—her affection for her daughter, the kind of mother she has been, her anxiety at the new departure that seems to resemble the earlier wobbly ride into the distance. The daughter is now, the poem implies, old enough to "leave home" in a full sense, but we do not know the specific reason or what the present circumstances are. Only the title tells us the situation, and (like "Daystar") the poem is all situation.

THE CARPE DIEM POEM

The following two poems from the 1600s represent similar situations: In each, a male speaker addresses a female auditor whom he desires. The poems belong to the tradition of carpe diem (Latin for "seize the day") because the speaker is urging his auditor, his lover, to enjoy pleasures now, before they die. The woman is resisting because of her concern for chastity or social rules. The action of these poems is implied in the shifts in what the speaker is saying. What does the woman do in THE FLEA? Can you imagine the woman's response in TO HIS COY MISTRESS?

JOHN DONNE

The Flea

- Mark but this flea, and mark in this,¹
 How little that which thou deny'st me is;
 It sucked me first, and now sucks thee,
 And in this flea our two bloods mingled be;
 5 Thou know'st that this cannot be said
 A sin, nor shame, nor loss of maidenhead.
 Yet this enjoys before it woo,
 And pampered² swells with one blood made of two,
 And this, alas, is more than we would do.³
- 10 Oh stay,⁴ three lives in one flea spare,
 Where we almost, yea more than, married are.
 This flea is you and I, and this
 Our marriage bed, and marriage temple is;
 Though parents grudge, and you, we're met
 15 And cloistered in these living walls of jet.
 Though use⁵ make you apt to kill me,
 Let not to that, self-murder added be,
 And sacrilege, three sins in killing three.

- Cruel and sudden, hast thou since 20 Purpled thy nail in blood of innocence?
 Wherein could this flea guilty be,
 Except in that drop which it sucked from thee?
 Yet thou triumph'st, and say'st that thou
 Find'st not thyself, nor me, the weaker now;
 25 'Tis true; then learn how false fears be;
 Just so much honor, when thou yield'st to me,
 Will waste, as this flea's death took life from thee.

1633

- What lines help you imagine what the speaker is doing as he speaks? what the auditor does or says?

ANDREW MARVELL

To His Coy Mistress

Had we but world enough, and time,
 This coyness,⁶ lady, were no crime.
 We would sit down, and think which way

1. Medieval preachers and rhetoricians asked their hearers to “mark” (look at) an object that illustrated a moral or philosophical lesson they wished to emphasize.
2. Fed luxuriously.
3. According to the medical theory of Donne’s era, conception involved the literal mingling of the lovers’ blood.
4. Desist.
5. Habit.
6. Hesitancy, modesty (not necessarily suggesting calculation).

To walk, and pass our long love's day.
 5 Thou by the Indian Ganges' side
 Shouldst rubies⁷ find: I by the tide
 Of Humber would complain.⁸ I would Love you ten years before the Flood,
 And you should if you please refuse
 10 Till the conversion of the Jews.⁹
 My vegetable love¹ should grow
 Vaster than empires, and more slow;
 An hundred years should go to praise
 Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze;
 15 Two hundred to adore each breast,
 But thirty thousand to the rest.
 An age at least to every part,
 And the last age should show your heart.
 For, lady, you deserve this state;²
 20 Nor would I love at lower rate.
 But at my back I always hear
 Time's wingèd chariot hurrying near;
 And yonder all before us lie
 Deserts of vast eternity.
 25 Thy beauty shall no more be found,
 Nor, in thy marble vault, shall sound
 My echoing song; then worms shall try
 That long preserved virginity,
 And your quaint honor turn to dust,
 30 And into ashes all my lust:
 The grave's a fine and private place,
 But none, I think, do there embrace.
 Now therefore, while the youthful hue
 Sits on thy skin like morning dew,³
 35 And while thy willing soul transpires⁴
 At every pore with instant fires,
 Now let us sport us while we may,
 And now, like am'rous birds of prey,
 Rather at once our time devour
 40 Than languish in his slow-chapped⁵ pow'r.
 Let us roll all our strength and all
 Our sweetness up into one ball,
 And tear our pleasures with rough strife

7. Talismans that are supposed to preserve virginity.

8. Write love complaints, conventional songs lamenting the cruelty of love. Humber: a river and estuary in Marvell's hometown of Hull.

9. Which, according to popular Christian belief, will occur just before the end of the world.

1. Which is capable only of passive growth, not of consciousness. The "vegetable soul" is lower than the other two divisions of the soul, "animal" and "rational."

2. Dignity. 3. The text reads "glew." "Lew" (warmth) has also been suggested as an emendation.

4. Breathes forth.

5. Slow-jawed. Chronos (Time), ruler of the world in early Greek myth, devoured all of his children except Zeus, who was hidden. Later, Zeus seized power (see line 46 and note).

Thorough⁶ the iron gates of life.

- 45 Thus, though we cannot make our sun
Stand still,⁷ yet we will make him run.⁸

1681

- How does each stanza develop the speaker's argument? Is it persuasive?

SETTING

Frequently a poem's setting draws on common notions of a particular time or place. Setting a poem in a garden, for example, or writing about apples almost inevitably reminds readers of the Garden of Eden because it is an important and widely recognized part of the Western heritage. Even people who don't read at all or who lack Judeo-Christian religious commitments are likely to know about Eden, and poets writing in Western cultures can count on that knowledge. A reference to something outside the poem that carries a history of meaning and strong emotional associations is called an allusion. For example, gardens may carry suggestions of innocence and order, or temptation and the Fall, or both, depending on how the poem handles the allusion.

Specific, well-known places may similarly be associated with particular ideas, values, ways of life, or natural phenomena. The titles of many poems refer, like the following one, directly to specific places or times.

MATTHEW ARNOLD Dover Beach⁹

- The sea is calm tonight.
The tide is full, the moon lies fair
Upon the straits; on the French coast the light
Gleams and is gone; the cliffs of England stand,
5 Glimmering and vast, out in the tranquil bay.
Come to the window, sweet is the night-air!
Only, from the long line of spray
Where the sea meets the moon-blanch'd land,
Listen! you hear the grating roar
10 Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling,
At their return, up the high strand,
Begin, and cease, and then again begin,
With tremulous cadence slow, and bring
The eternal note of sadness in.
- 15 Sophocles long ago
Heard it on the Aegean, and it brought Into his mind the turbid ebb and flow

6. Through. 7. To lengthen his night of love with Alemene, Zeus made the sun stand still.

8. Each sex act was believed to shorten life by one day.

9. At the narrowest point on the English Channel. The light on the French coast (lines 3–4) would be about twenty miles away.

- Of human misery,¹ we Find also in the sound a thought,
 20 Hearing it by this distant northern sea.
- The Sea of Faith
 Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
 Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furled.
 But now I only hear
 25 Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
 Retreating, to the breath
 Of the night-wind, down the vast edges drear
 And naked shingles² of the world.
- Ah, love, let us be true
 30 To one another! for the world, which seems
 To lie before us like a land of dreams,
 So various, so beautiful, so new,
 Hath really neither joy, nor love, nor light,
 Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain;
 35 And we are here as on a darkling plain
 Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight,
 Where ignorant armies clash by night.

c. 1851

The situation and setting of DOVER BEACH are concrete and specific. It is night by the seashore, and the speaker is gazing at the view from a room with someone he invites to “come to the window” (line 6) and “listen” (line 9); later he says to this person, “Ah, love, let us be true / To one another!” (lines 29–30). Most readers have assumed that the speaker and his companion are about to travel from Dover across the sea to France and that the situation is a honeymoon, or at least that the couple is young and married; after all the “world [. . .] seems / To lie before us [. . .] / so new” (lines 30–32). Although this poem is not a prayer, it is a kind of plea for hope despite the modern loss of faith. The tide is now full, but the poet hears a destructive repetition of rising and falling waves (the pebbles will be worn down eventually), and he dwells on the “withdrawing” side of this pattern. For centuries, Christian belief, “the Sea of Faith” (line 21), was at high tide, but now the speaker can only “hear” it “[r]etreating” (lines 24, 26). On the one hand, then, the specifics of setting—the fact that it is night, that the speaker looks out on a stony beach lined with cliffs, and so on—seem to evoke the sense of danger, isolation, and uncertainty the speaker feels as a result of the loss of faith. On the other hand, however, might details of setting introduce hope into the poem, especially when we combine them with our knowledge of how tides ebb and flow and how the dark of night gives way to the light of morning?

THE OCCASIONAL POEM

While much of the poetry in this anthology expresses personal feelings, and while some of it is tied to the poet’s autobiographical circumstances, a great deal of poetry written over the centuries has focused not on individuals but on political or historical topics and themes. The setting of epic poetry may be as broad as a nation or even the cosmos. Poems have been written to instruct readers about religion, science, philosophy, and the art of poetry, among many other topics, with an appropriate range of settings and situations. The poet may wish to influence readers' sympathies or loyalties toward different sides in a conflict, or to record and honor a specific event such as an inauguration. A poem written about or for a specific occasion is called an occasional poem, and such a poem is referential; that is, it refers to a certain historical time or event.

Sometimes it is hard to place ourselves fully in another time or place in order to imagine sympathetically what a particular historical moment would have been like, and even the best poetic efforts, by themselves, do not necessarily transport us there. For such poems we need, at the least, specific historical information—plus a willingness to be transported by a name, a date, or a dramatic situation.

Here, however, is a relatively recent example: an occasional poem that works to capture the significance of a recent, public event by considering it in the historical perspective inspired by a very specific setting.

MARTÍN ESPADA

Litany at the Tomb of Frederick Douglass³

Mount Hope Cemetery, Rochester, New York

November 7, 2008

This is the longitude and latitude of the impossible;
 this is the epicenter of the unthinkable;
 this is the crossroads of the unimaginable:
 the tomb of Frederick Douglass, three days after the election.

- 5 This is a world spinning away from the gravity of centuries, where the grave of a fugitive slave has become an altar.
 This is the tomb of a man born as chattel, who taught himself to read in secret, scraping the letters in his name with chalk on wood; now on the anvil-flat stone
 a campaign button fills the O in Douglass. The button says: Obama.
- 10 This is the tomb of a man in chains, who left his fingerprints on the slavebreaker's throat so the whip would never carve his back again;
 now a labor union T-shirt drapes itself across the stone, offered up by a nurse, a janitor, a bus driver. A sticker on the sleeve says: I Voted Today.
- This is the tomb of a man who rolled his call to arms off the press, 15 peering through spectacles at the abolitionist headline; now a newspaper spreads above his dates of birth and death. The headline says: Obama Wins.

3. Escaped slave (1817–95) who was involved in the Underground Railroad and became a major spokesman for abolition, especially through his autobiography (1845) and his Rochester-based newspaper, the North Star.

This is the stillness at the heart of the storm that began in the body of the first slave, dragged aboard the first ship to America. Yellow leaves descend in waves, and the newspaper flutters on the tomb, like the sails 20 Douglass saw in the bay, like the eyes of a slave closing to watch himself escape with the tide. Believers in spirits would see the pages trembling on the stone and say: look how the slave boy teaches himself to read.
I say a prayer, the first in years: that here we bury what we call the impossible, the unthinkable, the unimaginable, now and forever.
Amen.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

MARTÍN ESPADA (b. 1957)

From “Poetry Month: Martín Espada” (2011)*

While we all have our criticisms of President Obama, we must not forget the history he made in 2008, and the history we all made by voting for him and the feeling behind the making of that history. [. . .] Right after the election, I found myself in Rochester, New York. And it so happens that’s where Frederick Douglass is buried, and so this is the poem that came out of it.

First, it’s not an Obama poem; it’s a Frederick Douglass poem. Second, it’s a poem about the making of history; it’s about how we felt at the moment that history was made. [. . .] We can’t lose that feeling, even as we become frustrated or disillusioned. [. . .] We can’t lose the way we felt at that moment [. . .].

THE AUBADE

While an occasional poem focuses on a specific historical event, an aubade focuses on a specific time of day—morning. (Aubade comes from the French term for dawn.) Although morning suggests fresh beginnings and hope, an aubade often expresses sadness because the new day means that two lovers must part—time has moved on. Do you detect sadness or hopefulness in the following aubades? Do the poems help you visualize a particular day? How does place or situation affect the speaker’s response to the time of day? What references to darkness or light, to sleep or waking, or to other times of day do you notice in these poems?

JOHN DONNE

The Good-Morrow

I wonder, by my troth, what thou and I
 Did, till we loved? were we not weaned till then?
 But sucked on country pleasures, childishly?
 Or snorted we in the Seven Sleepers' den?⁴
 5 'Twas so; but⁵ this, all pleasures fancies be.
 If ever any beauty I did see,
 Which I desired, and got,⁶ 'twas but a dream of thee.

And now good-morrow to our waking souls,
 Which watch not one another out of fear;
 10 For love, all love of other sights controls,
 And makes one little room an everywhere.
 Let sea-discoverers to new worlds have gone,
 Let maps to other,⁷ worlds on worlds have shown,
 Let us possess one world, each hath one, and is one.

15 My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears,⁸
 And true plain hearts do in the faces rest;
 Where can we find two better hemispheres,
 Without sharp north, without declining west?
 Whatever dies was not mixed equally,⁹
 20 If our two loves be one, or, thou and I Love so alike that none do slacken, none can die.

1633

- Like so many of Donne's poems, this one attempts to persuade. What is the situation of this poem? What does the speaker wish to demonstrate?

A Description of the Morning

Now hardly here and there a hackney-coach¹
 Appearing, showed the ruddy morn's approach.
 Now Betty² from her master's bed had flown,
 And softly stole to discompose her own.
 5 The slip shod 'prentice from his master's door
 Had pared the dirt, and sprinkled round the floor.
 Now Moll had whirled her mop with dext'rous airs,
 Prepared to scrub the entry and the stairs.
 The youth with broomy stumps began to trace

4. According to legend, seven Christian youths escaped Roman persecution by sleeping in a cave for 187 years. Snorted: snored. 5. Except for. 6. Sexually possessed. 7. Other people.

8. That is, each is reflected in the other's eyes.

9. Perfectly mixed elements, according to scholastic philosophy, were stable and immortal.

1. Hired coach. Hardly: scarcely; that is, they are just beginning to appear.

2. Stock name for a servant girl. Moll (lines 7, 14) is a frequent lower-class nickname.

- 10 The kennel-edge³ where wheels had worn the place.
 The small-coal man⁴ was heard with cadence deep,
 Till drowned in shriller notes of chimney-sweep:
 Duns⁵ at his lordship's gate began to meet;
 And brick-dust Moll had screamed through half the street.⁶
- 15 The turnkey now his flock returning sees,
 Duly let out a-nights to steal for fees.⁷
 The watchful bailiffs take their silent stands,⁸
 And schoolboys lag with satchels in their hands.

- From the poem's brief descriptions of morning routines, what do we know about its various characters and the kind of community they inhabit? Could a similar poem be written today?

ONE POEM, MULTIPLE SITUATIONS AND SETTINGS

Though many poems depict a single situation and setting, a single poem will sometimes juxtapose multiple “scenes.” In such cases, we need both to determine the situation and setting particular to each scene and to consider how the poem interrelates its various scenes to create a singular effect and meaning.

The following poem describes several different scenes. Some seem to have actually occurred at particular places and times (when the main speaker was “In sixth grade,” for example [line 1]). Others seem hypothetical, abstract, or generic—events that might or often do happen almost anywhere to almost anybody (like “choos[ing] / persimmons,” lines 6–7). Still others seem indeterminate as to time and/or place (Did “Donna undres[s]” only once [line 18]? When?). How many different scenes of each type can you discern? What connects them to each other? For example, how might at least some of these scenes demonstrate or discuss various kinds of “precision” (lines 5, 82)? How so, and what kinds?

LI-YOUNG LEE

Persimmons

- In sixth grade Mrs. Walker slapped the back of my head and made me stand in the corner for not knowing the difference
- 5 between persimmon and precision.
 How to choose persimmons. This is precision.
 Ripe ones are soft and brown-spotted.
 Sniff the bottoms. The sweet one
- 10 will be fragrant. How to eat:

3. Edge of the gutter that ran down the middle of the street. Trace: To find old nails [Swift's note].

4. A seller of coal and charcoal. 5. Bill collectors.

6. Selling powdered brick that was used to clean knives.

7. Jailers collected fees from prisoners for their keep and often let them out at night so they could steal to pay expenses. 8. Looking for those on their “wanted” lists.

put the knife away, lay down newspaper.
 Peel the skin tenderly, not to tear the meat.
 Chew the skin, suck it,
 and swallow. Now, eat 15 the meat of the fruit,
 so sweet,
 all of it, to the heart.

Donna undresses, her stomach is white.
 In the yard, dewy and shivering 20 with crickets, we lie naked, face-up, face-down.
 I teach her Chinese.
 Crickets: chiu chiu. Dew: I've forgotten.
 Naked: I've forgotten.
 25 Ni, wo: you and me.
 I part her legs,
 remember to tell her
 she is beautiful as the moon.

Other words
 30 that got me into trouble were fight and fright, wren and yarn.
 Fight was what I did when I was frightened, fright was what I felt when I was fighting.
 Wrens are small, plain birds,
 35 yarn is what one knits with.
 Wrens are soft as yarn.
 My mother made birds out of yarn.
 I loved to watch her tie the stuff;
 a bird, a rabbit, a wee man.

40 Mrs. Walker brought a persimmon to class and cut it up
 so everyone could taste
 a Chinese apple. Knowing it wasn't ripe or sweet, I didn't eat
 45 but watched the other faces.

My mother said every persimmon has a sun inside, something golden, glowing, warm as my face.

Once, in the cellar, I found two wrapped in newspaper,
 50 forgotten and not yet ripe.
 I took them and set both on my bedroom windowsill, where each morning a cardinal sang, The sun, the sun.
 Finally understanding
 55 he was going blind,
 my father sat up all one night waiting for a song, a ghost.

I gave him the persimmons,
swelled, heavy as sadness,
60 and sweet as love.

This year, in the muddy lighting of my parents' cellar, I rummage, looking for something I lost.

My father sits on the tired, wooden stairs,
65 black cane between his knees,
hand over hand, gripping the handle.

He's so happy that I've come home.
I ask how his eyes are, a stupid question.
All gone, he answers.

70 Under some blankets, I find a box.
Inside the box I find three scrolls.
I sit beside him and untie
three paintings by my father:
Hibiscus leaf and a white flower.

75 Two cats preening.
Two persimmons, so full they want to drop from the cloth.

He raises both hands to touch the cloth, asks, Which is this?

This is persimmons, Father.

80 Oh, the feel of the wolftail on the silk, the strength, the tense precision in the wrist.

I painted them hundreds of times eyes closed. These I painted blind.

85 *Some things never leave a person:
scent of the hair of one you love,
the texture of persimmons,
in your palm, the ripe weight.*

ONE SITUATION AND SETTING, MULTIPLE POEMS

Careful attention to situation and setting can be helpful not only in understanding how any one poem works or means but also in appreciating the differences among poems. We can usefully compare any two or more poems that focus on a similar situation or setting. But some poems deliberately invite such comparison by revisiting precisely the same situation and setting depicted in other, earlier poems.

The following two poems, by Christopher Marlowe and Sir Walter Raleigh, provide a famous example of this sort of response. Like all pastoral poems, these are both set in a rural landscape and concerned with the simple life of country folk, usually (as here) shepherds, who live an outdoor life and tend to basic human needs. Yet Marlowe's is the more conventional of the two insofar as it presents that landscape and that life in stylized, idealized terms—as a simple, timeless world of beauty, music, and love that implicitly operates as a kind of counter to, and interlude from, the more urbane, adult, complicated, time-bound “real world.” Raleigh’s poem is only one of many replies to Marlowe’s, which itself indirectly alludes and responds to countless, even earlier works in the pastoral tradition.

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE

The Passionate Shepherd to His Love

Come live with me and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove⁹
That valleys, groves, hills, and fields,
Woods, or steepy mountain yields.

- 5 And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

- And I will make thee beds of roses
10 And a thousand fragrant posies,
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle¹
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;

- A gown made of the finest wool
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
15 Fair lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold;

- A belt of straw and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs:
And if these pleasures may thee move,
20 Come live with me, and be my love.

The shepherd swains² shall dance and sing
For thy delight each May morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me and be my love.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH

The Nymph’s Reply to the Shepherd

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd’s tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee and be thy love.

- 5 Time drives the flocks from field to fold,
When rivers rage, and rocks grow cold,

9. Experience. 1. Gown. 2. Youths.

And Philomel³ becometh dumb;
The rest complain of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton fields
10 To wayward winter reckoning yields:
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,
Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle, and thy posies
15 Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten;
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
Thy coral clasps and amber studs,
All these in me no means can move
20 To come to thee and be thy love.

But could youth last, and love still breed,
Had joys no date,⁴ nor age no need,
Then these delights my mind might move
To live with thee and be thy love.

1600

Raleigh's poem replies to Marlowe's by giving us the same situation and setting as perceived and described by a different speaker—the nymph rather than the shepherd. The following, much more recent poem takes a somewhat different tack, offering us not one but two different perspectives on the situation and setting depicted in Matthew Arnold's "Dover Beach"—that of the original poem's silent female auditor as related to us by another (presumably male) speaker.

ANTHONY HECHT The Dover Bitch

A Criticism of Life⁵

*for Andrews Wanning*⁶

So there stood Matthew Arnold and this girl
With the cliffs of England crumbling away behind them,
And he said to her, "Try to be true to me,
And I'll do the same for you, for things are bad
5 All over, etc., etc."
Well now, I knew this girl. It's true she had read
Sophocles in a fairly good translation
And caught that bitter allusion to the sea,⁷
But all the time he was talking she had in mind

3. The nightingale. 4. End.

5. Matthew Arnold, critic as well as poet, famously wrote that poetry should be "a criticism of life."

6. Professor of literature at Bard College.

7. See "Dover Beach," lines 9–18.

- 10 The notion of what his whiskers would feel like
 On the back of her neck. She told me later on
 That after a while she got to looking out
 At the lights across the channel, and really felt sad,
 Thinking of all the wine and enormous beds
- 15 And blandishments in French and the perfumes.
 And then she got really angry. To have been brought
 All the way down from London, and then be addressed
 As a sort of mournful cosmic last resort
 Is really tough on a girl, and she was pretty.
- 20 Anyway, she watched him pace the room
 And finger his watch-chain and seem to sweat a bit,
 And then she said one or two unprintable things.
 But you mustn't judge her by that. What I mean to say is,
 She's really all right. I still see her once in a while
- 25 And she always treats me right. We have a drink
 And I give her a good time, and perhaps it's a year
 Before I see her again, but there she is,
 Running to fat, but dependable as they come.
 And sometimes I bring her a bottle of Nuit d'Amour.⁸

POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

Consider the Who? What? Why? Where? and When? questions as you read the following poems.

NATASHA TRETHERWEY

Pilgrimage

*Vicksburg, Mississippi*⁹

- Here, the Mississippi carved its mud-dark path, a graveyard for skeletons of sunken riverboats.
 Here, the river changed its course,
- 5 turning away from the city
 as one turns, forgetting, from the past—the abandoned bluffs, land sloping up above the river's bend—where now the Yazoo fills the Mississippi's empty bed.
- 10 Here, the dead stand up in stone, white

8. French for “Night of Love,” presumably a bottle of perfume.

9. On July 4, 1863, the city surrendered to Union forces under Ulysses S. Grant after a forty-day siege; coming just a day after the Confederate defeat at Gettysburg, Vicksburg's surrender is often regarded as a major turning point in the Civil War.

marble, on Confederate Avenue. I stand on ground once hollowed by a web of caves;
 they must have seemed like catacombs,
 in 1863, to the woman sitting in her parlor, 15 candlelit, underground. I can see her listening to shells explode, writing herself into history, asking what is to become of all the living things in this place?
 This whole city is a grave. Every spring—
 20 Pilgrimage—the living come to mingle with the dead, brush against their cold shoulders in the long hallways, listen all night to their silence and indifference, relive their dying on the green battlefield.
 25 At the museum, we marvel at their clothes—preserved under glass—so much smaller than our own, as if those who wore them were only children. We sleep in their beds, the old mansions hunkered on the bluffs, draped 30 in flowers—funereal—a blur of petals against the river's gray.
 The brochure in my room calls this living history. The brass plate on the door reads Prissy's¹ Room. A window frames
 35 the river's crawl toward the Gulf. In my dream, the ghost of history lies down beside me,
 rolls over, pins me beneath a heavy arm.

2006

- What different historical times and situations meet in a single place in this poem? Why and how so?

KELLY CHERRY

Alzheimer's

He stands at the door, a crazy old man
 Back from the hospital, his mind rattling
 Like the suitcase, swinging from his hand,
 That contains shaving cream, a piggy bank,

1. Scarlett O'Hara's maid in Margaret Mitchell's novel Gone with the Wind (1936).

- 5 A book he sometimes pretends to read,
 His clothes. On the brick wall beside him
 Roses and columbine slug it out for space, claw the mortar.
 The sun is shining, as it does late in the afternoon
 In England, after rain.
- 10 Sun hardens the house, reifies it,
 Strikes the iron grillwork like a smithy
 And sparks fly off, burning in the bushes—
 The rosebushes—
 While the white wood trim defines solidity in space.
- 15 This is his house. He remembers it as his,
 Remembers the walkway he built between the front room
 And the garage, the rhododendron he planted in back,
 The car he used to drive. He remembers himself,
 A younger man, in a tweed hat, a man who loved
- 20 Music. There is no time for that now. No time for music,
 The peculiar screeching of strings, the luxurious
 Fiddling with emotion.
 Other things have become more urgent.
 Other matters are now of greater import, have more
- 25 Consequence, must be attended to. The first Thing he must do, now that he is home, is decide who
 This woman is, this old, white-haired woman
 Standing here in the doorway,
 Welcoming him in.

1997

- How do phrases like “a crazy old man” and “a book he sometimes pretends to read” indicate the speaker’s feelings toward the man she describes (lines 1, 5)? Does the tone shift at some point? Where? What might the poem encourage you to speculate about the speaker’s relationship to the people described? about their relationship to each other?

MAHMOUD DARWISH

Identity Card²

Write down:

I am Arab

my I.D. number, 50,000

my children, eight

- 5 and the ninth due next summer

—Does that anger you?

Write down:

Arab.

2. Translated by John Mikhail Asfour. Israeli law requires all citizens sixteen and over to carry a government-issued identity card at all times, to be presented on demand to authorized police, military, or government officials. Until 2005, the cards indicated the bearer’s ethnic group (Arab, Jew, etc.).

I work with my struggling friends in a quarry
 10 and my children are eight.
 I chip a loaf of bread for them, clothes and notebooks
 from the rocks.
 I will not beg for a handout at your door 15 nor humble myself on your threshold
 —Does that anger you?

Write down:

Arab,
 20 a name with no friendly diminutive.
 A patient man, in a country
 brimming with anger.
 My roots have gripped this soil
 since time began,
 25 before the opening of ages before the cypress and the olive,
 before the grasses flourished.
 My father came from a line of plowmen,
 and my grandfather was a peasant 30 who taught me about the sun's glory before teaching me to read.
 My home is a watchman's shack made of reeds and sticks
 —Does my condition anger you?

35 There is no gentle name,
 write down:
 Arab.
 The color of my hair, jet black—eyes, brown—40 trademarks,
 a headband over a *keffiyeh*³ and a hand whose touch grates rough as a rock.
 My address is a weaponless village
 45 with nameless streets.
 All its men are in the field and quarry
 —Does that anger you?

Write down, then at the top of Page One:

50 I do not hate and do not steal
 but starve me, and I will eat my assailant's flesh.

3. Traditional male headdress consisting of a square of cloth secured by a cord.

Beware of my hunger
55 and of my anger.

1964

- Based on the speaker's words and the poem's title, to whom and in what situation and setting do you imagine him speaking?

YEHUDA AMICHAI

[On Yom Kippur in 1967 . . .]⁴

On Yom Kippur in 1967, the Year of Forgetting,⁵ I put on my dark holiday clothes and walked to the Old City of Jerusalem.
For a long time I stood in front of an Arab's hole-in-the-wall shop, not far from the Damascus Gate,⁶ a shop with 5 buttons and zippers and spools of thread in every color and snaps and buckles.
A rare light and many colors, like an open Ark.

I told him in my heart that my father too had a shop like this, with thread and buttons.
10 I explained to him in my heart about all the decades and the causes and the events, why I am now here and my father's shop was burned there and he is buried here.⁷

When I finished, it was time for the Closing of the Gates prayer.
He too lowered the shutters and locked the gate
15 and I returned, with all the worshipers, home.

1968

- Why and how is it important that the poem is set on Yom Kippur? that it ends with the word "home"?

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA

Searching for love, a woman, someone to help ease down the cocked hammer

4. From the sequence "Jerusalem, 1967." Translated by Stephen Mitchell. Yom Kippur: the Day of Atonement, culmination of the High Holy Days, during which Jews seek forgiveness for wrongs committed against God and other people; usually falls in September or October.

5. In the so-called Six Day War of June 1967, Israel waged a highly successful campaign against Syria, Jordan, and Egypt, capturing the mainly Arab-occupied West Bank, along with the Sinai and Golan Heights. According to the translator, "the date 1967 (-5728) is expressed in the same Hebrew letters that also form the word for 'forget.'"

6. One of the main entrances to the Old City of Jerusalem, so called because it leads to a highway once stretching all the way to Syria's capital, Damascus.

7. Amichai's father was a prosperous German merchant who moved his family to what was then Palestine in 1936, three years after Adolf Hitler's appointment as Germany's chancellor, three years before the start of World War II, and twelve years before the state of Israel was founded.

8. Literally, "Liberty Street" (Vietnamese), famous thoroughfare in the French quarter of Saigon, Vietnam; so named only during the war between North and South Vietnam (1955–75).

of my nerves & senses. The music divides the evening into black 5 & white—soul, country & western, acid rock, & Frank Sinatra.
 I close my eyes & can see men drawing lines in the dust, daring each other to step across.
 10 America pushes through the membrane of mist & smoke, & I'm a small boy again in Bogalusa⁹ skirting tough talk coming out of bars with White Only signs & Hank Snow.¹ But tonight,
 15 here in Saigon, just for the hell of it,
 I walk into a place with Hank Williams² calling from the jukebox. The bar girls fade behind a smokescreen, fluttering like tropical birds in a cage, not 20 speaking with their eyes & usual painted smiles. I get the silent but only enemy machinegun fire

 25 can bring us together again.
 When I order a beer, the mama-san³

 30 down the street the black GIs hold to their turf also.
 An off-limits sign pulls me deeper into alleys; I look for a softness behind these voices 35 wounded by their beauty & war.
 Back in the bush at Dak To & Khe Sahn, we fought the brothers of these women
 we now run to hold in our arms.

2. Famous troubled country music singer-songwriter (1923–53) whose many hits include “I’m So Lonesome I Could Cry.”

3. In East Asia, a woman in authority; in Japanese, san is an honorific suffix, a title (not unlike “Mrs.”) added to names and proper nouns to indicate respect.

run into each other like tunnels

1988

- Why does the speaker seem to receive the reception he does in the first Tu Do Street bar he enters? How does he compare the way white and black American soldiers and Vietnamese women interact in this situation and setting and in others—in Bogalusa, Louisiana (lines 11–14) or “in the boonies” and “the bush at Dak To / & Khe Sahn” (lines 22–25, 36–39), for example? What does he seem to discover or conclude?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA (b. 1947)

From “The Body Is Our First Music: Interview with Tony Barnstone and Michael Garabedian” (1998)*

BARNSTONE: [. . .] I’m interested where the female resides in your wartime imagination, and where does sex and motherhood and generation come into this activity in which, for the most part, men kill men?

KOMUNYAKAA: Well . . . on the boundary, on the periphery, of every war, there seems to be the spoils of war alongside an industry of sex. But it’s more than that, because often there’s a kind of cleansing going on as well. People are getting killed, and people are being born on the periphery. This has always been the case [. . .]. Because the same men who are killing, the next day are loving. And often risking their hearts. So there is all this contradiction in their personality and perception. And I suppose we need that kind of complexity in order to make ourselves whole [. . .]. (118–19)

From “Still Negotiating with the Images: An Interview with William Baer” (1998)

[INTERVIEWER:] No poem shows the interrelatedness of human beings in wartime more effectively than “Tu Do Street” [. . .] Th[e end of the poem offers] an amazing image of our connected humanity, but is the connection with “the underworld” just a harsh reminder of death that should stir us to behave with more kindness, or is it a pessimistic reflection of the human propensity to divide and destroy ourselves?

[KOMUNYAKAA:] It was one of those endings that, once I’d written down, just stopped where it was. There were many symbolic underworlds in Vietnam, the underground tunnel systems, some of the bars, and the whole psychic space of the GI—a kind of underworld populated by ghosts and indefinable images. It was a place of emotional and psychological flux where one was trying to make sense out of the world and one’s place in that world. And there was, relentlessly, a going back and forth between that internal space and external world. It was an effort to deal with oneself, and with the other GIs, the Vietnamese, and even the ghosts that we'd managed to create ourselves. So, for me, this is a very complex picture of the situation of the GI—going back and forth, condemned in a way to trek back and forth between those emotional demarcations while trying to make sense out of things. (95)

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Matthew Arnold's DOVER BEACH and Natasha Trethewey's PILGRIMAGE are meditations on history and human destiny derived from the poets' close observation of particular places and times. Write an essay in which you examine one poem's descriptive language and the way it creates a suitable setting for the speaker's philosophical musings.
2. Write an essay either comparing the two carpe diem poems in this chapter or comparing one of these poems to Donne's THE GOOD-MORROW. If you choose the former option, concentrate on how each poem differently handles the same basic situation: How does each speaker go about convincing his auditor to “seize the day”? If you choose the latter option, explore how Donne's poem might work as a sort of sequel to the carpe diem poem: In what ways are the two poems alike, and what difference do their different situations make?
3. Martín Espada claims that his occasional poem is about Frederick Douglass rather than President Obama. Write an essay exploring whether and why that seems to be the case. Why, according to the poem, was the election of Obama both an especially good occasion for remembering Douglass and itself an occasion worth commemorating in a poem? What and whom exactly are commemorated here? Alternatively, compare Espada's poem to Natasha Trethewey's. What might each poem suggest about history and memory, time and place?
4. Kelly Cherry's ALZHEIMER's uses contrasts—especially before and after—to characterize the ravages of Alzheimer's disease. What evidence does the poem provide about what the man used to be like? What specific changes have come about? How does the setting of the poem suggest some of those changes? In what ways do the stabilities of house, landscape, and other people clarify what has happened? Write an essay about the function of the poem's setting.
5. Choose any poem in this anthology in which you think setting is especially key to the poem's effect and meaning or in which you think the meaningfulness of setting depends on the associations of particular times and/or places. Write an essay explaining why and how so.
6. Write your own DESCRIPTION OF THE MORNING—or of the afternoon, evening, or night, or of a particular time of the year. Whether you produce a poem or a prose sketch, try to capture, as Swift does, the feeling of this time as it is or might be experienced in a specific place.

Homelands

AN ALBUM

One of the most ancient literary topics is the quest or journey away from home. Sacred literature, including the Bible, tells of exile and a long period of suffering before returning to or reaching a homeland. Epics and romances may concern the hero's wanderings or adventures to reach or to defend a realm closely associated with his birth, inheritance, or fate. Since the 1500s, global exploration, colonialism, slavery, mass migration, and economic transformation have meant that many of the world's populations have experienced dislocation and deracination (loss of roots). Those who find themselves displaced try to remember where they came from; they may seek to honor their heritage or yearn for a sense of belonging. The poems in this album were written at different times in different places and cultural contexts. Each speaker suggests some kind of double vision on the past and present, on a more modern or recent location and the former place. What is the role of dislocation or altered identity in these poems? How do these poems represent the speaker's divided loyalties or distance from home? How do they indicate the passage of time, whether in history, over generations, or within one person's life?

MAYA ANGELOU

Africa

Thus she had lain
sugar cane sweet deserts her hair
golden her feet
5 mountains her breasts
two Niles her tears.
Thus she has lain
Black through the years.

Over the white seas
10 rime white and cold brigands ungentled icicle bold took her young daughters sold her strong sons
15 churched her with Jesus
bled her with guns.
Thus she has lain.

Now she is rising

20 remember the losses her screams loud and vain remember her riches
 her history slain
 now she is striding
 25 although she had lain.

MAYA ANGELOU (1928–2014)

From “Maya Angelou, The Art of Fiction No. 119” (1990)*

I never agreed, even as a young person, with the Thomas Wolfe title You Can’t Go Home Again. Instinctively I didn’t. But the truth is, you can never leave home. You take it with you; it’s under your fingernails; it’s in the hair follicles; it’s in the way you smile; it’s in the ride of your hips, in the passage of your breasts; it’s all there, no matter where you go. You can take on the affectations and the postures of other places and even learn to speak their ways. But the truth is, home is between your teeth. Everybody’s always looking for it: Jews go to Israel; black Americans and Africans in the Diaspora go to Africa; Europeans, Anglo-Saxons go to England and Ireland; people of Germanic background go to Germany. It’s a very queer quest. We can kid ourselves; we can tell ourselves, Oh yes, honey, I live in Tel Aviv, actually. . . . The truth is a stubborn fact.

DEREK WALCOTT

A Far Cry from Africa

A wind is ruffling the tawny pelt
 Of Africa. Kikuyu,¹ quick as flies,
 Batten upon the bloodstreams of the veldt.²
 Corpses are scattered through a paradise.
 5 Only the worm, colonel of carrion, cries:

1. East African tribe whose members, as Mau Mau fighters, conducted an eight-year insurrection against British colonial settlers in Kenya.

2. Open plains, neither cultivated nor thickly forested (Afrikaans).

“Waste no compassion on these separate dead!”
 Statistics justify and scholars seize
 The salients of colonial policy.
 What is that to the white child hacked in bed?
 10 To savages, expendable as Jews?
 Threshed out by beaters,³ the long rushes break
 In a white dust of ibises whose cries
 Have wheeled since civilization’s dawn
 From the parched river or beast-teeming plain.
 15 The violence of beast on beast is read
 As natural law, but upright man
 Seeks his divinity by inflicting pain.
 Delirious as these worried beasts, his wars
 Dance to the tightened carcass of a drum,
 20 While he calls courage still that native dread
 Of the white peace contracted by the dead.
 Again brutish necessity wipes its hands
 Upon the napkin of a dirty cause, again
 A waste of our compassion, as with Spain,⁴
 25 The gorilla wrestles with the superman.
 I who am poisoned with the blood of both,
 Where shall I turn, divided to the vein?
 I who have cursed
 The drunken officer of British rule, how choose 30 Between this Africa and the English tongue I love?
 Betray them both, or give back what they give?
 How can I face such slaughter and be cool?
 How can I turn from Africa and live?

1962

- How does the speaker express his divided loyalties in the questions that conclude the poem? What various meanings might the poem’s title accrue by the end?

3. In big-game hunting, natives are hired to beat the brush, driving birds—such as ibises—and other animals into the open.

4. Spanish Civil War (1936–39), in which the Republican loyalists were supported politically by liberals in the West and militarily by Soviet Communists, and the Nationalist rebels by Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

DEREK WALCOTT (b. 1930)

From “An Interview with Derek Walcott” (1979)

[QUESTION:] Do you want to talk about the Caribbean writer’s special relationship to Africa?

[ANSWER: . . .] I have been British; I have been a citizen of the Caribbean federation; now I’m supposed to be either a Trinidadian or a St. Lucian but with a British passport. I find that I am able to make a living in America (and I owe America a great deal for its recognition and the fact that I can work here); and there is the same danger, the same seduction in saying I really am African and should be in Africa, or that my whole experience is African. This can be simply another longing, even a slave longing, for another master. There is no West Indian who is black, or even one who is not black, who is not aware of the existence of Africa in all of us. [. . .] The fact is that every West Indian has been severed from a continent, whether he be Indian, Chinese, Portuguese, or black. To have the population induced into a mass nostalgia to be somewhere else seemed to me about as ennobling as wishing that the whole population was in Brooklyn, or Brickston. [. . .] It would be equally abhorrent to me to say “I wish we were English again” as to say “I wish we were African again.” The reality is that one has to build in the West Indies. But that is not to say one doesn’t know who one is: our music, our speech—all the things that are organic in the way we live—are African.

I [. . .] felt that it was a privilege to grow up as an English colonial child [in the West Indies] because politically and culturally the British heritage was supposed to be mine. It was no problem for me to feel that since I was writing in English, I was in tune with the growth of the language. I was the contemporary of anyone writing in English anywhere in the world. What is more important, however—and I’m still working on this—was to find a voice that was not inflected by influences. One didn’t develop an English accent in speech; one kept as close as possible to an inflection that was West Indian. The aim was that a West Indian or an Englishman could read a single poem, each with his own accent, without either one feeling that it was written in dialect.

The Latin Deli: An Ars Poetica⁵

Presiding over a formica counter, plastic Mother and Child magnetized to the top of an ancient register, the heady mix of smells from the open bins
 5 of dried codfish, the green plantains hanging in stalks like votive offerings, she is the Patroness of Exiles,
 a woman of no-age who was never pretty,
 who spends her days selling canned memories
 10 while listening to the Puerto Ricans complain that it would be cheaper to fly to San Juan than to buy a pound of Bustelo coffee here, and to Cubans perfecting their speech of a “glorious return” to Havana—where no one 15 has been allowed to die and nothing to change until then;
 to Mexicans who pass through, talking lyrically of dólares to be made in El Norte⁶—all wanting the comfort of spoken Spanish, to gaze upon the family portrait of her plain wide face, her ample bosom 20 resting on her plump arms, her look of maternal interest as they speak to her and each other of their dreams and their disillusion—how she smiles understanding, when they walk down the narrow aisles of her store 25 reading the labels of packages aloud, as if they were the names of lost lovers: Suspiros,⁷ Merengues, the stale candy of everyone’s childhood.
She spends her days
 slicing *jamón y queso*⁸ and wrapping it in wax paper tied with string: plain ham and cheese 30 that would cost less at the A&P,⁹ but it would not satisfy the hunger of the fragile old man lost in the folds of his winter coat, who brings her lists of items that he reads to her like poetry, or the others, whose needs she must divine, conjuring up products 35 from places that now exist only in their hearts—closed ports she must trade with.

1993

5. Art of Poetry (Latin), after the title of a treatise by the Roman Poet Horace (65–8 BCE).

6. The North (referring to the United States). Dólares: Dollars (Spanish).

7. Sighs (Spanish); like Merengues, a type of candy.

8. Ham and cheese (Spanish).

9. Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, a major grocery store chain founded in 1869.

- What keeps people shopping at the Latin Deli (versus a chain store)? How is this poem an “ars poetica,” or what might it say about “the art of poetry” as practiced by a Mexican American poet like Cofer?

CATHY SONG

Heaven

He thinks when we die we'll go to China.
 Think of it—a Chinese heaven
 where, except for his blond hair,
 the part that belongs to his father,
 5 everyone will look like him.
 China, that blue flower on the map,
 bluer than the sea
 his hand must span like a bridge to reach it.
 10 An octave away.

 I've never seen it.
 It's as if I can't sing that far.
 But look—
 on the map, this black dot.
 15 Here is where we live, on the pancake plains
 just east of the Rockies,
 on the other side of the clouds.
 A mile above the sea,
 20 the air is so thin, you can starve on it.
 No bamboo trees
 But the alpine equivalent,
 reedy aspen with light, fluttering leaves.
 Did a boy in Guangzhou¹ dream of this 25 as his last stop?
 I've heard the trains at night
 whistling past our yards,
 what we've come to own,
 the broken fences, the whiny dog, the rattlettrap cars.
 30 It's still the wild west,
 mean and grubby,
 the shootouts and fistfights in the back alley.
 With my son the dreamer
 and my daughter, who is too young to walk, 35 I've sat in this spot
 and wondered why here?
 Why in this short life,
 this town, this creek they call a river?

 He had never planned to stay,
 40 the boy who helped to build

1. Usually called Canton, a seaport city in southeastern China.

the railroads for a dollar a day.
 He had always meant to go back.
 When did he finally know that each mile of track led him further away, 45 that he would die in his sleep,
 dispossessed,
 having seen Gold Mountain,
 the icy wind tunneling through it,
 these landlocked, makeshift ghost towns?
 50 It must be in the blood,
 this notion of returning.
 It skipped two generations, lay fallow,
 the garden an unmarked grave.
 On a spring sweater day
 55 it's as if we remember him.
 I call to the children.
 We can see the mountains
 shimmering blue above the air.
 If you look really hard 60 says my son the dreamer, leaning out from the laundry's rigging,
 the work shirts fluttering like sails,
 you can see all the way to heaven.

1988

- Who is "He" in this poem's first line? What family history is recounted in the poem? How does the poem make use of contrast?

AGHA SHAHID ALI Postcard from Kashmir

(for Pavan Sahgal)

Kashmir shrinks into my mailbox,
 my home a neat four by six inches.
 I always loved neatness. Now I hold the half-inch Himalayas in my hand.
 5 This is home. And this the closest I'll ever be to home. When I return, the colors won't be so brilliant,
 the Jhelum's waters² so clean,
 so ultramarine. My love
 10 so overexposed.
 And my memory will be a little out of focus, in it

2. The river Jhelum runs through Kashmir and Pakistan.

a giant negative, black

- What words characterize the speaker's dreams of home in this poem? What words reveal a more realistic attitude?

Escape from the Old Country

I never had to make one,
no sickening weeks by ocean,
no waiting for the aerogrammes³ that gradually ceased to come.

- 5 Spent the babysitting money on novels, shoes, and movies,
yet the neighborhood stayed empty.
It had nothing to do with a journey not undertaken, nor with dialect, 10 nor with a land that waited to be rediscovered, then rejected.
As acid rain collected above the suburban hills, I tried to imagine being nothing, tried 15 to be able to claim, "I have no culture," and be believed.
Yet the land occupies the person even as the semblance of freedom invites a kind of recklessness.
20 Tradition, unobserved, unasked, hangs on tight; ancestors roam into reverie, interfering at the most awkward moments, first flirtations, in doorways and dressing rooms—
25 But of course. Here in America, no one escapes. In the end, each traveler returns to the town where, everyone knew, she hadn't even been born.

2006

- In the context of the rest of the poem, what are the various possible meanings of the sentence "Here in America, / no one escapes" (lines 25–26)?

3. Airmail letter, especially one on specially designed stationery.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Write a response paper or essay exploring how Africa is characterized in at least one or two poems in this album.
2. Multiple poems in this album explore the way we tend to idealize the place we have left. Write an essay comparing what at least two poems suggest about how and why we do so. Which, if any, poems seem to see such idealization as a problem? Why and how so?
3. Look closely at the three stanzas of A FAR CRY FROM AFRICA by Derek Walcott. Be sure to note any changes—rhyme patterns or meter, subject matter or attitude—across the three stanzas. Where does the speaker clarify who he is and where his loyalties lie? Why is the last part of the poem a series of questions? Write an essay in which you interpret the form and theme of the poem as itself a kind of “far cry from Africa,” in every sense: far from that homeland, part of a non-African tradition, “crying” for connection.
4. Imagine receiving in your mailbox a postcard from the place where you or your parents were born. (Alternatively, imagine receiving digital pictures or messages in other formats.) Write a poem or a short prose description in which you express a response similar to the speaker’s in Agha Shahid Ali’s POSTCARD FROM KASHMIR: How would the place be changed if you could visit, and how would it differ from the way you or your family think about it now?

THEME AND TONE

Poetry is full of surprises. Poems express anger or outrage just as effectively as love or sadness, and good poems can be written about going to a rock concert or having lunch or mowing the lawn, as well as about making love or smelling flowers or listening to Beethoven. Even poems on “predictable” subjects can surprise us with unpredicted attitudes or sudden twists. Knowing that a poem is about some particular subject or topic—love, for example, or death—may give us a general idea of what to expect, but it never tells us altogether what we will find in a particular poem. Labeling a poem a “love poem” or a “death poem” is a convenient way to speak of its topic. But poems that may be loosely called “love poems” or “death poems” may have little else in common, may express utterly different attitudes or ideas, and may concentrate on very different aspects of the subject. Letting a poem speak to us means more than merely figuring out its topic; it means listening to how the poem says what it says. What a poem says involves its theme. How a poem makes that statement involves its tone—the poem’s attitude or feelings toward its topic. No two poems on the same subject affect us in exactly the same way; their themes and tones vary, and even similar themes may be expressed in various ways, creating different tones and effects.

TONE

Tone, a term borrowed from acoustics and music, refers to the qualities of the language a speaker uses in social situations or in a poem, and it also refers to a speaker’s intended effect. Tone is closely related to style and diction; it is an effect of the speaker’s expressions, as if showing a real person’s feelings, manner, and attitude or relationship to a listener and to the particular subject or situation. Thus, the speaker may use angry or mocking words, may address the listener intimately or distantly, may sincerely confess or coolly observe, may paint a grand picture or narrate a legend.

The following poem describes a romantic encounter of sorts, but its tone may surprise you. As you read the poem, work first to identify its speaker, situation, and setting. Then try both to capture its tone in a single word or two and to figure out which features of the poem help to create that tone.

Leaving the Motel

- Outside, the last kids holler
Near the pool: they'll stay the night.
Pick up the towels; fold your collar
Out of sight.
- 5 Check: is the second bed
Unrumped, as agreed?
Landlords have to think ahead
In case of need,
- Too. Keep things straight: don't take 10 The matches, the wrong keyrings—
We've nowhere we could keep a keepsake—
Ashtrays, combs, things
- That sooner or later others
Would accidentally find.
- 15 Check: take nothing of one another's
And leave behind
- Your license number only,
Which they won't care to trace;
We've paid. Still, should such things get lonely, 20 Leave in their vase
- An aspirin to preserve
Our lilacs, the wayside flowers
We've gathered and must leave to serve
A few more hours;
- 25 That's all. We can't tell when
We'll come back, can't press claims,
We would no doubt have other rooms then,
Or other names.

The title and details of LEAVING THE MOTEL indicate the situation and setting: Two secret lovers are at the end of an afternoon sexual encounter in a motel room (perhaps one is speaking for both of them), reminding themselves not to leave or take with them any clues for “others” (line 13)—their spouses?—to find.

Whereas many poems on the topic of love confirm an enduring attachment or express desire or suggest erotic experience, this poem focuses on the effort to erase a stolen encounter. The two lovers have no names; indeed, they have registered under false names. They have already paid for this temporary shelter, can't stay the night like other guests or build a home with children of their own, and are running through a checklist of their agreements and duties (“Check,” “Keep things straight,” “Check” [lines 5, 9, 15]). Other than the “wayside” lilacs (line 22), the objects mentioned are trivial, from matches and keyrings to license numbers. The matter-of-fact but hurried tone suggests that they wish to hide any deep feelings (hinted at in the last two stanzas in the wish to make “claims” or preserve flowers [line 26]). The failure to express love—or guilt—enhances the effect when the tone shifts, at the word “still” (line 19), to the second thoughts about leaving something behind. The poem’s short rhyming lines, sounding brisk and somewhat impersonal, contrast with the situation and add to the tone of subdued regret that nothing lasts.

THEME

Our response to the tone of a poem, however it surprises or jars or stirs us, guides us to understand its theme (or themes): what the poem expresses about its topic. A theme is not simply a work’s subject or its topic; it is a statement about that topic. Although we can usually agree on what a poem is about without much difficulty, it is harder to determine how to state a poem’s theme. Not only may a theme be expressed in several different ways, but a single poem may also have more than one theme. Sometimes the poet explicitly states a poem’s theme, and such a statement may clarify why the author chose a particular mode of presentation and how the poem fits into the author’s own patterns of thinking and growing. However, the author’s words may give a misleading view of how most people read the poem, just as a person’s self-assessment may not be all we need in order to understand his or her character. Further study of the poem is necessary to understand how it fulfills—or fails to fulfill—the author’s intentions. Despite the difficulty of identifying and expressing themes, doing so is an important step in understanding and writing about poetry.

Topic Versus Tone and Theme: A Comparative Exercise

Reading two or more poems with similar topics side by side may suggest how each is distinctive in what it has to say and how it does so—its theme and tone. The following two poems are about animals, although both of them place their final emphasis on human beings: The animal in each case is only the means to the end of exploring human nature. The poems share the assumption that animal behavior may appear to reflect human habits and conduct, and that it may reveal much about us; in each case the character central to the poem is revealed to be surprisingly unlike the way she thinks of herself. But the poems differ in their tones, in the specific relationship between the woman and the animals, and in their themes.

How would you describe the tone of the following poem? its topic and theme?

MAXINE KUMIN Woodchucks

Gassing the woodchucks didn’t turn out right.
The knockout bomb from the Feed and Grain Exchange was featured as merciful, quick at the bone and the case we had against them was airtight, 5 both exits shoehorned shut with puddingstone,¹ but they had a sub-sub-basement out of range.

Next morning they turned up again, no worse for the cyanide than we for our cigarettes and state-store Scotch, all of us up to scratch.
 10 They brought down the marigolds as a matter of course and then took over the vegetable patch nipping the broccoli shoots, beheading the carrots.

The food from our mouths, I said, righteously thrilling to the feel of the .22, the bullets' neat noses.
 15 I, a lapsed pacifist fallen from grace puffed with Darwinian pieties for killing,
 now drew a bead on the littlest woodchuck's face.
 He died down in the everbearing roses.

Ten minutes later I dropped the mother. She 20 flipfopped in the air and fell, her needle teeth still hooked in a leaf of early Swiss chard.
 Another baby next. O one-two-three the murderer inside me rose up hard,
 the hawkeye killer came on stage forthwith.

25 There's one chuck left. Old wily fellow, he keeps me cocked and ready day after day after day.
 All night I hunt his humped-up form. I dream
 I sight along the barrel in my sleep.
 If only they'd all consented to die unseen
 30 gassed underground the quiet Nazi way.

1972

As you read WOODCHUCKS aloud, how does your tone of voice change from beginning to end? What tone do you use to read the ending? How does the hunter feel about her increasing attraction to violence? Why does the poem begin by calling the gassing of the woodchucks "merciful" (line 3) and end by describing it as "the quiet Nazi way" (line 30)? What names does the hunter call herself? How does the name-calling affect your feelings about her? Exactly when does the hunter begin to enjoy the feel of the gun and the idea of killing? How does the poet make that clear?

ADRIENNE RICH

Aunt Jennifer's Tigers

Aunt Jennifer's tigers prance across a screen,
 Bright topaz denizens of a world of green.

1. Mixture of cement, pebbles, and gravel.

- They do not fear the men beneath the tree;
 They pace in sleek chivalric certainty.
- 5 Aunt Jennifer's fingers fluttering through her wool
 Find even the ivory needle hard to pull.
 The massive weight of Uncle's wedding band
 Sits heavily upon Aunt Jennifer's hand.
- When Aunt is dead, her terrified hands will lie
 10 Still ringed with ordeals she was mastered by.
 The tigers in the panel that she made
 Will go on prancing, proud and unafraid.

1951

In this poem, why are tigers a particularly appropriate contrast to the woman embroidering or cross-stitching a hunting scene? What words describing the tigers seem particularly significant? Why are Aunt Jennifer's hands described as "terrified" (line 9)? What clues does the poem give about why Aunt Jennifer is so afraid? How does the poem make you feel about Aunt Jennifer's life and death? How would you describe the tone of the poem? Why does the poem begin and end with the tigers?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

ADRIENNE RICH (1929–2012)

From "When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision" (1971)*

In writing this poem, composed and apparently cool as it is, I thought I was creating a portrait of an imaginary woman. But this woman suffers from the opposition of her imagination, worked out in tapestry, and her lifestyle, "ringed with ordeals she was mastered by." It was important to me that Aunt Jennifer was a person as distinct from myself as possible—distanced by the formalism of the poem, by its objective, observant tone—even by putting the woman in a different generation.

*"When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision." Women's Forum of the MLA, Dec. 1971, Chicago. Address.

Questions for Comparing Poems

Here are some questions and steps for identifying, interpreting, and comparing the topic, theme, and tone of more than one poem. Some of these steps will be familiar to you already, and you may discover other ways to illuminate poetic themes and tones in addition to the guidelines offered here.

As you respond to these questions or prompts, be sure to note line numbers to cite your evidence, according to this format: “puddingstone” (line 5) or “her terrified hands will lie / Still ringed with ordeals” (lines 9–10).

1. Read each poem through slowly and carefully.
2. Compare the titles. How do the titles point to the topics and possible themes, and are these similar or different? Take WOODCHUCKS and AUNT JENNIFER’S TIGERS, for example. What different qualities do we associate with woodchucks or tigers, animals rarely kept as pets?
3. What is the situation and setting in each poem? Make a list of the words in each poem that name objects or indicate actions. Which things or scenes are most significant, and how would you visualize or imagine them? Compare your notes on situation, setting, objects, and actions in both poems.
4. Who are the speakers? Are there other people in the poems? Is anyone identified as a listener or auditor? Are any things or beings (such as animals) personified or given human traits? Compare the speakers and other personalities in the poems.
5. What happens in each poem? Look closely at each stanza. Could the stanzas or lines be rearranged without making a difference? Does one poem tell of a single event or short passage of time, whereas another describes repeated actions or longer periods? Is one poem more eventful than the other?
6. Write down four or five words that describe the tone of each poem. Do these words also describe the language or style of each poem? Can you use all or some of the same words for both poems?
7. What is different about the two styles and forms, including length? Notice the rhythms and sounds, any regular or irregular patterns of meter or rhyme, and the shape of the stanzas.
8. Re-read the poems and try to express their themes in complete sentences. Then try to combine the two themes in a single statement that notes similarities and differences between them. Does your statement comparing the themes resemble your comparison of the tone and style of the two poems? Do the themes relate to similar or different historical, political, and social issues or contexts featured in the poems? Do the poems develop their themes with comparable allusions to myth, religion, literature, art, or other familiar or traditional ideas or associations?
9. Drawing on your notes and responses to the other questions, outline and write an essay comparing the two poems.

THEME AND CONFLICT

Since a theme is an idea implied by all of the elements of the poem working together, identifying theme—as opposed to topic and tone—can sometimes be a tough and tricky business. In reading and writing about poetry, then, it often helps to focus first—and most—on conflict. Though we usually think of conflict as an aspect of plot, even perfectly plotless poems are almost always organized around and devoted to exploring conflicts and tensions. To begin to identify these, look for contrasts and think about the conflict they imply.

Take, for example, AUNT JENNIFER’S TIGERS. Though it might be hard to say at first just what the theme of Rich’s poem might be, it’s hard to miss the contrast that it builds and is built around. Where the tigers Aunt Jennifer embroiders “prance” and “pace” freely, “proud and unafraid” through a world as colorful and as lasting as they are (lines 1, 4, 12), Aunt Jennifer and her world seem just the opposite: Nothing but her fingers and hands move at all in the poem, and even they are “terrified” and tentative, “fluttering through her wool,” “weight[ed]” down by a heavy “wedding band” in life and stilled permanently by death (lines 9, 5, 7). We have, then, not just a contrast but a multifaceted conflict—between imaginary and real worlds, between individual vision and social obligation. What the poem concludes about this conflict is its theme, but starting with questions about conflict often provides not only an easier way into the poem but also a much richer, more textured experience and understanding of it.

The following poem is in fact all about just this issue—the role of conflict in poetry. As you read the poem, try to identify the contrasts it sets up, the underlying conflict those contrasts point to, and the theme that ultimately emerges. Then test your own interpretation of the poem against the author’s comments about how the poem came to be and what, for her, it’s all about.

On Writing

A love poem risks becoming a ruin, public, irretrievable, a form of tattooing, while loss, being permanent,
 can sustain a thousand documents.

5 Loss predominates in history,
 smorgasbord of death, betrayal, heresy,
 crime, contagion, deployment, divorce.
 A writer could remain aboard the ship of grief and thrive, never 10 approaching the shores of rapture.

What can be said about elation that the elated, seeking consolation from their joy, will go to books for?
 It’s wiser and quicker to look for 15 a poem in the dentist’s chair than in the luxury suite where eternal love, declared, turns out to be eternal. Who cares about a stranger’s bliss? Thus the juncture 20 where I’m stalled, unaccustomed to integrity, despite your presence, our tranquility, and every confidence.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK
ADRIENNE SU (b. 1967)

From The Best American Poetry 2013 (2013)*

When I started assembling my newest manuscript, The House Unburned, I found it to be suffering from structural gaps and an excess of grief and regret. [. . .]

To round it out, I needed to come up with some poems of happiness, or at least the absence of unhappiness. This presented a problem, since, as I'm always telling students, successful poems are born of uncertainty, interior conflict, the modes of struggle that lack clear solutions. I went back and forth between two selves: the editor, whose vision for the collection required some happier poems, and the poet, who raged against the affront of an assignment so lacking in ambiguity. How, argued the poet, can happiness, gratification, or success be complex enough to give life to a poem?

Eventually, the answer came with a shift in setting. If the poem could be about writing, conflict would be inherent in the question. So I gave myself permission to write about writing. Now that I had a conflict, the road to the poem appeared. (198)

WILLIAM BLAKE

London

I wander through each chartered street,
Near where the chartered Thames does flow,
And mark in every face I meet
Marks of weakness, marks of woe.

5 In every cry of every man,
In every Infant's cry of fear,
In every voice, in every ban,
The mind-forged manacles I hear.

How the Chimney-sweeper's cry
10 Every black'ning Church appalls;
And the hapless Soldier's sigh
Runs in blood down Palace walls.

But most through midnight streets I hear
How the youthful Harlot's curse
15 Blasts the new-born Infant's tear,
And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse.

- Does the tone of this poem seem sad, angry, or both? Why and how so? How might the repeated word “chartered” (lines 1 and 2) suggest a theme?

PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR

Sympathy

- I know what the caged bird feels, alas!
 When the sun is bright on the upland slopes;
 When the wind stirs soft through the springing grass,
 And the river flows like a stream of glass;
 5 When the first bird sings and the first bud opens,
 And the faint perfume from its chalice steals—
 I know what the caged bird feels!
- I know why the caged bird beats his wing
 Till its blood is red on the cruel bars;
 10 For he must fly back to his perch and cling
 When he fain² would be on the bough a-swing;
 And a pain still throbs in the old, old scars
 And they pulse again with a keener sting—
 I know why he beats his wing!
- 15 I know why the caged bird sings, ah me,
 When his wing is bruised and his bosom sore,—
 When he beats his bars and he would be free;
 It is not a carol of joy or glee,
 But a prayer that he sends from his heart's deep core,
 20 But a plea, that upward to Heaven he flings—
 I know why the caged bird sings!

1893

- How might your interpretation of this poem's theme change depending on whether or not you consider the date of its publication and/or the fact that its author was African American?

W. H. AUDEN

[Stop all the clocks, cut off the telephone]

- Stop all the clocks, cut off the telephone,
 Prevent the dog from barking with a juicy bone,
 Silence the pianos and with muffled drum
 Bring out the coffin, let the mourners come.
- 5 Let aeroplanes circle moaning overhead
 Scribbling on the sky the message He Is Dead,
 Put crêpe bows round the white necks of the public doves,
 Let the traffic policemen wear black cotton gloves.

2. Gladly.

He was my North, my South, my East and West,
 10 My working week and my Sunday rest,
 My noon, my midnight, my talk, my song;
 I thought that love would last for ever: I was wrong.

The stars are not wanted now: put out every one;
 Pack up the moon and dismantle the sun;
 15 Pour away the ocean and sweep up the wood;
 For nothing now can ever come to any good.

- In what tone of voice would you read line 12? How might you turn this line into a statement of the poem's theme?

Last Night

The next day, I am almost afraid.
 Love? It was more like dragonflies in the sun, 100 degrees at noon,
 the ends of their abdomens stuck together, I 5 close my eyes when I remember. I hardly knew myself, like something twisting and twisting out of a chrysalis, enormous, without language, all head, all shut eyes, and the humming 10 like madness, the way they writhe away, and do not leave, back, back, away, back. Did I know you? No kiss, no tenderness—more like killing, death-grip holding to life, genitals
 15 like violent hands clasped tight barely moving, more like being closed in a great jaw and eaten, and the screaming
 I groan to remember it, and when we started to die, then I refuse to remember, 20 the way a drunkard forgets. After, you held my hands extremely hard as my body moved in shudders like the ferry when its axle is loosed past engagement, you kept me sealed exactly against you, our hairlines 25 wet as the arc of a gateway after a cloudburst, you secured me in your arms till I slept—that was love, and we woke in the morning clasped, fragrant, buoyant, that was the morning after love.

- What comparison is the speaker of this poem making between “dragonflies / in the sun” and a night of love-making (lines 2–3)? What other comparisons are made in the poem? How do they work together and contribute to tone and theme?

Repulsive Theory

Little has been made of the soft, skirting action
of magnets reversed,
while much has been
5 made of attraction.
But is it not this pillowy principle of repulsion that produces the
doily edges of oceans
10 or the arabesques of thought?
And do these cutout coasts and incurved rhetorical beaches not baffle the onslaught of the sea or objectionable people 15 and give private life what small protection it's got?
Praise then the oiled motions of avoidance, the pearly convolutions of all that 20 slides off or takes a wide berth; praise every eddy vacuum of Earth,
all the dimpled depths of pooling space, the whole 25 swirl set up by fending-off—extending far beyond the personal,
I'm convinced—
immense and good
in a cosmological sense:
30 unpressing us against each other, lending the necessary never to never-ending.

TERRANCE HAYES

Carp Poem

After I have parked below the spray paint caked in the granite grooves of the Frederick Douglass³ Middle School sign, where men-size children loiter like shadows draped in outsize denim, jerseys, braids, and boots that mean I am no longer young;
 5 after I have made my way to the New Orleans Parish Jail down the block,
 where the black prison guard wearing the same weariness my prison guard father wears buzzes me in. I follow his pistol and shield along each corridor trying not to look at the black men boxed and bunked around me until I reach the tiny classroom
 10 where two dozen black boys are dressed in jumpsuits orange as the carp
 I saw in a pond once in Japan, so many fat, snaggletoothed fish ganged in and lurching for food that a lightweight tourist could have crossed the water on their backs so long as he had tiny rice balls or bread to drop into the mouths below his footsteps, which I'm thinking 15 is how Jesus must have walked on the lake that day, the crackers and crumbs falling from the folds of his robe, and how maybe it was the one fish so hungry it leaped up his sleeve that he later miraculously changed into a narrow loaf of bread, something that could stick to a believer's ribs, and don't get me wrong, I'm a believer too, in the power of food at least, 20 having seen a footbridge of carp packed gill to gill, packed tighter than a room of boy prisoners waiting to talk poetry with a young black poet, packed so close they'd have eaten each other had there been nothing else to eat.

- What theme might emerge from the particular way this poem describes and compares what seems like three very different episodes—at the New Orleans Parish Jail, in a Japanese garden, and in the Bible? What might the poem suggest about prison? about poetry?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Choose any two poems in this chapter that express positive and negative feelings about their topics. How do the tones of the poems combine or contrast the feelings? Is there a shift in tone in each poem? If so, where? How is the shift revealed through language? Write an essay in which you compare the way each poet accomplishes this shifting of tone.
2. Write an essay in which you consider the use of language to create tone in any two or more poems on the same subject. How do the tones suit the themes of these poems?
3. Write an essay on Maxine Kumin's WOODCHUCKS in which you show that the speaker's conflict between sympathy and murderous instinct is reflected in the mixed tone and varied vocabulary. Focus on formal and informal tone, noting phrases from law or religion—"the case we had against them"; "fallen from grace" (lines 4, 15)—or from everyday speech—"up to scratch," "food from our mouths" (lines 9, 13). How does the diction, or word choice, of the poem affect its tone?

6. Greek god of fire and of craftsmen; his Latin name is Vulcan.

7. In other words, the messenger of the gods and god of merchants, thieves, and oratory in Greek mythology, not the high-end French retail chain famous for its luxury leather goods, perfume, and scarves.

8. Underworld or god of the Underworld in Greek mythology; his Latin name is Pluto.

9. Usually subprime mortgage, high-risk mortgage granted to a borrower with a lower credit rating than required for a conventional mortgage. Hedge-funder: someone who runs a high-risk, high-return portfolio of investments. Hound with three heads: According to Greek myth, the entrance to Hades is guarded by Cerberus, a monstrous dog with at least three heads.

1. Literally, toilet water (French), a form of perfume.

2. National Association of Securities Dealers Automated Quotations (acronym), American stock exchange that includes technology giants Apple, Google, Microsoft, and Amazon. Dow: Dow Jones Industrial Average, a calculation of the average price of a select group of significant stocks traded on the NASDAQ and the New York Stock Exchange.

4. Reimagine W. D. Snodgrass's LEAVING THE MOTEL as a poem in which the speaker and lover are happy and delighted with each other and certain that the relationship will last forever. What details and phrases would need to be changed for the poem to express a positive feeling about the relationship? Write an essay in which you relate the tone of the poem to the subject of secret and short-lived sexual relationships.
5. Write an essay exploring just who or what C. K. Williams seems to poke fun at in THE ECONOMY RESCUED BY MY MOTHER RETURNING TO SHOP. For all its humor, might the poem have a serious point or theme?

SAMPLE WRITING: RESPONSE PAPER

In the response paper that follows, Stephen Bordland works through Auden's poem STOP ALL THE CLOCKS, CUT OFF THE TELEPHONE more or less line by line, writing down whatever ideas come to him. The form of this paper is less important than the process of thinking carefully about the poem's music, emotions, and meanings. As you can see, by the time Stephen reaches the end of his response, he has decided on a topic for the more formal essay that he will write later.

Response Paper on Auden's "Stop all the clocks, cut off the telephone"

I first heard this poem read aloud when I saw the movie Four Weddings and a Funeral on cable. The character who read the poem was reading it at the funeral of his lover. It was perfectly suited to the story and was very moving. I was struck by the actor's reading because the poem seemed to have a steady rhythm for several lines and then suddenly hit what sounded like a dead end—"I thought that love would last forever: I was wrong" (line 12). Hearing the actor's reading of this poem made me want to read it myself, to see if the poem would still affect me if I read/heard it outside of the context of an emotional scene in a movie. It did, and I think that the "I was wrong" line is the key—a turning point, I guess.

In the anthology, the poem seems to have no actual title (at least that's how I interpret the fact that the first line is in brackets where the title usually goes), but I did some searching on the Internet and found that this poem was once called "Funeral Blues." If I were reading the poem for the first time under that title, I would at least know that the poem has something to do with death right from the start. But this title makes the poem sound irreverent rather than sincerely painful. I wonder if that would have been true in the 1930s, when Auden wrote the poem. There were lots of blues and jazz songs of that era whose titles ended in "Blues" (like Robert Johnson's "Kindhearted Woman Blues"), so maybe the title wasn't meant to be read the way that I'm reading it. Anyway, I don't know if Auden himself changed the title, or if there's another story there, but I think it's a better poem without the title.

The poem starts with a request to an unknown person (everyone?) to make some common aspects of daily life go away: “Stop all the clocks” (1) presumably because time seems to be standing still; “cut off the telephone” (1) presumably because the speaker wants to be alone and undisturbed, cut off from human contact. I’m not sure what’s implied by “Prevent the dog from barking with a juicy bone” (2) mainly because I’m confused about the literal meaning: Are we supposed to prevent the dog from barking by giving him a juicy bone (one way to interpret “with a juicy bone”), or are we supposed to prevent the dog with a juicy bone in his mouth (another way of interpreting “with a juicy bone”) from barking at all? I don’t think I really have a handle on what this line means in relation to the other ones, but I’ll leave it for now. In the next line, “Silence the pianos” (3) clearly means that the speaker wants no music now that his lover is dead, except for the “muffled drum” (3) that will accompany the coffin and mourners in the fourth line. It’s interesting that all of these things so far are sounds—the tick-tock of the clock, the ring of the telephone, a barking dog, music. They all seem to stand in for something, too—for the passing of time, contact with other people (and with pets?), joy as expressed by music.

The image of “aeroplanes” (5) circling overhead (and “moaning” [5]—that’s a really good choice of words) writing “He is Dead” (6) is very strong and would have been a very modern reference at the time of this poem (c. 1936). A Christian Science Monitor article about a “skywriting” pilot says that “[s]kywriting’s heyday was from the 1930s to the early 1950s when Pepsi Cola used skywriting as its main way of advertising” (Hartill), so the reference here is to a commercial medium being used to make as many people as possible aware of the speaker’s loss. If a poet tried to make a reference to something equivalent today, it would have to be a television advertisement or a blog, maybe. I wonder if a modern poet could really pull off a reference to a TV ad and still make it sound sincerely sad.

I’m not sure what the “crêpe bows round the white necks of the public doves” (7) means. Would the bows even be visible? Does “crêpe” imply a color, or is it just a type of fabric? And what is a public dove? I’m not sure I like the repetition in this line of three adjective/noun pairs: “crepe bows,” “white necks,” “public doves.” It seems too precious or “poetic.” The “traffic policemen” (8) that I’ve seen all wear white gloves so that their hand movements can be seen clearly. The speaker wants them all to wear “black cotton gloves,” the appropriate color for mourning, but that would probably create real problems for the drivers trying to see what the policemen are directing them to do. So, I wonder if the bows on doves and black gloves on cops are both there to show us that the speaker is feeling not just the sort of grief that moves him to write poetry, but also the sort of intense pain that makes him want to throw the rest of the world into the same confusion and chaos he’s experiencing. Or at least, he’s not only asking to be alone, but also wanting the rest of the world to share his grief.

In the next four lines, the speaker turns to himself and his lover: “He was my North, my South, my East and West / My working week and my Sunday rest” (9-12).

These lines flow so smoothly, with a soothing, regular rhythm; they're almost sing-songy. But they don't seem sappy or wrong in this poem; they seem painfully sincere. The author uses place (as described by the compass) and time (the whole week, the reference to noon and midnight) to make very clear, in case we hadn't figured it out from the preceding lines, that his lover was everything to him. In the fourth line of this section, this regular rhythm is interrupted, or even stopped dead: "I thought that love would last for ever: I was wrong" (12). This is a very true and moving conclusion to reach, but it also seems ironic, once we read to the end of the poem. If the speaker was wrong to believe (before the death of his lover) that love would last forever, isn't it possible that he's wrong about the conclusion "nothing now can ever come to any good" (16)—that grief will last forever?

I think that Auden probably intended us to be aware of this irony. It seems to me that the poem is broken into three major parts. First, we sympathize with the speaker's grief and sense of loss. Then we're supposed to stop at the point where the speaker makes a judgment about his understanding of the world prior to that loss ("I thought that love would last for ever: I was wrong" [12]) and to spend a moment absorbing the meaning of that judgment. Finally, as we read the most extreme expression of the speaker's loss ("Pack up the moon and dismantle the sun" [14]), we can see that although we sympathize and understand, we also know something that the speaker doesn't know at the moment. Just as his love apparently blinded the speaker to love's inevitable end, so his profound grief is probably blinding him to grief's inevitable end. Also, it may just be me, but it seems that this last part is almost too dramatic or theatrical, as if maybe the speaker has made some sort of transition from being unself-consciously mournful to being self-consciously aware that the way he's expressing himself is poetic.

Back to the idea about the irony: The poem itself seems to be arguing against the notion that love cannot last forever (or, okay, a very long time). After all, people are still reading this poem, and I bet people will continue to read it for as long as people read poetry. That's about as close to forever as we get on this earth, so even though the lovers of this poem are long dead, their love lives on, in a way. Auden must have been aware of this when he was writing the poem. I wonder if he ever said anything in letters, essays, or speeches about art and immortality? If so, I think I'll write a paper on that topic as addressed in this poem.

Families are the groundwork of society, and most people's earliest memories involve family members. Families may be nuclear or extended, biological or adoptive, emotionally demonstrative or distant. Families may pass down traditions that younger generations may choose to abandon, embrace, or simply tolerate. Adults who have left home may dwell on memories, good or bad, of their mothers, fathers, brothers, or sisters. Each renewed contact with family can spark conflicting thoughts and feelings. Hope, disappointment, or grief for one's child can find expression as a concentrated moment in a poem. A spouse or a child can remind the speaker of the passage of time and mortality.

Because the family is such a basic unit of social interaction, many poems explore family relations. The following poems are all, in different ways, about family. What do these poems have in common? How do they differ? Which best capture your feelings and ideas about family relationships? Can you find two poems that express the same theme—in other words, can you accurately state their themes in the same way? How do any two poems compare in tone? Which poems have surprising shifts in tone? Do any poems express surprising or disturbing attitudes toward loved ones?

My Father's Song

Wanting to say things,
I miss my father tonight.
His voice, the slight catch,
the depth from his thin chest,
5 the tremble of emotion in something he has just said
to his son, his song:

We planted corn one Spring at Acu¹—
we planted several times
10 but this one particular time
I remember the soft damp sand in my hand.

My father had stopped at one point to show me an overturned furrow;
15 the plowshare had unearthed the burrow nest of a mouse in the soft moist sand.

1. Alternative name for Acoma village and/or pueblo, about sixty miles west of Albuquerque, New Mexico. Sometimes translated as "the place that always was," it is the oldest continuously inhabited community in the United States.

Very gently, he scooped tiny pink animals into the palm of his hand
 20 and told me to touch them.
 We took them to the edge of the field and put them in the shade of a sand moist clod.

I remember the very softness
 25 of cool and warm sand and tiny alive mice and my father saying things.

- What are the “things” that the speaker wants to say (line 1)? Are they the same “things” he remembers his father saying (line 26)? Does the poem itself say these things?

Those Winter Sundays

Sundays too my father got up early and put his clothes on in the blueblack cold, then with cracked hands that ached from labor in the weekday weather made
 5 banked fires blaze. No one ever thanked him.

I'd wake and hear the cold splintering, breaking.
 When the rooms were warm, he'd call,
 and slowly I would rise and dress,

 who had driven out the cold and polished my good shoes as well.
 What did I know, what did I know

- How might the poem's form, especially its lack of punctuation and capitalization, contribute to tone? to its characterization of the speaker's mother?

2. See the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5.15–16): "Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light until all that are in the house. / Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

MARTÍN ESPADA

Of the Threads That Connect the Stars

Did you ever see stars? asked my father with a cackle. He was not speaking of the heavens, but the white flash in his head when a fist burst between his eyes. In Brooklyn, this would cause men and boys to slap the table with glee; this might be the only heavenly light we'd ever see.

- 5 I never saw stars. The sky in Brooklyn was a tide of smoke rolling over us from the factory across the avenue, the mattresses burning in the junkyard, the ruins where squatters would sleep, the riots of 1966⁵ that kept me locked in my room like a suspect. My father talked truce on the streets.

My son can see the stars through the tall barrel of a telescope.

- 10 He names the galaxies with the numbers and letters of astronomy.

I cannot see what he sees in the telescope, no matter how many eyes I shut.

I understand a smoking mattress better than the language of galaxies.

My father saw stars. My son sees stars. The earth rolls beneath our feet. We lurch ahead, and one day we have walked this far.

2013

- How does the poem differentiate and connect three generations of one family by describing the stars each did or didn't, do or don't, see?

EMILY GROSHOLZ

Eden

In lurid cartoon colors, the big baby dinosaur steps backwards under the shadow of an approaching tyrannosaurus rex.

- 5 "His mommy going to fix it," you remark, serenely anxious, hoping for the best.

- After the big explosion, after the lights go down inside the house and up the street, we rush outdoors to find a squirrel stopped in straws of half-gnawed cable. I explain, 10 trying to fit the facts, "The squirrel is dead."

No, you explain it otherwise to me.

"He's sleeping. And his mommy going to come."

Later, when the squirrel has been removed,

- 15 "His mommy fix him," you insist, insisting on the right to know what you believe.

5. In July 1966, violent conflict repeatedly erupted between blacks and Puerto Ricans in Brooklyn's troubled Bedford-Stuyvesant neighborhood.

The world is truly full of fabulous great and curious small inhabitants, and you're the freshly minted, unashamed
 Adam in this garden. You preside,
 20 appreciate, and judge our proper names.

Like God, I brought you here.
 Like God, I seem to be omnipotent, mostly helpful, sometimes angry as hell.
 I fix whatever minor faults arise
 25 with bandaids, batteries, masking tape, and pills.

But I am powerless, as you must know,
 to chase the serpent sliding in the grass,
 or the tall angel with the flaming sword who scares you when he rises suddenly 30 behind the gates of sunset.

This Be the Verse

They fuck you up, your mum and dad.
 They may not mean to, but they do.
 They fill you with the faults they had
 And add some extra, just for you.
 5 But they were fucked up in their turn
 By fools in old-style hats and coats,
 Who half the time were sippy-stern
 And half at one another's throats.
 Man hands on misery to man.
 10 It deepens like a coastal shelf.⁶
 Get out as early as you can,
 And don't have any kids yourself.

How does the rest of the poem either maintain or complicate that tone? How might the poem's sound qualities—especially its rhyme and/or meter—contribute to tone? To what extent is and/or isn't the poem's first line an adequate statement of its theme?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK
 PHILIP LARKIN (1922–85)

From “An Interview with John Haffenden” (1981)*

Was it your intention, in using bad language in one or two poems, to provide a shock tactic?

Yes. I mean, these words are part of the palette. You use them when you want to shock. I don't think I've ever shocked for the sake of shocking. “They fuck you up” is funny because it's ambiguous. Parents bring about your conception and also bugger you up once you are born. Professional parents in particular don't like that poem. (61)

 Red chile *ristras*⁷ decorate my door, historical grandeur, and gently swing with an air of festive welcome.

 I can hear them talking in the wind,
 haggard, yellowing, crisp, rasping
 10 tongues of old men, licking the breeze.
 But grandmother loves green chile.
 When I visit her,
 she holds the green chile pepper

 25 Its bearing magnificent and taut as flanks of a tiger in mid-leap, she thrusts her blade into
 as cuts it open, with lust

 30 bandanna round her forehead, mysterious passion on her face and she serves me green chile con carne between soft warm leaves of corn tortillas, with beans and rice—her sacrifice
 35 to her little prince.
 I slurp from my plate
 with last bit of tortilla, my mouth burns and I hiss and drink a tall glass of cold water.

All over New Mexico, sunburned men and women

The Abuelita⁹ Poem

I. Skin & Corn

Her brown skin glistens as the sun pours through the kitchen window like gold leche.¹ After grinding the nixtamal,² a word so beautifully ethnic 5 it must not only be italicized but underlined to let you, the reader, know you've encountered something beautifully ethnic, she kneads with the hands of centuries-old ancestor spirits who magically yet realistically possess her 10 until the masa is smooth as a lowrider's

II. Apology

Before she died I called my abuelita grandma. I cannot remember 20 if she made corn tortillas from scratch but, O, how she'd flip the factory fresh El Milagros³ (Quality Since 1950) on the burner, bathe them in butter

- How does this poem play on the expectations that might be created by its title? What does the poem ultimately seem to suggest about those expectations?

CHARLIE SMITH

The Business

My father and his brother didn't get along;
 for years they kept at it, sniping, digging out the ground under each other's feet;
 it was a life work more important
 5 than family, than community. My grandfather set them to it, yoked them into his business, struck one against the other to make sparks, raise a fire that would warm him.

My grandfather was a brilliant man;
 10 he knew what a son will do for a father's love,
 how success is a knife driven into the brother's chest, how one must pay with another's life for his own; he knew what a sure thing it was, this jealousy, 15 like a magic bread
 that doesn't run out,
 that will feed a man as long as he lives.

ANDREW HUDGINS

Begotten

I've never, as some children do, looked at my folks and thought, I must have come from someone else—rich parents who'd misplaced me, but 5 who would, as in a myth or novel, return and claim me. Hell, no. I saw my face in cousins' faces, heard my voice in their high drawls. And Sundays, after the dinner plates were cleared,
 10 I lingered, elbow propped on red oilcloth, and studied great-uncles, aunts, and cousins new to me. They squirmed.
 I stared till I discerned the features they'd gotten from the family larder:
 15 eyes, nose, lips, hair? I stared until, uncomfortable, they'd snap, “Hey, boy—what are you looking at? At me?”
 “No, sir,” I'd lie. “No, ma'am.” I'd count ten and then continue staring at them.
 20 I never had to ask, What am I?
 I stared at my blood-kin, and thought,
 So this, dear God, is what I am.

- What can you infer from the language in this poem about the speaker's attitude toward his life and his family? What does the poem's title evoke?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Compare the portrayal of the parent-child relationship in any two poems in this album, focusing especially on the poems' tones and themes.
2. What words in Robert Hayden's THOSE WINTER SUNDAYS suggest the son's feelings toward his father and his home? What words indicate that his attitudes have changed since the time depicted in the poem? Write an essay in which you compare the speaker's feelings, as a youth and then later as a man, about his father and his home.
3. Write an essay comparing the way grandmothers and their relationship to food and family are portrayed in Jimmy Santiago Baca's GREEN CHILE and Paul Martinez Pompa's THE ABUELITA POEM. How might Pompa's poem respond to and comment on Baca's?
4. Pick the poem in this album that you like most and the one you like least. Write an informal response paper or essay comparing your reactions to the two poems and exploring just why and how the poems provoke those disparate reactions. What role do the poem's tones and themes play here? What role is played by your own experiences of, and feelings and ideas about, family?

LANGUAGE: WORD CHOICE AND ORDER

Fiction and drama depend on language just as poetry does, but in a poem almost everything comes down to the particular meanings and implications, as well as sound and shape, of individual words. When we read stories and plays, we generally focus our attention on character and plot, and although words determine how we imagine those characters and how we respond to what happens to them, we are not as likely to pause over any one word as we may need to when reading a poem. Because poems are often short, much depends on every word in them. Sometimes, as though they were distilled prose, poems contain only the essential words. They say just barely enough to communicate in the most basic way, using elemental signs—each of which is chosen for exactly the right shade of meaning or feeling or both. But elemental does not necessarily mean simple, and these signs may be very rich in their meanings and complex in their effects. The poet's word choice—the diction of a poem—determines not only meaning but also just about every effect the poem produces.

PRECISION AND AMBIGUITY

Let's look first at poems that create some of their effects by examining—or playing with—a single word. Here, multiple meanings or the shiftiness, ambiguity, and uncertainty of a word are at issue. The following short poem, for example, depends almost entirely on the ways we use the word play.

SARAH CLEGHORN

[The golf links lie so near the mill]

The golf links lie so near the mill
 That almost every day
 The laboring children can look out
 And see the men at play.

1915

While traveling in the American South, Cleghorn had seen, right next to a golf course, a textile mill that employed quite young children. Her poem doesn't say that we expect men to work and children to play; it just assumes our expectation and builds an effect of dramatic irony—an incongruity between what we expect and what actually occurs—out of the observation. The poem saves almost all of its devastating effect for the final word, after the situation has been carefully described and the irony set up.

In the following poem, a word used over and over acquires multiple meanings and refuses to be limited to a single one. Here, the importance of a word involves its ambiguity (that is, its having more than one possible meaning) rather than its precision or exactness. How many different meanings of the words lie and lay can you distinguish in the poem?

MARTHA COLLINS

Lies

Anyone can get it wrong, laying low when she ought to lie, but is it a lie for her to say she laid him when we know he wouldn't lie still long enough to let 5 her do it? A good lay is not a song, not anymore; a good lie is something else: lyrics, lines, what if you say dear sister
 when you have no sister, what if you say guns
 when you saw no guns, though you know
 10 they're there? She laid down her arms; she lay down, her arms by her sides. If we don't know, do we lie if we say? If we don't say, do we lie down on the job? To arms! in any case
 dear friends. If we must lie, let's not lie around.

DENOTATION AND CONNOTATION

Although the unambiguous or “dictionary” meaning of words—that is, their denotation—is certainly important, words are more than hard blocks of meaning on whose sense everyone agrees. They also carry emotional force and shades of suggestion. The words we use indicate not only what we mean but how we feel about it and want to encourage others to feel. A person who holds office is, quite literally (and unemotionally), an officeholder—the word denotes what he or she does. But if we want to imply that a particular officeholder is wise, trustworthy, and deserving of political support, we may call that person a civil servant, a political leader, or an elected official, whereas if we want to promote distrust or contempt of that same officeholder we might say politician or bureaucrat or political hack. These terms have clear connotations—suggestions of emotional coloration that imply our attitude and invite a similar one from our hearers. In poems, as in life, what words connote can be just as important as what they denote; some poems work primarily through denotation and some more through connotation.

The following epitaph, for example, which describes one person's mixed feelings about another, depends heavily on the connotations of fairly common words.

WALTER DE LA MARE

Slim Cunning Hands

Slim cunning hands at rest, and cozening eyes—
 Under this stone one loved too wildly lies;
 How false she was, no granite could declare;
 Nor all earth's flowers, how fair.

What the speaker in SLIM CUNNING HANDS remembers about the dead woman—her hands, her eyes—tells part of the story; her physical presence was clearly important to him. The poem's other nouns—stone, granite, flowers—all remind us of her death and its finality. All these words denote objects having to do with the rituals that memorialize a departed life. Granite and stone connote finality as well, and flowers connote fragility and suggest the brevity of life (which is why they have become the symbolic language of funerals). The way the speaker talks about the woman expresses, in just a few words, the complexity of his love for her. She was loved, he says, too “wildly”—by him perhaps, and apparently by others. The excitement she offered is suggested by the word, as is the lack of control. The words cunning and cozening imply both her falsity and, perhaps, her wildness; they suggest her calculation, cleverness, and untrustworthiness as well as her skill, persuasiveness, and ability to please. Moreover, coming at the end of the second line, the word lies has more than one meaning. The body “lies” under the stone, but the woman's falsity has by now become too prominent to ignore as a second meaning. And the word fair, a simple yet very inclusive word, suggests how totally attractive the speaker finds her: Her beauty can no more be expressed by flowers than her fickleness can be expressed by something as permanent as words in stone. But the word fair, in the emphatic position as the final word, also implies two other meanings that seem to resonate, ironically, with what we have already learned about her from the speaker: “impartial” and “just.” “Impartial” she may be in her preferences (as the word false suggests), but to the speaker she is hardly “just,” and the final defining word speaks both to her appearance and (ironically) to her character. Simple words here tell us perhaps all we need to know of a long story—or at least the speaker's version of it.

Words like fair and cozening are clearly loaded. They imply more emotionally than they mean literally. They have strong, clear connotations; they tell us what to think, what evaluation to make; and they suggest the basis for the evaluation.

Sometimes word choice in poems is less dramatic and less obviously significant but equally important. Often, in fact, simple appropriateness makes the words in a poem work, and words that do not call special attention to themselves can be the most effective. Precision of denotation may be just as impressive and productive of specific effects as the resonance or ambiguous suggestiveness of connotation. Often poems achieve their power by a combination of verbal effects, setting off elaborate figures of speech or other complicated strategies with simple words chosen to indicate exact actions, moments, or states of mind.

Words are the starting point for all poetry, of course, and almost every word is likely to be significant, either denotatively or connotatively or both. Poets who know their craft pick each word with care to express exactly what needs to be expressed and to suggest every emotional shade that the poem is calculated to evoke in us.

Word Choice: An Example and an Exercise

Before you read the following poem, notice the three words in the title. What do they lead you to expect? What questions do they raise? Jot down your thoughts on a piece of paper. Then, as you read the poem, take note of key words and try to be conscious of the emotional effects and impressions they create.

THEODORE ROETHKE

My Papa's Waltz

The whiskey on your breath
 Could make a small boy dizzy;
 But I hung on like death:
 Such waltzing was not easy.

- 5 We romped until the pans
 Slid from the kitchen shelf;
 My mother's countenance
 Could not unfrown itself.

- The hand that held my wrist
 10 Was battered on one knuckle;
 At every step you missed
 My right ear scraped a buckle.

- You beat time on my head
 With a palm caked hard by dirt,
 15 Then waltzed me off to bed
 Still clinging to your shirt.

1948

Exactly how does the situation in MY PAPA'S WALTZ and the poem itself fulfill or defy your expectations? How does it answer your questions? How does it characterize the waltz and the speaker's feelings about it? Which words are most suggestive in these terms? What clues are there in the word choice that an adult is remembering a childhood experience? How scared was the boy at the time? How does the grown adult now evaluate the emotions he felt when he was a boy?

WORD ORDER AND PLACEMENT

Individual words qualify and amplify one another—suggestions clarify other suggestions, and meanings grow upon meanings—and thus how words are put together and where individual words are located matters. Notice, for example, that in “Slim Cunning Hands” the final emphasis is on how fair in appearance the woman was; the speaker's last word describes the quality he can't forget despite her lack of a different kind of fairness and his distrust of her. Even though it doesn't justify everything else, her beauty mitigates all the disappointment and hurt. Putting the word fair at the end of the line and of the poem gives it special emphasis and meaning.

That one word, fair, does not stand all by itself, however, any more than any other word in a poem can be considered all alone. Every word exists within larger units of meaning—sentences, patterns of comparison and contrast, the whole poem—and where the word is and how it is used are often important. The final word or words may be especially emphatic (as in “Slim Cunning Hands”), and words that are repeated take on a special intensity, as lie does in LIES. Certain words may stand out because they are unusual or used in an unusual way (like unfrown or waltzing in “My Papa’s Waltz”) or because they are given an artificial prominence—through unusual sentence structure, for example, or because the title calls special attention to them. In a poem, as opposed to a prose work, moreover, the number and placement of words in a line and the spacing of the words and lines stays the same in every printed version. Where words come—in a line, in a stanza—and how they are spatially and visually related to other words also helps determine their force and meaning.

The subtlety and force of word choice are sometimes strongly affected by syntax—the way the sentences are put together. When you find unusual syntax or spacing, you can be pretty sure that something there merits special attention. Notice the odd sentence constructions in the second and third stanzas of “My Papa’s Waltz”—the way the speaker talks about the abrasion of buckle on ear in line 12, for example. He does not say that the buckle scraped his ear, but rather “My right ear scraped a buckle.” Reversing the more common expression makes a big difference in the effect created; the speaker avoids placing blame and refuses to specify any unpleasant effect. Had he said that the buckle scraped his ear, we would have to worry about the fragile ear. The syntax channels our feeling and helps control what we think of the “waltz.”

In the most curious part of the poem, the second stanza, the silent mother appears, and the syntax on both sides of the semicolon is peculiar. In lines 5–6, the connection between the romping and the pans falling is stated oddly: “We romped until the pans / Slid from the kitchen shelf” (emphasis added). The speaker does not say that they knocked down the pans or imply awkwardness, but he does suggest energetic activity and duration. He implies intensity, almost intention—as though the romping would not be complete until the pans fell. And the clause about the mother—odd but effective—makes her position clear. A silent bystander in this male ritual, she doesn’t seem frightened or angry. She seems to be holding a frown, or to have it molded on her face, as though it were part of her own ritual, and perhaps a facet of her stern character as well. The syntax implies that she has to maintain the frown, and the falling of the pans almost seems to be for her benefit. She disapproves, but she remains their audience.

Sometimes poems create, as well, a powerful sense of the way minds and emotions work by varying normal syntactical order in special ways. Listen for and watch, for example, what happens a few lines into the following poem. What does it suggest about what is happening inside the speaker?

SHARON OLDS
Sex without Love

How do they do it, the ones who make love without love? Beautiful as dancers, gliding over each other like ice-skaters over the ice, fingers hooked
5 inside each other's bodies, faces red as steak, wine, wet as the children at birth whose mothers are going to give them away. How do they come to the come to the come to the God come to the 10 still waters, and not love the one who came there with them, light rising slowly as steam off their joined skin? These are the true religious, the purists, the pros, the ones who will not 15 accept a false Messiah, love the priest instead of the God. They do not mistake the lover for their own pleasure, they are like great runners: they know they are alone with the road surface, the cold, the wind, 20 the fit of their shoes, their over-all cardiovascular health—just factors, like the partner in the bed, and not the truth, which is the single body alone in the universe against its own best time.

The poem starts calmly enough, with a simple rhetorical question implying that the speaker just cannot understand sex without love. Lines 2–4 carefully compare such sexual activity with two other artful activities, and the speaker—although plainly disapproving—seems coolly in control of the analysis and evaluation. But by the end of the fourth line, something begins to seem odd: “[H]ooked” seems too ugly and extreme a way to characterize the lovers’ fingers, however much the speaker may disapprove, and by line 6 the syntax seems to break down. How does “wine” fit the syntax of the line? Is it parallel with “steak,” another example of redness? Or is it somehow related to the last part of the sentence, parallel with “faces”? Neither of these possibilities quite works. At best, the punctuation is inadequate; at worst, the speaker’s mind is working too fast for the language it generates, scrambling its images. We can’t yet be sure what is going on, but by the ninth line the lack of control is manifest with the compulsive repeating (three times) of “come to the” and the interjected “God.”

Such verbal behavior—here concretized by the way the poem orders its words and spaces them on the page—invites us to reevaluate the speaker’s moralizing relative to her emotional involvement with the issues and with her representation of sexuality itself. The speaker’s own values, as well as those who have sex without love, become a subject for evaluation.

SHARON OLDS (b. 1942)

From “Sharon Olds” (1996)*

I don't think that sex has been written about a lot in poetry. And I want to be able to write about any subject. There [. . .] are subjects that are probably a lot harder to write about than others. I think that love is almost the hardest thing to write about. Not a general state of being in love, but a particular love for a particular person. Just one's taste for that one. And if you look at all the love poetry in our tradition, there isn't much that helps us know why that one. I'm just interested in human stuff like hate, love, sexual love, and sex. I don't see why not. It just seems to me if writers can assemble, in language, something that bears any relation to experience—especially important experience, experience we care about, moving and powerful experience—then it is worth trying.

Words, the basic materials of poetry, come in many varieties and can be used in many different ways and in different—sometimes surprising—combinations. They are seldom simple or transparent, even when we know their meanings and recognize their syntactical combinations as ordinary and conventional. Carefully examining them, individually and collectively, is a crucial part of reading poems, and being able to ask good questions about the words that poems use and the way they use them is one of the most basic—and rewarding—skills a reader of poetry can develop.

Pied Beauty¹

Glory be to God for dappled things—

For skies of couple-color as a brinded² cow;

For rose-moles all in stipple³ upon trout that swim;

Fresh-firecoal chestnut-falls;⁴ finches' wings;

And all trades, their gear and tackle and trim.

From reading and commentary at Princeton University (1952)

I've [. . .] gotten some fame, but I should probably say notoriety, from a very brief little poem called "The Red Wheelbarrow." [. . .] I had a letter from a lady in Boston [. . .] that said, "I love it. It's perfectly wonderful. But what does it mean?" [audience laughs] In the first place, I say modestly it's a perfect poem [laughs] [. . .] It means just the same as the opening lines of [John Keats's] Endymion, "A thing of beauty is a joy forever." And so much depends upon it. But instead of saying "A thing of beauty," I say, "a red wheel / barrow // glazed with rain / water // beside the white / chickens." Isn't that beautiful?

From interview with John W. Gerber (1950)

WILLIAMS: It actually took place just as it [. . .] says here [in "This Is Just to Say"]. And my wife being out, I left a note for her just that way, and she replied very beautifully. Unfortunately, I lost it. [. . .] I think what she wrote was quite as good as this, a little more complex, but quite as good. Perhaps the virtue of this is its simplicity.

INTERVIEWER: Now, what I want to ask you about that [is], What makes that a poem?

WILLIAMS: In the first place, it's metrically absolutely regular. [. . . reads poem] So, dogmatically speaking, it has to be a poem because it goes that way, don't you see?

INTERVIEWER: Well, this goes against so many preconceived ideas of the poem, though, because it's the kind of thing that almost anybody might say.

WILLIAMS: Yes, because no one believes that poetry can exist in its own light. That's one of our immediate fallacies. [. . .] Imagine reading a poem in the American dialects, how impossible! That's the first hazard, that's the first hurdle. We have to get over that. [. . .] It can't be that we poor colonials, as we have been ever since the Revolution, we poor people who are not living in the centers of Europe can have anything happen in our lives important enough to be put down in words and given a form. But everything in our lives, if it's sufficiently authentic to our lives and touches us deeply enough, with a certain amount of feeling, is capable of being organized into a form which can be a poem. [. . .] Your wife, [. . .] the woman who's there with whom you are supposed to be in love and sometimes are [. . .] had these things saved for supper, and here you come along and raid it. Why, it's practically rape of the icebox, and there you are. So I think that's material for a poem. [laughs] That's a definite poem—without even writing it. But then if you can give it conventional metrical form, why [. . .] you're just simply superb, that's all. [laughs] You've done a great deed.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Choose one poem in this book in which a single word seems crucial to that poem's total effect and theme. Write an essay in which you work out carefully why and how that's the case.
2. Choose one poem in this book in which syntax (the order of words in sentences) or the placement of words on the page seems especially key to the poem's overall effect and meaning. Write an essay explaining how and why considering word order, in either or both of these senses, might change or deepen a reader's understanding of the poem.
3. Language is a topic of (as well as tool used in) Martha Collins's LIES, A. E. Stallings's SHOULD, WOULD, COULD, and even Kay Ryan's BLANDEUR. Write an essay exploring what any of these poems has to say about poetry or language and how word choice, order, and placement help the poem express or illustrate it.

3. In grammar, mood of verbs expressing a simple statement of fact.

4. Pregnant, distended with or full of.

5. In grammar, of or relating to a verb tense used to designate a continuing state or incomplete action, especially in the past, as in “We used to speak regularly” and “I was eating.”

VISUAL IMAGERY AND FIGURES OF SPEECH

The language of poetry is often visual and pictorial. Rather than depending primarily on abstract ideas and elaborate reasoning, poems depend more on concrete and specific words that create images in our minds. Poems thus help us see things afresh or feel them suggestively through our other physical senses, such as hearing or touch. Sound is, as we will see, a vital aspect of poetry. But most poems use the sense of sight to help us form, in our minds, visual impressions, images that communicate more directly than concepts. We “see” yellow leaves on a branch, a father and son waltzing precariously, or two lovers sitting together on the bank of a stream, so that our response begins from a vivid visual impression of exactly what is happening. Some people think that those media and arts that challenge the imagination of a hearer or reader—radio drama, for example, or poetry—allow us to respond more fully than those (such as television or theater) that actually show things more fully to our physical senses. Certainly these media leave more to our imagination, to our mind’s eye.

Poems are sometimes quite abstract—they can even be about abstractions like grandeur or history. But usually they are quite concrete in what they ask us to see. One reason is that they often begin in a poet’s mind with a picture or an image: of a person, a place, an event, or an object of observation. That image may be based on something the poet has actually seen but it may also be totally imaginary and only based on the “real world” in the sense that it draws on the poet’s sense of what the world is like. Even when a poet begins with an idea that draws on visual experience, however, the reader still has to imagine (through the poem’s words) an image, some person or thing or action that the poem describes. The poet must rely on words to help the reader to flesh out that mental image. In a sense, then, the reader becomes a visual artist, but the poet directs the visualization by evoking specific responses through words. How that happens can involve quite complicated verbal strategies—or even visual ones that draw on the possibilities of print (see ch. 18).

The languages of description are quite varied. The visual qualities of poetry result partly from the two aspects of poetic language described in chapter 13: on the one hand, the precision of individual words, and, on the other hand, precision’s opposite—the reach, richness, and ambiguity of suggestion that words sometimes accrue. Visualization can also derive from sophisticated rhetorical and literary devices (figures of speech, for example, as we will see later in this chapter). But often description begins simply with naming—providing the word (noun, verb, adjective, or adverb) that will trigger images familiar from a reader’s own experience. A reader can readily imagine a dog or cat or house or flower when each word is named, but not all readers will envision the same kind of dog or flower until the word is qualified in some way. So the poet may specify that the dog is a greyhound or poodle, or that the flower is a daffodil or a lilac or Queen Anne's lace; or the poet may indicate colors, sizes, specific movements, or particular identifying features. Such description can involve either narrowing by category or expanding through detail, and often comparisons are either explicitly or implicitly involved. Notice how this works in the two following poems. In the first, Richard Wilbur's THE BEAUTIFUL CHANGES, for example, the comparison between wading through flowers in a meadow and wading among waves in the sea both suggests how the first experience feels and etches it visually in our minds. More than just a matter of naming, using precise words, and providing basic information, description involves qualification and comparison. Sometimes, as in the second poem below, the poet needs to tell us what not to picture, dissociating what the poem describes from other possible images we may have in mind. Different features in the language of description add up to something that describes a whole—a picture or scene—as well as a series of individualized objects.

Seeing in the mind's eye—the re-creation of visual experience—requires different skills from poets and readers. Poets use all the linguistic strategies they can think of to re-create for us something they have already “seen.” Poets depend on our having had a rich variety of visual experiences and try to draw on those experiences by using common, evocative words and then refining the process through more elaborate verbal devices. We as readers inhabit the process the other way around, trying to draw on our previous knowledge so that we can “see” by following verbal clues. In the poems that follow, notice the ways that description inspires specific images, and pay attention to how shape, color, relationship, and perspective become clear, not only through individual words but also through combinations of words and phrases that suggest appearance and motion.

RICHARD WILBUR The Beautiful Changes

One wading a Fall meadow finds on all sides
 The Queen Anne's Lace¹ lying like lilies
 On water; it glides
 So from the walker, it turns
 5 Dry grass to a lake, as the slightest shade of you
 Valleys my mind in fabulous blue Lucernes.²

The beautiful changes as a forest is changed
 By a chameleon's tuning his skin to it;
 As a mantis, arranged
 10 On a green leaf, grows
 Into it, makes the leaf leafier, and proves
 Any greenness is deeper than anyone knows.

Your hands hold roses always in a way that says
 They are not only yours; the beautiful changes

1. Plant sometimes called “wild carrot,” with delicate, fingerlike leaves and flat clusters of small white flowers.

2. Alfalfa, a plant resembling clover, with small purple flowers. Lake Lucerne is famed for its deep blue color and picturesque Swiss setting amid limestone mountains.

15 In such kind ways,
 Wishing ever to sunder
 Things and things' selves for a second finding, to lose
 For a moment all that it touches back to wonder.

1947

- What part of speech is “Beautiful” in the poem’s title and lines 7 and 14? What part of speech is “Changes”? What is meant by “the beautiful changes / In such kind ways” (lines 14–15)?

LYNN POWELL

Kind of Blue

Not Delft or delphinium, not Wedgewood³
 among the knickknacks, not wide-eyed chicory evangelizing in the devil strip—

5 But way on down in the moonless octave below midnight, honey, way down where you can’t tell cerulean from teal.

Not Mason jars of moonshine, not waverings of silk, not the long-legged hunger 10 of a heron or the peacock’s iridescent id—

 But Delilahs⁴ of darkness, darling, and the muscle of the mind giving in.

15 Not sullen snow slumped against the garden, not the first instinct of flame, not small, stoic ponds, or the cold derangement of a jealous sea—

20 But bluer than the lips of Lazarus, baby, before Sweet Jesus himself could figure out what else in the world to do but weep.

2004

- How does this poem help us envision a certain “kind of blue” by creating images of what it isn’t? How do the images develop over the course of the poem?

3. Wedgewood pottery, often of a distinctive blue, manufactured by a company founded in England. Delft: city in southern Holland renowned for the manufacture of ceramics.

4. Perhaps an allusion to the biblical Delilah, who conspired with the rulers of Philistine to destroy Samson’s strength by seducing him and cutting off his hair.

METAPHOR

Being visual does not just mean describing; telling us facts; indicating shapes, colors, and specific details. Often the vividness of the picture in our minds depends on comparisons made through figures of speech. What we are trying to imagine is pictured in terms of something else familiar to us, and we are asked to think of one thing as if it were something else. Many such comparisons, in which something is pictured or figured forth in terms of something already familiar to us, are taken for granted in daily life. Things we can't see or that aren't familiar to us are imaged as things we already know; for example, God is said to be like a father; Italy is said to be shaped like a boot; life is compared to a forest, a journey, or a sea. When the comparison is implicit, describing something as if it were something else, it is called a metaphor.

In the poem that follows, the poet helps us visualize old age and approaching death by making comparisons with familiar things—the coming of winter, the approach of sunset, and the dying embers of a fire.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

[That time of year thou mayst in me behold]

- That time of year thou mayst in me behold
 When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
 Bare ruined choirs, where late the sweet birds sang.
 5 In me thou see'st the twilight of such day
 As after sunset fadeth in the west;
 Which by and by⁵ black night doth take away,
 Death's second self,⁶ that seals up all in rest.
 In me thou see'st the glowing of such fire,
 10 That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
 As the deathbed whereon it must expire,
 Consumed with that which it was nourished by.
 This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
 To love that well which thou must leave ere long.

1609

The first four lines of THAT TIME OF YEAR evoke images of the late autumn, but notice that the poet does not have the speaker say directly that his physical condition and age make him resemble autumn. He draws the comparison without stating it as a comparison: You can see my own state, he says, in the coming of winter, when almost all the leaves have fallen from the trees. The speaker portrays himself indirectly by talking about the passing of the year. The poem uses metaphor; that is, one thing is pictured as if it were something else. “That time of year” goes on to another metaphor in lines 5–8 and still another in lines 9–12, and each metaphor contributes to our understanding of the speaker's sense of his old age and approaching death. More important, however, is the way the metaphors give us feelings, an emotional sense of the speaker's age and of his own attitude toward aging. Through the metaphors we come to understand, appreciate, and to some extent share the increasing sense of urgency that the poem expresses. Our emotional sense of the poem depends largely on the way each metaphor is developed and by the way each metaphor leads, with its own kind of internal logic, to another, even as later metaphors build on earlier ones. Look back at the poem. What does each metaphor contribute?

“That time of year” represents an unusually intricate use of images to organize a poem and focus its emotional impact. Not all poems depend on such a full and varied use of metaphor. Sometimes rather than accumulating metaphors, a poet presents a single metaphor that extends over a section of a poem (in which case it is called an extended metaphor) or even over the whole poem (in which case it is called a controlling metaphor). The following poem depends from the beginning—even from its title—on a single controlling metaphor.

LINDA PASTAN

Marks

My husband gives me an A for last night's supper,
 an incomplete for my ironing,
 a B plus in bed.
 5 My son says I am average,
 an average mother, but if
 I put my mind to it
 I could improve.
 My daughter believes
 10 in Pass/Fail and tells me
 I pass. Wait 'til they learn
 I'm dropping out.

1978

The speaker in MARKS is obviously less than pleased with the idea of continually being judged, and the metaphor of marks (or grades) as a way of talking about her performance of family duties suggests her irritation. The list of the roles implies the many things expected of her, and the three different systems of marking (letter grades, categories to be checked off on a chart, and pass/fail) detail the difficulties of multiple standards. The poem retains the language of schooldays all the way to the end (“learn,” line 11; “dropping out,” line 12), and the major effect of the poem depends on the irony of the speaker’s surrendering to the metaphor the family has thrust upon her; if she is to be judged as if she were a student, she retains the right to leave the system. Ironically, she joins the system (adopts the metaphor for herself) in order to defeat it.

PERSONIFICATION

Another figure of speech, personification, involves treating an abstraction, such as death or justice or beauty, as if it were a person. When “That time of year” talks about the coming of night and of sleep, for example, Sleep is personified as the “second self” of Death (that is, as a kind of “double” for death [line 8]). If personification in this poem is a brief gesture, it proves much more obvious and central in the following poem, though in this case, too, it is death that the poet personifies. How so, and with what implications and effects?

EMILY DICKINSON

[Because I could not stop for Death—]

Because I could not stop for Death—
He kindly stopped for me—
The Carriage held but just Ourselves—
And Immortality.

- 5 We slowly drove—He knew no haste
And I had put away
My labor and my leisure too,
For His Civility—

- We passed the School, where Children strove
10 At Recess—in the Ring—
We passed the Fields of Gazing Grain—
We passed the Setting Sun—

- Or rather—He passed Us—
The Dews drew quivering and chill—
15 For only Gossamer,⁷ my Gown—
My Tippet—only Tulle⁸—

- We paused before a House that seemed
A Swelling of the Ground—
The Roof was scarcely visible—
20 The Cornice—in the Ground—

Since then—’tis Centuries—and yet
Feels shorter than the Day
I first surmised the Horses’ Heads
Were toward Eternity—

c. 1863

- What vision of death and the afterlife is implied by the way death is personified and characterized in the poem? by the details the speaker offers about the carriage ride she takes with him?

SIMILE AND ANALOGY

Sometimes, in poetry as in prose, comparisons are made explicitly, as in the following poem.

7. Soft, sheer fabric. 8. Fine net fabric. Tippet: shawl.

ROBERT BURNS

A Red, Red Rose

O, my luvè's like a red, red rose
That's newly sprung in June.
O, my luvè is like the melodie
That's sweetly played in tune.

5 As fair art thou, my bonnie lass,
So deep in luvè am I;
And I will luvè thee still, my dear,
Till a' the seas gang⁹ dry.

Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
10 And the rocks melt wi' the sun;
And I will luvè thee still, my dear,
While the sands o' life shall run.

And fare thee weel, my only luvè,
And fare thee weel a while!
15 And I will come again, my luvè,
Though it were ten thousand mile.

1796

The first four lines make two explicit comparisons: The speaker says that his love is “like a [. . .] rose” (line 1) and “like [a] melodie” (line 3). Such explicit comparisons are called similes, and usually (as here) the comparison involves the word like or the word as. Similes work much as do metaphors, except that usually they are used more passingly, more incidentally; they make a quick comparison and usually do not elaborate. The two similes in A RED, RED ROSE assume that we already have a favorable opinion of roses and of melodies. Here the poet does not develop the comparison or even remind us of attractive details about roses or tunes. He pays the quick compliment and moves on.

Similes sometimes develop more elaborate comparisons than this and occasionally, as in the poem below, even govern a poem (in which case they are called analogies).

My Love for You Is So Embarrassingly

grand . . . would you mind terribly, my groundling,¹

AMIT MAJMUDAR

Dothead

Well yes, I said, my mother wears a dot.
 I know they said “third eye” in class, but it’s not an eye eye, not like that. It’s not some freak third eye that opens on your forehead like 5 on some Chernobyl baby.⁴ What it means is, what it’s showing is, there’s this unseen eye, on the inside. And she’s marking it.
 It’s how the X that says where treasure’s at is not the treasure, but as good as treasure.—
 10 All right. What I said wasn’t half so measured.
 In fact, I didn’t say a thing. Their laughter had made my mouth go dry. Lunch was after World History; that week was India—myths, caste system, suttee,⁵ all the Greatest Hits.
 15 The white kids I was sitting with were friends, at least as I defined a friend back then.
 So wait, said Nick, does your mom wear a dot?
 I nodded, and I caught a smirk on Todd—
 She wear it to the shower? And to bed?—
 20 while Jesse sucked his chocolate milk and Brad was getting ready for another stab.
 I said, Hand me that ketchup packet there.
 And Nick said, What? I snatched it, twitched the tear, and squeezed a dollop on my thumb and worked 25 circles till the red planet entered the house of war and on my forehead for the world to see my third eye burned those schoolboys in their seats, their flesh in little puddles underneath,
 pale pools where Nataraja⁶ cooled his feet.

What Is the Zoo for What

The word “zoo” is a zoo for the zoo.
 A fountain is a zoo for water, the song is a zoo for sound, the harmonica

4. That is, a baby born with birth defects as a result of the explosion that occurred in April 1986 at the Chernobyl Nuclear Power Plant in Ukraine.

5. Custom of a Hindu widow voluntarily being cremated on her husband’s funeral pyre.

6. The Lord of Dancers, an avatar of the Hindu god Shiva, whose ecstatic twirling expresses the cyclic energy of the universe.

is a zoo for the hot breath of Neil Young,⁷ vagina is a zoo for baby.

5 Baby, girl baby, is a zoo for vagina.

The rose is a zoo for the smell of the rose,
the smell of the rose rattles its cage,
the zookeeper throws something bleeding to it, the something bleeding is not enough, 10 a toddler fell into the cage of the rose,
the toddler was entirely eaten. His name was Rilke,⁸ it was in all the papers.
A Little Pine Box is a zoo for him now,
it said in all the papers.

Then all the kids started doing it. Falling 15 into the violet's cage, approaching the cave where the smell of violets slept, getting their whole head clawed off by it.
Neil Young did it to a buttercup and his face got absolutely mauled.

20 The music that was piped into the zoo let all the longing escape from it and it ran riot over the earth, full of the sight of the smell of a buttercup rearranging the face of Neil Young, 25 attacking pets at random, attacking me in my bed as I slept, attacking the happy wagging ends of my poems.

Can I put Neil Young in a poem.
Will he get trapped in there forever.

30 My voice is a zoo right now for this,
and this paces very much inside it,
it would like very much to escape and eat hot blood again and go home, and right down to the restless way
35 I walk I am an argument against zoos.

Zoo is very cruel. Let everything out and live in the wild. Let it hunt for itself

7. Influential Canadian singer-songwriter, musician, and activist (b. 1945); though he is primarily known as a guitarist, Young's only number-one hit, "Heart of Gold" (1972), features one of rock's best-known harmonica solos.

8. Rainer Maria Rilke (1875–1926), one of history's most famous and influential German-language poets, known especially for lyrics relying on intensely physical imagery and symbolism. According to one biographer (E. M. Butler), "There is no doubt that roses," in particular, "cast a spell upon Rilke," whose "roses were always explicitly in enclosed spaces: in death-bed chambers, in his study at night, in rose-bowls, bringing summer into a room."

All figurative language involves an attempt to clarify something and to prompt readers to feel a certain way about it. Saying that one's love is like a rose implies a delicate and fragile beauty and invites our senses into play so that we can share sensuously a response to appealing fragrance and soft touch, just as the shivering boughs and dying embers in "That time of year" suggest separation and loss at the same time that they invite us to share both the cold sense of loneliness and the warmth of old friendship.

Once you start looking for them, you will find figures of speech in poem after poem; they are among the most common devices through which poets share their visions with us.

POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

[Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?]

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
 Thou art more lovely and more temperate.
 Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
 And summer's lease hath all too short a date.
 5 Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
 And often is his gold complexion dimmed;
 And every fair from fair sometime declines,
 By chance or nature's changing course untrimmed.
 But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
 10 Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow'st,
 Nor shall Death brag thou wand'rest in his shade,
 When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st.
 So long as men can breathe or eyes can see,
 So long lives this,⁹ and this gives life to thee.

1609

- What sort of promise does the speaker make with this poem? Why can he boast that "thy eternal summer shall not fade" (line 9)?

9. This poem.

The Twenty-Third Psalm

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.
 He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters.
 He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.
 Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death,
 I will fear no evil: for thou art with me;
 thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.
 5 Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies:
 thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.
 Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life:
 and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.

- What is the controlling metaphor in this poem? At what point in the psalm does the controlling metaphor shift?

JOHN DONNE

[Batter my heart, three-personed God]²

Batter my heart, three-personed God; for You
 As yet but knock, breathe, shine, and seek to mend;
 That I may rise and stand, o'erthrow me, and bend
 Your force, to break, blow, burn, and make me new.
 5 I, like an usurped town, to another due,
 Labor to admit You, but Oh, to no end!
 Reason, Your viceroy³ in me, should defend,
 But is captived, and proves weak or untrue.
 Yet dearly I love You, and would be loved fain,⁴
 10 But am betrothed unto Your enemy:
 Divorce me, untie or break that knot again,
 Take me to You, imprison me, for I,
 Except You enthrall me, never shall be free,
 Nor ever chaste, except You ravish me.

1633

- In the poem's controlling metaphor, who is the speaker? Who, or what, is God? To whom is the speaker "betrothed" (line 10)?

1. Traditionally attributed to King David. This English translation is from the King James Version of the Bible (1611).

2. From the sequence Holy Sonnets.

3. One who rules as the representative of someone of higher rank. 4. Gladly.

RANDALL JARRELL

The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner⁵

From my mother's sleep I fell into the State,
 And I hunched in its belly till my wet fur froze.
 Six miles from earth, loosed from its dream of life,
 I woke to black flak and the nightmare fighters.
 5 When I died they washed me out of the turret with a hose.
 1945

- What is meant by “I fell into the State (line 1)”? What do the words “sleep,” “dream,” and “nightmare” (lines 1, 3, 4) suggest about the situation?

JOHN BREHM

Sea of Faith

Once when I was teaching “Dover Beach”⁶ to a class of freshmen, a young woman raised her hand and said “I’m confused about this ‘Sea of Faith.’” “Well,” I said, 5 “let’s talk about it. We probably need to talk a bit about figurative language.
 What confuses you about it?”
 “I mean, is it a real sea?” she asked.
 “You mean, is it a real body of water
 10 that you could point to on a map or visit on a vacation?”
 “Yes,” she said. “Is it a real sea?”
 Oh Christ, I thought, is this where we are?
 Next year I’ll be teaching them the alphabet
 15 and how to sound words out.
 I’ll have to teach them geography, apparently,
 before we can move on to poetry.
 I’ll have to teach them history, too—
 a few weeks on the Dark Ages might be instructive.
 20 “Yes,” I wanted to say, “it is.
 It is a real sea. In fact it flows right into the Sea of Ignorance
 IN WHICH YOU ARE DROWNING.
 Let me throw you a Rope of Salvation
 25 before the Sharks of Desire gobble you up.

5. A ball turret was a Plexiglas sphere set into the belly of a B-17 or B-24 [airplane] and inhabited by two .50 caliber machine-guns and one man, a short small man. When this gunner tracked with his machine-guns a fighter attacking his bomber from below, he revolved with the turret; hunched upside-down in his little sphere, he looked like the foetus in the womb. The fighters which attacked him were armed with cannon firing explosive shells. The hose was a steam hose [Jarrell’s note].

6. Famous and widely taught poem by Matthew Arnold (1822–88), published in 1867 and included in this anthology.

Let me hoist you back up onto this Ship of Fools so that we might continue our search for the Fountain of Youth. Here, take a drink of this. It's fresh from the River of Forgetfulness.”

30 But of course I didn't say any of that.
 I tried to explain in such a way as to protect her from humiliation, tried to explain that poets
 often speak of things that don't exist.

35 It was only much later that I wished
 I could have answered differently, only after I'd betrayed myself and been betrayed that I wished it was true, wished there really was a Sea of Faith

40 that you could wade out into, dive under its blue and magic waters, hold your breath, swim like a fish down to the bottom, and then emerge again able to believe in everything, faithful

45 and unafraid to ask even the simplest of questions, happy to have them simply answered.

2004

- When and how does the speaker's attitude toward the student and her question seem to change? How does figurative language figure in the initial conflict and its resolution?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Choose any poem in this chapter and explore the meaning and effect of its metaphor(s). Does the poem make use of an extended or controlling metaphor or of multiple metaphors? If the latter, how do the metaphors relate to and build on each other?
2. Choose any poem in this book that uses personification and write an essay exploring how this figure of speech contributes both to the emotional effect of the poem and its theme(s). (In addition to the Emily Dickinson poem in this chapter, other good options include Jimmy Santiago Baca's GREEN CHILE, John Keats's To AUTUMN, and John Donne's DEATH, BE NOT PROUD.)
3. Research the design of World War II bombers like the B-17 and the B-24. Try to find a picture of the gunner in the ball turret of such an airplane, and note carefully his body position. Write an essay in which you explain how Randall Jarrell's THE DEATH OF THE BALL TURRET GUNNER uses visual details to create its fetal and birth metaphors.
4. Look online for the lyrics to some of your favorite songs and identify the figures of speech used in each. Write an essay explaining which of these figures seem the most creative and effective, and why.
5. Choose any poem in this book that relies on at least one allusion to something or someone initially unfamiliar to you. After researching whatever the poem alludes to, write an informal response paper or essay exploring how the poem works and means differently to an informed reader.

SYMBOL

Properly used, the term symbol suggests one of the most basic things about poems—their ability to get beyond what words signify and to make larger claims about meanings in the verbal world. All words go beyond themselves. They are not simply a collection of sounds: They signify something beyond their sounds, often things or actions or ideas. Words describe not only a verbal universe but also a world in which actions occur, acts have implications, and events have meaning. Sometimes words signify something beyond themselves, say, rock or tree or cloud, and symbolize something as well, such as solidity or life or dreams. Words can—when their implications are agreed on by tradition, convention, or habit—stand for things beyond their most immediate meanings or significations and become symbols, and even simple words that have accumulated no special power from previous use may be given special significance in special circumstances—in poetry as in life itself.

A symbol is, put simply, something that stands for something else. The everyday world is full of common examples; a flag, a logo, a trademark, or a skull and crossbones all suggest things beyond themselves, and everyone likely understands what their display indicates, whether or not each viewer shares a commitment to what is thus represented. In common usage a prison symbolizes confinement, constriction, and loss of freedom, and in specialized traditional usage a cross may symbolize oppression, cruelty, suffering, death, resurrection, triumph, or an intersection of some kind (as in crossroads and crosscurrents). The specific symbolic significance depends on the context; for example, a reader might determine significance by looking at contiguous details in a poem and by examining the poem's attitude toward a particular tradition or body of beliefs. A star means one thing to a Jewish poet and something else to a Christian poet, still something else to a sailor or an actor. In a very literal sense, words themselves are all symbols (they stand for objects, actions, or qualities, not just for letters or sounds), but symbols in poetry are those words and phrases that have a range of reference beyond their literal signification or denotation.

THE INVENTED SYMBOL

Poems sometimes create a symbol out of a thing, action, or event that has no previously agreed-upon symbolic significance. Such a symbol is sometimes called an invented symbol. The following poem, for example, gives an action symbolic significance.

JAMES DICKEY

The Leap

The only thing I have of Jane MacNaughton
 Is one instant of a dancing-class dance.
 She was the fastest runner in the seventh grade,
 My scrapbook says, even when boys were beginning
 5 To be as big as the girls,
 But I do not have her running in my mind,
 Though Frances Lane is there, Agnes Fraser,
 Fat Betty Lou Black in the boys-against-girls
 Relays we ran at recess: she must have run
 10 Like the other girls, with her skirts tucked up
 So they would be like bloomers,
 But I cannot tell; that part of her is gone.
 What I do have is when she came,
 With the hem of her skirt where it should be 15 For a young lady, into the annual dance
 Of the dancing class we all hated, and with a light
 Grave leap, jumped up and touched the end
 Of one of the paper-ring decorations
 To see if she could reach it. She could,
 20 And reached me now as well, hanging in my mind
 From a brown chain of brittle paper, thin
 And muscular, wide-mouthed, eager to prove Whatever it proves when you leap
 In a new dress, a new womanhood, among the boys
 25 Whom you easily left in the dust
 Of the passionless playground. If I said I saw
 In the paper where Jane MacNaughton Hill,
 Mother of four, leapt to her death from a window
 Of a downtown hotel, and that her body crushed-in 30 The top of a parked taxi, and that I held Without trembling a picture of her lying cradled
 In that papery steel as though lying in the grass,
 One shoe idly off, arms folded across her breast,
 I would not believe myself. I would say
 35 The convenient thing, that it was a bad dream
 Of maturity, to see that eternal process
 Most obsessively wrong with the world
 Come out of her light, earth-spurning feet
 Grown heavy: would say that in the dusty heels
 40 Of the playground some boy who did not depend
 On speed of foot, caught and betrayed her.
 Jane, stay where you are in my first mind:
 It was odd in that school, at that dance.

I and the other slow-footed yokels sat in corners
 45 Cutting rings out of drawing paper

Before you leapt in your new dress
 And touched the end of something I began,
 Above the couples struggling on the floor,
 New men and women clutching at each other 50 And prancing foolishly as bears: hold on
 To that ring I made for you, Jane—
 My feet are nailed to the ground
 By dust I swallowed thirty years ago—
 While I examine my hands.

1967

Memory is crucial to THE LEAP. The fact that Jane MacNaughton's graceful leap in dancing class has stuck in the speaker's mind all these years means that this leap was important to him, meant something to him, stood for something in his mind. For the speaker, the leap is an "instant" and the "only thing" he has of Jane (lines 2, 1). He remembers its grace and ease, and he struggles at several points to articulate its meaning (lines 16–26, 44–50), but even without articulation or explanation it remains in his head as a visual memory, a symbol of something beyond himself, something he cannot do, something he wanted to be. What that leap stood for, or symbolized, was boldness, confidence, accomplishment, maturity, Jane's ability to go beyond her fellow students in dancing class—the transcending of childhood by someone entering adulthood. Her feet now seem "earth-spurning" (line 38) in that original leap, and they separate her from everyone else. Jane MacNaughton was beyond the speaker's abilities and any attempt he could make to articulate his hopes, but she was not beyond his dreams. And even before he could say so, she symbolized a dream.

The leap to her death seems cruelly wrong and ironic after the grace of her earlier leap. In memory she is suspended in air, as if there were no gravity, no coming back to earth, as if life could exist as dream. And so the photograph, re-created in precise detail, is a cruel dashing of the speaker's dream—a detailed record of the ending of a leap, a denial of the suspension in which his memory had held her. His dream is grounded; her mortality is insistent. But the speaker still wants to hang on to that symbolic moment (line 42), which he confronts in a more mature context but will never altogether replace or surrender.

The leap is ultimately symbolic in the poem, too, not just in the speaker's mind. In the poem (and for us as readers) its symbolism is double: The first leap symbolizes aspiration, and the second symbolizes the frustration and grounding of high hopes; the two are complementary, one impossible to imagine without the other. The poem is horrifying in some ways, a dramatic reminder that human beings don't ultimately transcend their mortality, their limits, no matter how heroic or unencumbered by gravity they may once have seemed. But the poem is not altogether sad and despairing, partly because it still affirms the validity of the original leap and partly because it creates and elaborates another symbol: the paper chain.

The chain connects Jane to the speaker both literally and figuratively. It is, in part, his paper chain that she had leaped to touch in dancing class (lines 18–19), and he thinks of her first leap as "touch[ing] the end of something I began" (line 47).

He and the other earthbound, “slow-footed yokels” (line 44) made the chain, and it connects them to her original leap, just as a photograph glimpsed in the newspaper connects the speaker to her second leap. And so the paper chain becomes the poem’s symbol of linkage, connecting lower accomplishment to higher possibility, the artisan to the artist, material substance to the act of imagination. At the end the speaker examines the hands that made the chain because those hands certify his connection to her and to the imaginative leap she had made for him. The chain thus symbolizes not only the lower capabilities of those who cannot leap like the budding Jane could, but also (later) the connection with her leap as both transcendence and mortality.

Like the leap, the chain is elevated to special meaning, given symbolic significance, only by the poet’s treatment of it. A leap and a chain have no necessary significance in themselves to most of us—at least no significance that we have all agreed upon—but they may take on significance in specific circumstances or a specific text.

THE TRADITIONAL SYMBOL

Other objects and acts have a built-in significance because of past usage in literature, or tradition, or the stories a culture develops to explain itself and its beliefs. Such things have acquired an agreed-upon significance, an accepted value in our minds. They already stand for something before the poet cites them; they are traditional symbols. Poets assume that their readers will recognize the traditional meanings of these symbols, and the poem does not have to propose or argue a particular symbolic value. Birds, for example, traditionally symbolize flight, freedom from confinement, detachment from earthbound limits, the ability to soar beyond rationality and transcend mortal limits. Traditionally, birds have also been linked with imagination, especially poetic imagination, and poets often identify with them as pure and ideal singers of songs.

One traditional symbol, the rose, may be a simple and fairly plentiful flower in its season, but it has so long stood for particular qualities that merely to name it creates predictable expectations. Its beauty, delicacy, fragrance, shortness of life, and depth of color have made it a symbol of the transitoriness of beauty, and countless poets have counted on its accepted symbolism—sometimes to compliment a friend (as Burns does in A RED, RED ROSE) or sometimes to make a point about the nature of symbolism. The following poem draws, in quite a traditional way, on the traditional meanings.

EDMUND WALLER

Song

Go, lovely rose!
 Tell her that wastes her time and me
 That now she knows,
 When I resemble¹ her to thee,
 5 How sweet and fair she seems to be.

1. Compare.

Tell her that's young,
 And shuns to have her graces spied,
 That hadst thou sprung
 In deserts, where no men abide,
 10 Thou must have uncommended died.

Small is the worth
 Of beauty from the light retired;
 Bid her come forth,
 Suffer herself to be desired,
 15 And not blush so to be admired.

Then die! that she
 The common fate of all things rare
 May read in thee;
 How small a part of time they share
 20 That are so wondrous sweet and fair!

The speaker in SONG sends the rose to his love in order to have it speak its traditional meanings of beauty and transitoriness. He counts on accepted symbolism to make his point and hurry her into accepting his advances. Likewise, the poet does not elaborate or argue these things because he does not need to; he counts on the familiarity of the tradition (though, of course, readers unfamiliar with the tradition will not respond in the same way—that is one reason it is difficult to fully appreciate texts from another linguistic or cultural tradition).

Poets may use traditional symbols to invoke predictable responses—in effect using shortcuts to meaning by repeating acts of signification sanctioned by time and cultural habit. But often poets examine the tradition even as they employ it, and sometimes they revise or reverse meanings built into the tradition. Symbols do not necessarily stay the same over time, and poets often turn even the most traditional symbols to their own original uses. Knowing the traditions of poetry—reading a lot of poems and observing how they tend to use certain words, metaphors, and symbols—can be very useful in reading new poems, but traditions evolve, and individual poems do highly individual things. Knowing the past never means being able to interpret new texts with certainty. Symbolism makes things happen, but individual poets and texts determine what will happen and how. How does the following poem both draw and comment on the traditional symbolism of roses?

DOROTHY PARKER

One Perfect Rose

A single flow'r he sent me, since we met.
 All tenderly his messenger he chose;
 Deep-hearted, pure, with scented dew still wet—
 One perfect rose.

5 I knew the language of the floweret;
 "My fragile leaves," it said, "his heart enclose."
 Love long has taken for his amulet
 One perfect rose.

Why is it no one ever sent me yet
 10 One perfect limousine, do you suppose?
 Ah no, it's always just my luck to get
 One perfect rose.

THE SYMBOLIC POEM

Sometimes symbols—traditional or not—become so insistent in the world of a poem that the larger referential world is left almost totally behind. In such cases the symbol is everything, and the poem does not just use symbols but becomes a symbolic poem, usually a highly individualized one dependent on an internal system introduced by the individual poet.

Here is one such poem.

WILLIAM BLAKE

The Sick Rose²

O rose, thou art sick.
 The invisible worm
 That flies in the night
 In the howling storm
 5 Has found out thy bed
 Of crimson joy,
 And his dark secret love
 Does thy life destroy.

1794

The poem does not seem to be about or refer to a real rose. Rather the poem is about what the rose represents—not in this case something altogether understandable through the traditional meanings of rose.

We usually associate the rose with beauty and love, often with sex; and here several key terms have sexual connotations: “worm,” “bed,” and “crimson joy” (lines 2, 5, 6). The violation of the rose by the worm is the poem’s main concern; the violation seems to have involved secrecy, deceit, and “dark” motives (line 7), and the result is sickness rather than the joy of love. The poem is sad; it involves a sense of hurt and tragedy, nearly of despair. The poem cries out against the misuse of the rose, against its desecration, implying that instead of a healthy joy in sensuality and sexuality, there has been in this case destruction and hurt, perhaps because of misunderstanding and repression and lack of sensitivity.

But to say so much about this poem we have to extrapolate from other poems by Blake, and we have to introduce information from outside the poem. Fully symbolic poems often require that we thus go beyond the formal procedures of reading that we have discussed so far. As presented in this poem, the rose is not part of the normal world that we ordinarily see, and it is symbolic in a special sense. The poet does not simply take an object from our everyday world and give it special significance, making it a symbol in the same way that James Dickey does with the leap. In Blake's poem the rose seems to belong to its own world, a world made entirely inside the poem or the poet's head. The rose is not referential, or not primarily so. The whole poem is symbolic; it lives in its own world. But what is the rose here a symbol of? In general terms, we can say from what the poem tells us; but we may not be as confident as we can be in the more nearly recognizable world of THE LEAP or ONE PERFECT ROSE. In THE SICK ROSE, it seems inappropriate to ask the standard questions: What rose? Where? Which worm? What are the particulars here? In the world of this poem worms can fly and may be invisible. We are altogether in a world of meanings that have been formulated according to a special system of knowledge and code of belief. We will feel comfortable and confident in that world only if we read many poems written by the poet (in this case, William Blake) within the same symbolic system.

Negotiation of meanings in symbolic poems can be very difficult indeed. Reading symbolic poems is an advanced skill that depends on knowledge of context, especially the lives and work of authors and the special literary and cultural traditions they work from. But usually the symbols you will find in poems are referential of meanings we all share, and you can readily discover these meanings by carefully studying the poems themselves.

Ode to a Nightingale

I

My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
 My sense, as though of hemlock I had drunk,
 Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains
 One minute past, and Lethe-wards³ had sunk:
 5 'Tis not through envy of thy happy lot,
 But being too happy in thine happiness,
 That thou, light-wingèd Dryad⁴ of the trees,
 In some melodious plot
 Of beechen green, and shadows numberless,
 10 Singest of summer in full-throated ease.

II

O, for a draught of vintage! that hath been Cooled a long age in the deep-delvèd earth,
 Tasting of Flora⁵ and the country green,
 Dance, and Provençal song,⁶ and sunburnt mirth!
 15 O for a beaker full of the warm South,
 Full of the true, the blushful Hippocrene,⁷

5. Roman goddess of flowers.

6. The medieval troubadours of Provence were famous for their love songs.

7. Fountain of the Muses on Mt. Helicon, whose waters bring poetic inspiration.

With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
 And purple-stainèd mouth;
 That I might drink, and leave the world unseen,
 20 And with thee fade away into the forest dim:

III

Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget
 What thou among the leaves hast never known,
 The weariness, the fever, and the fret
 Here, where men sit and hear each other groan;
 25 Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last gray hairs,
 Where youth grows pale, and specter-thin, and dies;
 Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
 And leaden-eyed despairs,
 Where Beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,
 30 Or new Love pine at them beyond tomorrow.

IV

Away! away! for I will fly to thee,
 Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,⁸
 But on the viewless⁹ wings of Poesy,
 Though the dull brain perplexes and retards:
 35 Already with thee! tender is the night,
 And haply the Queen-Moon is on her throne,
 Clustered around by all her starry Fays;¹
 But here there is no light,
 Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown 40 Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways.

V

I cannot see what flowers are at my feet,
 Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
 But, in embalmèd² darkness, guess each sweet
 Wherewith the seasonable month endows
 45 The grass, the thicket, and the fruit-tree wild;
 White hawthorn, and the pastoral eglantine;³
 Fast fading violets covered up in leaves;
 And mid-May's eldest child,
 The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
 50 The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves.

VI

Darkling⁴ I listen; and, for many a time
 I have been half in love with easeful Death,
 Called him soft names in many a musèd rhyme,
 To take into the air my quiet breath;
 55 Now more than ever seems it rich to die,
 To cease upon the midnight with no pain,

Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!
 No hungry generations tread thee down;
 The voice I hear this passing night was heard
 In ancient days by emperor and clown:
 65 Perhaps the selfsame song that found a path
 Through the sad heart of Ruth,⁵ when, sick for home,
 She stood in tears amid the alien corn;
 The same that ofttimes hath
 Charmed magic casements, opening on the foam
 70 Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn.

VIII

Forlorn! the very word is like a bell
 To toll me back from thee to my sole self!
 Adieu! the fancy cannot cheat so well
 As she is famed to do, deceiving elf.
 75 Adieu! adieu! thy plaintive anthem fades
 Past the near meadows, over the still stream,
 Up the hillside; and now 'tis buried deep
 In the next valley-glades:
 Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
 80 Fled is that music:—Do I wake or sleep?

May 1819

- Since birds obviously die, just as humans do, what might the speaker mean when he declares, “Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!” (line 61)? That is, how, according to the poem, is the bird “immortal” in a way the speaker isn’t? How might this help you begin to understand what the bird comes to symbolize in the poem?

ROBERT FROST

The Road Not Taken

Two roads diverged in a yellow wood,
 And sorry I could not travel both
 And be one traveler, long I stood
 And looked down one as far as I could 5 To where it bent in the undergrowth;
 Then took the other, as just as fair,
 And having perhaps the better claim,
 Because it was grassy and wanted wear;

5. Virtuous Moabite widow who, according to the Old Testament book of Ruth, left her own country to accompany her mother-in-law, Naomi, back to Naomi’s native land. She supported herself as a gleaner.

Though as for that the passing there
 10 Had worn them really about the same,
 And both that morning equally lay
 In leaves no step had trodden black.
 Oh, I kept the first for another day!
 Yet knowing how way leads on to way,
 15 I doubted if I should ever come back.

 I shall be telling this with a sigh
 Somewhere ages and ages hence:
 Two roads diverged in a wood, and I—
 I took the one less traveled by,
 20 And that has made all the difference.

1916

- What sort of choices might the fork in the road represent? In these terms, what seems most important about the description of the roads? Why and how might it matter that the poem's famous last lines (about the great "difference" [line 20] it made to take the road "less traveled by" [line 19]) are framed as something the speaker imagines saying "with a sigh" at some point in the distant future (line 16)?

HOWARD NEMEROV

The Vacuum

The house is so quiet now
 The vacuum cleaner sulks in the corner closet,
 Its bag limp as a stopped lung, its mouth
 Grinning into the floor, maybe at my 5 Slovenly life, my dog-dead youth.

 I've lived this way long enough,
 But when my old woman died her soul
 Went into that vacuum cleaner, and I can't bear
 To see the bag swell like a belly, eating the dust
 10 And the woolen mice, and begin to howl

 Because there is old filth everywhere
 She used to crawl, in the corner and under the stair.
 I know now how life is cheap as dirt,
 And still the hungry, angry heart
 15 Hangs on and howls, biting at air.

1955

- What does the vacuum come to symbolize? How might the poem play on the various meanings of the word vacuum?

ADRIENNE RICH

Diving into the Wreck

First having read the book of myths, and loaded the camera,
 and checked the edge of the knife-blade,
 I put on
 5 the body-armor of black rubber the absurd flippers
 the grave and awkward mask.
 I am having to do this not like Cousteau⁶ with his 10 assiduous team aboard the sun-flooded schooner but here alone.

There is a ladder.
 The ladder is always there
 15 hanging innocently close to the side of the schooner.
 We know what it is for,
 we who have used it.
 Otherwise
 20 it's a piece of maritime floss
 some sundry equipment.

I go down.
 Rung after rung and still the oxygen immerses me
 25 the blue light
 the clear atoms
 of our human air.
 I go down.
 My flippers cripple me,
 30 I crawl like an insect down the ladder and there is no one to tell me when the ocean will begin.

First the air is blue and then 35 it is bluer and then green and then black I am blacking out and yet my mask is powerful it pumps my blood with power
 the sea is another story
 40 the sea is not a question of power
 I have to learn alone to turn my body without force in the deep element.

6. Jacques-Yves Cousteau (1910–97), French writer and underwater explorer.

And now: it is easy to forget 45 what I came for among so many who have always lived here
 swaying their crenellated fans between the reefs
 50 and besides you breathe differently down here.

I came to explore the wreck.
 The words are purposes.
 The words are maps.
 55 I came to see the damage that was done and the treasures that prevail.
 I stroke the beam of my lamp slowly along the flank of something more permanent 60 than fish or weed

the thing I came for:
 the wreck and not the story of the wreck
 the thing itself and not the myth the drowned face always staring 65 toward the sun
 the evidence of damage worn by salt and sway into this threadbare beauty the ribs of the disaster curving their assertion
 70 among the tentative haunters.

This is the place.
 And I am here, the mermaid whose dark hair streams black, the merman in his armored body
 We circle silently
 75 about the wreck
 we dive into the hold.
 I am she: I am he whose drowned face sleeps with open eyes whose breasts still bear the stress 80 whose silver, copper, vermeil cargo lies obscurely inside barrels half-wedged and left to rot we are the half-destroyed instruments that once held to a course 85 the water-eaten log the fouled compass

We are, I am, you are
 by cowardice or courage
 the one who find our way 90 back to this scene carrying a knife, a camera

 a book of myths in which our names do not appear.

ROO BORSON

After a Death

Seeing that there's no other way,
 I turn his absence into a chair.
 I can sit in it,
 gaze out through the window.
 5 I can do what I do best and then go out into the world.
 And I can return then with my useless love,
 to rest,
 because the chair is there.

- Why do you think the speaker chooses to symbolize her absent loved one with a chair?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

BRIAN TURNER (b. 1967)

From “War and Peace: An Interview with Poet Brian Turner” (2009)*

[. . .] Iraq will never be finished in our lifetimes—for the veterans who have come back home, for many of them, and then also for the Iraqis, who we can easily forget because we don't have to deal with them. We don't see them, we don't meet them, we don't have to go visit them or help them with anything. They're clear across the horizon in some foreign country. But we are intimately connected.

I think people still very much want to talk about these things, but they don't have that avenue. And I do think poetry and art can offer some avenues in, towards the emotional content, not so much the geopolitical possibilities and discussions, but the human content. . . . It offers people a way into a moment, and into a world that maybe they've never been a part of or seen and that they can experience a small portion of it and then be reconnected or reengaged to a discussion. I definitely think it's useful.

SHARON OLDS

Bruise Ghazal¹

Now a black-and-blue oval on my hip has turned blue-violet as the ink-brand on the husk-fat of a prime cut, sore as a lovebite, but too large for a human mouth. I like it, my 5 flesh brooch—gold rim, envy-color cameo within, and violet mottle on which the door-handle that bit is a black purple with wiggles like trembling decapede legs. I count back the days, and forward 10 to when it will go its rot colors and then slowly fade. Some people think I should be over my ex by now—maybe
 I thought I might have been over him more by now. Maybe I'm half over who he 15 was, but not who I thought he was, and not over the wound, sudden deathblow as if out of nowhere, though it came from the core of our life together. Sleep now, Sharon, sleep. Even as we speak, the work is being 20 done, within. You were born to heal.
 Sleep and dream—but not of his return.
 Since it cannot harm him, wound him, in your dream.

2012

- How do the various figures of speech Olds initially uses to characterize both her physical wound and her feelings about it help make that wound a resonant symbol for the more emotional wounds she discusses later in the poem?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Consider the poems about roses in this chapter, and write a paragraph about each poem showing how it establishes specific symbolism for the rose. What generalizations can you draw about the rose's traditional meanings in poetry? If you can, find other poems about roses outside of this anthology to determine if your generalizations still apply.
2. Is there a "correct" interpretation of Adrienne Rich's DIVING INTO THE WRECK or of Brian Turner's JUNDEE AMERIKA? If one interpretation seems to fit all the particulars of the poem, does that mean it's better than other possible interpretations? Write an essay in which you explore the poem's symbolism and argue for or against the idea that there is a single best way to understand this poem. Can ambiguity serve a poet's purpose, or does it ultimately undercut a poem's meaning and significance?
3. Choose any poem in this book in which an object or action seems to function as a symbol. Write an essay exploring that symbol's various possible meanings.

1. Form of lyric poem, often on the subject of love and longing, originating in Middle Eastern and East Indian traditions and traditionally consisting of a series of autonomous but thematically related couplets each ending with the same internal rhyme and refrain words. (The first and second stanzas of one Heather McHugh ghazal, for example, end with the words "stirred person" and "absurd person.") Olds's poem does not adhere to this fixed form.

THE SOUNDS OF POETRY

Much of what happens in a poem happens in your mind's eye, but some of it happens in your "mind's ear" and in your voice. Poems are full of meaningful sounds and silences as well as words and sentences. Besides choosing words for their meanings, poets choose words because they have certain sounds, and poems use sound effects to create a mood or establish a tone, just as films do.

Historically, poetry began as an oral phenomenon. Early bards in many cultures chanted or recited their verses, often accompanied by a musical instrument of some kind, and poetry remains a vocal art, dependent on the human voice. Often poems that seem very difficult when looked at silently come alive when turned into sound. The music and rhythms become clearer, and saying the words aloud or hearing them spoken is very good practice for learning to hear in your mind's ear when you read silently.

RHYME

Rhyme—repetition or correspondence of the terminal sounds of words—is perhaps the single most familiar of sound devices poets use, though of course not all poems use it. Early English poetry, in fact, used alliteration, instead of rhyming words at the end of the poetic lines, to balance the first and second half of each line, and much, if not most, modern poetry is written in free verse—that is, without rhyme or regular meter. From the later Middle Ages until the twentieth century, however, the music of rhyme was central to both the sound and the formal conception of most poems in the Western world. Because poetry was originally an oral art (many poems were only later written down, if at all), various kinds of memory devices (sometimes called mnemonic devices) were built into poems to help reciters remember them. Rhyme was one such device, and most people still find it easier to memorize poetry that rhymes. The simple pleasure of hearing familiar sounds repeated at regular intervals may help account for the traditional popularity of rhyme. Rhyme also gives poetry a special aural quality that distinguishes it from prose. According to the established taste in eras before our own, there was a decorum or proper behavior in poetry as in other things: A poem should not in any way be mistaken for prose, which was thought to be artistically inferior to poetry and primarily utilitarian.

Some English poets (especially in the Renaissance) did experiment—often very successfully—with unrhymed verse, but the cultural pressure for rhyme was almost constant. Why? Custom, combined with the sense of proper decorum, accounted in part for the assumption that rhyme was necessary to poetry, but there was probably more to it than that. Rather, the poets' sense that poetry was an imitation of larger relationships in the universe made it seem natural to use rhyme to represent or re-create a sense of pattern, harmony, correspondence, symmetry, and order. The sounds of poetry were thus, poets reasoned, reminders of cosmic harmony, of the music of the spheres that animated all creation. In a modern world increasingly perceived as fragmented and chaotic, there may be less of a tendency to assume or assert a sense of harmony and symmetry. It would be too simple to say that rhyme in a poem necessarily means that the poet has a firm sense of cosmic order, or that an unrhymed poem testifies to chaos. But the cultural assumptions of different times have influenced the expectations and practices of both poets and readers.

Rhyme also provides a kind of discipline for the poet, a way of harnessing poetic talents and keeping a rein on the imagination. Robert Frost said that writing free verse was pointless, like playing tennis without a net. Frost speaks for many traditional poets in suggesting that writing good poetry requires discipline and great care with formal elements such as rhyme or rhythm. More recent poets have often chosen to play by new rules or to invent their own as they go along, preferring the sparer tones that unrhymed poetry provides. Contemporary poets of course still care about the sounds of their poetry, but they may replace rhyme with other aural devices or mix regular rhyme and meter with more flexible lines, paying tribute to tradition as well as the unexpectedness of experience.

End Rhyme and Rhyme Scheme

When we think of rhyme in poetry, what we likely think of first is the most common type—end rhyme, which occurs when the last words in two or more lines of a poem rhyme with each other. When we speak of a poem's rhyme scheme, we refer to its particular pattern of end rhymes. To indicate rhyme scheme, we conventionally assign a different letter of the alphabet to each rhyme sound, reusing the same letter every time the same terminal sound repeats in later lines. Here, for example, are the first two stanzas of Thomas Hardy's THE RUINED MAID, which have a rhyme scheme of aabb, cccb thanks to the way each stanza ends with the very same (long e) sound:

"O 'Melia, my dear, this does everything crown!	a
Who could have supposed I should meet you in Town?	a
And whence such fair garments, such prosperi-ty?"—	b
"O didn't you know I'd been ruined?" said she.	b
"You left us in tatters, without shoes or socks,	c
Tired of digging potatoes, and spudding up docks;	c
And now you've gay bracelets and bright feathers three!"—	b
"Yes: that's how we dress when we're ruined," said she.	b

Since any two adjacent lines that rhyme form a couplet, we could also or instead describe "The Ruined Maid" as a poem comprised entirely of rhyming couplets.

Internal, Slant, and Eye Rhyme

Though end rhyme alone determines the rhyme scheme of a poem, it isn't the only kind: Internal rhyme occurs when a word within (and thus internal to) a line rhymes with another word in the same or adjacent lines, as in the following lines from

Samuel Taylor Coleridge's "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" (internal rhyming words appear in italics):

In mist or cloud, on mast or shroud,
It perched for vespers nine;
Whiles all the night, through fog-smoke white,
Glimmered the white moonshine.

Whether end or internal, rhymes differ, too, in type. Technically, rhyme (or what is sometimes called perfect, true, or full rhyme) requires that words share consonants and vowel sounds, as do "cloud" and "shroud," "night" and "white." When words share one but not the other, we have a version of what's variously called off, half, near, or slant rhyme—that is, a rhyme slightly "off" or only approximate. (The words all and bowl, for example, share consonant sounds, but their vowel sounds differ, and the opposite is true of dark and heart.) Another device more common in poetry written since the later nineteenth century, and (like internal rhyme) ubiquitous in hip-hop lyrics, slant rhyme can produce a variety of effects, all deriving from the poem's failure to provide the sounds our ears expect, whether our brains know it or not. Much the same in reverse is true of eye rhyme: As much a visual as an aural device, it occurs, as its name suggests, when words look like they should rhyme, but don't, as with bear and ear, Yeats and Keats.

ONOMATOPOEIA, ALLITERATION, ASSONANCE, AND CONSONANCE

Sometimes the sounds in poems just provide special effects, rather like a musical score behind a film, setting the mood and getting us into an appropriate frame of mind. But often sound and meaning go hand in hand, and the poet finds words whose sounds echo the action or make a point by stressing the relationship among words and the things they signify.

A single word that captures or approximates the sound of what it describes, such as splash or squish or murmur, is an onomatopoeic word, and the device itself is onomatopoeia.

But poets can also turn sound into sense by choosing and ordering words so as to create distinctive, meaningful aural patterns. Rhyme is one such device, but three other important ones are

- alliteration—the repetition of usually initial consonant sounds through a sequence of words, as in "In lurid cartoon colors, the big baby / dinosaur steps backwards" (from Emily Grosholz's EDEN) or "The Wicked Witch of the West";
- consonance—the repetition of consonant sounds, especially at the end of words or syllables, without the correspondence of vowel sounds necessary to create rhyme, as in "abstruser musings" (from Coleridge's FROST AT MIDNIGHT) or "That was a stroke of luck"; and
- assonance—the repetition of vowel sounds in a sequence of words with different endings, as in "The death of the poet was kept from his poems" (from W. H. Auden's IN MEMORY OF W. B. YEATS).

Used effectively, such devices can be powerful tools, generating meaning, as well as creating mood or simply providing emphasis. A case in point is the following excerpt from the world's most famous mock epic, which describes a scene that may seem at once foreign and familiar to you: A young woman (or “nymph”) sits at a mirrored dressing table (or “toilet”), littered with cosmetics and other accouterments, and, with the help of her lady's maid, prepares herself for the day ahead—fixing her hair, applying makeup, and so on. Given the way these activities are characterized as a distinctly twisted religious ritual (in lines 123–30), what is the effect and significance of alliteration, particularly in line 140 (which here appears in bold)?

ALEXANDER POPE

From The Rape of the Lock

And now, unveil'd, the toilet stands displayed,
 Each silver vase in mystic order laid.
 125 First, rob'd in white, the nymph intent adores
 With head uncover'd, the cosmetic pow'rs.
 A heav'nly image in the glass appears,
 To that she bends, to that her eyes she rears;
 Th' inferior priestess,¹ at her altar's side,
 130 Trembling, begins the sacred rites of pride.
 Unnumber'd treasures ope at once, and here
 The various off'rings of the world appear;
 From each she nicely culls with curious² toil,
 And decks the goddess with the glitt'ring spoil.
 135 This casket India's glowing gems unlocks,
 And all Arabia breathes from yonder box.
 The tortoise here and elephant unite,
 Transform'd to combs, the speckled and the white.³
 Here files of pins extend their shining rows,
 140 Puffs, powders, patches, bibles, billet-doux.⁴
 Now awful⁵ beauty puts on all its arms;
 The fair each moment rises in her charms,
 Repairs her smiles, awakens ev'ry grace,
 And calls forth all the wonders of her face

SOUND POEMS

The following poems place especially heavy emphasis on sound and aural patterning. As you read them, try to identify which sound devices they use and with what effects.

1. That is, the lady's maid. 2. Strange, unusual.

3. The hair combs, in other words, are made from tortoiseshell (which is “speckled”) and ivory from an elephant's tusk (which is “white”).

4. Love letter (French). Patches: tiny pieces of silk or plaster worn to hide a blemish or heighten one's beauty. 5. Awe-inspiring.

1-2-3 was the number he played but today the number came 3-2-1;
 Bought his Carbide at 30, and it went to 29; had the favorite at Bowie⁶
 but the track was slow—
 O executive type, would you like to drive a floating-power, knee-action, silk-upholstered six? Wed a Hollywood star? Shoot the course in 58?
 Draw to the ace, king, jack?
 O fellow with a will who won't take no, watch out for three cigarettes on the same, single match; O democratic voter born in August under Mars, beware of liquidated rails—
 5 Denouement to denouement, he took a personal pride in the certain, certain way he lived his own, private life,
 But nevertheless, they shut off his gas; nevertheless, the bank foreclosed;
 nevertheless, the landlord called; nevertheless, the radio broke,
 And twelve o'clock arrived just once too often,
 Just the same he wore one gray tweed suit, bought one straw hat, drank one straight Scotch, walked one short step, took one long look, drew one deep breath,
 Just one too many,
 10 And wow he died as wow he lived,
 Going whop to the office and blooie home to sleep and biff got married and bam had children and oof got fired,
 Zowie did he live and zowie did he die,

Sound and Sense⁹

- 337 But most by numbers¹ judge a poet's song,
 And smooth or rough, with them, is right or wrong;
 In the bright muse though thousand charms conspire,²
 340 Her voice is all these tuneful fools admire,
 Who haunt Parnassus³ but to please their ear,
 Not mend their minds; as some to church repair,
 Not for the doctrine, but the music there.
 These, equal syllables⁴ alone require,
 345 Though oft the ear the open vowels tire,
 While expletives⁵ their feeble aid do join,
 And ten low words oft creep in one dull line,
 While they ring round the same unvaried chimes,
 With sure returns of still expected rhymes.
 350 Where'er you find "the cooling western breeze,"
 In the next line, it "whispers through the trees";
 If crystal streams "with pleasing murmurs creep,"
 The reader's threatened (not in vain) with "sleep."
 Then, at the last and only couplet fraught 355 With some unmeaning thing they call a thought,
 A needless Alexandrine⁶ ends the song,
 That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.
 Leave such to tune their own dull rhymes, and know
 What's roundly smooth, or languishingly slow;

7. A variety of rose. 8. New York City subway line.

9. From An Essay on Criticism, Pope's poem on the art of poetry and the problems of literary criticism. The passage excerpted here follows a discussion of several common weaknesses of critics—failure to regard an author's intention, for example, or overemphasis on clever metaphors and ornate style.

1. Meter, rhythm, sound. 2. Unite.

3. Mountain in Greece, traditionally associated with the Muses and considered the seat of poetry and music. 4. Regular accents. 5. Filler words, such as "do."

6. Line of six metrical feet, sometimes used in pentameter poems to vary the pace mechanically. Line 357 is an alexandrine.

- 360 And praise the easy vigor of a line,
 Where Denham's strength and Waller's⁷ sweetness join.
 True ease in writing comes from art, not chance,
 As those move easiest who have learned to dance.
 'Tis not enough no harshness gives offense,
- 365 The sound must seem an echo to the sense:
 Soft is the strain when Zephyr⁸ gently blows,
 And the smooth stream in smoother numbers flows;
 But when loud surges lash the sounding shore,
 The hoarse, rough verse should like the torrent roar.
- 370 When Ajax⁹ strives, some rock's vast weight to throw,
 The line too labors, and the words move slow;
 Not so, when swift Camilla¹ scours the plain,
 Flies o'er th' unbending corn, and skims along the main.
 Hear how Timotheus² varied lays surprise,
- 375 And bid alternate passions fall and rise!
 While, at each change, the son of Libyan Jove³
 Now burns with glory, and then melts with love;
 Now his fierce eyes with sparkling fury glow,
 Now sighs steal out, and tears begin to flow:
- 380 Persians and Greeks like turns of nature⁴ found,
 And the world's victor stood subdued by sound!
 The pow'r of music all our hearts allow,
 And what Timotheus was, is DRYDEN now.

1711

Helen Chasin's poem THE WORD PLUM savors the sounds of the word as well as the taste and feel of the fruit itself. It is almost as if the poem is tasting the sounds and rolling them slowly on the tongue. The alliterative second and third lines even replicate the p, l, uh, and m sounds of the word while imitating the squishy sounds of eating the fruit. Words like "delicious" and "luxury" sound juicy, and other words, such as "murmur," imitate sounds of satisfaction and pleasure. Even the process of eating is in part re-created aurally. The tight, clipped sounds of "taut skin / pierced" (lines 6–7) suggest the way teeth sharply break the skin and slice quickly into the soft flesh of a plum, and the words describing the tartness ("provoked," "question," lines 7, 9) force the lips to pucker and the tongue and palate to meet and hold, as if the mouth were savoring a tart fruit. The poet is having fun here refashioning the sensual appeal of a plum, teasing the sounds and meanings out of available words. The words must mean something appropriate and describe something accurately first of all, of course, but when they also imitate the sounds and feel of the process they describe, they do double duty.

7. Sir John Denham and Edmund Waller, seventeenth-century poets credited with perfecting the heroic couplet. 8. The west wind. 9. A Greek hero of the Trojan War, noted for his strength.

1. A woman warrior in Virgil's Aeneid.

2. Court musician of Alexander the Great, celebrated in a famous poem by John Dryden (see line 383) for the power of his music over Alexander's emotions.

3. In Greek tradition, the chief god of any people was often given the name Zeus (Jove), and the chief god of Libya (the Greek name for all of Africa) was called Zeus Ammon. Alexander visited his oracle and was proclaimed son of the god. 4. Similar alternations of emotion.

As its title implies, Kenneth Fearing's DIRGE is a musical lament, in this case for a businessman who took many chances and saw his investments and life go down the drain in the Great Depression of the early 1930s. The expressive cartoon words here like "oof" and "blooie" (line 11) echo the action. Reading aloud, you will notice that the poem employs rhythms much as a song would and that it frequently shifts its pace and mood. Notice how carefully the first two lines are balanced, and then how quickly the rhythm shifts as the "executive type" is addressed directly in line 3. (Especially long lines, like line 2, and irregular line lengths here create some of the poem's special sound effects.) In the direct address, the poem first picks up the rapid lingo of advertising. In stanza 3, the rhythm shifts again, but the poem gives us helpful clues about how to read. Line 5 sounds like prose and is long, drawn out, and rather dull (like its subject), but line 6 sets up a regular (and monotonous) rhythm with its repeated "nevertheless," which punctuates the rhythm like a drumbeat: "But nevertheless, tuh-tuh-tuh-tuh-tuh; nevertheless, tuh-tuh-tuh-tuh; nevertheless, tuh-tuh-tuh-tuh; nevertheless, tuh-tuh-tuh-tuh." In the next stanza comes more repetitive phrasing, this time guided by the word "one" in conjunction with other one-syllable words: "wore one gray tweed suit, bought one straw hat, tuh one tuh-tuh, tuh one tuh-tuh, tuh one tuh-tuh, tuh one tuh-tuh." And then a new rhythm and a new technique begin in stanza 5, which again imitates the language of comic books. You have to say words like "whop" and "zowie" aloud and in the rhythm of the whole sentence to get the full effect of how boring his life is, no matter how he tries to jazz it up. And so it goes—the repeating rhythms of routine—until the final bell ("Bong . . . bong . . . bong . . . bong") tolls rhythmically for the dead man in the final clanging line.

Written in a very different era and style, Pope's SOUND AND SENSE uses a number of echoic or onomatopoeic words. In some lines pleasant and unpleasant consonant sounds underline a particular point or emphasize a mood. When the poet talks about a particular weakness in poetry, he illustrates it at the same time—by using open vowels (line 345), expletives (line 346), monosyllabic words (line 347), predictable rhymes (lines 350–53), or long, slow lines (line 357). He similarly illustrates the good qualities of poetry as well (line 360, for example). But the main effects of the passage come from an interaction of several ingenious strategies at once. In lines 339 and 340, for example, Pope produces complex sound effects in addition to the harmony of a rhyming couplet ("conspire," "admire"). Assonance echoes in the oo vowel sounds in "muse," "tuneful," and "fools"; alliteration repeats consonants in "right or wrong" and "tuneful fools." Ironically, the muse-ical voice here is a bit out of tune to those who have good poetic taste: Pope intends the r and f sounds to feel both cute and awkward, as a comment on people who only want easy listening and miss poetry's other "charms," including its meaning (compared to the "doctrine" that is the real purpose of a church service, in line 343).

With a similar technique of demonstrating principles of poetic style and taste, the pace of lines 347, 357, and 359 is controlled by clashing consonant sounds as well as long vowels. Line 347 seems much longer than it is because almost every one-syllable word ends in a consonant that refuses to blend with the beginning of the next word, making the words hard to say without distinct, awkward pauses between them. In lines 357 and 359, long vowels such as those in "wounded," "snake," "slow," "along," "roundly," and "smooth" slow down the pace, and awkward, hard-to-pronounce consonants are again juxtaposed. The commas also provide nearly full stops in the middle of these lines to slow us down still more.

Similarly, the harsh lashing of the shore in lines 368–69 is accomplished partly by onomatopoeia and partly by the dominance of rough consonants in line 369. (In Pope’s time, the English r was still trilled gruffly so that it could be made to sound extremely rrrough and harrsh.) Almost every line in this passage demonstrates how to make sound echo sense.

POETIC METER

In the Western world, we can thank the ancient Greeks for systematizing an understanding of meter and providing a vocabulary (including the words rhythm and meter) that enables us to discuss the art of poetry. Meter comes from a Greek word meaning “measure”: What we measure in the English language are the patterns of stressed (or accented) syllables that occur naturally when we speak, and, just as when we measure length, the unit we use in measuring poetry is the foot. Most traditional poetry in English uses the accentual-syllabic form of meter—meaning that its rhythmic pattern is based on both a set number of syllables per line and a regular pattern of accents in each line. Not all poems have a regular metrical pattern, and not all metered poems follow only one pattern throughout. But like everyday speech, the language of poetry always has some accents (as in this italic emphasis on “some”), and poets arrange that rhythm for effect. Thus in nonmetrical as well as metrical poetry, a reader should “listen” for patterns of stress.

The Basic Metrical Feet of Poetry in English

iamb: an unstressed or unaccented syllable followed by a stressed or accented one (“she wént,” “believe”). This meter is called iambic.

trochee: a stressed syllable followed by an unstressed one (“méter,” “Hómer”). This meter is called trochaic.

anapest: two unstressed syllables followed by a stressed one (“comprehénd,” “after yóu”). This meter is called anapestic.

dactyl: a stressed syllable followed by two unstressed ones (“róundabout,” “dínner-time”). This meter is called dactylic.

rising or falling: the above feet either begin or end with the stressed syllable, as if they lose or gain momentum or “height.” Hence iambic and anapestic are called rising meters, and trochaic and dactylic are called falling meters.

Other Kinds of Feet

spondee: two stressed syllables. Spondaic feet vary or interrupt the prevailing rhythm, emphasizing a syllable that we would expect to be unstressed (“Lást cáll,” “Dón’t gó”).

pyrrhic: two unstressed syllables. Pyrrhic feet similarly interrupt the expected rising or falling beats, placing an unstressed syllable where we expect an emphasis (“üntǒ,” “ís ǎ”).

Spondees and pyrrhic feet depend on prevailing meter and usually appear singly or only a few times in a row. It is difficult to imagine (or to write or speak) a line or sentence that either has no unstressed syllables—a constant strong beat (spondaic)—or lacks stressed syllables—a rippling monotone (pyrrhic).

Because the concept of meter derives from poetic traditions in Greek and Latin that counted syllables rather than accents, other possible combinations of syllables acquired names, for instance, amphibrach (unstressed, stressed, unstressed—noted by Coleridge in his demonstration of meter, METRICAL FEET, below). But since most meter in poetry in English depends on accents rather than the number of syllables, the terms above cover most of the variations that you will encounter.

Counting Feet, or Meter

A line of poetry is subdivided into feet in order to “measure” its meter. The terms are easy enough to understand if you recall geometry or other numeric terminology. Remember that this is a count not of the number of syllables but of stresses; thus, for example, monometer could have two or three syllables per line.

monometer:	one foot
dimeter:	two feet
trimeter:	three feet
tetrameter:	four feet
pentameter:	five feet
hexameter:	six feet
heptameter:	seven feet
octameter:	eight feet

Counting the number of feet—that is, the number of accents, stresses, or strong beats per line—helps you identify the kind of feet in the line. Thus the terms are combined: iambic pentameter has five iambs per line; trochaic tetrameter has four trochees per line, and so on.

Scansion

Scansion is the technique of listening to and marking stressed and unstressed syllables, counting the syllables and feet. Often, you will need to scan several lines before you can be sure of the “controlling” metrical pattern or “base meter” of a poem.

In the following poem, Samuel Taylor Coleridge playfully names and illustrates many types of meter. By marking syllables himself as stressed or unstressed, he also illustrates how scansion works.

Hearing a poem properly involves practice—listening to others read poetry and especially to yourself as you read poems aloud. Your dictionary will show you the stresses for every word of more than one syllable, and the governing stress of individual words will largely control the patterns in a line: If you read a line for its sense (almost as if it were prose), you will usually see the line's basic pattern. But single-syllable words can be a challenge because they may or may not be stressed, depending on their syntactic function and the full meaning of the sentence. Normally, important functional words, such as one-syllable nouns and verbs, are stressed (as in normal conversation or in prose), while conjunctions (such as and or but), prepositions (such as on or with), and articles (such as an or the) are unstressed.

Here are the first two lines of Alexander Pope's "Sound and Sense," marked to show the stressed syllables:

But móst | by nŷm- | bers júdge | a pó- | et's sóng,
 And smóoth | or róugh, | wīth thém, | is ríght | or wróng.

These lines, like so many in English literature, provide an example of iambic pentameter—that is, each line consists of five iambic feet. Notice that there is nothing forced or artificial in the sound of these lines; the words flow easily. In fact,

5. Written originally for Coleridge's son Hartley, the poem was later adapted for his younger son, Derwent.

6. Long and short marks over syllables are Coleridge's.

7. Mountain in the lake country of northern England (where Coleridge lived in his early years), near the town of Derwent.

linguists contend that English is naturally iambic, and even the most ordinary, “unpoetic” utterances often fall into this pattern: “Please tell me if you’ve heard this one before.” “They said she had a certain way with words.” “The baseball game was televised at nine.”

Here are a few more examples of various meters.

iambic pentameter: “In sé- | quent tóil | all fór- | wards dó | conténd” (William Shakespeare, “Like as the waves . . .”)

trochaic octameter: “Ónce u- | pón a | mídníght | dréary, | whíle I | póndered, | wéak and | wéary” (Edgar Allan Poe, “The Raven”)

anapestic tetrameter: “There are mán- | y who sáy | that a dóg | has his dáy” (Dylan Thomas)

Although scanning lines of poetry by reading them aloud, marking syllables as unstressed or stressed, and adding up feet may seem like a counting game that has little to do with the meaning of poetry, it is an important way to understand the sound effects of a poem. Like different styles of music, different meters tend to express different moods or to suit different themes. When you know the basic meter of a poem, you are more alert to subtle variations in the pattern. Poets avoid the predictable or the lulling by using certain “change-ups” in the dominant meter or line length, such as substitution of a different foot (e.g., a trochee or spondee instead of an iamb); caesura, a short pause within a line often signaled by punctuation; or enjambment, extending the end of the grammatical sentence beyond the end of the poetic line.

Notice that the following example is perfectly regular dactylic hexameter until the final foot, a trochee. Also notice that Longfellow has placed a caesura within a long line.

“This is the | fórest pri- | méval. The | múrmuring | pínes and the | hémlocks” (Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Evangeline)

Substitution of one metrical foot for another—to accommodate idioms and conversational habits or to create a special effect or emphasis—is quite common, especially in the first foot of a line. Shakespeare often begins an iambic line with a trochee:

Líke as | the wáves | make towáreds | the péb- | bled shóre

Or consider this line from John Milton’s Paradise Lost, a poem written mainly in iambic pentameter:

Rócks, cáves, | lákes, féns, | bógs, déns, | and Shádes | of Déath

Here Milton substitutes three spondees for the first three iambs in a pentameter line. John Dryden’s “To the Memory of Mr. Oldham” arguably begins with two spondees, a pyrrhic, and an iamb before settling into a regular iambic pentameter:

Fárewéll, | tóo lít | tle, and | tóo láte | ly knówn,

As Dryden’s poem shows, meter does leave room for discussion; some readers might read the line above as iambic throughout, and others might read the last three feet as iambic: The natural emphasis on the first word after the caesura, “and,” could make the predictable word “too” unstressed. The way you actually read a line, once you have “heard” the basic rhythm, is influenced by two factors: normal pronunciation and prose sense (on the one hand) and the predominant pattern of the poem

(on the other). Since these two forces are constantly in tension and are sometimes contradictory, you can almost never fully predict the actual reading of a line, and good reading aloud (like every other art) depends less on formula than on subtlety and flexibility. And, again, very good readers sometimes disagree about whether or not to stress certain syllables. We have noted the use of substitution, and many poems since around 1900 have taken liberties with meter and rhyme. Some poets (such as Marianne Moore) have favored counting syllables rather than accents. Even more widespread is free verse, which does without any governing pattern of stresses or line lengths.

Scansion: An Exercise

Each of the following poems is written in a different meter. Using the terms defined in “Poetic Meter” (on pp. 871–72), as well as in Coleridge’s poem “Metrical Feet,” pair the following poems with their corresponding meters. (The answers are on p. 883.)

1. ANONYMOUS

[There was a young girl from St. Paul]

There was a young girl from St. Paul,
Wore a newspaper-dress to a ball.
 The dress caught on fire
 And burned her entire
Front page, sporting section and all.

(Note that this poem is a limerick and uses a meter common to this subgenre.)

2. ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON

 Half a league onward,
All in the valley of Death
 Rode the six hundred.
5 “Forward, the Light Brigade!
“Charge for the guns!” he said:

8. On October 25, 1854—during the Crimean war—miscommunication among commanders led a British cavalry troop to charge directly into a Russian artillery assault, leading to heavy casualties and an ignominious defeat.

“Forward, the Light Brigade!”
10 Was there a man dismay’d?
Not tho’ the soldier knew
Someone had blunder’d:
Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
15 Theirs but to do and die:
Into the valley of Death
Rode the six hundred.

The Star

“Twinkle, twinkle, little star,
How I wonder what you are!
Up above the world so high,
Like a diamond in the sky.

5 When the blazing sun is gone,
When he nothing shines upon,
Then you show your little light,
Twinkle, twinkle, all the night.

Then the trav’ler in the dark,
10 Thanks you for your tiny spark;
He could not see which way to go,
If you did not twinkle so.

In the dark blue sky you keep,
And often through my curtains peep,
15 For you never shut your eye
Till the sun is in the sky.

As your bright and tiny spark
Lights the trav’ler in the dark,
20 Though I know not what you are,
Twinkle, twinkle, little star.

4. ANNE BRADSTREET

To My Dear and Loving Husband

- If ever two were one, then surely we.
 If ever man were loved by wife, then thee;
 If ever wife was happy in a man,
 Compare with me ye women if you can.
 5 I prize thy love more than whole mines of gold,
 Or all the riches that the East doth hold.
 My love is such that rivers cannot quench,
 Nor aught but love from thee give recompense.
 Thy love is such I can no way repay;
 10 The heavens reward thee manifold, I pray.
 Then while we live, in love let's so persevere,
 That when we live no more we may live ever.

Sound and Sense: A Comparative Exercise

To get a vivid sense of the difference sound can make to the tone and meaning of a poem—and just how you can use what you've learned about meter, rhyme, and other sound devices—try comparing the two following poems, both inspired by World War I (1914–18). The first is the most famous of several poems originally published in the British newspaper the Daily Mail by Jessie Pope (1868–1941), an English journalist famous, before the war, as a writer of light verse. The second poem is the work of Wilfred Owen (1893–1918), an aspiring English poet who voluntarily enlisted in 1915 (the same year Pope's poem appeared) and, from January 1917, served as an officer on the French front. Begun some nine months later, during Owen's hospitalization for shell shock, and originally entitled "To Jessie Pope," his poem is in some ways as much about traditional poetic representations of war as it is about war itself.

As you read the two poems, pay careful attention to how each uses all of the various sound devices discussed in this chapter, particularly meter and rhyme. How precisely do such sound effects contribute to the poems' very different tones and themes and their very different views of war?

JESSIE POPE

The Call

Who's for the trench—
 Are you, my laddie?

Who'll follow French⁹—
 Will you, my laddie?
 5 Who's fretting to begin,
 Who's going out to win?
 And who wants to save his skin—
 Do you, my laddie?

Who's for the khaki suit—
 10 Are you, my laddie?
 Who longs to charge and shoot—
 Do you, my laddie?
 Who's keen on getting fit,
 Who means to show his grit,
 15 And who'd rather wait a bit—
 Would you, my laddie?

Who'll earn the Empire's¹ thanks—
 Will you, my laddie?
 Who'll swell the victor's ranks—
 20 Will you, my laddie?
 When that procession comes,
 Banners and rolling drums—
 Who'll stand and bite his thumbs—
 Will you, my laddie?

WILFRED OWENDulce et Decorum Est²

Bent double, like old beggars under sacks,
 Knock-kneed, coughing like hags, we cursed through sludge,
 Till on the haunting flares we turned our backs
 And towards our distant rest began to trudge.
 5 Men marched asleep. Many had lost their boots
 But limped on, blood-shod. All went lame; all blind;
 Drunk with fatigue; deaf even to the hoots
 Of disappointed shells that dropped behind.

9. Field-Marshal John French (1852–1925), commander in chief of the British Expeditionary Force for the first two years of World War I (1914–16).

1. At the start of World War I, the British Empire was the largest in human history, covering over eleven million square miles of the earth's surface; the desire to maintain or expand empire was one major cause of the war.

2. Part of a phrase from Horace (Roman poet and satirist, 65–68 BCE), quoted in full in the last lines of Owen's poem: "It is sweet and proper to die for one's country" (Latin).

- Gas! Gas! Quick, boys!—An ecstasy of fumbling,
 10 Fitting the clumsy helmets just in time;
 But someone still was yelling out and stumbling
 And floundering like a man in fire or lime.—
 Dim, through the misty panes and thick green light
 As under a green sea, I saw him drowning.
- 15 In all my dreams, before my helpless sight,
 He plunges at me, guttering, choking, drowning.
- If in some smothering dreams you too could pace
 Behind the wagon that we flung him in,
 And watch the white eyes writhing in his face,
 20 His hanging face, like a devil's sick of sin;
 If you could hear, at every jolt, the blood
 Come gargling from the froth-corrupted lungs,
 Obscene as cancer, bitter as the cud
 Of vile, incurable sores on innocent tongues,—
 25 My friend, you would not tell with such high zest
 To children ardent for some desperate glory,
 The old Lie: Dulce et decorum est
 Pro patria mori.

POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

[Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore]

- Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore,
 So do our minutes hasten to their end,
 Each changing place with that which goes before,
 In sequent toil all forwards do contend.³
- 5 Nativity, once in the main⁴ of light,
 Crawls to maturity, wherewith being crowned,
 Crooked⁵ eclipses 'gainst his glory fight,
 And Time that gave doth now his gift confound.⁶
 Time doth transfix⁷ the flourish set on youth

3. Struggle. Sequent: successive. 4. High seas. Nativity: newborn life. 5. Perverse.
 6. Bring to nothing. 7. Pierce.

- 10 And delves the parallels⁸ in beauty's brow,
 Feeds on the rarities of nature's truth,
 And nothing stands but for his scythe to mow.
 And yet to times in hope⁹ my verse shall stand,
 Praising thy worth, despite his cruel hand.

- Which lines in this poem vary the basic iambic meter? What is the effect of these variations?

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS

Spring and Fall

to a young child

- Márgarét áre you gríeving!
 Over Goldengrove unleaving?
 Leáves, like the things of man, you
 With your fresh thoughts care for, can you?
 5 Áh! ás the heart grows older
 It will-come to such sights colder
 By and by, nor spare a sigh
 Though worlds of wanwood leafmeal² lie;
 And yet you will weep and know why.
 10 Now no matter, child, the name:
 Sórrów's spríngs áre the same.
 Nor mouth had, no nor mind, expressed
 What heart heard of, ghost³ guessed:
 It ís the blight man was born for,
 15 It is Margaret you mourn for.

1880

- How does this poem's heavy use of alliteration serve its exploration of youth and age, life and death?

WALT WHITMAN

Beat! Beat! Drums!

I
 Beat! beat! drums!—Blow! bugles! blow!
 Through the windows—through doors—burst like a force of armed men,
 Into the solemn church, and scatter the congregation;
 Into the school where the scholar is studying:

8. Lines, wrinkles. 9. In the future.

1. Hopkins's own accent markings.

2. Broken up, leaf by leaf (analogous to "piecemeal"). Wanwood: pale, gloomy woods. 3. Soul.

- 5 Leave not the bridegroom quiet—no happiness must he have now with his bride;
Nor the peaceful farmer any peace plowing his field or gathering his grain;
So fierce you whirr and pound, you drums—so shrill you bugles blow.

2

- Beat! beat! drums!—Blow! bugles! blow!
Over the traffic of cities—over the rumble of wheels in the streets:
10 Are beds prepared for sleepers at night in the houses? No sleepers must sleep in those beds;
No bargainers' bargains by day—no brokers or speculators—Would they continue?
Would the talkers be talking? would the singer attempt to sing?
Would the lawyer rise in the court to state his case before the judge?
Then rattle quicker, heavier drums—you bugles wilder blow.

3

- 15 Beat! beat! drums!—Blow! bugles! blow!
Make no parley—stop for no expostulation;
Mind not the timid—mind not the weeper or prayer;
Mind not the old man beseeching the young man;
Let not the child's voice be heard, nor the mother's entreaties; Recruit!
Recruit!
20 Make the very trestles to shake under the dead, where they lie in their shrouds awaiting the hearses.
So strong you thump, O terrible drums—so loud you bugles blow.

1861

- How does Whitman use various sound devices to mimic both the sound he asks the drums and bugles to make and the effects he imagines those sounds having? How might the poem's date affect your sense of the poem, particularly its final stanza?

KEVIN YOUNG

Ode to Pork

- I wouldn't be here without you. Without you I'd be umpteen
pounds lighter & a lot 5 less alive. You stuck round my ribs even when I treated you like a dog
dirty, I dare not eat.
I know you're the blues
10 because loving you may kill me—but still you rock me down slow

as hamhocks on the stove.
 Anyway you come 15 fried, cured, burnt to within one inch of your life I love. Babe,
 I revere your every nickname—bacon, chitlin,
 20 cracklin, sin.
 Some call you murder,
 shame's stepsister—
 then dress you up
 & declare you white
 25 & healthy, but you always come back, sauced, to me.
 Adam himself gave up
 a rib to see yours
 piled pink beside him.
 30 Your heaven is the only one worth wanting—
 you keep me all night
 cursing your four-letter name, the next
 35 begging for you again.

2007

- How do sound effects contribute to the tone of ODE TO PORK? to the poem's characterization of the speaker's relationship to pork? How might they make the poem sound like a blues song?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Read Pope's SOUND AND SENSE carefully twice—once silently and once aloud—and then mark the stressed and unstressed syllables. Single out all the lines that have major variations from the basic iambic pentameter pattern. Pick out six lines with variations that seem to you worthy of comment, and write a paragraph on each in which you show how the variation contributes to the specific effects achieved in that line and the corresponding point Pope conveys about poetic style.
2. Try your hand at writing limericks in imitation of THERE WAS A YOUNG GIRL FROM ST. PAUL; study the rhythmic patterns and line lengths carefully, and imitate them exactly in your poem. Begin your limerick with "There once was a _____ from _____" (using a place for which you think you can find a comic rhyme).
3. Write an essay exploring how Wilfred Owen uses meter (including substitutions) and rhyme, as well as other sound devices, in DULCE ET DECORUM EST both to capture the experience of war and its effects and to respond critically to traditional war poetry, perhaps by comparing this poem to Jessie Pope's THE CALL. If you choose to draw on Pope's poem, however, you might also want to consider how the poem works and means differently when titled "Dulce et Decorum Est" rather than (as it originally was) "To Jessie Pope."
4. Pope's SOUND AND SENSE contains this advice for poets: "But when loud surges lash the sounding shore, / The hoarse, rough verse should like the torrent roar" (lines 368–69). In other words, he counsels that the sound of the poet's description should match the sense of what the poem is describing. Write an essay in which you examine the sound and sense in Shakespeare's LIKE AS THE WAVES MAKE TOWARDS THE PEBBLED SHORE. How does the poem achieve a harmony of meaning and sound?

5. Write an essay in which you discuss any poem in this book in which sound seems a more important element than anything else, even the meaning of words. What is the point of writing and reading this kind of poetry? Can it achieve its effects through silent reading, or must it be experienced aloud?

Words and Music

AN ALBUM

People often associate poetry with music, for good reason. The word lyric derives from the ancient Greeks' practice of reciting certain poems to the accompaniment of a harplike instrument, the lyre. Throughout history, poems have been set to music, and many "lyrics" have been created specifically to fit musical compositions. Many poems, especially during the Renaissance, were simply called "Song" (or "Chanson" or "Lied" or similar terms in other languages), and some were constructed in hybrid musical-poetic forms such as the madrigal, the dirge, and the hymn.

The most fundamental link between poetry and music involves their almost equal dependence on the principles of rhythm. Both art forms have a basis in mathematics: A regular beat or syncopated sound pattern shapes their phrasing and formal movement. Performers of both arts must keep count and consider quantities as well as qualities of sounds. Just as good musicians learn to listen and count so easily that it seems "natural," so poets often develop an ear for rhythm that makes their sound choices seem effortless. Readers, too, can develop such an ear.

Both poetry and music use representational or imitative strategies to create the illusion of sounds—bells, waves, motorcycles, for example—but words operate referentially in a way that sounds normally do not, and their syntax is of a different kind from that in musical composition. The referential fact of language almost always alters the "pure" effects of sound.

Poems composed to or for music obviously rely on rhythmic or harmonic effects even more than those created solely by words. Reading the lyrics of a song you know well is quite different from reading words that have for you no musical association or history. But the "music" created by a poem itself can work in a similar way when there is no musical "source" or cocreation.

The poems that follow were all written for, in conjunction with, or to imitate music. Can you add your own song lyrics from your favorite contemporary singers and groups? Are the words as effective without the music? Do they make good poems? Can you, in the lyrics you know well, separate the actual musical implications from those of the words alone?

THOMAS CAMPION

When to Her Lute Corinna Sings

- When to her lute Corinna sings,
Her voice revives the leaden¹ strings,
And doth in highest notes appear
As any challenged² echo clear;
5 But when she doth of mourning speak,
Ev'n with her sighs the strings do break.

1. Heavy. 2. Aroused.

And as her lute doth live or die,
 Led by her passion, so must I:
 For when of pleasure she doth sing,
 10 My thoughts enjoy a sudden spring;
 But if she doth of sorrow speak,
 Ev'n from my heart the strings do break.
 1601

- How does Campion mimic an “echo” in this poem? What is the effect of this echoing?

The following two poems are ballads, a type of narrative poem originally intended for singing. These examples, moreover, use patterns of meter and stanza that are used so often in ballads that they are often called ballad meter and ballad stanza. Can you identify the patterns?

Sir Patrick Spens

The king sits in Dumferling toune,³
 Drinking the blude-reid⁴ wine:
 “O whar will I get guid sailor,
 To sail this ship of mine?”
 5 Up and spake an eldern knight,
 Sat at the king’s richt knee:
 “Sir Patrick Spens is the best sailor
 That sails upon the sea.”
 The king has written a braid⁵ letter
 10 And signed it wi’ his hand,
 And sent it to Sir Patrick Spens,
 Was walking on the sand.
 The first line that Sir Patrick read,
 A loud lauch⁶ lauched he;
 15 The next line that Sir Patrick read,
 The tear blinded his ee.⁷
 “O wha is this has done this deed,
 This il deed done to me,
 To send me out this time o’ the year,
 20 To sail upon the sea?”
 “Make haste, make haste, my merry men all,
 Our guid ship sails the morn.”
 “O say na sae,⁸ my master dear,
 For I fear a deadly storm.

3. Town. 4. Bloodred. 5. Broad: explicit. 6. Laugh. 7. Eye. 8. Not so.

25 “Late, late yestre’en I saw the new moon
 Wi’ the auld moon in her arm,
 And I fear, I fear, my dear mastér,
 That we will come to harm.”

O our Scots nobles were richt laith⁹
 30 To weet their cork-heeled shoon,¹
 But lang owre a² the play were played
 Their hats they swam aboon.³

O lang, lang, may their ladies sit,
 Wi’ their fans into their hand,
 35 Or ere they see Sir Patrick Spens
 Come sailing to the land.

O lang, lang, may the ladies stand
 Wi’ their gold kems⁴ in their hair,
 Waiting for their ain⁵ dear lords,
 40 For they’ll see them na mair.

Half o’er, half o’er to Aberdour
 It’s fifty fadom deep,
 And there lies guid Sir Patrick Spens
 Wi’ the Scots lords at his feet.

c. 13th century

- Originally, ballads were a form of oral folk literature. Often their plots either involve extraordinary, even violent, events experienced by ordinary folk or center on a conflict between people of different social ranks. Is that true of “Sir Patrick Spens”? What might the ballad suggest about “nobles” (line 29) through its form, and especially its “music,” as well as its content?

DUDLEY RANDALL Ballad of Birmingham

*(On the bombing of a church in Birmingham, Alabama, 1963)*⁶

“Mother dear, may I go downtown
 Instead of out to play,
 And march the streets of Birmingham
 In a Freedom March today?”

5 “No, baby, no, you may not go,
 For the dogs are fierce and wild,
 And clubs and hoses, guns and jails
 Aren’t good for a little child.”

9. Right loath: very reluctant.

1. To wet their cork-heeled shoes. Cork was expensive, and thus such shoes were a mark of wealth and status. 2. Before all. 3. Above. 4. Combs. 5. Own

6. Just before Sunday services on September 15, 1963, a bomb exploded in Birmingham’s 16th Street Baptist Church, killing four girls, aged eleven to fourteen, and injuring at least twenty-one other members of the predominantly African American congregation.

“But, mother, I won’t be alone.
 10 Other children will go with me,
 And march the streets of Birmingham
 To make our country free.”
 “No, baby, no, you may not go,
 For I fear those guns will fire.
 15 But you may go to church instead
 And sing in the children’s choir.”
 She has combed and brushed her night-dark hair,
 And bathed rose petal sweet,
 And drawn white gloves on her small brown hands,
 20 And white shoes on her feet.
 The mother smiled to know her child
 Was in the sacred place,
 But that smile was the last smile
 To come upon her face.
 25 For when she heard the explosion,
 Her eyes grew wet and wild.
 She raced through the streets of Birmingham
 Calling for her child.
 She clawed through bits of glass and brick,
 30 Then lifted out a shoe.
 “Oh, here’s the shoe my baby wore,
 But, baby, where are you?”

1969

- Compare this poem to other ballads in this volume and elsewhere. Why is the form appropriate for commemorating this violent event?

AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE TOPLADY

A Prayer, Living and Dying

I

ROCK of ages, cleft for me,
 Let me hide myself in Thee!
 Let the Water and the Blood,
 From thy riven Side which flow’d,
 5 Be of sin the double cure;
 Cleanse me from its guilt and pow’r.

II

Not the labors of my hands
 Can fulfill thy Law’s demands:
 Could my zeal no respite know,
 10 Could my tears for ever flow,

All for sin could not atone;
Thou must save, and Thou alone.

III

Nothing in my hand I bring;
Simply to thy Cross I cling;
15 Naked, come to Thee for dress;
Helpless, look to Thee for grace;
Foul, I to the Fountain fly:
Wash me, SAVIOR, or I die!

IV

While I draw this fleeting breath—
20 When my eye-strings break in death—
When I soar to worlds unknown—
See Thee on thy judgment-throne—
ROCK of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee!

1776

- What aspects of this poem might make it suitable for communal singing by untrained singers?

ROBERT HAYDEN

Homage to the Empress of the Blues⁷

Because there was a man somewhere in a candystripe silk shirt, gracile and dangerous as a jaguar and because a woman moaned for him in sixty-watt gloom and mourned him Faithless Love Twotiming Love Oh Love Oh Careless Aggravating Love,

5 She came out on the stage in yards of pearls, emerging like a favorite scenic view, flashed her golden smile and sang.

Because grey laths began somewhere to show from underneath torn hurdygurdy⁸ lithographs of dollfaced heaven;
and because there were those who feared alarming fists of snow 10 on the door and those who feared the riot-squad of statistics,

She came out on the stage in ostrich feathers, beaded satin,
and shone that smile on us and sang.

1962

- How do the two short stanzas beginning with “She came out” complete the thoughts of the longer stanzas that start with “Because”?

7. Bessie Smith (1894 [or 1898?]-1937); legendary blues singer whose theatrical style grew out of the black American vaudeville tradition.

8. Disreputable kind of dance hall.

MICHAEL HARPER
Dear John, Dear Coltrane

*a love supreme, a love supreme a love supreme, a love supreme*⁹

Sex fingers toes
in the marketplace
near your father's church in Hamlet, North Carolina—¹ 5 witness to this love
in this calm fallow
of these minds,
there is no substitute for pain:
genitals gone or going,
10 seed burned out,
you tuck the roots in the earth,
turn back, and move
by river through the swamps, singing: a love supreme, a love supreme;
15 what does it all mean?
Loss, so great each black woman expects your failure in mute change, the seed gone.
You plod up into the electric city—20 your song now crystal and the blues. You pick up the horn with some will and blow
into the freezing night:
a love supreme, a love supreme—
25 Dawn comes and you cook up the thick sin 'tween impotence and death, fuel the tenor sax cannibal heart, genitals and sweat
30 that makes you clean—
a love supreme, a love supreme—
Why you so black?
cause I am
why you so funky?
35 cause I am
why you so black

9. Jazz saxophonist and composer John William Coltrane (1926–27) wrote “A Love Supreme” in response to a spiritual experience in 1957 that also led to his quitting heroin and alcohol. Mainly an instrumental improvisation featuring Coltrane’s saxophone, the piece begins with the repeated chant of “a love supreme.” The record was released in 1965.

1. Coltrane’s birthplace. His family shared a house with Coltrane’s grandfather, who was the minister of St. Stephen’s AME Zion Church.

cause I am
why you so sweet?
cause I am
 40 why you so black?
cause I am
a love supreme, a love supreme:

So sick
 you couldn't play Naima,² 45 so flat we ached
 for song you'd concealed with your own blood, your diseased liver gave out its purity,
 50 the inflated heart
 pumps out, the tenor kiss,
 tenor love:
a love supreme, a love supreme—
a love supreme, a love supreme—

BOB DYLAN

The Times They Are A-Changin'

Come gather 'round people
 Wherever you roam
 And admit that the waters
 Around you have grown
 5 And accept it that soon
 You'll be drenched to the bone
 If your time to you is worth savin'
 Then you better start swimmin' or you'll sink like a stone
 For the times they are a-changin'

10 Come writers and critics
 Who prophesize with your pen
 And keep your eyes wide
 The chance won't come again
 And don't speak too soon
 15 For the wheel's still in spin
 And there's no tellin' who that it's namin'
 For the loser now will be later to win
 For the times they are a-changin'

Come senators, congressmen
 20 Please heed the call

2. A song Coltrane wrote for and named after his wife, recorded in 1959.

- Don't stand in the doorway
 Don't block up the hall
 For he that gets hurt
 Will be he who has stalled
 25 There's a battle outside and it is ragin'
 It'll soon shake your windows and rattle your walls
 For the times they are a-changin'

 Come mothers and fathers
 Throughout the land
 30 And don't criticize
 What you can't understand
 Your sons and your daughters
 Are beyond your command
 Your old road is rapidly agin'
 35 Please get out of the new one if you can't lend your hand
 For the times they are a-changin'

 The line it is drawn
 The curse it is cast
 The slow one now
 40 Will later be fast
 As the present now
 Will later be past
 The order is rapidly fadin'
 And the first one now will later be last
 45 For the times they are a-changin'

1963, 1964

- How does familiarity with THE TIMES THEY ARE A-CHANGIN' as a song affect your sense of it as a poem? Do successful song lyrics necessarily work as poetry?

LINDA PASTAN

Listening to Bob Dylan, 2005

- Little Bobby Zimmerman,³ did he have a mother?
 Iconoclast to icon,

 5 Did he steal or borrow
 Woody's⁵ voice, pure gravel?

3. Influential singer-songwriter Bob Dylan was born Robert Allen Zimmerman (in Duluth, Minnesota, 1941).

4. Among the series of questions posed in Dylan's famous 1962 song "Blowin' in the Wind," is "how many times must the cannon balls fly / Before they're forever banned?"

5. Woody Guthrie (1912–67), influential Depression-era folk musician and singer-songwriter renowned for songs (including "This Land Is Your Land") championing common people and social and economic justice.

Women gave their bodies.
Kerouac⁶ gave travel.

Some would call him genius 10 or curly-headed sphinx, riding music out of sight
and noisy as a lynx.

Here we go again,
counting up our dead:
15 syncopated bullets,
hard rain on our heads,⁷ foxes in the hen house,

freedom on the rack.
Somebody sing something!
20 The times are a-changin' back.

JOSE B. GONZALEZ

Elvis in the Inner City

I was Elvis in the 70s, not swinging hips,
 Not wearing suede shoes, but just the same,
 In Canvas Chuck Taylors with my own svelte moves, Spinning rap, scratching vinyl to the tunes of 5 Kurtis Blow, the Sugarhill Gang, Grandmaster Flash⁶
 And the hip-hop of the hibity-hip-hip of other Rappers, making rap mine, rhyming to
 The boogie to the boom of the beat, beat, beat.

Mom and Dad's charros, same as Lawrence Welk's⁷
 10 Instrumentals were stuff of old country boleros,⁸
 But I had my rap, bebop and I'd rap, rap, rap.

The other side of the city, like the flip side of
 A one-hit wonder, bopped heads to Van Morrison,
 Jim Morrison, and Van Halen,⁹ but I couldn't break
 15 A pop to lyrics that weren't about me,
 Inner city, inequality, in the record store
 I be.

Boom boxes, size of refrigerators, walked up and Down projects giving concerts for free,
 20 And rap was made for me.

5. Pistol, especially semiautomatic.

6. Pioneering Caribbean-born, New York hip-hop artist, DJ, and Rock and Roll Hall of Famer Joseph Saddler (b. 1958). Kurtis Blow: U.S. rapper and record producer Kurt Walker (b. 1959), widely regarded as the first rapper to sign with a major record label (in 1979). Sugarhill Gang: U.S. rap group whose "Rapper's Delight" (1979) was arguably the first rap single to hit the Top 40.

7. U.S. accordionist and bandleader (1903–92) who hosted his own show from 1945 to 1982, featuring often sentimental earlier-twentieth-century standards performed by a big band and wholesome singers. Charros: literally, a Mexican horseman or cowboy, but here likely used to refer to the music of mariachi bands, who traditionally wear elaborate "charro" outfits.

Until I—a lone white square on a checkerboard,
 Reciting amidst Blacks of the block—
 Froze, could not get my lips to vibrate,
 Sync the refrain of the word
 25 “nigger.”

I, rockless, rapless,
 Without a side A nor a side B,
 Stuttered, strutted, struggled,
 To find someone who would

- How does Gonzalez use various sound effects, as well as the arrangement of words on the page (into lines and stanzas), to characterize the speaker's evolving relationship to hip hop?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Is there a meaningful difference between poetry and song lyrics? between poetry and rap? Is hip-hop a form of literature? Write an essay in which you explore the definitions of “poetry” and “lyrics.” Be sure to cite enough examples to illustrate your ideas.
2. Find on the Internet the lyrics of a song (of any genre) that in your opinion uses words well, and download or print out one or more versions. First, notice any variations between the text(s) you find and the words you hear when listening to the song. Using a correct version of the lyrics (as you determine it), scan the lines for meter and rhyme. Are any words or syllables used to keep the beat without adding to the meaning (like the word “do,” in Pope's SOUND AND SENSE)? Are any rhymes dependent on vowel sounds rather than consonants (that is, do they not quite rhyme in print)? How does the refrain (if any) vary from the rest of the lyrics, and how does it relate to the title or theme of the song? Which lines or verses are most important to the “story” or the feeling relayed by the song? How would you describe the diction and tone of the “speaker” of the words, and how does it compare with the vocal style of the singer? Write a descriptive response paper on these words as a poem without music, and as lyrics within the song. Are they equally successful in print as they are when performed with music?
3. Drawing on Mos Def's HIP HOP and the lyrics to at least two other songs, write an essay exploring the rhythm and sound devices peculiar to hip-hop or rap. How especially do its rhythmic patterns compare to those of metered poetry?
4. Write an essay comparing either Mos Def's HIP HOP to Jose B. Gonzalez's poem about hip-hop or Bob Dylan's THE TIMES THEY ARE A-CHANGIN' to Linda Pastan's poem LISTENING TO BOB DYLAN, 2005. Be sure to consider content—or what the song and the poem say about music or their times—and form—how the poem and/versus the song say it, especially through sound.

INTERNAL STRUCTURE

“Proper words in proper places”: That is how one great writer of English prose, Jonathan Swift, described good writing. A good poet finds appropriate words, and already we have looked at some implications for readers of the verbal choices a poet makes. But the poet must also decide where to put those words—how to arrange them for maximum semantic, as well as visual and aural, effect—because individual words, figures of speech, symbols, and sounds exist not only within phrases and sentences and rhythmic patterns, but also within the larger whole of the poem. How should the words be arranged and the poem organized? What comes first and what last? What principle or idea of organization will inform the poem? How do the parts combine into a whole? And what is the effect of that arrangement? Considering these questions from the poet’s point of view (What is my plan? Where shall I begin? Where do I want to go?) can help us notice the effects of structural choices.

DIVIDING POEMS INTO “PARTS”

It’s useful to think of most poems—whether narrative, dramatic, or lyric—as informally divisible into parts, distinguished from each other by shifts in subject matter or topic, in tone, in address, in tense, or in mode (from narration to reflection or description, for example), and so on. As you read a new poem, look out for such shifts, however subtle, to determine how many parts you think the poem has and how each part relates to, and builds on, the one before. The following lyric, for example, seems to have two parts. How does each part relate to the other? What differentiates and connects them?

PAT MORA

 between two rooms, I hear quiet clicks, cups of black coffee, click, click like facts
 5 budgets, tenure, curriculum,

 suits, quick beige smiles
 that seldom sneak into their eyes.

I peek
 10 in the other room señoras

in faded dresses stir sweet milk coffee, laughter whirls
 with steam from fresh tamales
*sh, sh, mucho ruido,*¹
 15 they scold one another,
 press their lips, trap smiles
 in their dark, Mexican eyes.
 1986

This poem's two parts closely resemble each other in that each describes the women who inhabit one of the "two rooms" the speaker "live[s]" "between." Both descriptions include sights ("crisp beige / suits," "faded dresses"), sounds ("quiet clicks," "laughter"), and even the suggestion of tastes ("black / coffee," "sweet / milk coffee"). Yet the relation between the two parts and the two rooms is clearly one of contrast ("crisp / [. . .] suits" versus "faded dresses," "quiet clicks" versus "laughter," etc.). Here different languages, habits, sights, sounds, and values characterize the worlds symbolized by the two rooms, and the poem is organized around the contrast between them. The meaning of the poem (the difference between the two worlds and the experience of living between them) is very nearly the same as the structure.

To fully understand that meaning and the poem, we would need to tease out all those contrasts and their implications. We would also need to consider the significance of the author's choice not only to make the two parts essentially equal in length, but also to order them as she does. How would the poem and our sense of the speaker's feelings about the two rooms be different if we simply rearranged its lines, as follows?

I live in a doorway between two rooms, I hear señoras
 in faded dresses stir sweet milk coffee, laughter whirls
 with steam from fresh tamales
sh, sh, mucho ruido,
 they scold one another,
 press their lips, trap smiles
 in their dark, Mexican eyes.

I peek
 in the other room, I hear quiet clicks, cups of black coffee, click, click like facts
 budgets, tenure, curriculum,
 from careful women in crisp beige
 suits, quick beige smiles
 that seldom sneak into their eyes.

1. A lot of noise.

INTERNAL VERSUS EXTERNAL OR FORMAL “PARTS”

In SONRISAS, the internal division created by the speaker’s shift in focus (from one room and world to another) corresponds to the poem’s formal or “external” division into two stanzas and two sentences. Internal and external or formal divisions need not always coincide with each other, however. Major shifts in a poem can and do occur in the middle of a stanza, a line, even a sentence. Take the following poem. Only one sentence and one stanza long, it has no formal divisions at all. Yet it, too, arguably divides into two parts. As you read the poem, consider whether you agree and, if so, where you think the shift occurs.

GALWAY KINNELL

Blackberry Eating

I love to go out in late September among the fat, overripe, icy, black blackberries to eat blackberries for breakfast, the stalks very prickly, a penalty
 5 they earn for knowing the black art of blackberry-making; and as I stand among them lifting the stalks to my mouth, the ripest berries fall almost unbidden to my tongue, as words sometimes do, certain peculiar words 10 like strengths or *squinch*ed, many-lettered, one-syllabled lumps,
 which I squeeze, squinch open, and splurge well in the silent, startled, icy, black language of blackberry-eating in late September.

1980

The poem’s first eight lines relate the speaker’s experience of just what the title leads us to expect—blackberry eating. But notice what happens in line 9: The speaker’s focus shifts from the topic of blackberries to the topic of words, with the word “as” signaling that we’re entering the second phase of an analogy (or extended simile) comparing the experience we’ve just read about (eating blackberries) to the one we now begin to read about (forming words), with both berries and words “fall[ing] almost unbidden to [the] tongue” (line 8). Here, then, the relation between the poem’s two parts and the two objects and experiences they describe is one of likeness rather than contrast. Fittingly enough for a poem about connection and comparison, as well as vaguely round “lumps” of things (line 11), the poem’s final line ends with the same words as its first (“late September”). In a sense, then, the poem might be described as having a circular, as well as two-part (or “bipartite”), structure.

LYRICS AS INTERNAL DRAMAS

Obviously, not all poems consist of only two parts, as do those above. The following poem, for example, arguably divides into three parts. Just as important, in this poem the relationship between the parts seems to be one of development, tracing a change of outlook or attitude within the speaker.

SEAMUS HEANEY

Punishment²

I can feel the tug
of the halter at the nape
of her neck, the wind
on her naked front.

5 It blows her nipples
to amber beads,
it shakes the frail rigging
of her ribs.

I can see her drowned
10 body in the bog,
the weighing stone,
the floating rods and boughs.

Under which at first
she was a barked sapling
15 that is dug up
oak-bone, brain-firkin:

her shaved head
like a stubble of black corn,
her blindfold a soiled bandage,
20 her noose a ring

to store
the memories of love.
Little adulteress,
before they punished you

25 you were flaxen-haired, undernourished, and your tar-black face was beautiful.
My poor scapegoat,

I almost love you
30 but would have cast, I know,
the stones of silence.
I am the artful voyeur

of your brain's exposed and darkened combs,
35 your muscles' webbing
and all your numbered bones:

2. According to the Roman historian Tacitus (c. 56–c. 120 CE), Germanic peoples punished adulterous women by first shaving their heads and then banishing or killing them. In 1951, in Windeby, Germany, the naked body of a young girl from the first century CE was pulled from the bog where she had been murdered. In contemporary Ireland, “betraying sisters” (line 38) have sometimes been punished by the Irish Republican Army for associating with British soldiers.

I who have stood dumb
 when your betraying sisters, cauled³ in tar,
 40 wept by the railings,
 who would connive
 in civilized outrage
 yet understand the exact and tribal, intimate revenge.
 1975

Here, the first shift seems to come in line 23 (again, in the middle of a stanza rather than its beginning): Up to this point, the speaker has described the long-dead girl in the third person (e.g., “her neck,” “her nipples,” lines 3, 5; emphasis added). And despite his twice-repeated emphasis on his own perceptions and responses (“I can feel,” “I can see,” lines 1, 9; emphasis added), the girl herself gets most of the attention. Starting in line 23, however, the speaker begins to speak to the girl directly, addressing her in the second person (“you”) and through epithets (“Little adulteress,” “poor scapegoat,” lines 23, 28). Verb tense shifts, too (“were,” line 25), as the speaker begins to imagine the girl’s life “before they punished” her (line 24). In at least two ways, then, the speaker seems to be coming closer to the girl, now seeing and addressing her as a human being with a history rather than as a thing to be looked at and talked about. At the same time, the speaker focuses more on himself as well, expressing his emotions (“I almost love you,” line 29) and reflecting somewhat critically on the way he looked at the girl’s body—and allowed us to—earlier in the poem (“I am the artful voyeur,” line 32).

Subject matter and tense shift again, however, in line 37: The poem’s final two stanzas consider the speaker’s behavior toward the “betraying sisters” (line 38) in an indeterminate past (“I [. . .] have,” line 37), as if here he describes not one specific experience, but rather a composite of many. Aside from the “your,” in line 38, the girl herself seems to have disappeared from the poem (so much so that even that “your” now seems potentially ambiguous: Might it now also refer to someone else?). Though in this poem, unlike BLACKBERRY EATING, we don’t have the word as to signal an analogy, it seems clear that Heaney’s speaker has, over the course of the poem, come to see a similarity between his own complex attitude toward the long-dead girl and the “betraying sisters,” the behavior of those responsible for these women’s various punishments, and even between writing a poem about such women and punishing them. How and why so?

Though PUNISHMENT is by no means a dramatic poem in the literal sense, it does—like some other lyrics—relate an internal drama of sorts, tracing the process through which its speaker comes to see or accept, as well as share with us, some truth about or insight into the world or himself that he didn’t see or accept previously, somewhat as a fictional character might in a dramatic or narrative poem or in a short story. In reading and writing about such poems, a good topic to explore might well be just what insight the speaker comes to over the course of the poem, and when and why so.

3. Wrapped or enclosed as if in a caul (the inner fetal membrane of higher vertebrates that sometimes covers the head at birth).

Analyzing Internal Structure: An Exercise

Like “Punishment,” both of the following poems arguably trace a development in their speakers’ perceptions of themselves or the world around them, even if the realization to which the speakers come and the process by which they get there differ. As you read each poem, think about where and why the shifts come both in the poem and in the speaker’s outlook. In which poem does the change within the speaker seem to happen during the poem itself (as in “Punishment”), and which poem might instead depict the change as one that happened at some earlier, unspecified point in time?

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

Frost at Midnight

The frost performs its secret ministry,
 Unhelped by any wind. The owl’s cry
 Came loud—and hark, again! loud as before.
 The inmates of my cottage, all at rest,
 5 Have left me to that solitude, which suits
 Abstruser musings: save that at my side
 My cradled infant slumbers peacefully.
 ’Tis calm indeed! so calm, that it disturbs
 And vexes meditation with its strange
 10 And extreme silentness. Sea, hill, and wood,
 This populous village! Sea, and hill, and wood,
 With all the numberless goings on of life,
 Inaudible as dreams! the thin blue flame
 Lies on my low burnt fire, and quivers not;
 15 Only that film,⁴ which fluttered on the grate,
 Still flutters there, the sole unquiet thing.
 Methinks, its motion in this hush of nature
 Gives it dim sympathies with me who live,
 Making it a companionable form,
 20 Whose puny flaps and freaks the idling Spirit
 By its own moods interprets, every where
 Echo or mirror seeking of itself,
 And makes a toy of Thought.

But O! how oft,
 How oft, at school, with most believing mind,
 25 Presageful, have I gazed upon the bars,
 To watch that fluttering stranger! and as oft
 With unclosed lids, already had I dreamt

4. In all parts of the kingdom these films are called strangers and supposed to portend the arrival of some absent friend [Coleridge’s note]. The “film” is a piece of soot fluttering on the bar of the grate.

Of my sweet birth-place, and the old church-tower,
 Whose bells, the poor man's only music, rang
 30 From morn to evening, all the hot Fair-day,
 So sweetly, that they stirred and haunted me
 With a wild pleasure, falling on mine ear
 Most like articulate sounds of things to come!
 So gazed I, till the soothing things I dreamt
 35 Lulled me to sleep, and sleep prolonged my dreams!
 And so I brooded all the following morn,
 Awed by the stern preceptor's face, mine eye
 Fixed with mock study on my swimming book:
 Save if the door half opened, and I snatched
 40 A hasty glance, and still my heart leaped up,
 For still I hoped to see the stranger's face,
 Townsman, or aunt, or sister more beloved,
 My play-mate when we both were clothed alike!⁵

Dear Babe, that sleepest cradled by my side,
 45 Whose gentle breathings, heard in this deep calm,
 Fill up the interspersed vacancies
 And momentary pauses of the thought!
 My babe so beautiful! it thrills my heart
 With tender gladness, thus to look at thee,
 50 And think that thou shalt learn far other lore
 And in far other scenes! For I was reared
 In the great city, pent 'mid cloisters dim,
 And saw nought lovely but the sky and stars.
 But thou, my babe! shalt wander like a breeze
 55 By lakes and sandy shores, beneath the crags
 Of ancient mountain, and beneath the clouds,
 Which image in their bulk both lakes and shores
 And mountain crags: so shalt thou see and hear
 The lovely shapes and sounds intelligible
 60 Of that eternal language, which thy God
 Utters, who from eternity doth teach
 Himself in all, and all things in himself.
 Great universal Teacher! he shall mould
 Thy spirit, and by giving make it ask.

65 Therefore all seasons shall be sweet to thee,
 Whether the summer clothe the general earth
 With greenness, or the redbreast sit and sing
 Betwixt the tufts of snow on the bare branch
 Of mossy apple-tree, while the nigh thatch
 70 Smokes in the sun-thaw; whether the eave-drops fall
 Heard only in the trances of the blast,

Or if the secret ministry of frost
 Shall hang them up in silent icicles,
 Quietly shining to the quiet Moon.

- Coleridge described some of his poems, including FROST AT MIDNIGHT, as having a circular structure. How and why might this poem seem circular, or in what way does its end resemble its beginning? In what way are the two different? How might the resemblance and difference help us recognize the change in the speaker's outlook?

SHARON OLDS

The Victims

When Mother divorced you, we were glad. She took it and took it, in silence, all those years and then kicked you out, suddenly, and her kids loved it. Then you were fired, and we 5 grinned inside, the way people grinned when Nixon's helicopter lifted off the South
 Lawn for the last time.⁶ We were tickled to think of your office taken away, your secretaries taken away,
 10 your lunches with three double bourbons, your pencils, your reams of paper. Would they take your suits back, too, those dark carcasses hung in your closet, and the black noses of your shoes with their large pores?
 15 She had taught us to take it, to hate you and take it until we pricked with her for your annihilation, Father. Now I pass the bums in doorways, the white slugs of their bodies gleaming through slits in their 20 suits of compressed silt, the stained flippers of their hands, the underwater fire of their eyes, ships gone down with the lanterns lit, and I wonder who took it and took it from them in silence until they had 25 given it all away and had nothing left but this.

1984

- How are the speakers' shifting attitudes toward her father (and the poem's parts) both related and differentiated by repetition of the word took?

6. When Richard Nixon resigned the U.S. presidency on August 8, 1974, his exit from the White House (by helicopter from the lawn) was televised live.

MAKING ARGUMENTS ABOUT STRUCTURE

Dividing a poem into parts and analyzing its internal structure as we have here isn't an exact science: Different readers might well come to slightly different conclusions about the nature, timing, and significance of key shifts and thus about just how many parts a poem might be said to have, how one part relates to another, and what sort of whole those parts create. It seems quite possible, for example, to argue that THE VICTIMS has either two parts or three, depending on what you make of lines 15–17 (up to the word “Now”), or that FROST AT MIDNIGHT has three, four, even five parts. In these cases, as in many others, there is no single correct answer. Indeed, ample room for disagreement is in a way precisely the point: Formulating your own ideas about just where important shifts come in a poem and just why they're important, identifying good evidence to support your conclusions, and considering alternative ways of understanding the poem's structure may take you far down the path to developing your own particular argument about how the poem as a whole works and means.

POEMS WITHOUT “PARTS”

As we've seen, too, dividing a poem into parts is simply a useful way to begin to explore and analyze its structure rather than the entire point or end of such analysis. And this is all the more obviously the case with those poems that contain no major shifts and thus no distinct “parts” at all. Such poems nonetheless have a distinct structure; their authors, too, must figure out how to organize their material so as to create something like a beginning, middle, and end. And here, too, such structural choices determine how the poem moves and means. The following poem is a case in point: One sentence and one stanza long, with no major shifts, how does it nonetheless manage both to cohere and develop? What picture of America results both from its particular details and the way they are organized?

WALT WHITMAN

I Hear America Singing

I hear America singing, the varied carols I hear,

Those of mechanics, each one singing his as it should be blithe and strong,

The carpenter singing his as he measures his plank or beam,

The mason singing his as he makes ready for work, or leaves off work,

5 The boatman singing what belongs to him in his boat, the deckhand singing on the steamboat deck,

The shoemaker singing as he sits on his bench, the hatter singing as he stands,

The wood-cutter's song, the ploughboy's on his way in the morning, or at noon intermission or at sundown,

The delicious singing of the mother, or of the young wife at work, or of the girl sewing or washing,

Each singing what belongs to him or her and to none else,

- 10 The day what belongs to the day—at night the party of young fellows,
robust, friendly,
Singing with open mouths their strong melodious songs.

1860

By limiting himself to a single sentence and a single stanza, which nonetheless refers to a multitude of people and “songs,” Whitman produces a poem that structurally embodies the motto on the U.S. seal—e pluribus unum, “Out of many, one.” The “many ones” with whom the poem begins are all ordinary men who work with their hands: From “mechanics” (line 2) to a “boatman” (line 5) and “plough-boy” (line 7), they work on land and shore, in city and country. Though line 8 doesn’t constitute a major shift, it does subtly broaden and further develop the poem’s picture of America: Women enter the poem; and though they, too, are depicted “at work,” the fact that they are identified specifically as a “mother,” “young wife,” and “girl” introduces, too, the idea both of generations and of family, two important social groups that intervene between many individuals, on the one hand, and an entire country, on the other. Finally, at poem’s end, we move from “day” to “night” and from labor to leisure, in a way that makes clear that these oppositions and time itself have also been structuring principles all along: Line 4, after all, describes the mason as singing “as he makes ready for [. . .] or leaves off work,” line 7 the plough-boy and wood-cutter each making “his way in the morning, or at noon intermission or at sundown.” By its close, then, the poem has shown us a full day of life in Whitman’s version of America and in the lives of those whose various, unique “carols” (line 1) combine to create a single American song.

POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

As you read each of the following poems, consider the following questions: Does the poem seem to divide into internal “parts”? If so, where and why? What are the major shifts? How does each part build on the last? How do the parts combine into a meaningful whole? If the poem doesn’t seem divisible into parts, what are its organizing principles? How does the poem build and develop, and what overall picture or even theme results?

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

[Th’ expense of spirit in a waste of shame]

- Th’ expense of spirit in a waste⁷ of shame
Is lust in action; and, till action, lust
Is perjured, murderous, bloody, full of blame,
Savage, extreme, rude, cruel, not to trust;
5 Enjoyed no sooner but despisèd straight:
Past reason hunted; and no sooner had,
Past reason hated, as a swallowed bait,
On purpose laid to make the taker mad:
Mad in pursuit, and in possession so;
10 Had, having, and in quest to have, extreme;

7. Using up; also, desert. Expense: expending.

A bliss in proof,⁸ and proved, a very woe;
 Before, a joy proposed; behind, a dream.
 All this the world well knows; yet none knows well
 To shun the heaven that leads men to this hell.

1609

- Paraphrase this poem. What emotional stages accompany the carrying out of a violent or lustful act? Is Shakespeare an insightful psychologist? What is his major insight about how lust works?

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

Ode to the West Wind

I

O wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being,
 Thou, from whose unseen presence the leaves dead
 Are driven, like ghosts from an enchanter fleeing,

5 Yellow, and black, and pale, and hectic red,
 Pestilence-stricken multitudes: O thou,
 Who chariotest to their dark wintry bed

The wingèd seeds, where they lie cold and low,
 Each like a corpse within its grave, until Thine azure sister of the Spring shall blow

10 Her clarion⁹ o'er the dreaming earth, and fill (Driving sweet buds like flocks to feed in air)
 With living hues and odors plain and hill:

Wild Spirit, which art moving everywhere;
 Destroyer and preserver; hear, oh, hear!

II

15 Thou on whose stream, mid the steep sky's commotion,
 Loose clouds like earth's decaying leaves are shed,
 Shook from the tangled boughs of Heaven and Ocean,

Angels¹ of rain and lightning: there are spread
 On the blue surface of thine aëry surge,

20 Like the bright hair uplifted from the head

Of some fierce Maenad,² even from the dim verge
 Of the horizon to the zenith's height,
 The locks of the approaching storm. Thou dirge

Of the dying year, to which this closing night

25 Will be the dome of a vast sepulcher,
 Vaulted with all thy congregated might

8. In the act. 9. Trumpet call. 1. Messengers. 2. Frenzied female votary of Dionysus, the Greek god of vegetation and fertility who was supposed to die in the fall and rise again each spring.

Of vapors, from whose solid atmosphere
Black rain, and fire, and hail will burst: oh, hear!

III

Thou who didst waken from his summer dreams
30 The blue Mediterranean, where he lay,
Lulled by the coil of his crystalline streams,
Beside a pumice isle in Baiae's bay,³
And saw in sleep old palaces and towers
Quivering within the wave's intenser day,
35 All overgrown with azure moss and flowers
So sweet, the sense faints picturing them! Thou
For whose path the Atlantic's level powers
Cleave themselves into chasms, while far below
The sea-blooms and the oozy woods which wear
40 The sapless foliage of the ocean, know
Thy voice, and suddenly grow gray with fear,
And tremble and despoil themselves:⁴ oh, hear!

IV

If I were a dead leaf thou mightest bear;
If I were a swift cloud to fly with thee;
45 A wave to pant beneath thy power, and share
The impulse of thy strength, only less free
Than thou, O uncontrollable! If even
I were as in my boyhood, and could be
The comrade of thy wanderings over Heaven,
50 As then, when to outstrip thy skyey speed
Scarce seemed a vision; I would ne'er have striven
As thus with thee in prayer in my sore need.
Oh, lift me as a wave, a leaf, a cloud!
I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!
55 A heavy weight of hours has chained and bowed
One too like thee: tameless, and swift, and proud.

V

Make me thy lyre, even as the forest is:
What if my leaves are falling like its own!
The tumult of thy mighty harmonies
60 Will take from both a deep, autumnal tone,
Sweet though in sadness. Be thou, Spirit fierce,
My spirit! Be thou me, impetuous one!

3. Where Roman emperors had erected villas, west of Naples.

4. The vegetation at the bottom of the sea . . . sympathizes with that of the land in the change of seasons [Shelley's note].

Drive my dead thoughts over the universe
 Like withered leaves to quicken a new birth!
 65 And, by the incantation of this verse,
 Scatter, as from an unextinguished hearth
 Ashes and sparks, my words among mankind!
 Be through my lips to unawakened earth
 The trumpet of a prophecy! O Wind,
 70 If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?

PHILIP LARKIN

Church Going

Once I am sure there's nothing going on
 I step inside, letting the door thud shut.
 Another church: matting, seats, and stone,
 And little books; sprawlings of flowers, cut
 5 For Sunday, brownish now; some brass and stuff
 Up at the holy end; the small neat organ;
 And a tense, musty, unignorable silence,
 Brewed God knows how long. Hatless, I take off
 My cycle-clips in awkward reverence,
 10 Move forward, run my hand around the font.
 From where I stand, the roof looks almost new—Cleaned, or restored? Someone would know: I don't.
 Mounting the lectern, I peruse a few
 Hectoring large-scale verses, and pronounce 15 "Here endeth" much more loudly than I'd meant.
 The echoes snigger briefly. Back at the door
 I sign the book, donate an Irish sixpence,
 Reflect the place was not worth stopping for.
 Yet stop I did: in fact I often do,
 20 And always end much at a loss like this,
 Wondering what to look for; wondering, too,
 When churches fall completely out of use
 What we shall turn them into, if we shall keep
 A few cathedrals chronically on show,
 25 Their parchment, plate and pyx in locked cases,
 And let the rest rent-free to rain and sheep.
 Shall we avoid them as unlucky places?
 Or, after dark, will dubious women come
 To make their children touch a particular stone;

30 Pick simples⁵ for a cancer; or on some Advised night see walking a dead one?
 Power of some sort or other will go on
 In games, in riddles, seemingly at random;
 But superstition, like belief, must die,
 35 And what remains when disbelief has gone?
 Grass, weedy pavement, brambles, buttress, sky,

 A shape less recognizable each week,
 A purpose more obscure. I wonder who Will be the last, the very last, to seek 40 This place for what it was; one of the crew
 That tap and jot and know what rood-lofts⁶ were?
 Some ruin-bibber,⁷ randy for antique,
 Or Christmas-addict, counting on a whiff
 Of gown-and-bands and organ-pipes and myrrh?
 45 Or will he be my representative,

 Bored, uninformed, knowing the ghostly silt
 Dispersed, yet tending to this cross of ground
 Through suburb scrub because it held unpilt
 So long and equably what since is found
 50 Only in separation—marriage, and birth,
 And death, and thoughts of these—for whom was built
 This special shell? For, though I've no idea
 What this accoutered frowsty barn is worth,
 It pleases me to stand in silence here;

 55 A serious house on serious earth it is,
 In whose blent⁸ air all our compulsions meet,
 Are recognized, and robed as destinies.
 And that much never can be obsolete,
 Since someone will forever be surprising
 60 A hunger in himself to be more serious,
 And gravitating with it to this ground,
 Which, he once heard, was proper to grow wise in,
 If only that so many dead lie round.

- Describe the parts of this poem. How do the first two stanzas differ from the rest of the poem? Where and how does the poem shift from the personal to the general?

5. Medicinal herbs.

6. Galleries atop the screens (on which crosses are mounted) that divide the naves or main bodies of churches from the choirs or chancels.

7. Literally, ruin-drinker: someone extremely attracted to antiquarian objects.

8. Blended.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK
PHILIP LARKIN (1922–85)

From “A Conversation with Ian Hamilton” (1964)*

It [“Church Going”] is of course an entirely secular poem. I was a bit irritated by an American who insisted to me it was a religious poem. It isn’t religious at all. Religion surely means that the affairs of this world are under divine surveillance, and so on, and I go to some pains to point out that I don’t bother about that kind of thing. [. . .]

[. . .] the poem is about going to church, not religion—I tried to suggest this by the title—and the union of the important stages of human life—birth, marriage and death—that going to church represents; and my own feeling that when they are dispersed into the registry office and the crematorium chapel life will become thinner in consequence. (22)

From “An Interview with John Haffenden” (1981)

It [“Church Going”] came from the first time I saw a ruined church in Northern Ireland, and I’d never seen a ruined church before—discarded. It shocked me. Now of course it’s commonplace: churches are not so much ruined as turned into bingo-halls, warehouses for refrigerators or split-level houses for architects.

It’s not clear in the poem that you began with a ruined church.

No, it wasn’t in the poem, but when you go into a church there’s a feeling of something . . . well . . . over, derelict.

Some critics have discerned in it a yearning for a latter-day Christian or religious sanction. Is that so?

I suppose so. I’m not someone who’s lost faith: I never had it. I was baptized [. . .] but not confirmed. Aren’t religions shaped in terms of what people want? No one could help hoping Christianity was true, or at least the happy ending—rising from the dead and our sins forgiven. One longs for these miracles, and so in a sense one longs for religion. But “Church Going” isn’t that kind of poem: it’s a humanist poem, a celebration of the dignity of . . . well, you know what it says. (56–57)

Greening

It never ends, the bruise

- When, how, and why might the speaker's outlook or attitude shift over the course of the poem?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. What words and patterns are repeated in the different stanzas of Shelley's ODE TO THE WEST WIND? What differences are there from stanza to stanza? What "progress" does the poem make? Write an essay in which you discuss the ways that meaning and structure are intertwined in Shelley's poem.
2. Write an essay that explores the use of contrast in Pat Mora's SONRISAS. How is each of the two rooms in the poem characterized by way of contrast with the other? What do they individually and jointly symbolize? What does the poem show through this contrast?
3. Pick out any poem you have read in this book that seems particularly effective in the way it is put together. Write an essay in which you consider how the poem is organized—that is, what structural principles it employs. What do the choices of speaker, situation, and setting have to do with the poem's structure? What other artistic decisions contribute to its structure?

SAMPLE WRITING: ESSAY-IN-PROGRESS

The following piece of writing by student Lindsay Gibson was originally just one section of a longer essay on multiple poems by Philip Larkin. Though the beginning and middle of the piece work fine out of that context, you'll notice that we haven't supplied either the complete title or the real conclusion that the piece needs to have in order to be an entire, effective essay. What should the piece be titled? How might it be brought to a more satisfying conclusion?

You will notice, too, that the essay focuses only in part and somewhat unevenly on issues related to internal structure. How might the essay make more of the poem's structure? More generally, what are the weakest and strongest moments and aspects of the essay? How might its argument be improved or expanded? Answering such questions for yourself or discussing them with your classmates might be a useful way to better understand the qualities of a good argument, a good title, and a good conclusion.

Philip Larkin's "Church Going"

Philip Larkin is one of the semester's most fascinating poets. His use of colloquial language, regular meter, and rhyme sets him slightly apart from other poets of his day, many of whom write in varying forms of verse, use nearly indecipherable language, and rarely, if ever, make use of rhyme at all. Many of his poems are fraught with existential crises, the nature of which only someone living in the postmodern world could understand; consequently, his poems contain a lot of meaning for the contemporary reader.

Larkin's most fascinating poem, "Church Going," embodies many of his best attributes as a poet: it uses everyday, standard English and is therefore easy to read and understand, yet its stanzas contain a real search for meaning that its simple language might not immediately invite the reader to ponder. The poem also addresses one of Larkin's main preoccupations: religion, and specifically the role of religion in a postmodern world. Even with all of this, the most engaging aspect of the poem is the duality reflected in its structure: at first and on the one hand, the speaker makes quiet fun of religion; later and on the other hand, he reveals to us his own search for meaning and the answers that he realizes religion may or may not be able to give him.

The first two stanzas of “Church Going” contain a narrative of a seemingly secular man entering a church he has passed along his way. The speaker observes the layout of the building, the various accoutrements common to a church, and views it all with a mild sense of sarcasm or awkward reverence. His language almost insists on his self-proclaimed ignorance: “Someone would know; I don’t” (line 12). And he foreshadows the rest of the poem when appraising the roof of the church as one would an antique: “Cleaned, or restored?” (12). At the end of the second stanza, the speaker reflects that “the place was not worth stopping for” (18). Yet stop he did, and that tells us volumes about what the rest of the poem is about.

In the third stanza, the poem’s tone and the speaker’s attitude shift as the speaker begins to ponder big questions about religion in today’s world: does it have any meaning left? Should it? The speaker reveals to us that he often stops at churches like these, searching for meaning, yet “Wondering what to look for” (21), not even knowing what the questions are that he wants answered. His use of words like “parchment, plate and pyx” (25) reveals to us that he is not as ignorant about religious liturgy as he would have us believe—which, in turn, is further evidence of the dual nature of the poem: The speaker wants us to believe he doesn’t know or care about anything to do with religion, yet he has been on his quest for meaning long enough to know the names of things he claims he does not. The last line of the third stanza poses another compelling question, this time about the future: after churches fall out of use, “Shall we avoid them as unlucky places?” (27). The question of whether, when faith is finally dead, people will still cling to superstitions such as luck and supernatural powers of whatever nature is a fascinating one.

The speaker goes on to explore this question in the next few stanzas by imagining some specific ways in which superstition might persist after religion is gone: women might take their children to “touch a particular stone” (29) or pick herbs around the church to use for medicinal purposes. But in all these imagined examples, no one actually goes to the church to worship anymore. In stanza 4, the speaker presents various tableaux of people using the church for more and more mundane uses, such as a student of architecture, someone else who only likes to see the ruins of old buildings simply because they’re old, and finally, and somewhat paradoxically, a “Christmas-addict” (43) who (presumably) wants to see the last religious remnants of his beloved, commoditized, and commercialized holiday. The last person who might visit the church in this post-religion world might even be a doppelganger of the speaker himself, who, though claiming to be “bored” and “uninformed” (46), visits the church because “it held unspilt / So long and equably what since is found / Only in separation— marriage, and birth, / And death, and thoughts of these” (48-51). Once again the speaker insists that he is ignorant and careless of religion, but goes on to betray the fact that even if he does not believe in the religion itself, he is fascinated by the idea that it held “unspilt” what people now only find in marriages, births, and deaths: meaning. It is at this point that the reader can truly appreciate the point and purpose of this whole poem: meaning, and the search for it. It seems poignant that the speaker realizes there is more meaning in the church itself than any other place, whether actual belief in religion is there or not.

The last stanza seems to be an attempt on the speaker’s part to reconcile the opposing forces of the poem—the speaker’s insistence that he cares nothing for religion and that religion is meaningless anyway versus his existential need to find some kind of meaning that will justify his existence and maybe even the beliefs of others. The speaker finally respects what the church does for people, including himself: one’s “compulsions meet, / Are recognised, and robed as destinies” (56-57). When one wonders if compulsions are merely that, one can go to church and be told that he or she is part of a larger whole—one’s destiny. And if compulsions can be transformed into destinies, at least in the mind of the wonderer, then there will always be value in such a service: “that much never can be obsolete” (58), according to the speaker of the poem.

The last stanzas of the poem are devoted to a man who gravitates to the church because he “once heard [it] was proper to grow wise in, / If only that so many dead lie round” (62-63). Once again, the speaker shows us that even when belief in the religion associated with the church is completely gone, a sense of reverence, if only for the dead, will remain. The belief may be gone, but the sense of a community among people searching for, and perhaps finding, meaning will remain, and people will always be drawn to that, no matter what their belief system (or lack thereof).

The poem itself has another overarching concern that merits discussion: death. There are many images of or mentions of death throughout the poem: There are “flowers, cut / For Sunday, brownish now” (4-5), the words “Here endeth” (15) echoing through the small church, the possibility of someone seeing a “walking dead one” (31), the assertion that “superstition, like belief, must die” (34), talk of the “ghostly silt / Dispersed” (46-47), thoughts of “marriage, and birth, / And death” (50-51). And finally, the last image in the poem is the abandoned church’s graveyard in which “so many dead lie round” (62). Throughout the poem there is death: death of people, death of ideas, death of faith. Death’s pervasiveness is one more way the poem struggles with its dual nature: the poem narrates a serious search for meaning, yet the very definition of death is that there is no meaning. Death is the end, there is nothing more. Any search for meaning is rendered meaningless anyway upon one’s death. The speaker implies that there is even an end to the search for meaning itself. The speaker asks in line 35, perhaps the most powerful line of the whole poem, “And what remains when disbelief has gone?” What is left over when even “disbelief” has died? Is it the beginning of another cycle in the search for meaning, or has even the “faith” that there is nothing out there died as well?

Gibson 4

The poem "Church Going" is a very layered, intensive look at all the things that matter to us as human beings: meaning, death, hope, hopelessness, and the way all of these things blend together in the perpetual existential crisis that is man's very existence.

EXTERNAL FORM

The previous chapters have discussed many of the internal features of a poem that make it unique: the tone and characteristics of its speaker; its situation and setting and its themes; its diction, imagery, and sounds. This chapter ventures into the external form of a poem, including its arrangement on the page and into both visual and verbal units. These formal aspects are external in being recognizable; like the fashion and fabric of clothing that expresses the personality of an individual, the external form is an appropriate garb or guise for the unique internal action and meaning of the poem. When reading a poem, you might immediately notice its stanza breaks. Or you might quickly recognize that the poem takes a traditional form such as the sonnet, or that it simply looks odd. These formal features guide readers as well as the poet. They help readers feel and appreciate repetitions and connections, changes and gaps, in the language as well as the meaning of the poem.

STANZAS

Most poems of more than a few lines are divided into stanzas—groups of lines divided from other groups by white space on the page. Putting some space between groupings of lines has the effect of sectioning a poem, giving its physical appearance a series of divisions that sometimes correspond to turns of thought, changes of scene or image, or other shifts in structure or direction of the kind examined in the last chapter. In Donne's THE FLEA, for example, the stanza divisions mark distinct stages in the action: Between the first and second stanzas, the speaker stops his companion from killing the flea; between the second and third stanzas, the companion follows through on her intention and kills the flea. Any formal division of a poem into stanzas is important to consider; what appear to be gaps or silences may be structural markers.

Historically, stanzas have most often been organized by patterns of rhyme, and often of meter, too; thus stanza divisions have traditionally been a visual indicator of patterns in sound. In most traditional stanza forms, the pattern of rhyme is repeated in stanza after stanza throughout the poem, until voice and ear become familiar with the pattern and come to expect it. The repetition of pattern allows us to hear deviations from the pattern as well, just as we do in music.

TRADITIONAL STANZA FORMS

As the poems in this anthology demonstrate, the forms that stanzas can take are limitless. Over time, however, certain stanza forms have become traditional, or “fixed.” In using traditional stanza forms, poets thus often implicitly or explicitly allude and even respond to previous poets and poems that have used the same form. Like musicians, they also generate new effects, meanings, and music through meaningful variations on traditional forms.

Terza Rima

In Shelley's ODE TO THE WEST WIND, the first and third lines in each stanza rhyme, and the middle line then rhymes with the first and third lines of the next stanza.

O wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being,	a
Thou, from whose unseen presence the leaves dead	b
Are driven, like ghosts from an enchanter fleeing,	a
Yellow, and black, and pale, and hectic red,	b
Pestilence-stricken multitudes: O thou,	c
Who chariotest to their dark wintry bed	b
The wingèd seeds, where they lie cold and low,	c
Each like a corpse within its grave, until	d
Thine azure sister of the Spring shall blow	c

In this stanza form, known as terza rima, the stanzas are linked to each other by a common sound: one rhyme sound from each stanza is picked up in the next stanza, and so on to the end of the poem (though sometimes poems in this form have sections that use varied rhyme schemes). Most traditional stanza forms involve a metrical pattern as well as a rhyme scheme. Terza rima, like most English fixed stanza and verse forms, involves iambic meter (unstressed and stressed syllables alternating regularly), and each line has five beats (pentameter).

As the title of the following poem announces, it, too, is written—at least mostly—in terza rima. And it depends, for its full effect, on our knowing not only that this stanza form was used by Dante in The Divine Comedy, written in Italian in the early 1300s, but also that this three-book epic depicts the poet's journey through Hell (or the inferno) and Purgatory to Paradise.

RICHARD WILBUR

Terza Rima

In this great form, as Dante proved in Hell,
There is no dreadful thing that can't be said
In passing. Here, for instance, one could tell

How our jeep skidded sideways toward the dead
5 Enemy soldier with the staring eyes,
Bumping a little as it struck his head,

And then flew on, as if toward Paradise¹

2008

- What might this poem communicate—about, for example, war, poetry, and/or death—by starting out, but not ending, in terza rima?

1. Perhaps an allusion, too, to Emily Dickinson's "[Because I could not stop for Death—]," which ends with a horse-drawn carriage driven by Death carrying the speaker "toward Eternity—" (line 24).

Terza rima requires many rhymes, and thus many different rhyme words, and therefore it is not very common in English, a language not as rich in rhyme possibilities as Italian or French. English is derived from so many different language families that it has fewer similar word endings than languages that mainly derive from a single language family.

Spenserian Stanza

Named for Edmund Spenser, who used it to great effect in his long poem The Faerie Queene, the Spenserian stanza is even more rhyme-rich than terza rima, using only three rhyme sounds in nine rhymed lines, as in John Keats's The Eve of St. Agnes:

Her falt'ring hand upon the balustrade,	a
Old Angela was feeling for the stair,	b
When Madeline, St. Agnes' charmèd maid,	a
Rose, like a missioned spirit, unaware:	b
With silver taper's light, and pious care,	b
She turned, and down the agèd gossip led	c
To a safe level matting. Now prepare,	b
Young Porphyro, for gazing on that bed;	c
She comes, she comes again, like ring dove frayed and fled	c

Notice that while the first eight lines of a Spenserian stanza are in iambic pentameter, the ninth has one extra foot, making it iambic hexameter.

Ballad Stanza

The much more common ballad stanza has only one set of rhymes in four lines; lines 1 and 3 in each stanza do not rhyme at all. And while those lines are in iambic tetrameter (4 beats/feet), lines 2 and 4 are rhymed iambic trimeter (3 beats/feet).

The king sits in Dumferling toune,	a
Drinking the blude-reid wine:	b
“O whar will I get guid sailor,	c
To sail this ship of mine?”	b

TRADITIONAL VERSE FORMS

Though ballad stanza takes its name from the fact that it is often used in the particular subgenre of poem known as the ballad, stanza forms are not themselves subgenres of poetry, but rather a form that can be used for various kinds of poems. The same is true of other traditional verse forms—set patterns of rhythm and rhyme that govern whole poems or parts of them rather than individual stanzas. Three especially useful verse forms to know are the couplet, blank verse, and free verse.

Any pair of consecutive lines that share end rhymes is called a rhyming couplet, regardless of their meter. Andrew Marvell's To His COY MISTRESS, for example, consists entirely of iambic tetrameter couplets, beginning with these two:

Had we but world enough, and time,	a
This coyneſs, Lady, were no crime.	a

We would sit down and think which way b
 To walk and pass our long love's day. b

A heroic couplet, however, requires iambic pentameter, as in Alexander Pope's SOUND AND SENSE:

But most by numbers judge a poet's song, a
 And smooth or rough, with them, is right or wrong; a
 In the bright muse though thousand charms conspire, b
 Her voice is all these tuneful fools admire b

Near the other end of the spectrum from the heroic couplet sits blank verse, which consists of lines with regular meter, usually iambic pentameter, but no discernible rhyme scheme, as in these lines, which Adam speaks to Eve in John Milton's epic Paradise Lost:

Well hast thou motioned, well thy thoughts employed,
 How we might best fulfil the work which here
 God hath assigned us; nor of me shalt pass
 Unpraised: for nothing lovelier can be found
 In woman, than to study household good,
 And good works in her husband to promote.

Though here used by Milton to describe lofty events of cosmic significance, blank verse was among the least formal and most natural of traditional verse forms until the explosion of free verse in the twentieth century. Now perhaps the most common of verse forms, free verse is "free" precisely because it's defined wholly by what it lacks—both regular meter and rhyme. The wildly different lengths of the following lines from THE WORD PLUM make its use of free verse especially obvious:

taut skin pierced, bitten, provoked into juice, and tart flesh

FIXED FORMS OR FORM-BASED SUBGENRES

Again, all these stanza and verse forms can be used in many different kinds of poems. But some kinds or subgenres of poetry are defined wholly by their use of very particular formal patterns. Perhaps the most famous of these are the sonnet and the haiku, to which we devote the albums that follow this chapter. Others include the limerick (see, for example, THERE WAS A YOUNG GIRL FROM ST. PAUL), the villanelle (DO NOT GO GENTLE INTO THAT GOOD NIGHT, below), the palindrome (MYTH, below), and the sestina (see below). Though relatively rare for much of the twentieth century, such traditional fixed forms have in recent years become increasingly popular once again. McSweeney's Internet Tendency, the online version of the famously eccentric literary magazine edited by novelist Dave Eggers, included no new poetry except sestinas between 2003 and 2006, and you can still find hundreds of examples on its Web site.

You can probably deduce the principles involved in each of these fixed forms by looking carefully at an example; if you have trouble, look at the definitions in the glossary.

TRADITIONAL FORMS: POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

DYLAN THOMAS

Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night²

Do not go gentle into that good night,
 Old age should burn and rave at close of day;
 Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

Though wise men at their end know dark is right,
 5 Because their words had forked no lightning they
 Do not go gentle into that good night.

Good men, the last wave by, crying how bright
 Their frail deeds might have danced in a green bay,
 Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

10 Wild men who caught and sang the sun in flight,
 And learn, too late, they grieved it on its way,
 Do not go gentle into that good night.

Grave men, near death, who see with blinding sight
 Blind eyes could blaze like meteors and be gay,
 15 Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

And you, my father, there on the sad height,
 Curse, bless, me now with your fierce tears, I pray.
 Do not go gentle into that good night.
 Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

1952

- What do the wise, good, wild, and grave men have in common with the speaker's father? Why do you think Thomas chose such a strict form, the villanelle, for such an emotionally charged subject?

2. Written during the final illness of the poet's father.

I was asleep while you were dying.
 It's as if you slipped through some rift, a hollow
 I make between my slumber and my waking, the Erebus³ I keep you in, still trying

Sestina

September rain falls on the house.
 In the failing light, the old grandmother sits in the kitchen with the child beside the Little Marvel Stove, 5 reading the jokes from the almanac, laughing and talking to hide her tears.

She thinks that her equinoctial tears and the rain that beats on the roof of the house were both foretold by the almanac,
 10 but only known to a grandmother.
 The iron kettle sings on the stove.
 She cuts some bread and says to the child,

3. In Greek mythology, the dark region of the underworld through which the dead pass en route to Hades.

It's time for tea now; but the child is watching the teakettle's small hard tears 15 dance like mad on the hot black stove, the way the rain must dance on the house.
 Tidying up, the old grandmother hangs up the clever almanac on its string. Birdlike, the almanac 20 hovers half open above the child, hovers above the old grandmother and her teacup full of dark brown tears.
 She shivers and says she thinks the house feels chilly, and puts more wood in the stove.
 25 It was to be, says the Marvel Stove.
I know what I know, says the almanac.
 With crayons the child draws a rigid house and a winding pathway. Then the child puts in a man with buttons like tears
 30 and shows it proudly to the grandmother.
 But secretly, while the grandmother
 busies herself about the stove, the little moons fall down like tears from between the pages of the almanac 35 into the flower bed the child has carefully placed in the front of the house.

Time to plant tears, says the almanac.
 The grandmother sings to the marvellous stove and the child draws another inscrutable house.

THE WAY A POEM LOOKS

Like stanza breaks, other arrangements of print and space help guide the voice and the mind to a clearer sense of sound and meaning. But sometimes poems are written to be seen rather than heard, and their appearance on the page is crucial to their effect. E. E. Cummings's poem l(a, for example, tries to visualize typographically what the poet asks you to see in your mind's eye.

The unusual spacing of words in the following poem, with some run together and others widely separated, provides a guide to reading, regulating both speed and sense, so that the poem can capture aloud some of the boy's wide-eyed enthusiasm, remembered now from a later perspective. (Notice how the word "defunct" helps establish the time and point of view.)

CONCRETE POETRY

Occasionally, poems are composed in a specific shape so that they look like physical objects. The idea that poems can be related to the visual arts is an old one. Theodoric in ancient Greece is credited with inventing technopaegnia—that is, the construction of poems with visual appeal. Once, the shaping of words to resemble an object was thought to have mystical power, but more recent attempts at concrete poetry, or shaped verse, are usually playful exercises that attempt to supplement (or replace) verbal meanings with devices from painting and sculpture. Here are two examples.

GEORGE HERBERT
Easter Wings

Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store,⁵
Though foolishly he lost the same,
Decaying more and more
Till he became
Most poor:
With thee
O let me rise
As larks,⁶ harmoniously,
And sing this day thy victories:
Then shall the fall further the flight in me.

My tender age in sorrow did begin;
And still with sicknesses and shame
Thou didst so punish sin,
That I became
Most thin.
With thee
Let me combine,
And feel this day thy victory;
For, if I imp⁷ my wing on thine,
Affliction shall advance the flight in me.

1633

- How do this poem's decreasing and increasing line lengths correspond to the meaning of the words? Why do you think Herbert has chosen to present the poem sideways?

5. In plenty. 6. Which herald the morning.

7. Engraft. In falconry, to engraft feathers in a damaged wing, so as to restore the powers of flight (OED).

- What shapes do you see in this poem? How are repeating words or sounds significant to the speaker's apparent statements about what women "should be" or should do (line 2)?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Trace the variations in imagery of light and darkness in Thomas's DO NOT GO GENTLE INTO THAT GOOD NIGHT. How do we know that light represents life and darkness death (rather than, say, sight and blindness)? How does the poet use the strict formal requirements of the villanelle to emphasize this interplay of light and darkness? Write an essay in which you discuss the interaction of form and content in DO NOT GO GENTLE INTO THAT GOOD NIGHT.

2. Which of the poems either mentioned or reproduced in this chapter do you think makes the most effective use of any traditional stanza or verse form? Why and how so? Write a response paper in which you explore your response to the poem and how it is shaped by the poet's choice of a traditional form.
3. Every poem has a particular form, whether or not it adheres to a traditional stanza or verse form or to conventional ideas about line, rhythm, or spacing. Examine closely the form of any poem in this book, including its arrangement on the page and division into lines and stanzas. How does the poet use form to shape sound, emotion, and meaning? Write an essay examining the relationship between the poem's theme and its external form.

From Black, Grey and White: A Book of Visual Sonnets by David Miller.

The Sonnet

AN ALBUM

The sonnet, one of the most persistent and familiar fixed forms, originated in the Middle Ages in Italian and French poetry. It dominated English poetry in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries and then was revived several times from the early nineteenth century onward. Except for some early experiments with length, the sonnet has always been fourteen lines long, and it usually is written in iambic pentameter. It is most often printed as if it were a single stanza, although it actually has formal divisions defined by its various rhyme schemes. For more than four centuries, the sonnet has been surprisingly resilient, and it continues to attract a variety of poets. As a verse form, the sonnet is contained, compact, demanding; whatever it does, it must do concisely. It is best suited to intensity of feeling and concentration of figurative language and expression.

Most sonnets are structured according to one of two principles of division. The English, or Shakespearean, sonnet is divided into three units of four lines each (quatrains) and a final unit of two lines (couplet), and sometimes the line spacing reflects this division. Ordinarily its rhyme scheme reflects the structure: The scheme of abab cdcd efef gg is the classic one, but many variations from that pattern still reflect the basic 4-4-4-2 division. In the Italian, or Petrarchan, sonnet (the Italian poet Petrarch was an early master of this form), the fundamental break is between the first eight lines (called an octave) and the last six (called a sestet). Its “typical” rhyme scheme is abbaabba cdecde, although it, too, produces many variations that still reflect the basic division into two parts, an octave and a sestet.

The two kinds of sonnet structures are useful for different sorts of argument. The 4-4-4-2 structure works very well for constructing a poem that makes a three-step argument (with either a quick summary or a dramatic turn at the end) or for setting up brief, cumulative images. Shakespeare’s THAT TIME OF YEAR THOU MAYST IN ME BEHOLD, for example, uses the 4-4-4-2 structure to mark the progressive steps toward death and the parting of lovers by using three distinct images and then summarizing. In the two-part structure of the Italian sonnet, the octave states a proposition or generalization, and the sestet provides a particular example, consequence, or application of it; alternatively, the second part may turn away from the first to present a new position or response. The final lines may, for example, reverse the first eight and achieve a paradox or irony in the poem, or the poem may nearly balance two comparable arguments. Basically, the 8-6 structure lends itself to poems with two points to make, or to those that make one point and then illustrate or complicate it.

During the Renaissance, poets regularly employed the sonnet for love poems; many modern sonnets continue to be about love or private life, and many poets continue to use a personal, apparently open and sincere tone in their sonnets. But poets often find the sonnet’s compact form and rigid demands equally useful for a variety of subjects and tones. Sonnets may be about subjects other than love: politics, philosophy, discovery. And their tones vary widely, too, from the anger and remorse of TH' EXPENSE OF SPIRIT IN A WASTE OF SHAME to the tender awe of HOW DO I LOVE THEE? (below). Many poets seem to take the kind of comfort in the careful limits of the form that William Wordsworth describes in NUNS FRET NOT (below), finding in its two basic variations, the English sonnet and the Italian sonnet, a wealth of ways to organize their materials into coherent structures.

Sometimes a neat and precise structure is altered as particular needs or effects may demand. And the two basic structures, Shakespearean and Petrarchan, certainly do not define all the structural possibilities within a fourteen-line poem, even if they are the most traditional ways of taking advantage of the sonnet's compact and contained form.

Which of the following sonnets follow the Italian model? the English? In each case, how do form, structure, and content work together? How does each poet adapt the traditional form to his or her particular purpose? Aside from particular patterns of rhyme and meter, what other conventions of the sonnet can you identify? How do individual poems use, rework, even comment on those conventions? (To see how one student answered some of these questions by comparing sonnets by two different writers, see the essay by Melissa Makolin that follows ch. 19.)

FRANCESCO PETRARCH

[Upon the breeze she spread her golden hair]¹

Upon the breeze she spread her golden hair that in a thousand gentle knots was turned,
and the sweet light beyond all measure burned
in eyes where now that radiance is rare;

5 and in her face there seemed to come an air of pity, true or false, that I discerned:
I had love's tinder in my breast unburned,
was it a wonder if it kindled there?

She moved not like a mortal, but as though 10 she bore an angel's form, her words had then a sound that simple human voices lack;

a heavenly spirit, a living sun was what I saw; now, if it is not so,
the wound's not healed because the bow grows slack.

c. 1334–338

- What might this sonnet imply about the relationship between the speaker and the woman described? What do both structure and form contribute to that characterization?

1. Translated by Anthony Mortimer.

HENRY CONSTABLE

[My lady's presence makes the roses red]

My lady's presence makes the roses red,
 Because to see her lips they blush for shame.
 The lily's leaves, for envy, pale became,
 And her white hands in them this envy bred.
 5 The marigold the leaves abroad doth spread,
 Because the sun's and her power is the same.
 The violet of purple colour came,
 Dyed in the blood she made my heart to shed.
 In brief: all flowers from her their virtue take;
 10 From her sweet breath their sweet smells do proceed;
 The living heat which her eyebeams doth make
 Warmeth the ground and quickeneth the seed.
 The rain, wherewith she watereth the flowers,
 Falls from mine eyes, which she dissolves in showers.

1594

- Which type of sonnet is this? How do external form and internal structure here work together?

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

[My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun]

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun;
 Coral is far more red than her lips' red;
 If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun,²
 If hairs be wires, black wires grow on her head.
 5 I have seen roses damasked³ red and white,
 But no such roses see I in her cheeks;
 And in some perfumes is there more delight
 Than in the breath that from my mistress reeks.
 I love to hear her speak, yet well I know
 10 That music hath a far more pleasing sound;
 I grant I never saw a goddess go;⁴
 My mistress, when she walks, treads on the ground.
 And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare
 As any she belied with false compare.

1609

- How might this poem respond to sonnets like Constable's MY LADY'S PRESENCE . . . and Petrarch's UPON THE BREEZE . . . ?

2. Mouse-colored.

3. Variegated.

4. Walk.

[Not marble, nor the gilded monuments]

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments
 Of princes, shall outlive this powerful rhyme;
 But you shall shine more bright in these contents
 Than unswept stone, besmeared with sluttish time.
 5 When wasteful war shall statues overturn,
 And broils⁵ root out the work of masonry,
 Nor Mars his⁶ sword nor war's quick fire shall burn
 The living record of your memory.
 'Gainst death and all-oblivious enmity
 10 Shall you pace forth; your praise shall still find room
 Even in the eyes of all posterity
 That wear this world out to the ending doom.⁷
 So, till the judgment that yourself arise,
 You live in this, and dwell in lovers' eyes.

1609

- How does each quatrain build on the last?

[Let me not to the marriage of true minds]

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
 Admit impediments.⁸ Love is not love
 Which alters when it alteration finds,
 Or bends with the remover to remove:
 5 Oh, no! it is an ever-fixèd mark,
 That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
 It is the star to every wandering bark,
 Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.⁹
 Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
 10 Within his bending sickle's compass come;
 Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
 But bears it out even to the edge of doom.
 If this be error and upon me proved,
 I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

1609

- What might the speaker mean when he says that love doesn't "ben[d] with the remover to remove" (line 4)? How might the rest of the poem explain and develop this statement?

5. Roots of plants.

6. Mars his: Mars's. Nor: neither.

7. Judgment Day.

8. The Church of England's marriage service contains this address to the witnesses: "If any of you know cause or just impediments why these persons should not be joined together [. . .]"

9. That is, measuring the altitude of stars (for purposes of navigation) is not a way to measure value.

JOHN MILTON

[When I consider how my light is spent]

When I consider how my light is spent,
 Ere half my days, in this dark world and wide,
 And that one talent which is death to hide¹
 Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent
 5 To serve therewith my Maker, and present
 My true account, lest he returning chide;
 “Doth God exact day-labor, light denied?”
 I fondly ask; but Patience to prevent²
 That murmur, soon replies, “God doth not need
 10 Either man’s work or his own gifts; who best
 Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best. His state
 Is kingly. Thousands at his bidding speed
 And post o’er land and ocean without rest:
 They also serve who only stand and wait.”

c. 1652

- How might the timing of the poem’s shift to Patience (in the middle of line 8) be meaningful? Paraphrase the speaker’s question and Patience’s reply.

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

Nuns Fret Not

Nuns fret not at their convent’s narrow room;
 And hermits are contented with their cells;
 And students with their pensive citadels;
 Maids at the wheel, the weaver at his loom,
 5 Sit blithe and happy; bees that soar for bloom,
 High as the highest Peak of Furness-fells,³
 Will murmur by the hour in foxglove bells:
 In truth the prison, unto which we doom
 Ourselves, no prison is: and hence for me,
 10 In sundry moods, ’twas pastime to be bound
 Within the sonnet’s scanty plot of ground;
 Pleased if some souls (for such there needs must be)

1. In the parable of the talents (Matt. 25), the servants who earned interest on their master’s money (his talents) while he was away were called “good and faithful”; the one who simply hid the money and then returned it was condemned and sent away.

2. Forestall. Fondly: foolishly.

3. Mountains in England’s Lake District, where Wordsworth lived.

Who have felt the weight of too much liberty,
Should find brief solace there, as I have found.

1807

- What does this poem imply about the sonnet's appeal?

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING

How Do I Love Thee?

How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.
I love thee to the depth and breadth and height
My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight
For the ends of Being and ideal Grace.
5 I love thee to the level of every day's
Most quiet need, by sun and candlelight.
I love thee freely, as men strive for Right;
I love thee purely, as they turn from Praise;
I love thee with the passion put to use
10 In my old griefs, and with my childhood's faith.
I love thee with a love I seemed to lose
With my lost saints—I love thee with the breath,
Smiles, tears of all my life!—and, if God choose,
I shall but love thee better after death.

1850

- How many “ways” of loving does the speaker “count” in the poem (line 1)? How do these ways relate to and build on each other?

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI

In an Artist's Studio

One face looks out from all his canvases,
One selfsame figure sits or walks or leans;
We found her hidden just behind those screens,
That mirror gave back all her loveliness.
5 A queen in opal or in ruby dress,
A nameless girl in freshest summer-greens,
A saint, an angel—every canvas means
The same one meaning, neither more nor less.
He feeds upon her face by day and night,
10 And she with true kind eyes looks back on him
Fair as the moon and joyful as the light:
Not wan with waiting, not with sorrow dim;
Not as she is, but was when hope shone bright;
Not as she is, but as she fills his dream.

1856

- What might this poem suggest about the relationship between painter and subject? How might the poem's form encourage us to compare painting to poetry?

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY

[What lips my lips have kissed, and where, and why]

What lips my lips have kissed, and where, and why,
 I have forgotten, and what arms have lain
 Under my head till morning; but the rain
 Is full of ghosts tonight, that tap and sigh
 5 Upon the glass and listen for reply,
 And in my heart there stirs a quiet pain
 For unremembered lads that not again
 Will turn to me at midnight with a cry.
 Thus in the winter stands the lonely tree,
 10 Nor knows what birds have vanished one by one,
 Yet knows its boughs more silent than before:
 I cannot say what loves have come and gone;
 I only know that summer sang in me
 A little while, that in me sings no more.

1923

- What are the poem's principal parts? Why does the Italian/Petrarchan model suit this sonnet?

[Women have loved before as I love now]

Women have loved before as I love now;
 At least, in lively chronicles of the past—
 Of Irish waters by a Cornish prow
 Or Trojan waters by a Spartan mast
 5 Much to their cost invaded—here and there,
 Hunting the amorous line, skimming the rest,
 I find some woman bearing as I bear
 Love like a burning city in the breast.
 I think however that of all alive
 10 I only in such utter, ancient way
 Do suffer love; in me alone survive
 The unregenerate passions of a day
 When treacherous queens, with death upon the tread,
 Heedless and wilful, took their knights to bed.

1931

- What does this poem imply about the difference between ancient and modern ways of loving?

[I, being born a woman and distressed]

I, being born a woman and distressed
 By all the needs and notions of my kind,
 Am urged by your propinquity to find
 Your person fair, and feel a certain zest

5 To bear your body's weight upon my breast:
 So subtly is the fume of life designed,
 To clarify the pulse and cloud the mind,
 And leave me once again undone, possessed.
 Think not for this, however, the poor treason
 10 Of my stout blood against my staggering brain,
 I shall remember you with love, or season
 My scorn with pity,—let me make it plain:
 I find this frenzy insufficient reason
 For conversation when we meet again.

1923

- What feelings are expressed here? What does the poem imply about the source or cause of these feelings?

[I will put Chaos into fourteen lines]

I will put Chaos into fourteen lines
 And keep him there; and let him thence escape
 If he be lucky; let him twist, and ape
 Flood, fire, and demon—his adroit designs
 5 Will strain to nothing in the strict confines
 Of this sweet Order, where, in pious rape,
 I hold his essence and amorphous shape,
 Till he with Order mingles and combines.
 Past are the hours, the years, of our duress,
 10 His arrogance, our awful servitude:
 I have him. He is nothing more nor less
 Than something simple not yet understood;
 I shall not even force him to confess;
 Or answer. I will only make him good.

1923

- What might this sonnet suggest about the value or appeal of the sonnet form?

ROBERT FROST

Range-Finding

The battle rent a cobweb diamond-strung
 And cut a flower beside a groundbird's nest
 Before it stained a single human breast.
 The stricken flower bent double and so hung.
 5 And still the bird revisited her young.
 A butterfly its fall had dispossessed,
 A moment sought in air his flower of rest,
 Then slightly stooped to it and fluttering clung.
 On the bare upland pasture there had spread

- 10 O'ernight 'twixt mullein stalks a wheel of thread
 And straining cables wet with silver dew.
 A sudden passing bullet shook it dry.
 The indwelling spider ran to greet the fly,
 But finding nothing, sullenly withdrew.

1916

- What is the “battle” of line 1? What is the poem’s actual subject?

Design

- I found a dimpled spider, fat and white,
 On a white heal-all,⁴ holding up a moth
 Like a white piece of rigid satin cloth—
 Assorted characters of death and blight
 5 Mixed ready to begin the morning right,
 Like the ingredients of a witches’ broth—
 A snow-drop spider, a flower like a froth,
 And dead wings carried like a paper kite.
- What had that flower to do with being white,
 10 The wayside blue and innocent heal-all?
 What brought the kindred spider to that height,
 Then steered the white moth thither in the night?
 What but design of darkness to appall?—
 If design govern in a thing so small.

1936

- How does this poem confound our usual preconceptions about “light” and “darkness”? How does its elaborate form complement its theme?

GWENDOLYN BROOKS First Fight. Then Fiddle.

- First fight. Then fiddle. Ply the slipping string
 With feathery sorcery; muzzle the note
 With hurting love; the music that they wrote
 Bewitch, bewilder. Qualify to sing
 5 Threadwise. Devise no salt, no hempen thing
 For the dear instrument to bear. Devote
 The bow to silks and honey. Be remote
 A while from malice and from murdering.
 But first to arms, to armor. Carry hate
 10 In front of you and harmony behind.
 Be deaf to music and to beauty blind.
 Win war. Rise bloody, maybe not too late

4. Plant, also called the “all-heal” and “self-heal,” with tightly clustered violet-blue flowers.

For having first to civilize a space
Wherein to play your violin with grace.

1949

- After advising “First fight. Then fiddle,” the speaker discusses first music, then conflict. Why do you think the poet has arranged her material this way? Why a sonnet?

GWEN HARWOOD

In the Park

She sits in the park. Her clothes are out of date.
Two children whine and bicker, tug her skirt.
A third draws aimless patterns in the dirt.
Someone she loved once passes by—too late

- 5 to feign indifference to that casual nod.
“How nice,” et cetera. “Time holds great surprises.”
From his neat head unquestionably rises
a small balloon . . . “but for the grace of God . . .”

They stand a while in flickering light, rehearsing 10 the children’s names and birthdays. “It’s so sweet to hear their chatter, watch them grow and thrive,” she says to his departing smile. Then, nursing the youngest child, sits staring at her feet.
To the Wind she says, “They have eaten me alive.”

1963

- What is the implication of the “small balloon” (line 8) that rises from the head of the man who passes by?

JUNE JORDAN

Something Like a Sonnet for Phillis Miracle Wheatley⁵

- Girl from the realm of birds florid and fleet flying full feather in far or near weather
Who fell to a dollar lust coffled⁶ like meat
Captured by avarice and hate spit together
5 Trembling asthmatic alone on the slave block built by a savagery travelling by carriage viewed like a species of flaw in the livestock
A child without safety of mother or marriage

5. African-born poet (1753–84) brought to the United States as a slave at the age of seven or eight.

6. Chained together in a line.

Chosen by whimsy but born to surprise
 10 They taught you to read but you learned how to write
 Begging the universe into your eyes:
 They dressed you in light but you dreamed with the night.
 From Africa singing of justice and grace,
 Your early verse sweetens the fame of our Race.

1989

- Phillis Wheatley herself usually wrote in heroic couplets—couplets of iambic pentameter. Why does Jordan choose dactylic meter, unusual for a sonnet?

BILLY COLLINS

Sonnet

All we need is fourteen lines, well, thirteen now, and after this one just a dozen to launch a little ship on love's storm-tossed seas, then only ten more left like rows of beans.
 5 How easily it goes unless you get Elizabethan and insist the iambic bongos must be played and rhymes positioned at the ends of lines, one for every station of the cross.
 But hang on here while we make the turn 10 into the final six where all will be resolved, where longing and heartache will find an end,
 where Laura will tell Petrarch⁷ to put down his pen,
 take off those crazy medieval tights,
 blow out the lights, and come at last to bed.

1999

- In what respects is Collins's poem a traditional sonnet? In what respects is it not? What might it suggest about the relationship between love and poetry, especially as portrayed in traditional sonnets?

HARRYETTE MULLEN

Dim Lady⁸

My honeybunch's peepers are nothing like neon. Today's special at Red Lobster is redder than her kisser. If Liquid Paper is white, her racks are institutional beige. If her mop were Slinkys, dishwater Slinkys would grow on her noggin. I have 5 seen tablecloths in Shakey's Pizza Parlors, red and white, but no such picnic colors do I see in her mug. And in some mintyfresh mouthwashes there is more sweetness than in the garlic

7. Italian poet Francesco Petrarch (1304–74), regarded as a father of the sonnet form. Many of his love poems were inspired by Laura, who may have been the wife of a local nobleman.

8. Shakespeare's sonnets frequently address or refer to the so-called Dark Lady.

breeze my main squeeze wheezes. I love to hear her rap, yet I'm aware that Muzak has a hipper beat. I don't know any 10 Marilyn Monroes. My ball and chain is plain from head to toe.
 And yet, by gosh, my scrumptious Twinkie has as much sex appeal for me as any lanky model or platinum movie idol who's hyped beyond belief.

2002

- How might Mullen's poem essentially "do unto" Shakespeare's MY MISTRESS' EYES ARE NOTHING LIKE THE SUN much as Shakespeare's poem itself does to earlier, especially Petrarchan sonnets? What is the effect of Mullen's diction? her use of brand names? Is DIM LADY a sonnet?

SHERMAN ALEXIE

 Here at the altar of loneliness.

2011

- What does Alexie suggest here about how and why we use Facebook? about the specific effects that doing so have on us? How do rhyme and meter, as well as other technical devices, help the poem communicate all this?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Consider carefully the structure of, and sequencing in, Brooks's FIRST FIGHT. THEN FIDDLE. How do various uses of sound in the poem (rhyme, onomatopoeia, and alliteration, for example) reinforce its themes and tones? Write an essay in which you explore the relationship between "sound and sense" in the poem.
2. Some of the sonnets in this book, such as those by Shakespeare, adhere closely to the classic English model; others, such as Milton's WHEN I CONSIDER HOW MY LIGHT IS SPENT, follow the Italian model; and some, such as those by Billy Collins and June Jordan, bear only slight resemblance to either of the traditional sonnet models. Take any four sonnets in this book as the basis for an essay in which you compare the various ways poets have used the sonnet form to achieve their unique artistic purposes.

3. Several poems in this album are not only sonnets but also commentaries on the sonnet or on certain conventions associated with it such as Petrarchan “conceits” (Shakespeare’s MY MISTRESS’ EYES . . .) or the relation between (male) speaker and (female) subject or love object. Write an essay comparing at least two of these poems. What does each ultimately suggest about the sonnet through both its form and its content?

The haiku, an import into the English poetic tradition, has a long history in Japanese poetry. Originally, the haiku (then called hokku) was a short section of a longer poem (called a renga or haikai) composed by several poets who wrote segments in response to one another. Traditionally, the Japanese haiku was an unrhymed poem consisting of seventeen sounds (or, rather, characters representing seventeen sounds) and distributed over three lines in a five-seven-five pattern—that is, five distinctive sounds in the first line, seven in the second, and five in the third. “Sounds” in the Japanese language are not exactly the same as “syllables” in English, but when English writers began to compose haiku about a century ago, they ordinarily translated the sound requirement into syllables.

Haiku aim for compression; they leave a lot unsaid. Typically, haiku describe a natural object and imply a state of mind. They usually have a “seasonal” requirement, so that each poem associates itself with one season of the year in a revolving pattern of change. This seasonal association may be made quite subtly and indirectly through, for example, an allusion to a seasonal flower. Haiku more generally involve descriptions of nature, reflecting the Buddhist sense of nature as orderly and benign but also contingent and transient.

When adapted into other languages and cultures, haiku cannot rely on the same spiritual assumptions or worldview, but these poems usually retain a sense of the human and natural as being mutually reflective and interdependent. Haiku often combine observation and imagination, blurring the Western distinction between seeing something literally and having some “vision” of its end or meaning.

Some of the traditional Japanese masters of haiku from the seventeenth to the early twentieth century—Bashō and Buson, for example—are represented (in English translations) in this album. So, too, are some of the many later poets and translators who have tried their hand at haiku, without always strictly observing the seventeen-syllable and three-line requirements. As haiku has become an international form, its conventions have, like those of other fixed forms, proven both demanding and adaptable to the particular needs of different cultural contexts, different languages, and different individual poets.

INTERVIEWER: [. . .] What motivated you to use haiku as a form? Where'd you get it from?

KNIGHT: From Gwendolyn Brooks. Yeah, she's the first one turned me on to haiku. She used to come visit me when I was in prison. And this is in the Sixties, remember, this is long before they had poets-in-the-prison programs and poets in schools. [. . .] She brought me some books and Japanese haiku. Years later I asked her how come and she said, “It was because you were too wordy in your poems.” And I like haiku. I try to use it, I try to follow the general form. I try to bring my own American consciousness to it. You know. [. . .] I like them because you gotta deal with the noun and the verb. With its 140-character limit, Twitter has given haiku a new lease on life, inspiring thousands of people around the world to try their hand at crafting what some now dub “twaiiku.” You can find countless examples—on topics ranging from cats and zombies to NASCAR—online and via Facebook pages like “The Twitter Haiku Movement.” But the “movement” (if such it is) first grabbed headlines in early 2010, when Sun Microsystems' CEO Jonathan Schwartz chose to tweet (or "twaiku") his resignation:

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. What is gained, and what is lost, when an artistic tradition like Japanese haiku is imported, through translation, imitation, and inspiration, into another language and culture? Using the poems in this album and your own research, write an essay in which you analyze the way that haiku has established itself as part of English-language literary culture. What might be distinctive about English-language or specifically American haiku? Or how exactly have writers in this tradition adapted the form to suit and reflect a distinctively modern, Western perspective and experience?
2. As this album begins to demonstrate, haiku has proven especially attractive to twentieth- and twenty-first-century African American poets. Gwendolyn Brooks, for example, introduced the form to Etheridge Knight, and Sonia Sanchez in a sense continues to walk in their footsteps. Using the poems in this album and your own research, write an essay in which you explore how at least one or two of these poets, or others, have made their own distinctive use of the form.
3. Write an essay exploring the seasonal imagery in at least three of the more traditional haiku in this album. How does each refer to a season, however indirectly? What does each manage to suggest about the particular character or feeling of that season, and how so?

Exploring Contexts

The more knowledge you have—both general knowledge and knowledge of poetic and literary traditions—the better a reader of poetry you are likely to be. Poems often draw on a fund of human knowledge about all sorts of things, asking us to bring to bear facts and beliefs we have acquired from earlier reading or from our everyday experiences. In the previous chapters, we have looked at how practice, specific skills, and a knowledge of basic literary terms make interpretation easier and better. This contextual section, however, focuses more on other types of information you need to read richly and fully: information about authors and their work, about events that influenced authors or inspired their writing, and about the ways other readers and critics have interpreted the work. Poets always write in a specific time and place, under unique circumstances, and with some awareness of the world around them, whether or not they explicitly refer to contemporary matters in a particular poem. Poems not only refer to people, places, and events—things that exist in time—but also reflect given moments; they are the products of both the potentialities and the limitations of the times in which they are created. Many poems—like many works of drama and fiction—also have something to say about their times, as well as timeless human qualities, habits, and relationships.

What we need to bring to our reading varies from poem to poem. For example, to understand Wilfred Owen's DULCE ET DECORUM EST we need to know that poison gas was used in World War I; the green tint through which the speaker sees the world in lines 13–14 comes from the green glass in the goggles of the gas mask he has just put on. But some broader issues matter as well, such as the climate of opinion that surrounded the war and the way war had been represented in earlier literary works. No doubt you will read a poem more intelligently—and with more feeling—the more you know about its cultural or historical and literary contexts. But at the same time, your sense of these subjects will grow as a result of reading the poems themselves sensitively and thoughtfully. Reading poetry can be a way to gain knowledge as well as an aesthetic experience. Although we don't generally turn to poetry for information as such, poems often give us more than we expect, insofar as we are aware of real-world contexts.

To get at appropriate factual, cultural, and historical information, we need to ask three kinds of questions of ourselves. The first is obvious: Do I understand all (or most) of the references in the poem? When events, places, or people unfamiliar to you come up, you will need to find out what, where, or whom they are. The second question is more difficult: How do I know, in a poem that does not refer specifically to events, people, or ideas that I do not recognize, that I need to know more? That is, when a poem has no specific references to look up, no people or events to identify, how do I know that it has a specific context? Usually, good poets will not puzzle you more than necessary, so you can safely assume that anything that is not self-explanatory will merit close attention and possibly some digging in the library. References that are not in themselves clear provide a strong clue that you need more information. When something doesn't click, when the information given does not seem enough, you need to trust your puzzlement and try to find the missing facts that will help you to make sense of the poem. But how? Often the date of the poem helps; sometimes the title gives a clue or a point of departure; sometimes you can uncover, by reading about the author, some of the things he or she was interested in or concerned about. There is no single all-purpose way to discover what to look for, but that kind of research—looking for clues, adding up the evidence—can be interesting in itself and very rewarding when it is successful. The third question for every factual reference is Why? Why does the poem refer to this particular person instead of some other? What function does the reference serve?

THE AUTHOR'S WORK AS CONTEXT:
ADRIENNE RICH

Even though all poets share the medium of language and usually have some common notions about their craft, they put the unique resources of their individual personalities, experiences, and outlooks into every poem they create. A poet may rely on tradition extensively and use devices that others have developed without surrendering his or her individuality, just as any individual shares certain characteristics with others—political affiliations, religious beliefs, tastes in clothes and music—without compromising his or her integrity and uniqueness. Sometimes a person's uniqueness is hard to define. But it is always there, and we recognize and depend on it in our relationships with other people. And so with poets: Most don't make a conscious effort to put an individual stamp on their work; they don't have to. The stamp is there in the very subjects, words, images, and forms they choose. Every individual's unique consciousness marks what it records and imagines.

Experienced readers can often identify a poem as the distinctive work of an individual poet even though they may never have seen that poem before, much as experienced listeners can identify a new piece of music as the work of a particular composer, singer, or group after hearing only a few phrases. This ability depends on a lot of reading or a lot of listening to music, and any reasonably sensitive reader can learn, over time, to do it with remarkable accuracy. Yet this ability is not an end in itself; rather, it is a by-product of learning to appreciate the particular, distinctive qualities of any poet's work. Once you've read several poems by the same poet, you will usually see some features that the poems all share, and gradually you may come to think of those features as characteristic. Many people have favorite poets, just as they have favorite rock groups or rap artists. In both cases, we are attracted to the artist's work precisely because, consciously or not, we recognize and appreciate that artist's distinctive style and outlook.

The work of any writer will display a characteristic way of thinking. It will have certain identifiable tendencies. But this does not mean that every poem by a particular author will be predictable and contain all of the same features. Poets test their talents and their views—as well as their readers—by experimenting with various subjects and points of view, formal structures and devices. Like all of us, poets also grow and change over time. As readers, then, we want to strive to recognize differences, as well as similarities, among individual poems and to appreciate the ways an author's work does and doesn't change over the years.

Of what practical use is it to learn to recognize and understand the distinctive voice and mind of a particular poet? One use is the pleasant surprise that occurs when you recognize something familiar. Reading a new poem by a familiar poet can be like meeting an old friend. Just as meeting something or someone altogether new to you provides one kind of pleasure, so revisiting the familiar provides another, equal and opposite kind. Just knowing and recognizing often feel good in and of themselves.

In addition, just as you learn from watching other people, seeing how they react and respond to various situations and events, so you can learn from watching poets at work—seeing how they learn and develop, how they change their minds or test alternative points of view, how they discover the reach and limits of their imaginations and talents, how they find their distinctive voices and come to terms with their own identities. Each poem exists separately and individually, but at the same time the whole body of a poet's work records the workings and the evolution of a distinctive artistic consciousness as it confronts a world that is itself perpetually changing.

Finally, the more you know about a poet and the more of his or her poems you read, the better a reader you will likely be of any individual poem by the poet. External facts of the writer's life may inform whatever he or she writes—be it a poem, an essay, a letter, or an autobiography. But beyond that, when you grow accustomed to a writer's habits and manners and means of expression, you learn what to expect. Coming to a new poem by a poet you already are familiar with, you know what to look for and have clear expectations for the poem. At the same time, you are better prepared to appreciate the surprises each poem holds in store.

THE POETRY OF ADRIENNE RICH

You will find both continuity and change, similarities and differences, in the work of any good poet, and this chapter introduces you to a great one. Adrienne Rich (1929–2012) was an especially active, prolific poet whom many readers and critics regard as the best of her generation. A careful reader of her work will find similarities of interest and strategy from her earliest poems—published shortly after World War II, in 1951—to her newest ones. A distinctive mind and orientation are at work.

But over the years Rich's work changed quite a lot, too, and she modified her views on a number of issues. Such changes were the result both of her personal experiences and of those shared experiences that helped define her era. Many of the changes in Rich's ideas and attitudes, for example, reflect changing concerns among American intellectuals (especially women) in the second half of the twentieth century, and her poems represent both changed social conditions and sharply altered social, political, and philosophical attitudes. But her poems also reflect altered personal circumstances. Rich married in her early twenties and had three children by the time she was thirty; many of her early poems are about heterosexual love, and some of them are quite explicitly about sex. Later, she was involved in a long-term lesbian relationship and wrote, again quite explicitly, about sex between women. In Rich's poems, then, we may not only trace the contours of an evolving personal life and outlook but also—and even more important for the study of poetry generally—see how changes within the poet and in her social and cultural context altered the subjects and themes of her poetry, as well as its form.

Just as information about an author's life and times can help us in this enterprise, so, too, can the essays, letters, and interviews in which an author reflects on the character and aims of his or her poetry and on the subjects the poetry explores. In the case of Rich, we have a bounty of such material from a poet who was also a remarkably prolific, articulate and influential prose writer. Gathered at the end of this chapter are excerpts from these writings, including both essays that express Rich's outlook at a particular moment and retrospective pieces in which she gives us her interpretation of the character and development of her work over time.

It is fitting that two of Adrienne Rich's books—A Change of World (1951) and The Will to Change (1971)—bear titles that prominently feature the word change. For change is, indeed, both a consistent concern of her poetry and a hallmark of her poetic career. Published when their author was just twenty-one, poems such as AT A BACH CONCERT, STORM WARNINGS, and AUNT JENNIFER'S TIGERS seem, at first glance, preternaturally mature. With their tightly controlled structure, their regular rhythm (and, often, rhyme), and their coolly observant tone, these early poems both embody and celebrate the “discipline” that “masters feelings” and the “proud restraining purity” by which art lends order to life (“At a Bach Concert,” below). (Versions of the word master, in fact, appear in all three poems.) Explaining why he chose A Change of World for the Yale Younger Poets Series, poet W. H. Auden singled out just such qualities and attitudes, praising Rich for a “craftsmanship” based in that “capacity for detachment from the self and its emotions without which no art is possible.” If “poems are analogous to persons,” Auden continued, then these poems are “neatly and modestly dressed, speak quietly but do not mumble, respect their elders but are not cowed by them, and do not tell fibs.”

Less than a decade later, however, Rich began to see the very “neatness” and “detachment” of her own early poems as itself a kind of “fib.” As she put it in 1964, the early poems, “even the ones I liked best and in which I felt I'd said most, were queerly limited; [. . .] in many cases I [. . .] suppressed, omitted, falsified even, certain disturbing elements to gain the perfection of order.” From this point forward, Rich's work was very much an attempt to do the very opposite—to, in Matthew Arnold's words, “see life steadily and see it whole,” in all its disturbing, disorderly imperfection. Indeed, one of the major themes of the later poems is both the necessity and the difficulty of breaking through the web of “myth” and illusion in order to get to “the thing itself” (DIVING INTO THE WRECK).

In its attempt to do just that, Rich's work itself became less neat and orderly, less quiet, modest, and respectful. Beginning with Snapshots of a Daughter-in-Law (1963) and its title poem, the poems speak in many radically different voices and tones and are cast in many different forms. Rich's evolution as a poet was not a matter of pursuing any kind of single-minded mastery over her materials. “I find that I can no longer go to write a poem with a neat handful of materials and express those materials according to a prior plan,” Rich explained in 1964; “the poem itself engenders new sensations, new awareness in me as it progresses.” What results are “poems that are experiences” rather than “poems about experiences.”

Adrienne Rich, circa 1970

In becoming more informal, exploratory, and emotional, Rich's poems also became more personal and autobiographical, more willing to enter and lay bare what “Storm Warnings” calls the “troubled regions” of the poet's own life, heart, and mind. In fact, Rich suggested that her artistic growth was, in part, a matter of closing the gap between “the woman in the poem and the woman writing the poem.” And in “Roofwalker,” a 1961 poem that articulated her new poetic ideal, Rich compares herself both to a roofer standing atop a half-built house and to “a naked man fleeing / across" those very roofs. Like both, she now dared to be "exposed, larger than life, / and due to break my neck."

At the same time, Rich's work also became steadily more social, political, and historical. HISTORY is, in fact, the title of one poem in this chapter and the subject of many others. As early as 1956, moreover, Rich began to insist on the historicity of her own poems by dating each one. "It seems to me now that this was an oblique political statement," Rich insists in the 1984 essay "Blood, Bread, and Poetry": "It was a declaration that placed poetry in a historical continuity, not above or outside history." "For Rich," as one critic argues, "a deepening subjectivity does not mean withdrawal, as it did for [Emily] Dickinson, but, on the contrary, a more searching engagement with people and with social forces."

In Rich's life, as in her work, the movement into the self fueled the movement outward—into the world and back into the past—and vice versa. On the one hand, it was in part her personal feelings and experiences—the fact that she felt "unfit, disempowered, adrift" as a housewife and mother in the mid-1950s—that sent her to the work of "political" writers such as Mary Wollstonecraft, Simone de Beauvoir, and James Baldwin, and, later, into the antiwar, civil rights, and women's movements. On the other hand, it was these writers and movements that eventually encouraged her to see her "private turmoil"—indeed, her consciousness itself—as the product of historically specific social and political forces. As she explains in the essay "Blood, Bread, and Poetry," my personal world view [. . .] was [. . .] created by political conditions. I was not a man; I was white in a white-supremacist society; I was [. . .] educated from the perspective of a particular class; my father was an "assimilated" Jew in an anti-Semitic world, my mother a white southern Protestant; there were particular historical currents on which my consciousness would come together, piece by piece. [. . .] My personal world view, which like so many young people I carried as a conviction of my own uniqueness, was not original with me, but was, rather, my untutored and half-conscious rendering of the facts of blood and bread, the social and political forces of my time and place.

Rich's mature poetry is, in many ways, an attempt to scrutinize the "social and political forces" that shape our lives and our relationships with one another and with the planet we inhabit. In this way, "the personal is political" for and in Rich—and so, too, is the literary. Yet her poetry works as poetry largely because in it the converse is always equally and palpably true. Her "poems compel us," as critic Albert Gelpi suggests, "precisely because [. . .] the politics [are] not abstracted and depersonalized but tested on the nerve-ends."

Despite—or even because of—all the changes, Rich's work also demonstrates a real and rare sort of consistency. From the very beginning of her career in the 1950s to its end in 2012, Rich conceived poems with a powerful sense of functional structure and cast them in lyric modes that sensitively reflect their moods and tones. She engaged readers viscerally and intellectually through vivid images. And certain images and objects—knives and coffee pots, ruins and rubble, maps and monsters, wintry weather—recur in multiple poems, binding the poems together even as they help us track a process of evolution and change that, Rich reminds us, isn't simple or straightforward. "If you think you can grasp me, think again," she warns us in the poem "Delta"; "my story flows in more than one direction."

POEMS BY ADRIENNE RICH

At a Bach Concert

Coming by evening through the wintry city
 We said that art is out of love with life.
 Here we approach a love that is not pity.

This antique discipline, tenderly severe,
 5 Renews belief in love yet masters feeling,
 Asking of us a grace in what we bear.

Form is the ultimate gift that love can offer—
 The vital union of necessity
 With all that we desire, all that we suffer.

10 A too-compassionate art is half an art.
 Only such proud restraining purity
 Restores the else-betrayed, too-human heart.
 1951

Storm Warnings

The glass has been falling all the afternoon,
 And knowing better than the instrument
 What winds are walking overhead, what zone
 Of gray unrest is moving across the land,
 5 I leave the book upon a pillowed chair
 And walk from window to closed window, watching
 Boughs strain against the sky

And think again, as often when the air
 Moves inward toward a silent core of waiting,
 10 How with a single purpose time has traveled
 By secret currents of the undiscerned
 Into this polar realm. Weather abroad
 And weather in the heart alike come on Regardless of prediction.

15 Between foreseeing and averting change
 Lies all the mastery of elements
 Which clocks and weatherglasses cannot alter.
 Time in the hand is not control of time,
 Nor shattered fragments of an instrument
 20 A proof against the wind; the wind will rise,
 We can only close the shutters.

I draw the curtains as the sky goes black
 And set a match to candles sheathed in glass
 Against the keyhole draught, the insistent whine
 25 Of weather through the unsealed aperture.
 This is our sole defense against the season;

These are the things that we have learned to do
Who live in troubled regions.

1951

Living in Sin

She had thought the studio would keep itself;
no dust upon the furniture of love.
Half heresy, to wish the taps less vocal,
the panes relieved of grime. A plate of pears,
5 a piano with a Persian shawl, a cat stalking the picturesque amusing mouse had risen at his urging.
Not that at five each separate stair would writhe
under the milkman's tramp; that morning light 10 so coldly would delineate the scraps of last night's cheese and three sepulchral bottles;
that on the kitchen shelf among the saucers
a pair of beetle-eyes would fix her own—envoy from some village in the moldings . . .
15 Meanwhile, he, with a yawn, sounded a dozen notes upon the keyboard,
declared it out of tune, shrugged at the mirror, rubbed at his beard, went out for cigarettes;
while she, jeered by the minor demons, 20 pulled back the sheets and made the bed and found a towel to dust the table-top,
and let the coffee-pot boil over on the stove.
By evening she was back in love again,
though not so wholly but throughout the night 25 she woke sometimes to feel the daylight coming like a relentless milkman up the stairs.

The next time it was: Be insatiable.

Then: *Save yourself; others you cannot save.*²

20 Sometimes she's let the tapstream scald her arm,
a match burn to her thumbnail,

or held her hand above the kettle's snout right in the woolly steam. They are probably angels, since nothing hurts her anymore, except 25 each morning's grit blowing into her eyes.

A thinking woman sleeps with monsters.
The beak that grips her, she becomes. And Nature, that sprung-lidded, still commodious steamer-trunk of tempora and *mores*³

30 gets stuffed with it all: the mildewed orange-flowers, the female pills, the terrible breasts of Boadicea⁴ beneath flat foxes' heads and orchids.

Two handsome women, gripped in argument,
each proud, acute, subtle, I hear scream

35 across the cut glass and majolica like Furies⁵ cornered from their prey:

The argument ad feminam,⁶ all the old knives that have rusted in my back, I drive in yours, ma semblable, ma soeur!⁷

2. According to Matthew 27.42, the chief priests, scribes, and elders mocked the crucified Jesus by saying, "He saved others; himself he cannot save."

3. Times and customs (Latin).

4. Queen of the ancient Britons. When her husband died, the Romans seized the territory he ruled and scourged Boadicea; she then led a heroic but ultimately unsuccessful revolt. Female pills: medicines for menstrual ailments.

5. In Roman mythology, the three sisters were the avenging spirits of retributive justice.

6. To the woman (Latin). The argumentum ad hominem (literally, "argument to the man") is (in classical rhetoric) an argument aimed at a person's individual prejudices or special interests.

7. My mirror-image or "double," my sister (French). Charles Baudelaire (1821–67), in the prefatory poem to Les Fleurs du Mal (1857), addresses (and attacks) his "hypocrite reader" as "mon semblable, mon frère" (my double, my brother).

 neither words nor music are her own;
 55 only the long hair dipping over her cheek, only the song of silk against her knees and these

 60 Poised, trembling and unsatisfied, before an unlocked door, that cage of cages, tell us, you bird, you tragical machine—is this fertilisante douleur?² Pinned down
 by love, for you the only natural action,

9. Sweet laughter, sweet chatter (Latin). The phrase (slightly modified here) concludes Horace’s Ode 1.22, describing the appeal of a mistress.

1. Opening line of a lyric by Thomas Campion (1567–1620), which appears elsewhere in this anthology.

2. Enriching pain (French).

3. “. . . is of the utmost consequence,” from Mary Wollstonecraft, Thoughts on the Education of Daughters, London, 1787 [Rich’s note]. Wollstonecraft (1759–97) is also, and more famously, the author of A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792).

a woman, partly brave and partly good,

“You all die at fifteen,” said Diderot,⁴ and turn part legend, part convention.
 Still, eyes inaccurately dream

 Deliciously, all that we might have been,
 all that we were—fire, tears,
 wit, taste, martyred ambition—
 stirs like the memory of refused adultery 85 the drained and flagging bosom of our middle years.

*Not that it is done well, but that it is done at all?*⁵ Yes, think of the odds! or shrug them off forever.
 This luxury of the precocious child,
 90 Time's precious chronic invalid,— would we, darlings, resign it if we could?
 Our blight has been our sinecure:
 mere talent was enough for us—
 glitter in fragments and rough drafts.
 95 Sigh no more, ladies.⁶

Time is male
 and in his cups drinks to the fair.
 Bemused by gallantry, we hear our mediocrities over-praised, 100 indolence read as abnegation, slattern thought styled intuition,
 every lapse forgiven, our crime only to cast too bold a shadow or smash the mould straight off.

4. “Vous mourez toutes a quinze ans,” from the Lettres à Sophie Volland, quoted by Simone de Beauvoir in Le Deuxième Sexe, vol. II, pp. 123–4 [Rich's note]. Editor of the Encyclopédie (the central document of the French Enlightenment), Denis Diderot (1713–84) became disillusioned with the traditional education of women and undertook an experimental education for his own daughter. French philosopher Simone de Beauvoir's (1908–86) landmark book, The Second Sex (1949), explores what she calls the “myths” and supposed “facts” that have made women “secondary” to men throughout human history.

5. Samuel Johnson's (1709–84) comment on women preachers: “Sir, a woman's preaching is like a dog's walking on his hinder legs. It is not done well, but you are surprised to find it done at all” (James Boswell's Life of Johnson, edited by L. F. Powell and G. B. Hill, Clarendon, 1934–64, vol. 1, p. 463).

6. Opening words of a song in Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing (Act 2, Scene 3); sung by a minor male character, it explains that “Men were deceivers ever” and urges women to “sigh not so, but let them go, / And be you blithe and bonny.”

Well,

she's long about her coming, who must be

Her mind full to the wind, I see her plunge breasted and glancing through the currents, taking the light upon her at least as beautiful as any boy

 poised, still coming,
her fine blades making the air wince

but her cargo

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

ADRIENNE RICH (1929–2012)

From “When We Dead Awaken” (1979)*

Over two years I wrote a 10-part poem called “Snapshots of a Daughter-in-Law,” in a longer, looser mode than I’d ever trusted myself with before. It was an extraordinary relief to write that poem. It strikes me now as too literary, too dependent on allusion; I hadn’t found the courage yet to do without authorities, or even to use the pronoun “I”—the woman in the poem is always “she.” One section of it, #2, concerns a woman who thinks she is going mad; she is haunted by voices telling her to resist and rebel, voices which she can hear but not obey.

*“When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision.” On Lies, Secrets, and Silence: Selected Prose: 1966–1978, W. W. Norton, 1979, pp. 33–49.

7. Cf. Le Deuxième Sexe, vol. II, p. 574: “. . . elle arrive du fond des ages, de Thèbes, de Minos, de Chichén Itzá; et elle est aussi le totem planté au coeur de la brousse africaine; c’est un hélicoptère et c’est un oiseau; et voilà la plus grande merveille: sous ses cheveux peints le bruissement des feuillages devient une pensée et des paroles s’échappent de ses seins” [Rich’s note]. “[S]he comes from the remotest ages, from Thebes, Minos, Chichén Itzá; and she is also the totem planted in the heart of the African jungle; she is a helicopter and she is a bird; and here is the greatest wonder: beneath her painted hair, the rustling of leaves becomes a thought and words escape from her breasts” (Simone de Beauvoir’s The Second Sex, translated by Constance Borde and Sheila Malovany, Alfred A. Knopf, 2009, p. 764).

PASSAGES FROM RICH'S ESSAYS

From When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision
(1972, 1979)⁵

Most, if not all, human lives are full of fantasy—passive daydreaming which need not be acted on. But to write poetry or fiction, or even to think well, is not to fantasize, or to put fantasies on paper. For a poem to coalesce, for a character or an action to take shape, there has to be an imaginative transformation of reality which is in no way passive. And a certain freedom of the mind is needed—freedom to press on, to enter the currents of your thought like a glider pilot, knowing that your motion can be sustained, that the buoyancy of your attention will not be suddenly snatched away. Moreover, if the imagination is to transcend and transform experience it has to question, to challenge, to conceive of alternatives, perhaps to the very life you are living at that moment. You have to be free to play around with the notion that day might be night, love might be hate; nothing can be too sacred for the imagination to turn into its opposite or to call experimentally by another name. For writing is re-naming. Now, to be maternally with small children all day in the old way, to be with a man in the old way of marriage, requires a holding-back, a putting-aside of that imaginative activity, and demands instead a kind of conservatism. I want to make it clear that I am not saying that in order to write well, or think well, it is necessary to become unavailable to others, or to become a devouring ego. This has been the myth of the masculine artist and thinker; and I do not accept it. But to be a female human being trying to fulfill traditional female functions in a traditional way is in direct conflict with the subversive function of the imagination. The word traditional is important here. There must be ways, and we will be finding out more and more about them, in which the energy of creation and the energy of relation can be united.

Adrienne Rich, circa 1978

But in those earlier years I always felt the conflict as a failure of love in myself. I had thought I was choosing a full life: the life available to most men, in which sexuality, work, and parenthood could coexist. But I felt, at twenty-nine, guilt toward the people closest to me, and guilty toward my own being.

I wanted, then, more than anything, the one thing of which there was never enough: time to think, time to write. The fifties and early sixties were years of rapid revelations: the sit-ins and marches in the South, the Bay of Pigs, the early antiwar movement,⁶ raised large questions—questions for which the masculine world of the academy around me seemed to have expert and fluent answers. But I needed to think for myself—about pacifism

5. First published in College English in 1972; this version, slightly revised, is included in On Lies, Secrets, and Silence: Selected Prose: 1966–1978, W. W. Norton, 1979, pp. 33–49.

6. That is, the movement opposing the Vietnam War (c. 1955–75). Bay of Pigs: on April 17, 1961, 1,400 Cuban exiles, backed by the CIA, launched a botched invasion of Communist Cuba at the Bay of Pigs, on the island's south coast.

and dissent and violence, about poetry and society, and about my own relationship to all these things. For about ten years I was reading in fierce snatches, scribbling in notebooks, writing poetry in fragments; I was looking desperately for clues, because if there were no clues then I thought I might be insane. I wrote in a notebook about this time:

Paralyzed by the sense that there exists a mesh of relationships—e.g., between my anger at the children, my sensual life, pacifism, sex (I mean sex in its broadest significance, not merely sexual desire)—an interconnectedness which, if I could see it, make it valid, would give me back myself, make it possible to function lucidly and passionately. Yet I grope in and out among these dark webs.

I think I began at this point to feel that politics was not something “out there” but something “in here” and of the essence of my condition.

In the late fifties I was able to write, for the first time, directly about experiencing myself as a woman. The poem⁷ was jotted in fragments during children's naps, brief hours in a library, or at 3 A.M. after rising with a wakeful child. I despaired of doing any continuous work at this time. Yet I began to feel that my fragments and scraps had a common consciousness and a common theme, one which I would have been very unwilling to put on paper at an earlier time because I had been taught that poetry should be “universal,” which meant, of course, non-female. Until then I had tried very much not to identify myself as a female poet.

*From A Communal Poetry (1993)*⁸

One day in New York in the late 1980s, I had lunch with a poet I'd known for more than twenty years. Many of his poems were—are—embedded in my life. We had read together at the antiwar events of the Vietnam years.⁹ Then, for a long time, we hardly met. As a friend, he had seemed to me withheld, defended in a certain way I defined as masculine and with which I was becoming in general impatient; yet often, in their painful beauty, his poems told another story. On this day, he was as I had remembered him: distant, stiff, shy perhaps. The conversation stumbled along as we talked about our experiences with teaching poetry, which seemed a safe ground. I made some remark about how long it was since last we'd talked. Suddenly, his whole manner changed: You disappeared! You simply disappeared. I realized he meant not so much from his life as from a landscape of poetry to which he thought we both belonged and were in some sense loyal.

If anything, those intervening years had made me feel more apparent, more visible—to myself and to others—as a poet. The powerful magnet of the women's liberation movement—and the women's poetry movement it released—had drawn me to coffeehouses where women were reading new kinds of poems; to emerging “journals of liberation” that published women's poems, often in a context of political articles and the beginnings of feminist criticism; to bookstores selling chapbooks and pamphlets from the new women's presses; to a woman poet's workshops with women in prison; to meetings with other women poets in Chinese restaurants, coffee shops, apartments, where we talked not only of poetry, but of the conditions that make it possible or impossible. It had never occurred to me that I was disappearing—rather, that I was, along with other women poets, beginning to appear. In fact, we were taking part in an immense shift in human consciousness.

My old friend had, I believe, not much awareness of any of this. It was, for him, so off-to-the-edge, so out-of-the-way; perhaps so dangerous, it seemed I had sunk, or dived, into a black hole. Only later, in a less constrained and happier meeting, were we able to speak of the different ways we had perceived that time.

He thought there had been a known, defined poetic landscape and that as poetic contemporaries we simply shared it. But whatever poetic "generation" I belonged to, in the 1950s I was a mother, under thirty, raising three small children. Notwithstanding the prize and the fellowship to Europe that my first book of poems had won me,¹ there was little or no "appearance" I then felt able to claim as a poet, against that other profound and as yet unworded reality.

From Why I Refused the National Medal for the Arts (2001)²

July 3, 1997

Jane Alexander, Chair

The National Endowment for the Arts

1100 Pennsylvania Avenue

Washington, D.C. 20506

Dear Jane Alexander,

I just spoke with a young man from your office, who informed me that I had been chosen to be one of twelve recipients of the National Medal for the Arts at a ceremony at the White House in the fall. I told him at once that I could not accept such an award from President Clinton or this White House because the very meaning of art, as I understand it, is incompatible with the cynical politics of this administration. I want to clarify to you what I meant by my refusal.

1. Rich won the Yale Younger Poets Prize in 1951 and traveled on a Guggenheim Fellowship 1952–53.

2. "Why I Refused the National Medal for the Arts." Arts of the Possible: Essays and Conversations, W. W. Norton, 2001, pp. 98–105.

After the text of my letter to Jane Alexander, then chair of the National Endowment for the Arts, had been fragmentarily quoted in various news stories, Steve Wasserman, editor of the Los Angeles Times Book Review, asked me for an article expanding on my reasons. Herewith the letter and the article [Rich's note].

Anyone familiar with my work from the early sixties on knows that I believe in art's social presence—as breaker of official silences, as voice for those whose voices are disregarded, and as a human birthright. In my lifetime I have seen the space for the arts opened by movements for social justice, the power of art to break despair. Over the past two decades I have witnessed the increasingly brutal impact of racial and economic injustice in our country.

There is no simple formula for the relationship of art to justice. But I do know that art—in my own case the art of poetry—means nothing if it simply decorates the dinner table of power that holds it hostage. The radical disparities of wealth and power in America are widening at a devastating rate. A president cannot meaningfully honor certain token artists while the people at large are so dishonored.

I know you have been engaged in a serious and disheartening struggle to save government funding for the arts, against those whose fear and suspicion of art is nakedly repressive. In the end, I don't think we can separate art from overall human dignity and hope. My concern for my country is inextricable from my concerns as an artist. I could not participate in a ritual that would feel so hypocritical to me.

Sincerely,
Adrienne Rich

cc: President Clinton

The invitation from the White House came by telephone on July 3. After several years' erosion of arts funding and hostile propaganda from the religious right and the Republican Congress, the House vote to end the National Endowment for the Arts was looming. That vote would break as news on July 10; my refusal of the National Medal for the Arts would run as a sidebar story in the New York Times and the San Francisco Chronicle.

In fact, I was unaware of the timing. My refusal came directly out of my work as a poet and essayist and citizen drawn to the interfold of personal and public experience. I had recently been thinking and writing about the shrinking of the social compact, of whatever it was this country had ever meant when it called itself a democracy: the shredding of the vision of government of the people, by the people, for the people.

"We the people—still an excellent phrase," said the playwright Lorraine Hansberry in 1962, well aware who had been excluded, yet believing the phrase might someday come to embrace us all. And I had for years been feeling both personal and public grief, fear, hunger, and the need to render this, my time, in the language of my art.

Whatever was "newsworthy" about my refusal was not about a single individual—not myself, not President Clinton. Nor was it about a single political party. Both major parties have displayed a crude affinity for the interests of corporate power, while deserting the majority of the people, especially the most vulnerable. Like so many others, I've watched the dismantling of our public education, the steep rise in our incarceration rates, the demonization of our young black men, the accusations against our teen-age mothers, the selling of health care—public and private—to the highest bidders, the export of subsistence-level jobs in the United States to even lower-wage countries, the use of below-minimum-wage prison labor to break strikes and raise profits, the scapegoating of immigrants, the denial of dignity and minimal security to working and poor people. At the same time, we've witnessed the acquisition of publishing houses, once risk-taking conduits of creativity, by conglomerates driven single-mindedly to fast profits, the acquisition of major communications and media by those same interests, the sacrifice of the arts and public libraries in stripped-down school and civic budgets, and, most recently, the evisceration of the National Endowment for the Arts. Piece by piece the democratic process has been losing ground to the accumulation of private wealth.

There is no political leadership in the White House or the Congress that has spoken to and for the people who, in a very real sense, have felt abandoned by their government.

And what about art? Mistrusted, adored, pietized, condemned, dismissed as entertainment, commodified, auctioned at Sotheby's, purchased by investment-seeking celebrities, it dies into the "art object" of a thousand museum basements. It's also reborn hourly in prisons, women's shelters, small-town garages, community-college workshops, halfway houses, wherever someone picks up a pencil, a wood-burning tool, a copy of The Tempest,³ a tag-sale camera, a whittling knife, a stick of charcoal, a pawnshop horn, a video of Citizen Kane,⁴ whatever lets you know again that this deeply instinctual yet self-conscious expressive language, this regenerative process, could help you save your life. "If there were no poetry on any day in the world," the poet Muriel Rukeyser wrote, "poetry would be invented that day. For there would be an intolerable hunger."

Art can never be totally legislated by any system, even those that reward obedience and send dissident artists to hard labor and death; nor can it, in our specifically compromised system, be really free. It may push up through cracked macadam, by the merest means, but it needs breathing space, cultivation, protection to fulfill itself. Just as people do. New artists, young or old, need education in their art, the tools of their craft, chances to study examples from the past and meet practitioners in the present, get the criticism and encouragement of mentors, learn that they are not alone. As the social compact withers, fewer and fewer people will be told Yes, you can do this; this also belongs to you. Like government, art needs the participation of the many in order not to become the property of a powerful and narrowly self-interested few.

Art is our human birthright, our most powerful means of access to our own and another's experience and imaginative life. In continually rediscovering and recovering the humanity of human beings, art is crucial to the democratic vision. A government tending further and further away from the search for democracy will see less and less “use” in encouraging artists, will see art as obscenity or hoax.

Federal funding for the arts, like the philanthropy of private arts patrons, can be given and taken away. In the long run art needs to grow organically out of a social compost nourishing to everyone, a literate citizenry, a free, universal, public education complex with art as an integral element, a society honoring both human individuality and the search for a decent, sustainable common life. In such conditions, art would still be a voice of hunger, desire, discontent, passion, reminding us that the democratic project is never-ending.

For that to happen, what else would have to change?

What I'd like to do here is touch on some aspects of poetry as it's created and received in [a] violently politicized and brutally divided world [. . .] .

I'll flash back to 1821: Shelley's⁶ claim, in “The Defence of Poetry,” that “poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world.” Piously overquoted, mostly out of context, it's taken to suggest that simply by virtue of composing verse, poets exert some exemplary moral power—in a vague, unthreatening way. In fact, in his earlier political essay “A Philosophic View of Reform,” Shelley had written that “Poets and philosophers [italics mine] are the unacknowledged” etc. The philosophers he was talking about were revolutionary-minded: Thomas Paine, William Godwin, Voltaire, Mary Wollstonecraft.⁷

And Shelley was, no mistake, out to change the legislation of his time. For him there was no contradiction among poetry, political philosophy, and active confrontation with illegitimate authority [. . .] .

6. Percy Bysshe Shelley, British poet (1792–1822).

7. British author (1759–97) whose works include both A Vindication of the Rights of Men (1790) and A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792); Wollstonecraft's daughter (by William Godwin) married Percy Bysshe Shelley. Voltaire: French Enlightenment philosopher (1694–78). William Godwin: Radical British philosopher (1756–1836) whose works include An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice (1793), also husband and first biographer of Mary Wollstonecraft. Thomas Paine: British-born author (1737–1809) of both Common Sense (1776) and Rights of Man (1791).

Shelley, in fact, saw powerful institutions, not original sin or “human nature,” as the source of human misery. For him, art bore an integral relationship to the “struggle between Revolution and Oppression.” His West Wind was the “trumpet of a prophecy,” driving “dead thoughts . . . like withered leaves, to quicken a new birth.”⁸

He did not say, “Poets are the unacknowledged interior decorators of the world.”

Pursuing this theme of the committed poet and the action of poetry in the world: two interviews, both from 1970.

A high official of the Greek military junta asks the poet Yannis Ritsos, then under house arrest: “You are a poet. Why do you get mixed up in politics?”

Ritsos answers, “A poet is the first citizen of his country and for this very reason it is the duty of the poet to be concerned about the politics of his country.”

Second interview. The South African poet Dennis Brutus, when asked about poetry and political activity: “I believe that the poet—as a poet—has no obligation to be committed, but the man—as a man—has an obligation to be committed. What I’m saying is that I think everybody ought to be committed and the poet is just one of the many ‘everybodies.’”

Dennis Brutus wrote, acted on, was imprisoned then exiled for his opposition to the South African apartheid⁹ regime [. . .].

What’s at stake here is the recognition of poetry as what James Scully calls “social practice.” He distinguishes between “protest poetry” and “dissident poetry”: Protest poetry is “conceptually shallow,” “reactive,” predictable in its means, too often a hand-wringing from the sidelines.

Dissident poetry, however [he writes] does not respect boundaries between private and public, self and other. In breaking boundaries, it breaks silences, speaking for, or at best, with, the silenced; opening poetry up, putting it into the middle of life. . . . It is a poetry that talks back, that would act as part of the world, not simply as a mirror of it.

I’m both a poet and one of the “everybodies” of my country. I live, in poetry and daily experience, with manipulated fear, ignorance, cultural confusion, and social antagonism huddling together on the fault line of an empire. In my lifetime I’ve seen the breakdown of rights and citizenship where ordinary “everybodies,” poets or not, have left politics to a political class bent on shoveling the elemental resources, the public commons of the entire world, into private control. Where democracy has been left to the raiding of “acknowledged” legislators, the highest bidders. In short, to a criminal element.

Ordinary, comfortable Americans have looked aside when our fraternally-twinning parties—Democrat and Republican—have backed dictatorships against popular movements abroad; as their covert agencies, through torture and assassination, through supplied weapons and military training, have propped up repressive parties and regimes in the name of anticommunism and our “national interests.” Why did we think fascistic methods, the subversion of civil and human rights, would be contained somewhere else? Because as a nation, we’ve clung to a self-righteous false innocence, eyes shut to our own scenario, our body politic’s internal bleeding.

But internal bleeding is no sudden symptom. That uncannily prescient African American writer James Baldwin asked his country, a quarter century ago: “If you don’t know my father, how can you know the people in the streets of Tehran?”¹

This year, a report from the Bureau of Justice Statistics finds that 1 out of every 136 residents of the United States is behind bars: many in jails, unconvicted. That the percentage of black men in prison or jail is almost 12 to 1 over white male prisoners. That the states with the highest rates of incarceration and execution are those with the poorest populations.

We often hear that—by contrast with, say, Nigeria or Egypt, China or the former Soviet Union—the West doesn’t imprison dissident writers. But when a nation’s criminal justice system imprisons so many—often on tawdry evidence and botched due process—to be tortured in maximum security units or on death row, overwhelmingly because of color and class, it is in effect—and intention—silencing potential and actual writers, intellectuals, artists, journalists: a whole intelligentsia. The internationally known case of Mumia Abu-Jamal² is emblematic but hardly unique. The methods of Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo³ have long been practiced in the prisons and policing of the United States.

What has all this to do with poetry? [. . .]

[. . .]let’s never discount it—within every official, statistical, designated nation, there breathes another nation: of unappointed, unappeased, unacknowledged clusters of people who daily, with fierce imagination and tenacity, confront cruelties, exclusions, and indignities, signaling through those carriers—which are often literal cages—in poetry, music, street theater, murals, videos, Web sites—and through many forms of direct activism.

I hope never to idealize poetry—it has suffered enough from that. Poetry is not a healing lotion, an emotional massage, a kind of linguistic aromatherapy. Neither is it a blueprint, nor an instruction manual, nor a billboard [. . .] .

Walt Whitman never separated his poetry from his vision of American democracy—a vision severely tested in a Civil War fought over the economics of slavery. Late in life he called “poetic lore [. . .] a conversation overheard in the dusk, from speakers far or hid, of which we get only a few broken murmurs”—the obscurity, we might think now, of democracy itself.

But also of those “dark times” in and about which Bertolt Brecht⁴ assured us there would be songs.

Poetry has been charged with “aestheticizing,” thus being complicit in, the violent realities of power, of practices like collective punishment, torture, rape, and genocide. This accusation was famously invoked in Adorno’s⁵ “after the Holocaust lyric poetry is impossible”—which Adorno later retracted and which a succession of Jewish poets have in their practice rejected [. . .].

If to “aestheticize” is to glide across brutality and cruelty, treat them merely as dramatic occasions for the artist rather than structures of power to be revealed and dismantled—much hangs on the words “merely” and “rather than.” Opportunism isn’t the same as committed attention. But we can also define the “aesthetic” not as a privileged and sequestered rendering of human suffering, but as news of an awareness, a resistance, that totalizing systems want to quell: art reaching into us for what’s still passionate, still unintimidated, still unquenched.

Poetry has been written off on other counts: (1) it’s not a mass-market “product”: it doesn’t get sold on airport newsstands or in supermarket aisles; (2) the actual consumption figures for poetry can’t be quantified at the checkout counter; (3) it’s too “difficult” for the average mind; (4) it’s too elite, but the wealthy don’t bid for it at Sotheby’s. It is, in short, redundant. This might be called the free-market critique of poetry.

There’s actually an odd correlation between these ideas: poetry is either inadequate, even immoral, in the face of human suffering, or it’s unprofitable, hence useless. Either way, poets are advised to hang our heads or fold our tents. Yet in fact, throughout the world, transfusions of poetic language can and do quite literally keep bodies and souls together—and more.

[. . .] Poetry has the capacity—in its own ways and by its own means—to remind us of something we are forbidden to see. A forgotten future: a still-uncreated site whose moral architecture is founded not on ownership and dis-possession, the subjection of women, torture and bribes, outcast and tribe, but on the continuous redefining of freedom—that word now held under house arrest by the rhetoric of the “free” market. This ongoing future, written off over and over, is still within view. All over the world its paths are being rediscovered and reinvented: through collective action, through many kinds of art. Its elementary condition is the recovery and redistribution of the world’s resources that have been extracted from the many by the few.

4. In “Motto,” the German poet and playwright (1898–1956) asks, “In dark times, will there also be singing?” And he answers, “yes, there will be singing. About the dark times.”

5. German philosopher Theodor Adorno (1903–69).

Finally: there is always that in poetry which will not be grasped, which cannot be described, which survives our ardent attention, our critical theories, our classrooms, our late-night arguments. There is always (I am quoting the poet/translator Américo Ferrari) “an unspeakable where, perhaps, the nucleus of the living relation between the poem and the world resides.”

The living relation between the poem and the world: difficult knowledge, operating theater where the poet, committed, goes on working.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. In her 1951 poem AT A BACH CONCERT, Adrienne Rich writes that “Form is the ultimate gift that love can offer” (line 7). What, exactly, is the case for the “discipline” of formal art argued by this poem (line 4)? How does Rich’s later work both embody and reject formalism? Considering as evidence the selections of Rich’s poetry and prose in this and previous chapters, write an essay in which you discuss how Rich’s thoughts about formality and form evolved throughout her career.
2. Carefully considering plot, characterization, and structure, write an essay in which you detail the ways DIVING INTO THE WRECK is and is not typical of Rich’s work.
3. In poems such as SNAPSHOTS OF A DAUGHTER-IN-LAW and PLANETARIUM, Rich considers the creative accomplishments of women throughout history. What role do these women play in Rich’s poetry, separately and together? How is that role both constrained and unconstrained by their gender? Write an essay in which you examine the way Rich portrays creative women. Are they role models in her work, or something else?

4. Rich once said of her college days in the late 1940s,

I had no political ideas of my own, only the era’s vague and hallucinatory anti-Communism and the encroaching privatism of the 1950s. Drenched in invisible assumptions of my class and race, unable to fathom the pervasive ideology of gender, I felt “politics” as distant, vaguely sinister, the province of powerful older men or of people I saw as fanatics. It was in poetry that I sought a grasp on the world and on interior events, “ideas of order,” even power.

Using the poems by Rich included in this anthology, write an essay that charts the development of the poet’s political consciousness.

5. In the prose writings excerpted in this chapter, Rich describes and defends the political passions that, she says, animate her life as an artist. How fully do Rich’s poems embody her political beliefs, particularly her commitment to feminism? Write an essay in which you explore Rich’s poetry in light of her feminist politics.
6. Choose two or more poems in this book by one author, and write an essay in which you draw on those poems to demonstrate either the distinctive, characteristic qualities and features of that author’s work or the way your understanding of one poem by the author is altered or enhanced when you read it in conjunction with the other poem or poems.

SAMPLE WRITING: COMPARATIVE ESSAY

The student essay below was written in response to the following assignment (a more elaborate version of the last writing suggestion in ch. 19):

Your second essay for the course should be 6–9 pages long and should analyze two or more poems included in The Norton Introduction to Literature. The poems must be by the same author.

You are strongly encouraged to pay attention to how the poems' meaning and effect are shaped by some aspect or aspects of their form. Those aspects might include specific formal features such as rhyme, meter, alliteration, or assonance, and/or external form or subgenre—the fact that a poem is a Shakespearean or Petrarchan sonnet, a haiku, or a dramatic monologue, for example. (In terms of the latter, you might consider how the poem's effect and meaning are shaped by the very fact that it takes a particular form.)

In her essay, student writer Melissa Makolin draws on three sonnets by William Shakespeare to argue for the distinctiveness and radicalism of the views expressed in two sonnets by another author, Edna St. Vincent Millay. In a sense, then, Makolin's essay focuses simultaneously on external form (ch. 18) and the author's work (ch. 19), even as it explores gender (“Exploring Gender: An Album”) and engages in a kind of feminist criticism (see “Critical Approaches”). That's a lot to tackle in a relatively short essay, and you will no doubt find things both to admire and to criticize about Makolin's argument. At what points do you find yourself agreeing with her interpretation? disagreeing? wanting more evidence or more analysis of the evidence provided? more contextual information—about literary tradition, the author, or historical and cultural context? Where and how might the essay's logic seem faulty or its claims contradictory? In the end, what might you take away from this sample essay about how to craft an effective, persuasive argument about an author's work?

Out-Sonneting Shakespeare: An Examination of Edna St. Vincent Millay's Use of the Sonnet Form

Edna St. Vincent Millay is known not only for her poetry, but also for the feminist ideals she represents therein. She was an extremely talented poet who turned the sonnet form on its head, using the traditionally restrictive form previously used almost exclusively by male poets to express feminist ideas that were radical for her time. Sonnets, especially as written by Shakespeare and Petrarch, are often about the physical beauty of an idealized but also objectified woman, and they implicitly emphasize the man's dominance over her. Millay uses the sonnet form to assert a much different view of femininity, sexuality, and biological dominance. She uses a form known for its poetic limitations to reject social limitations. She uses a form previously used to objectify women to portray them as sexual beings with power and control over their own bodies and lives. The paradox of Millay's poetry is that she uses a poetically binding, male-dominated form to show that she will not be bound either by literary tradition or societal mores regarding inter-gender relations.

The idea of a woman seeking physical pleasure in defiance of societal constraints is one that was revolutionary when "Women have loved before as I love now" and "I, being born a woman and distressed" were published, in 1931 and 1923 respectively. They are poems about a woman's lust leading her to select a sexual partner based on her physical needs rather than on the desire for love. This is a concept that Shakespeare would have found very contentious for three reasons. First, Shakespeare did not agree with acting on lust of any kind; in fact, this is the topic of his sonnet "Th' expense of spirit in a waste of shame." It is a fourteen-line treatise on the evils that result from acting on lustful urges in which Shakespeare declares,

Th'expense of spirit in a waste of shame
 Is lust in action; and, till action, lust
 Is perjured, murderous, bloody, full of blame,
 Savage, extreme, rude, cruel, not to trust. (lines 1-4)

Lust, sexual or otherwise, is a pathway to a hell both religious and secular. Seventeenth-century society dramatically constricted the liberties of women in particular and didn't encourage sexual freedom for either gender.

Second, the majority of Shakespeare's sonnets simultaneously idealize and trivialize the two things they celebrate: women and love. In poems such as "My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun," he treats women either as objects of an ordered, almost courtly love or as objects of mild ridicule. In this poem's first twelve lines, he mocks his mistress by describing her halitosis (7-8), referring to her breasts as "dun" (3) and her hair as "black wires" (4), references to all the contemporary conventions of beauty to which she does not conform. He not only tells her what the ideal of feminine beauty is, but also makes light of the various ways in which she does not live up to it. He justifies these hurtful insults by reassuring the poor woman that she is "as rare / As any she belied with false compare" (13-14). He mocks her appearance by telling her that she is special and beautiful in her own way only because he loves her. Insulting someone, breaking down her self-esteem, and convincing her that she could be loved by no one else are tactics used in abusive relationships to subjugate one's partner. This is not love, and the role of women in the traditional Shakespeare sonnet is far from empowered.

Third and finally, in addition to idealizing while simultaneously trivializing women, Shakespeare's sonnets also demean the concept of love. To Shakespeare, a woman is worthy of love either because she is an ideal of physical beauty or because he is noble enough to love her despite her flaws (as in "My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun"). He takes this warped concept one step further, though, by creating an ideal of love that is egotistical and unhealthy for both parties. In "Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?," he spends the first twelve lines describing the ways in which this particular woman fulfills the contemporary ideals of beauty. It is clear that he ardently reveres her physical appearance, and the poem ends with the kind of declaration of personal devotion consistent with love. The turn, however, exhibits a malignant narcissism when it reassures the beloved that "So long as men can breathe or eyes can see, / So long lives this, and this gives life to thee" (13-14). The object of the speaker's affection is just that, an object that only exists as an appendage to him. Shakespeare makes it clear that it is only because of his poetic greatness that their love will persist through the ages. He uses the poetic form to relegate women to the position of objects.

The sonnets of Edna St. Vincent Millay use Shakespearean and Petrarchan forms to offer quite a different view of the role of women. She sees herself as a liberated woman, and she is not afraid to defy social conventions by taking lovers and discarding them when necessary. In writing sonnets about actively satisfying her lust, she also defies literary conventions, completely changing the male-female power dynamic of past sonnets by male writers. In "Women have loved before as I love now," Millay discusses how women throughout history have felt the same lust that she feels, but unlike other more timid and traditional women, she is willing to join the ranks of the brave women of antiquity and to satisfy her passions despite the potential cost. This poem celebrates the women who choose to act against the standards set for them. Describing them as "treacherous queens, with death upon the tread, / Heedless and wilful, [who] took their knights to bed" makes them sound heroic, and it shifts control in the sexual relationship from the man to the woman (13-14). In Millay's version, the women sexually dominate the men and temporarily free themselves from the constraints of an oppressive society. Further, by alluding to the famous females of the "lively chronicles of the past" (2), she shows not only that this behavior is natural and heroic, but also that it is historically valid. The specific women she alludes to when referring to "Irish waters by a Cornish prow" (3) and "Trojan waters by a Spartan mast" (4) are respectively Iseult, the adulteress of the classic work of medieval passion The Romance of Tristan and Iseult, and Helen of Troy (or any of the other libidinous women) of the Homeric epics.

The fact that Millay uses the sonnet form to illustrate sexual liberation is significant for several reasons. First, it shows that she understands the restrictions placed upon her, both as a poet and as a woman. Second, using the sonnet shows that she can hold her own against the great male poets and write within the boundaries that they have erected; the subject matter of her poetry shows that she chooses not to. Lastly, it is significant because, in using the sonnet form for her own feminist purposes, she directly confronts Shakespeare's one-dimensional portrayal of women by proposing her own view of ideal femininity.

The second of Edna St. Vincent Millay's sonnets that defies the ideals set forth by Shakespeare is "I, being born a woman and distressed." It is a poem about impermanent lust, not eternal love. The speaker tells her lover that her feelings are purely physical ("a certain zest / To bear your body's weight upon breast," 4-5) and simply arise out of human biology ("the needs and notions of my kind," 2) and close quarters ("propinquity," 3). Emotional and physical needs are two things which need not be dependent on each other, and temporary desire does not have to lead to anything lasting. Consummation of a relationship was never discussed in the time of Shakespeare as a tenet of courtly love because women were supposed to be angelic ideals rather than real people with carnal desires. Millay's speaker defies these unrealistic and unattainable ideals of eternal adoration by warning her lover not to "Think" that "I shall remember you with love" (9, 11), illustrating that desire is impermanent. In fact, it is just a temporary "frenzy" and "insufficient reason" even to have a "conversation when we meet again" (13-14). Lust in Millay's world is fleeting, whereas the love of Shakespeare's world is final and complete once the man conquers all and the woman takes her place on his arm. Millay's poem might seem cynical, but it represents a more realistic view of female and male interactions; life and love are transitory and to be enjoyed in the moment because sexual urges can be sated, are biologically determined, and essential to survival, while emotional ones are (relatively) inconsequential and satisfied in other ways.

Millay draws on Shakespeare as a kind of foil by using the form so associated with his name as a vehicle for her very different views on the same topics. Millay brings sexual relationships to a far more terrestrial level with her assertions that women have primal urges that must be satisfied and that submission to ascribed gender roles is not necessary in order to obtain this satisfaction. She presents a radically modern view of relationships. She lambastes the Shakespearean paradigm of the idealized woman, a traditionally beautiful possession of the egotistical man. By using the Shakespearean sonnet form to propose her own revamped, modern vision of woman, a self-aware person who fearlessly relishes the idea of her own emotional and sexual independence, Millay redefines both “woman” and “love.”

Emily Dickinson

AN ALBUM

The bee himself did not evade the schoolboy more than she evaded me; and even at this day I still stand somewhat bewildered, like the boy.

—THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON

The woman many regard as America's most original poet was born in her family's home in Amherst, Massachusetts, on December 10, 1830. She would die in the same home at the age of fifty-five, having anonymously published only ten of the almost eighteen hundred poems that her sister was surprised to discover after her death. Because she never married and rarely, if ever, ventured outside her home in the last twenty years of her life, biographers and critics are fond of contrasting the narrowness of Emily Dickinson's life with the tremendous breadth of her posthumous reputation and influence, and the brevity and emotional intensity of her poetry, with its sheer formal, emotional, and intellectual audacity and range.

Yet Dickinson's life was not quite as uneventful or narrow as it might outwardly appear. She received a fairly extensive education for a woman of her era, studying classics, as well as science and other subjects, at both Amherst Academy, which she attended for seven years, and the Mount Holyoke Female Seminary (later, Mount Holyoke College), which she attended for one. She also read widely and deeply throughout her life. Moreover, she had a great deal of indirect knowledge of public and literary affairs, including the abolitionist, feminist, and Transcendentalist movements, as well as the various theological controversies of her day. Her father was a prominent lawyer, college administrator, and politician; Emily herself maintained an avid correspondence with some ninety people and included among her friends the clergyman Charles Wadsworth, journalists Samuel Bowles and Thomas Higginson, and novelist Helen Hunt Jackson. Dickinson's friendships also ensured her a select, but astute, audience for her letters and the poems she often included in them.

Dickinson nonetheless did cultivate her privacy and independence, bequeathing us a body of poetry that is in some ways as deliberately elusive, enigmatic, and eccentric as the woman herself apparently was, even to those who knew her best. As a result, hers is also a poetry that holds especially rich rewards for readers willing both to read individual poems multiple times and to read multiple poems with an eye on the light each sheds on the others.

As you read the Dickinson poems gathered in the following album and in other chapters, try to identify the various formal features and strategies that seem to you most characteristic of Dickinson's poetry, including its diction, syntax, punctuation, meter, and rhyme. Pay attention, too, to the varying tone of the poems and the persona Dickinson creates in and through them. To what extent and how and why do the speakers of these varied lyrics seem like versions of the same person? what sort of person or persons? What patterns do you notice in the objects depicted and in the topics or questions explored in these poems? What sorts of feelings are communicated, and what might the poems have to say about feeling, as well as thought and imagination? Why might (or might not) Dickinson's poems seem "torn up by the roots, with rain and dew and earth still clinging to them," as Higginson once declared? Or how might the poems help you understand what Dickinson meant when she wrote, "Tell all the truth but tell it slant / Success in Circuit lies"?

As you work to answer these questions for yourself, you may—like countless other readers before you—find yourself as intrigued by the poet behind the work as by the work itself, and rightly so. Yet critic Molly McQuade's cautionary words are perhaps worth keeping in mind: "Because [Dickinson] lived in seclusion by choice, and because her poetry also steadfastly reflects the author's coveting of privacy, to read the life in the poetry is perilous, if not impossible. Likewise, to search the life for the origins of her poetry would be treacherous."

Another factor that may make both a biographical approach to Dickinson's poetry and claims about how it changed over time somewhat more difficult than in the case of other poets is the fact that we cannot precisely date Dickinson's poems. Instead, we have to rely on the approximate dates scholars assign based on a study of the letters and the hand-sewn books that hold the only surviving copies. In a way, then, the case of Emily Dickinson is a bit like that of William Shakespeare—one in which all that we don't know about the author makes the work even more intriguing.

POEMS BY EMILY DICKINSON

[Tell all the truth but tell it slant—]

Tell all the truth but tell it slant—
 Success in Circuit lies
 Too bright for our infirm Delight
 The Truth's superb surprise
 5 As Lightning to the Children eased
 With explanation kind
 The Truth must dazzle gradually
 Or every man be blind—

1872

- What meanings of the word "Circuit" (line 2) seem especially appropriate and relevant here? Why and how so?

[I stepped from Plank to Plank]

I stepped from Plank to Plank
 A slow and cautious way
 The Stars about my Head I felt
 About my Feet the Sea.
 5 I knew not but the next
 Would be my final inch—

This gave me that precarious Gait
Some call Experience.

c. 1864

- For what does “stepp[ing] from Plank to Plank” become a metaphor in the poem? Is this experience a positive or a negative one?

[Wild Nights—Wild Nights!]

Wild Nights—Wild Nights!
Were I with thee
Wild Nights should be
Our luxury!

5 Futile—the Winds—
To a Heart in port—
Done with the Compass—
Done with the Chart!

Rowing in Eden—
10 Ah, the Sea!
Might I but moor—Tonight—
In Thee!

c. 1861

- Whom might the speaker be addressing? What might it mean to be “Done with the Chart” (line 8)?

[My Life had stood—a Loaded Gun—]

My Life had stood—a Loaded Gun—
In Corners—till a Day
The Owner passed—identified—
And carried Me away—

5 And now We roam in Sovereign Woods—
And now We hunt the Doe—
And every time I speak for Him—
The Mountains straight reply—

And do I smile, such cordial light
10 Upon the Valley glow—
It is as a Vesuvian face
Had let its pleasure through—

And when at Night—Our good Day done—
I guard My Master’s Head—
15 ’Tis better than the Eider-Duck’s
Deep Pillow—to have shared—

To foe of His—I’m deadly foe—
None stir the second time—

On whom I lay a Yellow Eye—
 20 Or an emphatic Thumb—
 Though I than He—may longer live
 He longer must—than I—
 For I have but the power to kill,
 Without—the power to die—
 c. 1863

- How does Dickinson set up and then defy expectations through the poem's controlling metaphor? How do the poem's quirks (e.g., the jerky rhythm, the strange syntax, the slant rhymes) contribute to its overall effect?

[After great pain, a formal feeling comes—]

After great pain, a formal feeling comes—
 The Nerves sit ceremonious, like Tombs—
 The stiff Heart questions was it He, that bore,
 And Yesterday, or Centuries before?
 5 The Feet, mechanical, go round—
 A Wooden way
 Of Ground, or Air, or Ought—
 Regardless grown,
 A Quartz contentment, like a stone—
 10 This is the Hour of Lead—
 Remembered, if outlived,
 As Freezing Persons recollect the Snow—
 First—Chill—then Stupor—then the letting go—
 c. 1862

- What different metaphors and similes are used here, and what does each contribute to the poem's portrayal of how we feel "After great pain"?

[A narrow Fellow in the Grass]

A narrow Fellow in the Grass
 Occasionally rides—
 You may have met Him—did you not
 His notice sudden is—
 5 The Grass divides as with a Comb—
 A spotted shaft is seen—
 And then it closes at your feet
 And opens further on—
 He likes a Boggy Acre
 10 A Floor too cool for Corn—
 Yet when a Boy, and Barefoot—
 I more than once at Noon
 Have passed, I thought, a Whip lash
 Unbraiding in the Sun

- 15 When stooping to secure it
 It wrinkled, and was gone—
 Several of Nature's People
 I know, and they know me—
 I feel for them a transport
 20 Of cordiality—
 But never met this Fellow
 Attended, or alone
 Without a tighter breathing
 And Zero at the Bone—

- What does the use of dactyls (each metrical foot consisting of a stressed syllable followed by two unstressed syllables) contribute to this poem? HART CRANE

To Emily Dickinson

You who desired so much—in vain to ask—
 Yet fed your hunger like an endless task,
 Dared dignify the labor, bless the quest—
 Achieved that stillness ultimately best,

- 5 Being, of all, least sought for: Emily, hear!
 O sweet, dead Silencer, most suddenly clear
 When singing that Eternity possessed
 And plundered momentarily in every breast;

—Truly no flower yet withers in your hand.
 10 The harvest you described and understand
 Needs more than wit to gather, love to bind.
 Some reconciliation of remotest mind—

Leaves Ormus rubyless, and Ophir¹ chill.
 Else tears heap all within one clay-cold hill.

- How does the speaker characterize Emily Dickinson in the first five lines of the poem? What does the second stanza suggest about the nature of her poetry? How does the poem's form contribute to its characterization of Dickinson and her work?

BILLY COLLINS

Taking Off Emily Dickinson's Clothes

First, her tippet² made of tulle, easily lifted off her shoulders and laid on the back of a wooden chair.

And her bonnet,
 5 the bow undone with a light forward pull.

Then the long white dress, a more complicated matter with mother-of-pearl buttons down the back,
 so tiny and numerous that it takes forever 10 before my hands can part the fabric, like a swimmer's dividing water,
 and slip inside.

You will want to know
 that she was standing 15 by an open window in an upstairs bedroom, motionless, a little wide-eyed,
 looking out at the orchard below,
 the white dress puddled at her feet on the wide-board, hardwood floor.

20 The complexity of women's undergarments in nineteenth-century America is not to be waved off,
 and I proceeded like a polar explorer through clips, clasps, and moorings, 25 catches, straps, and whalebone stays, sailing toward the iceberg of her nakedness.

1. Both Ormus and Ophir were cities in the Middle East legendary for their wealth and luxury.

2. Shoulder cape with hanging ends.

Later, I wrote in a notebook
 it was like riding a swan into the night,
 but, of course, I cannot tell you everything—30 the way she closed her eyes to the orchard, how her hair tumbled free of its pins,
 how there were sudden dashes
 whenever we spoke.

What I can tell you is 35 it was terribly quiet in Amherst that Sabbath afternoon,
 nothing but a carriage passing the house,
 a fly buzzing in a windowpane.

So I could plainly hear her inhale 40 when I undid the very top hook-and-eye fastener of her corset and I could hear her sigh when finally it was unloosed, the way some readers sigh when they realize that Hope has feathers, 45 that Reason is a plank, that Life is a loaded gun that looks right at you with a yellow eye.

- How does this poem use figures of speech to characterize the act of disrobing Dickinson? For what does that act, in turn, become a metaphor? How does the poem use allusions to specific Dickinson poems?

Chronology

- 1830 Dickinson is born on December 10 in Amherst, Massachusetts, second of the three children of Emily Norcross Dickinson and Edward Dickinson, son of the founder of Amherst College and himself both a treasurer of the college and a lawyer.
- 1841 After attending two local primary schools, Dickinson enters Amherst Academy; one of her teachers will later describe her “as a very bright, but rather delicate and frail-looking girl; an excellent scholar; of exemplary deportment, faithful in all school duties; but somewhat shy and nervous.” “Her compositions,” he added, “were strikingly original.”
- 1842-43 Dickinson’s father serves two terms as a state senator, later joining the Governor’s Executive Council (1846–47).
- 1844 After the death of a cousin, Dickinson spends a month with her aunt in Boston.
- 1847 Dickinson leaves Amherst Academy for one year at Mount Holyoke Female Seminary (later Mount Holyoke College).

- 1852 Dickinson publishes the first of seven poems to appear anonymously in the local Springfield Daily Republican, a newspaper with liberal, abolitionist leanings.
- 1853–55 Dickinson’s father serves in the U.S. Congress; in Spring 1855, Dickinson visits Washington, DC, with her father and sister, spending time with a cousin in Philadelphia on the way home. In 1855, her elder brother, Austin, declares himself “saved,” and Emily becomes the only member of her immediate family not to undergo a similar religious experience.
- 1856 Austin Dickinson marries Susan Huntington Gilbert, who will become one of Dickinson’s most intimate friends and the recipient of many letters and approximately ninety of her poems—by far the most of any correspondent.
- 1858 Dickinson meets Springfield Daily Republican editor Samuel Bowles (1826–78), who becomes a frequent visitor.
- 1862 Dickinson initiates a lifelong correspondence with Atlantic Monthly literary editor, abolitionist, and feminist Thomas Wentworth Higginson (1823–1911); though she will send many of her poems to Higginson, he advises against publication.
- 1864–65 Eye trouble sends Dickinson on two extended stays in Cambridgeport, where she is treated by a Boston ophthalmologist. After her return, Dickinson will seldom leave the family home, though she will receive visits from intimates including Higginson, Bowles, and the Reverend Charles Wadsworth.
- 1874 Dickinson’s father dies.
- 1875 Dickinson’s always-frail mother suffers a major stroke; Dickinson becomes her bedridden mother’s primary caretaker.
- 1877 After the death of his wife, Judge Otis P. Lord, an old friend, engages Dickinson in what one journalist calls “an astonishingly candid, erotic correspondence,” though Dickinson apparently refuses a marriage proposal.
- 1886 Dickinson dies at age fifty-five in her family’s Amherst home on May 15. In an obituary, sister-in-law Susan Dickinson observes, “Very few in the village, except among older inhabitants, knew Miss Emily personally, although the facts of her seclusion and her intellectual brilliancy were familiar Amherst traditions.” After Dickinson’s death, her sister discovers almost eighteen hundred poems, as well as three volumes of letters.
- 1890 Austin Dickinson’s mistress, Mabel Loomis Todd (1856–1932), and Thomas Higginson coedit and publish a posthumous collection of selected poems by Emily Dickinson.
- 1891 Responding to “a constant and earnest demand by readers for further information in regard to her,” Higginson publishes excerpts from selected Dickinson letters.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. One immediately apparent feature of Dickinson’s poetry is her rather odd use of punctuation, especially her frequent use of the dash. Write an essay that explains how punctuation contributes to the effect and meaning of at least two Dickinson poems.

2. Write an essay that explores the various kinds of “circuits” or “circuitousness” at work in at least two Dickinson poems and the way such “circuits” contribute to the poems’ success.
3. Write an essay explaining the way Dickinson’s poetry is characterized in one poem about Dickinson included in this album; be sure to draw on at least one of Dickinson’s poems to assess whether, why, and how that characterization seems apt.

W. B. Yeats

AN ALBUM

Mad Ireland hurt you into poetry.

—W. H. AUDEN

If it is difficult to make claims about either biographical elements in Emily Dickinson's poems or her poetry's development over time, the opposite seems true of the work of W. B. Yeats. Whereas Dickinson left us guessing about her inner life, the timing and revision of her poems, and her ideas about the nature and goals of her craft, Yeats left us a treasure trove of memoirs, essays, and manuscripts on which to draw. As such, his poetry may well move and speak to us more as we discover more about the author's personal experience and beliefs; about the order in which the poems were written (and often rewritten); and about the historical events that helped shape the author and his work. Whereas Dickinson published few poems in her lifetime and soared to fame only after her death, Yeats was a prolific and celebrated, if controversial, public figure who received the Nobel Prize for Literature some twenty-five years before his death.

William Butler Yeats was born in Dublin in 1865. Though he spent much of his youth in London and is today regarded as one of the greatest lyric poets in the English language, he is best known as the preeminent Irish poet of the twentieth century. Well versed in Irish history, folklore, and politics, Yeats attended art school for a time before devoting himself to writing poetry that was, early in his career, self-consciously dreamy and ethereal. (A great admirer of poets Percy Shelley [1792–1822] and William Blake [1782–1827], Yeats once labeled himself “the last Romantic.”) Yeats's poems became tighter, more concrete, direct, and passionate with his involvement (mainly through theater) with the Irish nationalist cause, his desperate love for the actress and activist Maud Gonne (1866–1953), his exposure to the work of the German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900), and his friendship with the American poet Ezra Pound (1885–1972). Yeats served as a senator in the newly independent Irish government before withdrawing from active public life to Thoor Ballylee, a crumbling, ancient tower fashioned into a home by Yeats and Georgie Hyde-Lees (1892–1968), the young Englishwoman he ultimately married.

Both Yeats and his work were profoundly shaped by shifts in the character and fortunes of Irish nationalism—both the political movement to liberate Ireland from British control and its cultural cousin, the Celtic Revival, which sought to rejuvenate a distinctively Irish literature and culture. Deeply involved in both movements in a way that his younger countryman, James Joyce (1882–1941), never was, Yeats nonetheless—at various times and in various ways—found himself in profound conflict with their aims, their methods, and their vision of both art and Ireland. Though he was particularly averse to the idea of art as propaganda, his early poetry and plays draw heavily on the oral folk traditions and rhythms to which he was first introduced during childhood visits to County Sligo and which he began to research more seriously after his introduction to Irish nationalists. Though such folk sources would become less important to his later work, Yeats strove throughout his life to preserve and reinvigorate Irish culture.

Yeats was also deeply influenced by events and movements that stretched well beyond his native country, including World War I (1914–18), the spiritualist movement, and the birth of psychology. As Yeats himself recognized, his deep immersion in the occult, as well as his lifelong search for a satisfactory belief system to replace or rejuvenate the Protestant Christianity of his ancestors, was at once a reaction to the materialistic, rationalistic spirit of his age (or what he called “the despotism of fact” that for him culminated in the First World War) and a reaction exceedingly common among the artists and intellectuals of his day. Ultimately, Yeats came to believe fervently in what his contemporary Carl Jung (1875–1961) labeled the “collective unconscious”—a sort of universal memory shared by all human beings—and in the idea that the poet, like the priest, the prophet, and the magician, taps into the collective unconscious and moves his audience through symbols. The comparison between priest and poet is key, for Yeats also believed that the arts, including poetry, should perform a quasi-religious function. He claimed in his essay “The Autumn of the Body” (1898) that “The arts are [. . .] about to take upon their shoulders the burdens that have fallen from the shoulders of priests, and to lead us back upon our journey by filling our thoughts with the essence of things, and not with things.” Elsewhere, he declared that he “made a new religion, almost an infallible church of poetic tradition.”

Such beliefs shape not only the complex symbolism of Yeats’s verse but also its external form. Yeats eschewed the free verse popular with his contemporaries at least in part because, as he explains in “The Symbolism of Poetry” (1900),

The purpose of rhythm [. . .] is to prolong the moment [. . .] when we are both asleep and awake, [. . .] by hushing us with an alluring monotony, which holds us waking by variety, to keep us in that state of perhaps real trance, in which the mind liberated from the pressure of the will is unfolded in symbols [. . .]. In the making and in the understanding of a work of art, and the more easily if it is full of patterns and symbols and music, we are lured to the threshold of sleep, and it may be far beyond it, without knowing that we have ever set our feet upon the steps of horn or of ivory.

To achieve those incantatory rhythms, Yeats experimented with various meters and verse forms, ranging from ballad stanza to ottava rima.

The chronology at the end of this album and the footnotes that accompany the poems will provide you with more information about Yeats, and you may find much more online and in the library. Even without that information, however, you will learn much about Yeats, his art, his beliefs, and the way all three changed over time by carefully reading the poems in this album one by one, paying attention to all that you observe, and talking about them with other readers. As you do so, keep in mind the following questions:

- What patterns can you detect in the poems’ external form, as well as internal structure?
- Where do symbols occur and recur, and what role do they play?

- What vision of art and the artist is conveyed by both the content and the form of these poems?
- Do you agree with those scholars who see dramatic shifts of both form and content from early poems such as THE LAKE ISLE OF INNISFREE (1890) to mid-career poems such as ALL THINGS CAN TEMPT ME (1910) and EASTER 1916 (1916) to late poems such as LEDA AND THE SWAN (1923) and SAILING TO BYZANTIUM (1923)?
- If you do detect three distinct phases and kinds of poems here, then do you think THE SECOND COMING (1919) fits more with the poems of Yeats's second or middle phase, or more with those of his third or late phase? Why and how so?
- If you see all the poems as more alike than different, what are the features that make them both alike and distinctive?

POEMS BY W. B. YEATS

The Lake Isle of Innisfree¹

I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree,
 And a small cabin build there, of clay and wattles made,
 Nine bean-rows will I have there, a hive for the honey-bee,
 And live alone in the bee-loud glade.

- 5 And I shall have some peace there, for peace comes dropping slow,
 Dropping from the veils of the morning to where the cricket sings;
 There midnight's all a glimmer, and noon a purple glow,
 And evening full of the linnet's wings.

- I will arise and go now, for always night and day
 10 I hear lake water lapping with low sounds by the shore;
 While I stand on the roadway, or on the pavements grey,
 I hear it in the deep heart's core.

1890

- Why does the speaker vow to go to Innisfree, and how does the life he imagines living there compare to the one he now lives? In what ways might his imagined future seem like a return to the past?

1. Island in Lough Gill, County Sligo, Ireland.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

W. B. YEATS (1865–1939)

From The Trembling of the Veil (1922)*

Sometimes I told myself very adventurous love-stories with myself for hero, and at other times I planned out a life of lonely austerity, and at other times mixed the ideals and planned a life of lonely austerity mitigated by periodical lapses. I had still the ambition, formed in Sligo in my teens, of living in imitation of Thoreau² on Innisfree, a little island in Lough Gill, and when walking through Fleet Street very homesick I heard a little tinkle of water and saw a fountain in a shop-window which balanced a little ball upon its jet, and began to remember lake water. From the sudden remembrance came my poem Innisfree, my first lyric with anything in its rhythm of my own music. I had begun to loosen rhythm as an escape from rhetoric and from that emotion of the crowd that rhetoric brings, but I only understood vaguely and occasionally that I must for my special purpose use nothing but the common syntax. A couple of years later I would not have written that first line with its conventional archaism—“Arise and go”—nor the inversion in the last stanza. Passing another day by the new Law Courts [. . .] I grew suddenly oppressed by the great weight of stone, and thought, “There are miles and miles of stone and brick all round me,” and presently added, “If John the Baptist or his like were to come again and had his mind set upon it, he could make all these people go out into some wilderness leaving their buildings empty,” and that thought, which does not seem very valuable now, so enlightened the day that it is still vivid in the memory [. . .].

The Autobiography of William Butler Yeats*. Macmillan, 1953. In this excerpt from his autobiography, Yeats describes the period in the 1880s when he was in his twenties and living in London with his family.

All Things Can Tempt Me

All things can tempt me from this craft of verse:
 One time it was a woman's face, or worse—
 The seeming needs of my fool-driven land;
 Now nothing but comes readier to the hand
 5 Than this accustomed toil. When I was young,
 I had not given a penny for a song
 Did not the poet sing it with such airs
 That one believed he had a sword upstairs;

2. Henry David Thoreau (1817–62) famously spent two years living in an isolated cabin near Walden Pond, in Massachusetts, experiences described in Walden; or Life in the Woods (1854).

Yet would be now, could I but have my wish,
 10 Colder and dumber and deafer than a fish.

1910

- In his commentary on THE LAKE ISLE OF INNISFREE (see “Authors on Their Work,” above), Yeats suggests that over time he abandoned the archaic language and syntax, as well as subject matter, of his early verse. How might (or might not) ALL THINGS CAN TEMPT ME both exemplify and comment on that shift? How do diction and syntax contribute to the poem’s effect?

Easter 1916³

I have met them at close of day
 Coming with vivid faces
 From counter or desk among gray
 Eighteenth-century houses.
 5 I have passed with a nod of the head
 Or polite meaningless words,
 Or have lingered awhile and said
 Polite meaningless words,
 And thought before I had done
 10 Of a mocking tale or a gibe
 To please a companion
 Around the fire at the club,
 Being certain that they and I
 But lived where motley is worn:
 15 All changed, changed utterly:
 A terrible beauty is born.

That woman’s⁴ days were spent
 In ignorant good-will,
 Her nights in argument
 20 Until her voice grew shrill.
 What voice more sweet than hers
 When, young and beautiful,
 She rode to harriers?
 This man⁵ had kept a school
 25 And rode our wingèd horse,⁶
 This other⁷ his helper and friend
 Was coming into his force;

3. On Easter Monday, 1916, nationalist leaders proclaimed an Irish Republic. After a week of street fighting, the British government put down the Easter Rebellion and executed a number of prominent nationalists, including the four mentioned in lines 75–76, all of whom Yeats knew personally.

4. Countess Constance Georgina Markiewicz (1868–1927), a beautiful and well-born young woman from County Sligo who became a vigorous nationalist. At first she was condemned to death, but her sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment, and she was granted amnesty in 1917.

5. Patrick Pearse (1879–1916), who led the assault on the Dublin Post Office, from which the proclamation of a republic was issued. A schoolmaster by profession, he had championed the restoration of the Gaelic language in Ireland and was an active political writer and poet.

6. The mythological Pegasus, a traditional symbol of poetic inspiration.

7. Thomas MacDonagh (1878–1916), also a writer and teacher.

He might have won fame in the end,
 So sensitive his nature seemed,
 30 So daring and sweet his thought.
 This other man⁸ I had dreamed
 A drunken, vainglorious lout.
 He had done most bitter wrong
 To some who are near my heart,
 35 Yet I number him in the song;
 He, too, has resigned his part
 In the casual comedy;
 He, too, has been changed in his turn,
 Transformed utterly:
 40 A terrible beauty is born.

Hearts with one purpose alone
 Through summer and winter seem
 Enchanted to a stone
 To trouble the living stream.
 45 The horse that comes from the road,
 The rider, the birds that range
 From cloud to tumbling cloud,
 Minute by minute they change;
 A shadow of cloud on the stream
 50 Changes minute by minute;
 A horse-hoof slides on the brim,
 And a horse splashes within it;
 The long-legged moor-hens dive,
 And hens to moor-cocks call;
 55 Minute by minute they live:
 The stone's in the midst of all.

Too long a sacrifice
 Can make a stone of the heart.
 O when may it suffice?
 60 That is Heaven's part, our part
 To murmur name upon name,
 As a mother names her child
 When sleep at last has come
 On limbs that had run wild.
 65 What is it but nightfall?
 No, no, not night but death;
 Was it needless death after all?
 For England may keep faith⁹
 For all that is done and said.
 70 We know their dream; enough
 To know they dreamed and are dead;

8. Major John MacBride (1868–1916), who had married Yeats's beloved Maud Gonne in 1903 but separated from her two years later.

9. Before the uprising, the English had promised eventual home rule to Ireland.

And what if excess of love
 Bewildered them till they died?
 I write it out in a verse—
 75 MacDonagh and MacBride
 And Connolly¹ and Pearse
 Now and in time to be,
 Wherever green is worn,
 Are changed, changed utterly;
 80 A terrible beauty is born.

1916

- The phrase “A terrible beauty is born” becomes a kind of refrain in this poem. What does the poem suggest about why the events of Easter 1916 and the kind of political passion and commitment that went into it were simultaneously “terrible” and “beautiful”? What do the stone and the stream seem to symbolize?

The Second Coming²

Turning and turning in the widening gyre³
 The falcon cannot hear the falconer;
 Things fall apart; the center cannot hold;
 Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world,
 5 The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere
 The ceremony of innocence is drowned;
 The best lack all conviction, while the worst
 Are full of passionate intensity.

 Surely some revelation is at hand;
 10 Surely the Second Coming is at hand.
 The Second Coming! Hardly are those words out
 When a vast image out of *Spiritus Mundi*⁴
 Troubles my sight: somewhere in sands of the desert
 A shape with lion body and the head of a man,
 15 A gaze blank and pitiless as the sun,
 Is moving its slow thighs, while all about it
 Reel shadows of the indignant desert birds.⁵
 The darkness drops again; but now I know
 That twenty centuries of stony sleep

1. James Connolly (1868–1916), the leader of the Easter uprising.

2. The Second Coming of Christ, according to Matthew 24.29–44, will follow a time of “tribulation.” In A Vision (1937), Yeats describes his view of history as dependent on cycles of about two thousand years: The birth of Christ had ended the cycle of Greco-Roman civilization, and now the Christian cycle seemed near an end, to be followed by an antithetical cycle, ominous in its portents.

3. Literally, the widening spiral of a falcon’s flight. “Gyre” is Yeats’s term for a cycle of history, which he diagrammed as a series of interpenetrating cones.

4. Or Anima Mundi (Latin), the spirit or soul of the world. Yeats considered this universal consciousness or memory a fund from which poets drew their images and symbols.

5. Yeats later wrote of the “brazen winged beast [. . .] described in my poem The Second Coming” as “associated with laughing, ecstatic destruction.”

- 20 Were vexed to nightmare by a rocking cradle,
And what rough beast, its hour come round at last,
Slouches towards Bethlehem to be born?

January 1919

- What vision of the contemporary world is implied by the metaphors in the poem's first half? What vision of its future is suggested in the poem's second half?

Leda and the Swan⁶

A sudden blow: the great wings beating still Above the staggering girl, her thighs caressed
By the dark webs, her nape caught in his bill,
He holds her helpless breast upon his breast.

- 5 How can those terrified vague fingers push
The feathered glory from her loosening thighs?
And how can body, laid in that white rush,
But feel the strange heart beating where it lies?

- A shudder in the loins engenders there
10 The broken wall, the burning roof and tower
And Agamemnon dead.

Being so caught up,
So mastered by the brute blood of the air,
Did she put on his knowledge with his power
Before the indifferent beak could let her drop?

1923

- If THE SECOND COMING predicts the end of one historical cycle and its governing (Christian) myth, LEDA AND THE SWAN imagines the beginning of the preceding cycle. How does the poem characterize that beginning? Might we again have here (as in EASTER 1916, above) a kind of “terrible beauty”? How would you paraphrase the question the speaker poses at the end? Why might questions in general loom so large in this poem?

Sailing to Byzantium⁷

I

That⁸ is no country for old men. The young
In one another's arms, birds in the trees

6. According to Greek myth, Zeus took the form of a swan to rape Leda, who became the mother of Helen of Troy; of Castor; and also of Clytemnestra, Agamemnon's wife and murderer. Helen's abduction from her husband, Menelaus, brother of Agamemnon, began the Trojan War (line 10). Yeats described the visit of Zeus to Leda as an annunciation like that to Mary (see Luke 1.26–38); “I imagine the annunciation that founded Greece as made to Leda” (A Vision).

7. Ancient name of Istanbul, the capital and holy city of Eastern Christendom from the late fourth century until 1453. It was famous for its stylized and formal mosaics; its symbolic, nonnaturalistic art; and its highly developed intellectual life. Yeats repeatedly uses it to symbolize a world of artifice and timelessness, free from the decay and death of the natural and sensual world.

8. Ireland, as an instance of the natural, temporal world.

—Those dying generations—at their song,
 The salmon-falls, the mackerel-crowded seas,
 5 Fish, flesh, or fowl, commend all summer long
 Whatever is begotten, born, and dies.
 Caught in that sensual music all neglect
 Monuments of unaging intellect.

II

An aged man is but a paltry thing,
 10 A tattered coat upon a stick, unless Soul clap its hands and sing, and louder sing
 For every tatter in its mortal dress,
 Nor is there singing school but studying
 Monuments of its own magnificence;
 15 And therefore I have sailed the seas and come
 To the holy city of Byzantium.

III

O sages standing in God's holy fire
 As in the gold mosaic of a wall,
 Come from the holy fire, perne in a gyre,⁹
 20 And be the singing-masters of my soul.
 Consume my heart away; sick with desire
 And fastened to a dying animal
 It knows not what it is; and gather me
 Into the artifice of eternity.

IV

25 Once out of nature I shall never take
 My bodily form from any natural thing,
 But such a form as Grecian goldsmiths make
 Of hammered gold and gold enameling
 To keep a drowsy Emperor awake;¹
 30 Or set upon a golden bough² to sing
 To lords and ladies of Byzantium
 Of what is past, or passing, or to come.

1927

- Like THE LAKE ISLE OF INNISFREE, this poem focuses on an imaginary journey and on a contrast between then and there versus here and now, yet this poem deals much more directly with the subject of art and especially of

9. That is, whirl in a coiling motion, so that his soul may merge with its motion as the timeless world invades the cycles of history and nature. "Perne" is Yeats's coinage (from the noun pirn): to spin around in the kind of spiral pattern that thread makes as it comes off a bobbin or spool.

1. I have read somewhere that in the Emperor's palace at Byzantium was a tree made of gold and silver, and artificial birds that sang [Yeats's note].

2. In book 6 of the Aeneid, the sibyl tells Aeneas that he must pluck the golden bough from a nearby tree in order to descend to Hades. Each time Aeneas plucks the branch, an identical one takes its place.

poetry or song: what it might be like, where it might come from, what it might do for us. How does this poem both pose and answer those questions?

A POEM ABOUT W. B. YEATS

W. H. AUDEN

In Memory of W. B. Yeats

(d. January, 1939)

I

He disappeared in the dead of winter:
The brooks were frozen, the airports almost deserted,
And snow disfigured the public statues;
The mercury sank in the mouth of the dying day.

5 What instruments we have agree
The day of his death was a dark cold day.

Far from his illness
The wolves ran on through the evergreen forests,
The peasant river was untempted by the fashionable quays;

10 By mourning tongues
The death of the poet was kept from his poems.

But for him it was his last afternoon as himself,
An afternoon of nurses and rumors;
The provinces of his body revolted,
15 The squares of his mind were empty,
Silence invaded the suburbs,
The current of his feeling failed; he became his admirers.

Now he is scattered among a hundred cities
And wholly given over to unfamiliar affections,
20 To find his happiness in another kind of wood
And be punished under a foreign code of conscience.
The words of a dead man
Are modified in the guts of the living.

But in the importance and noise of tomorrow
25 When the brokers are roaring like beasts on the floor of the Bourse,³
And the poor have the sufferings to which they are fairly accustomed,
And each in the cell of himself is almost convinced of his freedom,
A few thousand will think of this day
As one thinks of a day when one did something slightly unusual.

30 What instruments we have agree
The day of his death was a dark cold day.

II

You were silly like us; your gift survived it all:
The parish of rich women, physical decay,

3. Paris stock exchange.

Yourself. Mad Ireland hurt you into poetry.
 35 Now Ireland has her madness and her weather still,
 For poetry makes nothing happen: it survives
 In the valley of its making where executives
 Would never want to tamper, flows on south
 From ranches of isolation and the busy griefs,
 40 Raw towns that we believe and die in; it survives,
 A way of happening, a mouth.

III

Earth, receive an honored guest:
 William Yeats is laid to rest.
 Let the Irish vessel lie
 45 Emptied of its poetry.

In the nightmare of the dark
 All the dogs of Europe bark,
 And the living nations wait,
 Each sequestered in its hate;
 50 Intellectual disgrace
 Stares from every human face,
 And the seas of pity lie
 Locked and frozen in each eye.

Follow, poet, follow right
 55 To the bottom of the night,
 With your unconstraining voice
 Still persuade us to rejoice;

With the farming of a verse
 Make a vineyard of the curse,
 60 Sing of human unsuccess
 In a rapture of distress;

In the deserts of the heart
 Let the healing fountain start,
 In the prison of his days
 65 Teach the free man how to praise.

1939

- Does Auden's elegy as a whole affirm that "poetry makes nothing happen" (line 36)? Why does the death of Yeats seem to inspire the speaker to reflect on this possibility?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

W. H. AUDEN (1907–73)

From “W. H. Auden, The Art of Poetry No. 17” (1974)*

INTERVIEWER: How about writers as leaders? Yeats, for instance, held office.

AUDEN: And he was terrible! Writers seldom make good leaders. They're self-employed, for one thing, and they have very little contact with their customers. It's very easy for a writer to be unrealistic. I have not lost my interest in politics, but I have come to realize that, in cases of social or political injustice, only two things are effective: political action and straight journalistic reportage of the facts. The arts can do nothing. The social and political history of Europe would be what it has been if Dante, Shakespeare, Michelangelo, Mozart, et al., had never lived. A poet, qua poet, has only one political duty, namely, in his own writing to set an example of the correct use of his mother tongue which is always being corrupted. When words lose their meaning, physical force takes over. By all means, let a poet, if he wants to, write what is now called an “engagé” [“engaged”] poem, so long as he realizes that it is mainly himself who will benefit from it. It will enhance his literary reputation among those who feel the same as he does.

INTERVIEWER: Would you care to comment on Yeats?

AUDEN: I find it very difficult to be fair to Yeats because he had a bad influence on me. He tempted me into a rhetoric which was, for me, oversimplified. Needless to say, the fault was mine, not his. He was, of course, a very great poet.

Chronology

- 1865 William Butler Yeats is born on June 13 in Dublin, Ireland, the eldest child of merchant's daughter Susan Pollexfen Yeats and well-known, but often financially strapped, lawyer-turned-painter John Butler Yeats.
- 1867 To further his career as an artist, John Yeats moves his family to London.
- 1872 Yeats, with his mother and siblings, spends two years at his maternal grandparents' home in Sligo, on Ireland's rural west coast.
- 1874 Yeats returns to London with his family and attends the Godolphin School.
- 1880 Financial difficulties force John Yeats to move his family back to Dublin, where his eldest son attends a local high school.

- 1884 Yeats enters Dublin's Metropolitan School of Art, where he will study until 1886. With fellow writer and art student George Russell (known as "A.E."), Yeats begins his research into spiritualism and the occult.
- 1885 Yeats meets Irish nationalist leader John O'Leary and, with O'Leary's help, publishes his first poems in the Dublin University Review. (In a 1907 essay, Yeats will describe O'Leary as championing the "romantic" and "idealistic" "conception of Irish nationality [. . .] in whose service I labour.")
- 1887 Yeats returns to London with his family and edits Poems and Ballads of Young Ireland.
- 1888 Yeats joins the spiritualist Theosophical Society and edits Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry.
- 1889 Yeats publishes his first volume of poetry, The Wanderings of Oisín and Other Poems, and meets and falls in love with the actress and Irish revolutionary Maud Gonne.
- 1891 Gonne rejects the first of at least three marriage proposals from Yeats.
- 1892 Yeats and others found the London-based Irish Literary Society, and Yeats publishes The Countess Cathleen and Various Legends and Lyrics, a collection of plays and poems.
- 1893 Yeats publishes an edition of the poems of William Blake and a prose work, The Celtic Twilight.
- 1895 Yeats publishes Poems, which includes revised versions of works in his first two collections and which is sometimes said to mark the end of his early period.
- 1896 Yeats meets fellow writer and Celtic Revivalist Lady Augusta Gregory and begins to spend holidays at her estate, Coole Park, in rural County Galway, Ireland.
- 1899 Yeats and Lady Gregory found the Irish Literary Theatre, later called the Abbey Theatre, in Dublin, which produces his Countess Cathleen.
- 1902 Maud Gonne stars in Yeats's Cathleen ni Houlihan.
- 1903 Gonne marries war veteran John MacBride.
- 1904 Yeats's so-called middle period arguably begins with the publication of the collection In the Seven Woods. He begins a six-year stint as manager of the Abbey Theatre, coming into conflict both with conservative Catholics offended by the supposed immorality and impiety of Abbey productions and with Irish nationalists convinced that Abbey plays should promote a wholly positive view of Ireland and the Irish.
- 1907 An Abbey performance of J. M. Synge's The Playboy of the Western World sparks riots over its supposedly negative portrayal of the Irish.
- 1913 Yeats spends the first of three winters with the young American poet Ezra Pound.
- 1914 World War I begins (in August). Yeats publishes Responsibilities, his first pointedly modernist, as well as avowedly public and political, poetry collection.
- 1916 In London, Yeats debuts At the Hawk's Well, the first of his plays influenced by Japanese Noh drama (rather than Irish history and legend), and publishes Reveries of Childhood and Youth, the first volume of his autobiography. In April, Irish

- nationalists stage the Easter Uprising in Dublin. Proclaiming Ireland an independent republic, the seven hundred volunteers are defeated by British troops after a week of bloody fighting; their leaders, including John MacBride, are executed for treason in May. Yeats proposes to Maud Gonne for the last time.
- 1917 The Russian Revolution begins, and T. S. Eliot publishes his first poetry collection, which includes The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock and which, Yeats later claimed, announced the birth of a new, self-consciously “modern” poetry that he “disliked” and yet admired for its “satiric intensity.” Yeats marries Georgie Hyde-Lees; while still on their honeymoon, Georgie begins the spirit-inspired automatic writing that will be the basis for A Vision (1925; see below).
- 1918 World War I ends. Yeats and his wife move to Thoor (literally, “Castle”) Ballylee, an ancient Norman tower near Lady Gregory’s estate; the tower and its winding staircase will become a central symbol in his later poetry.
- 1919 In January, Russian revolutionaries kill four grand dukes, bringing to seventeen the number of members of the former Russian emperor’s family to die in the revolution. Yeats writes “The Second Coming” and publishes The Wild Swans at Coole, the last collection of his so-called middle period. His first child, a daughter, is born in Dublin. Ireland enters a period of civil unrest.
- 1921 A truce brings temporary peace to Ireland. Yeats’s second child, a son, is born, and Yeats publishes the poetry collection Michael Robartes and the Dancer (1921).
- 1922 Irish Civil War begins. Yeats’s father dies. Yeats publishes The Trembling of the Veil, the second volume of his autobiography, and begins his six-year stint as a senator in the first Irish government.
- 1923 Yeats wins the Nobel Prize for Literature.
- 1925 Yeats publishes A Vision, a work of nonfiction outlining his system of symbols and cyclical vision of history.
- 1928 Yeats publishes The Tower and resigns from the Irish Senate.
- 1933 Yeats publishes The Winding Stair and Other Poems.
- 1939 At seventy-three, Yeats dies in France on January 28. World War II begins.
- 1948 Yeats’s remains are returned to Ireland and buried in County Sligo under a stone bearing the epitaph he composed: “Cast a cold eye / On Life, on Death. / Horseman, pass by!”

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Write an essay in which you compare THE LAKE ISLE OF INNISFREE and SAILING TO BYZANTIUM in order to show how Yeats’s poetry both did and didn’t change over the course of his career. How might the first of these poems seem like the work of a young man and poet, and the latter like that of a mature one?
2. Write an essay that explains the significance of any one recurring image or symbol, or set of related images or symbols, in at least two Yeats poems. Alternatively, use your essay to explore why terror and beauty seem to go together in Yeats’ poems.
3. Drawing on at least three poems, write an essay explaining whether and how Yeats’s poetry seems distinctly “Irish.” How, for example, might the troubled history of his native country or his own troubled relationship to Irish nationalism, as well as the middle-class Irish public, be explored in the poems, including the later ones that outwardly seem resolutely non-Irish in content and form?

4. Write an essay comparing the way W. H. Auden's poem about Yeats portrays the nature, source, and function of poetry to the way Yeats's poems, such as SAILING TO BYZANTIUM, do. Alternatively, compare the way each poet handles the contrast between physical, mortal life and "decay" (Auden, line 33), on the one hand, and the life lived in the imagination and poetry, on the other. Do the two poets seem to agree about the immortality and importance of poetry?

Pat Mora

AN ALBUM

Award-winning contemporary writer Pat Mora was born in 1942 in El Paso, Texas, a city on the Mexican border to which all four of her Spanish-speaking grandparents migrated during the Mexican Revolution. After earning a BA and MA from the University of Texas, El Paso, she taught both high-school and college English but did not devote herself seriously to writing until after her 1981 divorce, when, as she once joked to an interviewer, “I saw the age of forty coming for me.” In the years since, she has seen her three children into adulthood; remarried; and left Texas for Cincinnati, Ohio, and Santa Fe, New Mexico (her two current homes). She has also flourished as a writer, publishing collections of poetry such as Borders (1986), Agua Santa/Holy Water (1995), Aunt Carmen’s Book of Practical Saints (1997), and Adobe Odes (2007); a book of essays, Nepantla: Essays from the Land in the Middle (1993); a family memoir, House of Houses (1997); and over twenty-five books for children and young adults, including poetry, picture books, biographies, and retellings of Mayan folktales.

Avowing that she “take[s] pride in being a Hispanic writer,” Mora sees her work for both children and adults as bound up with the effort to promote literacy, a wider knowledge and appreciation of Hispanic culture and heritage, and cross-cultural understanding. In Nepantla, she likens the work of the poet to that of the curandera, or traditional healer, sounding not unlike the Irish poet W. B. Yeats when she argues that [t]he Chicana writer seeks to heal cultural wounds of historical neglect by providing opportunities to remember the past, to share and ease bitterness, to describe what has been viewed as unworthy of description, to cure by incantations and rhythms, by listening with her entire being and responding. She then gathers the tales and myths, weaves them together, and, if lucky, casts spells.

Though she makes frequent use of Spanish terms and phrases in all her work, Mora writes primarily in English largely because she is, in her own words, “bilingual, though English-dominant,” living on the figurative border between languages and cultures or in what she calls “the land in the middle.” Much of her work explores that land. Yet in interviews, Mora roundly rejects the idea that the experience of living “in the middle” is necessarily negative. Rather she insists that, while “there are situations where, yes, it’s plenty difficult” or where she is uncertain about where she belongs or who she is, there is also a flip side: “it’s double pleasure in a way,” offering “the advantage of moving back and forth.” As Mora also suggests, people from all backgrounds “experience borders of many kinds throughout life.” And by exploring some of these divides—between, for example, men and women or different generations—Mora’s work stresses the ubiquity and even universality of the border experience, as well as the pleasures and conflicts it entails.

Literal, physical borders in particular and space and place in general also intrigue Mora—all the more, she suggests, since a 1989 move from the Southwest to the Midwest heightened her awareness of both the distinctiveness of her native landscape and her own relationship to it. Whenever she flew west, she explained to one interviewer,

I would look out at this tremendous space and think how totally I felt at home there. Many of my Midwestern friends would confide to me that they found the desert sometimes even terrifying. I remember one of the brightest women I know who is an academic in Cincinnati said to me that the first time she came to the Southwest she was afraid she would fall off because she was so used to the protection of trees [. . .]. Our early geography shapes us in complex ways.

Geography, landscape, and the immigrant experience are only some of the many things you will find to explore in Mora's poems, including those gathered in this album and in other chapters. What might her poems individually and collectively suggest about what both is and isn't unique about the Mexican American experience? about the positive and negative aspects of living "in the land of the middle"? about what unites and divides Mexican Americans of different classes, generations, and genders? about family? about the power and the limits of language? In what ways might Mora's poems perform the curandera-like work she ascribes to the poet in Nepantla?

Elena

My Spanish isn't enough.
 I remember how I'd smile
 listening to my little ones, understanding every word they'd say,
 5 their jokes, their songs, their plots.
 *Vamos a pedirle dulces a mamá. Vamos.*¹
 But that was in Mexico.
 Now my children go to American high schools.
 They speak English. At night they sit around 10 the kitchen table, laugh with one another.
 I stand by the stove and feel dumb, alone.
 I bought a book to learn English.
 My husband frowned, drank more beer.
 My oldest said, "Mamá, he doesn't want you 15 to be smarter than he is." I'm forty, embarrassed at mispronouncing words,
 embarrassed at the laughter of my children, the grocer, the mailman. Sometimes I take my English book and lock myself in the bathroom, 20 say the thick words softly, for if I stop trying, I will be deaf
 when my children need my help.

1985

- What does the speaker mean by the first line—"My Spanish isn't enough"? What other words in the poem address the inadequacy of language?

1. Let's go ask mama for sweets. Let's go (Spanish).

Gentle Communion

Even the long-dead are willing to move.
 Without a word, she came with me from the desert.
 Mornings she wanders through my rooms making beds, folding socks.

5 Since she can't hear me anymore,
 Mamande² ignores the questions I never knew to ask, about her younger days, her red hair, the time she fell and broke her nose in the snow. I will never know.

10 When I try to make her laugh, to disprove her sad album face, she leaves the room, resists me as she resisted grinning for cameras, make-up, English.

While I write, she sits and prays,
 15 feet apart, legs never crossed,
 the blue housecoat buttoned high as her hair dries white, girlish around her head and shoulders.

She closes her eyes, bows her head,
 20 and like a child presses her hands together, her patient flesh steeple, the skin worn, like the pages of her prayer book.

Sometimes I sit in her wide-armed chair as I once sat in her lap.

25 Alone, we played a quiet I Spy.
 She peeled grapes I still taste.

She removes the thin skin, places
 the luminous coolness on my tongue.
 I know not to bite or chew. I wait 30 for the thick melt,
 our private green honey.

1991

- How does this poem draw on the various meanings of the word communion? Why might it be significant that the grandmother comes “Without a word” (line 2)?

Mothers and Daughters

- How does the poem's form, especially its visual appearance and rhythm, contribute to its characterization of the mother-daughter relationship?

La Migra

I

Let's play *La Migra*³
 I'll be the Border Patrol.
 You be the Mexican maid.
 I get the badge and sunglasses.

5 You can hide and run,
 but you can't get away
 because I have a jeep
 I can take you wherever
 I want, but don't ask
 10 questions because
 I don't speak Spanish.
 I can touch you wherever
 I want but don't complain too much because I've got 15 boots and kick—if I have to,
 and I have handcuffs.

3. Mexican slang for U.S. border patrol agents (an abbreviation of the word immigration).

Oh, and a gun.
Get ready, get set, run.

Let's play La Migra
20 You be the Border Patrol.
I'll be the Mexican woman.
Your jeep has a flat,
and you have been spotted
by the sun.
25 All you have is heavy: hat, glasses, badge, shoes, gun.
I know this desert,
where to rest,
where to drink.
30 Oh, I am not alone.
You hear us singing
and laughing with the wind,
Agua dulce brota aquí,
*aquí, aquí,*⁴ but since you 35 can't speak Spanish,
you do not understand.
Get ready.

- 2001 Mora publishes My Own True Name: New and Selected Poems for Young Adults.
- 2007 Mora publishes Adobe Odes.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Food, cooking, and related imagery figure in many of Mora's poems. Write an essay exploring the significance of such references. What might the poems suggest about the roles food, cooking, and eating play in our lives?
2. Drawing on at least three of Mora's poems, write an essay that explores her vision of the role of language. When, how, and why does language both unite and divide people? When, why, and how might nonverbal forms of communication prove superior?
3. As the introduction to this album suggests, Pat Mora takes pride in being a Latina writer and identifies one of her goals as chronicling the experience and feelings of contemporary Latinos and Latinas. Write an essay in which you compare at least two of Mora's poems, exploring what they together imply about what it is like to be Latino/a and how that experience differs across generations, classes, and/or genders.
4. The poems reprinted here were originally included in various collections, each of which has a distinct focus and flavor. GENTLE COMMUNION, for example, appears in Mora's third volume, Communion (1991), which some critics see as the culmination of the earliest phase of her career and as the reflection of both a widening of the world depicted in her work (through poems inspired by her travels to other countries) and a greater concentration on the situation of women, and the relationships among women and between women and men. Pick the Mora poem you like most, identify the collection in which it originally appeared, and read some other poems included in that collection. Then write an essay that either compares your chosen poem to others in the collection or that explains how your interpretation of the original poem changes when you read it in conjunction with the other poems.

Introduction

Piping down the valleys wild
Piping songs of pleasant glee
On a cloud I saw a child.
And he laughing said to me

Pipe a song about a Lamb,
Sol piped with merry cheer.
Piper pipe that song again,
Sol piped, he wept to hear.

Drop thy pipe thy happy pipe,
Sing thy songs of happy cheer.
Sol sang the same again,
While he wept with joy to hear.

Piper sit thee down and write
In a book that all may read
So he vanished from my sight,
And I plucked a hollow reed.

And I made a rural pen,
And I stained the water clear,
And I wrote my happy songs,
Every child may joy to hear.

The Echoing Green

The Sun does arise,
 And make happy the skies,
 The merry bells ring,
 To welcome the Spring,
 The sky-lark and thrush,
 The birds of the bush,
 Sing louder around,
 To the bells' cheerful sound,
 While our sports shall be seen,
 On the Echoing Green.

Old John with white hair
 Does laugh away care,
 Sitting under the oak,
 Among the old folk.

They

They laugh at our play,
And soon they all say,
Such such were the joys,
When we all girls & boys,
In our youth time were seen,
On the Echoing Green.

Till the little ones weary
No more can be merry
The sun does descend,
And our sports have an end:
Round the laps of their mothers,
Many sisters and brothers,
Like birds in their nest,
Are ready for rest:
And sport no more seen,
On the darkening Green.

HOLY THURSDAY

'Twas on a Holy Thursday their innocent faces clean
The children walking two a two in red & blue & green
Grey headed headles walk'd before with wands as white as snow
Till into the high dome of Pauls they like Innocent's waters flow
O what a multitude they see in these flow'rs of London town
Seated in companies they sit with ruddiness all their own
The hum of multitudes was there but multitudes of lambs,
Thousands of little boys & girls raising their innocent hands
Now like a mighty wind they rise to heaven the voice of song
Or like harmonious thunderings the seats of heaven among Beneath them sat the aged men wise guardians of the poor
Then cherish pity lest you drive an angel from your door

The Lamb

Little Lamb who made thee
Dost thou know who made thee
Gave thee life & bid thee feed;
By the stream & o'er the mead;
Gave thee clothing of delight,
Softest clothing woolly bright;
Gave thee such a tender voice,
Making all the vales rejoice;
Little Lamb who made thee
Dost thou know who made thee

Little Lamb I'll tell thee,
Little Lamb I'll tell thee;
He is called by thy name,
For he calle himself a Lamb;
He is meek & he is mild,
He became a little child:
I child & thou a lamb,
We are called by his name:
Little Lamb God bless thee,
Little Lamb God bless thee

The Chimney Sweeper

When my mother died I was very young,
And my father sold me while yet my tongue
Could scarcely cry weep weep weep weep,
So your chimneys I sweep & in soot I sleep.
Theres little Tom Dact who cried when his head
That cur'd like a lambs back, was shav'd, so I said,
Hush Tom never mind it, for when your heads bare,
You know that the soot cannot spoil your white hair.
And so he was quiet, & that very night,
As Tom was a sleeping he had such a sight,
That thousands of sweepers Dick, Joe, Ned & Jack,
Were all of them lock'd up in coffins of black,
And by came an Angel who had a bright key,
And he open'd the coffins & set them all free,
Then down a green plain leaping laughing they
And wash in a river and shine in the Sun.
Then naked & white, all their bags left behind,
They rise upon clouds, and sport in the wind,
And the Angel told Tom, if he'd be a good boy,
He'd have God for his father & never want joy.
And so Tom awake and we rose in the dark
And get with our bags & our brushes to work,
Tho' the morning was cold, Tom was happy & warm,
So if all do their duty, they need not fear harm.

Introduction.

Hear the voice of the Bard!
Who Present, Past, & Future sees
Whose ears have heard,
The Holy Word,
That walk'd among the ancient trees.

Calling the lapsed Soul,
And weeping in the evening dew;
That might controll
The starry pole;
And fallen fallen light renew!

O Earth O Earth return!
Arise from out the dewy grass:
Night is worn,
And the morn
Rises from the slumberous mass.

Turn away no more:
Why wilt thou turn away
The starry floor
The watry shore
Is gain thee till the break of day.

The Tyger.

Tyger Tyger, burning bright,
In the forests of the night;
What immortal hand or eye,
Could frame thy fearful symmetry?

In what distant deeps or skies,
Burnt the fire of thine eyes?
On what wings dare he aspire?
What the hand, dare seize the fire?

And what shoulder, & what art,
Could twist the sinews of thy heart?
And when thy heart began to beat,
What dread hand? & what dread feet?

What the hammer? what the chain,
In what furnace was thy brain?
What the anvil? what dread grasp,
Dare its deadly wrongs clasp?

When the stars threw down their spears
And water'd heaven with their tears;
Did he smile his work to see?
Did he who made the Lamb make thee?

Tyger Tyger burning bright,
In the forests of the night;
What immortal hand or eye,
Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?

THE GARDEN OF LOVE

I went to the Garden of Love,
And saw what I never had seen;
A Chapel was built in the midst,
Where I used to play on the green.
And the gates of this Chapel were shut,
And Thou shalt not, writ over the door;
So I turn'd to the Garden of Love,
That so many sweet flowers bore.
And I saw it was filled with graves,
And tomb-stones where flowers should be;
And Priests in black gowns, were walking their rounds,
And binding with briars, my joys & desires.

THE Chimney Sweeper

A little black thing among the snow;
Crying weep, weep, in notes of woe!
Where are thy father & mother, say?
They are both gone up to the church to pray.

Because I was happy upon the heath,
And smil'd among the winters snow;
They clothed me in the clothes of death,
And taught me to sing the notes of woe.

And because I am happy, & dance & sing,
They think they have done me no injury;
And are gone to praise God & his Priest & King,
Who make up a heaven of our misery.

HOLY THURSDAY

Is this a holy thing to see,
In a rich and fruitful land,
Babes reduced to misery,
Fed with cold and usurous hand?

Is that trembling cry a song?
Can it be a song of joy?
And so many children poor?
It is a land of poverty!

And their sun does never shine,
And their fields are bleak & bare,
And their ways are filled with thorns,
It is eternal winter there.

For where-e'er the sun does shine,
And where-e'er the rain does fall,
Babe can never hunger there,
Nor poverty the mind appall.

THE AUTHOR'S WORK AS CONTEXT:
WILLIAM BLAKE'S SONGS OF INNOCENCE AND OF EXPERIENCE

Throughout history and across the globe, poets have collected their poems into sequences or cycles. The type of poem we today call haiku, for instance, emerged out of a tradition in Japanese culture dating back to the middle ages, whereby a single poet would produce a poem of three lines to which other poets would add poems of two and three lines each to create a sequence of thirty-six, one hundred, or even a thousand or more linked poems. Over time, people began to lift out the three-line verse that began such a sequence and to treat it as a poem in its own right, often gathering a number of these to create an anthology of sorts. The popularity of such anthologies in turn inspired poets to begin writing stand-alone poems of this type, which eventually came to be known as haiku. Even Bashō (1644–94), the acknowledged master of the form, published most of his haiku as part of a sequence embedded within a lengthy prose memoir of his extensive travels.

In the Western literary tradition, one common type of poetic sequence is the sonnet sequence. Many of the most famous sonnets—from those of Francesco Petrarca and William Shakespeare to those of Elizabeth Barrett Browning and Edna St. Vincent Millay—are part of such sequences. These poems often lack titles; instead we conventionally either use the poems' first lines as titles ("My mistress's eyes are nothing like the sun") or number them according to their place in the sequence (Sonnet 130).

Each of the poems in a sequence is itself an independent literary work that can be, and often is, enjoyed and understood on its own. Yet each also functions as part of the larger literary work that is the sequence. We can thus enjoy and understand the poem in quite a different way when we read it in the context of other poems in the sequence and in light of the traditions of poetic sequences generally.

Today, most poems are too short to be published singly, even if they are not part of a sequence. They may first appear in magazines, newspapers, or online, and later in books, including both collections of poems by a single writer and anthologies (like the one you are reading) that include the work of various poets. The poems in one poet's collection may be less intimately related to each other than the poems in a sequence, but they usually were written around the same time and provide a window of sorts onto a particular phase of the author's life and career. Further, poems in a collection—even, in rare cases, a collection by multiple authors—often share other features, depicting comparable situations or speakers or having a similar external form, for example. Though not the same as sequences, such collections can also offer an illuminating context for a particular poem—slightly altering, perhaps expanding, our response and interpretation.

WILLIAM BLAKE'S SONGS OF INNOCENCE AND OF EXPERIENCE

The rest of this chapter focuses on William Blake's Songs of Innocence and of Experience, one of the English-language tradition's most extraordinary poetry collections. One unique aspect of this collection is the fact that its creator—a professional painter and illustrator—not only wrote all the poems but also illustrated and printed the book himself, using a method of his own invention. As a result, Blake should indeed be regarded as the creator rather than the mere author of a book that is simultaneously a visual and verbal experience—a collection of interlinked paintings and poems.

The fact that the book was etched, printed, painted, and then sewn together by hand, moreover, had at least two important effects. First, Blake produced few copies of Songs of Innocence and of Experience; to date, only twenty-four are known to exist. Second, each of those twenty-four copies differs slightly from all the others: The order of the poems varies somewhat, and so, too, does the coloring of individual pages and illustrations.

In all its versions, however, the book combines two distinct yet intimately related sequences of poems. Blake first produced the book Songs of Innocence in 1789. Five years later, in 1794, he added other poems and pages to that book in order to create a new one: Songs of Innocence and of Experience. As its title suggests, the book is divided into two sections—"Songs of Innocence" and "Songs of Experience," each with its own title page and introductory poem.

Together, the two sections and sequences portray the world from two different, even opposite, perspectives, or what the book's title page labels "Two Contrary States of the Human Soul." An individual poem in "Songs of Innocence" thus often has a direct companion or counterpart poem in "Songs of Experience." In some cases, those two poems, though dramatically different, have precisely the same title and depict the same character or situation: There are, for example, two poems called HOLY THURSDAY and two called THE CHIMNEY SWEEPER. In other cases, the connection between the two poems is less direct: The poem THE LAMB, in "Songs of Innocence," for example, is typically viewed as the companion to THE TYGER, in "Songs of Experience." And the same holds true for THE ECCHOING GREEN (in "Innocence") and THE GARDEN OF LOVE (in "Experience"). A few poems, however, do not have any obvious counterparts; the two most famous examples are LONDON and THE SICK ROSE, which originally appeared in "Songs of Experience."

In this chapter, we include ten poems from Songs of Innocence and of Experience, along with color reproductions of some of the volume's actual pages to give you a sense of how it looks. (To see all of Blake's work, including various versions of the poems in this album, visit the impressive Blake Archive at www.blakearchive.org/blake/.) To provide more insight into Blake's life and world, a chronology follows the poems.

SONGS OF INNOCENCE

Introduction

Piping down the valleys wild
 Piping songs of pleasant glee
 On a cloud I saw a child.
 And he laughing said to me

- 5 Pipe a song about a Lamb;
 So I piped with merry chear,
 Piper pipe that song again—
 So I piped, he wept to hear.

- Drop thy pipe thy happy pipe
 10 Sing thy songs of happy chear,
 So I sung the same again
 While he wept with joy to hear

- Piper sit thee down and write
 In a book that all may read—
 15 So he vanish'd from my sight.
 And I pluck'd a hollow reed.

- And I made a rural pen,
 And I stain'd the water clear,
 And I wrote my happy songs
 20 Every child may joy to hear.

The Ecchoing Green

- The Sun does arise,
 And make happy the skies.
 The merry bells ring,
 To welcome the Spring.
 5 The sky-lark and thrush,
 The birds of the bush,
 Sing louder around,
 To the bells chearful sound.
 While our sports shall be seen
 10 On the Ecchoing Green.

- Old John with white hair
 Does laugh away care,
 Sitting under the oak,
 Among the old folk.
 15 They laugh at our play,
 And soon they all say,
 Such such were the joys.
 When we all girls & boys,

 Gave thee such a tender voice,
 Making all the vales rejoice?
 Little Lamb, who made thee?
 10 Dost thou know who made thee?

1. In the English Church, the Thursday celebrating Christ's ascension, thirty-nine days after Easter. It was customary on this day to march the poor, frequently orphaned, children from the charity schools of London to a service at St. Paul's Cathedral.

2. See Hebrews 13.2: "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares."

Little Lamb, I'll tell thee!
 Little Lamb, I'll tell thee:
 He is calléd by thy name,
 For he calls himself a Lamb,
 15 He is meek and he is mild;
 He became a little child.
 I a child and thou a lamb,
 We are calléd by his name.
 Little Lamb, God bless thee!
 20 Little Lamb, God bless thee!

The Chimney Sweeper

When my mother died I was very young,
 And my father sold me while yet my tongue,
 Could scarcely cry weep weep weep weep.
 So your chimneys I sweep & in soot I sleep.
 5 There's little Tom Dacre, who cried when his head
 That curl'd like a lambs back, was shav'd, so I said.
 Hush Tom never mind it, for when your head's bare,
 You know that the soot cannot spoil your white hair.
 And so he was quiet, & that very night,

Chronology: William Blake and His Times

1757 William Blake is born in London on November 28, one of the seven children of Catherine and James Blake (a maker and seller of stockings and gloves); only five of the children will survive infancy.

1765–67 Blake has his first angelic visions and, at age ten (1767), enters drawing school.

1772 At age fourteen, Blake is apprenticed to a master engraver.

1776 The American Revolution, or War of Independence, begins.

1779 His apprenticeship complete, the twenty-one-year-old Blake begins his studies at the Royal Academy of Art.

1780 Blake begins to read and sing his own poems to friends and to earn his living by giving drawing lessons and by engraving prints and book illustrations for other authors and artists. (One such work is Anna Letitia Barbauld's Hymns in Prose for Children [1781].) While sketching near a river, Blake and two fellow artists are detained by British soldiers, who suspect them of being French spies; the prisoners are released only after other Royal Academy members testify on their behalf.

1782 Blake (at twenty-four) marries Catherine Boucher, an illiterate former domestic servant and one of the thirteen children of a market gardener. (Blake will teach his wife not only to read and write but also to engrave and print books, and she will eventually help with the engraving, printing, coloring, and assembly of all his self-published works.)

1783 A friend finances the publication of Poetical Sketches, the only book by Blake to be published in the conventional manner by another publisher. The American War of Independence ends in a British defeat.

1784 After the death of Blake's father, Blake's younger brother comes to live and study engraving with Blake and his wife; Blake uses his small inheritance to open a small print-selling and publishing business with a friend and

- writes (but does not publish) An Island in the Moon, a work of prose satire containing drafts of three poems later included in Songs of Innocence.
- 1785 When Blake's business folds, he returns to his work as an engraver for other publishers.
- 1787 After his brother's death, Blake begins to see him in visions, including one that reveals a new method of "illuminated printing" or relief etching.
- 1788 Blake produces All Religions Are One and There Is No Natural Religion, the first works made using his "illuminated printing" technique; Blake will use the same method to self-publish all of his subsequent work.
- 1789 Blake etches Songs of Innocence and The Book of Thel. The French Revolution begins in July with the storming of the Bastille, a Parisian prison.
- 1790–91 Blake etches The Marriage of Heaven and Hell and The French Revolution.
- 1792 Blake's friend and fellow radical Thomas Paine is sentenced to death in absentia for publishing his two-part political treatise Rights of Man, though the sentence is never carried out.
- 1793 In France, Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette are executed as part of the "Reign of Terror." Britain and France go to war. Blake etches America.
- 1794 Several London radicals well known to Blake are tried for high treason, a capital crime, but they are ultimately acquitted. Blake produces Songs of Innocence and of Experience, Visions of the Daughters of Albion, and The Book of Urizen.
- 1795–96 Blake produces The Book of Los and begins The Four Zoas.
- 1800 Blake and his wife move from London to the Sussex seaside to be near his new patron, William Hayley, whom Blake will later describe as "the enemy of my Spiritual Life while he pretends to be the Friend of my Corporeal."
- 1802–1804 A scuffle with a soldier leads to Blake's trial and acquittal on charges of sedition, a capital crime. Blake and Catherine move back to London.
- 1809–10 Blake self-publishes Milton.
- 1815 British forces defeat Napoleon at Waterloo.
- 1818–20 Blake self-publishes Jerusalem.
- 1820–25 Blake produces (on commission) watercolor illustrations for the Book of Job.
- 1825 Blake begins work on another commission, illustrations for Dante's Divine Comedy.
- 1827 Blake dies on August 12 at the age of sixty-nine.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Write an essay analyzing Blake's two HOLY THURSDAY poems or any other pair of counterpart poems from Songs of Innocence and of Experience. What different views of the same person, place, situation, and so on are offered in your two poems? What conclusions does each poem seem to reach about, and through, the subject it depicts? How do the poems' formal qualities—syntax, diction, rhythm, rhyme, and so on—contribute to their distinctive tone and theme(s)?

2. Drawing on evidence from various poems in the “Songs of Experience” section of Songs of Innocence and of Experience, write an essay explaining how LONDON or THE SICK ROSE works as a “Song of Experience” poem. What similarities do you see between LONDON or THE SICK ROSE and other “Experience” poems? What does either of these poems add to the “Experience” sequence?
3. Write an essay exploring a particular symbol or set of symbols, characters, or formal techniques that you see as important to the effect and meaning of Blake's Songs as a sequence.
4. Choose any poem in this anthology and use library or Internet resources to research the collection or sequence of which it is a part. Write a response paper or essay reflecting on how your interpretation of the poem changes when you read it as part of a particular collection or sequence rather than on its own.
5. Write an essay analyzing at least two poems in this book that are part of the same sequence or collection. You might choose two sonnets by Edna St. Vincent Millay or William Shakespeare; two of the poems from Robert Browning's Dramatic Lyrics (1842): MY LAST DUCHESS and SOLILOQUY OF THE SPANISH CLOISTER; or two poems from the sequence of odes by John Keats that includes ODE TO A NIGHTINGALE, ODE ON A GRECIAN URN, and TO AUTUMN. How do your two poems make sense together, as parts of a single, unified sequence or collection? If you know how the poems are ordered in the collection, what difference might their order make to their meaning?
6. Write two poems that, like Blake's HOLY THURSDAY or CHIMNEY SWEEPER poems, depict the same object, person, or situation from two dramatically different perspectives.

CULTURAL AND HISTORICAL CONTEXTS:
THE HARLEM RENAISSANCE

Poetry may be read in private moments or experienced in a great variety of communal settings—in classrooms or theaters, for example, or at poetry slams or public readings. But it is almost always written in solitude by a single author. Collaborative composition is rare in poetry, even rarer than in other arts. Still, there is a sense in which many poems represent collaborative acts. Traditions, group identities, shared experiences, desires, and communal needs may come together in a particular moment and location to produce poetry that has a distinctive stamp of time, place, and vision. One such phenomenon was the Harlem Renaissance, a period of ten or fifteen years early in the twentieth century when an extraordinarily talented group of people came together in uptown Manhattan to celebrate and embody the awakening of a new African American consciousness. It was an unprecedented moment in American poetry and in American culture more generally, and it produced some of the twentieth century's most compelling and original poems, as well as significant works of art in a variety of other categories.

The Harlem Renaissance was not exactly a movement in the sense of having a formal structure; no one originated it or called it to order, and in fact it was not consciously planned or organized by any person or group. There was no founder, no architect, no leader, and it is hard to say why or how—or even exactly when—it began or ended. It happened, as the needs and desires of African American intellectuals and artists became manifest and began to coalesce in a particular time and place, and it ended—or rather scattered its energy—when conditions in the world at large dictated that other priorities, especially economic ones, began to trump those that had brought it together. But it was not, of course, independent of history or without cause. It was a product of many circumstances, most of them involving the long-term aftereffects of slavery and the increasingly articulated desire of African Americans to produce a distinctive black American culture within the larger national culture. The Harlem Renaissance represented powerful assertions: that America had to include the voices of black Americans in order to find its own full definition and, equally, that artistic creativity—including literary creativity—was essential to black Americans' realization and assertion of their full humanity. To live in Harlem and to be black and creative was not an altogether happy experience, and the poetry that exploded out of that time and place is a poetry of anger, resentment, conflict, and torn loyalties. It is also a poetry of energy, sensitivity, humanity, and high ideals.

What was the Harlem Renaissance? It was first of all a migration or, rather, part of a migration: Around the end of World War I, American blacks relocated in large numbers from the South to the North and from rural areas to cities. New York was only one of many destinations; Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit, Washington, Cleveland, Buffalo, and other urban centers all received huge numbers of black migrants. But New York was the largest and most vibrant seat of culture in America, beginning to rival European capitals as a site where active artistic communities produced and consumed culture of all kinds—high, low, and in between. More than 100,000 blacks migrated to Harlem during the 1920s, taking over and transforming a Manhattan neighborhood north of Central Park and turning it into a distinctive, creative, independent center of art and performance activities that drew the rest of New York City to it. For most of the 1920s—called “the Roaring 20s” throughout the Western world because of the era’s daring, rebellious attitudes and booming economic growth—Harlem was a magnet for avant-garde whites in New York. They flocked to speakeasies, nightclubs, and theaters (see map, pp. 1032–33). They were fascinated by the kinds of music, dance, and performance art they could find there—productions quite different from those on Broadway or in other parts of the city, though increasingly white venues tried to capture, in their own productions, something of the life and energy that patrons sought in Harlem. White readers, and many white artists, showed enormous—sometimes mawkish or even ghoulish—curiosity about black life in America. Before the Harlem Renaissance had ended, a large number of Broadway productions—Marc Connelly’s Green Pastures (1930), Eugene O’Neill’s The Emperor Jones (1920) and All God’s Chillun Got Wings (1924), for example—and many novels tried to represent the black experience for white audiences. Black artists and writers (and their readers) were not always happy with the way white writers portrayed black experience and black concerns or “adapted” work originally created by African Americans, but the widespread curiosity—some of it piqued by the flourishing of the Harlem group and some by “intruders” from the white establishment—provided a wider audience for black literature and arts than had existed in earlier generations.

The height of the Harlem Renaissance was the 1920s, though it is hard to pin down just when the period began and ended. Some historians, pointing to the political ferment caused by U.S. entry into World War I in 1917, date the beginnings in the mid to late teens, and some regard it as lasting until the outbreak of World War II in the late 1930s. But the decade of the 1920s saw most of the productivity and creative energy that we associate with the flourishing of Harlem. And it was in the early 1920s when most of the leading writers in the group actually moved to New York. Many historians regard the stock-market crash of 1929 and the depression that followed as signs of the end. Certainly the mood of the whole nation changed rapidly then, and by the early 1930s most of the leading figures of the Renaissance had moved away from New York, forming smaller communities elsewhere or becoming individually isolated. The Harlem neighborhood itself began a slow economic decline.

Prominent African Americans (including W. E. B. Du Bois, third from the right in the second row) parade down New York’s Fifth Avenue on July 28, 1917, to protest a race riot in East St. Louis, Illinois. Thirty-nine African Americans were killed and hundreds were seriously injured in that melee, one of the deadliest outbreaks of racial violence in America.

The cover of Volume I, Number 1 of Fire!!, a journal “Devoted to Younger Negro Artists,” established by the self-designated “niggerati,” the younger generation of African American intellectuals and writers—including Wallace Thurman, Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, and others—who wanted to (in Hughes’s words) “burn up a lot of the old, dead, conventional Negro-white ideas of the past.”

Between the wars, though, Harlem’s productivity and impact were dramatic. Before 1917, there had been few publishing outlets hospitable to young black writers; only Paul Lawrence Dunbar among African American poets was widely read or known, and he had died in 1906. But rising political and social concerns during and immediately after World War I produced several new periodicals: The Messenger, founded in 1917 by A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen, claimed to be “The only Radical Negro Magazine in America,” and in 1923 the Urban League started its own magazine, Opportunity. Both of these new journals saw themselves as activist alternatives to the NAACP’s official journal, Crisis, edited by W. E. B. Du Bois. Other magazines came and went. Fire!! managed only a single issue, but brought verbal and visual art spectacularly together. Meanwhile—and perhaps just as important in a different way—mainstream magazines (Vanity Fair, for example) and publishers (Knopf, Macmillan, Harper, and Harcourt Brace) began to feature younger black writers who soon developed a growing readership.

Portrait of Alain Locke, by Betsy G. Reyneau

Some historians date the Harlem Renaissance from the composition of Claude McKay's fiery sonnet IF WE MUST DIE (below), written in the summer of 1919. McKay later denied that the poem referred specifically to blacks and whites, but the many anti-black riots that broke out in several American cities that summer—sometimes called “the Red Summer”—certainly inspired and shaped the poem. Another milestone was the publication in 1922 of James Weldon Johnson's Book of American Negro Poetry, which, in the words of the editors of the Norton Anthology of African American Literature, “emphasized the youthful promise of the new writers and established some of the terms of the emerging movement.” But it was Alain Locke's landmark anthology, The New Negro, that, in 1925, effectively announced the significance of the Harlem Renaissance. Locke, a sociology professor at Howard University and an Oxford graduate as the first African American Rhodes Scholar, gathered all kinds of material—poems, fiction, essays, visual art—by authors old and young, black and white—into a working definition of what the “new Negro” was all about.

The major figures of the Harlem Renaissance were, however, highly individual. And though they shared many ideals and aspirations, they never confined themselves to a creed or hardened into a “school.” Langston Hughes, with a wonderful lyric voice and an eye for telling details, pursued the relationship of poetry to black music and experimented with a variety of forms and rhythms. Countee Cullen, on the other hand, was deeply committed to conventional poetic forms and felt most at home poetically when he was working in traditional fixed forms. Claude McKay, born in Jamaica, lived briefly in New York but mostly in Greenwich Village rather than Harlem, and spent much of his career abroad (in Russia, France, and North Africa). He always followed his own star in poetry, too; his poetry was sometimes violent and incendiary, but equally strong was his sense of nostalgia and natural spiritualism. Despite setting a militant tone in a founding poem of the Harlem Renaissance, “If We Must Die,” he wrote only two poems that were directly about Harlem experiences and themes. Likewise, novelists like Zora Neale Hurston, Jean Toomer, Jesse Fauset, and Nella Larsen pursued individual styles and themes in their fiction. What held the group together was a dedication to producing first-rate writing, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, a commitment to raising the aspirations of American blacks of all backgrounds and abilities.

The question of who was to benefit from the ambitious art of the Harlem Renaissance was hotly debated. Was it ordinary people, who could stretch the horizons of their reading and their own ambitions? African Americans generally? Or was it primarily intellectuals and artists who might raise expectations for black thought and art? W. E. B. Du Bois, who was a lightning rod for many members of the militant and radical new generation, had famously championed the “talented tenth,” a select group whose natural gifts authoritatively raised them above others, and opinions split over whether the beneficiaries of the Harlem Renaissance were to be ordinary readers and viewers or the creative geniuses themselves, in the service of a higher aesthetic quite distinct from social progress. It’s fair to say that writers remained divided, alternately championing the triumph of art and hoping for a larger cultural impact that would benefit readers (especially black readers) more generally.

The Dark Tower, a forum for African American intellectuals, met frequently in the home of A'Lelia Walker, a prominent Harlem heiress and socialite. Countee Cullen’s poem FROM THE DARK TOWER (later in this chapter) is painted on the wall.

The role of whites in the Harlem Renaissance is also a matter of some dispute. The most controversial, though undeniably influential figure was Carl Van Vechten, whose parties legendarily brought young black writers into the company of famous and powerful white celebrities, many of whom could be helpful to black writers' careers. Van Vechten was a gifted photographer whose portraits of many rising figures chronicle the Harlem years brilliantly (as some of the photographs in this chapter demonstrate), and he undeniably fostered many useful connections that resulted in publication and fame. But some felt his motives were self-serving, and his well-meaning novel about everyday Harlem life, Nigger Heaven (1926), was widely disparaged, though critics equally suspected "realistic" accounts of everyday life by black writers. (See, for example, the Du Bois review of a

Carl Van Vechten, 1926

Claude McKay novel later in this chapter.) There is no doubt that figures like Van Vechten fostered interaction between prominent whites and rising figures in the black artistic community, but not everyone regarded the results as helpful to the black cause overall. Some historians view white participation in the Harlem Renaissance as exploitative, others as sincere but bumbling; still others view such black-white collaboration as an early demonstration of racial unity.

Another set of questions involves elitism—whether the renaissance had truly salutary effects on the larger black community. Du Bois insisted on the obligation of “the talented tenth” to use their artistic and intellectual gifts to improve the lot of others. Critics of Du Bois find his position divisive and patronizing toward the majority of the black community; defenders see the idea as a strategy for achieving community improvement by cultivating potential leaders. At the heart of this controversy is disagreement about how leadership works to promote both improved social conditions and audience engagement. (Similar arguments rage today over the stardom of African American athletes and entertainers.)

Two related controversies concern the influence of the church on black culture and the relationship of the ambitious new “high art” of poetry, novels, and painting to popular-culture phenomena such as jazz, blues, and dance. There is little doubt that religion was a powerful force in the black community, but observers continue to debate, as the artists themselves then did, whether it fostered and furthered artistic expression or served as a restraining and discouraging force. Often readers can see in poetry about even the most secular subjects traces of religious ideas and traditions; you will have to decide for yourself whether the effects are positive or not. The relationship of radical art to popular culture was even more vexed. Some central figures in the Harlem Renaissance regarded their own aims as “above” the “attractions” and “spectacles” that drew large numbers of whites to Harlem, and they regarded the performance arts as, at best, distractions from or dilutions of the main flow of radical artistic expression. And while nearly everyone agrees that the quality of various theatrical arts in the many venues of Harlem was very high, the question of whether, beyond jazz and blues, the influence of popular arts on poetry was good or bad remains open.

Known as the “Empress of the Blues,” Bessie Smith was one of the most popular entertainers in America during the 1920s.

No easy summary of the Harlem Renaissance will do. Its ambitions—often radical, sometimes revolutionary—made enormous waves in both the black urban community and the world of art. However one measures the Harlem Renaissance in terms of its impact on later writers, black and white, the poems themselves continue to speak to readers across divides of time and culture. You will find that some of the poems can hardly be understood without knowledge of the specific circumstances and conditions that produced them; you will also find that many of the poems reach insistently for connections both to the past and to the enduring concerns of poets and readers in far-flung times and places.

ARNA BONTEMPS

A Black Man Talks of Reaping

I have sown beside all waters in my day.
I planted deep, within my heart the fear
That wind or fowl would take the grain away.
I planted safe against this stark, lean year.

- 5 I scattered seed enough to plant the land
In rows from Canada to Mexico
But for my reaping only what the hand
Can hold at once is all that I can show.

Yet what I sowed and what the orchard yields
 10 My brother's sons are gathering stalk and root,
 Small wonder then my children glean in fields
 They have not sown, and feed on bitter fruit.

 Yet Do I Marvel

I doubt not God is good, well-meaning, kind,
 And did He stoop to quibble could tell why
 The little buried mole continues blind,
 Why flesh that mirrors Him must some day die,
 5 Make plain the reason tortured Tantalus¹
 Is baited by the fickle fruit, declare
 If merely brute caprice dooms Sisyphus²
 To struggle up a never-ending stair.
 Inscrutable His ways are, and immune
 10 To catechism by a mind too strewn
 With petty cares to slightly understand
 What awful brain compels His awful hand.
 Yet do I marvel at this curious thing:
 To make a poet black, and bid him sing!

Some are teathed on a silver spoon,
 With the stars strung for a rattle;
 I cut my teeth as the black raccoon—
 For implements of battle.

 And heralded by a star;⁴
 They swathed my limbs in a sackcloth gown
 On a night that was black as tar.
 For some, godfather and goddame

 Dame Poverty gave me my name,
 And Pain godfathered me.
 For I was born on Saturday—

- We shall not always plant while others reap
 The golden increment of bursting fruit,
 Not always countenance, abject and mute,
 That lesser men should hold their brothers cheap;

 Shall we beguile their limbs with mellow flute,
 Not always bend to some more subtle brute;
 We were not made eternally to weep.

 And there are buds that cannot bloom at all
 In light, but crumple, piteous, and fall;
 So in the dark we hide the heart that bleeds,
 And wait, and tend our agonizing seeds.

The Weary Blues

Droning a drowsy syncopated tune,
 Rocking back and forth to a

6. In darkness (Latin). 7. Major Harlem thoroughfare, now Malcolm X Boulevard.

He did a lazy sway. . . .
 He did a lazy sway. . . .
 To the tune o' those Weary Blues.
 With his ebony hands on each ivory key
 10 He made that poor piano moan with melody.
 O Blues!
 Swaying to and fro on his rickety stool
 He played that sad raggy tune like a musical fool.
 Sweet Blues!
 15 Coming from a black man's soul.
 O Blues!
 In a deep song voice with a melancholy tone
 I heard that Negro sing, that old piano moan—
 "Ain't got nobody in all this world,
 20 Ain't got nobody but ma self.
 I's gwine to quit ma frownin'
 And put ma troubles on the shelf."
 Thump, thump, thump, went his foot on the floor.
 He played a few chords then he sang some more—
 25 "I got the Weary Blues
 And I can't be satisfied.
 Got the Weary Blues
 And can't be satisfied—
 I ain't happy no mo'
 30 And I wish that I had died."
 And far into the night he crooned that tune.
 The stars went out and so did the moon.
 The singer stopped playing and went to bed
 While the Weary Blues echoed through his head.
 35 He slept like a rock or a man that's dead.

The Negro Speaks of Rivers

I've known rivers:
 I've known rivers ancient as the world and older than the flow of human blood in human veins.
 My soul has grown deep like the rivers.
 I bathed in the Euphrates when dawns were young.
 5 I built my hut near the Congo and it lulled me to sleep.
 I looked upon the Nile and raised the pyramids above it.
 I heard the singing of the Mississippi when Abe Lincoln went down to New Orleans, and I've seen its muddy bosom turn all golden in the sunset.
 I've known rivers:
 Ancient, dusky rivers.
 10 My soul has grown deep like the rivers.

I, Too

I, too, sing America.

I am the darker brother.
 They send me to eat in the kitchen
 When company comes,
 5 But I laugh,
 And eat well,
 And grow strong.

Tomorrow,
 I'll sit at the table.
 10 When company comes
 Nobody'll dare
 Say to me,
 "Eat in the kitchen,"
 Then.

15 Besides,
 They'll see how beautiful I am
 And be ashamed—
 I, too, am America.

Sonnet to a Negro in Harlem

- You are disdainful and magnificent—
 Your perfect body and your pompous gait,
 Your dark eyes flashing solemnly with hate,
 Small wonder that you are incompetent
 5 To imitate those whom you so despise—
 Your shoulders towering high above the throng,
 Your head thrown back in rich, barbaric song,
 Palm trees and mangoes stretched before your eyes.
 Let others toil and sweat for labor's sake
 10 And wring from grasping hands their meed^s of gold.
 Why urge ahead your supercilious feet?
 Scorn will efface each footprint that you make.
 I love your laughter arrogant and bold.
 You are too splendid for this city street.

Harlem Shadows

- I hear the halting footsteps of a lass
 In Negro Harlem when the night lets fall
 Its veil. I see the shapes of girls who pass
 To bend and barter at desire's call.
 5 Ah, little dark girls who in slippered feet
 Go prowling through the night from street to street!
 Through the long night until the silver break
 Of day the little gray feet know no rest;
 Through the lone night until the last snow-flake
 10 Has dropped from heaven upon the earth's white breast,
 The dusky, half-clad girls of tired feet
 Are trudging, thinly shod, from street to street.
 Ah, stern harsh world, that in the wretched way
 Of poverty, dishonor and disgrace,
 15 Has pushed the timid little feet of clay,
 The sacred brown feet of my fallen race!
 Ah, heart of me, the weary, weary feet
 In Harlem wandering from street to street.

If We Must Die

- If we must die, let it not be like hogs
 Hunted and penned in an inglorious spot,
 While round us bark the mad and hungry dogs,
 Making their mock at our accursed lot.
- 5 If we must die, O let us nobly die,
 So that our precious blood may not be shed
 In vain; then even the monsters we defy
 Shall be constrained to honor us though dead!
 O kinsmen! we must meet the common foe!
- 10 Though far outnumbered let us show us brave,
 And for their thousand blows deal one deathblow!
 What though before us lies the open grave?
 Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack,
 Pressed to the wall, dying, but fighting back!

1919

The Tropics in New York

- Bananas ripe and green, and ginger-root,
 Cocoa in pods and alligator pears,
 And tangerines and mangoes and grape fruit,
 Fit for the highest prize at parish fairs,
- 5 Set in the window, bringing memories
 Of fruit-trees laden by low-singing rills,
 And dewy dawns, and mystical blue skies
 In benediction over nun-like hills.
- My eyes grew dim, and I could no more gaze;
 10 A wave of longing through my body swept,
 And, hungry for the old, familiar ways,
 I turned aside and bowed my head and wept.

The Harlem Dancer

- Applauding youths laughed with young prostitutes
 And watched her perfect, half-clothed body sway;
 Her voice was like the sound of blended flutes
 Blown by black players upon a picnic day.
- 5 She sang and danced on gracefully and calm,
 The light gauze hanging loose about her form;
 To me she seemed a proudly-swaying palm
 Grown lovelier for passing through a storm.
 Upon her swarthy neck black shiny curls
- 10 Luxuriant fell; and tossing coins in praise,
 The wine-flushed, bold-eyed boys, and even the girls,
 Devoured her shape with eager, passionate gaze;

But looking at her falsely-smiling face,
 I knew her self was not in that strange place.

The White House

Your door is shut against my tightened face,
 And I am sharp as steel with discontent;
 But I possess the courage and the grace
 To bear my anger proudly and unbent.
 5 The pavement slabs burn loose beneath my feet,
 And passion rends my vitals as I pass,
 A chafing savage, down the decent street,
 Where boldly shines your shuttered door of glass.
 Oh, I must search for wisdom every hour,
 10 Deep in my wrathful bosom sore and raw,
 And find in it the superhuman power
 To hold me to the letter of your law!
 Oh, I must keep my heart inviolate
 Against the poison of your deadly hate.

CONTEXTUAL EXCERPTS

James Weldon Johnson

From the preface to
 The Book of American Negro Poetry (1921)

James Weldon Johnson, circa 1920

This preface has gone far beyond what I had in mind when I started. It was my intention to gather together the best verses I could find by Negro poets and present them with a bare word of introduction. It was not my plan to make this collection inclusive nor to make the book in any sense a book of criticism. I planned to present only verses by contemporary writers; but, perhaps, because this is the first collection of its kind, I realized the absence of a starting-point and was led to provide one and to fill in with historical data what I felt to be a gap.

It may be surprising to many to see how little of the poetry being written by Negro poets today is being written in Negro dialect. The newer Negro poets show a tendency to discard dialect; much of the subject-matter which went into the making of traditional dialect poetry, 'possums, watermelons, etc., they have discarded altogether, at least, as poetic material. This tendency will, no doubt, be regretted by the majority of white readers; and, indeed, it would be a distinct loss if the American Negro poets threw away this quaint and musical folk speech as a medium of expression. And yet, after all, these poets are working through a problem not realized by the reader, and, perhaps, by many of these poets themselves not realized consciously. They are trying to break away from, not Negro dialect itself, but the limitations on Negro dialect imposed by the fixing effects of long convention.

The Negro in the United States has achieved or been placed in a certain artistic niche. When he is thought of artistically, it is as a happy-go-lucky, singing, shuffling, banjo-picking being or as a more or less pathetic figure. The picture of him is in a log cabin amid fields of cotton or along the levees. Negro dialect is naturally and by long association the exact instrument for voicing this phase of Negro life; and by that very exactness it is an instrument with but two full stops, humor and pathos. So even when he confines himself to purely racial themes, the Aframerican poet realizes that there are phases of Negro life in the United States which cannot be treated in the dialect either adequately or artistically. Take, for example, the phases rising out of life in Harlem, that most wonderful Negro city in the world. I do not deny that a Negro in a log cabin is more picturesque than a Negro in a Harlem flat, but the Negro in the Harlem flat is here, and he is but part of a group growing everywhere in the country, a group whose ideals are becoming increasingly more vital than those of the traditionally artistic group, even if its members are less picturesque.

What the colored poet in the United States needs to do is something like what Synge⁹ did for the Irish; he needs to find a form that will express the racial spirit by symbols from within rather than by symbols from without, such as the mere mutilation of English spelling and pronunciation. He needs a form that is freer and larger than dialect, but which will still hold the racial flavor; a form expressing the imagery, the idioms, the peculiar turns of thought, and the distinctive humor and pathos, too, of the Negro, but which will also be capable of voicing the deepest and highest emotions and aspirations, and allow of the widest range of subjects and the widest scope of treatment.

Negro dialect is at present a medium that is not capable of giving expression to the varied conditions of Negro life in America, and much less is it capable of giving the fullest interpretation of Negro character and psychology. This is no indictment against the dialect as dialect, but against the mold of convention in which Negro dialect in the United States has been set. In time these conventions may become lost, and the colored poet in the United States may sit down to write in dialect without feeling that his first line will put the general reader in a frame of mind which demands that the poem be humorous or pathetic. In the meantime, there is no reason why these poets should not continue to do the beautiful things that can be done, and done best, in the dialect.

9. John Millington Synge (1871–1909), Irish dramatist whose works celebrate Irish traditions.

In stating the need for Aframerican poets in the United States to work out a new and distinctive form of expression I do not wish to be understood to hold any theory that they should limit themselves to Negro poetry, to racial themes; the sooner they are able to write American poetry spontaneously, the better. Nevertheless, I believe that the richest contribution the Negro poet can make to the American literature of the future will be the fusion into it of his own individual artistic gifts.

Alain Locke

From The New Negro (1925)

The tide of Negro migration, northward and city-ward, is not to be fully explained as a blind flood started by the demands of war industry coupled with the shutting off of foreign migration, or by the pressure of poor crops coupled with increased social terrorism in certain sections of the South and Southwest. Neither labor demand, the bollweevil,¹ nor the Ku Klux Klan is a basic factor, however contributory any or all of them may have been. The wash and rush of this human tide on the beach line of the northern city centers is to be explained primarily in terms of a new vision of opportunity, of social and economic freedom, of a spirit to seize, even in the face of an extortionate and heavy toll, a chance for the improvement of conditions. With each successive wave of it, the movement of the Negro becomes more and more a mass movement toward the larger and the more democratic chance—in the Negro's case a deliberate flight not only from countryside to city, but from medieval America to modern.

Take Harlem as an instance of this. Here in Manhattan is not merely the largest Negro community in the world, but the first concentration in history of so many diverse elements of Negro life. It has attracted the African, the West Indian, the Negro American; has brought together the Negro of the North and the Negro of the South; the man from the city and the man from the town and village; the peasant, the student, the business man, the professional man, artist, poet, musician, adventurer and worker, preacher and criminal, exploiter and social outcast. Each group has come with its own separate motives and for its own special ends, but their greatest experience has been the finding of one another. Proscription and prejudice have thrown these dissimilar elements into a common area of contact and interaction. Within this area, race sympathy and unity have determined a further fusing of sentiment and experience. So what began in terms of segregation becomes more and more, as its elements mix and react, the laboratory of a great race-welding. Hitherto, it must be admitted that American Negroes have been a race more in name than in fact, or to be exact, more in sentiment than in experience. The chief bond between them has been that of a common condition rather than a common consciousness; a problem in common rather than a life in common. In Harlem, Negro life is seizing upon its first chances for group expression and self-determination. It is—or promises at least to be—a race capital. That is why our comparison is taken with those nascent centers of folk-expression and self-determination which are playing a creative part in the world today. Without pretense to their political significance, Harlem has the same role to play for the New Negro as Dublin has had for the New Ireland or Prague for the New Czechoslovakia.

Harlem, I grant you, isn't typical—but it is significant, it is prophetic. No sane observer, however sympathetic to the new trend, would contend that the great masses are articulate as yet, but they stir, they move, they are more than physically restless. The challenge of the new intellectuals among them is clear enough—the “race radicals” and realists who have broken with the old epoch of philanthropic guidance, sentimental appeal and protest. But are we after all only reading into the stirrings of a sleeping giant the dreams of an agitator? The answer is in the migrating peasant. It is the “man farthest down” who is most active in getting up. One of the most characteristic symptoms of this is the professional man, himself migrating to recapture his constituency after a vain effort to maintain in some Southern corner what for years back seemed an established living and clientele. The clergyman following his errant flock, the physician or lawyer trailing his clients, supply the true clues. In a real sense it is the rank and file who are leading, and the leaders who are following. A transformed and transforming psychology permeates the masses.

When the racial leaders of twenty years ago spoke of developing race-pride and stimulating race-consciousness, and of the desirability of race solidarity, they could not in any accurate degree have anticipated the abrupt feeling that has surged up and now pervades the awakened centers. [. . .] It is a social disservice to blunt the fact that the Negro of the Northern centers has reached a stage where tutelage, even of the most interested and well-intentioned sort, must give place to new relationships, where positive self-direction must be reckoned with in ever increasing measure. The American mind must reckon with a fundamentally changed Negro.

The Negro too, for his part, has idols of the tribe to smash. If on the one hand the white man has erred in making the Negro appear to be that which would excuse or extenuate his treatment of him, the Negro, in turn, has too often unnecessarily excused himself because of the way he has been treated. The intelligent Negro of today is resolved not to make discrimination an extenuation for his shortcomings in performance, individual or collective; he is trying to hold himself at par, neither inflated by sentimental allowances nor depreciated by current social discounts. For this he must know himself and be known for precisely what he is, and for that reason he welcomes the new scientific rather than the old sentimental interest. Sentimental interest in the Negro has ebbed. We used to lament this as the falling off of our friends; now we rejoice and pray to be delivered both from self-pity and condescension. The mind of each racial group has had a bitter weaning, apathy or hatred on one side matching disillusionment or resentment on the other; but they face each other today with the possibility at least of entirely new mutual attitudes. [. . .]

The fiction is that the life of the races is separate, and increasingly so. The fact is that they have touched too closely at the unfavorable and too lightly at the favorable levels.

While inter-racial councils have sprung up in the South, drawing on forward elements of both races, in the Northern cities manual laborers may brush elbows in their everyday work, but the community and business leaders have experienced no such interplay or far too little of it. These segments must achieve contact or the race situation in America becomes desperate. Fortunately this is happening. There is a growing realization that in social effort the cooperative basis must supplant long-distance philanthropy, and that the only safeguard for mass relations in the future must be provided in the carefully maintained contacts of the enlightened minorities of both race groups. In the intellectual realm a renewed and keen curiosity is replacing the recent apathy; the Negro is being carefully studied, not just talked about and discussed. In art and letters, instead of being wholly caricatured, he is being seriously portrayed and painted.

To all of this the New Negro is keenly responsive as an augury of a new democracy in American culture. He is contributing his share to the new social understanding. But the desire to be understood would never in itself have been sufficient to have opened so completely the protectively closed portals of the thinking Negro's mind. There is still too much possibility of being snubbed or patronized for that. It was rather the necessity for fuller, truer self-expression, the realization of the unwisdom of allowing social discrimination to segregate him mentally, and a counter-attitude to cramp and fetter his own living—and so the “spite-wall” that the intellectuals built over the “color-line” has happily been taken down. Much of this reopening of intellectual contacts has centered in New York and has been richly fruitful not merely in the enlarging of personal experience, but in the definite enrichment of American art and letters and in the clarifying of our common vision of the social tasks ahead.

The particular significance in the re-establishment of contact between the more advanced and representative classes is that it promises to offset some of the unfavorable reactions of the past, or at least to re-surface race contacts somewhat for the future. Subtly the conditions that are molding a New Negro are molding a new American attitude.

However, this new phase of things is delicate; it will call for less charity but more justice; less help, but infinitely closer understanding. This is indeed a critical stage of race relationships because of the likelihood, if the new temper is not understood, of engendering sharp group antagonism and a second crop of more calculated prejudice. In some quarters, it has already done so. Having weaned the Negro, public opinion cannot continue to paternalize. The Negro today is inevitably moving forward under the control largely of his own objectives. What are these objectives? Those of his outer life are happily already well and finally formulated, for they are none other than the ideals of American institutions and democracy. Those of his inner life are yet in process of formation, for the new psychology at present is more of a consensus of feeling than of opinion, of attitude rather than of program. Still some points seem to have crystallized.

Up to the present one may adequately describe the Negro's “inner objectives” as an attempt to repair a damaged group psychology and reshape a warped social perspective. Their realization has required a new mentality for the American Negro. And as it matures we begin to see its effects; at first, negative, iconoclastic, and then positive and constructive. In this new group psychology we note the lapse of sentimental appeal, then the development of a more positive self-respect and self-reliance; the repudiation of social dependence, and then the gradual recovery from hyper-sensitiveness and “touchy” nerves, the repudiation of the double standard of judgment with its special philanthropic allowances and then the sturdier desire for objective and scientific appraisal; and finally the rise from social disillusionment to race pride, from the sense of social debt to the responsibilities of social contribution, and offsetting the necessary working and commonsense acceptance of restricted conditions, the belief in ultimate esteem and recognition.

The Negro mind reaches out as yet to nothing but American wants, American ideas. But this forced attempt to build his Americanism on race values is a unique social experiment, and its ultimate success is impossible except through the fullest sharing of American culture and institutions. There should be no delusion about this. American nerves in sections unstrung with race hysteria are often fed the opiate that the trend of Negro advance is wholly separatist, and that the effect of its operation will be to encyst the Negro as a benign foreign body in the body politic. This cannot be—even if it were desirable. The racialism of the Negro is no limitation or reservation with respect to American life; it is only a constructive effort to build the obstructions in the stream of his progress into an efficient dam of social energy and power. Democracy itself is obstructed and stagnated to the extent that any of its channels are closed. Indeed they cannot be selectively closed. So the choice is not between one way for the Negro and another way for the rest, but between American institutions frustrated on the one hand and American ideals progressively fulfilled and realized on the other.

More and more, however, an intelligent realization of the great discrepancy between the American social creed and the American social practice forces upon the Negro the taking of the moral advantage that is his. Only the steady and sobering effect of a truly characteristic gentleness of spirit prevents the rapid rise of a definite cynicism and counter-hate and a defiant superiority feeling. Human as this reaction would be, the majority still deprecate its advent, and would gladly see it forestalled by the speedy amelioration of its causes. We wish our race pride to be a healthier, more positive achievement than a feeling based upon a realization of the shortcomings of others. But all paths toward the attainment of a sound social attitude have been difficult; only a relatively few enlightened minds have been able as the phrase puts it “to rise above” prejudice. The ordinary man has had until recently only a hard choice between the alternatives of supine and humiliating submission and stimulating but hurtful counter-prejudice. Fortunately from some inner, desperate resourcefulness has recently sprung up the simple expedient of fighting prejudice by mental passive resistance, in other words by trying to ignore it. For the few, this manna may perhaps be effective, but the masses cannot thrive upon it.

Fortunately there are constructive channels opening out into which the balked social feelings of the American Negro can flow freely.

Without them there would be much more pressure and danger than there is. These compensating interests are racial but in a new and enlarged way. One is the consciousness of acting as the advance-guard of the African peoples in their contact with Twentieth Century civilization; the other, the sense of a mission of rehabilitating the race in world esteem from that loss of prestige for which the fate and conditions of slavery have so largely been responsible. Harlem, as we shall see, is the center of both these movements; she is the home of the Negro's "Zionism."² The pulse of the Negro world has begun to beat in Harlem. A Negro newspaper carrying news material in English, French, and Spanish, gathered from all quarters of America, the West Indies, and Africa has maintained itself in Harlem for over five years. Two important magazines,³ both edited from New York, maintain their news and circulation consistently on a cosmopolitan scale. Under American auspices and backing, three pan-African congresses have been held abroad for the discussion of common interests, colonial questions, and the future cooperative development of Africa. In terms of the race question as a world problem, the Negro mind has leapt, so to speak, upon the parapets of prejudice and extended its cramped horizons. In so doing it has linked up with the growing group consciousness of the dark-peoples and is gradually learning their common interests. As one of our writers has recently put it: "It is imperative that we understand the white world in its relations to the non-white world." As with the Jew, persecution is making the Negro international.

As a world phenomenon this wider race consciousness is a different thing from the much asserted rising tide of color. Its inevitable causes are not of our making. The consequences are not necessarily damaging to the best interests of civilization. Whether it actually brings into being new Armadas of conflict or argosies⁴ of cultural exchange and enlightenment can only be decided by the attitude of the dominant races in an era of critical change. With the American Negro, his new internationalism is primarily an effort to recapture contact with the scattered peoples of African derivation. Garveyism⁵ may be a transient, if spectacular, phenomenon, but the possible role of the American Negro in the future development of Africa is one of the most constructive and universally helpful missions that any modern people can lay claim to.

It might not have been such a jolt had my five years' absence from Harlem been spent otherwise. But the study of medicine includes no courses in cabaretting; and, anyway, the Negro cabarets in Washington, where I studied, are all uncompromisingly black. Accordingly I was entirely unprepared for what I found when I returned to Harlem recently.

I remembered one place especially where my own crowd used to hold forth; and, hoping to find some old-timers there still, I sought it out one midnight. The old, familiar plunkety-plunk welcomed me from below as I entered. I descended the same old narrow stairs, came into the same smoke-misty basement, and found myself a chair at one of the ancient white-porcelain, mirror-smooth tables. I drew a deep breath and looked about, seeking familiar faces. "What a lot of 'fays!'"⁶ I thought, as I noticed the number of white guests. Presently I grew puzzled and began to stare, then I gaped—and gasped. I found myself wondering if this was the right place—if, indeed, this was Harlem at all. I suddenly became aware that, except for the waiters and members of the orchestra, I was the only Negro in the place.

After a while I left it and wandered about in a daze from night-club to night-club. I tried the Nest, Small's, Connie's Inn, the Capitol, Happy's, the Cotton Club. There was no mistake; my discovery was real and was repeatedly confirmed. No wonder my old crowd was not to be found in any of them. The best of Harlem's black cabarets have changed their names and turned white.

Such a discovery renders a moment's recollection irresistible. As irresistible as were the cabarets themselves to me seven or eight years ago. Just out of college in a town where cabarets were something only read about. A year of graduate work ahead. A Summer of rest at hand. Cabarets. Cabarets night after night, and one after another. There was no cover-charge then, and a fifteen-cent bottle of Whistle lasted an hour. It was just after the war⁷—the heroes were home—cabarets were the thing.

How the Lybia prospered in those happy days! It was the gathering place of the swellest Harlem set: if you didn't go to the Lybia, why, my dear, you just didn't belong. The people you saw at church in the morning you met at the Lybia at night. What romance in those war-tinged days and nights! Officers from Camp Upton,⁸ with pretty maids from Brooklyn! Gay lieutenants, handsome captains—all whirling the lively onestep. Poor non-coms⁹ completely ignored; what sensible girl wanted a corporal or even a sergeant? That white, old-fashioned house, standing alone in 138th street, near the corner of Seventh Avenue—doomed to be torn down a few months thence—how it shook with the dancing and laughter of the dark merry crowds!

But the first place really popular with my friends was a Chinese restaurant in 136th Street, which had been known as Hayne's Café and then became the Oriental. It occupied an entire house of three stories, and had carpeted floors and a quiet, superior air. There was excellent food and incredibly good tea and two unusual entertainers: a Cuban girl, who could so vary popular airs that they sounded like real music, and a slender little "brown" with a voice of silver and a way of singing a song that made you forget your food. One could dance in the Oriental if one liked, but one danced to a piano only, and wound one's way between linen-clad tables over velvety, noiseless floors.

8. Military facility near Manhattan. 9. Noncommissioned officers.

Here we gathered: Fritz Pollard, All-American halfback,¹ selling Negro stock to prosperous Negro physicians; Henry Creamer and Turner Layton, who had written “After You’ve Gone” and a dozen more songs, and were going to write “Strut, Miss Lizzie;” Paul Robeson,² All-American end, on the point of tackling law, quite unaware that the stage would intervene; Preacher Harry Bragg, Harvard Jimmie MacLendon and a half a dozen others. Here at a little table, just inside the door, Bert Williams³ had supper every night, and afterward sometimes joined us upstairs and sang songs with us and lampooned the Actors’ Equity Association, which had barred him because of his color. Never did white guests come to the Oriental except as guests of Negroes. But the manager soon was stricken with a psychosis of some sort, became a black Jew, grew himself a bushy, square-cut beard, donned a skull-cap and abandoned the Oriental. And so we were robbed of our favorite resort, and thereafter became mere rounders.

Such places, those real Negro cabarets that we met in the course of our rounds! There was Edmonds’ in Fifth Avenue at 130th Street. It was a sure-enough honky-tonk, occupying the cellar of a saloon. It was the social center of what was then, and still is, Negro Harlem’s kitchen. Here a tall brown-skin girl, unmistakably the one guaranteed in the song to make a preacher lay his Bible down, used to sing and dance her own peculiar numbers, vesting them with her own originality. She was known simply as Ethel,⁴ and was a genuine drawing-card. She knew her importance, too. Other girls wore themselves ragged trying to rise above the inattentive din of conversation, and soon, literally, yelled themselves hoarse; eventually they lost whatever music there was in their voices and acquired that familiar throaty roughness which is so frequent among blues singers, and which, though admired as characteristically African, is as a matter of fact nothing but a form of chronic laryngitis. Other girls did these things, but not Ethel. She took it easy. She would stride with great leisure and self-assurance to the center of the floor, stand there with a half-contemptuous nonchalance, and wait. All would become silent at once. Then she’d begin her song, genuine blues, which, for all their humorous lines, emanated tragedy and heartbreak:

Woke up this mawnin’
 The day was dawnin’
 And I was sad and blue, so blue, Lord—
 Didn’ have nobody
 To tell my troubles to—

It was Ethel who first made popular the song, “Tryin’ to Teach My Good Man Right from Wrong,” in the slow, meditative measures in which she complained:

I’m gettin’ sick and tired of my railroad man
 I’m gettin’ sick and tired of my railroad man—

It wasn't long before this song-bird escaped her dingy cage. Her name is a vaudeville attraction now, and she uses it all—Ethel Waters. Is there anyone who hasn't heard her sing "Shake That Thing!"?

There were the Lybia, then, and Hayne's, Connor's, the Oriental, Edmonds' and the Garden of Joy, each distinctive, standing for a type, some living up to their names, others living down to them, but all predominantly black. Regularly I made the rounds among these places and saw only incidental white people. I have seen them occasionally in numbers, but such parties were out on a lark. They weren't in their natural habitat and they often weren't any too comfortable.

But what of Barron's, you say? Certainly they were at home there. Yes, I know about Barron's. I have been turned away from Barron's because I was too dark to be welcome. I have been a member of a group that was told, "No more room," when we could see plenty of room. Negroes were never actually wanted in Barron's save to work. Dark skins were always discouraged or barred. In short, the fact about Barron's was this: it simply wasn't a Negro cabaret; it was a cabaret run by Negroes for whites. It wasn't even on the lists of those who lived in Harlem—they'd no more think of going there than of going to the Winter Garden Roof.⁵ But these other places were Negro through and through. Negroes supported them, not merely in now-and-then parties, but steadily, night after night.

Some think it's just a fad. White people have always more or less sought Negro entertainment as diversion. The old shows of the early nineteen hundreds, Williams and Walker⁶ and Cole and Johnson, are brought to mind as examples. The howling success—literally that—of J. Leubrie Hill⁷ around 1913 is another; on the road his "Darktown Follies" played in numerous white theatres. In Harlem it played at the black Lafayette and, behold, the Lafayette temporarily became white. And so now, it is held, we are observing merely one aspect of a meteoric phenomenon, which simply presents itself differently in different circumstances: Roland Hayes and Paul Robeson, Jean Toomer and Walter White, Charles Gilpin and Florence Mills⁸—"Green Thursday," "Porgy," "In Abraham's Bosom"⁹—Negro spirituals—the startling new African groups

[. . .] It may be a season's whim, then, this sudden, contagious interest in everything Negro. If so, when I go into a familiar cabaret, or the place where a familiar cabaret used to be, and find it transformed and relatively colorless, I may be observing just one form that the season's whim has taken.

But suppose it is a fad—to say that explains nothing. How came the fad? What occasions the focusing of attention on this particular thing—rounds up and gathers these seasonal whims, and centers them about the Negro? Cabarets are peculiar, mind you. They're not like theatres and concert halls. You don't just go to a cabaret and sit back and wait to be entertained. You get out on the floor and join the pow-wow and help entertain yourself. Granted that white people have long enjoyed the Negro entertainment as a diversion, is it not something different, something more, when they bodily throw themselves into Negro entertainment in cabarets? "Now Negroes go to their own cabarets to see how white people act."

And what do we see? Why, we see them actually playing Negro games. I watch them in that epidemic Negroism, the Charleston. I look on and envy them. They camel and fish-tail and turkey, they geche and black-bottom and scronch, they skate and buzzard and mess-around¹—and they do them all better than I! This interest in the Negro is an active and participating interest. It is almost as if a traveler from the North stood watching an African tribe-dance, then suddenly found himself swept wildly into it, caught in its tidal rhythm.

Willingly would I be an outsider in this if I could know that I read it aright—that out of this change in the old familiar ways some finer thing may come. Is this interest akin to that of the Virginians on the veranda of a plantation's big-house—sitting genuinely spellbound as they hear the lugubrious strains floating up from the Negro quarters? Is it akin to that of the African explorer, Stanley,² leaving a village far behind, but halting in spite of himself to catch the boom of its distant drum? Is it significant of basic human responses, the effect of which, once admitted, will extend far beyond cabarets? Maybe these Nordics at last have tuned in on our wave-length. Maybe they are at last learning to speak our language.

Claude McKay's Home to Harlem [. . .] for the most part nauseates me, and after the dirtier parts of its filth I feel distinctly like taking a bath. This does not mean that the book is wholly bad. McKay is too great a poet to make any complete failure in writing. There are bits of Home to Harlem beautiful and fascinating: the continued changes upon the theme of the beauty of colored skins; the portrayal of the fascination of their new yearnings for each other which Negroes are developing. The chief character, Jake, has something appealing, and the glimpses of the Haitian, Ray, have all the materials of a great piece of fiction.

But it looks as though, despite this, McKay has set out to cater for that prurient demand on the part of white folk for a portrayal in Negroes of that utter licentiousness which conventional civilization holds white folk back from enjoying—if enjoyment it can be called. That which a certain decadent section of the white American world, centered particularly in New York, longs for with fierce and unrestrained passions, it wants to see written out in black and white, and saddled on black Harlem. This demand, as voiced by a number of New York publishers, McKay has certainly satisfied, and added much for good measure. He has used every art and emphasis to paint drunkenness, fighting, lascivious sexual promiscuity, and utter absence of restraint in as bold and as bright colors as he can.

[. . .] As a picture of Harlem life or of Negro life anywhere, it is, of course, nonsense. Untrue, not so much on account of its facts, but on account of its emphasis and glaring colors. I am sorry that the author of Harlem Shadows stooped to this. I sincerely hope that he will some day rise above it and give us in fiction the strong, well-knit as well as beautiful theme, that it seems to me he might do.

Zora Neale Hurston

How It Feels to Be Colored Me (1928)

I am colored but I offer nothing in the way of extenuating circumstances except the fact that I am the only Negro in the United States whose grandfather on the mother's side was not an Indian chief.

I remember the very day that I became colored. Up to my thirteenth year I lived in the little Negro town of Eatonville, Florida. It is exclusively a colored town. The only white people I knew passed through the town going to or coming from Orlando. The native whites rode dusty horses, the Northern tourists chugged down the sandy village road in automobiles. The town knew the Southerners and never stopped cane chewing when they passed. But the Northerners were something else again. They were peered at cautiously from behind curtains by the timid. The more venturesome would come out on the porch to watch them go past and got just as much pleasure out of the tourists as the tourists got out of the village.

The front porch might seem a daring place for the rest of the town, but it was a gallery seat for me. My favorite place was atop the gate-post. Proscenium box⁴ for a born first-nighter. Not only did I enjoy the show, but I didn't mind the actors knowing that I liked it. I usually spoke to them in passing. I'd wave at them and when they returned my salute, I would say something like this: "Howdy-do-well-I-thank-you-where-you-goin'?" Usually automobile or the horse paused at this, and after a queer exchange of compliments, I would probably "go a piece of the way" with them, as we say in farthest Florida. If one of my family happened to come to the front in time to see me, of course negotiations would be rudely broken off. But even so, it is clear that I was the first "welcome-to-our-state" Floridian, and I hope the Miami Chamber of Commerce will please take notice.

During this period, white people differed from colored to me only in that they rode through town and never lived there. They liked to hear me "speak pieces" and sing and wanted to see me dance the parse-me-la, and gave me generously of their small silver for doing these things, which seemed strange to me for I wanted to do them so much that I needed bribing to stop. Only they didn't know it. The colored people gave no dimes. They deplored any joyful tendencies in me, but I was their Zora nevertheless. I belonged to them, to the nearby hotels, to the county—everybody's Zora.

But changes came in the family when I was thirteen, and I was sent to school in Jacksonville. I left Eatonville, the town of the oleanders, as Zora. When I disembarked from the river-boat at Jacksonville, she was no more. It seemed that I had suffered a sea change. I was not Zora of Orange County any more, I was now a little colored girl. I found it out in certain ways. In my heart as well as in the mirror, I became a fast⁵ brown—warranted not to rub nor run.

But I am not tragically colored. There is no great sorrow dammed up in my soul, nor lurking behind my eyes. I do not mind at all. I do not belong to the sobbing school of Negrohood who hold that nature somehow has given them a lowdown dirty deal and whose feelings are all hurt about it. Even in the helter-skelter skirmish that is my life, I have seen that the world is to the strong regardless of a little pigmentation more or less. No, I do not weep at the world—I am too busy sharpening my oyster knife.⁶

6. Allusion to Shakespeare's The Merry Wives of Windsor 2.2.4–5: "Why, then the world's mine oyster, / Which I with sword will open."

Someone is always at my elbow reminding me that I am the grand-daughter of slaves. It fails to register depression with me. Slavery is sixty years in the past. The operation was successful and the patient is doing well, thank you. The terrible struggle that made me an American out of a potential slave said "On the line!" The Reconstruction said "Get set!"; and the generation before said "Go!" I am off to a flying start and I must not halt in the stretch to look behind and weep. Slavery is the price I paid for civilization, and the choice was not with me. It is a bully adventure and worth all that I have paid through my ancestors for it. No one on earth ever had a greater chance for glory. The world to be won and nothing to be lost. It is thrilling to think—to know that for any act of mine, I shall get twice as much praise or twice as much blame. It is quite exciting to hold the center of the national stage, with the spectators not knowing whether to laugh or to weep.

The position of my white neighbor is much more difficult. No brown specter pulls up a chair beside me when I sit down to eat. No dark ghost thrusts its leg against mine in bed. The game of keeping what one has is never so exciting as the game of getting.

I do not always feel colored. Even now I often achieve the unconscious Zora of Eatonville before the Hegira.⁷ I feel most colored when I am thrown against a sharp white background.

For instance at Barnard.⁸ "Beside the waters of the Hudson" I feel my race. Among the thousand white persons, I am a dark rock surged upon, and overswept, but through it all, I remain myself. When covered by the waters, I am; and the ebb but reveals me again.

Sometimes it is the other way around. A white person is set down in our midst, but the contrast is just as sharp for me. For instance, when I sit in the drafty basement that is The New World Cabaret with a white person, my color comes. We enter chatting about any little nothing that we have in common and are seated by the jazz waiters. In the abrupt way that jazz orchestras have, this one plunges into a number. It loses no time in circumlocutions, but gets right down to business. It constricts the thorax and splits the heart with its tempo and narcotic harmonies. This orchestra grows rambunctious, rears on its hind legs and attacks the tonal veil with primitive fury, rending it, clawing it until it breaks through to the jungle beyond. I follow those heathen—follow them exultingly. I dance wildly inside myself; I yell within, I whoop; I shake my assegai⁹ above my head, I hurl it true to the mark yeeeooww! I am in the jungle and living in the jungle way. My face is painted red and yellow and my body is painted blue. My pulse is throbbing like a war drum. I want to slaughter something—give pain, give death to what, I do not know. But the piece ends. The men of the orchestra wipe their lips and rest their fingers. I creep back slowly to the veneer we call civilization with the last tone and find the white friend sitting motionless in his seat, smoking calmly.

Music. The great blobs of purple and red emotion have not touched him. He has only heard what I felt. He is far away and I see him but dimly across the ocean and the continent that have fallen between us. He is so pale with his whiteness then and I am so colored.

At certain times I have no race, I am me. When I set my hat at a certain angle and saunter down Seventh Avenue, Harlem City, feeling as snooty as the lions in front of the Forty-Second Street Library,¹ for instance. So far as my feelings are concerned, Peggy Hopkins Joyce on the Boule Mich² with her gorgeous raiment, stately carriage, knees knocking together in a most aristocratic manner, has nothing on me. The cosmic Zora emerges. I belong to no race nor time. I am the eternal feminine with its string of beads.

I have no separate feeling about being an American citizen and colored. I am merely a fragment of the Great Soul that surges within the boundaries. My country, right or wrong.

Sometimes, I feel discriminated against, but it does not make me angry. It merely astonishes me. How can any deny themselves the pleasure of my company? It's beyond me.

But in the main, I feel like a brown bag of miscellany propped against a wall. Against a wall in company with other bags, white, red and yellow. Pour out the contents, and there is discovered a jumble of small things priceless and worthless. A first-water diamond,³ an empty spool, bits of broken glass, lengths of string, a key to a door long since crumbled away, a rusty knife-blade, old shoes saved for a road that never was and never will be, a nail bent under the weight of things too heavy for any nail, a dried flower or two still a little fragrant. In your hand is the brown bag. On the ground before you is the jumble it held—so much like the jumble in the bags, could they be emptied, that all might be dumped in a single heap and the bags refilled without altering the content of any greatly. A bit of colored glass more or less would not matter. Perhaps that is how the Great Stuffer of Bags filled them in the first place—who knows?

Harlem Literati

The summer of 1926, I lived in a rooming house on 137th Street, where Wallace Thurman and Harcourt Tynes⁴ also lived. Thurman was then managing editor of the Messenger, a Negro magazine that had a curious career. It began by being very radical, racial, and socialistic, just after the war. I believe it received a grant from the Garland Fund⁵ in its early days. Then it later became a kind of Negro society magazine and a plugger for Negro business, with photographs of prominent colored ladies and their nice homes in it. A. Phillip Randolph, now President of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, Chandler Owen, and George S. Schuyler were connected with it. Schuyler's editorials, à la Mencken,⁶ were the most interesting things in the magazine, verbal brickbats that said sometimes one thing, sometimes another, but always vigorously. I asked Thurman what kind of magazine the Messenger was, and he said it reflected the policy of whoever paid off best at the time.

Anyway, the Messenger bought my first short stories. They paid me ten dollars a story. Wallace Thurman wrote me that they were very bad stories, but better than any others they could find, so he published them.

Thurman had recently come from California to New York. He was a strangely brilliant black boy, who had read everything, and whose critical mind could find something wrong with everything he read. I have no critical mind, so I usually either like a book or don't. But I am not capable of liking a book and then finding a million things wrong with it, too—as Thurman was capable of doing.

Thurman had read so many books because he could read eleven lines at a time. He would get from the library a great pile of volumes that would have taken me a year to read. But he would go through them in less than a week, and be able to discuss each one at great length with anybody. That was why, I suppose, he was later given a job as a reader at Macaulay's—the only Negro reader, so far as I know, to be employed by any of the larger publishing firms.

Wallace Thurman wanted to be a great writer, but none of his own work ever made him happy. The Blacker the Berry,⁷ his first book, was an important novel on a subject little dwelt upon in Negro fiction—the plight of the very dark Negro woman, who encounters in some communities a double wall of color prejudice within and without the race. His play, Harlem, considerably distorted for box office purposes, was, nevertheless, a compelling study—and the only one in the theater—of the impact of Harlem on a Negro family fresh from the South. And his Infants of the Spring, a superb and bitter study of the bohemian fringe of Harlem's literary and artistic life, is a compelling book.

But none of these things pleased Wallace Thurman. He wanted to be a very great writer, like Gorki or Thomas Mann,⁸ and he felt that he was merely a journalistic writer. His critical mind, comparing his pages to the thousands of other pages he had read, by Proust, Melville, Tolstoy, Galsworthy, Dostoyevski, Henry James, Sainte-Beuve, Taine, Anatole France,⁹ found his own pages vastly wanting. So he contented himself by writing a great deal for money, laughing bitterly at his fabulously concocted “true stories,” creating two bad motion pictures¹ of the “Adults Only” type for Hollywood, drinking more and more gin, and then threatening to jump out of windows at people’s parties and kill himself.

During the summer of 1926, Wallace Thurman, Zora Neale Hurston, Aaron Douglas, John P. Davis, Bruce Nugent, Gwendolyn Bennett,² and I decided to publish “a Negro quarterly of the arts” to be called Fire—the idea being that it would burn up a lot of the old, dead conventional Negro-white ideas of the past, *épater le bourgeois*³ into a realization of the existence of the younger Negro writers and artists, and provide us with an outlet for publication not available in the limited pages of the small Negro magazines then existing, the Crisis, Opportunity, and the Messenger—the first two being house organs of inter-racial organizations, and the latter being God knows what.

Sweltering summer evenings we met to plan Fire. Each of the seven of us agreed to give fifty dollars to finance the first issue. Thurman was to edit it, John P. Davis to handle the business end, and Bruce Nugent to take charge of distribution. The rest of us were to serve as an editorial board to collect material, contribute our own work, and act in any useful way that we could.

I don’t know how Thurman persuaded the printer to let us have all the copies to distribute, but he did. I think Alain Locke, among others, signed notes guaranteeing payments. But since Thurman was the only one of the seven of us with a regular job, for the next three or four years his checks were constantly being attached and his income seized to pay for Fire. And whenever I sold a poem, mine went there, too—to Fire.

None of the older Negro intellectuals would have anything to do with Fire. Dr. DuBois⁴ in the Crisis roasted it. The Negro press called it all sorts of bad names, largely because of a green and purple story by Bruce Nugent, in the Oscar Wilde⁵ tradition, which we had included. Rean Graves, the critic for the Baltimore Afro-American, began his review by saying: “I have just tossed the first issue of Fire into the fire.” Commenting upon various of our contributors, he said: “Aaron Douglas who, in spite of himself and the meaningless grotesqueness of his creations, has gained a reputation as an artist, is permitted to spoil three perfectly good pages and a cover with his pen and ink hudge pudge. Countee Cullen has written a beautiful poem in his ‘From a Dark Tower,’ but tries his best to obscure the thought in superfluous sentences. Langston Hughes displays his usual ability to say nothing in many words.”

So Fire had plenty of cold water thrown on it by the colored critics. The white critics (except for an excellent editorial in the Bookman for November, 1926) scarcely noticed it at all. We had no way of getting it distributed to bookstands or news stands. Bruce Nugent took it around New York on foot and some of the Greenwich Village bookshops put it on display, and sold it for us. But then Bruce, who had no job, would collect the money and, on account of salary, eat it up before he got back to Harlem.

Finally, irony of ironies, several hundred copies of Fire were stored in the basement of an apartment where an actual fire occurred and the bulk of the whole issue was burned up. Even after that Thurman had to go on paying the printer.

Now Fire is a collector's item, and very difficult to get, being mostly ashes.

That taught me a lesson about little magazines. But since white folks had them, we Negroes thought we could have one, too. But we didn't have the money.

[. . .] About the future of Negro literature Thurman was very pessimistic. He thought the Negro vogue had made us all too conscious of ourselves, had flattered and spoiled us, and had provided too many easy opportunities for some of us to drink gin and more gin, on which he thought we would always be drunk. With his bitter sense of humor, he called the Harlem literati, the “niggerati.”

Of this “niggerati,” Zora Neale Hurston was certainly the most amusing. Only to reach a wider audience, need she ever write books—because she is a perfect book of entertainment in herself. In her youth she was always getting scholarships and things from wealthy white people, some of whom simply paid her just to sit around and represent the Negro race for them, she did it in such a racy fashion. She was full of side-splitting anecdotes, humorous tales, and tragicomic stories, remembered out of her life in the South as a daughter of a travelling minister of God. She could make you laugh one minute and cry the next. To many of her white friends, no doubt, she was a perfect “darkie,” in the nice meaning they give the term—that is a naïve, childlike, sweet, humorous, and highly colored Negro.

But Miss Hurston was clever, too—a student who didn't let college give her a broad a and who had great scorn for all pretensions, academic or otherwise. That is why she was such a fine folk-lore collector,⁶ able to go among the people and never act as if she had been to school at all. Almost nobody else could stop the average Harlemit on Lenox Avenue and measure his head with a strange-looking, anthropological device and not get bawled out for the attempt, except Zora, who used to stop anyone whose head looked interesting, and measure it.

[. . .] Harlem was like a great magnet for the Negro intellectual, pulling him from everywhere. Or perhaps the magnet was New York—but once in New York, he had to live in Harlem, for rooms were hardly to be found elsewhere unless one could pass for white or Mexican or Eurasian and perhaps live in the Village⁷—which always seemed to me a very arty locale, in spite of the many real artists and writers who lived there. Only a few of the New Negroes lived in the Village, Harlem being their real stamping ground.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Many poets of the Harlem Renaissance made extensive use of the sonnet form; this chapter contains such examples as Countee Cullen's FROM THE DARK TOWER, Helene Johnson's SONNET TO A NEGRO IN HARLEM, and Claude McKay's IF WE MUST DIE. Write an essay in which you compare some of the sonnets written during the Harlem Renaissance. How do different approaches to the sonnet form signal different thematic concerns?
2. In 1921, James Weldon Johnson wrote of "the need for Aframerican poets in the United States to work out a new and distinctive form of expression." Judging from the selections in this chapter, do you think that poets such as Langston Hughes and Claude McKay met the need articulated by Johnson? Write an essay in which you examine both traditionalism and innovation in the poetry of the Harlem Renaissance. How distinct are the works of black and white poets during this period?
3. In The New Negro, Alain Locke declared, "In Harlem, Negro life is seizing upon its first chances for group expression and self-determination." Do poems such as Arna Bontemps's A BLACK MAN TALKS OF REAPING, Angelina Grimké's THE BLACK FINGER, and Langston Hughes's I, TOO achieve a common social consciousness—Locke's "group expression"? What political effect do you think these poets hoped to achieve through their work? Write an essay in which you analyze the political ideas in the poetry of the Harlem Renaissance.
4. Some poems of the Harlem Renaissance—Langston Hughes's THE WEARY BLUES and Claude McKay's THE HARLEM DANCER, for example—are explicitly about music; others, such as Countee Cullen's SATURDAY'S CHILD, with its ballad form, and Angelina Grimké's improvisational TENEBRIS, take a distinctly musical approach. Write an essay about the interplay of words and music in the poetry of this period.
5. In his review of Claude McKay's Home to Harlem, W. E. B. Du Bois laments that McKay "stooped" to betraying the black cause by portraying "drunkenness, fighting, lascivious sexual promiscuity, and utter absence of restraint" in his novel's black characters. Do writers have a particular duty to portray positive role models? Do writers from ethnic groups engaged in social struggle have an obligation to participate in that struggle? Citing evidence from the selections in this chapter, write an essay in which you weigh the demands of artistic duty against the demands of artistic freedom.
6. What does it mean for a group of artists to be considered a "school"—that is, a group whose work appears to share common themes, styles, and goals? Write an essay in which you discuss whether or not the writers of the Harlem Renaissance spoke with a unified voice. Does a grouping like "the Harlem Renaissance" help our understanding of this period and the art it produced, or does it obscure the individual achievements of the artists themselves?
7. Identify any two poets in this anthology whose work interests you and who lived and wrote in roughly the same time and place. (The biographies at the end of the Poetry section might be a helpful place to start.) Then do a bit of research. Did your two poets have similar backgrounds? Are they considered part of the same or competing "movements" or "schools"? Drawing on your research, write an essay in which you compare at least one poem by each poet and explore how the poems were each shaped by historical and cultural context. Alternatively, choose two poets in this anthology who wrote poems on similar topics or of the same type or genre (odes or sonnets, for example) but who lived and wrote in very different times and/or places. Then write a research essay exploring how historical and/or cultural context might shape the different ways in which each writer approaches the same topic or genre.

In the following essay student Irene Morstan reads Langston Hughes's poem, I, Too in the context of the Harlem Renaissance, drawing upon primary and secondary sources she discovered online, as well as material included in chapter 21. How effectively does she use her sources? integrate and balance textual and contextual analysis? To what aspects of the poem might she pay more attention?

"They'll See How Beautiful I Am": "I, Too" and the Harlem Renaissance

Langston Hughes begins his 1926 essay "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" with a statement made to him by another black poet: "I want to be a poet—not a Negro poet." Hughes takes this to mean that the poet wishes he were a white poet, and pities the poet for this. He believes that the black poet should accept his blackness. The goal for black poets should not be to sound like white poets but to celebrate and embrace their black identity.

Hughes was a central figure in a movement called the Harlem Renaissance, which was "a period of ten or fifteen years in the early twentieth century when an extraordinarily talented group of people came together [. . .] to celebrate and embody the awakening of a new African American consciousness" (Mays, "Cultural" 1031). The Norton Introduction to Literature states, "The Harlem Renaissance represented powerful assertions: that America had to include the voices of black Americans in order to find its own full definition and, equally, that artistic creativity [. . .] was essential to black Americans' realization and assertion of their full humanity" (Mays, "Cultural" 1031). Hughes speaks to both of those assertions in his poem "I, Too." He insists upon the place of the black poet, and person, at the American "table" and upon the power of the black poet to "sing."

The opening of "I, Too" is a declaration of the black man as a poet, despite being historically excluded from such a title. In the first line of the poem "I, too, sing America," Hughes indicates that the speaker is a poet. Hughes related poetry to music, suggesting that Hughes thinks music-making and writing poetry are related. Not only is the speaker a poet, but he is a black poet. By the second line of the poem the race of the speaker is clear; he refers to himself as the "darker brother." The "too" in the first line implies that the speaker has been set apart from another group of people, that he has been excluded from "sing[ing] America." However, the speaker is responding to this exclusion with an affirmative statement that he is both a black poet and part of the American family, despite being set aside by white people.

Refusing to be set aside was an important part of the Harlem Renaissance. James Weldon Johnson, in his preface to The Book of American Negro Poetry, says black poets moved away from writing in dialect to keep white people from thinking of them as "a happy-go-lucky, singing, shuffling, banjo-picking being or as a more or less pathetic figure" (1049). Black poets in the Harlem Renaissance did not want to be stereotyped by whites; they did not want to be Jim from Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. Such stereotypes made black people easy to overlook because they were represented as caricatures of people. These figures did not accurately represent the black person as a complex human being capable of artistic achievement. Not all Harlem Renaissance poets responded to this in the same way. The author of "Literature of the Harlem Renaissance" states, "Countee Cullen insisted that the Black poet is a part of the universal community of all poets, while Langston Hughes asserted his unique racial qualities." While Hughes, in "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain," says that he does not believe that black people should give up any of the things associated with black identity, including writing in dialect, he does explore the dismissal of the black poet by the white audience through "I, Too."

This theme of black exclusion surfaces in the second stanza where the speaker talks about how "They send me to eat in the kitchen / When company comes" (lines 3-4). Here "they" refers to white people who dismiss the black poet from the "table" (line 9). These lines suggest that the white people are perhaps ashamed of "the darker brother" and do not want him to be present in front of the other white guests, the "company." Maybe they don't even see him as a brother, just a servant. This reflects the place of the black artist in the 1920s and 1930s. While the black artist might occasionally be present, he was meant to be a source of entertainment for white people, not an equal. Rudolph Fisher discusses the white interest in Harlem in The Caucasian Storms Harlem, where he notes, "White people have always more or less sought Negro entertainment as diversion" (1057). Despite being suspicious of white peoples' impulses to go to Harlem nightclubs, Fisher hopes that this white interest in black artistry will be the beginning of "finer things" and that "Maybe they are at last learning to speak our language" (1058).

The speaker of "I, Too" also sees that "finer things" are on the horizon. Even though he has been sent to the kitchen, a place reminiscent of the institution of slavery where black slaves worked to feed their white masters, the speaker of the poem says, "I laugh, / And eat well, / And grow strong" (lines 5-7). This dismissal has not crushed his spirit, and "Tomorrow, / I'll sit at the table" (lines 8-9).

Hughes's speaker anticipates the time when the black poet will no longer be cast aside. Because of his strength and his spirit he is undeniable. In the future,

Nobody'll dare

Say to me,

"Eat in the kitchen" (lines 11-13)

And the black spirit was undeniable during the Harlem Renaissance. The number of notable black authors and artists gathered in one place was incredible. During the 1920s and 1930s writers like Claude McKay, Countee Cullen, Zora Neale Hurston, Jean Toomer, Angelina Grimké, as well as Langston Hughes, were all in Harlem. This was one of the first times that black people from all over America were in one place together, as "more than 100,000 blacks migrated to Harlem during the 1920s" (Mays, "Cultural" 1034). Alain Locke, author of The New Negro, saw this as a turning point in black history and in the history of America, even arguing that it created a real black "race." In 1925, he wrote,

Hitherto, it must be admitted that American Negroes have been a race more in name than in fact, or to be exact, more in sentiment than experience. The chief bond between them has been that of a common condition rather than a common consciousness; a problem in common rather than a life in common. In Harlem, Negro life is seizing upon its first chances for group expression and self-determination. (1050)

The Harlem Renaissance was a movement where black writers, even though they may have had some differences, joined together to create black art according to their own rules, not the rules of white people. Black artists had "grow[n] strong," and it is this strength that the speaker of "I, Too" sees as causing change between black and whites.

However, as hopeful as the speaker is, he acknowledges that this has not yet happened. By placing "then" on its own line and at the end of the sentence (line 14), Hughes highlights that these actions are yet to come. The "then" in the poem sounds wistful, as if the speaker gets very excited about the prospect of being acknowledged and respected, only to remember the difficulties that lie between the current state of affairs and the one dreamt of for the future. Racial inequality was still prevalent at the time of the Harlem Renaissance, and the situation did not improve for some time. During the 1920s and 1930s segregation was still normal. (Langston Hughes said that an African American who moved to New York "had to live in Harlem, for rooms were hardly to be found elsewhere unless one could pass for white or Mexican or Eurasian" [The Big Sea 1065], and Fisher says that blacks like him were surprisingly even excluded from some Harlem clubs [1057].) On the other hand, the isolation of the "then" on its own line also could be read as being firmly insistent that a positive change will come. This echoes the goal of the writers of the Harlem Renaissance, "to [raise] the aspirations of American blacks of all backgrounds and abilities" (Mays, "Cultural" 1038). In this reading, "then" is both a statement of faith about the future and a call to action about now.

These two readings reflect two different black views of Harlem literature. Some people were cynical and did not believe that change had come or would. Langston Hughes recounts that "[a]bout the future of Negro literature [Wallace] Thurman was very pessimistic. He thought the Negro vogue had made us all too conscious of ourselves, had flattered and spoiled us, and had provided too many easy opportunities for some of us to drink gin and more gin, on which he thought we would always be drunk" (The Big Sea 1065). In contrast to this dark view of the Harlem Renaissance is novelist Zora Neale Hurston's view of the position of black people in 1920s America. In "How It Feels to Be Colored Me," she states, "I am not tragically colored. There is no great sorrow dammed up in my soul nor lurking behind my eyes. . . . I do not belong to the sobbing school of Negrohood who hold that nature somehow has given them a lowdown dirty deal. . . . I do not weep at the world—I am too busy sharpening my oyster knife" (1060). Here Hurston is expressing that she is not brought down by the slavery of the past, but is making herself ready to make the world hers. Her view is the positive one found in Hughes's poem.

Just as the writers of the Harlem Renaissance wanted their creative abilities to be appreciated, so they also wanted black people and culture to be appreciated and embraced by the American public. The speaker of "I, Too" makes this apparent at the end of the poem when he says,

Besides,
They'll see how beautiful I am
And be ashamed—
I, too, am America. (lines 15-18)

The speaker is asserting that being black is being beautiful and that people who have discriminated against blacks will be ashamed of their behavior when they really see what black people are like. Not only are black people beautiful, they are part of America. The speaker of the poem makes this clear when he says that he is America. This "darker brother" is just as much a part of America as a white person (line 2), so he should not be excluded, either physically or literarily. Hughes, like many other writers of the Harlem Renaissance, is insisting that all Americans recognize the place of black people, both culturally and creatively, in the American identity.

Hughes speaks not only to white people in "I, Too" but also to other writers during the Harlem Renaissance. As is illustrated in the opening anecdote, Hughes was insistent about honoring blackness and common black life. He thought that all aspects of black life were worth celebrating, and "[u]nlike other notable black poets of the period—Claude McKay, Jean Toomer, and Countee Cullen—Hughes refused to differentiate between his personal experience and the common experience of black America. He wanted to tell the stories of his people in ways that reflected their actual culture, including both their suffering and their love of music, laughter, and language itself" ("Langston Hughes"). Hughes's references to race and beauty throughout "I, Too" show that he was committed to representing black life in a positive way.

Langston Hughes and the writers of the Harlem Renaissance are an important part of American history and have had a lasting impact on American literature. The quality of their works and power of their message shaped American culture. Through creative pieces like "I, Too," Hughes shows audiences how black literature and black people were valuable parts of the American identity.

CRITICAL CONTEXTS:
SYLVIA PLATH'S "DADDY"

As the previous context chapters have suggested, poems draw on all kinds of earlier texts, experiences, and events. But they also produce new contexts of discussion and interpretation, ongoing conversations about the poems themselves. Different readers of poems see different things in them, so naturally a variety of interpretations and evaluations develop around any poem that is read repeatedly by various readers. Many of those interpretations are published in specialized journals and books (the selections that follow are all reprinted from published sources), and a kind of dialogue develops among readers, producing a body of commentary about the poem. Professional interpreters of texts are called literary critics, and the textual analysis they provide is called literary criticism—not because their work is necessarily negative or corrective, but because they ask hard, analytical, “critical” questions and interpret texts through a wide variety of literary, historical, biographical, psychological, aesthetic, moral, political, or social perspectives.

Your own interpretive work may seem to you more private and far removed from such “professional” writing about poems. But once you engage in class discussion or talk informally about a poem, you are practicing literary criticism—offering comments, analyzing, judging, putting the poem into some kind of perspective that makes it more intelligible. You are, in effect, joining the ongoing conversation about the poem. And when you write about the poem, you may often engage the opinions of others—your teacher, fellow students, or published criticism. You may not have the experience or specific expertise of professional critics, but you can modify or answer the work of others and use it in your own work.

There are many ways to engage literary criticism and put it to work for you. The most common is to draw on published work for specific information about the poem: glossings of particular terms; explanations of references or situations you don't recognize; accounts of how, when, and under what circumstances the poem was written. Another common use of such material is as a springboard for your own interpretation, either building on what someone else has argued or, if you disagree, using that argument as a point of departure.

When you use the work of others, you must give full credit, carefully detailing the sources of all direct quotations and all borrowed ideas. You must always tell your reader exactly how to find the material you have quoted, paraphrased, or summarized. Usually, you do this through careful notes and a list of citations (that is, a bibliography) at the end of your paper. (See ch. 31 for help with citation and documentation.) Your instructor may also guide you to handbooks—for example, the MLA Handbook or The Chicago Manual of Style—that provide more detail.

It is usually best to do your own extensive analysis of a poem before consulting what other critics have said. Your own reading experience gives you a legiti-mate perspective. You always want to take in new information and to challenge both your first impressions and your considered analyses—but don't be too quick to adopt somebody else's ideas. The best way to test the views of others is to compare them critically to your own conclusions, which you might then want to supplement, refine, extend, or even scrap altogether. You can sharpen your skills by testing your views against those of people with extensive interpretive experience. As you will discover, even the experts disagree. In fact, one measure of a poem's greatness is its ability to stimulate disagreement and a broad range of interpretation.

Judged by that standard, the poem featured in this chapter is arguably among the very greatest of the twentieth century. First published posthumously in 1965 and famously declared “monstrous” by distinguished Jewish American critic Irving Howe, Sylvia Plath's DADDY has generated countless interpretations and unusually heated debate among a wide array of readers. As the rash of newspaper, magazine, and Web articles inspired by the fiftieth anniversary of Plath's suicide in 2013 suggest, moreover, it is a debate that is still very much alive. This chapter invites you to enter that debate: Beginning with the poem itself (which is where we hope you, too, will begin), it features excerpts from several especially influential commentaries published over the last fifty years (including Howe's), as well as an exercise and “Suggestions for Writing” designed to help you develop your own informed response to both the poem and its critical context.

SYLVIA PLATH

Daddy

You do not do, you do not do
 Any more, black shoe
 In which I have lived like a foot
 For thirty years, poor and white,
 5 Barely daring to breathe or Achoo.

Daddy, I have had to kill you.
 You died before I had time—
 Marble-heavy, a bag full of God,
 Ghastly statue with one gray toe¹
 10 Big as a Frisco seal

And a head in the freakish Atlantic
 Where it pours bean green over blue
 In the waters off beautiful Nauset.²
 I used to pray to recover you.
 15 Ach, du.³

In the German tongue, in the Polish town⁴
 Scraped flat by the roller
 Of wars, wars, wars.

1. Otto Plath, Sylvia's father, lost a toe to gangrene that resulted from diabetes.

2. Inlet on Cape Cod, Massachusetts. 3. Oh, you (German).

4. Otto Plath, an ethnic German, was born in Grabow, Poland.

But the name of the town is common.
 20 My Polack friend
 Says there are a dozen or two.
 So I never could tell where you
 Put your foot, your root,
 I never could talk to you.
 25 The tongue stuck in my jaw.
 It stuck in a barb wire snare.
 Ich,⁵ ich, ich, ich,
 I could hardly speak.
 I thought every German was you.
 30 And the language obscene
 An engine, an engine
 Chuffing me off like a Jew.
 A Jew to Dachau, Auschwitz, Belsen.⁶
 I began to talk like a Jew.
 35 I think I may well be a Jew.
 The snows of the Tyrol, the clear beer of Vienna⁷
 Are not very pure or true.
 With my gypsy-ancestress and my weird luck
 And my Taroc⁸ pack and my Taroc pack
 40 I may be a bit of a Jew.
 I have always been scared of you,
 With your Luftwaffe,⁹ your gobbledygoo.
 And your neat moustache
 And your Aryan¹ eye, bright blue.
 45 Panzer²-man, panzer-man, O You—
 Not God but a swastika
 So black no sky could squeak through.
 Every woman adores a Fascist,
 The boot in the face, the brute
 50 Brute heart of a brute like you.
 You stand at the blackboard, daddy,
 In the picture I have of you,
 A cleft in your chin instead of your foot
 But no less a devil for that, no not 55 Any less the black man who Bit my pretty red heart in two.
 I was ten when they buried you.
 At twenty I tried to die

5. German for "I." 6. Sites of World War II Nazi death camps.

7. The snow in the Tyrol (an Alpine region in Austria and northern Italy) is, legendarily, as pure as the beer is clear in Vienna. 8. Tarot, playing cards used mainly for fortune-telling.

9. German air force. 1. People of Germanic lineage, often blond-haired and blue-eyed.

2. Literally "panther" (German), the Nazi tank corps' term for an armored vehicle.

Sylvia Plath

Otto Plath

And get back, back, back to you.
 60 I thought even the bones would do
 But they pulled me out of the sack,
 And they stuck me together with glue.³
 And then I knew what to do.
 I made a model of you,
 65 A man in black with a Meinkampf⁴ look
 And a love of the rack and the screw.
 And I said I do, I do.
 So daddy, I'm finally through.
 The black telephone's off at the root,
 70 The voices just can't worm through.
 If I've killed one man, I've killed two—
 The vampire who said he was you
 And drank my blood for a year,
 Seven years, if you want to know.
 75 Daddy, you can lie back now.
 There's a stake in your fat black heart
 And the villagers never liked you.
 They are dancing and stamping on you.
 They always knew it was you.
 80 Daddy, daddy, you bastard, I'm through.

Preparing a Response to Critical Contexts: An Exercise

Before you read the criticism on Sylvia Plath's DADDY reprinted in this chapter, carefully read the poem itself several times. Ask all the analytical questions you have found useful in other cases: Who is speaking? to whom? when? under what conditions? What is the full situation? What kind of language does the poem use? How does the poem use metaphor? allusion? historical reference? What strategies of rhythm and sound does the poem use? What is the poem's tone? When was the poem written, and how does it reflect its time? What do you know about the person who wrote it? In what ways is this poem like others you have read by this poet or by this poet's contemporaries?

Once you have a preliminary "reading" of your own and have noted answers to these questions, look at the selections that follow. In order to come up with ideas for an essay incorporating the selections, you might follow these basic steps:

- Read each critical piece carefully and keep close track of all the things with which you agree and (even more important) disagree.
- Look specifically for information and facts that are new to you; examine and question the information carefully.
- Look for points of disagreement among the critics, make a list of the most important issues raised, and look for the parts of the poem over which disagreements occur.
- Once you have prepared your notes and absorbed some of the criticism, how do you participate in the debate about Sylvia Plath's poem? Here are some possible topics for an essay that draws on published criticism:
 - Your essay could show that others have overlooked or misinterpreted something significant. Note the sources the critics cite. Which articles or works by or about Sylvia Plath come up in more than one of the essays below? Find in your library or on the Internet a copy of the cited sources and read and interpret them in your own way.
 - Your essay could be an overview of critical trends in the study of this poem, making clear which positions you find helpful, and where your own critical position differs from others. Sort the critics into two or three groups according to their interpretation of "Daddy." Which critics place the most emphasis on Plath's psychology, personal experience, and self-expression? Which critics stress her development as a poet with a specific style? Which critics highlight her social criticism, either of anti-Semitism and the Holocaust or of sexism and women's oppression, or both? (See the section "Critical Approaches" for help identifying and describing the approaches of these critics or groups of critics.)

- In one or two sentences, write a thesis statement expressing your views on various critical approaches, such as the following:
 - Criticism of Sylvia Plath's "Daddy" has gone too far with a biographical approach, whereas myth criticism would facilitate a better understanding of the poem.
 - The life of Sylvia Plath provides a key to a reading of her poem "Daddy." As suggested by critics (including Steiner, Alvarez, and Axelrod) and biographical sources, the poem expresses violent emotional aspects of her life, including her unresolved attachment to her father, Otto Plath; her power struggle with her husband, Ted Hughes; and her suicide attempt.
 - Feminist readings of Sylvia Plath's "Daddy" have taken different approaches: Some focus on biographical evidence of Plath's experience as a woman, whereas others, such as Margaret Homans's A FEMININE TRADITION, consider a "literal" identification of the woman poet with the female speaker of the poem to be a reinforcement of the idea that women can never escape their personal, physical lives. This essay balances these feminist approaches to "Daddy," examining it as a semiautobiographical dramatic monologue: The speaker responds to some experiences Plath had as a daughter and wife, but the poem is not wholly autobiographical.

CRITICAL EXCERPTS

George Steiner

From Dying Is an Art (1967)⁵

Sylvia Plath's last poems have already passed into legend as both representative of our present tone of emotional life and unique in their implacable, harsh brilliance [. . .].

The spell does not lie wholly in the poems themselves. The suicide of Sylvia Plath at the age of thirty-one in 1963, and the personality of this young woman who had come from Massachusetts to study and live in England (where she married Ted Hughes, himself a gifted poet), are vital parts of it. To those who knew her and to the greatly enlarged circle who were electrified by her last poems and sudden death, she had come to signify the specific honesties and risks of the poet's condition. Her personal style, and the price in private harrowing she so obviously paid to achieve the intensity and candor of her principal poems, have taken on their own dramatic authority.

All this makes it difficult to judge the poems. I mean that the vehemence and intimacy of the verse is such as to constitute a very powerful rhetoric of sincerity. The poems play on our nerves with their own proud nakedness, making claims so immediate and sharply urged that the reader flinches, embarrassed by the routine discretions and evasions of his own sensibility. Yet if these poems are to take life among us, if they are to be more than exhibits in the history of modern psychological stress, they must be read with all the intelligence and scruple we can muster. They are too honest, they have cost too much, to be yielded to myth.

It requires no biographical impertinence to realize that Sylvia Plath's life was harried by bouts of physical pain, that she sometimes looked on the accumulated exactions of her own nerve and body as "a trash / To annihilate each decade."⁶ She was haunted by the piecemeal, strung-together mechanics of the flesh. [. . .] The hospital ward was her exemplary ground:

My patent leather overnight case like a black pillbox,
My husband and child smiling out of the family photo;
Their smiles catch onto my skin, little smiling hooks.⁷

This brokenness, so sharply feminine and contemporary, is, I think, her principal realization [. . .]. This new frankness of women about the specific hurts and tangles of their nervous-physiological makeup is as vital to the poetry of Sylvia Plath as it is to the tracts of Simone de Beauvoir⁸ or to the novels of Edna O'Brien and Brigit Brophy.⁹ Women speak out as never before [. . .].

Where Emily Dickinson could—indeed was obliged to—shut the door on the riot and humiliations of the flesh, thus achieving her particular dry lightness, Sylvia Plath "fully assumed her own condition." This alone would assure her of a place in modern literature. But she took one step further, assuming a burden that was not naturally or necessarily hers.

Born in Boston in 1932 of German and Austrian parents, Sylvia Plath had no personal, immediate contact with the world of the concentration camps. I may be mistaken, but so far as I know there was nothing Jewish in her background. But her last, greatest poems culminate in an act of identification, of total communion with those tortured and massacred. [Here Steiner quotes lines 31–40 of "Daddy."]

Pablo Picasso, Guernica (1937)

Sylvia Plath is only one of a number of young contemporary poets, novelists, and playwrights, themselves in no way implicated in the actual holocaust, who have done most to counter the general inclination to forget the death camps. Perhaps it is only those who had no part in the events who can focus on them rationally and imaginatively; to those who experienced the thing, it has lost the hard edges of possibility, it has stepped outside the real.

Committing the whole of her poetic and formal authority to the metaphor, to the mask of language, Sylvia Plath became a woman being transported to Auschwitz on the death trains. The notorious shards of massacre seemed to enter into her own being:

A cake of soap,
A wedding ring,
A gold filling.¹

In “Daddy” she wrote one of the very few poems I know of in any language to come near the last horror. It achieves the classic act of generalization, translating a private, obviously intolerable hurt into a code of plain statement, of instantaneously public images which concern us all. It is the “Guernica”² of modern poetry. And it is both histrionic and, in some ways, “arty,” as is Picasso’s outcry.

Are these final poems entirely legitimate? In what sense does anyone, himself uninvolved and long after the event, commit a subtle larceny when he invokes the echoes and trappings of Auschwitz and appropriates an enormity of ready emotion to his own private design? Was there latent in Sylvia Plath’s sensibility, as in that of many of us who remember only by fiat of imagination, a fearful envy, a dim resentment at not having been there, of having missed the rendezvous with hell? In “Lady Lazarus” and “Daddy” the realization seems to me so complete, the sheer rawness and control so great, that only irresistible need could have brought it off. These poems take tremendous risks, extending Sylvia Plath’s essentially austere manner to the very limit. They are a bitter triumph, proof of the capacity of poetry to give to reality the greater permanence of the imagined. She could not return from them.

A. Alvarez

*From Sylvia Plath (1968)*³

The reasons for Sylvia Plath's images are always there, though sometimes you have to work hard to find them. She is, in short, always in intelligent control of her feelings. Her work bears out her theories:

I think my poems come immediately out of the sensuous and emotional experiences I have, but I must say I cannot sympathise with these cries from the heart that are informed by nothing except a needle or a knife or whatever it is. I believe that one should be able to control and manipulate experiences, even the most terrifying—like madness, being tortured, this kind of experience—and one should be able to manipulate these experiences with an informed and intelligent mind. I think that personal experience shouldn't be a kind of shut box and mirror-looking narcissistic experience. I believe it should be generally relevant, to such things as Hiroshima and Dachau, and so on.

It seems to me that it was only by her determination both to face her most inward and terrifying experiences and to use her intelligence in doing so—so as not to be overwhelmed by them—that she managed to write these extraordinary last poems, which are at once deeply autobiographical and yet detached, generally relevant.

[. . .] She assumes the suffering of all the modern victims. Above all, she becomes an imaginary Jew. I think this is a vitally important element in her work. For two reasons. First, because anyone whose subject is suffering has a ready-made modern example of hell on earth in the concentration camps. And what matters in them is not so much the physical torture—since sadism is general and perennial—but the way modern, as it were industrial, techniques can be used to destroy utterly the human identity. [. . .] This anonymity of pain, which makes all dignity impossible, was Sylvia Plath's subject. Second, she seemed convinced, in these last poems, that the root of her suffering was the death of her father, whom she loved, who abandoned her, and who dragged her after him into death. And in her fantasies her father was pure German, pure Aryan, pure anti-semitic.

It all comes together in the most powerful of her last poems, "Daddy," about which she wrote the following bleak note:

The poem is spoken by a girl with an Electra complex. Her father died while she thought he was God. Her case is complicated by the fact that her father was also a Nazi and her mother very possibly part Jewish. In the daughter the two strains marry and paralyse each other—she has to act out the awful little allegory once over before she is free of it.⁴

3. A. Alvarez. "Sylvia Plath." Beyond All This Fiddle, Penguin, 1968, pp. 56–57.

4. From the introductory notes to "New Poems," a reading prepared for the BBC Third Programme but never broadcast [Alvarez's note]. "Electra complex" is the psychoanalytic term for a girl's sense of competition with her mother for her father's affection, coined by Carl Jung (1875–1961) and alluding to the eponymous heroine of Sophocles's tragedy Electra. In the play, Electra and her brother conspire to kill their mother to avenge the murder of their father.

[. . .] What comes through most powerfully, I think, is the terrible unforgivingness of her verse, the continual sense not so much of violence—although there is a good deal of that—as of violent resentment that this should have been done to her. What she does in the poem is, with a weird detachment, to turn the violence against herself so as to show that she can equal her oppressors with her self-inflicted oppression. And this is the strategy of the concentration camps. When suffering is there whatever you do, by inflicting it upon yourself you achieve your identity, you set yourself free.

Yet the tone of the poem, like its psychological mechanisms, is not single or simple, and she uses a great deal of skill to keep it complex. Basically, her trick is to tell this horror story in a verse form as insistently jaunty and ritualistic as a nursery rhyme. And this helps her to maintain towards all the protagonists—her father, her husband and herself—a note of hard and sardonic anger, as though she were almost amused that her own suffering should be so extreme, so grotesque. [. . .] When she first read me the poem a few days after she wrote it, she called it a piece of “light verse.” It obviously isn’t, yet equally obviously it also isn’t the racking personal confession that a mere description or précis of it might make it sound.

Yet neither is it unchangingly vindictive or angry. The whole poem works on one single, returning note and rhyme, echoing from start to finish:

You do not do, you do not do . . .
 . . . I used to pray to recover you.
 Ach, du . . .

There is a kind of cooing tenderness in this which complicates the other, more savage note of resentment. It brings in an element of pity, less for herself and her own suffering than for the person who made her suffer. Despite everything, “Daddy” is a love poem.

Irving Howe

*From The Plath Celebration: A Partial Dissent (1973)*⁵

Sylvia Plath’s most famous poem, adored by many sons and daughters, is “Daddy.” It is a poem with an affecting theme, the feelings of the speaker as she regathers the pain of her father’s premature death and her persuasion that he has betrayed her by dying:

I was ten when they buried you.
 At twenty I tried to die
 And get back, back, back to you.

In the poem Sylvia Plath identifies the father (we recall his German birth) with the Nazis (“Panzer-man, panzer-man, O You”) and flares out with assaults

5. Irving Howe. “The Plath Celebration: A Partial Dissent.” 1973. The Critical Point of Literature and Culture, Horizon, 1977, pp. 231–33. All footnotes have been added by the editor.

for which nothing in the poem (nor, so far as we know, in Sylvia Plath's own life) offers any warrant: "A cleft in your chin instead of your foot / But no less a devil for that. . . ." Nor does anything in the poem offer warrant, other than the free-flowing hysteria of the speaker, for the assault of such lines as, "There's a stake in your fat black heart / And the villagers never liked you." [. . .]

What we have here is a revenge fantasy, feeding upon filial love-hatred, and thereby mostly of clinical interest. But seemingly aware that the merely clinical can't provide the materials for a satisfying poem, Sylvia Plath tries to enlarge upon the personal plight, give meaning to the personal outcry, by fancying the girl as victim of a Nazi father: "An engine, an engine / Chuffing me off like a Jew. . . ."

The more sophisticated admirers of this poem may say that I fail to see it as a dramatic presentation, a monologue spoken by a disturbed girl not necessarily to be identified with Sylvia Plath, despite the similarities of detail between the events of the poem and the events of her life. I cannot accept this view. The personal-confessional element, strident and undisciplined, is simply too obtrusive to suppose the poem no more than a dramatic picture of a certain style of disturbance. If, however, we did accept such a reading of "Daddy," we would fatally narrow its claims to emotional or moral significance, for we would be confining it to a mere vivid imagining of a pathological state. That, surely, is not how its admirers really take the poem.

It is clearly not how the critic George Steiner takes the poem when he calls it "the 'Guernica' of modern poetry." But then, in an astonishing turn, he asks: "In what sense does anyone, himself uninvolved and long after the event, commit a subtle larceny when he invokes the echoes and trappings of Auschwitz and appropriates an enormity of ready emotion to his own private design?" The question is devastating to his early comparison with "Guernica." Picasso's painting objectifies the horrors of Guernica,⁶ through the distancing of art; no one can suppose that he shares or participates in them. Plath's poem aggrandizes on the "enormity of ready emotion" invoked by references to the concentration camps, in behalf of an ill-controlled if occasionally brilliant outburst. There is something monstrous, utterly disproportionate, when tangled emotions about one's father are deliberately compared with the historical fate of the European Jews; something sad, if the comparison is made spontaneously. "Daddy" persuades once again, through the force of negative example, of how accurate T. S. Eliot was in saying, "The more perfect the artist, the more completely separate in him will be the man who suffers and the mind which creates."⁷

Judith Kroll

*From Rituals of Exorcism: "Daddy" (1976)*⁸

Poems explicitly about the protagonist's father, read in order of composition, show that the attitude toward him evolves from nostalgic mournfulness, regret, and guilt, to resentment and a bitter resolve to break his hold on her. [. . .]

The recital of the myth in "Daddy" ends in a ritual intended to cancel the earlier "sacred marriage" which has suffocated her:

You do not do, you do not do
Any more, black shoe
In which I have lived like a foot
For thirty years, poor and white,
Barely daring to breathe or Achoo.⁹

In this image of passive and victimized domesticity, the speaker implicitly compares her past self to the "old woman who lived in a shoe" who "didn't know what to do"; now, however, she makes it clear that she does know what to do.

As a preamble to the exorcism, [. . .] Daddy must be cast in this new light, transformed from god to devil, if he is to be successfully expelled, but there must also be some real basis for it. To be effectively exposed, he must first appear as godly. But the speaker soon shows that she now attributes his godliness in part to his authoritarianism and personal inaccessibility—qualities which became intensified through his death, and which later became transferred to "a model of you"—her husband. [. . .] Loving a man literally or metaphorically dead [. . .] becomes a kind of persecution or punishment; and so, by the end of the incantation, Daddy deserves to be cast out. The "black telephone . . . off at the root," conveys the finality of the intended exorcism.

The "venomousness," ambiguous from the beginning, is not the whole story. "Daddy" is not primarily a poem of "father-hatred" or abuse as Robert Lowell, Elizabeth Hardwick, and others have contended. The need for exorcising her father's ghost lies, after all, in the extremity of her attachment to him. Alvarez very justly remarks that [. . .] "'Daddy' is a love poem."¹ [. . .] The love is not merely conveyed by the rhythm and sound of the poem, it is a necessary part of the poem's meaning, a part of the logic of its act.

The exorcism serves another purpose because through it she attempts to reject the pattern of being abandoned and made to suffer by a god, a man who is "chock-full of power": she creates "a model of you"—an image of her father—and marries this proxy. Then she kills both father and husband at once, magically

9. When Plath introduced "Daddy" as being about "a girl with an Electra complex" (with, in effect, the female version of an Oedipus complex), she gave a clue to what may be a play on words in the poem. "Oedipus" means "swell-foot," and therefore the speaker's identification of herself as a "foot" may be a private way of saying "I am Oedipus" and incorporating into the poem an allusion to the Electra complex.

1. Alvarez, "Sylvia Plath" [see pp. 1080–81].

using each as the other's representative.² Each death entails that of the other: the stake in her father's heart also kills the "vampire who said he was you"; and the killing of her marriage (for which she now claims to take responsibility, as she does for having allowed her marriage to perpetuate, by proxy, her relationship to her father) finally permits Daddy to "lie back." The marriage to and killing of her father by proxy are acts of what Frazer³ calls "sympathetic magic," in which "things act on each other at a distance through a secret sympathy." [. . .]

Plath was familiar with and used such ideas. [. . .] The notion that "as the image suffers, so does the man"—affecting the real subject through a proxy—nicely describes marriage to a model of Daddy, and explains why "If I've killed one man, I've killed two." The earlier attempt of the speaker in "Daddy" to recover her father also involved sympathetic magic; she had tried to rejoin him by dying and becoming like him:

At twenty I tried to die
And get back, back, back to you.

She finally exorcises her father as if he were a scapegoat invested with the evils of her spoiled history. Frazer's discussion of rituals in which the dying god is also a scapegoat is germane here. He conjectures that two originally separate rituals merged. [. . .] The father in "Daddy" may well be described as such a divine scapegoat figure.

*From A Feminine Tradition (1982)*⁹

The current belief in a literal “I” present in poetry is responsible for the popular superstition that Sylvia Plath’s death was the purposeful completion of her poetry’s project, the assumption being that if the speaker is precisely the same as the biographical Plath, the poetry’s self-destructive violence is directed toward Plath herself, not toward an imagined speaker. This reading of Plath is unfair to the woman and, by calling it merely unmediated self-expression, obscures her poetry’s real power. In poem after poem depicting or wishing for physical violence, the imagery of violence is part of a symmetrical figurative system, and death is figured as a way of achieving rebirth or some other transcendence.¹ Plath’s project may not thus be very different from that of Dickinson, who speaks quite often from beyond the grave, reimagining and repossessing death as her own in order to dispel the terrors of literal death. However, within that figurative system the poet embraces a self-destructive program that must soon have been poetically terminal, even if it did not bring about the actual death.

1. I am indebted here, for their persuasively positive readings of Plath, to Judith Kroll, Chapters in a Mythology: The Poetry of Sylvia Plath (New York: Harper & Row, 1976), and to Stacy Pies, “Coming Clear of the Shadow: The Poetry of Sylvia Plath,” unpublished essay (Yale University, 1979) [Homans’s note].

Several of Plath's late poems come to terms with a father figure (who may include the poetic fathers she acknowledges in The Colossus), whose crime, no different from that identified by nineteenth-century women, is of attempting to transform the feminine self into objects.

"Daddy" uses Nazi imagery to make the same accusation about objectification brought against men as oppressors in "Lady Lazarus" and makes the corollary accusation against the father (and the husband modelled after him) that objectification has silenced her: "I never could talk to you./ . . . I could hardly speak." In this context defiance and retribution take the form of her speaking, but again this counterattack is counterproductive. Punning on the expression "being through" to mean both establishing a telephone connection and being finished, she at once makes and conclusively severs communication:

So daddy, I'm finally through.
The black telephone's off at the root,
The voices just can't worm through.

The poem concludes, "Daddy, daddy, you bastard, I'm through." Suppressing the power of the one who silenced her, she simultaneously returns herself to the silence that the poem came into being to protest.

Pamela J. Annas

*From A Disturbance in Mirrors: The Poetry of Sylvia Plath (1988)*²

The particular sexual metaphor in "Daddy" is sado-masochism, which stands for the authority structure of a patriarchal and war-making society. [. . .] "Daddy" is an analysis of the structure of the society in which the individual is enmeshed. Intertwined with the image of sadist and masochist in "Daddy" is a parallel image of vampire and victim. In "Daddy," father, husband, and a larger patriarchal and competitive authority structure, which the speaker of the poem sees as having been responsible for the various imperialisms of the twentieth century, all melt together and become demonic, finally a gigantic vampire figure. In the modulation from one image to another to form an accumulated image that is characteristic of many of Plath's late poems, the male figure at the center of "Daddy" takes four major forms: the statue, the Gestapo officer, the professor, and the vampire. The poem begins, however, with an image of a black shoe, an image which, like the black shoe in "The Munich Mannequins" and like the black suit in "The Applicant," can be seen to stand for corporate man. The second stanza of the poem refers back to the title poem of The Colossus, where the speaker's father, representative of a gigantic male other, so dominated her world that her horizon was bounded by his scattered pieces. [. . .] Here the image of her father, grown larger than the earlier Colossus of Rhodes, stretches across and subsumes the whole of the United States, from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean.

The next seven stanzas of “Daddy” construct the image of the Gestapo officer, using her family background—her parents were both of German origin—to mediate between her personal sense of suffocation and the social history of the Nazi invasions. The black shoe of the first stanza in which she says she has been wedged like a foot “barely daring to breathe” becomes in stanza ten, at the end of the Nazi section, a larger social image of suffocation: “Not God but a swastika / So black no sky could squeak through.” The Gestapo figure recurs briefly three stanzas later as the speaker of the poem transfers the image from father to husband and incidentally suggests that the victim has some control in a brutalized association—at least to the extent she chooses to be there.³ “I made a model of you, . . . And I said I do, I do.” The Gestapo figure becomes “Herr Professor” in stanza eleven, an actual image of Plath’s father, and also an image of what has for centuries been seen as the prototypical and even ideal relationship between a man and a woman.⁴ The professor, who is a man, talks and is active; the woman, who is a student, listens and is passive. [. . .] But Plath places this image between the images of Nazi/Jew and vampire/victim so that it becomes the center of a series. Indeed, the image of daddy as teacher turns almost immediately into a devil/demon/vampire. [. . .]

The last two stanzas of “Daddy” are like the conclusion of “Lady Lazarus” in their assertion that the speaker of the poem is breaking out of the cycle and that, in order to do so, she must turn on and kill Herr God, Herr Lucifer in the one poem, and Daddy in his final metamorphosis as vampire in the other poem [. . .].

The cycle of victim/vampire is, left alone, a closed and repetitious cycle, like the repeated suicides of “Lady Lazarus.” According to the legends and the Hollywood film versions of these legends we all grew up on, once consumed by a vampire, one dies and is reborn a vampire and preys upon others, who in their turn die and become vampires. The vampire imagery in Sylvia Plath’s poetry intersects on one level with her World War II imagery and its exploitation and victimization and on another level intersects with her images of a bureaucratic, fragmented, and dead—in the sense of numbed and unaware—society. The connections are sometimes confused, but certainly World War II is often imaged in her poetry as a kind of grisly, vampiric feast. [. . .]

The whole of “Daddy” is an exorcism to banish the demon, put a stake through the vampire’s heart, and thus break the cycle of vampire → victim. It is crucial to the poem that the exorcism is accomplished through communal Judith Lewis Herman, in Father-Daughter Incest (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1981), discusses the history of the suppression of incest beginning with Freud and continuing into contemporary psychological literature, the attribution of reports of incest to hysterical female oedipal fantasizing or, when the fact of incest is impossible to deny, assigning blame to the victim: what Herman calls the Seductive Daughter and/or the Collusive Mother (Chapter 1, “A Common Occurrence”). Writing in the early 1960s and familiar with some of these attitudes, [. . .] Plath assigns some culpability to the victim.

action by the “villagers.” The rhythm of the poem is powerfully and deliberately primitive: a child’s chant, a formal curse. The hard sounds, short lines, and repeated rhymes of “do,” “you,” “Jew,” and “through” give a hard pounding quality to the poem that is close to the sound of a heart beat. [. . .]

Purity, which is what exorcism aims at, is for Plath an ambiguous concept. On the one hand it means integrity of self, wholeness rather than fragmentation, an unspoiled state of being, rest, perfection, aesthetic beauty, and loss of self through transformation into some reborn other. On the other hand, it also means absence, isolation, blindness, a kind of autism which shuts out the world, stasis and death, and a loss of self through dispersal into some other. In “Lady Lazarus” and “Fever 103°” the emphasis is on exorcising the poet’s previous selves, though within a social context that makes that unlikely. “Daddy,” however, is a purification of the world; in “Daddy” it is the various avatars of the other—the male figure who represents the patriarchal society she lives in—that are being exorcised. [. . .] The more the speaker of the poems defines her situation as desperate, the more violent and vengeful becomes the agent of purification and transformation.

From Sylvia Plath: The Wound and the Cure of Words (1990)⁵

Although this poem too [“Daddy”] has traditionally been read as “personal” (Aird 78) or “confessional” (M. L. Rosenthal 82), Margaret Homans has more recently suggested that it concerns a woman’s dislocated relations to speech (Women Writers 220–21). Plath herself introduced it on the BBC as the opposite of confession, as a constructed fiction: “Here is a poem spoken by a girl with an Electra complex. [. . .]” (CP 293).⁶ [. . .] However we interpret Plath’s preface, we must agree that “Daddy” is dramatic and allegorical, since its details depart freely from the facts of her biography. In this poem she [. . .] figures her unresolved conflicts with paternal authority as a textual issue. Significantly, her father was a published writer, and his successor, her husband, was also a writer. Her preface asserts that the poem concerns a young woman’s paralyzing self-division, which she can defeat only through allegorical representation. Recalling that paralysis was one of Plath’s main tropes for literary incapacity, we begin to see that the poem evokes the female poet’s anxiety of authorship and specifically Plath’s strategy of delivering herself from that anxiety by making it the topic of her discourse. Viewed from this perspective, “Daddy” enacts the woman poet’s struggle with “daddy-poetry.” It represents her effort to reject the “buried male muse” from her invention process and the “jealous gods” from her audience (J 223; CP 179).⁷

Plath wrote “Daddy” several months after Hughes left her, on the day she learned that he had agreed to a divorce (October 12, 1962). George Brown and Tirril Harris have shown that early loss makes one especially vulnerable to subsequent loss (Bowly 250–59), and Plath seems to have defended against depression by almost literally throwing herself into her poetry. She followed “Daddy” with a host of poems that she considered her greatest achievement to date: “Medusa,” “The Jailer,” “Lady Lazarus,” “Ariel,” the bee sequence, and others. The letters she wrote to her mother and brother on the day of “Daddy,” and then again four days later, brim with a sense of artistic self-discovery: “Writing like mad. . . . Terrific stuff, as if domesticity had choked me” (LH 466).⁸ Composing at the “still blue, almost eternal hour before the baby’s cry, before the glassy music of the milkman, setting his bottles” (quoted in Alvarez, Savage God 21), she experienced an “enormous” surge in creative energy (LH 467). [. . .] she wrote “Daddy” to demonstrate the existence of her voice, which had been silent or subservient for so long. She wrote it to prove her “genius” (LH 468).

Plath projected her struggle for textual identity onto the figure of a partly Jewish young woman who learns to express her anger at the patriarch and at his language of male mastery, which is as foreign to her as German, as “obscene” as murder (st. 6),⁹ and as meaningless as “gobbledygo” (st. 9). [. . .] At a basic level, “Daddy” concerns its own violent, transgressive birth as a text, its origin in a culture that regards it as illegitimate—a judgment the speaker hurls back on the patriarch himself when she labels him a bastard (st. 16). Plath’s unaccommodating worldview, which was validated by much in her childhood and adult experience, led her to understand literary tradition not as an expanding universe of beneficial influence [. . .] but as a closed universe in which every addition required a corresponding subtraction [. . .]. If Plath’s speaker was to be born as a poet, a patriarch must die.

As in “The Colossus,” the father here appears as a force or an object rather than as a person. Initially he takes the form of an immense “black shoe,” capable of stamping on his victim (st. 1). Immediately thereafter he becomes a marble “statue” (st. 2) [. . .]. He then transforms into Nazi Germany (st. 6–7, 9–10), the archetypal totalitarian state. [. . .] Eventually the father declines in stature from God (st. 2) to a devil (st. 11) to a dying vampire (st. 15). Perhaps he shrinks under the force of his victim’s denunciation, which de-creates him as a power as it creates him as a figure. But whatever his size, he never assumes human dimensions, aspirations, and relations—except when posing as a teacher in a photograph (st. 11). Like the colossus, he remains figurative and symbolic, not individual.

[. . . Unlike the father figure in “The Colossus,”] “Daddy” remains silent, apart from the gobbledygo attributed to him once (st. 9). He uses his mouth primarily for biting and for drinking blood. The poem emphasizes his feet and, implicitly, his phallus. He is a “black shoe” (st. 1), a statue with “one gray toe” (st. 2), a “boot” (st. 10). [. . . the speaker] is herself silenced by his shoe: “I never could talk to you” (st. 5). Daddy is [. . .] a male censor. His boot in the face of “every woman” is presumably lodged in her mouth (st. 10). He stands for all the elements in the literary situation and in the female ephebe's¹ internalization of it, that prevent her from producing any words at all, even copied or subservient ones. Appropriately, Daddy can be killed only by being stamped on: he lives and dies by force, not language. If "The Colossus" tells a tale of the patriarch's speech, [. . .] "Daddy" tells a tale of the daughter's effort to speak.

Thus we are led to another important difference between the two poems. The "I" of "The Colossus" acquires her identity only through serving her "father," whereas the "I" of "Daddy" actuates her gift only through opposition to him. The later poem precisely inscribes the plot of Plath's dream novel of 1958: "a girl's search for the dead father—for an outside authority which must be developed, instead, from the inside" (J 258). As the child of a Nazi, the girl could "hardly speak" (st. 6), but as a Jew she begins "to talk" and to acquire an identity (st. 7). In Plath's allegory, the outsider Jew corresponds to "the rebel, the artist, the odd" (JP 55),² and particularly to the woman artist. Otto Rank's Beyond Psychology, which had a lasting influence on her, explicitly compares women to Jews, since "woman . . . has suffered from the very beginning a fate similar to that of the Jew, namely, suppression, slavery, confinement, and subsequent persecution" (287–88). Rank, whose discourse I would consider tainted by anti-Semitism, argues that Jews speak a language [. . .] that differs essentially from the language of the majority cultures in which they find themselves (191, 281–84). He analogously [. . .] argues that woman speaks in a language different from man's, and that as a result of man's denial of woman's world, "woman's 'native tongue' has hitherto been unknown or at least unheard" (248). [. . .] his idea of linguistic difference based on gender and his analogy between Jewish and female speech seem to have embedded themselves in the substructure of "Daddy" (and in many of Plath's other texts as well). For Plath, as later for Adrienne Rich, the Holocaust and the patriarchy's silencing of women were linked outcomes of the masculinist interpretation of the world. Political insurrection and female self-assertion also interlaced symbolically. In "Daddy," Plath's speaker finds her voice and motive by identifying herself as antithetical to her Fascist father. [. . .] Previously devoted to the patriarch—both in "The Colossus" and in memories evoked in "Daddy" of trying to "get back" to him (st. 12)—she now seeks only to escape from him and to see him destroyed.

Plath has unleashed the anger, normal in mourning as well as in revolt, that she suppressed in the earlier poem. But she has done so at a cost. Let us consider her childlike speaking voice. The language of "Daddy," beginning with its title, is often regressive. The "I" articulates herself by moving backwards in time, using the language of nursery rhymes and fairy tales (the little old woman who lived in a shoe, the black man of the forest). Such language accords with a child's conception of the world, not an adult's. Plath's assault on the language of "daddy-poetry" has turned inward, on the language of her own poem, which teeters precariously on the edge of a preverbal abyss—represented by the eerie, keening "oo" sound with which a majority of the verses end. And then let us consider the play on "through" at the poem's conclusion. Although that last line allows for multiple readings, one interpretation is that the "I" has unconsciously carried out her father's wish: her discourse, by transforming itself into cathartic oversimplifications, has undone itself.

Yet the poem does contain its verbal violence by means more productive than silence. In a letter to her brother, Plath referred to “Daddy” as “gruesome” (LH 472), while on almost the same day she described it to A. Alvarez as a piece of “light verse” (Alvarez, Beyond 56). She later read it on the BBC in a highly ironic tone of voice. The poem’s unique spell derives from its rhetorical complexity: its variegated and perhaps bizarre fusion of the horrendous and the comic. As [Margaret] Uroff has remarked, it both shares and remains detached from the fixation of its protagonist (159). [. . .] Plath’s speaker uses potentially self-mocking melodramatic terms to describe both her opponent (“so black no sky could squeak through” [st. 10]) and herself (“poor and while” [st. 1]). While this aboriginal speaker quite literally expresses black-and-white thinking, her civilized double possesses a sensibility sophisticated enough to subject such thinking to irony. Thus the poem expresses feelings that it simultaneously parodies—it may be parodying the very idea of feeling. The tension between erudition and simplicity in the speaker’s voice appears in her pairings that juxtapose adult with childlike diction: “breathe or Achoo,” “your Luftwaffe, your gobbledygoo” (st. 1, 9). She can expound on such adult topics as Taroc packs, Viennese beer, and Tyrolean snowfall; can specify death camps by name; and can employ an adult vocabulary of “recover,” “ancestress,” “Aryan,” “Meinkampf,” “obscene,” and “bastard.” Yet she also has recourse to a more primitive lexicon that includes “chuffing,” “your black heart,” and “my pretty red heart.” She proves herself capable of careful intellectual discriminations (“so I never could tell” [st. 5]), conventionalized description (“beautiful Nauset” [st. 3]), and moral analogy (“if I’ve killed one man, I’ve killed two” [st. 15]), while also exhibiting regressive fantasies (vampires), repetitions (“wars, wars, wars” [st. 4]), and inarticulateness (“panzer-man, panzer-man, O You—” [st. 9]). She oscillates between calm reflection (“You stand at the blackboard, daddy, / In the picture I have of you” [st. 11]) and mad incoherence (“Ich, ich, ich, ich” [st. 6]). Her sophisticated language puts her wild language in an ironic perspective, removing the discourse from the control of the archaic self who understands experience only in extreme terms.

The ironies in “Daddy” proliferate in unexpected ways, however. When the speaker proclaims categorically that “every woman adores a Fascist” (st. 10), she is subjecting her victimization to irony by suggesting that sufferers choose, or at least accommodate themselves to, their suffering. But she is also subjecting her authority to irony, since her claim about “every woman” is transparently false. It simply parodies patriarchal commonplaces, such as those advanced by Helene Deutsch concerning “feminine masochism” (192–99, 245–85). [. . .] Plath’s mother wished that Plath would write about “decent, courageous people” (LH 477), and she herself heard an inner voice demanding that she be a perfect “paragon” in her language and feeling (J 176). But in the speaker of “Daddy,” she inscribed the opposite of such a paragon: a divided self whose veneer of civilization is breached and infected by unhealthy instincts.

Plath’s irony cuts both ways. At the same time that the speaker’s sophisticated voice undercuts her childish voice, reducing its melodrama to comedy, the childish or maddened voice undercuts the pretensions of the sophisticated voice, revealing the extremity of suffering masked by its ironies. While demonstrating the inadequacy of thinking and feeling in opposites, the poem implies that such a mode can locate truths denied more complex cognitive and affective systems. The very moderation of the normal adult intelligence, its tolerance of ambiguity, its defenses against the primal energies of the id, results in falsification. Reflecting Schiller's³ idea that the creative artist experiences a "momentary and passing madness" (quoted by Freud in a passage of The Interpretation of Dreams [193] that Plath underscored), "Daddy" gives voice to that madness. Yet the poem's sophisticated awareness, its comic vision, probably wins out in the end, since the poem concludes by curtailing the power of its extreme discourse [. . .]. Furthermore, Plath distanced herself from the poem's aboriginal voice by introducing her text as "a poem spoken by a girl with an Electra complex"—that is, as a study of the girl's pathology rather than her father's—and as an allegory that will "free" her from that pathology. She also distanced herself by reading the poem in a tone that emphasized its irony. And finally, she distanced herself by laying the poem's wild voice permanently to rest after October. The aboriginal vision was indeed purged. "Daddy" represents not Dickinson's madness that is divinest sense,⁴ but rather an entry into a style of discourse and a mastery of it. [. . .]

Plath's poetic revolt in "Daddy" liberated her pent-up creativity, but the momentary success sustained her little more than self-sacrifice had done. "Daddy" became another stage in her development, an unrepeatably experiment, a vocal opening that closed itself at once. The poem is not an elegy for the power of "daddy-poetry" but for the powers of speech Plath discovered in composing it.

When we consider "Daddy" generically, a further range of implications presents itself. Although we could profitably consider the poem as the dramatic monologue Plath called it in her BBC broadcast, let us regard it instead as the kind of poem most readers have taken it to be: a domestic poem. [. . .] I shall define the domestic poem as one that represents and comments on a protagonist's relationship to one or more family members, usually a parent, child, or spouse. To focus our discussion even further, I shall emphasize poetry that specifically concerns a father.

In the 1950s the "domestic poem" proper appeared on the scene, with its own conventions and expectations, and with its own complex cultural and literary reasons for being. Perhaps [. . .] its precise timing depended on a reaction against modernism's aesthetic of impersonality.⁵ Theodore Roethke wrote several early poems that initiated the genre: "My Papa's Waltz" (1948), "The Lost Son" (1948), and "Where Knock Is Open Wide" (1951). [Robert] Lowell's "Life Studies" sequence (1959) was, and is, the genre's most prominent landmark. [. . .] In all these poems, the parent-child relationship serves as a locus for psychological investigation. In many of them it also serves as a means of representing the acquisition of poetic identity and of exploring the bounds of textuality itself. [. . .] The

5. In "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919), modernist poet T. S. Eliot articulates an "impersonal theory of poetry," arguing, "the more perfect the artist, the more completely separate in him will be the man who suffers and the mind which creates."

“domestic poem” became a system of signs in which each individual text’s adherence to the system and deviations within the system produced its particular literary meaning.

During Plath’s trying time of 1958–59 [. . .] she struggled [. . .] to “break into a new line of poetry” (J 321). As always, her method was to “read others and think hard” (J 302). The two male poets she read most intently, the two who most instructed her, were Roethke and Lowell.

In 1959 [when she attended Lowell’s Boston University poetry courses] Plath did not consciously attempt to write in the domestic poem genre, perhaps because she was not yet ready to assume her majority. [. . .] But by fall 1962, when she had already lost so much, she was ready to chance tackling poetic tradition, and specifically her chief male instructors, Roethke and Lowell. In “Daddy” she achieved her victory in two ways. First, as we have seen, she symbolically assaults a father figure who is identified with male control of language. All her anxiety of influence comes to the fore in the poem: her sense of belatedness, her awareness of constraint, her fears of inadequacy, her furious need to overcome her dependency, her guilt at her own aggressivity. Since the precursors “do not do / Any more” (st. 1), she wishes to escape their paralyzing influence and to empty the “bag full of God” that has kept her tongue stuck in her jaw for so long (st. 2, 5). The father whose power she attacks is not simply Roethke or Lowell, or even Hughes or Otto Plath, but a literary character who includes reference to all of them as categories of masculine authority. [. . .]

In addition to killing the father in its fictional plot, the poem seeks to discredit the forefathers through its status as poetic act. Taking a genre established by Roethke and Lowell, “Daddy” fundamentally alters it through antithesis and parody. Like all strong poems, it transforms its genre and therefore the way we perceive the precursive examples [. . .]. Her poem attempts to conclude the genre, to represent the final possible stroke, or at the very least to inaugurate some new and important genre, of which the whole domestic genre was but a foreshadowing.

This point comes clearer if we compare “Daddy” with two analogues, Roethke’s “The Lost Son” (1948) and Lowell’s “Commander Lowell” (1959). In the Freudian drama of “The Lost Son,” the protagonist subjectively relives his childhood fears and fantasies. Like the speaker of the companion piece, “My Papa’s Waltz,” he is still enmeshed in the family romance, remembering the father ambivalently as powerful, protective, and threatening. After locating himself at his father’s grave, where he feels both grief and estrangement [. . .], he descends into his unconscious, seeking, as Roethke later explained, “some clue to existence” (Poet 38). He encounters his death wish, his memory of his father as “Father Fear,” his sexual anxieties, and finally the “dark swirl” of a blackout, after which a childhood memory of his “Papa” shouting “order” in German returns him to consciousness. Although the figure of “Papa” blends earthly and heavenly father (Poet 39), he also symbolizes the superego, restoring order to a psyche and a poem that had fallen into chaos. At the poem’s conclusion, as the “lost son” waits for his “understandable spirit” to revive, he appears to be purged, though not cured, of the conflicts that incapacitated him.

The speaker of "Commander Lowell," in contrast, is objective, precise, and witty. His discourse reflects a detached perspective on the past rather than a psychic reimmersion in it. He portrays his father as one who threatened him only through weakness. This father "was nothing to shout / about to the summer colony at 'Matt'"; took "four shots with his putter to sink his putt"; sang "Anchors Aweigh" in the bathtub; was fired from his job; and squandered his inheritance. Whereas Roethke's poem represents a cathartic experience, Lowell's converts chaotic feelings into intellectual irony. Whereas Roethke's poem can be read as an allegory of man's relationship to God or as a model of the Freudian psyche, Lowell's remains a realistic narrative, though it does suggest the cultural and financial decline of a social class.

Plath's poem combines features of both of these precursors: Roethke's evocation of a German-speaking authoritarian with Lowell's sarcastic deflation of a man without qualities; Roethke's subjective anguish with Lowell's social comedy. Like Roethke's Papa, Plath's title character is an intimidating patriarch; like Lowell's Father, he is a buffoon ("big as a Frisco seal"). Finally, Plath's poem, like those of her predecessors, has little to do with psychological cure: the speaker's defenses remain in place. But in a deeper sense, "Daddy" swerves sharply from its precursors, curtailing their power. It turns the psychological depth of Roethke's poem and the ironically detached surface of Lowell's poem into a fury of denunciation, an extravagance of emotion, an exaggeration of acts and effects, perhaps revealing the subtexts of both precursors. [. . .] It unmasks Roethke's implicitly oppressive father figure as a monster and Lowell's sophisticated comedy as slapstick. It transforms the domestic genre alternately into a horror show, encapsulating every political, cultural, and familial atrocity of the age, and a theater of cruelty, evoking nervous laughter. "Daddy" takes the genre as far as it can go—and then further.

[. . . N]either poet [Roethke or Lowell] moved significantly in the directions suggested by "Daddy" [in their subsequent poems . . .] But Lowell confessed a feeling of defeat in his foreword to [Plath's] Ariel, and perhaps that confession has general application: "There is a peculiar, haunting challenge to these poems . . . in her lines, I often hear the serpent whisper, 'Come, if only you had the courage, you too could have my rightness, audacity and ease of inspiration'"(x).

From “Every Woman Adores a Fascist”: Feminist Visions of Fascism from Three Guineas to Fear of Flying (2000)⁶

Throughout the 50s and 60s, the scenario of the fascist leader and his mesmerized followers was commonly interpreted as a gendered sadomasochistic encounter between a male leader and the collectively feminized “masses.”⁷ When Max Horkheimer and Theodor W. Adorno⁸ sought an analogy by which to describe totalitarianism, they echoed Reich’s⁹ assumption that women are particularly constitutionally susceptible to the tyrant’s libidinal allure:

Just as women adore the unmoved paranoiac, so nations genuflect before totalitarian Fascism [. . .] (Dialectic of Enlightenment 191)

Given the gendered assumptions underpinning these and so many early theories of fascism, it is not surprising that fascism came to be a recurring term in feminist discourse. Countering the notion that women are drawn to subjugation, post-war feminism developed an analogy that posed fascism as a correlative of patriarchy: an exaggerated but related form of male domination. Likewise, Kate Millet's Sexual Politics (1970) represents fascist ideology as "the most deliberate attempt ever made to revive and solidify extreme patriarchal conditions" (159) by dissolving existing women's groups, turning back the clock on women's participation in higher education and the workplace, banning abortion, preventing distribution of contraceptives, and reinstating separate spheres for men and women.

THE DIALECTIC OF "DADDY"

Sylvia Plath's snarling declaration, in her 1962 poem "Daddy," that

Every woman adores a Fascist,
The boot in the face, the brute
Brute heart of a brute like you (Ariel, 50)

is as much a part of the Plath mythology as her gas-oven suicide that mirrored the imagery of the Holocaust in her poems. Although references to fascism and the Holocaust appear in only a handful of her poems, they loom large in Plath criticism and pose problems for feminist readings. Her poems bring together at a heated pitch both terms of [the] fascism/patriarchy analogy [found in other feminist discourse]; however, in "Daddy" and elsewhere, the speaker's relationship to both terms is highly conflicted, with equal measures of resistance and desire.

Fascism signifies a series of opposites for Plath: subjugation and oppression, control and freedom, sadism and masochism, and hate and love. These pairs are typically polarized by gender: Daddy and his daughter who sees herself as a Jew, and Herr Doktor and Lady Lazarus. However, Plath's female speakers identify with both the Jewish victim (although by no means were all the victims of the Holocaust Jewish, they are generally so in Plath's work) and the Nazi torturer. Beneath the speaker's bitter hatred for the "Panzer-man" in "Daddy" is a strong connection between the two. A. Alvarez even calls it a "love poem." Direct addresses to the dead man—"you" (and "du"), "your" and "Daddy"—occur twenty-nine times, in relation to the speaker's thirty "I"s, a ratio demonstrating Daddy's enormous psychic importance to the speaker. [. . .] Daddy is the super-ego, the paternal law,¹ and as such, he embodies an elusive linguistic power: the speaker "never could talk to" him: "The tongue stuck in my jaw. // It stuck in a barb wire snare. / Ich, ich, ich, ich" (49.25–27). [. . .] In "Daddy," the speaker's fear of the Nazi patriarch has made her seek out another language uncontaminated by his German: now she talks "like a Jew. / I think I may well be a Jew" (Ariel 50.34–35)—Daddy's historical victim.

The figure of Daddy constitutes a problem of language, memory and desire, all of which prevent the speaker from recuperation. The need to recreate the father leads to a self-destructive repetition compulsion: "I made a model of you, / A man in black with a Meinkampf look // And a love of the rack and the screw. / And I said I do, I do" (Ariel 51.64–67). Ironically rhyming the marriage vow with the ugly “screw,” Plath shows the speaker’s shifts of agency and libido: the sexualized love of the “screw” and the masochistic desire to slavishly serve the father’s memory. [. . .] Instead of a movement of exhumation to burial, “Daddy” moves from the speaker’s passive masochism to active sadism, but both positions are doggedly in reference to Daddy.

Plath’s declaration of desire in relation to the fascist/patriarch has opened the way for damning criticism, the majority of which centers on whether or not she had the “right” to employ Holocaust imagery in a highly personal way. Leon Wieseltier [. . .] contends that Plath “did not earn” the right to use the Holocaust’s “metaphors for extremity”; “. . . Whatever her German father did to her,” he argues of “Daddy,” “it could not have been what the Germans did to the Jews. The metaphor is inappropriate. The images do not illuminate her experience” (20). Irving Howe agrees [. . .] (qtd. in Butscher 230). But Plath is far from the only writer to construct personal meanings around images of Nazism and the Holocaust. What incurs such critical wrath is the libidinal valences in which the speaker cloaks her fascism references and the fact that the evil Nazi “Daddy” is intimately connected to patriarchy. Wieseltier conflates the speaker’s voice with Plath’s, reading “Daddy” as Plath’s father. [. . .]

In her journals, Plath does collapse her speaker’s personas and her own: “If I really think I killed and castrated my father, may all my dreams of deformed and tortured people be my guilty visions of him or fears of punishment for me? And how to lay them? To stop them operating through the rest of my life?” (Journals 273). Here Plath focuses less on autobiographical realism than she does on psychic life and psychoanalytic narratives of female sexual development. Her poetry displays a similar focus. It is significant that Plath tends to construct similes rather than metaphors to express the figurative relation between the Holocaust and the speaker’s personal history: her skin is not a Nazi lampshade, but rather “bright as a Nazi lampshade” (“Lady Lazarus”); the engine in “Daddy” is “chuffing” her “off like a Jew.” The figurative distance [. . .] indicates that Plath is primarily interested in how history is incorporated into our consciousness and takes on personal and imaginary significance. [. . .] Her poems show, as Jacqueline Rose points out, how history and politics are filtered through the prism of fantasy, in which the most fanciful and grotesque distortions occur. “Remember the illogic of the fantasy,” Plath reminds herself in her diaries (Journals 60). [. . .]

In a desperate letter contemplating suicide, Plath writes:

I can begin to see the compulsion for committing original sin, for adoring Hitler, for taking opium. I have long wanted to read and explore the theories of philosophy, psychology, national, religious and primitive consciousness, but it seems now too late for anything. (56)

Here and throughout Plath’s poems, fascism has a particular relationship to the “primitive unconscious,” to repressed aggressive desires and to a desire to be swept away. Plath was far from the first to intuit in fascism a harnessing of unconscious impulses. In Civilization and its Discontents, Freud proposed that those impulses repressed or forbidden in democratic society would necessarily reemerge in some other form, and many critics read fascism or authoritarianism as founded upon the expression of violent and sadomasochistic desires disavowed by liberal politics. W. H. Auden, for example, remarked in 1940 in his commencement address at Smith College (Plath's alma mater), that "[Carl] Jung hardly went far enough when he said 'Hitler is the unconscious of every German'; he comes uncomfortably near being the unconscious of most of us."² Plath's images of fascism are crafted according to this dream-logic of the unconscious, forging surreal links and producing unexpected affinities; in her lexicon, Nazism is inextricably linked to the unconscious and to sexual fantasy.

Plath's voice stands out in sharp relief against the Cold War rhetoric of 1950s America, smug with postwar prosperity, extolling democracy's triumph over fascism and its ethical imperative to do battle with the next monster (communism). Plath opposes the happy homemaker smiling beside shiny refrigerators and reliable washing machines to the frustrated, self-destructive female artist obsessed with death. Her female speakers inhabit a world of violence and brutality colored by voluptuous sexuality. Dissatisfied with their culture that shuts them out of opportunities, these women savor and theatricalize their abjection and revenge. They replace romantic myths of love with a carnal imbalance of powers where the torturer and his victim [. . .] are bound together by hate, resentment, and lust. Daddy's love and the security of marriage are dissatisfying compensations for limited horizons; the female speakers' long-delayed rebellions against "Daddy" arouse stifled desires for social power and sexual liberation.

[. . .] Cherishing martyrdom and seeking it out as the role they play best, the masochistic women in Ariel and The Colossus are whirling dervishes of revenge rising above a landscape of dirty dishes and smelly diapers to rage, burn, and murder men. [. . .] If Plath's is the language of female victimization, it is not one we are accustomed to hearing, for it always contains its double: a lashing, sadistic triumph. Nowhere is this clearer than in "Daddy."

[. . .] But even if she rebels against the oppressive patriarchal father, the speaker of "Daddy" recapitulates his violence. Her anger is reactive, and she does not succeed in freeing herself of him; her punishment of "Daddy" shows her own identification with his Nazi cruelty rather than overcoming of it. Even at the end of the poem, she is still addressing herself to him; she is still caught within the dialectic of Daddy.

The difference between [Virginia] Woolf's and Plath's models of female psychology under fascism and patriarchy is illustrated by their respective identifications with Greek heroines. Woolf's example [in Three Guineas (1938)] of a woman rebelling against the patriarchal law is Sophocles' Antigone. [. . .] For Woolf, Antigone is a model of visionary female bravery who is able to rise above her situation and perceive that "there are two kinds of law, the written and the unwritten" (184). The patriarch Creon's edict violates the more sacred humanist laws and needs to be challenged.

Plath also turns to Attic Greek drama for her model of female insurrection, but she chooses Aeschylus's Electra, a daughter whose relationship to her tyrannnical father—Agamemnon, who sacrificed his other daughter, Iphigenia, to the winds—is entirely different from Antigone’s. After Agamemnon is killed, Electra’s mother, Clytaemestra, and her lover, Aegisthus, abuse Electra for her loyalty to her father’s memory. The Chorus of Mycenaean Women warns Electra to temper her rebellion against her mother, but she persists until her exiled brother returns and kills Clytaemestra and Aegisthus. Electra persists in loving her deeply flawed father long after he is dead.

[. . .] Plath’s reading of Electra takes into account unconscious and ambivalent psychic responses.³ [. . .] It is the female speaker’s mother who may be Jewish and who connects the speaker to a position of victimhood that she both savors and repudiates. In her attraction to the fascist male/father, Plath’s daughter both betrays and repeats her mother’s possible fate as a Jew married to a Nazi. [. . .] Plath’s Electra is Antigone’s “libidinous double,” containing within her Antigone’s rebellion but unable to shake her love-hate relation to her father. Plath’s reiteration of and departure from simplistic narratives of power and desire—that one is either subservient to or in rebellion against patriarchal/fascist power—shows the conflicted emotions within one woman. Her transformation of the oedipal father into the fascist father encapsulates how “Daddy” is imbued by virtue of his place in the family, with mythic phallic power and how a daughter could both hate him and think that “he was God.”

For Plath, the “fascist” structure of patriarchal desire is inherently erotic, and it is ironically the feminist daughter who tries to free herself from “Daddy” for whom he looms largest in psychic life. Even though institutions change and women gain ground in their struggle to separate from “Daddy,” Plath suggests that he stubbornly persists as an object of sadomasochistic fantasy. The two poles of behavior rejected by liberal politics—domination and submission—surface in Plath’s poems as the substance of eroticized fantasy. This point is difficult to reconcile with a feminist vision for social change: for Plath, we are bound to our investments in the tyrannical “Daddy” all the more so as he is politically repudiated.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. In his essay DYING IS AN ART, George Steiner argues that Plath's poems "are too honest, they have cost too much, to be yielded to myth." Do you think that DADDY is an "honest" poem? Write an essay exploring what "honesty" means in modern poetry and whether or not DADDY is an "honest" poem. Draw on the critical essays found in this chapter, and be sure to cite them when appropriate.
2. Several of the critics in this chapter make competing claims about the meaning and significance of the form of DADDY, particularly its nursery-rhyme-like qualities. Using those claims as a springboard, write an essay in which you make your own argument about the relationship between form and content in DADDY.
3. In THE PLATH CELEBRATION: A PARTIAL DISSENT, Irving Howe argues, "There is something monstrous, utterly disproportionate, when tangled emotions about one's father are deliberately compared with the historical fate of the European Jews." Is Plath's personal, artistic use of a great historical tragedy truly "monstrous," as Howe says, or is it acceptable and effective, as other critics here contend? Write an essay in which you discuss the appropriateness and effects of Plath's references to the Holocaust.
4. Broe, Kroll, Homans, Annas, and Axelrod all claim that DADDY portrays the speaker's attempt to successfully "exorcise" one demon or another, though they disagree rather dramatically both about what that demon is and about whether and how that exorcism (not the poem) succeeds. Using their arguments as a starting point, write an essay in which you offer your own interpretation of the process of exorcism enacted in the poem.
5. In SYLVIA PLATH, A. Alvarez quotes Plath's own interpretation of DADDY as a poem "spoken by a girl with an Electra complex." (Other articles mention this statement.) Research the term "Electra complex," which originated with Sigmund Freud. Is it useful to interpret DADDY through the lens of the Electra complex? Citing critics included in this chapter, write an essay in which you discuss Plath's Freudian explanation of DADDY.
6. Write an essay comparing Plath's DADDY to at least two of the "domestic poems" mentioned by Axelrod in SYLVIA PLATH: THE WOUND AND THE CURE OF WORDS or other similar, contemporaneous poems. To what extent do you agree and disagree with Axelrod's interpretation of the similarities and differences between DADDY and poems by Plath's contemporaries?
7. Is DADDY a "feminist" poem? Citing the essays by Homans and other critics in this chapter, write an essay in which you explore the validity of a feminist interpretation.

About suffering they were never wrong,
The Old Masters: how well they understood
Its human position; how it takes place
While someone else is eating or opening a window or just walking dully along;

5 How, when the aged are reverently, passionately waiting
For the miraculous birth, there always must be Children who did not specially want it to happen, skating
On a pond at the edge of the wood:
They never forgot

10 That even the dreadful martyrdom must run its course
Anyhow in a corner, some untidy spot
Where the dogs go on with their doggy life and the torturer's horse
Scratches its innocent behind on a tree.

In Brueghel's Icarus,² for instance: how everything turns away

15 Quite leisurely from the disaster; the plowman may
Have heard the splash, the forsaken cry,
But for him it was not an important failure; the sun shone
As it had to on the white legs disappearing into the green
Water; and the expensive delicate ship that must have seen 20 Something amazing, a boy falling out of the sky,
Had somewhere to get to and sailed calmly on.

According to Greek myth, Daedalus and his son, Icarus, escaped from imprisonment by using homemade wings of feathers and wax; but Icarus flew too near the sun, the wax melted, and he fell into the sea and drowned. In the Bruegel painting the central figure is a peasant plowing, and several other figures are more immediately noticeable than Icarus, who, disappearing into the sea, is easy to miss in the lower right-hand corner.

ROBERT BROWNING
My Last Duchess

*Ferrara*³

- That's my last Duchess painted on the wall,
Looking as if she were alive. I call
That piece a wonder, now: Frà Pandolf's hands⁴
Worked busily a day, and there she stands.
- 5 Will't please you sit and look at her? I said
"Frà Pandolf" by design, for never read
Strangers like you that pictured countenance,
The depth and passion of its earnest glance,
But to myself they turned (since none puts by
- 10 The curtain I have drawn for you, but I)
And seemed as they would ask me, if they durst,
How such a glance came there; so, not the first
Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 'twas not
Her husband's presence only, called that spot
- 15 Of joy into the Duchess' cheek: perhaps Frà Pandolf chanced to say "Her mantle laps
Over my lady's wrist too much," or "Paint
Must never hope to reproduce the faint
Half-flush that dies along her throat": such stuff
- 20 Was courtesy, she thought, and cause enough
For calling up that spot of joy. She had
A heart—how shall I say?—too soon made glad,
Too easily impressed; she liked whate'er
She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.
- 25 Sir, 'twas all one! My favor at her breast,
The dropping of the daylight in the West,
The bough of cherries some officious fool
Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule
She rode with round the terrace—all and each
- 30 Would draw from her alike the approving speech,
Or blush, at least. She thanked men,—good! but thanked Somehow—I know not how—as if she ranked
My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name
With anybody's gift. Who'd stoop to blame
- 35 This sort of trifling? Even had you skill
In speech—which I have not—to make your will Quite clear to such an one, and say, "Just this Never to stoop. Oh sir, she smiled, no doubt, Whene'er I passed her; but who passed without 45 Much the same smile? This grew; I gave commands;

 Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
 As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
 The company below, then. I repeat,
 The Count your master's known munificence

 Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
 Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
 At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

Kubla Khan

*Or, a Vision in a Dream*⁵

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
 A stately pleasure-dome decree:
 Where Alph, the sacred river, ran Through caverns measureless to man
 5 Down to a sunless sea.
 So twice five miles of fertile ground
 With walls and towers were girdled round:
 And here were gardens bright with sinuous rills
 Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;
 10 And here were forests ancient as the hills,
 Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.
 But oh! that deep romantic chasm which slanted
 Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!⁶
 A savage place! as holy and enchanted
 15 As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted
 By woman wailing for her demon-lover!⁷
 And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething,

5. Coleridge said that he wrote this fragment immediately after waking from an opium dream and that after he was interrupted by a caller he was unable to finish the poem.

6. That is, from side to side beneath a cover of cedar trees.

7. In a famous and often-imitated German ballad, the lady Lenore is carried off on horseback by the specter of her lover and married to him at his grave.

As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing,
 A mighty fountain momentarily⁸ was forced,
 20 Amid whose swift half-intermitted burst
 Huge fragments vaulted like rebounding hail,
 Or chaffy grain beneath the thresher's flail:
 And 'mid these dancing rocks at once and ever
 It flung up momentarily the sacred river.
 25 Five miles meandering with a mazy motion
 Through wood and dale the sacred river ran,
 Then reached the caverns measureless to man,
 And sank in tumult to a lifeless ocean:
 And 'mid this tumult Kubla heard from far
 30 Ancestral voices prophesying war!

The shadow of the dome of pleasure
 Floated midway on the waves;
 Where was heard the mingled measure
 From the fountain and the caves.
 35 It was a miracle of rare device,
 A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!

A damsel with a dulcimer
 In a vision once I saw:
 It was an Abyssinian maid,
 40 And on her dulcimer she played,
 Singing of Mount Abora.
 Could I revive within me
 Her symphony and song,
 To such a deep delight 'twould win me,
 45 That with music loud and long,
 I would build that dome in air,
 That sunny dome! those caves of ice!
 And all who heard should see them there,
 And all should cry, Beware! Beware!
 50 His flashing eyes, his floating hair!
 Weave a circle round him thrice,
 And close your eyes with holy dread,
 For he on honey-dew hath fed,
 And drunk the milk of Paradise.

[Death, be not proud]

- Death be not proud, though some have called thee
 Mighty and dreadful, for thou art not so;
 For those whom thou think'st thou dost overthrow
 Die not, poor Death, nor yet canst thou kill me.
 5 From rest and sleep, which but thy pictures² be,
 Much pleasure; then from thee much more must flow,
 And soonest³ our best men with thee do go,
 Rest of their bones, and soul's delivery.⁴
 Thou art slave to Fate, Chance, kings, and desperate men,
 10 And dost with Poison, War, and Sickness dwell;
 And poppy or charms can make us sleep as well,
 And better than thy stroke; why swell'st⁵ thou then?
 One short sleep past, we wake eternally
 And death shall be no more; Death, thou shalt die.

Song

Go, and catch a falling star,
 Get with child a mandrake root,⁶
 Tell me, where all past years are,
 Or who cleft the devil's foot,
 5 Teach me to hear mermaids singing
 Or to keep off envy's stinging,
 And find
 What wind
 Serves to advance an honest mind.
 10 If thou beest born to strange sights,⁷
 Things invisible to see,
 Ride ten thousand days and nights,
 Till age snow white hairs on thee;
 Thou, when thou return'st, wilt tell me
 15 All strange wonders that befell thee,
 And swear
 No where
 Lives a woman true, and fair.
 If thou find'st one, let me know:
 20 Such a pilgrimage were sweet.
 Yet do not, I would not go,
 Though at next door we might meet:
 Though she were true when you met her,
 And last till you write your letter,
 25 Yet she
 Will be
 False, ere I come, to two, or three.

The Sun Rising

 Busy old fool, unruly sun,
 Why dost thou thus,
 Through windows, and through curtains, call on us?
 Must to thy motions lovers' seasons run?
 5 Saucy pedantic wretch, go chide
 Late schoolboys, and sour prentices,⁸
 Go tell court-huntsmen that the king will ride,
 Call country ants⁹ to harvest offices;
 Love, all alike, no season knows, nor clime,

A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning

As virtuous men pass mildly away,
 And whisper to their souls to go,
 Whilst some of their sad friends do say,
 "The breath goes now," and some say, "No,"
 5 So let us melt, and make no noise,
 No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move;
 'Twere profanation of our joys
 To tell the laity our love.

 Moving of the earth⁵ brings harms and fears,
 10 Men reckon what it did and meant;
 But trepidation of the spheres,⁶
 Though greater far, is innocent.

 Dull sublunary⁷ lovers' love
 (Whose soul is sense) cannot admit
 15 Absence, because it doth remove
 Those things which elemented⁸ it.

 But we, by a love so much refined
 That our selves know not what it is,

1. The East and West Indies, commercial sources of spices and gold.

2. Mimicry. 3. Requires. 4. Of orbit. 5. Earthquakes.

6. Renaissance theory that the celestial spheres trembled and thus caused unexpected variations in their orbits. Such movements are "innocent" because earthlings do not observe or fret about them.

7. Below the moon—that is, changeable. According to the traditional cosmology that Donne invokes here, the moon is the dividing line between the immutable celestial world and the mutable earthly one.

8. Comprised, made up its elements.

Inter-assured of the mind,
 20 Care less, eyes, lips, and hands to miss.
 Our two souls therefore, which are one,
 Though I must go, endure not yet
 A breach, but an expansion,
 Like gold to airy thinness beat.
 25 If they be two, they are two so
 As stiff twin compasses are two:
 Thy soul, the fixed foot, makes no show
 To move, but doth, if the other do;
 And though it in the center sit,
 30 Yet when the other far doth roam,
 It leans, and hearkens after it,
 And grows erect, as that comes home.
 Such wilt thou be to me, who must,
 Like the other foot, obliquely run;
 35 Thy firmness makes my circle⁹ just,
 And makes me end where I begun.

We Wear the Mask

We wear the mask that grins and lies,
 It hides our cheeks and shades our eyes,—
 This debt we pay to human guile;
 With torn and bleeding hearts we smile,
 5 And mouth with myriad subtleties.
 Why should the world be over-wise,
 In counting all our tears and sighs?
 Nay, let them only see us, while
 We wear the mask.
 10 We smile, but, O great Christ, our cries
 To thee from tortured souls arise.
 We sing, but oh the clay is vile
 Beneath our feet, and long the mile;
 But let the world dream otherwise,

- Let us go then, you and I,
When the evening is spread out against the sky
Like a patient etherised upon a table;
Let us go, through certain half-deserted streets,
5 The muttering retreats
Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels
And sawdust restaurants with oyster-shells:
Streets that follow like a tedious argument
Of insidious intent
10 To lead you to an overwhelming question . . .
Oh, do not ask, 'What is it?'
Let us go and make our visit.
- In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.²

20 Slipped by the terrace, made a sudden leap,
And seeing that it was a soft October night,
Curled once about the house, and fell asleep.

There will be time, there will be time
To prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet;
There will be time to murder and create,

1. From Dante, Inferno (27.61–66): “If I thought that my reply would be / to one who would ever return to the world, / this flame would stay without further movement; // but since none has ever returned alive from this depth, / if what I hear is true, / I answer you without fear of infamy.” The words are spoken by the character Guido da Montefeltro—imprisoned in flame in the depths of hell as a punishment for giving false counsel—to Dante, whom da Montefeltro believes will never return from his journey into the inferno. 2. Italian artist Michelangelo Buonarroti (1475–1564).

3. Echo of Andrew Marvell’s “To His Coy Mistress” (1681), which famously begins, “Had we but world enough, and time / This coyness, lady, were no crime.”

- And time for all the works and days⁴ of hands
 30 That lift and drop a question on your plate;
 Time for you and time for me,
 And time yet for a hundred indecisions,
 And for a hundred visions and revisions,
 Before the taking of a toast and tea.
- 35 In the room the women come and go
 Talking of Michelangelo.
- And indeed there will be time
 To wonder, 'Do I dare?' and, 'Do I dare?'
 Time to turn back and descend the stair,
 40 With a bald spot in the middle of my hair—
 (They will say: 'How his hair is growing thin!')
 My morning coat, my collar mounting firmly to the chin,
 My necktie rich and modest, but asserted by a simple pin—
 (They will say: 'But how his arms and legs are thin!')
- 45 Do I dare
 Disturb the universe?
 In a minute there is time
 For decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse.
- For I have known them all already, known them all—50 Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons,
 I have measured out my life with coffee spoons;
 I know the voices dying with a dying fall
 Beneath the music from a farther room.
 So how should I presume?
- 55 And I have known the eyes already, known them all—
 The eyes that fix you in a formulated phrase,
 And when I am formulated, sprawling on a pin,
 When I am pinned and wriggling on the wall,
 Then how should I begin
 60 To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways?
 And how should I presume?
- And I have known the arms already, known them all—Arms that are braceleted and white and bare
 (But in the lamplight, downed with light brown hair!)
 65 Is it perfume from a dress
 That makes me so digress?
 Arms that lie along a table, or wrap about a shawl.
 And should I then presume?
 And how should I begin?

4. Works and Days is a poem composed about 700 BCE by the Greek writer Hesiod; lamenting the moral decay of the present, it celebrates simple life and hard work, especially agricultural labor.

70 Shall I say, I have gone at dusk through narrow streets
 And watched the smoke that rises from the pipes
 Of lonely men in shirt-sleeves, leaning out of windows? . . .
 I should have been a pair of ragged claws
 Scuttling across the floors of silent seas.

75 And the afternoon, the evening, sleeps so peacefully!
 Smoothed by long fingers,
 Asleep . . . tired . . . or it malingers,
 Stretched on the floor, here beside you and me.
 Should I, after tea and cakes and ices,
 80 Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis?
 But though I have wept and fasted, wept and prayed, Though I have seen my head (grown slightly bald) brought in upon a platter,⁵
 I am no prophet—and here's no great matter;
 I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker,
 85 And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker,
 And in short, I was afraid.

And would it have been worth it, after all,
 After the cups, the marmalade, the tea,
 Among the porcelain, among some talk of you and me,
 90 Would it have been worth while,
 To have bitten off the matter with a smile,
 To have squeezed the universe into a ball⁶
 To roll it towards some overwhelming question,
 To say: 'I am Lazarus, come from the dead,⁷
 95 Come back to tell you all, I shall tell you all'—
 If one, settling a pillow by her head,
 Should say: 'That is not what I meant at all.
 That is not it, at all.'

And would it have been worth it, after all,
 100 Would it have been worth while,
 After the sunsets and the dooryards and the sprinkled streets,
 After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor—
 And this, and so much more?—
 It is impossible to say just what I mean!
 105 But as if a magic lantern threw the nerves in patterns on a screen:
 Would it have been worth while
 If one, settling a pillow or throwing off a shawl,

5. Like John the Baptist; at a banquet, King Herod has the prophet's head delivered on a plate to Salome, the woman who requested his execution (Mark 6.17–28; Matt. 14.3–11).

6. Another echo of "To His Coy Mistress": "Let us roll all our strength and all / Our sweetness up into one ball, / And tear our pleasures with rough strife / Through the iron gates of life" (lines 41–44).

7. The New Testament relates the story of Jesus raising Lazarus from the dead in John 11.1–44.

And turning toward the window, should say:

‘That is not it at all,

110 That is not what I meant, at all.’

No! I am not Prince Hamlet,⁸ nor was meant to be;

Am an attendant lord, one that will do

To swell a progress,⁹ start a scene or two,

Advise the prince; no doubt, an easy tool,

115 Deferential, glad to be of use,

Politic, cautious, and meticulous;

Full of high sentence,¹ but a bit obtuse;

At times, indeed, almost ridiculous—

Almost, at times, the Fool.

120 I grow old . . . I grow old . . .

I shall wear the bottoms of my trousers rolled.

Shall I part my hair behind? Do I dare to eat a peach?

I shall wear white flannel trousers, and walk upon the beach.

I have heard the mermaids singing, each to each.

125 I do not think that they will sing to me.

I have seen them riding seaward on the waves

Combing the white hair of the waves blown back

When the wind blows the water white and black.

We have lingered in the chambers of the sea

130 By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and brown

Till human voices wake us, and we drown.

ROBERT FROST

Home Burial

He saw her from the bottom of the stairs

Before she saw him. She was starting down,

Looking back over her shoulder at some fear.

She took a doubtful step and then undid it

5 To raise herself and look again. He spoke Advancing toward her: “What is it you see

From up there always?—for I want to know.”

She turned and sank upon her skirts at that,

And her face changed from terrified to dull.

10 He said to gain time: “What is it you see?”

Mounting until she cowered under him.

“I will find out now—you must tell me, dear.”

8. Protagonist of Shakespeare’s tragedy Hamlet, who is indecisive for much of the play.

9. Journey of a royal or noble person, or the representation of such a journey onstage as part of a play (as was common in Shakespeare’s age).

1. Sententious; that is, he tends to speak in a pompous, formal manner.

She, in her place, refused him any help,
 With the least stiffening of her neck and silence.
 15 She let him look, sure that he wouldn't see,
 Blind creature; and awhile he didn't see.
 But at last he murmured, "Oh," and again, "Oh."

"What is it—what?" she said.

"Just that I see."

"You don't," she challenged. "Tell me what it is."

20 "The wonder is I didn't see at once.
 I never noticed it from here before.
 I must be wonted² to it—that's the reason.
 The little graveyard where my people are!
 So small the window frames the whole of it.
 25 Not so much larger than a bedroom, is it?
 There are three stones of slate and one of marble,
 Broad-shouldered little slabs there in the sunlight
 On the sidehill. We haven't to mind those.
 But I understand: it is not the stones,
 30 But the child's mound—"

"Don't, don't, don't,

don't," she cried.

She withdrew, shrinking from beneath his arm
 That rested on the banister, and slid downstairs;
 And turned on him with such a daunting look,
 He said twice over before he knew himself:
 35 "Can't a man speak of his own child he's lost?"

"Not you!—Oh, where's my hat? Oh, I don't need it!
 I must get out of here. I must get air.—
 I don't know rightly whether any man can."

"Amy! Don't go to someone else this time.

40 Listen to me. I won't come down the stairs."
 He sat and fixed his chin between his fists.
 "There's something I should like to ask you, dear."

"You don't know how to ask it."

"Help me, then."

Her fingers moved the latch for all reply.

45 "My words are nearly always an offense.
 I don't know how to speak of anything
 So as to please you. But I might be taught,
 I should suppose. I can't say I see how.
 A man must partly give up being a man
 50 With womenfolk. We could have some arrangement
 By which I'd bind myself to keep hands off

2. Habituated, accustomed.

Anything special you're a-mind to name.
 Though I don't like such things 'twixt those that love.
 Two that don't love can't live together without them.
 55 But two that do can't live together with them."
 She moved the latch a little. "Don't—don't go.
 Don't carry it to someone else this time.
 Tell me about it if it's something human.
 Let me into your grief. I'm not so much
 60 Unlike other folks as your standing there
 Apart would make me out. Give me my chance.
 I do think, though, you overdo it a little.
 What was it brought you up to think it the thing
 To take your mother-loss of a first child
 65 So inconsolably—in the face of love.
 You'd think his memory might be satisfied—"
 "There you go sneering now!"

"I'm not, I'm not!
 You make me angry. I'll come down to you.
 God, what a woman! And it's come to this,
 70 A man can't speak of his own child that's dead."
 "You can't because you don't know how to speak.
 If you had any feelings, you that dug
 With your own hand—how could you?—his little grave;
 I saw you from that very window there,
 75 Making the gravel leap and leap in air,
 Leap up, like that, like that, and land so lightly
 And roll back down the mound beside the hole.
 I thought, Who is that man? I didn't know you.
 And I crept down the stairs and up the stairs
 80 To look again, and still your spade kept lifting.
 Then you came in. I heard your rumbling voice
 Out in the kitchen, and I don't know why,
 But I went near to see with my own eyes.
 You could sit there with the stains on your shoes
 85 Of the fresh earth from your own baby's grave
 And talk about your everyday concerns.
 You had stood the spade up against the wall Outside there in the entry, for I saw it."

"I shall laugh the worst laugh I ever laughed.
 90 I'm cursed. God, if I don't believe I'm cursed."

"I can repeat the very words you were saying:
 'Three foggy mornings and one rainy day
 Will rot the best birch fence a man can build.'
 Think of it, talk like that at such a time!
 95 What had how long it takes a birch to rot
 To do with what was in the darkened parlor?
 You couldn't care! The nearest friends can go
 With anyone to death, comes so far short

- They might as well not try to go at all.
 100 No, from the time when one is sick to death,
 One is alone, and he dies more alone.
 Friends make pretense of following to the grave,
 But before one is in it, their minds are turned
 And making the best of their way back to life
 105 And living people, and things they understand.
 But the world's evil. I won't have grief so
 If I can change it. Oh, I won't, I won't!"
- "There, you have said it all and you feel better.
 You won't go now. You're crying. Close the door.
 110 The heart's gone out of it: why keep it up?
 Amy! There's someone coming down the road!"
- "You—oh, you think the talk is all. I must go—Somewhere out of this house. How can I make you—"
- "If—you—do!" She was opening the door wider.
 115 "Where do you mean to go? First tell me that.
 I'll follow and bring you back by force. I will!—"

1915

Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening

- Whose woods these are I think I know.
 His house is in the village, though;
 He will not see me stopping here
 To watch his woods fill up with snow.
- 5 My little horse must think it queer
 To stop without a farmhouse near
 Between the woods and frozen lake
 The darkest evening of the year.
- He gives his harness bells a shake
 10 To ask if there is some mistake.
 The only other sound's the sweep
 Of easy wind and downy flake.
- The woods are lovely, dark, and deep,
 But I have promises to keep,
 15 And miles to go before I sleep,
 And miles to go before I sleep.

SEAMUS HEANEY

Digging

Between my finger and my thumb
 The squat pen rests; snug as a gun.

- Under my window, a clean rasping sound
 When the spade sinks into gravelly ground:
 5 My father, digging. I look down
 Till his straining rump among the flowerbeds
 Bends low, comes up twenty years away
 Stooping in rhythm through potato drills³
 Where he was digging.
- 10 The coarse boot nestled on the lug, the shaft
 Against the inside knee was levered firmly.
 He rooted out tall tops, buried the bright edge deep
 To scatter new potatoes that we picked Loving their cool hardness in our hands.
- 15 By God, the old man could handle a spade.
 Just like his old man.
 My grandfather cut more turf⁴ in a day
 Than any other man on Toner's bog.
 Once I carried him milk in a bottle
 20 Corked sloppily with paper. He straightened up
 To drink it, then fell to right away
 Nicking and slicing neatly, heaving sods
 Over his shoulder, going down and down
 For the good turf. Digging.
- 25 The cold smell of potato mould, the squelch and slap
 Of soggy peat, the curt cuts of an edge
 Through living roots awaken in my head.
 But I've no spade to follow men like them.
 Between my finger and my thumb
 30 The squat pen rests.
 I'll dig with it.

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS

God's Grandeur

The world is charged with the grandeur of God.
 It will flame out, like shining from shook foil;⁵
 It gathers to a greatness, like the ooze of oil
 Crushed. Why do men then now not reckon his rod?⁶

3. Small furrows in which seeds are sown.

4. Peat cut into slabs and dried to be used as fuel in stoves and furnaces.

5. "I mean foil in its sense of leaf or tinsel [. . .]. Shaken goldfoil gives off broad glares like sheet lightning and also, and this is true of nothing else, owing to its zig-zag dints and creasings and network of small many cornered facets, a sort of fork lightning too" (Letters of Gerard Manley Hopkins to Robert Bridges, edited by C. C. Abbott, 1955, p. 169).

6. Heed his authority.

- 5 Generations have trod, have trod, have trod;
 And all is seared with trade; bleared, smeared with toil;
 And wears man's smudge and shares man's smell: the soil
 Is bare now, nor can foot feel, being shod.
- And for all this, nature is never spent;
 10 There lives the dearest freshness deep down things;
 And though the last lights off the black West went
 Oh, morning, at the brown brink eastward, springs—
 Because the Holy Ghost over the bent
 World broods with warm breast and with ah! bright wings.
 c. 1877

The Windhover⁷

To Christ our Lord

- I caught this morning morning's minion,⁸ kingdom of daylight's dauphin,⁹ dapple-dawn-drawn Falcon, in his riding
 Of the rolling level underneath him steady air, and striding
 High there, how he rung upon the rein of a wimpling¹ wing
 5 In his ecstasy! then off, off forth on swing,
 As a skate's heel sweeps smooth on a bow-bend: the hurl and gliding Rebuffed the big wind. My heart in hiding Stirred for a bird,—the achieve of, the mastery of the thing!
- Brute beauty and valor and act, oh, air, pride, plume, here
 10 Buckle!² AND the fire that breaks from thee then, a billion
 Times told lovelier, more dangerous, O my chevalier!³
- No wonder of it: shéer plód makes plow down sillion⁴
 Shine, and blue-bleak embers, ah my dear,
 Fall, gall themselves, and gash gold-vermilion.

BEN JONSON

On My First Son

- Farewell, thou child of my right hand,⁵ and joy;
 My sin was too much hope of thee, loved boy:
 Seven years thou wert lent to me, and I thee pay,
 Exacted by thy fate, on the just⁶ day.
 5 O could I lose all father now! for why
 Will man lament the state he should envy,

7. Small hawk, the kestrel, which habitually hovers in the air, headed into the wind.

8. Favorite, beloved. 9. Heir to regal splendor. 1. Rippling.

2. Several meanings may apply: to join closely, to prepare for battle, to grapple with, to collapse.

3. Horseman, knight.

4. Narrow strip of land between furrows in an open field divided for separate cultivation.

5. Literal translation of the son's name, Benjamin.

6. Exact; the son died on his seventh birthday, in 1603.

To have so soon 'scaped world's and flesh's rage,
 And, if no other misery, yet age?
 Rest in soft peace, and asked, say, "Here doth lie
 10 Ben Jonson his⁷ best piece of poetry."
 For whose sake henceforth all his vows be such
 As what he loves may never like too much.
 1616

JOHN KEATS Ode on a Grecian Urn

I

Thou still unravished bride of quietness,
 Thou foster-child of silence and slow time,
 Sylvan historian, who canst thus express
 A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme:
 5 What leaf-fringed legend haunts about thy shape
 Of deities or mortals, or of both,
 In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?⁸
 What men or gods are these? What maidens loath?
 What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape?
 10 What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy?

II

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
 Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;
 Not to the sensual⁹ ear, but, more endeared,
 Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone:
 15 Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave
 Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
 Bold Lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
 Though winning near the goal—yet, do not grieve;
 She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
 20 For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

III

Ah, happy, happy boughs! that cannot shed
 Your leaves, nor ever bid the Spring adieu;
 And, happy melodist, unwearied,
 For ever piping songs for ever new;
 25 More happy love! more happy, happy love!
 For ever warm and still to be enjoyed,
 For ever panting, and for ever young;
 All breathing human passion far above,
 That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and cloyed,
 30 A burning forehead, and a parching tongue.

7. That is, Ben Jonson's (this was a common Renaissance form of the possessive).

8. Arcadia. Tempe is a beautiful valley near Mt. Olympus in Greece, and the valleys ("dales") of Arcadia are a picturesque section of the Peloponnesus; both came to be associated with the pastoral ideal.

9. Of the senses, as distinguished from the "ear" of the spirit or imagination.

IV

Who are these coming to the sacrifice?
 To what green altar, O mysterious priest,
 Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
 And all her silken flanks with garlands dressed?
 35 What little town by river or sea shore,
 Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
 Is emptied of its folk, this pious morn?
 And, little town, thy streets for evermore
 Will silent be; and not a soul to tell
 40 Why thou art desolate, can e'er return.

V

O Attic shape! Fair attitude! with brede¹
 Of marble men and maidens overwrought,²
 With forest branches and the trodden weed;
 Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought 45 As doth eternity: Cold Pastoral!
 When old age shall this generation waste,
 Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
 Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
 Beauty is truth, truth beauty³—that is all
 50 Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.

To Autumn

I

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness,
 Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun;
 Conspiring with him how to load and bless
 With fruit the vines that round the thatch-eves run;
 5 To bend with apples the mossed cottage-trees,
 And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core;
 To swell the gourd, and plump the hazel shells
 With a sweet kernel; to set budding more,
 And still more, later flowers for the bees,
 10 Until they think warm days will never cease,
 For Summer has o'er-brimmed their clammy cells.

II

Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store?
 Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
 Thee sitting careless on a granary floor,

1. Woven pattern. Attic: Attica was the district of ancient Greece surrounding Athens.

2. Ornamented all over.

3. In some texts of the poem, "Beauty is truth, truth beauty" is in quotation marks, and in some texts it is not, leading to critical disagreements about whether the last line and a half are also inscribed on the urn or spoken by the poem's speaker.

- 15 Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind,⁴
 Or on a half-reaped furrow sound asleep,
 Drowsed with the fume of poppies, while thy hook⁵
 Spares the next swath and all its twinèd flowers:
 And sometimes like a gleaner thou dost keep 20 Steady thy laden head across a brook;
 Or by a cider-press, with patient look,
 Thou watchest the last oozings hours by hours.

III

- Where are the songs of Spring? Ay, where are they?
 Think not of them, thou hast thy music too—
 25 While barrèd clouds bloom the soft-dying day,
 And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue;
 Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn
 Among the river shallows,⁶ borne aloft
 Or sinking as the light wind lives or dies;
 30 And full-grown lambs loud bleat from hilly bourn;⁷
 Hedge-crickets sing; and now with treble soft
 The red-breast whistles from a garden-croft;⁸
 And gathering swallows twitter in the skies.

ETHERIDGE KNIGHT

Hard Rock Returns to Prison from the Hospital for the Criminal Insane

- Hard Rock was “known not to take no shit
 From nobody,” and he had the scars to prove it:
 Split purple lips, lumped ears, welts above
 His yellow eyes, and one long scar that cut
 5 Across his temple and plowed through a thick
 Canopy of kinky hair.
- The WORD was that Hard Rock wasn’t a mean nigger
 Anymore, that the doctors had bored a hole in his head,
 Cut out part of his brain, and shot electricity
 10 Through the rest. When they brought Hard Rock back, Handcuffed and chained, he was turned loose,
 Like a freshly gelded stallion, to try his new status.
 And we all waited and watched, like indians at a corral,
 To see if the WORD was true.
- 15 As we waited we wrapped ourselves in the cloak
 Of his exploits: “Man, the last time, it took eight Screws to put him in the Hole.”⁹ “Yeah, remember when he

4. Which sifts the grain from the chaff. 5. Scythe or sickle. 6. Shallows. 7. Domain.
 8. Enclosed garden near a house. 9. Solitary confinement. Screws: guards.

Smacked the captain with his dinner tray?" "He set
 The record for time in the Hole—67 straight days!"
 20 "Ol Hard Rock! man, that's one crazy nigger."
 And then the jewel of a myth that Hard Rock had once bit
 A screw on the thumb and poisoned him with syphilitic spit.

The testing came, to see if Hard Rock was really tame.
 A hillbilly called him a black son of a bitch
 25 And didn't lose his teeth, a screw who knew Hard Rock
 From before shook him down and barked in his face.
 And Hard Rock did nothing. Just grinned and looked silly,
 His eyes empty like knot holes in a fence.

And even after we discovered that it took Hard Rock
 30 Exactly 3 minutes to tell you his first name,
 We told ourselves that he had just wised up,
 Was being cool; but we could not fool ourselves for long,
 And we turned away, our eyes on the ground. Crushed.
 He had been our Destroyer, the doer of things
 35 We dreamed of doing but could not bring ourselves to do,
 The fears of years, like a biting whip,
 Had cut grooves too deeply across our backs.

Facing It

My black face fades,
 hiding inside the black granite.
 I said I wouldn't,
 dammit: No tears.
 5 I'm stone. I'm flesh.
 My clouded reflection eyes me like a bird of prey, the profile of night slanted against morning. I turn this way—I'm inside
 10 the Vietnam Veterans Memorial¹ again, depending on the light to make a difference.
 I go down the 58,022 names,
 half-expecting to find
 15 my own in letters like smoke.
 I touch the name Andrew Johnson;²

1. Designed by Yale undergraduate Maya Ying Lin, the centerpiece of this Washington, D.C., memorial consists of two black, highly reflective stone walls, each almost 247 feet long, etched with the names of servicemen declared either missing or killed in action during the Vietnam conflict.

2. Soldier from Komunyakaa's hometown, Bogalusa, Louisiana. He shared the name of the U.S. president who, after succeeding the recently assassinated Abraham Lincoln in 1865, both vetoed bills designed to stop Southern states from depriving freed slaves of their civil liberties and opposed passage of the Fourteenth Amendment (1868) granting citizenship to African Americans.

I see the booby trap's white flash.
 Names shimmer on a woman's blouse
 but when she walks away
 20 the names stay on the wall.
 Brushstrokes flash, a red bird's wings cutting across my stare.
 The sky. A plane in the sky.
 A white vet's image floats
 25 closer to me, then his eyes look through mine. I'm a window.
 He's lost his right arm inside the stone. In the black mirror a woman's trying to erase names:
 No, she's brushing a boy's hair.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA (b. 1947)

From "Facing It" (2000)*

Now, as I think back to 1984, when I wrote "Facing It," with the humidity hanging over New Orleans [. . .] in early summer, I remember that it seemed several lifetimes from those fiery years in Vietnam. [. . .] I had meditated on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial as if the century's blues songs had been solidified into something monumental and concrete. Our wailing, our ranting, our singing of spirituals and kaddish and rock anthems, it was all captured and refined into a shaped destiny that attempted to portray personal and public feelings about war and human loss. It became a shrine overnight: a blackness that plays with light—a reflected motion in the stone that balances a dance between grass and sky. Whoever faces the granite becomes a part of it. The reflections move into and through each other. A dance between the dead and the living. Even in its heft and weight, emotionally and physically, it still seems to defy immediate description, constantly incorporating into its shape all the new reflections and shapes brought to it: one of the poignant shrines of the twentieth century. MARGE PIERCY

Barbie Doll

This girlchild was born as usual and presented dolls that did pee-pee and miniature GE stoves and irons and wee lipsticks the color of cherry candy.
 5 Then in the magic of puberty, a classmate said:
 You have a great big nose and fat legs.

 She was healthy, tested intelligent,
 possessed strong arms and back,
 abundant sexual drive and manual dexterity.
 10 She went to and fro apologizing.
 Everyone saw a fat nose on thick legs.

 She was advised to play coy, exhorted to come on hearty,
 exercise, diet, smile and wheedle.
 15 Her good nature wore out like a fan belt.
 So she cut off her nose and her legs and offered them up.

 In the casket displayed on satin she lay 20 with the undertaker's cosmetics painted on,
 a turned-up putty nose,
 dressed in a pink and white nightie.
 Doesn't she look pretty? everyone said.

Consummation at last.
 25 To every woman a happy ending.

SYLVIA PLATH Lady Lazarus

I have done it again.
 One year in every ten
 I manage it—

A sort of walking miracle, my skin
 5 Bright as a Nazi lampshade,
 My right foot

A paperweight,
 My face a featureless, fine
 Jew linen.³

10 Peel off the napkin
 O my enemy.
 Do I terrify?—

The nose, the eye pits, the full set of teeth?
 The sour breath
 15 Will vanish in a day.

Soon, soon the flesh
 The grave cave ate will be
 At home on me

And I a smiling woman.
 20 I am only thirty.
 And like the cat I have nine times to die.

This is Number Three.
 What a trash
 To annihilate each decade.

25 What a million filaments.
 The peanut-crunching crowd
 Shoves in to see

Them unwrap me hand and foot—
 The big strip tease.
 30 Gentlemen, ladies

These are my hands
 My knees.
 I may be skin and bone,

3. During World War II, prisoners in some Nazi camps were gassed to death and their body parts then turned into objects such as lampshades and paperweights.

- Nevertheless, I am the same, identical woman.
 35 The first time it happened I was ten.
 It was an accident.
- The second time I meant
 To last it out and not come back at all.
 I rocked shut
- 40 As a seashell.
 They had to call and call
 And pick the worms off me like sticky pearls.
- Dying
 Is an art, like everything else.
 45 I do it exceptionally well.
- I do it so it feels like hell.
 I do it so it feels real.
 I guess you could say I've a call.
- It's easy enough to do it in a cell.
 50 It's easy enough to do it and stay put.
 It's the theatrical
- Comeback in broad day
 To the same place, the same face, the same brute
 Amused shout:
- 55 "A miracle!"
 That knocks me out.
 There is a charge
- For the eyeing of my scars, there is a charge
 For the hearing of my heart—
 60 It really goes.
- And there is a charge, a very large charge
 For a word or a touch
 Or a bit of blood
- Or a piece of my hair or my clothes.
 65 So, so Herr Doktor.
 So, Herr Enemy.
- I am your opus,
 I am your valuable,
 The pure gold baby
- 70 That melts to a shriek.
 I turn and burn.
 Do not think I underestimate your great concern
- Ash, ash—
 You poke and stir.
 75 Flesh, bone, there is nothing there—

A cake of soap,
A wedding ring,
A gold filling.

Herr God, Herr Lucifer
80 Beware
Beware.

Out of the ash
I rise with my red hair
And I eat men like air.

Morning Song

Love set you going like a fat gold watch.
The midwife slapped your footsoles, and your bald cry
Took its place among the elements.

Our voices echo, magnifying your arrival. New statue.
5 In a drafty museum, your nakedness
Shadows our safety. We stand round blankly as walls.

I'm no more your mother
Than the cloud that distils a mirror to reflect its own slow
Effacement at the wind's hand.

10 All night your moth-breath
Flickers among the flat pink roses. I wake to listen:
A far sea moves in my ear.

One cry, and I stumble from bed, cow-heavy and floral
In my Victorian nightgown.
15 Your mouth opens clean as a cat's. The window square
Whitens and swallows its dull stars. And now you try
Your handful of notes;
The clear vowels rise like balloons.

EDGAR ALLAN POE

The Raven

Once upon a midnight dreary, while I pondered, weak and weary,
Over many a quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore,
While I nodded, nearly napping, suddenly there came a tapping,
As of some one gently rapping, rapping at my chamber door.
5 "Tis some visitor," I muttered, "tapping at my chamber door—
Only this, and nothing more."

Ah, distinctly I remember it was in the bleak December,
And each separate dying ember wrought its ghost upon the floor.

Eagerly I wished the morrow;—vainly I had sought to borrow 10 From my books surcease of sorrow—sorrow for the lost Lenore—
 For the rare and radiant maiden whom the angels name Lenore—
 Nameless here for evermore.

And the silken sad uncertain rustling of each purple curtain
 Thrilled me—filled me with fantastic terrors never felt before;
 15 So that now, to still the beating of my heart, I stood repeating “’Tis some visitor entreating entrance at my chamber door;—
 Some late visitor entreating entrance at my chamber door;
 This it is, and nothing more.”

Presently my soul grew stronger; hesitating then no longer,
 20 “Sir,” said I, “or Madam, truly your forgiveness I implore;
 But the fact is I was napping, and so gently you came rapping,
 And so faintly you came tapping, tapping at my chamber door,
 That I scarce was sure I heard you”—here I opened wide the door;—
 Darkness there, and nothing more.

Deep into that darkness peering, long I stood there wondering, fearing,
 Doubting, dreaming dreams no mortal ever dared to dream before;
 But the silence was unbroken, and the darkness gave no token,
 And the only word there spoken was the whispered word, “Lenore!”
 This I whispered, and an echo murmured back the word, “Lenore!”— 30 Merely this, and nothing more.

Back into the chamber turning, all my soul within me burning,
 Soon I heard again a tapping somewhat louder than before.
 “Surely,” said I, “surely that is something at my window lattice;
 Let me see, then, what thereat is, and this mystery explore—35 Let my heart be still a moment and this mystery explore;—
 ’Tis the wind and nothing more!”

Open here I flung the shutter, when, with many a flirt and flutter,
 In there stepped a stately raven of the saintly days of yore;
 Not the least obeisance made he; not an instant stopped or stayed he;
 40 But, with mien of lord or lady, perched above my chamber door—
 Perched upon a bust of Pallas⁴ just above my chamber door—
 Perched, and sat, and nothing more.

Then this ebony bird beguiling my sad fancy into smiling,
 By the grave and stern decorum of the countenance it wore,
 45 “Though thy crest be shorn and shaven, thou,” I said, “art sure no craven, Ghastly grim and ancient raven wandering from the Nightly shore—
 Tell me what thy lordly name is on the Night’s Plutonian⁵ shore!”
 Quoth the raven, “Nevermore.”

Much I marvelled this ungainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly,
 50 Though its answer little meaning—little relevancy bore,
 For we cannot help agreeing that no living human being Ever yet was blessed with seeing bird above his chamber door—

4. Athena, the Greek goddess of wisdom. 5. Dark; Pluto was the ancient Greek god of the underworld.

Bird or beast upon the sculptured bust above his chamber door,
With such name as “Nevermore.”

- 55 But the raven, sitting lonely on the placid bust, spoke only
That one word, as if his soul in that one word he did outpour.
Nothing farther then he uttered—not a feather then he fluttered—
Till I scarcely more than muttered “Other friends have flown before—
On the morrow he will leave me, as my hopes have flown before.”
60 Then the bird said “Nevermore.”

- Startled at the stillness broken by reply so aptly spoken, “Doubtless,” said I, “what it utters is its only stock and store
Caught from some unhappy master whom unmerciful Disaster
Followed fast and followed faster till his songs one burden bore—
65 Till the dirges of his Hope that melancholy burden bore
Of ‘Never—nevermore.’”

- But the raven still beguiling all my sad soul into smiling,
Straight I wheeled a cushioned seat in front of bird and bust and door;
Then, upon the velvet sinking, I betook myself to linking 70 Fancy unto fancy, thinking what this ominous bird of yore—
What this grim, ungainly, ghastly, gaunt, and ominous bird of yore Meant in croaking “Nevermore.”

- This I sat engaged in guessing, but no syllable expressing
To the fowl whose fiery eyes now burned into my bosom’s core;
75 This and more I sat divining, with my head at ease reclining
On the cushion’s velvet lining that the lamplight gloated o’er,
But whose velvet violet lining with the lamplight gloating o’er,
She shall press, ah, nevermore!

- Then, methought, the air grew denser, perfumed from an unseen censer
80 Swung by angels whose faint foot-falls tinkled on the tufted floor.
“Wretch,” I cried, “thy God hath lent thee—by these angels he hath sent thee
Respite—respite and nepenthe⁶ from thy memories of Lenore!
Quaff, oh quaff this kind nepenthe and forget this lost Lenore!”
Quoth the raven, “Nevermore.”

- 85 “Prophet!” said I, “thing of evil!—prophet still, if bird or devil!—
Whether Tempter sent, or whether tempest tossed thee here ashore,
Desolate, yet all undaunted, on this desert land enchanted—
On this home by Horror haunted—tell me truly, I implore—
Is there—is there balm in Gilead?⁷—tell me—tell me, I implore!”
90 Quoth the raven, “Nevermore.”

“Prophet!” said I, “thing of evil—prophet still, if bird or devil!
By that Heaven that bends above us—by that God we both adore—
Tell this soul with sorrow laden if, within the distant Aidenn,⁸
It shall clasp a sainted maiden whom the angels name Lenore—

6. Drug reputed by the Greeks to cause forgetfulness or sorrow (pronounced “ne-PEN-thee”).

7. See Jeremiah 8.22. 8. Eden.

- 95 Clasp a rare and radiant maiden whom the angels name Lenore.”
 Quoth the raven, “Nevermore.”

“Be that word our sign of parting, bird or fiend!” I shrieked upstarting—“Get thee back into the tempest and the Night’s Plutonian shore!
 Leave no black plume as a token of that lie thy soul hath spoken!
 100 Leave my loneliness unbroken!—quit the bust above my door!
 Take thy beak from out my heart, and take thy form from off my door!”
 Quoth the raven, “Nevermore.”

And the raven, never flitting, still is sitting, still is sitting
 On the pallid bust of Pallas just above my chamber door;
 105 And his eyes have all the seeming of a demon’s that is dreaming,
 And the lamp-light o’er him streaming throws his shadow on the floor;
 And my soul from out that shadow that lies floating on the floor
 Shall be lifted—nevermore!

EZRA POUND

The River-Merchant’s Wife: A Letter

(after Rihaku)⁹

- While my hair was still cut straight across my forehead
 I played about the front gate, pulling flowers.
 You came by on bamboo stilts, playing horse,
 You walked about my seat, playing with blue plums.
 5 And we went on living in the village of Chokan:
 Two small people, without dislike or suspicion.
- At fourteen I married My Lord you.
 I never laughed, being bashful.
 Lowering my head, I looked at the wall.
 10 Called to, a thousand times, I never looked back.
- At fifteen I stopped scowling,
 I desired my dust to be mingled with yours
 For ever and for ever and for ever.
 Why should I climb the look out?
- 15 At sixteen you departed,
 You went into far Ku-to-yen, by the river of swirling eddies,
 And you have been gone five months.
 The monkeys make sorrowful noise overhead.
- You dragged your feet when you went out.
 20 By the gate now, the moss is grown, the different mosses,
 Too deep to clear them away!

9. Japanese name for Li Po, an eighth-century Chinese poet. Pound’s poem is based on one by Li Po, which Pound read in translation.

The leaves fall early this autumn, in wind.
 The paired butterflies are already yellow with August
 Over the grass in the West garden;
 25 They hurt me. I grow older.
 If you are coming down through the narrows of the river Kiang,
 Please let me know beforehand,
 And I will come out to meet you
 As far as Cho-fu-Sa.

WALLACE STEVENS

Anecdote of the Jar

I placed a jar in Tennessee,
 And round it was, upon a hill.
 It made the slovenly wilderness
 Surround that hill.
 5 The wilderness rose up to it,
 And sprawled around, no longer wild.
 The jar was round upon the ground
 And tall and of a port in air.
 It took dominion everywhere.
 10 The jar was gray and bare.
 It did not give of bird or bush,
 Like nothing else in Tennessee.

The Emperor of Ice-Cream

Call the roller of big cigars,
 The muscular one, and bid him whip
 In kitchen cups concupiscent curds.¹
 Let the wenches dawdle in such dress
 5 As they are used to wear, and let the boys
 Bring flowers in last month's newspapers.
 Let be be finale of seem.²
 The only emperor is the emperor of ice-cream.
 Take from the dresser of deal,
 10 Lacking the three glass knobs, that sheet

1. "The words 'concupiscent curds' have no genealogy; they are merely expressive: at least, I hope they are expressive. They express the concupiscent of life, but, by contrast with the things in relation to them in the poem, they express or accentuate life's destitution, and it is this that gives them something more than a cheap lustre" (Wallace Stevens, Letters. Edited by Holly Stevens, U of California P, 1996, p. 500).

2. "The true sense of Let be be the finale of seem is let being become the conclusion or denouement of appearing to be: in short, icecream is an absolute good. The poem is obviously not about icecream, but about being as distinguished from seeming to be" (Letters 341).

- On which she embroidered fantails³ once
 And spread it so as to cover her face.
 If her horny feet protrude, they come
 To show how cold she is, and dumb.
 15 Let the lamp affix its beam.
 The only emperor is the emperor of ice-cream.

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON

Tears, Idle Tears⁴

- Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean,
 Tears from the depth of some divine despair
 Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,
 In looking on the happy autumn-fields,
 5 And thinking of the days that are no more.
- Fresh as the first beam glittering on a sail,
 That brings our friends up from the underworld,
 Sad as the last which reddens over one
 That sinks with all we love below the verge;
 10 So sad, so fresh, the days that are no more.
- Ah, sad and strange as in dark summer dawns
 The earliest pipe of half-awakened birds
 To dying ears, when unto dying eyes
 The casement slowly grows a glimmering square;
 15 So sad, so strange, the days that are no more.
- Dear as remembered kisses after death,
 And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feigned
 On lips that are for others; deep as love,
 Deep as first love, and wild with all regret;
 20 O Death in Life, the days that are no more!
 1847

Ulysses⁵

- It little profits that an idle king,
 By this still hearth, among these barren crags,
 Matched with an agèd wife,⁶ mete and dole
 Unequal laws unto a savage race,
 5 That hoard, and sleep, and feed, and know not me.

3. Fantail pigeons. 4. One of the songs from Tennyson's book-length narrative poem The Princess.
 5. After the Trojan War ended, Ulysses (or Odysseus), king of Ithaca and one of the war's Greek heroes, returned to his island home (line 34). Homer's account of the situation is in book 11 of The Odyssey, but Dante's account of Ulysses in canto 26 of the Inferno is the more immediate background of Tennyson's poem. 6. Penelope.

I cannot rest from travel; I will drink
 Life to the lees.⁷ All times I have enjoyed Greatly, have suffered greatly, both with those
 That loved me, and alone; on shore, and when 10 Through scudding drifts the rainy Hyades⁸
 Vexed the dim sea. I am become a name;
 For always roaming with a hungry heart
 Much have I seen and known—cities of men
 And manners, climates, councils, governments,
 15 Myself not least, but honored of them all—
 And drunk delight of battle with my peers,
 Far on the ringing plains of windy Troy.
 I am a part of all that I have met;
 Yet all experience is an arch wherethrough
 20 Gleams that untraveled world, whose margin fades
 For ever and for ever when I move.
 How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
 To rust unburnished, not to shine in use!
 As though to breathe were life. Life piled on life
 25 Were all too little, and of one to me
 Little remains; but every hour is saved
 From that eternal silence, something more,
 A bringer of new things; and vile it were
 For some three suns to store and hoard myself,
 30 And this gray spirit yearning in desire
 To follow knowledge like a sinking star,
 Beyond the utmost bound of human thought.

This is my son, mine own Telemachus,
 To whom I leave the scepter and the isle—
 35 Well-loved of me, discerning to fulfill
 This labor, by slow prudence to make mild
 A rugged people, and through soft degrees
 Subdue them to the useful and the good.
 Most blameless is he, centered in the sphere
 40 Of common duties, decent not to fail
 In offices of tenderness, and pay
 Meet adoration to my household gods,
 When I am gone. He works his work, I mine.

There lies the port; the vessel puffs her sail:
 45 There gloom the dark, broad seas. My mariners,
 Souls that have toiled, and wrought, and thought with me—
 That ever with a frolic welcome took
 The thunder and the sunshine, and opposed
 Free hearts, free foreheads—you and I are old;
 50 Old age hath yet his honor and his toil.
 Death closes all; but something ere the end,

7. That is, all the way down to the bottom of the cup.

8. Group of stars believed to predict the rain when they rose at the same time as the sun.

Some work of noble note, may yet be done,
 Not unbecoming men that strove with Gods.
 The lights begin to twinkle from the rocks;
 55 The long day wanes; the slow moon climbs; the deep Moans round with many voices. Come, my friends,
 'Tis not too late to seek a newer world.
 Push off, and sitting well in order smite
 The sounding furrows; for my purpose holds
 60 To sail beyond the sunset, and the baths
 Of all the western stars, until I die.
 It may be that the gulfs will wash us down;⁹
 It may be we shall touch the Happy Isles,¹
 And see the great Achilles, whom we knew.
 65 Though much is taken, much abides; and though
 We are not now that strength which in old days
 Moved earth and heaven, that which we are, we are:
 One equal temper of heroic hearts,
 Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will 70 To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield.

WALT WHITMAN

Facing West from California's Shores

Facing west, from California's shores,
 Inquiring, tireless, seeking what is yet unfound,
 I, a child, very old, over waves, towards the house of maternity,² the land of migrations, look afar,
 Look off the shores of my Western sea, the circle almost circled:
 5 For starting westward from Hindustan, from the vales of Kashmere,
 From Asia, from the north, from the God, the sage, and the hero,
 From the south, from the flowery peninsulas and the spice islands,
 Long having wandered since, round the earth having wandered,
 Now I face home again, very pleased and joyous;
 10 (But where is what I started for, so long ago?
 And why is it yet unfound?)

A Noiseless Patient Spider

A noiseless patient spider,
 I marked where on a little promontory it stood isolated,
 Marked how to explore the vacant vast surrounding,
 It launched forth filament, filament, filament, out of itself,
 5 Ever unreeling them, ever tirelessly speeding them.

9. Beyond the Gulf of Gibraltar was supposed to lie a chasm that led to Hades, the underworld.

1. Elysium, the Islands of the Blessed, where heroes like Achilles (line 64) go after death.

2. Asia, as the supposed birthplace of the human race.

And you O my soul where you stand,
 Surrounded, detached, in measureless oceans of space, Ceaselessly musing, venturing, throwing, seeking the spheres to connect them,
 Till the bridge you will need be formed, till the ductile anchor hold,
 10 Till the gossamer thread you fling catch somewhere, O my soul.

RICHARD WILBUR

Love Calls Us to the Things of This World

The eyes open to a cry of pulleys,
 And spirited from sleep, the astounded soul
 Hangs for a moment bodiless and simple
 As false dawn.
 5 Outside the open window
 The morning air is all awash with angels.
 Some are in bed-sheets, some are in blouses,
 Some are in smocks: but truly there they are.
 Now they are rising together in calm swells
 10 Of halcyon³ feeling, filling whatever they wear
 With the deep joy of their impersonal breathing;
 Now they are flying in place, conveying
 The terrible speed of their omnipresence, moving
 And staying like white water; and now of a sudden 15 They swoon down into so rapt a quiet
 That nobody seems to be there.

The soul shrinks

From all that it is about to remember,
 From the punctual rape of every blessed day,
 20 And cries,
 “Oh, let there be nothing on earth but laundry,
 Nothing but rosy hands in the rising steam
 And clear dances done in the sight of heaven.”

Yet, as the sun acknowledges
 25 With a warm look the world's hunks and colors,
 The soul descends once more in bitter love
 To accept the waking body, saying now
 In a changed voice as the man yawns and rises,
 “Bring them down from their ruddy gallows;
 30 Let there be clean linen for the backs of thieves;
 Let lovers go fresh and sweet to be undone,
 And the heaviest nuns walk in a pure floating
 Of dark habits,
 keeping their difficult balance.”

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

The Dance

In Brueghel's great picture, The Kermess,⁴ the dancers go round, they go round and around, the squeal and the blare and the tweedle of bagpipes, a bugle and fiddles
 5 tipping their bellies (round as the thick-sided glasses whose wash they impound) their hips and their bellies off balance to turn them. Kicking and rolling about the Fair Grounds, swinging their butts, those 10 shanks must be sound to bear up under such rollicking measures, prance as they dance in Brueghel's great picture, The Kermess.

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

[The world is too much with us]

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
 Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers:
 Little we see in Nature that is ours;
 We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!⁵
 5 This Sea that bares her bosom to the moon;
 The winds that will be howling at all hours,
 And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers;
 For this, for every thing, we are out of tune;
 It moves us not.—Great God! I'd rather be 10 A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn;
 So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
 Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
 Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea;
 Or hear old Triton⁶ blow his wreathèd horn.

1807

4. A painting by Pieter Brueghel the Elder (1525?–69).

5. Gift. It is the act of giving the heart away that is sordid.

6. Sea deity, usually represented as blowing on a conch shell. Proteus: an old man of the sea who (in The Odyssey) can assume a variety of shapes.

Biographical Sketches: Poets

Sketches are included for all poets represented by two or more poems.

W. H. AUDEN (1907–73)

Wystan Hugh Auden was born in York, England, to a medical officer and a nurse. Intending at first to become a scientist, Auden studied at Oxford, where he became the center of the “Oxford Group” of poets and leftist intellectuals. His travels during the 1930s led him to Germany, Iceland, China, Spain (where he was an ambulance driver in the civil war), and the United States (where he taught at various universities and, in 1946, became a naturalized citizen). A prolific writer of poems, plays, essays, and criticism, Auden won the Pulitzer Prize in 1948 for his collection of poems The Age of Anxiety, set in a New York City bar. Late in life he returned to Christ Church College, Oxford, where he was writer in residence. He is regarded as a masterly poet of political and intellectual conscience as well as one of the twentieth century’s greatest lyric craftsmen.

BASHŌ (1644–94)

Born Matsuo Munefusa, the second son of a low-ranking provincial samurai, the haiku poet who came to be known as Bashō at first put aside his literary interests and entered into service with the local ruling military house. In 1666, following the feudal lord’s death, Bashō left for Edo (now Tokyo), the military capital of the shogun’s new government, to pursue a career as a professional poet. He supported himself as a teacher and editor of other people’s poetry but ultimately developed a following and a sizable group of students. A seasoned traveler, Bashō maintained an austere existence on the road and at home, casting himself in travel narratives such as Oku no hosomichi (The Narrow Road to the Interior, 1694) as a pilgrim devoted to nature and Zen.

ELIZABETH BISHOP (1911–79)

Born in Worcester, Massachusetts, Elizabeth Bishop endured the death of her father before she was a year old and the institutionalization of her mother four years later. Bishop was raised first by her maternal grandmother in Nova Scotia, then by her paternal grandparents back in Worcester. At Vassar College she met the poet Marianne Moore, who encouraged her to give up plans for medical school and pursue a career in poetry. Bishop traveled through Canada, Europe, and South America, finally settling in Rio de Janeiro, where she lived for nearly twenty years. Her four volumes of poetry are North and South (1946); A Cold Spring (1955), which won the Pulitzer Prize; Questions of Travel (1965); and Geography III (1976), which won the National Book Critics’ Circle Award.

WILLIAM BLAKE (1757–1828)

The son of a London haberdasher and his wife, William Blake studied drawing at ten and at fourteen was apprenticed to an engraver for seven years. After a first book of poems, Poetical Sketches (1783), he began experimenting with what he called “illuminated printing”—the words and pictures of each page were engraved in relief on copper, which was used to print sheets that were then partly colored by hand—a laborious and time-consuming process that resulted in books of singular beauty, no two of which are exactly alike. His great Songs of Innocence and of Experience (1794) were produced in this manner, as were his increasingly mythic and prophetic books, including The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1793), The Four Zoas (1803), Milton (1804), and Jerusalem (1809). Blake devoted his later life to pictorial art, illustrating The Canterbury Tales, the Book of Job, and The Divine Comedy, on which he was hard at work when he died.

GWENDOLYN BROOKS (1917–2000)

Gwendolyn Brooks was born in Topeka, Kansas, and raised in Chicago, where she began writing poetry at the age of seven, and where she graduated from Wilson Junior College in 1936. Shortly after beginning her formal study of modern poetry at Chicago's Southside Community Art Center, Brooks produced her first book of poems, A Street in Bronzeville (1945). With her second volume, Annie Allen (1949), she became the first African American to win the Pulitzer Prize. Though her early work focused on what Langston Hughes called the "ordinary aspects of black life," during the mid-1960s she devoted her poetry to raising African American consciousness and to social activism. In 1968, she was named the Poet Laureate of Illinois; from 1985 to 1986, she became the first black woman ever to serve as poetry consultant to the Library of Congress.

ROBERT BROWNING (1812–89)

Born in London, Robert Browning attended London University but was largely self-educated, learning Latin, Greek, French, and Italian by the time he was fourteen. He was an accomplished but little-known poet and playwright when he began courting the already famous poet Elizabeth Barrett. After they eloped to Italy in 1846, the Brownings enjoyed a period of happiness during which they produced most of their best-known work. Following Elizabeth's death in 1861, Robert returned to England with their son and for the rest of his life enjoyed great literary and social success. His major collections are Men and Women (1855), dedicated to his wife, and Dramatis Personae (1864), which contains some of his finest dramatic monologues. Lionized as one of England's greatest poets by the time of his death, Browning is buried in Poets' Corner at London's Westminster Abbey.

JUDITH ORTIZ COFER (b. 1952)

Born in Hormigueros, Puerto Rico, Judith Ortiz Cofer just two years later moved with her family, first to New Jersey and later to Georgia, experiences that would inspire much of her later fiction and poetry.

"How can you inject passion and purpose into your work if it has no roots?" she asks, avowing that her own roots include a long line of women storytellers who "infected" her at a very early age with the desire to tell stories both on and off the page. After earning an MA at Florida Atlantic University (1977), Ortiz Cofer returned to Georgia, where she currently serves as professor emerita at the University of Georgia. Among her numerous publications are The Line of the Sun (1989), a novel in which a young girl relates the history of her ne'er-do-well uncle's emigration from Puerto Rico; the poetry collection A Love Story Beginning in Spanish (2005); The Latin Deli: Prose and Poetry (1993); and In the Cruel Country: Notes for an Elegy (2015).

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE (1772–1834)

Born in the small town of Ottery St. Mary in rural Devonshire, England, Samuel Taylor Coleridge is among the greatest and most original of the nineteenth-century Romantic poets. He wrote three of the most haunting and powerful poems in English—The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798), Christabel (1816), and "Kubla Khan" (1816)—as well as immensely influential literary criticism and a treatise on biology. In 1795, in the midst of a failed experiment to establish a "Pantisocracy" (his form of ideal community), he met William Wordsworth, and in 1798 they jointly published their enormously influential Lyrical Ballads. Coleridge's physical ailments, addiction to opium, and profound sense of despair made his life difficult and tumultuous and certainly affected his work. Still, he remains a central figure in English literature.

BILLY COLLINS (b. 1941)

Sometimes described as "the most popular poet in America," Billy Collins enjoys the sort of celebrity status usually reserved for Hollywood actors like his friend Bill Murray, reportedly signing six-figure contracts for books-in-progress. As U.S. Poet Laureate (2001–03), however, Collins both refused to publish and hence profit from his poem "The Names," written in honor of the victims of the 9/11 attacks, and initiated philanthropic projects like Poetry 180, which aims at exciting high-schoolers' interest in poetry. Born in New York City, Collins credits his mother with awakening his love of poetry and teaching him the importance of “reading poetry as poetry [. . .] as a set of sounds set to rhythm”—lessons reinforced by his studies at the College of Holy Cross and the University of California—Riverside. Though Collins began publishing his work in the 1980s, it wasn’t until 1991 that his book Questions About Angels thrust him into the spotlight. Since that time, he has published numerous collections, including The Art of Drowning (1995), Taking off Emily Dickinson’s Clothes (2000), Ballistics (2008), and Aimless Love (2013). By his own account “unashamedly” “suburban,” “domestic,” and “middle class,” Collins’s deceptively simple poetry uses the material of the everyday to, as one reader put it, “help us feel the mystery of being alive.”

MARTHA COLLINS (b. 1940)

Nebraska-born poet, teacher, translator, and editor Martha Collins grew up in Des Moines, Iowa, the late and only child of a pharmacist who wanted her to be a doctor and a pianist who fostered the love of music that still, she says, ensures “I usually hear the music of a poem before I begin to understand it.” In the process of earning three degrees in English literature—a Stanford BA (1962) and an MA and PhD from the University of Iowa (1965, 1971)—Collins discovered, in her words, “that I didn’t want to write about writers—I wanted to be one.” Citing as inspirations poets as diverse as Wallace Stevens, Gwendolyn Brooks, John Ashbery, and Emily Dickinson—whom, she says, “taught me to care about everything I see,” as well as “every word I write”—Collins published her first poetry collection, The Catastrophe of Rainbows, in 1985. In addition to later collections such as The Arrangement of Space (1991), Some Things Words Can Do (1998), White Papers (2012), and Day unto Day (2014), Collins’s award-winning body of work includes both three books of poetry translated from the Vietnamese and Blue Front (2006), a book-length poem inspired by a lynching her father witnessed in Cairo, Illinois when he was only five. After over thirty years at the University of Massachusetts–Boston, where she founded and codirected the Creative Writing program, Collins returned to the Midwest in 1997, serving until 2007 as Pauline Delaney Professor of Creative Writing at Oberlin College in Ohio, where she still lives.

COUNTEE CULLEN (1903–46)

During his own lifetime, Countee Cullen was the most celebrated and honored poet of the Harlem Renaissance, and he claimed New York City as his birthplace. In fact, he may have been born in Louisville, Kentucky, and the circumstances of his childhood adoption by the Reverend Frederick Cullen remain obscure. It is certain, though, that the poet received a good education at New York’s DeWitt Clinton High School and then New York University. After receiving his MA at Harvard, Cullen returned to New York in 1926 and soon established himself as the leading figure in the Harlem literary world, winning numerous awards for his poetry and editing the influential monthly column “The Dark Tower” for Opportunity: Journal of Negro Life. A playwright, novelist, translator, and anthologist, Cullen is best remembered as a poet; his work has been collected in the volume My Soul’s High Song: The Collected Writings of Countee Cullen, Voice of the Harlem Renaissance (1991).

E. E. CUMMINGS (1894–1962)

Born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, the son of a Congregationalist minister, Edward Estlin Cummings attended Harvard University, where he wrote poetry in the Pre-Raphaelite and Metaphysical traditions. He joined the ambulance corps in France the day after the United States entered World War I but was imprisoned by the French due to his outspoken opposition to the war; he transmuted the experience into his first literary success, the novel The Enormous Room (1922). After the war, Cummings established himself as a poet and artist in New York City’s Greenwich Village, made frequent trips to France and New Hampshire, and showed little interest in wealth or his growing celebrity. His variety of Modernism was distinguished by its playfulness, its formal experimentation, its lyrical directness, and above all its celebration of the individual.

EMILY DICKINSON (1830–86)

From childhood on, Emily Dickinson led a sequestered and obscure life. Yet her verse has traveled far beyond the cultured yet relatively circumscribed environment in which she lived: her room, her father's house, her family, a few close friends, and the small town of Amherst, Massachusetts. Indeed, along with Walt Whitman, her far more public contemporary, she all but invented American poetry. Born in Amherst, the daughter of a respected lawyer whom she revered ("His heart was pure and terrible," she once wrote), Dickinson studied for less than a year at the Mount Holyoke Female Seminary, returning permanently to her family home. She became more and more reclusive, dressing only in white, seeing no visitors, yet working ceaselessly at her poems—nearly eighteen hundred in all, only a few of which were published during her lifetime. After her death, her sister Lavinia discovered the rest in a trunk, neatly bound into packets with blue ribbons—among the most important bodies of work in all of American literature.

JOHN DONNE (1572–1631)

The first and greatest of the English writers who came to be known as the Metaphysical poets, John Donne wrote in a revolutionary style that combined highly intellectual conceits with complex, compressed phrasing. Born into an old Roman Catholic family at a time when Catholics were subject to constant harassment, Donne quietly abandoned his religion and had a promising legal career until a politically disastrous marriage ruined his worldly hopes. He struggled for years to support a large family; impoverished and despairing, he even wrote a treatise (Biathanatos) on the lawfulness of suicide. King James (who had ambitions for him as a preacher) eventually pressured Donne to take Anglican orders in 1615, and Donne became one of the great sermonizers of his day, rising to the position of dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in 1621. Donne's private devotions ("Meditations") were published in 1624, and he continued to write poetry until a few years before his death.

PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR (1872–1906)

The son of former slaves, Paul Laurence Dunbar was born in Dayton, Ohio. He attended a white high school, where he showed an early talent for writing and was elected class president. Unable to afford further education, he then worked as an elevator operator, writing poems and newspaper articles in his spare time. Dunbar took out a loan to subsidize the printing of his first book, Oak and Ivy (1893), but with the publication of Majors and Minors (1895) and Lyrics of Lowly Life (1896), his growing reputation enabled him to support himself by writing and lecturing. Though acclaimed during his lifetime for his lyrical use of rural black dialect in volumes such as Candle-Lightin' Time (1902), Dunbar was later criticized for adopting "white" literary conventions and accused of pandering to racist images of slaves and ex-slaves. He wrote novels and short stories in addition to poetry and dealt frankly with racial injustice in works such as The Sport of the Gods (1903) and The Fourth of July and Race Outrages (1903).

MARTÍN ESPADA (b. 1957)

At the age of thirteen, Martín Espada moved with his family to a Long Island neighborhood where they were the only Puerto Ricans, an experience he describes as "more traumatic than anything that ever happened to me on the so-called mean streets" of the racially diverse Brooklyn neighborhood he previously called home. By working everywhere from a bar and a ballpark to a primate lab and a transient hotel, Espada put himself through college, graduating from the University of Wisconsin–Madison with a BA in history, with a focus on Latin America. After earning a law degree at Northeastern University, in Boston, he went to work as a lawyer, specializing first in bilingual education, later in housing law. From age twenty, however, Espada was also writing poetry, inspired initially by a family friend's gift of both an anthology of Latin American revolutionary poetry and the prediction that "Tri tambien seras poeta" ("You will also become a poet"). Featuring barrio photos taken by his father, a community activist, Espada's first collection, The Immigrant Iceboy's Bolero, appeared in 1982. But it was his third, prize-winning book, Rebellion Is the Circle of a Lover's Hand (1990), that led the New York Times to predict he would be "the Latino poet of his generation." In the years since, Espada has done much to earn that title, securing a professorship at the University of Massachusetts–Amherst (in 1993) and publishing not only poetry collections ranging from City of Coughing and Dead Radiators (1993) to The Republic of Poetry (2006, a finalist for the Pulitzer) but also books of essays including Zapata's Disciple (1998), anthologies of Latino and Chicano poetry, and translations. What drives all that work, says Espada, is the same commitment he had as a lawyer: “to speak on behalf of” all those who lack not the ability but the “opportunity” to “speak for themselves.”

ROBERT FROST (1874–1963)

Though his poetry identifies Frost with rural New England, he was born and lived to the age of eleven in San Francisco. Moving to New England after his father's death, Frost studied classics in high school, entered and dropped out of both Dartmouth and Harvard, and spent difficult years as an unrecognized poet before his first book, A Boy's Will (1913), was accepted and published in England. Frost's character was full of contradiction—he held “that we get forward as much by hating as by loving”—yet by the end of his long life he was one of the most honored poets of his time, as well as the most widely read. In 1961, two years before his death, he was invited to read a poem at John F. Kennedy's presidential inauguration ceremony. Frost's poems—masterfully crafted, sometimes deceptively simple—are collected in The Poetry of Robert Frost (1969).

ALLEN GINSBERG (1926–97)

After a childhood in Paterson, New Jersey, overshadowed by his mother's mental illness, Allen Ginsberg enrolled at Columbia University, intent upon following his father's advice and becoming a labor lawyer. At the center of a circle that included Lucien Carr, Jack Kerouac, William S. Burroughs, and Neal Cassady, Ginsberg became interested in experimental poetry and alternative lifestyles. He graduated in 1948 and then joined the literary scene in San Francisco. In 1956, he published Howl and Other Poems, with an introduction by his mentor William Carlos Williams. The title poem, which condemned bourgeois culture and celebrated the emerging counterculture, became a manifesto for the Beat movement and catapulted Ginsberg to fame. Deeply involved in radical politics and Eastern spiritualism, Ginsberg went on to write such prose works as Declaration of Independence for Dr. Timothy Leary (1971) in addition to many volumes of poetry.

ANGELINA GRIMKÉ (1880–1958)

Born in Boston, Angelina Grimké was the descendent of black slaves, white slaveholders, free blacks, and prominent white abolitionists, including her namesake, Angelina Weld Grimké. As a child, Angelina was abandoned by her white mother, whose middle-class family disapproved of her marriage to Archibald Grimké, a biracial lawyer and author who eventually became vice president of the NAACP. Grimké graduated from the Boston Normal School of Gymnastics in 1902 and then moved with her father to Washington, D.C., where she worked as a teacher and began to write poetry, essays, short stories, and plays. By the 1920s, she was publishing her work in the leading journals and anthologies of the Harlem Renaissance—The Crisis, Opportunity, Alain Locke's The New Negro (1925), Countee Cullen's Caroling Dusk (1927), and Robert Kerlin's Negro Poets and Their Poems (1928). Much of her finest writing can be found in Selected Works of Angelina Weld Grimké (1991).

ROBERT HAYDEN (1913–80)

Born in a Detroit ghetto, Asa Sheffey became “Robert Hayden” at eighteen months, when he was unofficially adopted by the neighbors who would raise him and whom he would remember in poems such as “Those Winter Sundays.” Inspired by the Harlem Renaissance writers he discovered as a teenager, Hayden published his first poem in 1931. Severely nearsighted, he attended Detroit City College (1932–36), thanks only to state rehabilitation grants, and worked for the Federal Writers Project (1936–39), before studying with W. H. Auden at the University of Michigan (MA, 1944). Becoming “a poet who teaches [. . .] so that he can write a poem or two now and then,” Hayden held professorships at historically black Fisk University (1946–69) and at the University of Michigan (1969–80). International acclaim came late: In 1966, Langston Hughes and seven other judges unanimously awarded Hayden the Grand Prize for Poetry at the First World Festival of Negro Arts in Senegal, and in 1976 he became the first African American appointed to the post now known as U.S. Poet Laureate. Like his masterpiece “Middle Passage” (1962), much of Hayden's poetry aims, he said, to “correct the distortions of Afro-American history.” Yet he passionately insisted that he was not a “black artist” but an American one. Today he is widely and rightly regarded as among the very best of both.

TERRANCE HAYES (b. 1971)

Born in Columbia, South Carolina, Terrence Hayes attended Coker College on a basketball scholarship, shifting his attention to poetry only in his senior year and going on to earn an MFA from the University of Pittsburgh (1997). His first book of poetry, Muscular Music (1999), is an exploration of popular culture’s impact on African American identity and notions of masculinity, and was followed by Hip Logic (2002), a National Poetry Series winner, and Wind in a Box (2006), listed by Publishers Weekly as one of the top 100 books of 2006. Characterized as “an elegant and adventurous writer” whose work deftly combines humor and sincerity, Hayes has garnered numerous honors and awards for his work, including a National Book Award for his fourth collection, Lighthead (2010), three Best American Poetry selections, a Pushcart Prize, and a MacArthur Fellowship. Though he is continually drawn to themes of identity, masculinity, race, culture, and community, he “aspire[s] to a poetic style that resists style”; and indeed, his collections contain poetic forms that range from pecha kucha, a format for Japanese business presentations, to Dante’s terza rima, and adopt the voices of poets from Amiri Baraka to Dr. Seuss. Hayes teaches creative writing at the University of Pittsburgh, where he lives with his wife and fellow poet Yona Harvey and their children.

SEAMUS HEANEY (1939–2013)

Considered “the most important Irish poet since Yeats,” 1995 Nobel Prize–winner Seamus Heaney grew up with his eight siblings on Mossbawn Farm in rural County Derry, Northern Ireland. At twelve, however, scholarships took Heaney first to St. Columb’s College and then Queen’s University, Belfast, where he studied Irish, Latin, and Old English. Here, too, he discovered the poetry of authors such as Ted Hughes, Patrick Kavanagh, and Robert Frost, which, he said, first taught him to “trust” in the value of that “local” childhood experience that he once “considered archaic and irrelevant to the modern world.” Rural life and labor, as well as the relationship between past and present, the “archaic” and the “modern,” loom large from his earliest collection, Death of a Naturalist (1966), to much later ones such as District and Circle (2006). Most famous, perhaps, is North (1975), especially its sequence of poems inspired by both the ancient, yet somehow ageless, corpses discovered in Irish and Scandinavian bogs, and also by the increasingly violent conflict between Protestants and Catholics in Northern Ireland. Having earned virtually all of the highest honors that a contemporary poet could, Heaney also won acclaim both as a versatile and creative translator, most famously of Beowulf (2000) and Antigone (The Burial at Thebes), (2004), and as an essayist; his Finders Keepers: Selected Prose, 1971–2001 (2002) won the Truman Capote Award for Literary Criticism, the largest annual prize of its kind. After teaching at Harvard from 1985 until 2006, Heaney lived in Dublin until his death.

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS (1844–89)

Born the eldest of eight children of a marine-insurance adjuster and his wife, Gerard Manley Hopkins attended Oxford, where his ambition was to become a painter—until, at the age of twenty-two, he converted to Roman Catholicism and burned all his early poetry as too worldly. Not until after his seminary training and ordination as a Jesuit priest, in 1877, did he resume writing poetry, though he made few attempts to publish his verse, which many of his contemporaries found nearly incomprehensible. Near the end of his life, Hopkins was appointed professor of Greek at University College, Dublin, where—out of place, deeply depressed, and all but unknown—he died of typhoid. His poetry, collected and published by his friends, has been championed by modern poets, who admire its controlled tension, strong rhythm, and sheer exuberance.

LANGSTON HUGHES (1902–67)

Born in Joplin, Missouri, Langston Hughes was raised mainly by his maternal grandmother, though he lived intermittently with each of his parents. He studied at Columbia University but left to travel and work at a variety of jobs. Having already published poems in periodicals, anthologies, and his own first collection, The Weary Blues (1926), he graduated from Lincoln University; published a successful novel, Not without Laughter (1930); and became a major writer in the Harlem Renaissance. During the 1930s, he became involved in radical politics and traveled the world as a correspondent and columnist; during the 1950s, though, the FBI classified him as a security risk and limited his ability to travel. In addition to poems and novels, he wrote essays, plays, screenplays, and an autobiography; he also edited anthologies of literature and folklore.

JOHN KEATS (1795–1821)

Because John Keats was the son of a London livery stable owner and his wife, reviewers would later disparage him as a working-class “Cockney poet.” At fifteen he was apprenticed to a surgeon, and at twenty-one he became a licensed pharmacist—in the same year that his first two published poems, including the sonnet “On First Looking into Chapman’s Homer,” appeared in The Examiner, a journal edited by the critic and poet Leigh Hunt. Hunt introduced Keats to such literary figures as the poet Percy Bysshe Shelley and helped him publish his Poems by John Keats (1817). When his second book, the long poem Endymion (1818), was fiercely attacked by critics, Keats, suffering from a steadily worsening case of tuberculosis, knew that he would not live to realize his poetic promise. In July 1820, he published Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St. Agnes; and Other Poems, which contained the poignant “To Autumn” and three other great odes: “Ode on a Grecian Urn,” “Ode on Melancholy,” and “Ode to a Nightingale”; early the next year, he died in Rome. In the years after Keats’s death, his letters became almost as famous as his poetry.

ETHERIDGE KNIGHT (1931–91)

A native of Corinth, Mississippi, Etheridge Knight spent much of his adolescence carousing in pool halls, bars, and juke joints, developing a skillful oratorical style in an environment that prized verbal agility. During this time, he also became addicted to narcotics. He served in the U.S. Army from 1947 to 1951; in 1960 he was sentenced to eight years in prison for robbery. At the Indiana State Prison in Michigan City, he began to write poetry and in 1968 published his first collection, Poems from Prison. After his release, Knight joined the Black Arts movement, taught at a number of universities, and published works including Black Voices from Prison (1970), Belly Song and Other Poems (1973), and Born of a Woman (1980).

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA (b. 1947)

The first African American man to win a Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, Yusef Komunyakaa once described his life and work as a “process” of “healing” from “two places.” The first was Bogalusa, Louisiana—the segregated rural mill town where James Willie Brown, Jr., grew up, learning “the importance of music and metaphor” from the Bible and the family radio, “the value of tools” and “precision” from a carpenter father unable to read or write. The second was Vietnam, where twenty-one-year-old Komunyakaa—who eventually adopted the surname his great-grandparents gave up when they emigrated from Trinidad—earned a Bronze Star for meritorious wartime service. While pursuing a BA (University of Colorado, 1975), an MA (Colorado State, 1979), and an MFA (University of California, Irvine, 1980), Komunyakaa began to turn the first of these places into poetry, initially gaining recognition with the jazz- and blues-inflected collection Copacetic (1984). National acclaim came with Dien Cai Dau (1988), the book in which, twenty years after the fact, the poet finally, in his own words, stopped “writing around the war.” In the years since, Komunyakaa’s numerous collections have garnered him some of poetry’s highest honors, including a Pulitzer (for Neon Vernacular: New & Selected Poems 1977–1989 [1994]), the Ruth Lilly Poetry Prize (2001), and the Wallace Stevens Award (2011). Today Global Distinguished Professor of English at New York University, Komunyakaa is also the editor of two jazz poetry anthologies; cotranslator (with Martha Collins) of Vietnamese poet Nguyen Quan Thieu’s The Insomnia of Fire (1995); and author of Blues Notes: Essays, Interviews & Commentaries (2000) and, with Chad Gracia, of Gilgamesh: A Verse Play (2006).

PHILIP LARKIN (1922–85)

Postwar England’s most widely known and popular poet, so-called laureate of the common man Philip Larkin endured what he later described as a boring childhood as the second, belated, rather shy—because also nearsighted and stuttering—child of Coventry's city treasurer. Exempted from service in World War II because of his eyesight, Larkin graduated from Oxford in 1943 and became a librarian, mainly at Hull, where he headed the university library for thirty years (1955–85). Larkin credited his rediscovery of Thomas Hardy's poetry with "cur[ling]" him of the Yeatsian "Celtic fever" of his first collection, The North Ship (1945), and helping him to develop the mature style debuted in his second, The Less Deceived (1955). This critically acclaimed book made Larkin the undisputed leading light of "the Movement," a group of young poets who rejected the enigmatic, allusive, and—in their eyes—elitist modernism of T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound in favor of a more straightforward and robust, if also skeptical and ironic, style. Notoriously publicity-averse, Larkin declined the position of Poet Laureate of the United Kingdom just a year before his death. In his lifetime, he published only two other volumes of verse, The Whitsun Weddings (1964) and High Windows (1974); two novels, Jill (1946) and A Girl in Winter (1947); All What Jazz (1970), a collection of jazz reviews originally written for the Daily Telegraph; and the best-selling Required Writing: Miscellaneous Pieces 1955–1982 (1983). Since his death, Larkin has become a more controversial figure, thanks less to the previously unpublished work included in Collected Poems (1988) than to the publication of both his Selected Letters (1992) and Andrew Motion's revealing biography, Philip Larkin: A Writer's Life (1993).

CLAUDE MCKAY (1889–1948)

Festus Claudius McKay was born and raised in Sunny Ville, Clarendon Parish, Jamaica, the youngest of eleven children. He worked as a wheelwright and cabinetmaker, then briefly as a police constable, before writing and publishing two books of poetry in Jamaican dialect. In 1912, he emigrated to the United States, where he attended Booker T. Washington's Tuskegee Institute in Alabama and studied agricultural science at Kansas State College before moving to New York City. McKay supported himself through various jobs while becoming a prominent literary and political figure. The oldest Harlem Renaissance writer, McKay was also the first to publish, with the poetry collection Harlem Shadows (1922). His other works include the novels Home to Harlem (1928) and Banana Bottom (1933) and his autobiography, A Long Way from Home (1937).

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY (1892–1950)

Born in Rockland, Maine, Edna St. Vincent Millay published her first poem at twenty, her first poetry collection at twenty-five. After graduating from Vassar College, she moved to New York City's Greenwich Village, where she both gained a reputation as a brilliant poet and became notorious for her bohemian life and her association with prominent artists, writers, and radicals. In 1923, she won the Pulitzer Prize for her collection The Ballad of the Harp-Weaver; in 1925, growing weary of fame, she and her husband moved to Austerlitz, New York, where she lived for the rest of her life. Although her work fell out of favor with mid-twentieth-century Modernists, who rejected her formalism as old-fashioned, her poetry—witty, acerbic, and superbly crafted—has found many new admirers today.

PAT MORA (b. 1942)

Born to Mexican American parents in El Paso, Texas, Pat Mora earned a BA and an MA from the University of Texas at El Paso. She has been a consultant on U.S.-Mexico youth exchanges; a museum director and administrator at her alma mater; and a teacher of English at all levels. Her poetry—collected in Chants (1985), Borders (1986), Communion (1991), Agua Santa (1995), Aunt Carmen's Book of Practical Saints (1997), and Adobe Odes (2006)—reflects and addresses her Chicana and southwestern background. Mora's other publications include Nepantla: Essays from the Land in the Middle (1993); a family memoir, House of Houses (1997); and many works for children and young adults.

SHARON OLDS (b. 1942)

Born in San Francisco; raised in Berkeley by fiercely religious, yet troubled parents; and educated at Stanford (BA, 1964) and Columbia (PhD, 1972) universities (where she wrote a dissertation on Ralph Waldo Emerson), poet Sharon Olds was thirty-seven when she published her first book of poetry, Satan Says, in 1981. Since then, she has come to rank as one of America's most important living poets, garnering National Book Critics' Circle Awards both for her 1984 collection The Dead and the Living and for Strike Spark: Selected Poems (2002). In 2013, she became the first woman to win the T.S. Eliot Prize for Poetry, for Stag's Leap, a collection that also earned a Pulitzer. Like the work of two writers to whom Olds is often compared, Walt Whitman and Sylvia Plath, however, hers has consistently provoked controversy, thanks mainly to its unflinching attention to, and distinctly female perspective on, the pleasures and pains of both the human body and the family, as well as emotional and literal violence. The Dead and the Living is divided between "Poems for the Living," about the poet's experience as daughter and mother, and "Poems for the Dead," about the victims of international conflicts; The Father (1992) chronicles her father's death (from cancer), One Secret Thing (2008), her mother's. Stag's Leap (2013) deals with the disintegration of her 32-year marriage. As famous for her reticence off the page as for her candor on it, Olds teaches creative writing both at New York University and in a program for the severely disabled that she founded at NYU's Goldwater Hospital.

WILFRED OWEN (1893–1918)

Born in Oswestry, Shropshire, England, Wilfred Owen left school in 1911, having failed to win a scholarship to London University. He served as assistant to a vicar in Oxfordshire until 1913, when he left to teach English at a Berlitz school in Bordeaux. In 1915, Owen returned to England to enlist in the army and was sent to the front lines in France. Suffering from shell shock two years later, he was evacuated to Craiglockhart War Hospital, where he met the poets Siegfried Sassoon and Robert Graves. Five of Owen's poems were published in 1918, the year he returned to combat; he was killed one week before the signing of the armistice. His poems, which portray the horror of trench warfare and satirize the unthinking patriotism of those who cheered the war from their armchairs, are collected in the two-volume Complete Poems and Fragments (1983).

DOROTHY PARKER (1893–1967)

Born in West End, New Jersey, Dorothy Rothchild worked for both Vogue and Vanity Fair magazines before becoming a freelance writer. In 1917, she married Edwin Pond Parker II, whom she divorced in 1928. Her first book of verse, Enough Rope (1926), was a best-seller and was followed by Sunset Gun (1928), Death and Taxes (1931), and Collected Poems: Not So Deep as a Well (1936). In 1927, Parker became a book reviewer for the New Yorker, to which she contributed for most of her career. In 1933, Parker and her second husband, Alan Campbell, moved to Hollywood, where they collaborated as film writers. In addition, Parker wrote criticism, two plays, short stories, and news reports from the Spanish Civil War. She is probably best remembered, though, as the reigning wit at the "Round Table" at Manhattan's Algonquin Hotel, where, in the 1920s and '30s, she traded barbs with other prominent writers and humorists.

LINDA PASTAN (b. 1932)

Linda Pastan was born in New York City and raised in nearby Westchester County. After graduating from Radcliffe College, she received an MA in literature from Brandeis University. Although her first published poems appeared in Mademoiselle in 1955, Pastan spent many years concentrating on her husband and three children—indeed, much of her poetry deals with her own family life. Her many collections include A Perfect Circle of Sun (1971), The Five Stages of Grief (1978), American Book Award nominee PM/AM: New and Selected Poems (1982), Carnival Evening: New and Selected Poems 1968–1998 (1998), Queen of a Rainy Country (2006), and Traveling Light (2011). She lives in Potomac, Maryland.

SYLVIA PLATH (1932–63)

Sylvia Plath was born in Boston; her father, a Polish immigrant, died when she was eight. After graduating from Smith College, Plath attended Cambridge University on a Fulbright scholarship, and there she met and married the poet Ted Hughes, with whom she had two children. As she documented in her novel The Bell Jar (1963), in 1953—between her junior and senior years of college—Plath became seriously depressed, attempted suicide, and was hospitalized. In 1963, the breakup of her marriage led to another suicide attempt, this time successful. Plath has attained cult status as much for her poems as for her “martyrdom” to art and life. In addition to her first volume of poetry, The Colossus (1960), Plath’s work has been collected in general—led him to found the Imagist school of poetry, to advise and assist many great writers (Eliot, Joyce, Williams, Frost, and Hemingway, to name a few), and to write a number of highly influential critical works. His increasingly fiery and erratic behavior led to a charge of treason (he served as a propagandist for Italian Fascist Beni Mussolini during World War II), a diagnosis of insanity, and twelve years at St. Elizabeth’s, an institution for the criminally insane.

Son of a wealthy merchant, London-born Alexander Pope managed to become the greatest poet of his age, one of the most accomplished versifiers and satirists in English literary history, and the first

British writer to make his living entirely by his pen despite—or, rather, thanks to—two obvious handicaps. One, tuberculosis of the spine, contracted in infancy, ensured that Pope was, in the words of his contemporaries, only “about four feet six high; very humpbacked and deformed,” plagued with “the headache four days in a week, and [. . .] sick [. . .] the other three.” Two, as a Roman Catholic, Pope was legally debarred from voting or holding public office, inheriting or purchasing land, living within ten miles of London, or attending any of England’s so-called public schools or universities. Largely self-taught and unable to rely on patronage, the pugnacious, politically conservative Pope launched his career with poems celebrating natural beauty and love (Pastorals [1709] and Windsor Forest [1713]) but leapt to fame with two book-length poems in a very different spirit—the didactic An Essay on Criticism (1711) and the brilliant mock epic The Rape of the Lock (1712, 1714). Made wealthy by his monumental translations of Homer’s Iliad (1720) and Odyssey (1726), Pope retired to a five-acre villa in Twickenham, outside London. By the time of his death at age fifty-six, he had produced an unrivalled body of work that includes at least two other masterpieces, the merciless satire The Dunciad (1728) and the philosophical verse-treatise An Essay on Man (1734).

EZRA POUND (1885–1972)

Born in Hailey, Idaho, Ezra Pound studied at the University of Pennsylvania and Hamilton College before traveling to Europe in 1908. He remained there, living in Ireland, England, France, and Italy, for much of his life. Pound’s tremendous ambition—to succeed in his own work and to influence the development of poetry and Western culture in general—led him to found the Imagist school of poetry, to advise and assist many great writers (Eliot, Joyce, Williams, Frost, and Hemingway, to name a few), and to write a number of highly influential critical works. His increasingly fiery and erratic behavior led to a charge of treason (he served as a propagandist for Italian Fascist Beni Mussolini during World War II), a diagnosis of insanity, and twelve years at St. Elizabeth’s, an institution for the criminally insane.

ADRIENNE RICH (1929–2012)

Easily one of the foremost poets and public intellectuals of her time, Adrienne Rich was born in Baltimore, Maryland, daughter of a former concert pianist and of a renowned Johns Hopkins University pathologist.

Rich’s career as a poet began in 1951, when the Radcliffe College senior’s first volume, A Change of World (1951), was selected by W. H. Auden for the prestigious Yale Younger Poets Award. Two years later, Rich married Harvard economist Alfred Conrad, with whom she had three children. As the 1950s gave way to the 1960s and ’70s, Rich’s life and work changed profoundly. Beginning with her 1963 collection, Snapshots of a Daughter-in-Law, her poetry became ever less tightly controlled and formal, as it became ever more politically and personally charged, reflecting her deep engagement with the feminist, antiwar, and civil rights movements. After her recently estranged husband’s suicide (1970) and publication of the National Book Award-winning Diving into the Wreck (1974), Rich began a lifelong partnership with Jamaican-born novelist and editor Michelle Cliff and published her two most influential prose works, Of Woman Born: Motherhood as Experience and Institution (1976) and On Lies, Secrets and Silence (1979), which includes her landmark essay “Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence.” In the decades that followed, Rich never rested on her countless laurels, fiercely pursuing both her craft and her campaign for social justice. Her thirtieth and last volume of verse, Tonight No Poetry Will Serve, came out in 2010, just two years before her death, at age eighty-two, from the rheumatoid arthritis she had battled for decades. In its obituary, the New York Times aptly dubbed her “a poet of towering reputation,” whose work is “distinguished by an unswerving progressive vision and a dazzling, empathetic ferocity.”

KAY RYAN (b. 1945)

Described by fellow poet J. D. McClatchy as “compact, exhilarating, strange affairs” full of sly wordplay and wit, Kay Ryan’s poems are often compared to Emily Dickinson’s. Like Dickinson, says Jack Foley, “Ryan can certainly be funny, but it is rarely without a sting.” Typically less than 20 lines long and with lines often containing six syllables or less, Ryan’s poems tend to have what she calls “the most dangerous shape,” one in which “nearly every word is on one edge or the other” and “you can’t hide anything” because “Any crap is going to show.” U.S. Poet Laureate from 2008 to 2010 and winner of the 2011 Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, Ryan earned such accolades the hard way. Raised in California’s Mojave Desert and San Joaquin Valley by her oil-well-driller father and once rejected from the poetry club at UCLA, where she earned both BA (1967) and MA (1968) degrees in English, Ryan began teaching remedial English at the College of Marin in 1971, receiving widespread recognition for her poetry only some twenty years later. “All of us want instant success,” she has said, “I’m glad I was on a sort of slow drip.” This “drip” has produced over seven volumes, including Say Uncle (2000) and The Best of It: New and Selected Poems (2010). In 2009 Ryan was widowed by the death of Carol Adair, her partner of over thirty years. Although she is sometimes accused of being too apolitical by members of the gay community, Ryan’s 30-plus years at Marin have made her a strong and vocal advocate of what she describes as America’s “much underpraised and underfunded community colleges.”

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE (1554–1616)

Considering the great fame of his work, surprisingly little is known of William Shakespeare’s life. Between 1585 and 1592, he left his birthplace of Stratford-upon-Avon for London to begin a career as playwright and actor. No dates of his professional career are recorded, however, nor can the order in which he composed his plays and poems be determined with any certainty. By 1594, he had established himself as a poet with two long works—Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece—and his more than 150 sonnets are supreme expressions of the form. His reputation, though, rests on the works he wrote for the theater. Shakespeare produced perhaps thirty-five plays in twenty-five years, proving himself a master of every dramatic genre: tragedy (in works such as Macbeth, Hamlet, King Lear, and Othello); historical drama (for example, Richard III and Henry IV); comedy (Twelfth Night, As You Like It, and many more); and romance (in plays such as The Tempest and Cymbaline). Without question, Shakespeare is the most quoted, discussed, and beloved English writer.

WALLACE STEVENS (1879–1955)

Born and raised in Reading, Pennsylvania, Wallace Stevens attended Harvard University and New York Law School. In New York City, he worked for a number of law firms, published poems in magazines, and befriended such literary figures as William Carlos Williams and Marianne Moore. In 1916, Stevens moved to Connecticut and began working for the Hartford Accident and Indemnity Company, where he became a vice president in 1934 and where he worked for the rest of his life, writing poetry at night and during vacations. He published his first collection, Harmonium, in 1923 and followed it with a series of volumes from 1935 until 1950, establishing himself as one of the twentieth century’s most important poets. His lectures were collected in The Necessary Angel: Essays on Reality and Imagination (1951); his Collected Poems appeared in 1954.

ADRIENNE SU (b. 1967)

Adrienne Su grew up in Atlanta, Georgia, unaware, she says, of the ironies involved in being “viewed as Chinese,” while “I knew no Chinese and thrived on the study of Latin.” A graduate of Harvard and the University of Virginia, where she studied with Rita Dove, Gregory Orr, and Charles Wright, Su, by her own account, “started writing as soon as I could form a sentence on paper” and “started sending out work” while still in high school. Having worked as a freelance editor and writer, Su is today an associate professor of English and Poet-in-Residence at Pennsylvania’s Dickinson College; a wife and mother; and the author of three poetry collections, Middle Kingdom (1997), Sanctuary (2006), and Having None of It (2009). Crediting her high-school Latin teacher and the ancient Roman poet Virgil with first teaching her the art of meter, and her early involvement in poetry slams with bolstering her commitment to writing “poems that on some levels can be read by anyone.” Su also, in her words, “prefer[s] the daily to the exotic as subject matter;” seeing writing as best when “it’s woven into every life, as a ritual that fits somewhere between making pancakes for my kids and preparing a class for college students.”

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON (1809–92)

Certainly the most popular and perhaps the most important of the Victorian poets, Alfred, Lord Tennyson demonstrated his talents at an early age; he published his first volume in 1827. Encouraged to devote his life to poetry by a group of undergraduates at Cambridge University known as the “Apostles,” Tennyson was particularly close to Arthur Hallam, whose sudden death in 1833 inspired the long elegy In Memoriam (1850). With that poem he achieved lasting fame and recognition; he was appointed Poet Laureate the year of its publication, succeeding Wordsworth. Despite the great popularity of his “journalistic” poems—“The Charge of the Light Brigade” (1854) is perhaps the best known—Tennyson’s great theme was the past, both personal (In the Valley of Caunteretz, 1864) and national (Idylls of the King, 1869). Tennyson was made a baron in 1884; when he died, eight years later, he was buried in Poets’ Corner in London’s Westminster Abbey.

NATASHA TRETHERWEY (b. 1966)

Daughter of a social worker and a Canadian poet who met at a Kentucky college, but had to marry in Ohio because of laws banning interracial unions, Natasha Trethewey was born in her mother’s hometown of Gulfport, Mississippi. After her parents’ divorce, she lived with her mother in Atlanta, summering on the Gulf Coast with both her father and her mother’s family. In 1985, Trethewey was just beginning her studies at the University of Georgia when her stepfather murdered her mother. Turning to poetry to deal with her grief, Trethewey earned her BA in 1989; an MA from Virginia’s Hollins College, where her father was a professor (1991); and an MFA from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst (1995). After a short stint teaching at Auburn University, Trethewey moved to Emory and, in 2007, became only the fourth African American poet ever to win the Pulitzer Prize, for Native Guard. Her third collection, it explores the problem of individual and collective historical amnesia through elegies to her mother and a ten-sonnet sequence written from the perspective of a soldier in the first all-black regiment to fight on the Union side in the Civil War. The years 2007–08, however, also brought Trethewey loss and hardship when her brother was imprisoned on drug-related charges and her beloved grandmother died. Interweaving poetry, essays, and letters, her memoir Beyond Katrina: A Meditation on the Mississippi Gulf Coast (2010) reflects on both the region and her family’s efforts to remember and rebuild.

WALT WHITMAN (1819–92)

Walt Whitman was born on a farm in West Hills, Long Island, to a British father and a Dutch mother. After working as a journalist throughout New York for many years, he taught for a time and founded his own newspaper, The Long Islander, in 1838; he then left journalism to work on Leaves of Grass, originally intended as a poetic treatise on American democratic idealism. Published privately in multiple editions from 1855 to 1874, the book of poems at first failed to reach a mass audience. In 1881, Boston’s Osgood and Company published another edition of Leaves of Grass, which sold well until the district attorney called it “obscene literature” and stipulated that Whitman remove certain poems and phrases. He refused, and it was many years before his works were again published, this time in Philadelphia. By the time Whitman died, his work was revered, as it still is today, for its greatness of spirit and its exuberant American voice.

RICHARD WILBUR (b. 1921)

The son of a painter and a newspaperman’s daughter, former U.S. Poet Laureate Richard Wilbur was raised in rural New Jersey, a background that may help to explain his precise imagery and keen interest in nature. Graduating from Amherst College into a world at war, Wilbur in 1942 married the woman who would remain his wife for over sixty years, joined the army, and, by his own account, began to “versify in earnest” because “One does not use poetry [...] as a means to organize oneself and the world, until one’s world somehow gets out of hand.” The many collections Wilbur published between his first, The Beautiful Changes and Other Poems (1947), and Anterooms: New Poems and Translations (2010) include two Pulitzer Prize winners: Things of This World (1956) and New and Collected Poems (1988). In recent decades Wilbur's poems have been increasingly lauded for the very qualities that drew criticism in the 30 years between his two Pulitzer Prizes: As critic Gerry Cunningham wittily puts it, "They never raise their voices, put knives to their throats, drink too much, tell dirty jokes, or take their clothes off in public." Using traditional patterns of rhyme and meter, they "acknowledge horror," but remain largely "untouched by it."

Born in Rutherford, New Jersey, William Carlos Williams attended school in Switzerland and New York and studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania and the University of Leipzig in Germany. He spent most of his life in Rutherford, practicing medicine and gradually establishing himself as one of the great figures in American poetry. Early in his writing career he left the European-inspired Imagist movement in favor of a more uniquely American poetic style comprised of vital, local language, and "no ideas but in things." His shorter poems have been published in numerous collected editions, including the Pulitzer Prize-winning Brueghel, and Other Poems (1963); his five-volume philosophical poem, Paterson, was published in 1963. Among his other works are plays such as A Dream of Love (1948) and Many Loves (1950); a trilogy of novels—White Mules (1937), In the Money (1940), and The Build-Up (1952); his Autobiography (1951); his Selected Essays (1954); and his Selected Letters (1957).

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH (1770–1850)

Regarded by many as the greatest of the Romantic poets, William Wordsworth was born in Cockermouth in the English Lake District, a beautiful, mountainous region that his poetry helped make a popular tourist destination even in his own lifetime. He studied at Cambridge and then spent a year in France, hoping to witness the French Revolution firsthand; as the Revolution's "glorious renovation" dissolved into anarchy and then tyranny, Wordsworth was forced to return to England. Remarkably, he managed to establish "a saving intercourse with my true self" and to write some of his finest poetry, including the early version of his autobiographical masterpiece, The Prelude, which first appeared in 1805 and then again, much altered, in 1850. In 1798, Wordsworth and his friend Samuel Taylor Coleridge published Lyrical Ballads, which contained many of their greatest poems and can be considered the founding document of English Romanticism. Revered by the reading public, Wordsworth served as Poet Laureate from 1843 until his death in 1850.

WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS (1865–1939)

William Butler Yeats was born in Dublin, Ireland, and, though he spent most of his youth in London, became the preeminent Irish poet of the twentieth century. Immersed in Irish history, folklore, and politics, as well as spiritualism and the occult, he attended art school for a time but left to devote himself to poetry that was, early in his career, self-consciously dreamy and ethereal. Yeats's poems became tighter and more passionate with his reading of philosophers such as Nietzsche, his involvement (mainly through theater) with the Irish nationalist cause, and his desperate love for the actress and nationalist Maud Gonne. He was briefly a senator in the newly independent Irish government before withdrawing from active public life to Thoor Ballylee, a crumbling Norman tower that Yeats and his wife fashioned into a home. There he developed an elaborate mythology (published as A Vision in 1925) and wrote poems that explored fundamental questions of history and identity. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1923.

KEVIN YOUNG (b. 1970)

Poet Kevin Young was born in Lincoln, Nebraska and grew up mainly in the Midwest, before heading east to Harvard. There, he took courses with Seamus Heaney, participated—alongside Natasha Trethewey—in the influential Dark Room Collective, and wrote many of the poems that would eventually make up his first, award-winning collection (Most Way Home, 1995) on the way to earning a BA in English and American literature (1992). Shuttlung between coasts, Young spent two years at Stanford University, in Northern California, before completing his MFA at Brown, in Rhode Island. As poems like “Ode to Pork” attest, however, Young also has deep southern roots. Both his mother—among the first black women to earn a PhD (in Chemistry) from the University of Nebraska—and his father—an ophthalmologist who was also an avid hunter and cook—grew up in rural Louisiana, where much of Young’s extended family still lives. Since 2005, when he married editor Kate Tuttle, Young has lived mainly in Atlanta, Georgia, where he currently serves as both Atticus Haygood Professor of English and Creative Writing and Curator of the Raymond Danowski Poetry Library at Emory University. Young’s astonishingly diverse collections of verse include Black Maria (2005), about fictional private eye A. K. A. Jones; Ardency (2011), about the real-life Africans who managed to wrest control of the slave ship Amistad in 1839; and Book of Hours (2014), which moves from poems grappling with his father’s 2004 death, in a hunting accident, to those inspired by the birth of Young’s first son some two years later.

DRAMA

Reading, Responding, Writing

As noted in the introduction, many cultures have had oral literatures: histories, romances, poems to be recited or sung. Our own era has its share of oral art forms, of course, but “literary” fiction and poetry are now most often read privately, silently, from the printed page. Most contemporary fiction writers and poets write with an understanding that their work will be experienced and enjoyed this way.

In contrast, drama is written primarily to be performed—by actors, on a stage, for an audience. Playwrights work with an understanding that the words on the page are just the first step—a map of sorts—toward the ultimate goal: a collaborative, publicly performed work of art. They create plays fully aware of the possibilities that go beyond printed words and extend to physical actions, stage devices, and other theatrical techniques for creating effects and modifying audience responses. Although the script of a play may be the most essential piece in the puzzle that makes up the final work of art, the play text is not the final, complete work.

To attend a play—that is, to be part of an audience—represents a very different kind of experience from the usually solitary act of reading. On the stage, real human beings, standing for imaginary characters, deliver lines and perform actions for you to see and hear. In turn, the actors adapt in subtle ways to the reactions of the people who attend the performance and whose responses are no longer wholly private but have become, in part, communal.

When you attend the performance of a play, then, you become a collaborator in the creation of a unique work of art: not the play text but instead a specific interpretation of that text. No two performances of a play can ever be identical, just as no two interpretations of a play can be exactly the same.

READING DRAMA

In many respects, of course, reading drama is similar to reading fiction. In both cases we anticipate what will happen next; we imagine the characters, settings, and actions; we respond to the symbolic suggestiveness of images; and we notice thematic patterns that are likely to matter in the end. But because most plays are written to be performed, reading plays is also somewhat different from reading fiction or poetry. In fiction, for example, there is a mediator or narrator, someone standing between us and the events. In contrast, drama rarely has such an interpreter or mediator to tell us what is happening or to shape our responses. Play texts instead rely on stage directions (the italicized descriptions of the set, characters, and actions), while exposition (the explanation of the past and current situation) emerges only here and there through dialogue.

For this reason, reading drama may place a greater demand on the imagination than reading fiction does: The reader must be his or her own narrator and interpreter. Such exercise for the imagination can prove rewarding, however, for it has much in common with the imaginative work that a director, actors, and other artists involved in a staged production do. In re-creating a play as we read it, we are essentially imagining the play as if it were being performed by live actors in real time. We “cast” the characters, we design the set with its furniture and props, and we choreograph or “block” the physical action, according to the cues in the text.

In reading drama even more than in reading fiction, we construct our ideas of character and personality from what characters say. In some plays, especially those with a modernist or experimental bent, certain lines of dialogue can be mystifying; other characters, as well as the audience or readers, can be left wondering what a speech means. On the one hand, such puzzling lines can become clearer in performance when we see and hear actors deliver them. On the other hand, plays that call for several characters to speak at once or to talk at cross purposes can be much easier to understand from the printed script than in performance. In interpreting dialogue, you will naturally draw on your own experiences of comparable situations or similar personalities, as well as your familiarity with other plays or stories.

Questions to Ask When Reading a Play

In reading drama as in reading fiction, you can begin to understand a text by asking some basic questions about the elements of drama.

- Expectations: What do you expect
 - from the title? from the first sentence, paragraph, or speech?
 - after the first events or interactions of characters? as the conflict is resolved?
- Characterization: Who are the characters? Is there a list of characters printed after the title of the play? What do you notice about their names or any identification of their roles, character types, or relationships?
 - Who is/are the protagonist(s)?
 - Who is/are the antagonist(s) (villain, opponent, obstacle)?
 - Who are the other characters?
 - What does each character know at any moment in the action? What does each character expect at any point? What does the audience know or expect that is different from what the characters know or expect?
- Plot: What happens in the play?
 - Do the characters or situations change during the play?
 - What are the differences between the beginning, middle, and end of the play? Is it divided into acts? Would there be an intermission in a performance?
 - Can you summarize the plot? Is it a recognizable kind or genre such as tragedy, comedy, farce, or mystery?

- Setting: What is the setting of the play?
 - When does the action occur? Is it contemporary or set in the past? Do the stage directions specify a day of the week, a season, a time of day?
 - Are there any time changes during the play? Are the scenes in chronological order, or are there any scenes that are supposed to take place earlier or simultaneously? Does the passage of time in the lives of the characters correspond with the passage of time onstage? Or do we understand that time has passed and events have occurred off-stage and between scenes?
 - Where does it take place? Is it in the United States or another country, or in a specific town or region? Do the stage directions describe the scene that an audience would see on stage, and does this remain the same or does it change during the play? How many scene changes are there?
- Style: What do you notice about how the play is written?
 - What is the style of the dialogue? Are the sentences and speeches short or long? Is the vocabulary simple or complex? Do characters ever speak at the same time, or do they always take turns? Does the play instruct actors to be silent for periods of time? Which characters speak most often?
 - Are there any images or figures of speech?
 - What is the tone or mood? Does the play make the reader or audience feel sad, amused, worried, curious?
- Theme: What does the play mean? Can you express its theme or themes?
 - Answers to these big questions may be found in many instances by returning to your answers to the questions above. The play's meaning or theme depends on all its features.

THINKING THEATRICALY

As you read a play, you should not only make mental or written notes but also raise some of the questions an actor might ask in preparing a role, or that a director might ask before choosing a cast: How should this line be spoken? What kind of person is this character, and what are his or her motives in each scene? What does the play suggest about what made the character this way—family, environment, experience? Which characters are present or absent (onstage or off) in which scenes, and how do the characters onstage or off influence one another? Would you, as “director” of an imaginary performance, tell the actors to move in certain directions, together or apart; to express certain emotions and intentions; to speak in quiet, angry, sarcastic, or agonized tones?

Besides trying to understand the characters, you should consider ways that the play could be produced, designed, and staged. How might a set designer create a kitchen, drawing room, garden, woods, or other space for the actors to move in, and how many set changes are there in the play? What would the audience see through any windows or doors in an imaginary building? How would lighting give an impression of the time of day or season? Would sound effects or music be necessary (such as a gunshot, radio, or telephone)? What sort of costumes are specified in the stage directions, and how would costumes help express character types and their relationships, as well as the historical time period? What essential props must be provided for the actors to use, and what other props are optional?

As you read Susan Glaspell's TRIFLES, keep these kinds of questions in mind. Try to create a mental image of the settings and of each character, and think about different ways the lines might be delivered and their effect on an audience's response.

SUSAN GLASPELL

(1876–1948)

Trifles

Though today remembered almost exclusively for her masterful Trifles (1916), Susan Glaspell wrote over a dozen plays, fifty short stories, nine novels, and a memoir, in addition to playing a key role in the development of twentieth-century American theater. Born in Davenport, Iowa, she graduated from Drake University in 1899 and spent two years at the Des Moines Daily News, where she covered the trial of a fifty-seven-year-old woman accused of murdering her sleeping husband with an axe. When Glaspell's short stories began appearing in magazines, she returned to Davenport. There, she became involved with George Cram Cook, a former English professor, socialist, and married father of two. The two wed in 1913 and moved east, eventually settling in New York's Greenwich Village and Cape Cod, Massachusetts, where they founded the Provincetown Playhouse (later the Playwright's Theater), an extraordinary gathering of freethinking, Left-leaning actors, directors, and playwrights that included Edna St. Vincent Millay and a then-unknown Eugene O'Neill. Between 1916 and 1922, this pioneering group reportedly staged more plays by women than any other contemporary theater; among them were eleven by Glaspell, ranging from realistic dramas such as Trifles and satirical comedies like Woman's Honor (1918) to her expressionistic The Verge (1921). Widowed in 1924, Glaspell ended a brief second marriage in 1931, the same year that her last play, Alison's House, won the Pulitzer Prize for Drama. Having published her first novel in 1909 and multiple best sellers in the 1920s and 1930s, Glaspell spent the last years of her life writing fiction in Provincetown.

CHARACTERS

COUNTY ATTORNEY

HALE

MRS. PETERS, Sheriff's wife

MRS. HALE

SCENE: The kitchen in the now abandoned farmhouse of JOHN WRIGHT, a gloomy kitchen, and left without having been put in order—unwashed pans

under the sink, a loaf of bread outside the bread-box, a dish-towel on the table—other signs of incompleting work. At the rear the outer door opens and the SHERIFF comes in followed by the COUNTY ATTORNEY and HALE. The SHERIFF and HALE are men in middle life, the COUNTY ATTORNEY is a young man; all are much bundled up and go at once to the stove. They are followed by the two women—the SHERIFF’s wife first; she is a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face. MRS. HALE is larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking, but she is disturbed now and looks fearfully about as she enters. The women have come in slowly, and stand close together near the door.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Rubbing his hands.] This feels good. Come up to the fire, ladies.

MRS. PETERS: [After taking a step forward.] I’m not—cold.

SHERIFF: [Unbuttoning his overcoat and stepping away from the stove as if to mark the beginning of official business.] Now, Mr. Hale, before we move things about, you explain to Mr. Henderson just what you saw when you came here yesterday morning.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: By the way, has anything been moved? Are things just as you left them yesterday?

SHERIFF: [Looking about.] It’s just the same. When it dropped below zero last night I thought I’d better send Frank out this morning to make a fire for us—no use getting pneumonia with a big case on, but I told him not to touch anything except the stove—and you know Frank.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Somebody should have been left here yesterday.

SHERIFF: Oh—yesterday. When I had to send Frank to Morris Center for that man who went crazy—I want you to know I had my hands full yesterday. I knew you could get back from Omaha by today and as long as I went over everything here myself—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Well, Mr. Hale, tell just what happened when you came here yesterday morning.

HALE: Harry and I had started to town with a load of potatoes. We came along the road from my place and as I got here I said, “I’m going to see if I can’t get John Wright to go in with me on a party telephone.”¹ I spoke to Wright about it once before and he put me off, saying folks talked too much anyway, and all he asked was peace and quiet—I guess you know about how much he talked himself; but I thought maybe if I went to the house and talked about it before his wife, though I said to Harry that I didn’t know as what his wife wanted made much difference to John—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Let’s talk about that later, Mr. Hale. I do want to talk about that, but tell now just what happened when you got to the house.

HALE: I didn’t hear or see anything; I knocked at the door, and still it was all quiet inside. I knew they must be up, it was past eight o’clock. So I knocked again, and I thought I heard somebody say, “Come in.” I wasn’t sure, I’m not sure yet, but I opened the door—this door [Indicating the door by which the two women are still standing.] and there in that rocker—[Pointing to it.] sat Mrs. Wright.

[They all look at the rocker.]

1. That is, a party line in which a number of households each have extensions of a single line, a common arrangement in the early twentieth century, especially in rural areas.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: What—was she doing?

HALE: She was rockin' back and forth. She had her apron in her hand and was kind of—pleating it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: And how did she—look?

HALE: Well, she looked queer.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: How do you mean—queer?

HALE: Well, as if she didn't know what she was going to do next. And kind of done up.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: How did she seem to feel about your coming?

HALE: Why, I don't think she minded—one way or other. She didn't pay much attention. I said, "How do, Mrs. Wright, it's cold, ain't it?" And she said, "Is it?"—and went on kind of pleating at her apron. Well, I was surprised; she didn't ask me to come up to the stove, or to set down, but just sat there, not even looking at me, so I said, "I want to see John." And then she—laughed. I guess you would call it a laugh. I thought of Harry and the team outside, so I said a little sharp: "Can't I see John?" "No," she says, kind o' dull like. "Ain't he home?" says I. "Yes," says she, "he's home." "Then why can't I see him?" I asked her, out of patience. "'Cause he's dead," says she. "Dead?" says I. She just nodded her head, not getting a bit excited, but rockin' back and forth. "Why—where is he?" says I, not knowing what to say. She just pointed upstairs—like that. [Himself pointing to the room above.] I got up, with the idea of going up there. I walked from there to here—then I says, "Why, what did he die of?" "He died of a rope round his neck," says she, and just went on pleatin' at her apron. Well, I went out and called Harry. I thought I might—need help. We went upstairs and there he was lyin'—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I think I'd rather have you go into that upstairs, where you can point it all out. Just go on now with the rest of the story.

HALE: Well, my first thought was to get that rope off. It looked . . . [Stops, his face twitches.] . . . but Harry, he went up to him, and he said, "No, he's dead all right, and we'd better not touch anything." So we went back downstairs. She was still sitting that same way. "Has anybody been notified?" I asked. "No," says she, unconcerned. "Who did this, Mrs. Wright?" said Harry. He said it business-like—and she stopped pleatin' of her apron. "I don't know," she says. "You don't know?" says Harry. "No," says she. "Weren't you sleepin' in the bed with him?" says Harry. "Yes," says she, "but I was on the inside." "Somebody slipped a rope round his neck and strangled him and you didn't wake up?" says Harry. "I didn't wake up," she said after him. We must 'a looked as if we didn't see how that could be, for after a minute she said, "I sleep sound." Harry was going to ask her more questions but I said maybe we ought to let her tell her story first to the coroner, or the sheriff, so Harry went fast as he could to Rivers' place, where there's a telephone.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: And what did Mrs. Wright do when she knew that you had gone for the coroner?

HALE: She moved from that chair to this one over here [Pointing to a small chair in the corner.] and just sat there with her hands held together and looking down. I got a feeling that I ought to make some conversation, so I said I had come in to see if John wanted to put in a telephone, and at that she started to laugh, and then she stopped and looked at me—scared. [The COUNTY

ATTORNEY, who has had his notebook out, makes a note.] I dunno, maybe it wasn't scared. I wouldn't like to say it was. Soon Harry got back, and then Dr. Lloyd came, and you, Mr. Peters, and so I guess that's all I know that you don't.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Looking around.] I guess we'll go upstairs first—and then out to the barn and around there. [To the SHERIFF.] You're convinced that there was nothing important here—nothing that would point to any motive?

SHERIFF: Nothing here but kitchen things.

[The COUNTY ATTORNEY, after again looking around the kitchen, opens the door of a cupboard closet. He gets up on a chair and looks on a shelf. Pulls his hand away, sticky.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Here's a nice mess.

[The women draw nearer.]

MRS. PETERS: [To the other woman.] Oh, her fruit; it did freeze. [To the LAWYER.] She worried about that when it turned so cold. She said the fire'd go out and her jars would break.

SHERIFF: Well, can you beat the women! Held for murder and worryin' about her preserves.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I guess before we're through she may have something more serious than preserves to worry about.

HALE: Well, women are used to worrying over trifles.

[The two women move a little closer together.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [With the gallantry of a young politician.] And yet, for all their worries, what would we do without the ladies? [The women do not unbend. He goes to the sink, takes a dipperful of water from the pail and pouring it into a basin, washes his hands. Starts to wipe them on the roller towel, turns it for a cleaner place.] Dirty towels! [Kicks his foot against the pans under the sink.] Not much of a housekeeper, would you say, ladies?

MRS. HALE: [Stiffly.] There's a great deal of work to be done on a farm.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: To be sure. And yet [With a little bow to her.] I know there are some Dickson county farmhouses which do not have such roller towels. [He gives it a pull to expose its length again.]

MRS. HALE: Those towels get dirty awful quick. Men's hands aren't always as clean as they might be.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Ah, loyal to your sex, I see. But you and Mrs. Wright were neighbors. I suppose you were friends, too.

MRS. HALE: [Shaking her head.] I've not seen much of her of late years. I've not been in this house—it's more than a year.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: And why was that? You didn't like her?

MRS. HALE: I liked her all well enough. Farmers' wives have their hands full, Mr. Henderson. And then—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Yes—?

MRS. HALE: [Looking about.] It never seemed a very cheerful place.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: No—it's not cheerful. I shouldn't say she had the home-making instinct.

MRS. HALE: Well, I don't know as Wright had, either.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: You mean that they didn't get on very well?

MRS. HALE: No, I don't mean anything. But I don't think a place'd be any cheerfuller for John Wright's being in it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I'd like to talk more of that a little later. I want to get the lay of things upstairs now. [He goes to the left, where three steps lead to a stair door.]

SHERIFF: I suppose anything Mrs. Peters does'll be all right. She was to take in some clothes for her, you know, and a few little things. We left in such a hurry yesterday.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Yes, but I would like to see what you take, Mrs. Peters, and keep an eye out for anything that might be of use to us.

MRS. PETERS: Yes, Mr. Henderson. [The women listen to the men's steps on the stairs, then look about the kitchen.]

MRS. HALE: I'd hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing. [She arranges the pans under the sink which the LAWYER had shoved out of place.]

MRS. PETERS: Of course it's no more than their duty.

MRS. HALE: Duty's all right, but I guess that deputy sheriff that came out to make the fire might have got a little of this on. [Gives the roller towel a pull.] Wish I'd thought of that sooner. Seems mean to talk about her for not having things slicked up when she had to come away in such a hurry.

MRS. PETERS: [Who has gone to a small table in the left rear corner of the room, and lifted one end of a towel that covers a pan.] She had bread set. [Stands still.]

MRS. HALE: [Eyes fixed on a loaf of bread beside the bread box, which is on a low shelf at the other side of the room. Moves slowly toward it.] She was going to put this in there. [Picks up loaf, then abruptly drops it. In a manner of returning to familiar things.] It's a shame about her fruit. I wonder if it's all gone. [Gets up on the chair and looks.] I think there's some here that's all right, Mrs. Peters. Yes—here; [Holding it toward the window.] this is cherries, too. [Looking again.] I declare I believe that's the only one. [Gets down, bottle in her hand. Goes to the sink and wipes it off on the outside.] She'll feel awful bad after all her hard work in the hot weather. I remember the afternoon I put up my cherries last summer. [She puts the bottle on the big kitchen table, center of the room. With a sigh, is about to sit down in the rocking-chair. Before she is seated realizes what chair it is; with a slow look at it, steps back. The chair, which she has touched, rocks back and forth.]

MRS. PETERS: Well, I must get those things from the front room closet. [She goes to the door at the right, but after looking into the other room, steps back.] You coming with me, Mrs. Hale? You could help me carry them. [They go in the other room; reappear, MRS. PETERS carrying a dress and skirt, MRS. HALE following with a pair of shoes.] My, it's cold in there. [She puts the clothes on the big table, and hurries to the stove.]

MRS. HALE: [Examining the skirt.] Wright was close. I think maybe that's why she kept so much to herself. She didn't even belong to the Ladies Aid. I suppose she felt she couldn't do her part, and then you don't enjoy things when you feel shabby. She used to wear pretty clothes and be lively, when she was Minnie Foster, one of the town girls singing in the choir. But that—oh, that was thirty years ago. This all you was to take in?

MRS. PETERS: She said she wanted an apron. Funny thing to want, for there isn't much to get you dirty in jail, goodness knows. But I suppose just to make her feel more natural. She said they was in the top drawer in this cupboard. Yes, here. And then her little shawl that always hung behind the door. [Opens stair door and looks.] Yes, here it is. [Quickly shuts door leading upstairs.]

MRS. HALE: [Abruptly moving toward her.] Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Yes, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: Do you think she did it?

MRS. PETERS: [In a frightened voice.] Oh, I don't know.

MRS. HALE: Well, I don't think she did. Asking for an apron and her little shawl. Worrying about her fruit.

MRS. PETERS: [Starts to speak, glances up, where footsteps are heard in the room above. In a low voice.] Mr. Peters says it looks bad for her. Mr. Henderson is awful sarcastic in a speech and he'll make fun of her sayin' she didn't wake up.

MRS. HALE: Well, I guess John Wright didn't wake when they was slipping that rope under his neck.

MRS. PETERS: No, it's strange. It must have been done awful crafty and still. They say it was such a—funny way to kill a man, rigging it all up like that.

MRS. HALE: That's just what Mr. Hale said. There was a gun in the house. He says that's what he can't understand.

MRS. PETERS: Mr. Henderson said coming out that what was needed for the case was a motive; something to show anger, or—sudden feeling.

MRS. HALE: [Who is standing by the table.] Well, I don't see any signs of anger around here. [She puts her hand on the dish towel which lies on the table, stands looking down at table, one half of which is clean, the other half messy.] It's wiped to here. [Makes a move as if to finish work, then turns and looks at loaf of bread outside the bread box. Drops towel. In that voice of coming back to familiar things.] Wonder how they are finding things upstairs. I hope she had it a little more red-up² up there. You know, it seems kind of sneaking. Locking her up in town and then coming out here and trying to get her own house to turn against her!

MRS. PETERS: But Mrs. Hale, the law is the law.

MRS. HALE: I s'pose 'tis. [Unbuttoning her coat.] Better loosen up your things, Mrs. Peters. You won't feel them when you go out.

[MRS. PETERS takes off her fur tippet, goes to hang it on hook at back of room, stands looking at the under part of the small corner table.]

MRS. PETERS: She was piecing a quilt. [She brings the large sewing basket and they look at the bright pieces.]

MRS. HALE: It's log cabin pattern. Pretty, isn't it? I wonder if she was goin' to quilt it or just knot it?

[Footsteps have been heard coming down the stairs. The SHERIFF enters followed by HALE and the COUNTY ATTORNEY.]

SHERIFF: They wonder if she was going to quilt it or just knot it!

[The men laugh, the women look abashed.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Rubbing his hands over the stove.] Frank's fire didn't do much up there, did it? Well, let's go out to the barn and get that cleared up.

[The men go outside.]

MRS. HALE: [Resentfully.] I don't know as there's anything so strange, our takin' up our time with little things while we're waiting for them to get the evidence. [She sits down at the big table smoothing out a block with decision.] I don't see as it's anything to laugh about.

MRS. PETERS: [Apologetically.] Of course they've got awful important things on their minds. [Pulls up a chair and joins MRS. HALE at the table.]

MRS. HALE: [Examining another block.] Mrs. Peters, look at this one. Here, this is the one she was working on, and look at the sewing! All the rest of it has been so nice and even. And look at this! It's all over the place! Why, it looks as if she didn't know what she was about! [After she has said this they look at each other, then start to glance back at the door. After an instant MRS. HALE has pulled at a knot and ripped the sewing.]

MRS. PETERS: Oh, what are you doing, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: [Mildly.] Just pulling out a stitch or two that's not sewed very good. [Threading the needle.] Bad sewing always made me fidgety.

MRS. PETERS: [Nervously.] I don't think we ought to touch things.

MRS. HALE: I'll just finish up this end. [Suddenly stopping and leaning forward.] Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Yes, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: What do you suppose she was so nervous about?

MRS. PETERS: Oh—I don't know. I don't know as she was nervous. I sometimes sew awful queer when I'm just tired. [MRS. HALE starts to say something, looks at MRS. PETERS, then goes on sewing.] Well, I must get these things wrapped up. They may be through sooner than we think. [Putting apron and other things together.] I wonder where I can find a piece of paper, and string.

MRS. HALE: In that cupboard, maybe.

MRS. PETERS: [Looking in cupboard.] Why, here's a bird-cage. [Holds it up.] Did she have a bird, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: Why, I don't know whether she did or not—I've not been here for so long. There was a man around last year selling canaries cheap, but I don't know as she took one; maybe she did. She used to sing real pretty herself.

MRS. PETERS: [Glancing around.] Seems funny to think of a bird here. But she must have had one, or why would she have a cage? I wonder what happened to it.

MRS. HALE: I s'pose maybe the cat got it.

MRS. PETERS: No, she didn't have a cat. She's got that feeling some people have about cats—being afraid of them. My cat got in her room and she was real upset and asked me to take it out.

MRS. HALE: My sister Bessie was like that. Queer, ain't it?

MRS. PETERS: [Examining the cage.] Why, look at this door. It's broke. One hinge is pulled apart.

MRS. HALE: [Looking too.] Looks as if someone must have been rough with it.

MRS. PETERS: Why, yes. [She brings the cage forward and puts it on the table.]

MRS. HALE: I wish if they're going to find any evidence they'd be about it. I don't like this place.

MRS. PETERS: But I'm awful glad you came with me, Mrs. Hale. It would be lonesome for me sitting here alone.

MRS. HALE: It would, wouldn't it? [Dropping her sewing.] But I tell you what I do wish, Mrs. Peters. I wish I had come over sometimes when she was here. I—[Looking around the room.—]wish I had.

MRS. PETERS: But of course you were awful busy, Mrs. Hale—your house and your children.

MRS. HALE: I could've come. I stayed away because it weren't cheerful—and that's why I ought to have come. I—I've never liked this place. Maybe because it's down in a hollow and you don't see the road. I dunno what it is, but it's a lonesome place and always was. I wish I had come over to see Minnie Foster sometimes. I can see now—[Shakes her head.]

MRS. PETERS: Well, you mustn't reproach yourself, Mrs. Hale. Somehow we just don't see how it is with other folks until—something comes up.

MRS. HALE: Not having children makes less work—but it makes a quiet house, and Wright out to work all day, and no company when he did come in. Did you know John Wright, Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Not to know him; I've seen him in town. They say he was a good man.

MRS. HALE: Yes—good; he didn't drink, and kept his word as well as most, I guess, and paid his debts. But he was a hard man, Mrs. Peters. Just to pass the time of day with him—[Shivers.] Like a raw wind that gets to the bone. [Pauses, her eye falling on the cage.] I should think she would 'a wanted a bird. But what do you suppose went with it?

MRS. PETERS: I don't know, unless it got sick and died. [She reaches over and swings the broken door, swings it again, both women watch it.]

MRS. HALE: You weren't raised round here, were you? [MRS. PETERS shakes her head.] You didn't know—her?

MRS. PETERS: Not till they brought her yesterday.

MRS. HALE: She—come to think of it, she was kind of like a bird herself—real sweet and pretty, but kind of timid and—fluttery. How—she—did—change. [Silence; then as if struck by a happy thought and relieved to get back to everyday things.] Tell you what, Mrs. Peters, why don't you take the quilt in with you? It might take up her mind.

MRS. PETERS: Why, I think that's a real nice idea, Mrs. Hale. There couldn't possibly be any objection to it, could there? Now, just what would I take? I wonder if her patches are in here—and her things. [They look in the sewing basket.]

MRS. HALE: Here's some red. I expect this has got sewing things in it. [Brings out a fancy box.] What a pretty box. Looks like something somebody would give you. Maybe her scissors are in here. [Opens box. Suddenly puts her hand to her nose.] Why—[MRS. PETERS bends nearer, then turns her face away.] There's something wrapped up in this piece of silk.

MRS. PETERS: Why, this isn't her scissors.

MRS. HALE: [Lifting the silk.] Oh, Mrs. Peters—it's—

[MRS. PETERS bends closer.]

MRS. PETERS: It's the bird.

MRS. HALE: [Jumping up.] But, Mrs. Peters—look at it! Its neck! Look at its neck! It's all—other side to.

MRS. PETERS: Somebody—wring—its—neck.

[Their eyes meet. A look of growing comprehension, of horror. Steps are heard outside. MRS. HALE slips box under quilt pieces, and sinks into her chair. Enter SHERIFF and COUNTY ATTORNEY. MRS. PETERS rises.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [As one turning from serious things to little pleasantries.] Well ladies, have you decided whether she was going to quilt it or knot it?

MRS. PETERS: We think she was going to—knot it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Well, that's interesting, I'm sure. [Seeing the bird-cage.] Has the bird flown?

MRS. HALE: [Putting more quilt pieces over the box.] We think the—cat got it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Preoccupied.] Is there a cat?

[MRS. HALE glances in a quick covert way at MRS. PETERS.]

MRS. PETERS: Well, not now. They're superstitious, you know. They leave.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [To SHERIFF PETERS, continuing an interrupted conversation.] No sign at all of anyone having come from the outside. Their own rope.

Now let's go up again and go over it piece by piece. [They start upstairs.] It would have to have been someone who knew just the—

[MRS. PETERS sits down. The two women sit there not looking at one another, but as if peering into something and at the same time holding back. When they talk now it is in the manner of feeling their way over strange ground, as if afraid of what they are saying, but as if they cannot help saying it.]

MRS. HALE: She liked the bird. She was going to bury it in that pretty box.

MRS. PETERS: [In a whisper.] When I was a girl—my kitten—there was a boy took a hatchet, and before my eyes—and before I could get there—[Covers her face an instant.] If they hadn't held me back I would have—[Catches herself, looks upstairs where steps are heard, falters weakly.]—hurt him.

MRS. HALE: [With a slow look around her.] I wonder how it would seem never to have had any children around. [Pause.] No, Wright wouldn't like the bird—a thing that sang. She used to sing. He killed that, too.

MRS. PETERS: [Moving uneasily.] We don't know who killed the bird.

MRS. HALE: I knew John Wright.

MRS. PETERS: It was an awful thing was done in this house that night, Mrs. Hale. Killing a man while he slept, slipping a rope around his neck that choked the life out of him.

MRS. HALE: His neck. Choked the life out of him. [Her hand goes out and rests on the bird-cage.]

MRS. PETERS: [With rising voice.] We don't know who killed him. We don't know.

MRS. HALE: [Her own feeling not interrupted.] If there's been years and years of nothing, then a bird to sing to you, it would be awful—still, after the bird was still.

MRS. PETERS: [Something within her speaking.] I know what stillness is. When we homesteaded in Dakota, and my first baby died—after he was two years old, and me with no other then—

MRS. HALE: [Moving.] How soon do you suppose they'll be through, looking for the evidence?

MRS. PETERS: I know what stillness is. [Pulling herself back.] The law has got to punish crime, Mrs. Hale.

MRS. HALE: [Not as if answering that.] I wish you'd seen Minnie Foster when she wore a white dress with blue ribbons and stood up there in the choir and sang. [A look around the room.] Oh, I wish I'd come over here once in a while! That was a crime! That was a crime! Who's going to punish that?

MRS. PETERS: [Looking upstairs.] We mustn't—take on.

MRS. HALE: I might have known she needed help! I know how things can be—for women. I tell you, it's queer, Mrs. Peters. We live close together and we live far apart. We all go through the same things—it's all just a different kind of the same thing. [Brushes her eyes, noticing the bottle of fruit, reaches out for it.] If I was you, I wouldn't tell her her fruit was gone. Tell her it ain't. Tell her it's all right. Take this in to prove it to her. She—she may never know whether it was broke or not.

MRS. PETERS: [Takes the bottle, looks about for something to wrap it in; takes petticoat from the clothes brought from the other room, very nervously begins winding this around the bottle. In a false voice.] My, it's a good thing the men couldn't hear us. Wouldn't they just laugh! Getting all stirred up over a little thing like a—dead canary. As if that could have anything to do with—with—wouldn't they laugh!

[The men are heard coming down stairs.]

MRS. HALE: [Under her breath.] Maybe they would—maybe they wouldn't.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: No, Peters, it's all perfectly clear except a reason for doing it. But you know juries when it comes to women. If there was some definite thing. Something to show—something to make a story about—a thing that would connect up with this strange way of doing it—

[The women's eyes meet for an instant. Enter HALE from outer door.]

HALE: Well, I've got the team around. Pretty cold out there.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I'm going to stay here a while by myself. [To the SHERIFF.] You can send Frank out for me, can't you? I want to go over everything. I'm not satisfied that we can't do better.

SHERIFF: Do you want to see what Mrs. Peters is going to take in?

[The LAWYER goes to the table, picks up the apron, laughs.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Oh, I guess they're not very dangerous things the ladies have picked out. [Moves a few things about, disturbing the quilt pieces which cover the box. Steps back.] No, Mrs. Peters doesn't need supervising. For that matter, a sheriff's wife is married to the law. Ever think of it that way, Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Not—just that way.

SHERIFF: [Chuckling.] Married to the law. [Moves toward the other room.] I just want you to come in here a minute, George. We ought to take a look at these windows.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Scoffingly.] Oh, windows!

SHERIFF: We'll be right out, Mr. Hale.

[HALE goes outside. The SHERIFF follows the COUNTY ATTORNEY into the other room. Then MRS. HALE rises, hands tight together, looking intensely at MRS. PETERS, whose eyes make a slow turn, finally meeting MRS. HALE'S. A moment MRS. HALE holds her, then her own eyes point the way to where the box is concealed. Suddenly MRS. PETERS throws back quilt pieces and tries to put the box in the bag she is wearing. It is too big. She opens box, starts to take bird out, cannot touch it, goes to pieces, stands there helpless. Sound of a knob turning in the other room. MRS. HALE snatches the box and puts it in the pocket of her big coat. Enter COUNTY ATTORNEY and SHERIFF.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Facetiously.] Well, Henry, at least we found out that she was not going to quilt it. She was going to—what is it you call it, ladies?

MRS. HALE: [Her hand against her pocket.] We call it—knot it, Mr. Henderson.

QUESTIONS

1. If we were watching a production of TRIFLES and had no cast list, how would we gradually piece together the fact that Mrs. Peters is the sheriff's wife? What are the earliest lines of dialogue that allow an audience to infer this fact?
2. What lines in the play characterize Mrs. Hale's reaction to the men's behavior and attitudes? What lines characterize Mrs. Peters's reaction to the men early in the play, and what lines show her feelings changing later in the play? What might account for the two women's initial differences and their evolving solidarity with Mrs. Wright?
3. What are the "trifles" that the men ignore and the two women notice? Why do the men dismiss them, and why do the women see these things as significant clues? What is the thematic importance of these "trifles"?
4. How would you stage the key moment of the play, Mrs. Hale's discovery of the bird in the sewing basket? What facial expression would she have? What body language? Where would you place Mrs. Peters, and what would she be doing? How would you use lighting to heighten the effectiveness of the scene?
5. If a twenty-first-century playwright were to write an updated version of TRIFLES, what details of plot, character, and setting would be different from those in Glaspell's play? What would be the same? What are some possible "trifles" that might serve the same dramatic functions as those in Glaspell's play?

RESPONDING TO DRAMA

When reading a play in order to write about it, you will need to keep a record of how you respond and what you observe as the action unfolds. Recording your thoughts as you read will help you clarify your expectations and attend to the way the play elicits and manages them. Below you will find examples of two ways of responding to a play. The first shows how you might jot down your initial impressions and questions in the margins as you read. The second shows how one reader used the questions on pages 1153–54 to take more comprehensive, methodical notes on the same play. Each of these methods of note-taking has certain advantages, and you may well find that a combination of the two works best.

SAMPLE WRITING: ANNOTATION OF TRIFLES

Though the passage chosen for annotation here is the play's opening, any passage in a play—including stage directions, as well as dialogue—will reward close analysis.

A “trifle” is something unimportant and also a kind of dessert. So is the play going to be about unimportant things? Is it a comedy?

CHARACTERS

SHERIFF

MRS. PETERS, Sheriff's wife

MRS. HALE

Only character not identified either by job or relationship to somebody else. (Why not “Mr. Hale”?)

HALE

Why “now abandoned”? Who’s John Wright? “Gloomy” doesn’t sound like a comedy.

SCENE: The kitchen in the now abandoned farmhouse of JOHN WRIGHT, a gloomy kitchen, and left without having been put in order—unwashed pans under the sink, a loaf of bread outside the bread-box, a dish-towel on the table—other signs of incompleting work. At the rear the outer door opens and the SHERIFF comes in followed by the COUNTY ATTORNEY and HALE. The SHERIFF and HALE are men in middle life, the COUNTY ATTORNEY is a young man; all are much bundled up and go at once to the stove. They are followed by the two women—the SHERIFF’s wife first; she is a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face. MRS. HALE is larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking, but she is disturbed now and looks fearfully about as she enters. The women have come in slowly, and stand close together near the door.

Is this a crime scene? Why refer to “work” (not “eating” or something?)

Women described more than men. They look different, but even the “comfortable looking” one (funny expression) isn’t comfortable. They stick together.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Rubbing his hands.] This feels good. Come up to the fire, ladies.

Why hesitate?

MRS. PETERS: [After taking a step forward.] I’m not—cold.

Now attorney gets a name. Sounds like they are in court.

SHERIFF: [Unbuttoning his overcoat and stepping away from the stove as if to mark the beginning of official business.] Now, Mr. Hale, before we move things about, you explain to Mr. Henderson just what you saw when you came here yesterday morning.

Second mention of things being moved: they’re worried about evidence.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: By the way, has anything been moved? Are things just as you left them yesterday?

So this is “a big case.” Is John Wright the criminal or victim?

SHERIFF: [Looking about.] It’s just the same. When it dropped below zero last night I thought I’d better send Frank out this morning to make a fire for us—no use getting pneumonia with a big case on, but I told him not to touch anything except the stove—and you know Frank.

Everyone knows everyone else. It’s very cold, a harsh environment outside this kitchen. And it takes work to make it warm (lighting a fire).

It's a small town (in Nebraska?), but a lot of bad stuff is happening! Sheriff is defensive with attorney—source of conflict?

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Somebody should have been left here yesterday.

SHERIFF: Oh—yesterday. When I had to send Frank to Morris Center for that man who went crazy—I want you to know I had my hands full yesterday. I knew you could get back from Omaha by today and as long as I went over everything here myself—

Again, everybody knows about everybody else.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Well, Mr. Hale, tell just what happened when you came here yesterday morning.

Hale assumes most husbands would act differently around their wives, care about what they want—but maybe not Wright.

HALE: Harry and I had started to town with a load of potatoes.

We came along the road from my place and as I got here I said, "I'm going to see if I can't get John Wright to go in with me on a party telephone." I spoke to Wright about it once before and he put me off, saying folks talked too much anyway, and all he asked was peace and quiet—I guess you know about how much he talked himself; but I thought maybe if I went to the house and talked about it before his wife, though I said to Harry that I didn't know as what his wife wanted made much difference to John—

Attorney is worried about being "official," sticking to facts, actions, "business," and "that" (Wright's personality or feelings?) doesn't count.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Let's talk about that later, Mr. Hale. I do want to talk about that, but tell now just what happened when you got to the house.

Everyone gets up early—because of all the work they have to do?

HALE: I didn't hear or see anything; I knocked at the door, and still it Really ordinary things now seem very creepy. Why are the women still standing by the door—because they are afraid? because they aren't part of "official business"? Are they witnesses, too? Why are they here?

was all quiet inside. I knew they must be up, it was past eight o'clock. So I knocked again, and I thought I heard somebody say, "Come in." I wasn't sure, I'm not sure yet, but I opened the door—this door [Indicating the door by which the two women are still standing.] and there in that rocker—[Pointing to it.] sat Mrs. Wright.

She's not listed as character either. What happened?

SAMPLE WRITING: READING NOTES

Below are examples of the questions an experienced reader might ask when reading the play TRIFLES for the first time, as well as responses to those questions. (See pp. 1155–65.) Any of these notes might inspire ideas for essay topics on Trifles. This is just a selection of the many details that could be observed about this lasting play, in which details certainly matter.

Expectations

Does the title suggest anything? “Trifles” sounds like a comedy (a trifle is something trivial), but it might be ironic. But why does Hale say that “women are used to worrying over trifles”? I expect to find out that the title is significant in some way.

Characterization

Who are the characters? What are they like? Three men and two women in the cast of characters. After I read the stage directions and part of the dialogue, I check the list again to keep straight who is who. What kind of situation would bring together a sheriff, a county attorney, a farmer, and two wives? No actors are needed to play either Mr. Wright or Mrs. Wright. Some men who help Mr. Hale (Harry) and Mr. Peters (deputy Frank) are mentioned as coming and going but are never on stage.

The “county attorney” acts like a detective; he seems businesslike and thinks he’s smarter than farmers and women. The stage directions specify that he speaks “With the gallantry of a young politician,” but his flattery toward the women doesn’t work. We find out his name is Mr. Henderson.

According to the stage directions, Mrs. Peters, the sheriff’s wife, is “a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face”; Mrs. Hale, the farmer’s wife, is “larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking.” The casting of the two women would be important for contrast; a wider range of physical types would be suitable for the men. Everyone is cold, but only the men take comfort by the fire in the kitchen; the women are upset.

Is there a protagonist, an antagonist, or other types? There isn’t a young hero or heroine of this play, and I wouldn’t call anyone the villain unless it’s the dead man.

Are the characters’ names significant? There’s nothing especially meaningful or unusual about the names, although “Hale” means healthy (as in “hale and hearty”), and “Wright” sounds just like “right,” though obviously something’s wrong in this house.

Plot

What happens? The big event has already happened; this is the scene of the crime. The men are looking for clues and leave the women in the kitchen, where they discover possible causes or motives for the crime. The women decide not to tell the men about either the evidence they find or their interpretation of it.

Are there scene changes? The whole scene is a fairly short uninterrupted period in one part of a farmhouse. Characters go offstage to other rooms or outdoors to the barn.

How is exposition handled? The county attorney asks Hale to “tell just what happened”; Hale explains what happened before the play started, describing how Mrs. Wright behaved. It comes as a shock to learn that Mrs. Wright told Hale he couldn’t see John Wright “‘Cause [he was] dead.” Shouldn’t she have run to tell someone about the murder or have told Hale as soon as he arrived? When Hale reports that Mrs. Wright said her husband “died of a rope around his neck,” it sounds suspicious. Could she have slept so soundly that she didn’t realize someone had strangled Mr. Wright?

What events mark the rising action? When the men go upstairs and Mrs. Hale says, “I’d hate to have men coming into my kitchen, and snooping and criticizing,” the women have a chance to notice more in the kitchen. Mrs. Hale recalls her relationship to Mrs. Wright, and the women discuss whether the wife really murdered her husband.

The men return to the kitchen on their way out to the barn just after the women discover the quilt pieces with the bad stitching. The next dialogue between the women is more open and brings out Mrs. Hale’s regret for not having visited and supported Mrs. Wright in her unhappy marriage. They notice the empty birdcage.

What is the climax? Mrs. Hale finds the dead bird in the pretty box, and the two women understand what it means just before the men return to the kitchen briefly. From then on the women utter small lies to the men. Mrs. Peters for the first time reveals personal memories that suggest she can imagine Mrs. Wright’s motives.

What is the resolution? As everyone prepares to leave, Mrs. Peters pretends the bird is insignificant, joining Mrs. Hale in protecting Mrs. Wright and playing along with the men’s idea that there’s nothing to notice in the kitchen. The women collaborate in hiding the bird.

What kind of play or plot is it? Like some detective stories, the play doesn’t ask “whodunnit?” but why the murder was committed. Its mode of representation is a familiar type—domestic realism—in which the places, people, things, and even events are more or less ordinary. (Unfortunately, domestic violence is quite common.)

Setting

When does the action occur? The play appears to be contemporary with 1916 (a stove heater, party-line telephones, a horse-drawn wagon). It is a winter morning, and the scene takes perhaps an hour.

Where does the action occur? It is obviously farm country, perhaps in the Midwest, where farms are very far apart.

What is the atmosphere? The freezing weather reflects the feeling of the play and gives the characters a motive for gathering in the kitchen. John Wright is described as a chilly wind. The frozen house has ruined Mrs. Wright's preserves of summer fruit. The mess in the kitchen, especially the sticky spill of red fruit in the cupboard, seems related to the unhappiness and horror of the marriage and the crime.

Are there scene changes? Instead of several scenes over a longer time, showing the deteriorating marriage, the crisis over the bird, the murder itself, Mrs. Wright's sleepless night, and Mr. Hale's visit, the story unfolds in a single scene, in one room, on the second morning after the murder, between the entrance and exit of Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters. It is essential that the play focus on "kitchen things" and what the women visitors notice and think.

Style, Tone, Imagery

What is the style of the dialogue? The dialogue seems similar to everyday speech. There are some differences in speaking style that show the Hales are more rustic than the Peters and the county attorney. Hale has a relaxed way of telling a story: "then I says," etc. Mrs. Hale: "Those towels get dirty awful quick" and "If I was you, I wouldn't tell her the fruit was gone. Tell her it ain't."

How do nonverbal gestures and actions convey meaning? Many specific actions indicated in the stage directions are crucial to the play: everyone looking at the rocking chair, pointing to the room upstairs, looking at the loaf of bread that should have been put back in the bread box, etc.

Do any of the props seem to have symbolic meaning? Some objects in the play are so important they seem symbolic, though the play tries not to be too heavily poetic. All kinds of "trifles" are clues. For instance, the women get Mrs. Wright's clothes to bring to her in jail. "MRS. HALE: [Examining the skirt.] Wright was close," meaning stingy. Mrs. Hale's words convey a quick impression: The skirt looks "shabby" because John Wright didn't give his wife any money for clothes (he was "good" but stingy and cold).

There would be some colorful props on stage—the jar of cherries, the red cloth and other quilt material, the pretty box—all of them signs of what has gone wrong. The room itself is "gloomy" and has some dirty and messy things in plain sight; other things in the cupboards are eventually revealed. These props would add to the uncomfortable feeling of the play.

The closest thing to a symbol is the caged songbird. Even the men notice the broken door and missing bird. Mrs. Hale underlines the comparison to Mrs. Wright twice: “she was kind of like a bird,” and later, “No, Wright wouldn’t like the bird—a thing that sang. She used to sing. He killed that, too.”

Theme

What is the theme of the play? The title calls attention to what the play is about. Glaspell didn’t call it The Caged Songbird or Murder in the Midwest or something heavy-handed. The main action is a search for a motive to confirm what everyone believes, that Minnie Wright must have strangled her husband while he was sleeping in bed. But the underlying theme of the play seems to be about men’s and women’s different perspectives. How can women’s everyday things be important? Why would anyone charged with murder worry about preserves? Even the women hope that Mrs. Wright’s worry about having her apron and shawl in jail means she didn’t commit the crime. The kitchen things—the trifles in her own house—“turn against her,” but the women are able to hide evidence that the men consider insignificant.

WRITING ABOUT DRAMA

Writing an essay about drama, like writing about fiction or poetry, can sharpen your responses and focus your reading; at the same time, it can illuminate aspects of the work that other readers may have missed. When you write about drama, in a very real sense you perform the role that directors and actors take on in a stage performance: You offer your “reading” of the text, interpreting it in order to guide other readers’ responses. But you also shape and refine your own response by attempting to express it clearly.

Using the notes you have taken while reading a play, try to locate the specific lines that have contributed to your expectations or your discoveries. Are these lines at the beginning, the middle, or the end of the play? Who gives most of the hints or misleading information? If there is one character who is especially unseeing, especially devious, or especially insightful, you might decide to write an essay describing the function of that character in the play. A good way to undertake such a study of a character in drama (as in fiction) is to imagine the work without that character. Mrs. Hale in Trifles is certainly the cleverest “detective,” so why do we need Mrs. Peters as well? One obvious answer is that plays need dialogue, and we would find it artificial if Mrs. Hale talked mainly to herself. But a more interesting answer is that in a play the audience learns by witnessing characters with different temperaments responding to the same situation. As these remarks suggest, you can also develop essays that compare characters.

In addition to character studies, essays on drama can focus on the kinds of observations made above: expectations and plot structure; the presence and absence of characters or actions onstage; the different degrees of awareness of characters and audience at various points in the action; titles, stage directions, and other stylistic details, including metaphors or other imagery; and, of course, themes. As you write, you will probably discover that you can imagine directing or acting in a performance of the play, and you'll realize that interpreting a play is a crucial step in bringing it to life.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. The action in Glaspell's play unfolds continuously, without interruption, in a single, relatively small room (the kitchen of a farmhouse), with the two female characters never leaving the stage. Write a response paper or essay discussing how these three factors affect your responses to the play, to the crime being investigated, and to the various characters.
2. How do your sympathies for Mrs. Peters change over the course of TRIFLES? What might Mrs. Peters be said to represent in the clash of attitudes at the heart of the play? Write an essay in which you examine both Mrs. Peters's evolving character as it is revealed in TRIFLES and her significance to the play's theme.
3. How would you characterize Susan Glaspell's feminism as revealed in TRIFLES—does it seem radical or moderate? How does it compare to feminist political and social ideas of our own time? (Consult three or more educational or library Web sites for biographical background on Glaspell; there are several sites offering teaching materials on TRIFLES as well. If time allows, you might also pursue sources that provide an overview of women's movements in the United States in the twentieth century.) Write an essay in which you explore the political leanings apparent in TRIFLES, both in the context of Glaspell's play (published in 1916) and in the broader historical context of the struggle for women's rights over the past century.
4. Write an essay in which you propose a production of TRIFLES, complete with details of how you would handle the casting, costumes, set design, lighting, and direction of the actors. What would be your overall controlling vision for the production? Would you attempt to reproduce faithfully the look and feel of the play as it might have been in 1916, or would you introduce innovations? How would you justify your choices in terms of dramatic effectiveness?

SAMPLE WRITING: RESPONSE PAPER

Response papers are a great way to begin moving from informal notes to a more formal essay. Though many response-paper assignments invite you to respond to any aspect or element of a literary text that grabs your attention, the following example was written in response to a more targeted assignment, one that asked students to “explore something specific about the way TRIFLES handles plot. For example, what are the major internal and/or external conflicts? Or what would you argue is the play’s turning point, and why?” Student-writer Jessica Zezulka explored the last question. Marginal comments below are the instructor’s. But what do you think of her answer? How might she strengthen and develop the argument she begins to make here about the play’s turning point? What alternative answers or arguments occur to you?

Jessica Zezulka Professor Mays English 298 10 January 2017	Zezulka 1	Might it be possible to read their conversation as less trivial (even up to this point) than the male characters do?
Trifles Plot Response Paper
While the men dillydally over the facts, the so-called “evidence,” the women in Trifles discover the missing piece: a motive for murder. The moment Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters find the dead canary in the hidden box is the turning point in the play. Up until that instant, their conversation seems trivial, to both a reader and the men involved. Upon discussing the little trifles, the quilt and the sewing, these two women have inadvertently stumbled across what the men are so desperate to find. This turning point changes the way the play is read, as well as the way you view the wife of the dead man.		Again, though, don’t we have relevant evidence before that about the possible state (and effects) of this marriage, which might be just as relevant to motive? If so, what really makes this moment stand out?
Mrs. Wright, accused of murdering her husband, appears almost crazy for just up and killing her spouse. The reader is as confused as the men at first, wondering why on earth would she do it? When you realize, along with the two women, that her motive was his brutal killing of the canary, you suddenly become privy to a secret that the men seemingly never learn. The play uses dramatic irony, where the reader knows the truth but the characters in the play are oblivious.		Interesting! Irony certainly is key to the play, but not all the characters are equally “oblivious,” right?

Susan Glaspell timed this moment perfectly, giving the reader time to be both confused and then suddenly enlightened.

This turning point breeds sympathy for the accused murderess. Mrs. Wright is no longer just a good-wife-gone-bad. You as the reader follow the emotions of the two women in the empty house and can feel their almost immediate comprehension and understanding of both the situation and the woman involved. The wife becomes someone we can relate to, almost having a just cause for murdering her husband. As I said, Glaspell builds the tension to that point perfectly; the reader is all for the law being upheld until you know what led up to the murder. If you asked me, I'd say he deserved it. The women's discussion of Trifles led to the heart of the matter, a turning point that all but justifies John Wright's death.

So might the play also turn on the conflict — or at least the contrast — between two possible ways of defining “innocence” or even two kinds of “law”?

SAMPLE WRITING: ESSAY

The following sample of student writing demonstrates how you might develop an early response to a play into a more formal and thorough argument about it. In her essay on Susan Glaspell's TRIFLES, Stephanie Ortega explores the relationship among the female characters in order to offer her own answers to more than one of the questions posed in the previous chapter's "Suggestions for Writing": How does Mrs. Peters's character evolve over the course of Trifles? How is that evolution significant to the play's theme, or how might it help to define the play's particular version of feminism?

As always, we encourage you to read the sample with a critical eye, identifying what works and what doesn't so as to discover specific ways to improve your own writing and reading. At what moments in the essay do you find yourself strongly agreeing? discovering something new about or in Glaspell's play? At what moments might you instead find yourself disagreeing or feeling either confused or simply dissatisfied, wanting more? What exactly makes each of these moments especially satisfying, interesting, persuasive, enlightening—or the reverse? If Stephanie Ortega were your classmate, what three specific things would you suggest she do in order to improve the essay in revision? Alternatively, what three qualities of this essay might you want to emulate in your own work?

A Journey of Sisterhood

Trifles begins at the start of a murder investigation. Mrs. Wright has allegedly murdered her harsh husband, John Wright; and the Sheriff and his wife, Mrs. Peters; the County Attorney; and the neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. Hale, all come to the Wright house to investigate. Throughout the entire play the women are always on stage, whereas the men enter and exit, so the women are the play's focus. But Glaspell's Trifles is a feminist play not only because of that, but also because of how it shows two or even three very different women coming together in sisterhood.

Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Hale are first introduced as they stand together by the door of the house where the murder took place, yet though the women stand together, their behavior and views initially seem wide apart. Whereas Mrs. Hale stands up for her counterparts, Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Wright, from the beginning, Mrs. Peters at first tends to stick up more for the men. When the County Attorney makes a remark about Mrs. Wright not having been much of a homemaker and having a dirty home, we see that Mrs. Hale doesn't like men poking in Mrs. Wright's business and having input in the doings of a house. Putting herself in Mrs. Wright's shoes, Mrs. Hale says, "I'd hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing" (1159, emphasis added). But Mrs. Peters states that since it is an investigation, "it's no more than th[e men's] duty" to poke around (1159). Later, when Mrs. Hale actually interferes with the investigation by trying to tidy up the place and re-sew the badly stitched quilt they discover, Mrs. Peters steps in, "[n]ervously" saying, "I don't think we ought to touch things" (1161). Mrs. Peters's only view is that of her husband; she knows and seems to care very little about Mrs. Wright or her life before marriage as Minnie Foster. As far as Mrs. Peters is concerned, "the law is the law" (1160), and she is "married to" it, as the County Attorney will say at the end of the play (1164); therefore she must abide by it.

Mrs. Hale's identification with Minnie Foster only intensifies as the play progresses. She remembers Minnie Foster as a carefree woman full of energy and life, bright and cheery like a canary, implying that marriage to John Wright "change[d]" all that (1162). Mrs. Hale starts feeling guilty for not visiting Mrs. Wright, telling Mrs. Peters multiple times that she "wish[es she] had come over sometimes when she was here," and eventually even suggesting that not coming to see Mrs. Wright was "a crime" (1162, 1164).

In part because of the way Mrs. Hale talks about her, Minnie Foster's figurative presence becomes ever stronger, bringing Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters together as they put themselves into her place, speculating about her feelings and responses to the conditions of her life. When the women come upon a box containing a bird that had its neck wrung, Mrs. Hale associates Mr. Wright's presumed killing of the songbird with his destruction of part of Mrs. Wright, speculating about her feelings: "No, Wright wouldn't like the bird—a thing that sang. She used to sing. He killed that, too" (1163). Thus, Mr. Wright's killing of the bird is a symbolic killing of Minnie Foster's spirit. At this point, the women come to understand that Mrs. Wright was indeed the one who killed her husband because when the women realize that Mr. Wright wrung the bird's neck, the women finally know the reason for Mrs. Wright's "funny way" of killing him (1160). (It's now that "Their eyes meet" with "[a] look of growing comprehension, of horror" [1163].)

More importantly, here is where we really start to see a change in Mrs. Peters. For the first time she, too, interferes with the investigators, even though she doesn't actually destroy evidence or lie, when she responds to a question about the cat by simply saying that there is not one "now" (1163). She expresses sympathy for Minnie Foster and identifies with her, based on her own memories of the way she felt both when her kitten was killed with a hatchet and, much later, when her first baby died, leaving her and her husband alone in the “stillness” of their isolated house (1163). Mrs. Peters also states that had she gotten hold of the boy who killed her kitten long ago she would have gotten revenge just as Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Hale now speculate that Minnie Foster Wright did. The women each sympathize with Minnie Foster and the distant person she has become, Mrs. Wright.

By sympathizing with Mrs. Wright and paying attention to the “little things” the men don’t consider solid “evidence” (1161), the women have single-handedly sorted out a plausible sequence of events and, more importantly, a reason why Mrs. Wright killed her husband the way she did. Yet rather than reveal what they’ve learned, they slowly, in the silence of mutual sympathy, work together to cover Mrs. Wright’s tracks and to protect her. Mrs. Peters is defying the actual law and starting to protect the law of women and sisterhood instead. Mrs. Hale, Mrs. Peters, and Mrs. Wright become one unit, opposing their intuitive feminine selves to the logical and analytical men.

Although Mrs. Wright never once appears on stage, her presence is what brings all three women closer. They are able to attain information that the men simply overlook. And it is this which brings the women forth in the union of sisterhood at the end of the play as they realize that “We [women] all go through the same things—it’s all just a different kind of the same thing” (1164).

ELEMENTS OF DRAMA

Most of us read more fiction than drama and are likely to encounter drama by watching filmed versions of it. Nonetheless, the skills you have developed in reading stories and poems come in handy when you read plays. And just as with fiction and poetry, you will understand and appreciate drama more fully by becoming familiar with the various elements of the genre.

CHARACTER

Character is possibly the most familiar and accessible of the elements; both fiction and drama feature one or more imaginary persons who take part in the action. The word character refers not only to a person represented in an imagined plot, whether narrated or acted out, but also to the unique qualities that make up a personality. From one point of view, “character” as a part in a plot and “character” as a kind of personality are both predictions: This sort of person is likely to see things from a certain angle and behave in certain ways. Notice that the idea of character includes both the individual differences among people and the classification of similar people into types. Whereas much realistic fiction emphasizes unique individuals rather than general character types, drama often compresses and simplifies personalities—a play has only about two hours at the most (sometimes much less) in which to show situations, appearances, and behaviors, without description or background other than exposition provided in the dialogue. The advantage of portraying character in broader strokes is that it heightens the contrasts between character types, adding to the drama: Differences provoke stronger reactions.

Plays are especially concerned with character because of the concrete manner in which they portray people on the stage. With a few exceptions (such as experiments in multimedia performance), the only words in the performance of a play are spoken by actors, and usually these actors are in character—that is, speaking as though they really were the people they play in the drama. (Rarely, plays have a narrator who observes and comments on the action from the sidelines, and in some plays a character may address the audience directly, but even when the actors apparently step outside of the imaginary frame, they are still part of the play and are still playing characters.) In fiction, the narrator’s description and commentary can guide a reader’s judgment about characters. Reading a play, you will have no such guide because drama relies almost exclusively on indirect characterization (see ch. 3). Apart from some clues about characters in the stage directions, you will need to imagine the appearance, manners, and movement of someone speaking the lines assigned to any one character. You can do this even as you read through a play for the first time, discovering the characters’ attitudes and motivations as the scenes unfold. This ability to predict character and then to revise expectations as situations change is based not only on our experiences of people in real life but also on our familiarity with types of characters or roles that occur in many dramatic forms.

Consider the patterns of characters in many stories that are narrated or acted out, whether in novels, comic books, television series, Hollywood films, or even video games. In many of these forms, there is a leading role, a main character: the protagonist. The titles of plays such as HAMLET, ANTIGONE, or, a little less obviously, DEATH OF A SALESMAN imply that the play will be about a central character, the chief object of the playwright's and the reader's or audience's concern. Understanding the character of the protagonist—sometimes in contrast with an antagonist, the opponent of the main character—becomes the consuming interest of such a play. Especially in more traditional or popular genres, the protagonist may be called a hero or heroine, and the antagonist may be called the villain. Most characterization in professional theater, however, avoids depicting pure good and pure evil in a fight to the death. Most characters possess both negative and redeeming qualities.

As in other genres that represent people in action, in drama there are minor characters or supporting roles. At least since ancient Rome, romantic comedies have been structured around a leading man and woman, along with a comparable pair (often the “buddies” of the leads) whose problems may be less serious, whose characters may be less complex, or who in other ways support or complicate rather than dominate the action. Sometimes a minor character can be said to be a foil, a character designed to bring out qualities in another character by contrast. The main point to remember is that all the characters in a drama are interdependent and help characterize each other. Through dialogue and behavior, each brings out what is characteristic in the others.

Like movies, plays must respect certain limitations: the time an audience can be expected to sit and watch, the attention and sympathy an audience is likely to give to various characters, the amount of exposition that can be shown rather than spoken aloud. Because of these constraints, playwrights, screenwriters, casting directors, and actors must rely on shortcuts to convey character. Everyone involved, including the audience, consciously or unconsciously relies on stereotypes of various social roles to flesh out the dramatic action. Even a play that seeks to undermine stereotypes must still invoke them. In the United States today, casting—or typecasting—usually relies on an actor's social identity, from gender and race to occupation, region, and age. However, plays that rely too much on stereotypes, positive or negative, may leave everyone disappointed (or offended); a role that defies stereotypes can be more interesting to perform and to watch. Alternatively, a character can be so exceptional and unfamiliar that audiences will fail to recognize any connection to people they might meet, and their responses will fall flat. All dramatic roles, then, must have some connection to types of personality, and good roles modify such types just enough to make the character interesting. Playwrights often overturn or modify expectations of character in order to surprise an audience. So, too, do the actors who play those parts.

Every performance of a given character, like every production of a play, is an interpretation. Not just “adaptations”—Greek or Elizabethan plays set in modern times and performed in modern dress, for example—but even productions that seek to adhere faithfully to the written play are interpretations of what is vital or essential in it. John Malkovich, in the 1983–84 production of Death of a Salesman, did not portray Biff Loman as an outgoing, successful, hail-fellow-well-met jock, though that is apparently how the playwright originally envisioned the part. Malovich saw Biff as only pretending to be a jock. Big-time athletes, he insisted, don't glad-hand people; they wait for people to come to them. The actor did not change the author's words, but by intonation, body language, and "stage business" (wordless gestures and actions) he suggested his own view of the character. In other words, he broke with the expectations associated with the character's type. As you read and develop your own interpretation of a play, try imagining various interpretations of its characters in order to reveal different possible meanings in the drama.

Questions about Character

- Who is the protagonist? Why and how so? Which other characters, if any, are main or major characters? Which are minor characters?
- What are the protagonist's most distinctive traits, and what is most distinctive about his or her outlook and values? What motivates the character? What is it about the character that creates internal and/or external conflict? Which lines or stage directions reveal most about the character?
- What are the roles of other characters? Which, if any, functions as an antagonist? Which, if any, serves as a foil? Does any character function as a narrator or chorus, providing background information and commentary? Why and how so?
- To what extent are any of the characters in the play "types"? How might this affect an audience's experience of the play? In what ways might a director or actor choose to go against the expected types, and how would this complicate the play's overall effect and meaning?
- Which of the characters, or which aspects of the characters, does the play encourage us to sympathize with or to admire? to view negatively? Why and how so? Are there characters who might be more or less sympathetic, depending on how the role is cast and interpreted?
- If you were directing a production of this play, whom among your friends and acquaintances would you cast in each role, and why? If you were directing a movie version, what professional actors would you cast?

PLOT AND STRUCTURE

An important part of any storyteller's task, whether in narrative or dramatic genres, is the invention, selection, and arrangement of some action. Even carefully structured action cannot properly be called a full-scale plot without some unifying sense of purpose. That is, what happens should seem to happen for meaningful reasons. This does not mean, of course, that characters or the audience must be satisfied in their hopes or expectations, or that effective plays need to wrap up every loose end. It does mean that a reader or theatergoer should feel that the playwright has completed this play—that nothing essential is missing—though the play's outcome or overall effect may be difficult to sum up.

Conflict is the engine that drives plot, and the presentation of conflict shapes the dramatic structure of a play. A conflict whose outcome is never in doubt may have other kinds of interest, but it is not truly dramatic. In a dramatic conflict, each of the opposing forces must at some point seem likely to triumph or worthy of such triumph—whether conflict is external (one character versus another, or one group of characters versus another group, each of whom may represent a different worldview) or internal (within a single character torn between competing views, duties, needs, or desires), or even one idea or ideology versus another one. In Hamlet, for example, our interest in the struggle between Hamlet and Claudius depends on their being evenly matched. Claudius has possession of the throne and the queen, but Hamlet's role as the heir to the late king and his popularity with the people offset his opponent's strength.

The typical plot in drama, as in fiction, involves five stages: exposition, rising action, climax, falling action, and conclusion. Exposition, the first phase of plot, provides essential background information about the characters and situation as they exist at the beginning of a play and perhaps also about the events that got the characters to this point—as when, early in Trifles, Mr. Hale describes what happened before the play opens. The second phase, rising action, begins when an inciting incident leads to conflict—as when, in Trifles, the men leave the women alone with what the latter soon discover to be crucial evidence. The moment when the conflict reaches its greatest pitch of intensity and its outcome is decided is the plot's third phase, its climax or turning point—in Trifles, perhaps the discovery of the dead bird and the act of covering up the evidence. The fourth stage, falling action, brings a release of emotional tension and moves the characters toward the resolution of their conflict and the plot itself toward its fifth and final stage, the conclusion. In Trifles, the men's return to the kitchen because, they believe, no evidence has been found can be called the falling action. The women's apparent decision to remain mute about what they have discovered can be called the resolution. The play concludes as the characters leave the Wrights' house. Unlike Trifles, some lengthy plays feature more than one plot. In such cases, the plot to which less time and attention is devoted is called the subplot.

Many older plays in the Western tradition, such as Shakespeare's, have five acts, each act roughly corresponding to—and thus emphasizing—a particular phase of plot. Acts are often further subdivided into scenes, each of which usually takes place in a somewhat different time and place and features a somewhat different combination of characters. Ancient Greek plays such as OEDIPUS THE KING are structured differently, such that individual scenes or episodes are separated by choral songs—that is, odes spoken or sung by the group of characters known as the chorus. Modern plays tend to have fewer acts and scenes than those of earlier eras, and plays such as Trifles—in which the action unfolds continuously and, usually, in a single time and place—have become so common that they have their own name: the one-act play.

In the performance of a play longer than one act, it has become customary to have at least one intermission, in part for the practical reason that the audience may need restrooms or refreshments. Breaks may be signaled by turning down stage lights, turning up the house lights, and lowering the curtain (if there is one).

On rare occasions, very long plays (such as Tony Kushner's Angels in America [1992–93]) are performed over more than one evening, with the obvious challenge of finding an audience willing and able to afford tickets and time for more than one performance; those who read such play “cycles” or sequences at their own pace at home have a certain advantage.

The key point is that the form of a play and the breaks between scenes or acts result from the nature of the play. Breaks can create suspense—a curtain comes down after an unexplained gunshot—or they can provide relief from tension or an emotional crisis.

Questions about Plot

- Read the first scene or the first few pages and then stop. What potential for conflict do you see here? What do you expect to happen in the rest of the play?
- How is the play divided into acts, scenes, or episodes, if at all? What is the effect of this structure? Does the division of the play correspond, more or less, to the five stages of plot development—exposition, rising action, climax, resolution, conclusion?
- Does the play show a relatively clear progression through the traditional stages of plot development, or does it seem to defy such conventions? If so, how, and what might the playwright achieve through these departures from tradition?
- What is the inciting incident or destabilizing event? How and why does this event destabilize the initial situation? How would you describe the conflict that develops? To what extent is it external, internal, or both?
- What is the climax, or turning point? Why and how so? How is the conflict resolved? How and why might this resolution fulfill or defy your expectations?

STAGES, SETS, AND SETTING

Most of us have been to a theater at one time or another, and we know what a conventional modern stage (the proscenium stage) looks like: a room with the wall missing between us and it (the so-called fourth wall). So when we read a modern play—that is, one written during the past two or three hundred years—and imagine it taking place before us, we think of it as happening on this kind of stage. Though there are also other modern types of stages—the thrust stage, where the audience sits around three sides of the major acting area, and the arena stage, where the audience sits all the way around the acting area and players make their entrances and their exits through the auditorium—most plays today are performed on a proscenium stage. Most of the plays in this book can be readily imagined as taking place on such a stage.

Ancient Greek plays and the plays of Shakespeare were originally staged quite differently from most modern plays, however, and although they may be played today on a proscenium stage, we might be confused as we read if we are unaware of the layout of the theaters for which they were first written. In the Greek theater, the audience sat on a raised semicircle of seats (amphitheater) halfway around a circular area (orchestra) used primarily for dancing by the chorus. At the back of the orchestra was the skene, or stage house, representing the palace or temple before which the action took place. Shakespeare's stage, in contrast, basically involved a rectangular area built inside one end of a large enclosure like a circular walled-in yard; the audience stood on the ground or sat in stacked balconies around three sides of the principal acting area (rather like a thrust stage). There were additional acting areas on either side of this stage, as well as a recessed area at its back (which could represent Gertrude's chamber in Hamlet, for example) and an upper acting area (which could serve as Juliet's balcony). A trap door in the stage floor was used for occasional effects; the ghost of Hamlet's father probably entered and exited this way. Until three centuries ago—and certainly in Shakespeare's time—plays for large paying audiences were performed outdoors in daylight because of the difficulty and expense of lighting. If you are curious about Shakespeare's stage, you can visit a reconstruction of his Globe Theatre in Southwark, London, England, either in person or online at www.shakespearesglobe.org. Every summer, plays by Shakespeare are performed there for large international audiences willing to sit on hard benches around the arena or to stand as “groundlings” (a lucky few of whom can lean on the stage near the feet of the actors). The walls in the background of the stage are beautifully carved and painted, but there is no painted scenery, minimal furniture, few costume changes, no lighting, and no curtain around the stage (a cloth hanging usually covers the recessed area at the back of the stage). Three or four musicians may play period instruments on the balcony.

As the design of the Globe suggests, the conventions of dramatic writing and stage production have changed considerably over the centuries. Certainly this is true of the way playwrights convey a sense of place—one of the two key ingredients that make up a play's setting. Usually the audience is asked to imagine that the featured section of the auditorium is actually a particular place somewhere else. The audience of course knows it is a stage, more or less bare or elaborately disguised, but they accept it as a kitchen, a public square, a wooded park, an open road, or a room in a castle or a hut. Oedipus the King takes place entirely before the palace at Thebes. Following the general convention of ancient Greek drama, the play's setting never changes. When the action demands the presence of Teiresias, for example, the scene does not shift to him; instead, escorts bring him to the front of the palace. Similarly, important events that take place elsewhere are described by witnesses who arrive on the scene.

In Shakespeare's theater the conventions of place are quite different: The acting arena does not represent a single specific place but assumes a temporary identity according to the characters who inhabit it, their costumes, and their speeches. At the opening of Hamlet we know we are at a sentry station because a man dressed as a soldier challenges two others. By line 15, we know that we are in Denmark because the actors profess to be “liegemen to the Dane.” At the end of the scene the actors leave the stage and in a sense take the sentry station with them. Shortly thereafter, a group of people dressed in court costumes and a man and a woman wearing crowns appear. As a theater audience, we must surmise from the costumes and dialogue that the acting area has now become a royal court; when we read the play, the stage directions give us a cue that the place has changed.

In a modern play, there are likely to be several changes of scene, each marked by the lowering of the curtain or the darkening of the stage while different sets and props are arranged. Sets (the design, decoration, and scenery) and props (articles or objects used on stage) vary greatly in modern productions of plays written in any period. Sometimes space is merely suggested—a circle of sand at one end of the stage, a blank wall behind—to emphasize universal themes or to stimulate the audience's imagination. More typically, a set uses realistic aids to the imagination. The set of Trifles, for example, must include at least a sink, a cupboard, a stove, a small table, a large kitchen table, and a rocking chair, as well as certain props: a bird cage, quilting pieces, and an ornamental box.

Time is the second key ingredient of setting, and conventions for representing time have also altered across the centuries. Three or four centuries ago, European dramatists and critics admired the conventions of classical Greek drama which, they believed, dictated that the action of a play should represent a very short time—sometimes as short as the actual performance time (two or three hours), and certainly no longer than a single day. This unity of time, one of the three so-called classical unities, impels a dramatist to select the moment when a stable situation should change and to fill in the necessary prior details by exposition. (These same critics maintained that a play should be unified in place and action as well; the kind of leaping from Denmark to England, or from court to forest, that happens in Shakespeare's plays, as well as subplots, were off-limits according to such standards. In Trifles, which observes the three unities, all the action before the investigators' visit to the farmhouse is summarized by characters during their brief visit, and the kitchen is the only part of the house seen by the audience.)

When there are gaps and shifts in time, they are often indicated between scenes with the help of scenery, sound effects, stage directions, or notes in the program. An actor must assist in conveying the idea of time if his or her character appears at different ages. Various conventions of classical or Elizabethan drama have also worked effectively to communicate to the audience the idea of the passage of time, from the choral odes in Oedipus the King to the breaks between scenes in Shakespeare plays.

Action within a play thus can take place in a wide range of locations and over many years rather than in the one place and the twenty-four-hour period demanded by critics who believed in the classical unities. And we can learn much about how a particular play works and what it means by paying attention to the way it handles setting and sets.

Questions about Setting and Staging

- Does all the action occur in one time and place, or in more than one? If the latter, what are those times and places? How much time tends to pass between scenes or episodes?
- How important do the general time and place seem to be, and in what ways are they important? What about the plot and characters would remain the same if a director chose to set the play in a different time and place? What wouldn't?
- What patterns do you notice regarding where and when things happen? Which characters are associated with each setting? How do different characters relate to the same setting? When, how, and why do scenes change from one setting to another? Are there significant deviations?
- Do the stage directions describe particular settings and props in detail? If so, what seems significant about the details? How might they establish mood, reveal character, and affect individual characters and their interactions with one another? Is there anything in the stage directions that seems to be intended more for readers than for a director staging a production?
- Does the date of the play tell you anything about the way it was originally intended to be staged? Does the representation of time and place in the play implicitly call for a certain type of stage? If you were staging the play today, what kind of stage, sets, and props might you use, and why? How might your choices affect how the play works on audiences and what it means to them?

TONE, LANGUAGE, AND SYMBOL

In plays, as in other literary genres, tone is difficult to specify or explain. Perhaps tone is more important in drama than in other genres because it is, in performance, a spoken form, and vocal tone always affects the meaning of spoken words to some extent, in any culture or language. The actor—and any reader who wishes to imagine a play as spoken aloud—must infer from the written language just how to read a line, what tone of voice to use. The choice of tone must be a negotiation between the words of the playwright and the interpretation and skill of the actor or reader. At times stage directions will specify the tone of a line of dialogue, though even that must be only a hint, since there are many ways of speaking “intensely” or “angrily.” Find a line in one of the plays printed here that has a stage direction telling the actor how to deliver it, and with one or two other people take turns saying it that way. If nothing else, such an experiment may help you appreciate the talent of good actors who can put on a certain tone of voice and make it seem natural and convincing. But it will also show you the many options for interpreting tone.

Dramatic irony, in which a character’s perception is contradicted by what the audience knows, and even situational irony, in which a character’s (and the audience’s) expectations about what will happen are contradicted by what actually does happen, are relatively easy to detect. But verbal irony, in which a statement implies a meaning quite different from its obvious, literal meaning, can be fairly subtle and easy to miss. In the absence of clear stage directions, verbal irony—like other aspects of tone—can also be a matter of interpretation. That is, directors and actors, as well as readers and audiences, will often have to decide which lines in a play should be interpreted ironically. All three types of irony are nonetheless crucial to drama. As the very term dramatic irony suggests, drama—even more than fiction—depends for its effects on gaps between what the various characters and the audience know. And situational irony—the gap between expectations and outcomes and even between what characters seem to deserve and what they get—is an especially key component of tragedy.

Never hesitate to apply the skills you have developed in interpreting poetry to drama; after all, most early plays were written in some form of verse. Aspects of poetry often emerge in modern plays; for example, monologues or extended speeches by one character, while they rarely rhyme or have regular meter, may allow greater eloquence than is usual in everyday speech and may include revealing imagery and figures of speech. A character in Lorraine Hansberry’s A Raisin in the Sun, for example, uses metaphor and personification, as well as alliteration, to great effect when she remarks (in act 3) that “death done come in this here house [. . .] Done come walking in my house.”

Simple actions or objects, too, often have metaphorical significance or turn into symbols. Effective plays often use props in this way, as Trifles does with the bird and its cage. And some plays, like some poems, may even be organized around controlling metaphors. As you read, pay close attention to metaphors or images, whether in language or more concrete form.

Allusions, references to other works of literature or art or something else external to the play, can enrich the text in similar ways. The title of Tom Stoppard’s uproarious comedy The Real Inspector Hound (1968), for example, seems to be an allusion to Sir Arthur Conan Doyle’s novel The Hound of the Baskervilles (1901–02), featuring Sherlock Holmes. Doyle’s novel is a classic in the detective fiction genre, which Stoppard's Inspector Hound parodies. In a more serious vein, though New Orleans, where Tennessee Williams's A STREETCAR NAMED DESIRE takes place, actually does contain a street called Elysian Fields, the play gets a good deal of symbolic mileage out of using this as a setting for the play thanks to the allusion to Greek mythology (in which the Elysian Fields were the final resting place of heroic and virtuous souls). Awareness of all the stylistic choices in the work can help you reach a clearer interpretation of the whole play.

Questions about Tone, Language, and Symbol

- Which lines in the play strike you as most ambiguous when it comes to the tone in which they should be spoken? Why and how so? What is the effect of that ambiguity, or how might an actor's or reader's decision about tone here affect the play as a whole?
- How would you describe the overall tone of the whole play? Do any moments or entire scenes or acts in the play seem interestingly different in terms of their tone?
- How do the play's characters differ from one another in terms of their tone? Does any character's tone change over the course of the play?
- Are any details—such as names; actions or statements; references to objects, props, or other details of setting; or allusions, metaphors, or other figures of speech—repeated throughout the play? Do any of these repeated details seem to have special significance? If so, what might that significance be?
- What types of irony, if any, are at work in the play? What is the effect of the irony?

THEME

Theme—a statement a work seems to make about a given issue or subject—is by its very nature the most comprehensive of the elements, embracing the impact of the entire work. Indeed, theme is not part of the work but is abstracted from it by the reader or audience. Since we, as interpreters, infer the theme and put it in our own words, we understandably often disagree about it. To arrive at your own statement of a theme, you need to consider all the elements of a play together: character, structure, setting (including time and place), tone, and other aspects of the style or the potential staging that create the entire effect.

Tips for Identifying Theme

Because theme emerges from a work in its entirety and from all the other elements working together, there's no one-size-fits-all method for discovering theme. Here, however, are some things to look for and consider as you read and re-read a play.

- Pay attention to the title. A title will seldom indicate a play's theme directly, but some titles do suggest a central topic or a key question. Probe the rest of the play to see what insights, if any, about that topic or answers to that question it ultimately seems to offer.

- Identify any statements that the characters make about a general concept, issue, or topic such as human nature, the natural world, and so on, particularly in monologues or in debates between major characters. Look, too, for statements that potentially have a general meaning or application beyond the play, even if they refer to a specific situation. Then consider whether and how the play as a whole corroborates, overturns, or complicates any one such view or statement.
- If a character changes over the course of the play, try to articulate the truth or insight that he or she seems to discover. Then consider whether and how the play as a whole corroborates or complicates that insight.
- Identify a conflict depicted in the play and state it in general terms or turn it into a general question, leaving out any reference to specific characters, setting, and so on. Then think about the insight or theme that might be implied by the way the conflict is resolved.

Above all, try to understand a play on its own terms and to separate interpretation from evaluation. You may dislike symbolic or unrealistic drama until you get more used to it; if a play is not supposed to represent what real people would do in everyday life in that place and time, then it should not be criticized for failing to do so. Or you may find realistic plays about ordinary adults in middle America in the mid-twentieth century to be lacking in excitement or appeal. Yet if you read carefully, you may discover vigorous, moving portrayals of people trapped in situations all too familiar to them, if alien to you. Tastes may vary as widely as tones of speech, but if you are familiar with the elements of drama and the ways dramatic conventions vary over time and across cultures, you can become a good judge of theatrical literature, and you will notice more and more of the fine effects it can achieve. Nothing replaces the exhilaration and immediacy of a live theater performance, but reading and re-reading plays can yield a rich and rewarding appreciation of the dramatic art.

AUGUST WILSON

(1945–2005)

Fences

August Wilson died of liver cancer when he was only sixty. One of the most important dramatists in American theater history, he had come a long way, the hard way. Frederick August Kittel, Jr. (who would later take his mother's maiden name), was the son of a white, German-born baker and his wife, a black cleaning woman who singlehandedly raised their six children in Pittsburgh's down-at-the-hill Hill District. In 1957, when Wilson was twelve, his mother remarried. Her new husband was an African American sewer-department worker who, as Wilson learned only after his stepfather's death, had been both a high-school football star unable to secure a college scholarship and an ex-convict. After a series of bad experiences, Wilson left school at fifteen. Armed with a tenth-grade education, he took on a series of menial jobs, read his way through the public library, and served briefly in the Army. In 1968, he returned to the Hill, cofounding the Black Horizon Theater and debuting his first play. Fourteen years later, Wilson struck artistic gold with Ma Rainey's Black Bottom (1982), his first Broadway play and the second in what would become a ten-play cycle. Set mostly in the Hill and chronicling African American life in every decade of the twentieth century, the series earned Wilson two Pulitzers (for Fences, 1987, and The Piano Lesson, 1990); a Tony (for Fences); a Grammy (for the Ma Rainey's cast album); an Emmy (for his adaptation of Piano Lesson); and eight Drama Critics Circle awards. Wilson often described Fences as his least representative, most conventional play, thanks to the way it revolves around a single "big character." Yet this, his best-known work, is also arguably among his most personal, set in the period of his youth and aimed, he said, at "uncover[ing] the nobility and the dignity" of the adults he grew up around—"that generation, which shielded its children from all of the indignities they went through."

SETTING: The setting is the yard which fronts the only entrance to the Maxson household, an ancient two-story brick house set back off a small alley in a big-city neighborhood. The entrance to the house is gained by two or three steps leading to a wooden porch badly in need of paint.

A relatively recent addition to the house and running its full width, the porch lacks congruence. It is a sturdy porch with a flat roof. One or two chairs of dubious value sit at one end where the kitchen window opens onto the porch. An old-fashioned icebox stands silent guard at the opposite end.

The yard is a small dirt yard, partially fenced (except during the last scene), with a wooden sawhorse, a pile of lumber, and other fence-building equipment off to the side. Opposite is a tree from which hangs a ball made of rags. A baseball bat leans against the tree. Two oil drums serve as garbage receptacles and sit near the house at right to complete the setting.

1. Influential Canadian-American director-actor (1919–2006) whom August Wilson called his "guide, mentor, and provocateur"; the first black director of a Broadway play (Lorraine Hansberry's A Raisin in the Sun, 1959), artistic director of the Eugene O'Neill Theater Center and the Yale Repertory Theatre, and dean of the Yale School of Drama, Richards oversaw the first productions of all of Wilson's plays, beginning with Ma Rainey's Black Bottom (1982).

THE PLAY: Near the turn of the century, the destitute of Europe sprang on the city with tenacious claws and an honest and solid dream. The city devoured them. They swelled its belly until it burst into a thousand furnaces and sewing machines, a thousand butcher shops and bakers' ovens, a thousand churches and hospitals and funeral parlors and moneylenders. The city grew. It nourished itself and offered each man a partnership limited only by his talent, his guile and his willingness and capacity for hard work. For the immigrants of Europe, a dream dared and won true.

The descendants of African slaves were offered no such welcome or participation. They came from places called the Carolinas and the Virginias, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee. They came strong, eager, searching. The city rejected them and they fled and settled along the riverbanks and under bridges in shallow, ramshackle houses made of sticks and tar paper. They collected rags and wood. They sold the use of their muscles and their bodies. They cleaned houses and washed clothes, they shined shoes, and in quiet desperation and vengeful pride, they stole, and lived in pursuit of their own dream. That they could breathe free, finally, and stand to meet life with the force of dignity and whatever eloquence the heart could call upon.

By 1957, the hard-won victories of the European immigrants had solidified the industrial might of America. War had been confronted and won with new energies that used loyalty and patriotism as its fuel. Life was rich, full and flourishing. The Milwaukee Braves won the World Series, and the hot winds of change that would make the sixties a turbulent, racing, dangerous and provocative decade had not yet begun to blow full.

*When the sins of our fathers visit us
We do not have to play host.
We can banish them with forgiveness
As God, in His Largeness and Laws.*

ACT ONE

Scene 1

It is 1957. Troy and Bono enter the yard, engaged in conversation. Troy is fifty-three years old, a large man with thick, heavy hands; it is this largeness that he strives to fill out and make an accommodation with. Together with his blackness, his largeness informs his sensibilities and the choices he has made in his life.

Of the two men, Bono is obviously the follower. His commitment to their friendship of thirty-odd years is rooted in his admiration of Troy's honesty, capacity for hard work, and his strength, which Bono seeks to emulate.

It is Friday night, payday, and the one night of the week the two men engage in a ritual of talk and drink. Troy is usually the most talkative and at times he can be crude and almost vulgar, though he is capable of rising to profound heights of expression. The men carry lunch buckets and wear or carry burlap aprons and are dressed in clothes suitable to their jobs as garbage collectors.

BONO: Troy, you ought to stop that lying!

TROY: I ain't lying! The nigger had a watermelon this big. (Indicates with his hands) Talking about . . . "What watermelon, Mr. Rand?" I like to fell out! "What watermelon, Mr. Rand?" . . . And it sitting there big as life.

BONO: What did Mr. Rand say?

TROY: Ain't said nothing. Figure if the nigger too dumb to know he carrying a watermelon, he wasn't gonna get much sense out of him. Trying to hide that great big old watermelon under his coat. Afraid to let the white man see him carry it home.

BONO: I'm like you . . . I ain't got no time for them kind of people.

TROY: Now what he look like getting mad 'cause he see the man from the union talking to Mr. Rand?

BONO: He come talking to me about . . . "Maxson gonna get us fired." I told him to get away from me with that. He walked away from me calling you a troublemaker. What Mr. Rand say?

TROY: Ain't said nothing. He told me to go down the commissioner's office next Friday. They called me down there to see them.

BONO: Well, as long as you got your complaint filed, they can't fire you. That's what one of them white fellows tell me.

TROY: I ain't worried about them firing me. They gonna fire me 'cause I asked a question? That's all I did. I went to Mr. Rand and asked him, "Why? Why you got the white mens driving and the colored lifting?" Told him, "What's the matter, don't I count? You think only white fellows got sense enough to drive a truck. That ain't no paper job! Hell, anybody can drive a truck. How come you got all whites driving and the colored lifting?" He told me, "Take it to the union." Well, hell, that's what I done! Now they wanna come up with this pack of lies.

BONO: I told Brownie if the man come and ask him any questions . . . just tell the truth! It ain't nothing but something they done trumped up on you 'cause you filed a complaint on them.

TROY: Brownie don't understand nothing. All I want them to do is change the job description. Give everybody a chance to drive the truck. Brownie can't see that. He ain't got that much sense.

BONO: How you figure he be making out with that gal be up at Taylors' all the time . . . that Alberta gal?

TROY: Same as you and me. Getting as much as we is. Which is to say nothing.

BONO: It is, huh? I figure you doing a little better than me . . . and I ain't saying what I'm doing.

TROY: Aw, nigger, look here . . . I know you. If you had got anywhere near that gal, twenty minutes later you be looking to tell somebody. And the first one you gonna tell . . . that you gonna want to brag to . . . is gonna be me.

BONO: I ain't saying that. I see where you be eyeing her.

TROY: I eye all the women. I don't miss nothing. Don't never let nobody tell you Troy Maxson don't eye the women.

BONO: You been doing more than eyeing her. You done bought her a drink or two.

TROY: Hell yeah, I bought her a drink! What that mean? I bought you one, too. What that mean 'cause I buy her a drink? I'm just being polite.

BONO: It's all right to buy her one drink. That's what you call being polite. But when you wanna be buying two or three . . . that's what you call eyeing her.

TROY: Look here, as long as you know me . . . you ever know me to chase after women?

BONO: Hell yeah! Long as I done know you. You forgetting I knew you when.

TROY: Naw, I'm talking about since I been married to Rose?

BONO: Oh, not since you been married to Rose. Now, that's the truth, there. I can say that.

TROY: All right then! Case closed.

BONO: I see you be walking up around Alberta's house. You supposed to be at Taylors' and you be walking up around there.

TROY: What you watching where I'm walking for? I ain't watching after you.

BONO: I seen you walking around there more than once.

TROY: Hell, you liable to see me walking anywhere! That don't mean nothing 'cause you see me walking around there.

BONO: Where she come from anyway? She just kinda showed up one day.

TROY: Tallahassee. You can look at her and tell she one of them Florida gals. They got some big healthy women down there. Grow them right up out the ground. Got a little bit of Indian in her. Most of them niggers down in Florida got some Indian in them.

BONO: I don't know about that Indian part. But she damn sure big and healthy. Woman wear some big stockings. Got them great big old legs and hips as wide as the Mississippi River.

TROY: Legs don't mean nothing. You don't do nothing but push them out of the way. But them hips cushion the ride!

BONO: Troy, you ain't got no sense.

TROY: It's the truth! Like you riding on Goodyears!

(Rose enters from the house. She is ten years younger than Troy. Her devotion to him stems from her recognition of the possibilities of her life without him: a succession of abusive men and their babies, a life of partying and running the streets, the church, or aloneness with its attendant pain and frustration. She recognizes Troy's spirit as a fine and illuminating one and she either ignores or forgives his faults, only some of which she recognizes. Though she doesn't drink, her presence is an integral part of the Friday night rituals. She alternates between the porch and the kitchen, where supper preparations are under way.)

ROSE: What you all out here getting into?

TROY: What you worried about what we getting into for? This is men talk, woman.

ROSE: What I care what you talking about? Bono, you gonna stay for supper?

BONO: No, I thank you, Rose. But Lucille say she cooking up a pot of pigfeet.

TROY: Pigfeet! Hell, I'm going home with you! Might even stay the night if you got some pigfeet. You got something in there to top them pigfeet, Rose?

ROSE: I'm cooking up some chicken. I got some chicken and collard greens.

TROY: Well, go on back in the house and let me and Bono finish what we was talking about. This is men talk. I got some talk for you later. You know what kind of talk I mean. You go on and powder it up.

ROSE: Troy Maxson, don't you start that now!

TROY (Puts his arm around her): Aw, woman . . . come here. Look here, Bono . . . when I met this woman . . . I got out that place, say, “Hitch up my pony, saddle up my mare . . . there’s a woman out there for me somewhere. I looked here. Looked there. Saw Rose and latched on to her.” I latched on to her and told her—I’m gonna tell you the truth—I told her, “Baby, I don’t wanna marry, I just wanna be your man.” Rose told me . . . tell him what you told me, Rose.

ROSE: I told him if he wasn’t the marrying kind, then move out the way so the marrying kind could find me.

TROY: That’s what she told me. “Nigger, you in my way. You blocking the view! Move out the way so I can find me a husband.” I thought it over two or three days. Come back—

ROSE: Ain’t no two or three days nothing. You was back the same night.

TROY: Come back, told her . . . “Okay, baby . . . but I’m gonna buy me a banty rooster and put him out there in the backyard . . . and when he see a stranger come, he’ll flap his wings and crow . . .” Look here, Bono, I could watch the front door by myself . . . it was that back door I was worried about.

ROSE: Troy, you ought not talk like that. Troy ain’t doing nothing but telling a lie.

TROY: Only thing is . . . when we first got married . . . forget the rooster . . . we ain’t had no yard!

BONO: I hear you tell it. Me and Lucille was staying down there on Logan Street. Had two rooms with the outhouse in the back. I ain’t mind the outhouse none. But when that goddamn wind blow through there in the winter . . . that’s what I’m talking about! To this day I wonder why in the hell I ever stayed down there for six long years. But see, I didn’t know I could do no better. I thought only white folks had inside toilets and things.

ROSE: There’s a lot of people don’t know they can do no better than they doing now. That’s just something you got to learn. A lot of folks still shop at Bella’s.

TROY: Ain’t nothing wrong with shopping at Bella’s. She got fresh food.

ROSE: I ain’t said nothing about if she got fresh food. I’m talking about what she charge. She charge ten cents more than the A&P.²

TROY: The A&P ain’t never done nothing for me. I spends my money where I’m treated right. I go down to Bella, say, “I need a loaf of bread, I’ll pay you Friday.” She give it to me. What sense that make when I got money to go and spend it somewhere else and ignore the person who done right by me? That ain’t in the Bible.

ROSE: We ain’t talking about what’s in the Bible. What sense it make to shop there when she overcharge?

TROY: You shop where you want to. I’ll do my shopping where the people been good to me.

ROSE: Well, I don’t think it’s right for her to overcharge. That’s all I was saying.

BONO: Look here . . . I got to get on. Lucille be raising all kind of hell.

TROY: Where you going, nigger? We ain’t finished this pint. Come here, finish this pint.

BONO: Well, hell, I am . . . if you ever turn the bottle loose.

2. By the 1930s, the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, so named in 1859, was the leading supermarket chain in the United States.

TROY (Hands him the bottle): The only thing I say about the A&P is I'm glad Cory got that job down there. Help him take care of his school clothes and things. Gabe done moved out and things getting tight around here. He got that job . . . He can start to look out for himself.

ROSE: Cory done went and got recruited by a college football team.

TROY: I told that boy about that football stuff. The white man ain't gonna let him get nowhere with that football. I told him when he first come to me with it. Now you come telling me he done went and got more tied up in it. He ought to go and get recruited in how to fix cars or something where he can make a living.

ROSE: He ain't talking about making no living playing football. It's just something the boys in school do. They gonna send a recruiter by to talk to you. He'll tell you he ain't talking about making no living playing football. It's a honor to be recruited.

TROY: It ain't gonna get him nowhere. Bono'll tell you that.

BONO: If he be like you in the sports . . . he's gonna be all right. Ain't but two men ever played baseball as good as you. That's Babe Ruth and Josh Gibson.³ Them's the only two men ever hit more home runs than you.

TROY: What it ever get me? Ain't got a pot to piss in or a window to throw it out of.

ROSE: Times have changed since you was playing baseball, Troy. That was before the war.⁴ Times have changed a lot since then.

TROY: How in hell they done changed?

ROSE: They got lots of colored boys playing ball now. Baseball and football.

BONO: You right about that, Rose. Times have changed, Troy. You just come along too early.

TROY: There ought not never have been no time called too early! Now you take that fellow . . . what's that fellow they had playing right field for the Yankees back then? You know who I'm talking about, Bono. Used to play right field for the Yankees.

ROSE: Selkirk?⁵

TROY: Selkirk! That's it! Man batting .269, understand? .269. What kind of sense that make? I was hitting .432 with thirty-seven home runs! Man batting .269 and playing right field for the Yankees! I saw Josh Gibson's daughter yesterday. She walking around with raggedy shoes on her feet. Now I bet you Selkirk's daughter ain't walking around with raggedy shoes on her feet! I bet you that!

ROSE: They got a lot of colored baseball players now. Jackie Robinson⁶ was the first. Folks had to wait for Jackie Robinson.

TROY: I done seen a hundred niggers play baseball better than Jackie Robinson. Hell, I know some teams Jackie Robinson couldn't even make! What you talking about Jackie Robinson. Jackie Robinson wasn't nobody. I'm talking

3. Georgia-born catcher (1911–47) often called “the black Babe Ruth”; hailed by the Baseball Hall of Fame as “the greatest power hitter in black baseball,” he died three months before integration of the major leagues. Babe Ruth: legendary outfielder, pitcher, and power hitter (1895–1948) for the Boston Red Sox and New York Yankees.

4. World War II (1939–45).

5. George Selkirk (1908–87), Canadian-born player who succeeded Babe Ruth as the New York Yankees right fielder.

6. Brooklyn Dodgers first baseman (1919–72) who, in 1947, became the first black player in the major leagues and, in 1949, the first black winner of the National League MVP Award.

about if you could play ball then they ought to have let you play. Don't care what color you were. Come telling me I come along too early. If you could play . . . then they ought to have let you play.

(Troy takes a long drink from the bottle.)

ROSE: You gonna drink yourself to death. You don't need to be drinking like that.

TROY: Death ain't nothing. I done seen him. Done wrassled with him. You can't tell me nothing about death. Death ain't nothing but a fastball on the outside corner. And you know what I'll do to that! Lookee here, Bono . . . am I lying? You get one of them fastballs, about waist high, over the outside corner of the plate where you can get the meat of the bat on it . . . and good God! You can kiss it good-bye. Now, am I lying?

BONO: Naw, you telling the truth there. I seen you do it.

TROY: If I'm lying . . . that 450 feet worth of lying! (Pause) That's all death is to me. A fastball on the outside corner.

ROSE: I don't know why you want to get on talking about death.

TROY: Ain't nothing wrong with talking about death. That's part of life. Everybody gonna die. You gonna die, I'm gonna die. Bono's gonna die. Hell, we all gonna die.

ROSE: But you ain't got to talk about it. I don't like to talk about it.

TROY: You the one brought it up. Me and Bono was talking about baseball . . . you tell me I'm gonna drink myself to death. Ain't that right, Bono? You know I don't drink this but one night out of the week. That's Friday night. I'm gonna drink just enough to where I can handle it. Then I cuts it loose. I leave it alone. So don't you worry about me drinking myself to death. 'Cause I ain't worried about Death. I done seen him. I done wrestled with him.

Look here, Bono . . . I looked up one day and Death was marching straight at me. Like Soldiers on Parade! The Army of Death was marching straight at me. The middle of July, 1941. It got real cold just like it be winter. It seem like Death himself reached out and touched me on the shoulder. He touch me just like I touch you. I got cold as ice and Death standing there grinning at me.

ROSE: Troy, why don't you hush that talk.

TROY: I say . . . What you want, Mr. Death? You be wanting me? You done brought your army to be getting me? I looked him dead in the eye. I wasn't fearing nothing. I was ready to tangle. Just like I'm ready to tangle now. The Bible say be ever vigilant. That's why I don't get but so drunk. I got to keep watch.

ROSE: Troy was right down there in Mercy Hospital. You remember he had pneumonia? Laying there with a fever talking plumb out of his head.

TROY: Death standing there staring at me . . . carrying that sickle in his hand. Finally he say, "You want bound over for another year?" See, just like that . . . "You want bound over for another year?" I told him, "Bound over hell! Let's settle this now!"

It seem like he kinda fell back when I said that, and all the cold went out of me. I reached down and grabbed that sickle and threw it just as far as I could throw it . . . and me and him commenced to wrestling.

We wrestled for three days and three nights. I can't say where I found the strength from. Every time it seemed like he was gonna get the best of me, I'd reach way down deep inside myself and find the strength to do him one better.

ROSE: Every time Troy tell that story he find different ways to tell it. Different things to make up about it.

TROY: I ain't making up nothing. I'm telling you the facts of what happened. I wrestled with Death for three days and three nights and I'm standing here to tell you about it. (Pause) All right. At the end of the third night we done weakened each other to where we can't hardly move. Death stood up, throwed on his robe . . . had him a white robe with a hood on it. He throwed on that robe and went off to look for his sickle. Say, "I'll be back." Just like that. "I'll be back." I told him say, "Yeah, but . . . you gonna have to find me!" I wasn't no fool. I wasn't going looking for him. Death ain't nothing to play with. And I know he's gonna get me. I know I got to join his army . . . his camp followers. But as long as I keep my strength and see him coming . . . as long as I keep up my vigilance . . . he's gonna have to fight to get me. I ain't going easy.

BONO: Well, look here, since you got to keep up your vigilance . . . let me have the bottle.

TROY: Aw hell, I shouldn't have told you that part. I should have left out that part.

ROSE: Troy be talking that stuff and half the time don't even know what he be talking about.

TROY: Bono know me better than that.

BONO: That's right. I know you. I know you got some Uncle Remus⁷ in your blood.

You got more stories than the devil got sinners.

TROY: Aw hell, I done seen him too! Done talked with the devil.

ROSE: Troy, don't nobody want to be hearing all that stuff.

(Lyons enters the yard from the street. Thirty-four years old, Troy's son from a previous marriage, he sports a neatly trimmed goatee, sport coat and white shirt, tieless and buttoned at the collar. Though he fancies himself a musician, he is more caught up in the rituals and "idea" of being a musician than in the actual practice of the music. He has come to borrow money from Troy and, while he knows he will be successful, he is uncertain as to what extent his lifestyle will be held up to scrutiny and ridicule.)

LYONS: Hey, Pop.

TROY: What you come "Hey, Popping" me for?

LYONS: How you doing, Rose? (Kisses her) Mr. Bono. How you doing?

BONO: Hey, Lyons . . . how you been?

TROY: He must have been doing all right. I ain't seen him around here last week.

ROSE: Troy, leave your boy alone. He come by to see you and you wanna start all that nonsense.

TROY: I ain't bothering Lyons. (Offers him the bottle) Here, get you a drink. We got an understanding. I know why he come by to see me and he know I know.

LYONS: Come on, Pop . . . I just stopped by to say hi . . . see how you was doing.

TROY: You ain't stopped by yesterday.

ROSE: You gonna stay for supper, Lyons? I got some chicken cooking in the oven.

LYONS: No, Rose . . . thanks. I was just in the neighborhood and thought I'd stop by for a minute.

7. African American narrator of the folktales, adapted from African American originals, published by white Georgia journalist Joel Chandler Harris beginning in 1879, and featuring Br'er Rabbit.

TROY: You was in the neighborhood all right, nigger. You telling the truth there.

You was in the neighborhood 'cause it's my payday.

LYONS: Well, hell, since you mentioned it . . . let me have ten dollars.

TROY: I'll be damned! I'll die and go to hell and play blackjack with the devil before I give you ten dollars.

BONO: That's what I want to know about . . . that devil you done seen.

LYONS: What . . . Pop done seen the devil? You too much, Pops.

TROY: Yeah, I done seen him. Talked to him too!

ROSE: You ain't seen no devil. I done told you that man ain't had nothing to do with the devil. Anything you can't understand, you want to call it the devil.

TROY: Look here, Bono . . . I went down to see Hertzberger about some furniture. Got three rooms for two-ninety-eight. That what it say on the radio. "Three rooms . . . two-ninety-eight." Even made up a little song about it. Go down there . . . man tell me I can't get no credit. I'm working every day and can't get no credit. What to do? I got an empty house with some raggedy furniture in it. Cory ain't got no bed. He's sleeping on a pile of rags on the floor. Working every day and can't get no credit. Come back here—Rose'll tell you—madder than hell. Sit down . . . try to figure what I'm gonna do. Come a knock on the door. Ain't been living here but three days. Who know I'm here? Open the door . . . devil standing there bigger than life. White fellow . . . got on good clothes and everything. Standing there with a clipboard in his hand. I ain't had to say nothing. First words come out of his mouth was . . . "I understand you need some furniture and can't get no credit." I liked to fell over. He say, "I'll give you all the credit you want, but you got to pay the interest on it." I told him, "Give me three rooms' worth and charge whatever you want." Next day a truck pulled up here and two men unloaded them three rooms. Man what drove the truck give me a book. Say send ten dollars, first of every month to the address in the book and everything will be all right. Say if I miss a payment the devil was coming back and it'll be hell to pay. That was fifteen years ago. To this day . . . the first of the month I send my ten dollars, Rose'll tell you.

ROSE: Troy lying.

TROY: I ain't never seen that man since. Now you tell me who else that could have been but the devil? I ain't sold my soul or nothing like that, you understand. Naw, I wouldn't have truck with the devil about nothing like that. I got my furniture and pays my ten dollars the first of the month just like clockwork.

BONO: How long you say you been paying this ten dollars a month?

TROY: Fifteen years!

BONO: Hell, ain't you finished paying for it yet? How much the man done charged you.

TROY: Aw hell, I done paid for it. I done paid for it ten times over! The fact is I'm scared to stop paying it.

ROSE: Troy lying. We got that furniture from Mr. Glickman, He ain't paying no ten dollars a month to nobody.

TROY: Aw hell, woman. Bono know I ain't that big a fool.

LYONS: I was just getting ready to say . . . I know where there's a bridge for sale.

TROY: Look here, I'll tell you this . . . it don't matter to me if he was the devil. It don't matter if the devil give credit. Somebody has got to give it.

ROSE: It ought to matter. You going around talking about having truck with the devil . . . God's the one you gonna have to answer to. He's the one gonna be at the Judgment.

LYONS: Yeah, well, look here, Pop . . . let me have that ten dollars. I'll give it back to you. Bonnie got a job working at the hospital.

TROY: What I tell you, Bono? The only time I see this nigger is when he wants something. That's the only time I see him.

LYONS: Come on, Pop, Mr. Bono don't want to hear all that. Let me have the ten dollars. I told you Bonnie working.

TROY: What that mean to me? "Bonnie working." I don't care if she working. Go ask her for the ten dollars if she working. Talking about "Bonnie working." Why ain't you working?

LYONS: Aw, Pop, you know I can't find no decent job. Where am I gonna get a job at? You know I can't get no job.

TROY: I told you I know some people down there. I can get you on the rubbish if you want to work. I told you that the last time you came by here asking me for something.

LYONS: Naw, Pop . . . thanks. That ain't for me. I don't wanna be carrying nobody's rubbish. I don't wanna be punching nobody's time clock.

TROY: What's the matter, you too good to carry people's rubbish? Where you think that ten dollars you talking about come from? I'm just supposed to haul people's rubbish and give my money to you 'cause you too lazy to work. You too lazy to work and wanna know why you ain't got what I got.

ROSE: What hospital Bonnie working at? Mercy?

LYONS: She's down at Passavant working in the laundry.

TROY: I ain't got nothing as it is. I give you that ten dollars and I got to eat beans the rest of the week. Naw . . . you ain't getting no ten dollars here.

LYONS: You ain't got to be eating no beans. I don't know why you wanna say that.

TROY: I ain't got no extra money. Gabe done moved over to Miss Pearl's paying her the rent and things done got tight around here. I can't afford to be giving you every payday.

LYONS: I ain't asked you to give me nothing. I asked you to loan me ten dollars. I know you got ten dollars.

TROY: Yeah, I got it. You know why I got it? 'Cause I don't throw my money away out there in the streets. You living the fast life . . . wanna be a musician . . . running around in them clubs and things . . . then, you learn to take care of yourself. You ain't gonna find me going and asking nobody for nothing. I done spent too many years without.

LYONS: You and me is two different people, Pop.

TROY: I done learned my mistake and learned to do what's right by it. You still trying to get something for nothing. Life don't owe you nothing. You owe it to yourself. Ask Bono. He'll tell you I'm right.

LYONS: You got your way of dealing with the world . . . I got mine. The only thing that matters to me is the music.

TROY: Yeah, I can see that! It don't matter how you gonna eat . . . where your next dollar is coming from. You telling the truth there.

LYONS: I know I got to eat. But I got to live too. I need something that gonna help me to get out of the bed in the morning. Make me feel like I belong in the world. I don't bother nobody. I just stay with my music 'cause that's the only way I can find to live in the world. Otherwise there ain't no telling what I might do. Now I don't come criticizing you and how you live. I just come by to ask you for ten dollars. I don't wanna hear all that about how I live.

TROY: Boy, your mama did a hell of a job raising you.

LYONS: You can't change me, Pop. I'm thirty-four years old. If you wanted to change me, you should have been there when I was growing up. I come by to see you . . . ask for ten dollars and you want to talk about how I was raised. You don't know nothing about how I was raised.

ROSE: Let the boy have ten dollars, Troy.

TROY (To Lyons): What the hell you looking at me for? I ain't got no ten dollars. You know what I do with my money. (To Rose) Give him ten dollars if you want him to have it.

ROSE: I will. Just as soon as you turn it loose.

TROY (Handing Rose the money): There it is. Seventy-six dollars and forty-two cents. You see this, Bono? Now, I ain't gonna get but six of that back.

ROSE: You ought to stop telling that lie. Here, Lyons. (Hands him the money)

LYONS: Thanks, Rose. Look . . . I got to run . . . I'll see you later.

TROY: Wait a minute. You gonna say, "Thanks, Rose," and ain't gonna look to see where she got that ten dollars from? See how they do me, Bono?

LYONS: I know she got it from you, Pop. Thanks. I'll give it back to you.

TROY: There he go telling another lie. Time I see that ten dollars . . . he'll be owing me thirty more.

LYONS: See you, Mr. Bono.

BONO: Take care, Lyons!

LYONS: Thanks, Pop. I'll see you again.

(Lyons exits the yard.)

TROY: I don't know why he don't go and get him a decent job and take care of that woman he got.

BONO: He'll be all right, Troy. The boy is still young.

TROY: The boy is thirty-four years old.

ROSE: Let's not get off into all that.

BONO: Look here . . . I got to be going. I got to be getting on. Lucille gonna be waiting.

TROY (Puts his arm around Rose): See this woman, Bono? I love this woman. I love this woman so much it hurts. I love her so much . . . I done run out of ways of loving her. So I got to go back to basics. Don't you come by my house Monday morning talking about time to go to work . . . 'cause I'm still gonna be stroking!

ROSE: Troy! Stop it now!

BONO: I ain't paying him no mind, Rose. That ain't nothing but gin-talk. Go on, Troy. I'll see you Monday.

TROY: Don't you come by my house, nigger! I done told you what I'm gonna be doing.

(The lights fade to black.)

Scene 2

The lights come up on Rose hanging up clothes. She hums and sings softly to herself. It is the following morning.

ROSE (Singing):

Jesus, be a fence all around me every day
 Jesus, I want you to protect me as I travel on my way.
 Jesus, be a fence all around me every day.

(Troy enters from the house.)

Jesus, I want you to protect me
 As I travel on my way.

(To Troy) 'Morning. You ready for breakfast? I can fix it soon as I finish hanging up these clothes?

TROY: I got the coffee on. That'll be all right. I'll just drink some of that this morning.

ROSE: That 651 hit yesterday. That's the second time this month. Miss Pearl hit for a dollar . . . seem like those that need the least always get lucky. Poor folks can't get nothing.

TROY: Them numbers don't know nobody. I don't know why you fool with them. You and Lyons both.

ROSE: It's something to do.

TROY: You ain't doing nothing but throwing your money away.

ROSE: Troy, you know I don't play foolishly. I just play a nickel here and a nickel there.

TROY: That's two nickels you done thrown away.

ROSE: Now I hit sometimes . . . that makes up for it. It always comes in handy when I do hit. I don't hear you complaining then.

TROY: I ain't complaining now. I just say it's foolish. Trying to guess out of six hundred ways which way the number gonna come. If I had all the money niggers, these Negroes, throw away on numbers for one week—just one week—I'd be a rich man.

ROSE: Well, you wishing and calling it foolish ain't gonna stop folks from playing numbers. That's one thing for sure. Besides . . . some good things come from playing numbers. Look where Pope done bought him that restaurant off of numbers.

TROY: I can't stand niggers like that. Man ain't had two dimes to rub together. He walking around with his shoes all run over bumming money for cigarettes. All right. Got lucky there and hit the numbers . . .

ROSE: Troy, I know all about it.

TROY: Had good sense, I'll say that for him. He ain't throwed his money away. I seen niggers hit the numbers and go through two thousand dollars in four days. Man bought him that restaurant down there . . . fixed it up real nice . . . and then didn't want nobody to come in it! A Negro go in there and can't get no kind of service. I seen a white fellow come in there and order a bowl of stew. Pope picked all the meat out the pot for him. Man ain't had nothing but a bowl of meat! Negro come behind him and ain't got nothing but the potatoes and carrots. Talking about what numbers do for people, you picked a wrong example. Ain't done nothing but make a worser fool out of him than he was before.

ROSE: Troy, you ought to stop worrying about what happened at work yesterday.

TROY: I ain't worried. Just told me to be down there at the commissioner's office on Friday. Everybody think they gonna fire me. I ain't worried about them firing me. You ain't got to worry about that. (Pause) Where's Cory? Cory in the house? (Calls) Cory?

ROSE: He gone out.

TROY: Out, huh? He gone out 'cause he know I want him to help me with this fence. I know how he is. That boy scared of work.

(Gabriel enters. He comes halfway down the alley and, hearing Troy's voice, stops.)

He ain't done a lick of work in his life.

ROSE: He had to go to football practice. Coach wanted them to get in a little extra practice before the season start.

TROY: I got his practice . . . running out of here before he get his chores done.

ROSE: Troy, what is wrong with you this morning? Don't nothing set right with you. Go on back in there and go to bed . . . get up on the other side.

TROY: Why something got to be wrong with me? I ain't said nothing wrong with me.

ROSE: You got something to say about everything. First it's the numbers . . . then it's the way the man runs his restaurant . . . then you done got on Cory. What's it gonna be next? Take a look up there and see if the weather suits you . . . or is it gonna be how you gonna put up the fence with the clothes hanging in the yard.

TROY: You hit the nail on the head then.

ROSE: I know you like I know the back of my hand. Go on in there and get you some coffee . . . see if that straighten you up. 'Cause you ain't right this morning.

(Troy starts into the house and sees Gabriel. Gabriel starts singing. Troy's brother, he is seven years younger than Troy. Injured in World War II, he has a metal plate in his head. He carries an old trumpet tied around his waist and believes with every fiber of his being that he is the archangel Gabriel.⁸ He carries a chipped basket with an assortment of discarded fruits and vegetables he has picked up in the strip district⁹ and which he attempts to sell.)

GABRIEL (Singing):

Yes, ma'am, I got plums
You ask me how I sell them

8. Divine messenger in Jewish, Christian, and Islamic traditions. In the Bible, he appears to Daniel (to explain his visions), to Zacharias (to prophesy John the Baptist's birth), and to Mary (to announce that she will bear Jesus). He is also said to be the angelic trumpeter who will announce the arrival of the Last Judgment and Christ's second coming.

9. Market district located on a narrow strip of land northeast of downtown Pittsburgh.

Oh ten cents apiece
 Three for a quarter
 Come and buy now
 'Cause I'm here today
 And tomorrow I'll be gone.

(Rose enters.)

Hey, Rose!

ROSE: How you doing, Gabe?

GABRIEL: There's Troy . . . Hey, Troy!

TROY: Hey, Gabe.

(Troy exits into the kitchen.)

ROSE (To Gabriel): What you got there?

GABRIEL: You know what I got, Rose. I got fruits and vegetables.

ROSE (Looking in the basket): Where's all these plums you talking about?

GABRIEL: I ain't got no plums today, Rose. I was just singing that. Have some tomorrow. Put me in a big order for plums. Have enough plums tomorrow for Saint Peter¹ and everybody.

(Troy reenters from the kitchen and crosses to the steps.)

(To Rose) Troy's mad at me.

TROY: I ain't mad at you. What I got to be mad at you about? You ain't done nothing to me.

GABRIEL: I just moved over to Miss Pearl's to keep out from in your way. I ain't mean no harm by it.

TROY: Who said anything about that? I ain't said anything about that.

GABRIEL: You ain't mad at me, is you?

TROY: Naw . . . I ain't mad at you, Gabe. If I was mad at you I'd tell you about it.

GABRIEL: Got me two rooms. In the basement. Got my own door too. Wanna see my key? (Holds up a key) That's my own key! Ain't nobody else got a key like that. That's my key! My two rooms!

TROY: Well, that's good, Gabe. You got your own key . . . that's good.

ROSE: You hungry, Gabe? I was just fixing to cook Troy his breakfast.

GABRIEL: I'll take some biscuits. You got some biscuits? Did you know when I was in Heaven . . . every morning me and Saint Peter would sit down by the Gate and eat some big fat biscuits? Oh, yeah! We had us a good time. We'd sit there and eat us them biscuits and then Saint Peter would go off to sleep and tell me to wake him up when it's time to open the Gates for the Judgment.

ROSE: Well, come on . . . I'll make up a batch of biscuits.

(Rose exits into the house.)

GABRIEL: Troy . . . Saint Peter got your name in the book. I seen it. It say . . . Troy Maxson. I say . . . I know him! He got the same name like what I got. That's my brother!

1. Apostle traditionally represented as guardian of heaven's gates because, in Matthew 16.19, Jesus tells him, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven [. . .]."

TROY: How many times you gonna tell me that, Gabe?

GABRIEL: Ain't got my name in the book. Don't have to have my name. I done died and went to Heaven. He got your name though. One morning Saint Peter was looking at his book . . . marking it up for the Judgment . . . and he let me see your name. Got it in there under M. Got Rose's name . . . I ain't seen it like I seen yours . . . but I know it's in there. He got a great big book. Got everybody's name what was ever been born. That's what he told me. But I seen your name. Seen it with my own eyes.

TROY: Go on in the house there. Rose going to fix you something to eat.

GABRIEL: Oh, I ain't hungry. I done had breakfast with Aunt Jemima. She come by and cooked me up a whole mess of flapjacks. Remember how we used to eat them flapjacks?

TROY: Go on in the house and get you something to eat now.

GABRIEL: I got to go sell my plums. I done sold some tomatoes. Got me two quarters. Wanna see? (Shows Troy his quarters) I'm gonna save them and buy me a new horn so Saint Peter can hear me when it's time to open the Gates. (Stops suddenly. Listens) Hear that? That's the hellhounds. I got to chase them out of here. Go on get out of here! Get out! (Exits singing:)

Better get ready for the Judgment
 Better get ready for the Judgment
 My Lord is coming down.

(Rose enters from the house.)

TROY: He gone off somewhere.

GABRIEL (Offstage):

Better get ready for the Judgment
 Better get ready for the Judgment morning
 Better get ready for the Judgment
 My God is coming down.

ROSE: He ain't eating right. Miss Pearl say she can't get him to eat nothing.

TROY: What you want me to do about it, Rose? I done did everything I can for the man. I can't make him get well. Man got half his head blown away . . . what you expect?

ROSE: Seem like something ought to be done to help him.

TROY: Man don't bother nobody. He just mixed up from that metal plate he got in his head. Ain't no sense for him to go back into the hospital.

ROSE: Least he be eating right. They can help him take care of himself.

TROY: Don't nobody wanna be locked up, Rose. What you wanna lock him up for? Man go over there and fight the war . . . messin' around with them Japs, get half his head blown off . . . and they give him a lousy three thousand dollars. And I had to swoop down on that.

ROSE: Is you fixing to go into that again?

TROY: That's the only way I got a roof over my head . . . 'cause of that metal plate.

ROSE: Ain't no sense you blaming yourself for nothing. Gabe wasn't in no condition to manage that money. You done what was right by him. Can't nobody say you ain't done what was right by him. Look how long you took care of him . . . till he wanted to have his own place and moved over there with Miss Pearl.

TROY: That ain't what I'm saying, woman! I'm just stating the facts. If my brother didn't have that metal plate in his head . . . I wouldn't have a pot to piss in or a window to throw it out of. And I'm fifty-three years old. Now see if you can understand that!

(He gets up from the porch and starts to exit the yard.)

ROSE: Where you going off to? You been running out of here every Saturday for weeks. I thought you was gonna work on this fence?

TROY: I'm gonna walk down to Taylors'. Listen to the ball game. I'll be back in a bit. I'll work on it when I get back.

(He exits the yard. The lights fade to black.)

Scene 3

The lights come up on the yard. It is four hours later. Rose is taking down the clothes from the line. Cory enters carrying his football equipment.

ROSE: Your daddy like to had a fit with you running out of here this morning without doing your chores.

CORY: I told you I had to go to practice.

ROSE: He say you were supposed to help him with this fence.

CORY: He been saying that the last four or five Saturdays, and then he don't never do nothing, but go down to Taylors'. Did you tell him about the recruiter?

ROSE: Yeah, I told him.

CORY: What he say?

ROSE: He ain't said nothing too much. You get in there and get started on your chores before he gets back. Go on and scrub down them steps before he gets back here hollering and carrying on.

CORY: I'm hungry. What you got to eat, Mama?

ROSE: Go on and get started on your chores. I got some meat loaf in there. Go on and make you a sandwich . . . and don't leave no mess in there.

(Cory exits into the house. Rose continues to take down the clothes. Troy enters the yard and sneaks up and grabs her from behind.)

Troy! Go on, now. You liked to scared me to death. What was the score of the game? Lucille had me on the phone and I couldn't keep up with it.

TROY: What I care about the game? Come here, woman. (Tries to kiss her)

ROSE: I thought you went down Taylors' to listen to the game. Go on, Troy! You supposed to be putting up this fence.

TROY (Attempting to kiss her again): I'll put it up when I finish with what is at hand.

ROSE: Go on, Troy. I ain't studying you.

TROY (Chasing after her): I'm studying you . . . fixing to do my homework!

ROSE: Troy, you better leave me alone.

TROY: Where's Cory? That boy brought his butt home yet?

ROSE: He's in the house doing his chores.

TROY (Calling): Cory! Get your butt out here, boy!

(Rose exits into the house with the laundry. Troy goes over to the pile of wood, picks up a board, and starts sawing. Cory enters from the house.)

You just now coming in here from leaving this morning?

CORY: Yeah, I had to go to football practice.

TROY: Yeah, what?

CORY: Yessir.

TROY: I ain't but two seconds off you noway. The garbage sitting in there overflowing . . . you ain't done none of your chores . . . and you come in here talking about, "Yeah."

CORY: I was just getting ready to do my chores now, Pop . . .

TROY: Your first chore is to help me with this fence on Saturday. Everything else come after that. Now get that saw and cut them boards.

(Cory takes the saw and begins cutting the boards. Troy continues working. There is a long pause.)

CORY: Hey, Pop . . . why don't you buy a TV?

TROY: What I want with a TV? What I want one of them for?

CORY: Everybody got one. Earl, Ba Bra . . . Jesse!

TROY: I ain't asked you who had one. I say what I want with one?

CORY: So you can watch it. They got lots of things on TV. Baseball games and everything. We could watch the World Series.

TROY: Yeah . . . and how much this TV cost?

CORY: I don't know. They got them on sale for around two hundred dollars.

TROY: Two hundred dollars, huh?

CORY: That ain't that much, Pop.

TROY: Naw, it's just two hundred dollars. See that roof you got over your head at night? Let me tell you something about that roof. It's been over ten years since that roof was last tarred. See now . . . the snow come this winter and sit up there on that roof like it is . . . and it's gonna seep inside. It's just gonna be a little bit . . . ain't gonna hardly notice it. Then the next thing you know, it's gonna be leaking all over the house. Then the wood rot from all that water and you gonna need a whole new roof. Now, how much you think it cost to get that roof tarred?

CORY: I don't know.

TROY: Two hundred and sixty-four dollars . . . cash money. While you thinking about a TV, I got to be thinking about the roof . . . and whatever else go wrong around here. Now if you had two hundred dollars, what would you do . . . fix the roof or buy a TV?

CORY: I'd buy a TV. Then when the roof started to leak . . . when it needed fixing . . . I'd fix it.

TROY: Where are you gonna get the money from? You done spent it for a TV. You gonna sit up and watch the water run all over your brand-new TV.

CORY: Aw, Pop. You got money. I know you do.

TROY: Where I got it at, huh?

CORY: You got it in the bank.

TROY: You wanna see my bankbook? You wanna see that seventy-three dollars and twenty-two cents I got sitting up in there.

CORY: You ain't got to pay for it all at one time. You can put a down payment on it and carry it home with you.

TROY: Not me. I ain't gonna owe nobody nothing if I can help it. Miss a payment and they come and snatch it right out your house. Then what you got? Now, soon as I get two hundred dollars clear, then I'll buy a TV. Right now, as soon as I get two hundred and sixty-four dollars, I'm gonna have this roof tarred.

CORY: Aw . . . Pop!

TROY: You go on and get you two hundred dollars and buy one if ya want it. I got better things to do with my money.

CORY: I can't get no two hundred dollars. I ain't never seen two hundred dollars.

TROY: I'll tell you what . . . you get you a hundred dollars and I'll put the other hundred with it.

CORY: All right, I'm gonna show you.

TROY: You gonna show me how you can cut them boards right now.

(Cory begins to cut the boards. There is a long pause.)

CORY: The Pirates won today. That makes five in a row.

TROY: I ain't thinking about the Pirates. Got an all-white team. Got that boy . . . that Puerto Rican boy . . . Clemente.² Don't even half-play him. That boy could be something if they give him a chance. Play him one day and sit him on the bench the next.

CORY: He gets a lot of chances to play.

TROY: I'm talking about playing regular. Playing every day so you can get your timing. That's what I'm talking about.

CORY: They got some white guys on the team that don't play every day. You can't play everybody at the same time.

TROY: If they got a white fellow sitting on the bench . . . you can bet your last dollar he can't play! The colored guy got to be twice as good before he get on the team. That's why I don't want you to get all tied up in them sports. Man on the team and what it get him? They got colored on the team and don't use them. Same as not having them. All them teams the same.

CORY: The Braves got Hank Aaron and Wes Covington.³ Hank Aaron hit two home runs today. That makes forty-three.

TROY: Hank Aaron ain't nobody. That's what you supposed to do. That's how you supposed to play the game. Ain't nothing to it. It's just a matter of timing . . . getting the right follow-through. Hell, I can hit forty-three home runs right now!

CORY: Not off no major-league pitching, you couldn't.

2. Roberto Clemente (1934–72), Pittsburgh Pirates right fielder (1955–72), four-time National League batting champion, and winner of twelve Gold Gloves.

3. African American fielder (1932–2011) who played for the Milwaukee Braves from 1956 to 1961. Hank Aaron: legendary African American batsman (b. 1934) who played twenty-one seasons with the Milwaukee, later Atlanta, Braves (1954–74) and, in 1974–75, broke Babe Ruth's records for most home runs and runs batted in (RBIs).

TROY: We had better pitching in the Negro leagues. I hit seven home runs off of Satchel Paige.⁴ You can't get no better than that!

CORY: Sandy Koufax.⁵ He's leading the league in strikeouts.

TROY: I ain't thinking of no Sandy Koufax.

CORY: You got Warren Spahn and Lew Burdette.⁶ I bet you couldn't hit no home runs off of Warren Spahn.

TROY: I'm through with it now. You go on and cut them boards. (Pause) Your mama tell me you done got recruited by a college football team? Is that right?

CORY: Yeah. Coach Zellman say the recruiter gonna be coming by to talk to you. Get you to sign the permission papers.

TROY: I thought you supposed to be working down there at the A&P. Ain't you supposed to be working down there after school?

CORY: Mr. Stawicki say he gonna hold my job for me until after the football season. Say starting next week I can work weekends.

TROY: I thought we had an understanding about this football stuff? You suppose to keep up with your chores and hold that job down at the A&P. Ain't been around here all day on a Saturday. Ain't none of your chores done . . . and now you telling me you done quit your job.

CORY: I'm gonna be working weekends.

TROY: You damn right you are! And ain't no need for nobody coming around here to talk to me about signing nothing.

CORY: Hey, Pop . . . you can't do that. He's coming all the way from North Carolina.

TROY: I don't care where he coming from. The white man ain't gonna let you get nowhere with that football noway. You go on and get your book-learning so you can work yourself up in that A&P or learn how to fix cars or build houses or something, get you a trade. That way you have something can't nobody take away from you. You go on and learn how to put your hands to some good use. Besides hauling people's garbage.

CORY: I get good grades, Pop. That's why the recruiter wants to talk with you. You got to keep up your grades to get recruited. This way I'll be going to college. I'll get a chance . . .

TROY: First you gonna get your butt down there to the A&P and get your job back.

CORY: Mr. Stawicki done already hired somebody else 'cause I told him I was playing football.

TROY: You a bigger fool than I thought . . . to let somebody take away your job so you can play some football. Where you gonna get your money to take out your girlfriend and whatnot? What kind of foolishness is that to let somebody take away your job?

CORY: I'm still gonna be working weekends.

4. Pitcher (1906–82); arguably the Negro Leagues' most famous player (1926–47), he pitched in the newly integrated major leagues from age forty-two to sixty (1948–66).

5. Brooklyn, later Los Angeles, Dodgers pitcher (b. 1935), the first player ever to win three Cy Young Awards, and the youngest ever elected to Baseball's Hall of Fame.

6. Like 1957 Cy Young Award winner Warren Spahn (1921–2003), a pitcher for the Boston, later Milwaukee, Braves (1926–2007), MVP of the 1957 World Series, the only World Series the Milwaukee Braves ever won and the first, since 1948, won by any non-New York team.

TROY: Naw . . . naw. You getting your butt out of here and finding you another job.

CORY: Come on, Pop! I got to practice. I can't work after school and play football too. The team needs me. That's what Coach Zellman say . . .

TROY: I don't care what nobody else say. I'm the boss . . . you understand? I'm the boss around here. I do the only saying what counts.

CORY: Come on, Pop!

TROY: I asked you . . . did you understand?

CORY: Yeah . . .

TROY: What!?!

CORY: Yessir.

TROY: You go on down there to that A&P and see if you can get your job back. If you can't do both . . . then you quit the football team. You've got to take the crookeds with the straights.

CORY: Yessir. (Pause) Can I ask you a question?

TROY: What the hell you wanna ask me? Mr. Stawicki the one you got the questions for.

CORY: How come you ain't never liked me?

TROY: Liked you? Who the hell say I got to like you? What law is there say I got to like you? Wanna stand up in my face and ask a damn fool-ass question like that. Talking about liking somebody. Come here, boy, when I talk to you.

(Cory comes over to where Troy is working. He stands slouched over and Troy shoves him on his shoulder.)

Straighten up, goddamn it! I asked you a question . . . what law is there say I got to like you?

CORY: None.

TROY: Well, all right then! Don't you eat every day? (Pause) Answer me when I talk to you! Don't you eat every day?

CORY: Yeah.

TROY: Nigger, as long as you in my house, you put that sir on the end of it when you talk to me!

CORY: Yes . . . sir.

TROY: You eat every day.

CORY: Yessir!

TROY: Got a roof over your head.

CORY: Yessir!

TROY: Got clothes on your back.

CORY: Yessir.

TROY: Why you think that is?

CORY: 'Cause of you.

TROY: Aw, hell, I know its 'cause of me . . . but why do you think that is?

CORY (Hesitant): 'Cause you like me.

TROY: Like you? I go out of here every morning . . . bust my butt . . . putting up with them crackers every day . . . 'cause I like you? You about the biggest fool I ever saw. (Pause) It's my job. It's my responsibility! You understand that? A man got to take care of his family. You live in my house . . . sleep you behind on my bedclothes . . . fill you belly up with my food . . . 'cause you my son.

You my flesh and blood. Not 'cause I like you! 'Cause it's my duty to take care of you. I owe a responsibility to you!

Let's get this straight right here . . . before it go along any further . . . I ain't got to like you. Mr. Rand don't give me my money come payday 'cause he likes me. He gives me 'cause he owe me. I done give you everything I had to give you. I gave you your life! Me and your mama worked that out between us. And liking your black ass wasn't part of the bargain. Don't you try and go through life worrying about if somebody like you or not. You best be making sure they doing right by you. You understand what I'm saying, boy?

CORY: Yessir.

TROY: Then get the hell out of my face, and get on down to that A&P.

(Rose has been standing behind the screen door for much of the scene. She enters as Cory exits.)

ROSE: Why don't you let the boy go ahead and play football, Troy? Ain't no harm in that. He's just trying to be like you with the sports.

TROY: I don't want him to be like me! I want him to move as far away from my life as he can get. You the only decent thing that ever happened to me. I wish him that. But I don't wish him a thing else from my life. I decided seventeen years ago that boy wasn't getting involved in no sports. Not after what they did to me in the sports.

ROSE: Troy, why don't you admit you was too old to play in the major leagues? For once . . . why don't you admit that?

TROY: What do you mean too old? Don't come telling me I was too old. I just wasn't the right color. Hell, I'm fifty-three years old and can do better than Selkirk's .269 right now!

ROSE: How's was you gonna play ball when you were over forty? Sometimes I can't get no sense out of you.

TROY: I got good sense, woman. I got sense enough not to let my boy get hurt over playing no sports. You been mothering that boy too much. Worried about if people like him.

ROSE: Everything that boy do . . . he do for you. He wants you to say, "Good job, son." That's all.

TROY: Rose, I ain't got time for that. He's alive. He's healthy. He's got to make his own way. I made mine. Ain't nobody gonna hold his hand when he get out there in that world.

ROSE: Times have changed from when you was young, Troy. People change. The world's changing around you and you can't even see it.

TROY (Slow, methodical): Woman . . . I do the best I can do. I come in here every Friday. I carry a sack of potatoes and a bucket of lard. You all line up at the door with your hands out. I give you the lint from my pockets. I give you my sweat and my blood. I ain't got no tears. I done spent them. We go upstairs in that room at night . . . and I fall down on you and try to blast a hole into forever. I get up Monday morning . . . find my lunch on the table. I go out. Make my way. Find my strength to carry me through to the next Friday. (Pause) That's all I got, Rose. That's all I got to give. I can't give nothing else.

(Troy exits into the house. The lights fade to black.)

Scene 4

It is Friday. Two weeks later. Cory starts out of the house with his football equipment. The phone rings.

CORY (Calling): I got it! (Answers the phone, stands in the screen door talking)

Hello? Hey, Jesse. Naw . . . I was just getting ready to leave now.

ROSE (Calling): Cory!

CORY: I told you, man, them spikes is all tore up. You can use them if you want, but they ain't no good. Earl got some spikes.

ROSE (Calling): Cory!

CORY (Calling to Rose): Mam? I'm talking to Jesse. (Into phone) When she say that? (Pause) Aw, you lying, man. I'm gonna tell her you said that.

ROSE (Calling): Cory, don't you go nowhere!

CORY: I got to go to the game, Ma! (Into the phone) Yeah, hey, look, I'll talk to you later. Yeah, I'll meet you over Earl's house. Later. Bye, Ma.

(Cory exits the house and starts out the yard.)

ROSE: Cory, where you going off to? You got that stuff all pulled out and thrown all over your room.

CORY (In the yard): I was looking for my spikes. Jesse wanted to borrow my spikes.

ROSE: Get up there and get that cleaned up before your daddy get back in here.

CORY: I got to go to the game! I'll clean it up when I get back.

(He exits.)

ROSE: That's all he need to do is see that room all messed up.

(Rose exits into the house. Troy and Bono enter the yard with a bottle. Troy is dressed in clothes other than his work clothes.)

BONO: He told him the same thing he told you. Take it to the union.

TROY: Brownie ain't got that much sense. Man wasn't thinking about nothing.

He wait until I confront them on it . . . then he wanna come crying seniority.

(Calls) Hey, Rose!

BONO: I wish I could have seen Mr. Rand's face when he told you.

TROY: He couldn't get it out of his mouth! Liked to bit his tongue! When they called me down there to the commissioner's office . . . he thought they was gonna fire me. Like everybody else.

BONO: I didn't think they was gonna fire you. I thought they was gonna put you on the warning paper.

TROY: Hey, Rose! (To Bono) Yeah, Mr. Rand like to bit his tongue.

(Troy breaks the seal on the bottle, takes a drink, and hands it to Bono.)

BONO: I see you run right down to Taylors' and told that Alberta gal.

TROY (Calling): Hey, Rose! (To Bono) I told everybody. Hey, Rose! I went down there to cash my check.

ROSE (Entering from the house): Hush all that hollering, man! I know you out here. What they say down there at the commissioner's office?

TROY: You supposed to come when I call you, woman. Bono'll tell you that. (To Bono) Don't Lucille come when you call her?

ROSE: Man, hush your mouth. I ain't no dog . . . talk about "come when you call me."

TROY (Puts his arm around Rose): You hear this, Bono? I had me an old dog used to get uppity like that. You say, "C'mere, Blue!" . . . and he just lay there and look at you. End up getting a stick and chasing him away trying to make him come.

ROSE: I ain't studying you and your dog. I remember you used to sing that old song.

TROY (Singing):
Hear it ring! Hear it ring!
I had a dog his name was Blue.

ROSE: Don't nobody wanna hear you sing that old song.

TROY (Singing):
You know Blue was mighty true.

ROSE: Used to have Cory running around here singing that song.

BONO: Hell, I remember that song myself.

TROY (Singing):
You know Blue was a good old dog.
Blue treed a possum in a hollow log.

That was my daddy's song. My daddy made up that song.

ROSE: I don't care who made it up. Don't nobody wanna hear you sing it.

TROY (Makes a song like calling a dog): Come here, woman.

ROSE: You come in here carrying on, I reckon they ain't fired you. What they say down there at the commissioner's office?

TROY: Look here, Rose . . . Mr. Rand called me into his office today when I got back from talking to them people down there . . . it come from up top . . . he called me in and told me they was making me a driver.

ROSE: Troy, you kidding!

TROY: No I ain't. Ask Bono.

ROSE: Well, that's great, Troy. Now you don't have to hassle them people no more.

(Lyons enters from the street.)

TROY: Aw hell, I wasn't looking to see you today. I thought you was in jail. Got it all over the front page of the Courier about them raiding Seefus' place . . . where you be hanging out with all them thugs.

LYONS: Hey, Pop . . . that ain't got nothing to do with me. I don't go down there gambling. I go down there to sit in with the band. I ain't got nothing to do with the gambling part. They got some good music down there.

TROY: They got some rogues . . . is what they got.

LYONS: How you been, Mr. Bono? Hi, Rose.

BONO: I see where you playing down at the Crawford Grill tonight.

ROSE: How come you ain't brought Bonnie like I told you. You should have brought Bonnie with you, she ain't been over in a month of Sundays.

LYONS: I was just in the neighborhood . . . thought I'd stop by.

TROY: Here he come . . .

BONO: Your daddy got a promotion on the rubbish. He's gonna be the first colored driver. Ain't got to do nothing but sit up there and read the paper like them white fellows.

LYONS: Hey, Pop . . . if you knew how to read you'd be all right.

BONO: Naw . . . naw . . . you mean if the nigger knew how to drive he'd be all right. Been fighting with them people about driving and ain't even got a license. Mr. Rand know you ain't got no driver's license?

TROY: Driving ain't nothing. All you do is point the truck where you want it to go. Driving ain't nothing.

BONO: Do Mr. Rand know you ain't got no driver's license? That's what I'm talking about. I ain't asked if driving was easy. I asked if Mr. Rand know you ain't got no driver's license.

TROY: He ain't got to know. The man ain't got to know my business. Time he find out, I have two or three driver's licenses.

LYONS (Going into his pocket): Say, look here, Pop . . .

TROY: I knew it was coming. Didn't I tell you, Bono? I know what kind of "look here, Pop" that was. The nigger fixing to ask me for some money. It's Friday night. It's my payday. All them rogues down there on the avenue . . . the ones that ain't in jail . . . and Lyons is hopping in his shoes to get down there with them.

LYONS: See, Pop . . . if you'd give somebody else a chance to talk sometime, you'd see that I was fixing to pay you back your ten dollars like I told you. Here . . . I told you I'd pay you when Bonnie got paid.

TROY: Naw . . . you go ahead and keep that ten dollars. Put it in the bank. The next time you feel like you wanna come by here and ask me for something . . . you go on down there and get that.

LYONS: Here's your ten dollars, Pop. I told you I don't want you to give me nothing. I just wanted to borrow ten dollars.

TROY: Naw . . . you go on and keep that for the next time you want to ask me.

LYONS: Come on, Pop . . . here go your ten dollars.

ROSE: Why don't you go on and let the boy pay you back, Troy?

LYONS: Here you go, Rose. If you don't take it I'm gonna have to hear about it for the next six months. (Hands her the money)

ROSE: You can hand yours over here too, Troy.

TROY: You see this, Bono. You see how they do me.

BONO: Yeah, Lucille do me the same way.

(Gabriel is heard singing offstage. He enters.)

GABRIEL: Better get ready for the Judgment! Better get ready for . . . Hey! . . . Hey! There's Troy's boy!

LYONS: How you doing, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL: Lyons . . . The King of the Jungle! Rose . . . hey, Rose. Got a flower for you. (Takes a rose from his pocket) Picked it myself. That's the same rose like you is!

ROSE: That's right nice of you, Gabe.

LYONS: What you been doing, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL: Oh, I been chasing hellhounds and waiting on the time to tell Saint Peter to open the Gates.

LYONS: You been chasing hellhounds, huh? Well . . . you doing the right thing, Uncle Gabe. Somebody got to chase them.

GABRIEL: Oh, yeah . . . I know it. The devil's strong. The devil ain't no pushover. Hellhounds snipping at everybody's heels. But I got my trumpet waiting on the Judgment time.

LYONS: Waiting on the Battle of Armageddon,⁷ huh?

GABRIEL: Ain't gonna be too much of a battle when God get to waving that Judgment sword. But the people's gonna have a hell of a time trying to get into Heaven if them Gates ain't open.

LYONS (Putting his arm around Gabriel): You hear this, Pop. Uncle Gabe, you all right!

GABRIEL (Laughing with Lyons): Lyons! King of the Jungle.

ROSE: You gonna stay for supper, Gabe. Want me to fix you a plate?

GABRIEL: I'll just take a sandwich, Rose. Don't want no plate. Just wanna eat with my hands. I'll take a sandwich.

ROSE: How about you, Lyons? You staying? Got some short ribs cooking.

LYONS: Naw, I won't eat nothing till after we finished playing. (Pause) You ought to come down and listen to me play, Pop.

TROY: I don't like that Chinese music. All that noise.

ROSE: Go on in the house and wash up, Gabe . . . I'll fix you a sandwich.

GABRIEL (As he exits, to Lyons): Troy's mad at me.

LYONS: What you mad at Uncle Gabe for, Pop.

ROSE: He thinks Troy's mad at him 'cause he moved over to Miss Pearl's.

TROY: I ain't mad at the man. He can live where he want to live at.

LYONS: What he move over there for? Miss Pearl don't like nobody.

ROSE: She don't mind him none. She treats him real nice. She just don't allow all that singing.

TROY: She don't mind that rent he be paying . . . that's what she don't mind.

ROSE: Troy, I ain't going through that with you no more. He's over there 'cause he want to have his own place. He can come and go as he please.

TROY: Hell, he could come and go as he please here. I wasn't stopping him. I ain't put no rules on him.

ROSE: It ain't the same thing, Troy. And you know it.

(Gabriel comes to the screen door.)

Now, that's the last I wanna hear about that. I don't wanna hear nothing else about Gabe and Miss Pearl. And next week . . .

GABRIEL: I'm ready for my sandwich, Rose.

ROSE: And next week . . . when that recruiter come from that school . . . I want you to sign that paper and go on and let Cory play football. Then that'll be the last I have to hear about that.

TROY (To Rose as she exits into the house): I ain't thinking about Cory nothing.

LYONS: What . . . Cory got recruited? What school he going to?

7. According to Christian tradition, the final, history-ending battle between the armies of good and evil.

TROY: That boy walking around here smelling his piss . . . thinking he's grown. Thinking he's gonna do what he want, irrespective of what I say. Look here, Bono . . . I left the commissioner's office and went down to the A&P . . . that boy ain't working down there. He lying to me. Telling me he got his job back . . . telling me he working weekends . . . telling me he working after school . . . Mr. Stawicki tell me he ain't working down there at all!

LYONS: Cory just growing up. He's just busting at the seams trying to fill out your shoes.

TROY: I don't care what he's doing. When he get to the point where he wanna disobey me . . . then it's time for him to move on. Bono'll tell you that I bet he ain't never disobeyed his daddy without paying the consequences.

BONO: I ain't never had a chance. My daddy came on through . . . but I ain't never knew him to see him . . . or what he had on his mind or where he went. Just moving on through. Searching out the New Land. That's what the old folks used to call it. See a fellow moving around from place to place . . . woman to woman . . . called it Searching out the New Land. I can't say if he ever found it. I come along, didn't want no kids. Didn't know if I was gonna be in one place long enough to fix on them right as their daddy. I figured I was going searching too. As it turned out I been hooked up with Lucille near about as long as your daddy been with Rose. Going on sixteen years.

TROY: Sometimes I wish I hadn't known my daddy. He ain't cared nothing about no kids. A kid to him wasn't nothing. All he wanted was for you to learn how to walk so he could start you to working. When it come time for eating . . . he ate first. If there was anything left over, that's what you got. Man would sit down and eat two chickens and give you the wing.

LYONS: You ought to stop that, Pop. Everybody feed their kids. No matter how hard times is . . . everybody care about their kids. Make sure they have something to eat.

TROY: The only thing my daddy cared about was getting them bales of cotton in to Mr. Lubin. That's the only thing that mattered to him. Sometimes I used to wonder why he was living. Wonder why the devil hadn't come and got him. "Get them bales of cotton in to Mr. Lubin" and find out he owe him money . . .

LYONS: He should have just went on and left when he saw he couldn't get nowhere. That's what I would have done.

TROY: How he gonna leave with eleven kids? And where he gonna go? He ain't knew how to do nothing but farm. No, he was trapped and I think he knew it. But I'll say this for him . . . he felt a responsibility toward us. Maybe he ain't treated us the way I felt he should have . . . but without that responsibility he could have walked off and left us . . . made his own way.

BONO: A lot of them did. Back in those days what you talking about . . . they walk out their front door and just take on down one road or another and keep on walking.

LYONS: There you go! That's what I'm talking about.

BONO: Just keep on walking till you come to something else. Ain't you never heard of nobody having the walking blues? Well, that's what you call it when you just take off like that.

TROY: My daddy ain't had them walking blues! What you talking about? He stayed right there with his family. But he was just as evil as he could be. My mama couldn't stand him. Couldn't stand that evilness. She run off when I was about eight. She sneaked off one night after he had gone to sleep. Told me she was coming back for me. I ain't never seen her no more. All his women run off and left him. He wasn't good for nobody.

When my turn come to head out, I was fourteen and got to sniffing around Joe Canewell's daughter. Had us an old mule we called Greyboy. My daddy sent me out to do some plowing and I tied up Greyboy and went to fooling around with Joe Canewell's daughter. We done found us a nice spot, got real cozy with each other. She about thirteen and we done figured we was grown anyway . . . so we down there enjoying ourselves . . . ain't thinking about nothing. We didn't know Greyboy had got loose and wandered back to the house and my daddy was looking for me. We down there by the creek enjoying ourselves when my daddy come up on us. Surprised us. He had them leather straps off the mule and commenced to whupping me like there was no tomorrow. I jumped up, mad and embarrassed. I was scared of my daddy. When he commenced to whupping on me . . . quite naturally I run to get out of the way. (Pause) Now I thought he was mad 'cause I ain't done my work. But I see where he was chasing me off so he could have the gal for himself. When I see what the matter of it was, I lost all fear of my daddy. Right there is where I become a man . . . at fourteen years of age. (Pause) Now it was my turn to run him off. I picked up them same reins that he had used on me. I picked up them reins and commenced to whupping on him. The gal jumped up and run off . . . and when my daddy turned to face me, I could see why the devil had never come to get him . . . 'cause he was the devil himself. I don't know what happened. When I woke up, I was laying right there by the creek, and Blue . . . this old dog we had . . . was licking my face. I thought I was blind. I couldn't see nothing. Both my eyes were swollen shut. I laid there and cried. I didn't know what I was gonna do. The only thing I knew was the time had come for me to leave my daddy's house. And right there the world suddenly got big. And it was a long time before I could cut it down to where I could handle it.

Part of that cutting down was when I got to the place where I could feel him kicking in my blood and knew that the only thing that separated us was the matter of a few years.

(Gabriel enters from the house with a sandwich.)

LYONS: What you got there, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL: Got me a ham sandwich. Rose gave me a ham sandwich.

TROY: I don't know what happened to him. I done lost touch with everybody except Gabriel. But I hope he's dead. I hope he found some peace.

LYONS: That's a heavy story, Pop. I didn't know you left home when you was fourteen.

TROY: And didn't know nothing. The only part of the world I knew was the forty-two acres of Mr. Lubin's land. That's all I knew about life.

LYONS: Fourteen's kinda young to be out on your own. (Phone rings) I don't even think I was ready to be out on my own at fourteen. I don't know what I would have done.

TROY: I got up from the creek and walked on down to Mobile.⁸ I was through with farming. Figured I could do better in the city. So I walked the two hundred miles to Mobile.

LYONS: Wait a minute . . . you ain't walked no two hundred miles, Pop. Ain't nobody gonna walk no two hundred miles. You talking about some walking there.

BONO: That's the only way you got anywhere back in them days.

LYONS: Shhh. Damn if I wouldn't have hitched a ride with somebody!

TROY: Who you gonna hitch it with? They ain't had no cars and things like they got now. We talking about 1918.

ROSE (Entering): What you all out here getting into?

TROY (To Rose): I'm telling Lyons how good he got it. He don't know nothing about this I'm talking.

ROSE: Lyons, that was Bonnie on the phone. She say you supposed to pick her up.

LYONS: Yeah, okay, Rose.

TROY: I walked on down to Mobile and hitched up with some of them fellows that was heading this way. Got up here and found out . . . not only couldn't you get a job . . . you couldn't find no place to live. I thought I was in freedom. Shhh. Colored folks living down there on the riverbanks in whatever kind of shelter they could find for themselves. Right down there under the Brady Street Bridge. Living in shacks made of sticks and tarpaper. Messed around there and went from bad to worse. Started stealing. First it was food. Then I figured, hell, if I steal money I can buy me some food. Buy me some shoes too! One thing led to another. Met your mama. I was young and anxious to be a man. Met your mama and had you. What I do that for? Now I got to worry about feeding you and her. Got to steal three times as much. Went out one day looking for somebody to rob . . . that's what I was, a robber. I'll tell you the truth. I'm ashamed of it today. But it's the truth. Went to rob this fellow . . . pulled out my knife . . . and he pulled out a gun. Shot me in the chest. It felt just like somebody had taken a hot branding iron and laid it on me. When he shot me I jumped at him with my knife. They told me I killed him and they put me in the penitentiary and locked me up for fifteen years. That's where I met Bono. That's where I learned how to play baseball. Got out that place and your mama had taken you and went on to make life without me. Fifteen years was a long time for her to wait. But that fifteen years cured me of that robbing stuff. Rose'll tell you. She asked me when I met her if I had gotten all that foolishness out of my system. And I told her, "Baby, it's you and baseball all what count with me." You hear me, Bono? I meant it too. She say, "Which one comes first?" I told her, "Baby, ain't no doubt it's baseball . . . but you stick and get old with me and we'll both outlive this baseball." Am I right, Rose? And it's true.

ROSE: Man, hush your mouth. You ain't said no such thing. Talking about, "Baby, you know you'll always be number one with me." That's what you was talking.

TROY: You hear that, Bono. That's why I love her.

BONO: Rose'll keep you straight. You get off the track, she'll straighten you up.

8. City in southwest Alabama, on the Gulf Coast near the Florida state line.

ROSE: Lyons, you better get on up and get Bonnie. She waiting on you.

LYONS (Gets up to go): Hey, Pop, why don't you come on down to the Grill and hear me play?

TROY: I ain't going down there. I'm too old to be sitting around in them clubs.

BONO: You got to be good to play down at the Grill.

LYONS: Come on, Pop . . .

TROY: I got to get up in the morning.

LYONS: You ain't got to stay long.

TROY: Naw, I'm gonna get my supper and go on to bed.

LYONS: Well, I got to go. I'll see you again.

TROY: Don't you come around my house on my payday.

ROSE: Pick up the phone and let somebody know you coming. And bring Bonnie with you. You know I'm always glad to see her.

LYONS: Yeah, I'll do that, Rose. You take care now. See you, Pop. See you, Mr. Bono. See you, Uncle Gabe.

GABRIEL: Lyons! King of the Jungle!

(Lyons exits.)

TROY: Is supper ready, woman? Me and you got some business to take care of. I'm gonna tear it up too.

ROSE: Troy, I done told you now!

TROY (Puts his arm around Bono): Aw hell, woman . . . this is Bono. Bono like family. I done known this nigger since . . . how long I done know you?

BONO: It's been a long time.

TROY: I done known this nigger since Skippy was a pup. Me and him done been through some times.

BONO: You sure right about that.

TROY: Hell, I done know him longer than I known you. And we still standing shoulder to shoulder. Hey, look here, Bono . . . a man can't ask for no more than that. (Drinks to him) I love you, nigger.

BONO: Hell, I love you too . . . but I got to get home see my woman. You got yours in hand. I got to go get mine.

(Bono starts to exit as Cory enters the yard, dressed in his football uniform. He gives Troy a hard, uncompromising look.)

CORY: What you do that for, Pop? (Throws his helmet down in the direction of Troy)

ROSE: What's the matter? Cory . . . what's the matter?

CORY: Papa done went up to the school and told Coach Zellman I can't play football no more. Wouldn't even let me play the game. Told him to tell the recruiter not to come.

ROSE: Troy . . .

TROY: What you Troying me for. Yeah, I did it. And the boy know why I did it.

CORY: Why you wanna do that to me? That was the one chance I had.

ROSE: Ain't nothing wrong with Cory playing football, Troy.

TROY: The boy lied to me. I told the nigger if he wanna play football . . . to keep up his chores and hold down that job at the A&P. That was the conditions. Stopped down there to see Mr. Stawicki . . .

CORY: I can't work after school during the football season, Pop! I tried to tell you that Mr. Stawicki's holding my job for me. You don't never want to listen to nobody. And then you wanna go and do this to me!

TROY: I ain't done nothing to you. You done it to yourself.

CORY: Just 'cause you didn't have a chance! You just scared I'm gonna be better than you, that's all.

TROY: Come here.

ROSE: Troy . . .

(Cory reluctantly crosses over to Troy.)

TROY: All right! See. You done made a mistake.

CORY: I didn't even do nothing!

TROY: I'm gonna tell you what your mistake was. See . . . you swung at the ball and didn't hit it. That's strike one. See, you in the batter's box now. You swung and you missed. That's strike one. Don't you strike out!

(The lights go down on the scene.)

ACT TWO

Scene 1

The following morning. Cory is at the tree hitting the ball with the bat. He tries to mimic Troy, but his swing is awkward, less sure. Rose enters from the house.

ROSE: Cory, I want you to help me with this cupboard.

CORY: I ain't quitting the team. I don't care what Poppa say.

ROSE: I'll talk to him when he gets back. He had to go see about your Uncle Gabe. The police done arrested him. Say he was disturbing the peace. He'll be back directly. Come on in here and help me clean out the top of this cupboard.

(Cory exits into the house. Rose sees Troy and Bono coming down the alley.)

Troy . . . what they say down there?

TROY: Ain't said nothing. I give them fifty dollars and they let him go. I'll talk to you about it. Where's Cory?

ROSE: He's in there helping me clean out these cupboards.

TROY: Tell him to get his butt out here.

(Troy and Bono go over to the pile of wood. Bono picks up the saw and begins sawing.)

(To Bono) All they want is the money. That makes six or seven times I done went down there and got him. See me coming they stick out their hands.

BONO: Yeah, I know what you mean. That's all they care about . . . that money. They don't care about what's right. (Pause) Nigger, why you got to go and get some hard wood? You ain't doing nothing but building a little old fence. Get you some soft pine wood. That's all you need.

TROY: I know what I'm doing. This is outside wood. You put pine wood inside the house. Pine wood is inside wood. This here is outside wood. Now you tell me where the fence is gonna be?

BONO: You don't need this wood. You can put it up with pine wood and it'll stand as long as you gonna be here looking at it.

TROY: How you know how long I'm gonna be here, nigger? Hell, I might just live forever. Live longer than old man Horsely.

BONO: That's what Magee used to say.

TROY: Magee's a damn fool. Now you tell me who you ever heard of gonna pull their own teeth with a pair of rusty pliers.

BONO: The old folks . . . my granddaddy used to pull his teeth with pliers. They ain't had no dentists for the colored folks back then.

TROY: Get clean pliers! You understand? Clean pliers! Sterilize them! Besides we ain't living back then. All Magee had to do was walk over to Doc Goldblum's.

BONO: I see where you and that Tallahassee gal . . . that Alberta . . . I see where you all done got tight.

TROY: What you mean "got tight"?

BONO: I see where you be laughing and joking with her all the time.

TROY: I laughs and jokes with all of them, Bono. You know me.

BONO: That ain't the kind of laughing and joking I'm talking about.

(Cory enters from the house.)

CORY: How you doing, Mr. Bono?

TROY: Cory? Get that saw from Bono and cut some wood. He talking about the wood's too hard to cut. Stand back there, Jim, and let that young boy show you how it's done.

BONO: He's sure welcome to it.

(Cory takes the saw and begins to cut the wood.)

Whew-e-e! Look at that. Big old strong boy. Look like Joe Louis.⁹ Hell, must be getting old the way I'm watching that boy whip through that wood.

CORY: I don't see why Mama want a fence around the yard noways.

TROY: Damn if I know either. What the hell she keeping out with it? She ain't got nothing nobody want.

BONO: Some people build fences to keep people out . . . and other people build fences to keep people in. Rose wants to hold on to you all. She loves you.

TROY: Hell, nigger, I don't need nobody to tell me my wife loves me, Cory . . . go on in the house and see if you can find that other saw.

CORY: Where's it at?

TROY: I said find it! Look for it till you find it!

(Cory exits into the house.)

What's that supposed to mean? Wanna keep us in?

BONO: Troy . . . I done known you seem like damn near my whole life. You and Rose both. I done know both of you all for a long time. I remember when you met Rose. When you was hitting them baseball out the park. A lot of them old gals was after you then. You had the pick of the litter. When you picked Rose, I was happy for you. That was the first time I knew you had any sense. I said . . . My man Troy knows what he's doing . . . I'm gonna follow this nigger . . . he might take me somewhere. I been following you too. I done learned a whole heap of things about life watching you. I done learned how to tell where the shit lies. How to tell it from the alfalfa. You done learned me a lot of things. You showed me how to not make the same mistakes . . . to take life as it comes along and keep putting one foot in front of the other. (Pause) Rose a good woman, Troy.

9. Alabama-born boxer (1914–81) known as the "Brown Bomber," world heavyweight champion from 1937 to 1949.

TROY: Hell, nigger, I know she a good woman. I been married to her for eighteen years. What you got on your mind, Bono?

BONO: I just say she a good woman. Just like I say anything. I ain't got to have nothing on my mind.

TROY: You just gonna say she a good woman and leave it hanging out there like that? Why you telling me she a good woman?

BONO: She loves you, Troy. Rose loves you.

TROY: You saying I don't measure up. That's what you trying to say. I don't measure up 'cause I'm seeing this other gal. I know what you trying to say.

BONO: I know what Rose means to you, Troy. I'm just trying to say I don't want to see you mess up.

TROY: Yeah, I appreciate that, Bono. If you was messing around on Lucille I'd be telling you the same thing.

BONO: Well, that's all I got to say. I just say that because I love you both.

TROY: Hell, you know me . . . I wasn't out there looking for nothing. You can't find a better woman than Rose. I know that. But seems like this woman just stuck on to me where I can't shake her loose. I done wrestled with it, tried to throw her off me . . . but she just stuck on tighter. Now she's stuck on for good.

BONO: You's in control . . . that's what you tell me all the time. You responsible for what you do.

TROY: I ain't ducking the responsibility of it. As long as it sets right in my heart . . . then I'm okay. 'Cause that's all I listen to. It'll tell me right from wrong every time. And I ain't talking about doing Rose no bad turn. I love Rose. She done carried me a long ways and I love and respect her for that.

BONO: I know you do. That's why I don't want to see you hurt her. But what you gonna do when she find out? What you got then? If you try and juggle both of them . . . sooner or later you gonna drop one of them. That's common sense.

TROY: Yeah, I hear what you saying, Bono. I been trying to figure a way to work it out.

BONO: Work it out right, Troy. I don't want to be getting all up between you and Rose's business . . . but work it so it come out right.

TROY: Aw hell, I get all up between you and Lucille's business. When you gonna get that woman that refrigerator she been wanting? Don't tell me you ain't got no money now. I know who your banker is. Mellon don't need that money bad as Lucille want that refrigerator. I'll tell you that.

BONO: Tell you what I'll do . . . when you finish building this fence for Rose . . . I'll buy Lucille that refrigerator.

TROY: You done stuck your foot in your mouth now!

(Troy grabs up a board and begins to saw. Bono starts to walk out the yard.)

Hey, nigger . . . where you going?

BONO: I'm going home. I know you don't expect me to help you now. I'm protecting my money. I wanna see you put up that fence by yourself. That's what I want to see. You'll be here another six months without me.

TROY: Nigger, you ain't right.

BONO: When it comes to my money . . . I'm as right as fireworks on the Fourth of July.

TROY: All right, we gonna see now. You better get out your bankbook.

(Bono exits, and Troy continues to work. Rose enters from the house.)

ROSE: What they say down there? What's happening with Gabe?

TROY: I went down there and got him out. Cost me fifty dollars. Say he was disturbing the peace. Judge set up a hearing for him in three weeks. Say to show cause why he shouldn't be recommitted.

ROSE: What was he doing that cause them to arrest him?

TROY: Some kids was teasing him and he run them off home. Say he was howling and carrying on. Some folks seen him and called the police. That's all it was.

ROSE: Well, what's you say? What'd you tell the judge?

TROY: Told him I'd look after him. It didn't make no sense to recommit the man. He stuck out his big greasy palm and told me to give him fifty dollars and take him on home.

ROSE: Where's he at now? Where'd he go off to?

TROY: He's gone on about his business. He don't need nobody to hold his hand.

ROSE: Well, I don't know. Seem like that would be the best place for him if they did put him into the hospital. I know what you're gonna say. But that's what I think would be best.

TROY: The man done had his life ruined fighting for what? And they wanna take and lock him up. Let him be free. He don't bother nobody.

ROSE: Well, everybody got their own way of looking at it I guess. Come on and get your lunch. I got a bowl of lima beans and some cornbread in the oven. Come on get something to eat. Ain't no sense you fretting over Gabe. (Turns to go in the house)

TROY: Rose . . . got something to tell you.

ROSE: Well, come on . . . wait till I get this food on the table.

TROY: Rose!

(She stops and turns around.)

I don't know how to say this. (Pause) I can't explain it none. It just sort of grows on you till it gets out of hand. It starts out like a little bush . . . and the next thing you know it's a whole forest.

ROSE: Troy . . . what is you talking about?

TROY: I'm talking, woman, let me talk. I'm trying to find a way to tell you . . . I'm gonna be a daddy. I'm gonna be somebody's daddy.

ROSE: Troy . . . you're not telling me this? You're gonna be . . . what?

TROY: Rose . . . now . . . see . . .

ROSE: You telling me you gonna be somebody's daddy? You telling your wife this?

(Gabriel enters from the street. He carries a rose in his hand.)

GABRIEL: Hey, Troy! Hey, Rose!

ROSE: I have to wait eighteen years to hear something like this.

GABRIEL: Hey, Rose . . . I got a flower for you. (Hands it to her) That's a rose. Same rose like you is.

ROSE: Thanks, Gabe.

GABRIEL: Troy, you ain't mad at me is you? Them bad mens come and put me away. You ain't mad at me is you?

TROY: Naw, Gabe, I ain't mad at you.

ROSE: Eighteen years and you wanna come with this.

GABRIEL (Takes a quarter out of his pocket): See what I got? Got a brand-new quarter.

TROY: Rose . . . it's just . . .

ROSE: Ain't nothing you can say, Troy. Ain't no way of explaining that.

GABRIEL: Fellow that give me this quarter had a whole mess of them. I'm gonna keep this quarter till it stop shining.

ROSE: Gabe, go on in the house there. I got some watermelon in the frigidaire. Go on and get you a piece.

GABRIEL: Say, Rose . . . you know I was chasing hellhounds and them bad mens come and get me and take me away. Troy helped me. He come down there and told them they better let me go before he beat them up. Yeah, he did!

ROSE: You go on and get you a piece of watermelon, Gabe. Them bad mens is gone now.

GABRIEL: Okay, Rose . . . gonna get me some watermelon. The kind with the stripes on it.

(Gabriel exits into the house.)

ROSE: Why, Troy? Why? After all these years to come dragging this in to me now. It don't make no sense at your age. I could have expected this ten or fifteen years ago, but not now.

TROY: Age ain't got nothing to do with it, Rose.

ROSE: I done tried to be everything a wife should be. Everything a wife could be. Been married eighteen years and I got to live to see the day you tell me you been seeing another woman and done fathered a child by her. And you know I ain't never wanted no half nothing in my family. My whole family is half. Everybody got different fathers and mothers . . . my two sisters and my brother. Can't hardly tell who's who. Can't never sit down and talk about Papa and Mama. It's your papa and your mama and my papa and my mama . . .

TROY: Rose . . . stop it now.

ROSE: I ain't never wanted that for none of my children. And now you wanna drag your behind in here and tell me something like this.

TROY: You ought to know. It's time for you to know.

ROSE: Well, I don't want to know, goddamn it!

TROY: I can't just make it go away. It's done now. I can't wish the circumstance of the thing away.

ROSE: And you don't want to either. Maybe you want to wish me and my boy away. Maybe that's what you want? Well, you can't wish us away. I've got eighteen years of my life invested in you. You ought to have stayed upstairs in my bed where you belong.

TROY: Rose . . . now listen to me . . . we can get a handle on this thing. We can talk this out . . . come to an understanding.

ROSE: All of a sudden it's "we." Where was "we" at when you was down there rolling around with some godforsaken woman? "We" should have come to an understanding before you started making a damn fool of yourself. You're a day late and a dollar short when it comes to an understanding with me.

TROY: It's just . . . She gives me a different idea . . . a different understanding about myself. I can step out of this house and get away from the pressures and problems . . . be a different man. I ain't got to wonder how I'm gonna pay the bills or get the roof fixed. I can just be a part of myself that I ain't never been.

ROSE: What I want to know . . . is do you plan to continue seeing her. That's all you can say to me.

TROY: I can sit up in her house and laugh. Do you understand what I'm saying. I can laugh out loud . . . and it feels good. It reaches all the way down to the bottom of my shoes. (Pause) Rose, I can't give that up.

ROSE: Maybe you ought to go on and stay down there with her . . . if she a better woman than me.

TROY: It ain't about nobody being a better woman or nothing. Rose, you ain't to blame. A man couldn't ask for no woman to be a better wife than you've been. I'm responsible for it. I done locked myself into a pattern trying to take care of you all that I forgot about myself.

ROSE: What the hell was I there for? That was my job, not somebody else's.

TROY: Rose, I done tried all my life to live decent . . . to live a clean . . . hard . . . useful life. I tried to be a good husband to you. In every way I knew how. Maybe I come into the world backwards, I don't know. But . . . you born with two strikes on you before you come to the plate. You got to guard it closely . . . always looking for the curveball on the inside corner. You can't afford to let none get past you. You can't afford a call strike. If you going down . . . you going down swinging. Everything lined up against you. What you gonna do. I fooled them, Rose. I bunted. When I found you and Cory and a halfway decent job . . . I was safe. Couldn't nothing touch me. I wasn't gonna strike out no more. I wasn't going back to the penitentiary, I wasn't gonna lay in the streets with a bottle of wine. I was safe. I had me a family. A job. I wasn't gonna get that last strike. I was on first looking for one of them boys to knock me in. To get me home.

ROSE: You should have stayed in my bed, Troy.

TROY: Then when I saw that girl . . . she firmed up my backbone. And I got to thinking that if I tried . . . I just might be able to steal second. Do you understand, after eighteen years I wanted to steal second.

ROSE: You should have held me tight. You should have grabbed me and held on.

TROY: I stood on first base for eighteen years and I thought . . . well, goddamn it . . . go on for it!

ROSE: We're not talking about baseball! We're talking about you going off to lay in bed with another woman . . . and then bring it home to me. That's what we're talking about. We ain't talking about no baseball.

TROY: Rose, you're not listening to me. I'm trying the best I can to explain it to you. It's not easy for me to admit that I been standing in the same place for eighteen years.

ROSE: I been standing with you! I been right here with you, Troy. I got a life too. I gave eighteen years of my life to stand in the same spot with you. Don't you think I ever wanted other things? Don't you think I had dreams and hopes? What about my life? What about me? Don't you think it ever crossed my mind to want to know other men? That I wanted to lay up somewhere and forget about my responsibilities? That I wanted someone to make me laugh so I could feel good? You not the only one who's got wants and needs. But I held on to you, Troy. I took all my feelings, my wants and needs, my dreams . . . and I buried them inside you. I planted a seed and watched and prayed over it. I planted myself inside you and waited to bloom. And it didn't take me no eighteen years to find out the soil was hard and rocky and it wasn't never gonna bloom.

But I held on to you, Troy. I held you tighter. You was my husband. I owed you everything I had. Every part of me I could find to give you. And upstairs in that room . . . with the darkness falling in on me . . . I gave everything I had to try and erase the doubt that you wasn't the finest man in the world. And wherever you was going . . . I wanted to be there with you. 'Cause you was my husband. 'Cause that's the only way I was gonna survive as your wife. You always talking about what you give . . . and what you don't have to give. But you take too. You take . . . and don't even know nobody's giving!

(Rose turns to exit into the house; Troy grabs her arm.)

TROY: You say I take and don't give!

ROSE: Troy! You're hurting me.

TROY: You say I take and don't give.

ROSE: Troy . . . you're hurting my arm! Let go!

TROY: I done give you everything I got. Don't you tell that lie on me.

ROSE: Troy!

TROY: Don't you tell that lie on me!

(Cory enters from the house.)

CORY: Mama!

ROSE: Troy, you're hurting me.

TROY: Don't you tell me about no taking and giving.

(Cory comes up behind Troy and grabs him. Troy, surprised, is thrown off balance just as Cory throws a glancing blow that catches him on the chest and knocks him down. Troy is stunned, as is Cory.)

ROSE: Troy. Troy. No!

(Troy gets to his feet and starts at Cory.)

Troy . . . no. Please! Troy!

(Rose pulls on Troy to hold him back. Troy stops himself.)

TROY (To Cory): All right. That's strike two. You stay away from around me, boy. Don't you strike out. You living with a full count. Don't you strike out.

(Troy exits out the yard as the lights go down on the scene.)

Scene 2

It is six months later, early afternoon. Troy enters from the house and starts to exit the yard. Rose enters from the house.

ROSE: Troy, I want to talk to you.

TROY: All of a sudden, after all this time, you want to talk to me, huh? You ain't wanted to talk to me for months. You ain't wanted to talk to me last night. You ain't wanted no part of me then. What you wanna talk to me about now?

ROSE: Tomorrow's Friday.

TROY: I know what day tomorrow is. You think I don't know tomorrow's Friday? My whole life I ain't done nothing but look to see Friday coming and you got to tell me it's Friday.

ROSE: I want to know if you're coming home.

TROY: I always come home, Rose. You know that. There ain't never been a night I ain't come home.

ROSE: That ain't what I mean . . . and you know it. I want to know if you're coming straight home after work.

TROY: I figured I'd cash my check . . . hang out at Taylors' with the boys . . . maybe play a game of checkers . . .

ROSE: Troy, I can't live like this. I won't live like this. You livin' on borrowed time with me. It's been going on six months now you ain't been coming home.

TROY: I be here every night. Every night of the year. That's three hundred sixty-five days.

ROSE: I want you to come home tomorrow after work.

TROY: Rose . . . I don't mess up my pay. You know that now. I take my pay and I give it to you. I don't have no money but what you give me back. I just want to have a little time to myself . . . a little time to enjoy life.

ROSE: What about me? When's my time to enjoy life?

TROY: I don't know what to tell you, Rose. I'm doing the best I can.

ROSE: You ain't come home from work but time enough to change your clothes and run out . . . and you wanna call that the best you can do?

TROY: I'm going over to the hospital to see Alberta. She went into the hospital this afternoon. Look like she might have the baby early. I won't be gone long.

ROSE: Well, you ought to know. They went over to Miss Pearl's and got Gabe today. She said you told them to go ahead and lock him up.

TROY: I ain't said no such thing. Whoever told you that is telling a lie. Pearl ain't doing nothing but telling a big fat lie.

ROSE: She ain't had to tell me. I read it on the papers.

TROY: I ain't told them nothing of the kind.

ROSE: I saw it right there on the papers.

TROY: What it say, huh?

ROSE: It said you told them to take him.

TROY: Then they screwed that up, just the way they screw up everything. I ain't worried about what they got on the paper.

ROSE: Say the government send part of his check to the hospital and the other part to you.

TROY: I ain't got nothing to do with that if that's the way it works. I ain't made up the rules about how it work.

ROSE: You did Gabe just like you did Cory. You wouldn't sign the paper for Cory . . . but you signed for Gabe. You signed that paper.

(The phone is heard ringing inside the house.)

TROY: I told you I ain't signed nothing, woman! The only thing I signed was the release form. Hell, I can't read, I don't know what they had on that paper! I ain't signed nothing about sending Gabe away.

ROSE: I said send him to the hospital . . . you said let him be free . . . now you done went down there and signed him to the hospital for half his money. You went back on yourself, Troy. You gonna have to answer for that.

TROY: See now . . . you been over there talking to Miss Pearl. She done got mad 'cause she ain't getting Gabe's rent money. That's all it is. She's liable to say anything.

ROSE: Troy, I seen where you signed the paper.

TROY: You ain't seen nothing I signed. What she doing got papers on my brother anyway? Miss Pearl telling a big fat lie. And I'm gonna tell her about it too! You ain't seen nothing I signed. Say . . . you ain't seen nothing I signed.

(Rose exits into the house to answer the phone. She returns.)

ROSE: Troy . . . that was the hospital. Alberta had the baby.

TROY: What she have? What is it?

ROSE: It's a girl.

TROY: I better get on down to the hospital to see her.

ROSE: Troy . . .

TROY: Rose . . . I got to go see her now. That's only right . . . what's the matter . . . the baby's all right, ain't it?

ROSE: Alberta died having the baby.

TROY: Died . . . you say she's dead? Alberta's dead?

ROSE: They said they done all they could. They couldn't do nothing for her.

TROY: The baby? How's the baby?

ROSE: They say it's healthy. I wonder who's gonna bury her.

TROY: She had family, Rose. She wasn't living in the world by herself.

ROSE: I know she wasn't living in the world by herself.

TROY: Next thing you gonna want to know if she had any insurance.

ROSE: Troy, you ain't got to talk like that.

TROY: That's the first thing that jumped out your mouth. "Who's gonna bury her?" Like I'm fixing to take on that task for myself.

ROSE: I am your wife. Don't push me away.

TROY: I ain't pushing nobody away. Just give me some space. That's all. Just give me some room to breathe.

(Rose exits into the house. Troy walks about the yard.)

(With a quiet rage that threatens to consume him) All right . . . Mr. Death. See now . . . I'm gonna tell you what I'm gonna do. I'm gonna take and build me a fence around this yard. See? I'm gonna build me a fence around what belongs to me. And then I want you to stay on the other side. See? You stay over there until you're ready for me. Then you come on. Bring your army. Bring your sickle. Bring your wrestling clothes. I ain't gonna fall down on my vigilance this time. You ain't gonna sneak up on me no more. When you ready for me . . . when the top of your list say "Troy Maxson" . . . that's when you come around here. You come up and knock on the front door. Ain't nobody else got nothing to do with this. This is between you and me. Man to man. You stay on the other side of that fence until you ready for me. Then you come up and knock on the front door. Anytime you want. I'll be ready for you.

(The lights fade to black.)

Scene 3

The lights come up on the porch. It is late evening three days later. Rose sits listening to the ball game, waiting for Troy. The final out of the game is made and Rose switches off the radio. Troy enters the yard carrying an infant wrapped in blankets. He stands back from the house and calls.

Rose enters and stands on the porch. There is a long, awkward silence, the weight of which grows heavier with each passing second.

TROY: Rose . . . I'm standing here with my daughter in my arms. She ain't but a wee bitty little old thing. She don't know nothing about grownups' business. She innocent . . . and she ain't got no mama.

ROSE: What you telling me for, Troy?

(She turns and exits into the house.)

TROY: Well . . . I guess we'll just sit out here on the porch.

(He sits down on the porch. There is an awkward indelicateness about the way he handles the baby. His largeness engulfs and seems to swallow her. He speaks loud enough for Rose to hear:)

A man's got to do what's right for him. I ain't sorry for nothing I done. It felt right in my heart. (To the baby) What you smiling at? Your daddy's a big man. Got these great big old hands. But sometimes he's scared. And right now your daddy's scared 'cause we sitting out here and ain't got no home. Oh, I been homeless before. I ain't had no little baby with me. But I been homeless. You just be out on the road by your lonesome and you see one of them trains coming and you just kinda go like this . . . (Singing, as a lullaby:)

Please, Mr. Engineer, let a man ride the line
Please, Mr. Engineer, let a man ride the line
I ain't got no ticket please let me ride the blinds.¹

(Rose enters from the house. Troy hearing her steps behind him, stands and faces her.)

She's my daughter, Rose. My own flesh and blood. I can't deny her no more than I can deny them boys. (Pause) You and them boys is my family. You and

1. That is, hitch a free ride on the platform outside a rail car with no door at one end (hence, "blind").

them and this child is all I got in the world. So I guess what I'm saying is . . . I'd appreciate it if you'd help me take care of her.

ROSE: Okay, Troy . . . you're right. I'll take care of your baby for you . . . 'cause . . . like you say . . . she's innocent . . . and you can't visit the sins of the father upon the child. A motherless child has got a hard time. (Takes the baby from him) From right now . . . this child got a mother. But you a womanless man.

(Rose turns and exits into the house with the baby. The lights fade to black.)

Scene 4

It is two months later. Lyons enters from the street. He knocks on the door and calls.

LYONS: Hey, Rose! (Pause) Rose!

ROSE (From inside the house): Stop that yelling. You gonna wake up Raynell. I just got her to sleep.

LYONS: I just stopped by to pay Papa this twenty dollars I owe him. Where's Papa at?

ROSE: He should be here in a minute. I'm getting ready to go down to the church. Sit down and wait on him.

LYONS: I got to go pick up Bonnie over her mother's house.

ROSE: Well, sit it down there on the table. He'll get it.

LYONS: (Enters the house and sets the money on the table): Tell Papa I said thanks. I'll see you again.

ROSE: All right, Lyons. We'll see you.

(Lyons starts to exit as Cory enters.)

CORY: Hey, Lyons.

LYONS: What's happening, Cory. Say man, I'm sorry I missed your graduation. You know I had a gig and couldn't get away. Otherwise, I would have been there, man. So what you doing?

CORY: I'm trying to find a job.

LYONS: Yeah, I know how that go, man. It's rough out here. Jobs are scarce.

CORY: Yeah, I know.

LYONS: Look here, I got to run. Talk to Papa . . . he know some people. He'll be able to help get you a job. Talk to him . . . see what he say.

CORY: Yeah . . . all right, Lyons.

LYONS: You take care. I'll talk to you soon. We'll find some time to talk.

(Lyons exits the yard. Cory wanders over to the tree, picks up the bat and assumes a batting stance. He studies an imaginary pitcher and swings. Dissatisfied with the result, he tries again. Troy enters. They eye each other for a beat. Cory puts the bat down and exits the yard. Troy starts into the house as Rose exits with Raynell. She is carrying a cake.)

TROY: I'm coming in and everybody's going out.

ROSE: I'm taking this cake down to the church for the bake sale. Lyons was by to see you. He stopped by to pay you your twenty dollars. It's laying in there on the table.

TROY (Going into his pocket): Well . . . here go this money.

ROSE: Put it in there on the table, Troy. I'll get it.

TROY: What time you coming back?

ROSE: Ain't no use in you studying me. It don't matter what time I come back.

TROY: I just asked you a question, woman. What's the matter . . . can't I ask you a question?

ROSE: Troy, I don't want to go into it. Your dinner's in there on the stove. All you got to do is heat it up. And don't you be eating the rest of them cakes in there. I'm coming back for them. We having a bake sale at the church tomorrow.

(Rose exits the yard. Troy sits down on the steps, takes a pint bottle from his pocket, opens it and drinks. He begins to sing.)

TROY:

Hear it ring! Hear it ring!
 Had an old dog his name was Blue
 You know Blue was mighty true
 You know Blue was a good old dog
 Blue treed a possum in a hollow log
 You know from that he was a good old dog.

(Bono enters the yard.)

BONO: Hey, Troy.

TROY: Hey, what's happening, Bono?

BONO: I just thought I'd stop by to see you.

TROY: What you stop by and see me for? You ain't stopped by in a month of Sundays. Hell, I must owe you money or something.

BONO: Since you got your promotion I can't keep up with you. Used to see you every day. Now I don't even know what route you working.

TROY: They keep switching me around. Got me out in Greentree now . . . hauling white folks' garbage.

BONO: Greentree, huh? You lucky, at least you ain't got to be lifting them barrels. Damn if they ain't getting heavier. I'm gonna put in my two years and call it quits.

TROY: I'm thinking about retiring myself.

BONO: You got it easy. You can drive for another five years.

TROY: It ain't the same, Bono. It ain't like working the back of the truck. Ain't got nobody to talk to . . . feel like you working by yourself. Naw, I'm thinking about retiring. How's Lucille?

BONO: She all right. Her arthritis get to acting up on her sometime. Saw Rose on my way in. She going down to the church, huh?

TROY: Yeah, she took up going down there. All them preachers looking for somebody to fatten their pockets. (Pause) Got some gin here.

BONO: Naw, thanks. I just stopped by to say hello.

TROY: Hell, nigger . . . you can take a drink. I ain't never known you to say no to a drink. You ain't got to work tomorrow.

BONO: I just stopped by. I'm fixing to go over to Skinner's. We got us a domino game going over his house every Friday.

TROY: Nigger, you can't play no dominoes. I used to whup you four games out of five.

BONO: Well, that learned me. I'm getting better.

TROY: Yeah? Well, that's all right.

BONO: Look here . . . I got to be getting on. Stop by sometime, huh?

TROY: Yeah, I'll do that, Bono. Lucille told Rose you bought her a new refrigerator.

BONO: Yeah, Rose told Lucille you had finally built your fence . . . so I figured we'd call it even.

TROY: I knew you would.

BONO: Yeah . . . okay. I'll be talking to you.

TROY: Yeah, take care, Bono. Good to see you. I'm gonna stop over.

BONO: Yeah. Okay, Troy.

(Bono exits. Troy drinks from the bottle.)

TROY:

Old Blue died and I dug his grave
 Let him down with a golden chain
 Every night when I hear old Blue bark
 I know Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark.
 Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

(Cory enters the yard. Cory and Troy eye each other for a beat. Cory walks over to Troy, who sits in the middle of the steps.)

CORY: I got to get by.

TROY: Say what? What's you say?

CORY: You in my way. I got to get by.

TROY: You got to get by where? This is my house. Bought and paid for. In full. Took me fifteen years. And if you wanna go in my house and I'm sitting on the steps . . . you say excuse me. Like your mama taught you.

CORY: Come on, Pop . . . I got to get by.

(Cory starts to maneuver his way past Troy. Troy grabs his leg and shoves him back.)

TROY: You just gonna walk over top of me?

CORY: I live here too!

TROY (Advancing on him): You just gonna walk over top of me in my own house?

CORY: I ain't scared of you.

TROY: I ain't asked if you was scared of me. I asked you if you was fixing to walk over top of me in my own house? That's the question. You ain't gonna say excuse me? You just gonna walk over top of me?

CORY: If you wanna put it like that.

TROY: How else am I gonna put it?

CORY: I was walking by you to go into the house 'cause you sitting on the steps drunk, singing to yourself. You can put it like that.

TROY: Without saying excuse me???

(Cory doesn't respond) I asked you a question. Without saying excuse me???

CORY: I ain't got to say excuse me to you. You don't count around here no more.

TROY: Oh, I see . . . I don't count around here no more. You ain't got to say excuse me to your daddy. All of a sudden you done got so grown that your daddy don't count around here no more . . . Around here in his own house and yard that he done paid for with the sweat of his brow. You done got so grown to where you gonna take over. You gonna take over my house. Is that right? You gonna wear my pants. You gonna go in there and stretch out on my bed. You ain't got to say excuse me 'cause I don't count around here no more. Is that right?

CORY: That's right. You always talking this dumb stuff. Now, why don't you just get out my way.

TROY: I guess you got someplace to sleep and something to put in your belly. You got that, huh? You got that? That's what you need. You got that, huh?

CORY: You don't know what I got. You ain't got to worry about what I got.

TROY: You right! You one hundred percent right! I done spent the last seventeen years worrying about what you got. Now it's your turn, see? I'll tell you what to do. You grown . . . we done established that. You a man. Now, let's see you act like one. Turn your behind around and walk out this yard. And when you get out there in the alley . . . you can forget about this house. See? 'Cause this is my house. You go on and be a man and get your own house. You can forget about this. 'Cause this is mine. You go on and get yours 'cause I'm through with doing for you.

CORY: You talking about what you did for me . . . what'd you ever give me?

TROY: Them feet and bones! That pumping heart, nigger! I give you more than anybody else is ever gonna give you.

CORY: You ain't never gave me nothing! You ain't never done nothing but hold me back. Afraid I was gonna be better than you. All you ever did was try and make me scared of you. I used to tremble every time you called my name. Every time I heard your footsteps in the house. Wondering all the time . . . what's Papa gonna say if I do this? . . . What's he gonna say if I do that? . . . What's Papa gonna say if I turn on the radio? And Mama, too . . . she tries . . . but she's scared of you.

TROY: You leave your mama out of this. She ain't got nothing to do with this.

CORY: I don't know how she stand you . . . after what you did to her.

TROY: I told you to leave your mama out of this! (Advances on Cory)

CORY: What you gonna do . . . give me a whupping? You can't whup me no more. You're too old. You just an old man.

TROY (Shoves him on his shoulder): Nigger! That's what you are! You just another nigger on the street to me!

CORY: You crazy! You know that?

TROY: Go on now! You got the devil in you. Get on away from me!

CORY: You just a crazy old man . . . talking about I got the devil in me.

TROY: Yeah, I'm crazy! If you don't get on the other side of that yard . . . I'm gonna show you how crazy I am! Go on . . . get the hell out of my yard.

CORY: It ain't your yard. You took Uncle Gabe's money he got from the Army to buy this house and then you put him out.

TROY (Advances on Cory): Get your black ass out of my yard!

(Troy's advance backs Cory up against the tree. Cory grabs the bat.)

CORY: I ain't going nowhere! Come on . . . put me out! I ain't scared of you.

TROY: That's my bat!

CORY: Come on!

TROY: Put my bat down!

CORY: Come on, put me out.

(Cory swings at Troy, who backs across the yard.)

What's the matter? You so bad . . . put me out!

(Troy advances on Cory, who backs up.)

Come on! Come on!

TROY: You're gonna have to use it! You wanna draw that bat back on me . . . you're gonna have to use it.

CORY: Come on! . . . Come on!

(Cory swings the bat at Troy a second time. He misses. Troy continues to advance on him.)

TROY: You're gonna have to kill me! You wanna draw that bat back on me. You're gonna have to kill me.

(Cory, backed up against the tree, can go no farther. Troy taunts him. He sticks out his head and offers him a target.)

Come on! Come on!

(Cory is unable to swing the bat. Troy grabs it.)

Then I'll show you.

(Cory and Troy struggle over the bat. The struggle is fierce and fully engaged. Troy ultimately is the stronger, and takes the bat from Cory and stands over him ready to swing. He stops himself.)

Go on and get away from around my house.

(Cory, stung by his defeat, picks himself up, walks slowly out of the yard and up the alley.)

CORY: Tell Mama I'll be back for my things. (Exits)

TROY: They'll be on the other side of that fence.

I can't taste nothing. Hallelujah! I can't taste nothing no more. (Assumes a batting posture and begins to taunt Death, the fastball in the outside corner)

Come on! It's between you and me now! Come on! Anytime you want! Come on! I be ready for you . . . but I ain't gonna be easy.

(The lights go down on the scene.)

Scene 5

The time is 1965. The lights come up in the yard. It is the morning of Troy's funeral. A funeral plaque with a light hangs beside the door. There is a small garden plot off to the side. There is noise and activity in the house as Rose, Gabriel, Lyons and Bono have gathered. The door opens and Raynell, seven years old, enters dressed in a flannel nightgown. She crosses to the garden and pokes around with a stick. Rose calls from the house.

ROSE: Raynell!

RAYNELL: Mam?

ROSE: What you doing out there?

RAYNELL: Nothing.

(Rose comes to the screen door.)

ROSE: Girl, get in here and get dressed. What you doing?

RAYNELL: Seeing if my garden growed.

ROSE: I told you it ain't gonna grow overnight. You got to wait.

RAYNELL: It don't look like it never gonna grow. Dag!

ROSE: I told you a watched pot never boils. Get in here and get dressed.

RAYNELL: This ain't even no pot, Mama.

ROSE: You just have to give it a chance. It'll grow. Now you come on and do what I told you. We got to be getting ready. This ain't no morning to be playing around. You hear me?

RAYNELL: Yes, Mam.

(Rose exits into the house. Raynell continues to poke at her garden with a stick. Cory enters. He is dressed in a Marine corporal's uniform, and carries a duffel bag. His posture is that of a military man, and his speech has a clipped sternness.)

CORY (To Raynell): Hi. (Pause) I bet your name is Raynell.

RAYNELL: Uh-huh.

CORY: Is your mama home?

(Raynell runs up on the porch and calls through the screen door.)

RAYNELL: Mama . . . there's some man out here. Mama?

(Rose comes to the screen door.)

ROSE: Cory? Lord have mercy! Look here, you all!

(Rose and Cory embrace in a tearful reunion as Bono and Lyons enter from the house dressed in funeral clothes.)

BONO: Aw, looka here . . .

ROSE: Done got all grown up!

CORY: Don't cry, Mama. What you crying about?

ROSE: I'm just so glad you made it.

CORY: Hey, Lyons. How you doing, Mr. Bono.

(Lyons goes to embrace Cory.)

LYONS: Look at you, man. Look at you. Don't he look good, Rose. Got them corporal stripes.

ROSE: What took you so long.

CORY: You know how the Marines are, Mama. They got to get all their paperwork straight before they let you do anything.

ROSE: Well, I'm sure glad you made it. They let Lyons come. Your Uncle Gabe's still in the hospital. They don't know if they gonna let him out or not. I just talked to them a little while ago.

LYONS: A corporal in the United States Marines.

BONO: Your daddy knew you had it in you. He used to tell me all the time.

LYONS: Don't he look good, Mr. Bono?

BONO: Yeah, he remind me of Troy when I first met him. (Pause) Say, Rose, Lucille's down at the church with the choir. I'm gonna go down and get the pallbearers lined up. I'll be back to get you all.

ROSE: Thanks, Jim.

CORY: See you, Mr. Bono.

(Bono exits.)

LYONS (With his arm around Raynell): Cory . . . look at Raynell. Ain't she precious? She gonna break a whole lot of hearts.

ROSE: Raynell, come and say hello to your brother. This is your brother, Cory. You remember Cory.

RAYNELL: No, Mam.

CORY: She don't remember me, Mama.

ROSE: Well, we talk about you. She heard us talk about you. (To Raynell) This is your brother Cory. Come on and say hello.

RAYNELL: Hi.

CORY: Hi. So you're Raynell. Mama told me a lot about you.

ROSE: You all come on into the house and let me fix you some breakfast. Keep up your strength.

CORY: I ain't hungry, Mama.

LYONS: You can fix me something, Rose. I'll be in there in a minute.

ROSE: Cory, you sure you don't want nothing. I know they ain't feeding you right.

CORY: No, Mama . . . thanks. I don't feel like eating. I'll get something later.

ROSE: Raynell . . . get on upstairs and get that dress on like I told you.

(Rose and Raynell exit into the house.)

LYONS: So . . . I hear you thinking about getting married.

CORY: Yeah, I done found the right one, Lyons. It's about time.

LYONS: Me and Bonnie been split up about four years now. About the time Papa retired. I guess she just got tired of all them changes I was putting her through. (Pause) I always knew you was gonna make something out yourself. Your head was always in the right direction. So . . . you gonna stay in . . . make it a career . . . put in your twenty years?

CORY: I don't know. I got six already, I think that's enough.

LYONS: Stick with Uncle Sam and retire early. Ain't nothing out here. I guess Rose told you what happened with me. They got me down the workhouse. I thought I was being slick cashing other people's checks.

CORY: How much time you doing?

LYONS: They give me three years. I got that beat now. I ain't got but nine more months. It ain't so bad. You learn to deal with it like anything else. You got to take the crooked with the straights. That's what Papa used to say. He used to say that when he struck out. I seen him strike out three times in a row . . . and the next time up he hit the ball over the grandstand. Right out there in Homestead Field.² He wasn't satisfied hitting in the seats . . . he wanted to hit it over everything! After the game he had two hundred people standing around waiting to shake his hand. You got to take the crooked with the straights. Yeah, Papa was something else.

CORY: You still playing?

LYONS: Cory . . . you know I'm gonna do that. There's some fellows down there we got us a band . . . we gonna try and stay together when we get out . . . but yeah, I'm still playing. It still helps me to get out of bed in the morning. As long as it do that I'm gonna be right there playing and trying to make some sense out of it.

ROSE (Calling): Lyons, I got these eggs in the pan.

LYONS: Let me go on and get these eggs, man. Get ready to go bury Papa. (Pause) How you doing? You doing all right?

(Cory nods. Lyons touches him on the shoulder and they share a moment of silent grief. Lyons exits into the house. Cory wanders about the yard. Raynell enters.)

RAYNELL: Hi.

CORY: Hi.

RAYNELL: Did you used to sleep in my room?

CORY: Yeah . . . that used to be my room.

RAYNELL: That's what Papa call it. "Cory's room." It got your football in the closet.

(Rose comes to the screen door.)

ROSE: Raynell, get in there and get them good shoes on.

RAYNELL: Mama, can't I wear these? Them other one hurt my feet.

ROSE: Well, they just gonna have to hurt your feet for a while. You ain't said they hurt your feet when you went down to the store and got them.

RAYNELL: They didn't hurt then. My feet done got bigger.

ROSE: Don't you give me no backtalk now. You get in there and get them shoes on.

(Raynell exits into the house.)

Ain't too much changed. He still got that piece of rag tied to that tree. He was out here swinging that bat. I was just ready to go back in the house. He swung that bat and then he just fell over. Seem like he swung it and stood there with this grin on his face . . . and then he just fell over. They carried him on down to the hospital, but I knew there wasn't no need . . . Why don't you come on in the house?

CORY: Mama . . . I got something to tell you. I don't know how to tell you this . . . but I've got to tell you . . . I'm not going to Papa's funeral.

ROSE: Boy, hush your mouth. That's your daddy you talking about. I don't want hear that kind of talk this morning. I done raised you to come to this? You standing there all healthy and grown talking about you ain't going to your daddy's funeral?

CORY: Mama . . . listen . . .

ROSE: I don't want to hear it, Cory. You just get that thought out of your head.

2. Among the most renowned teams in the Negro League, the Homestead Grays originated in Homestead, Pennsylvania, just south of Pittsburgh, but moved to Pittsburgh's Forbes Field in the late 1930s.

CORY: I can't drag Papa with me everywhere I go. I've got to say no to him. One time in my life I've got to say no.

ROSE: Don't nobody have to listen to nothing like that. I know you and your daddy ain't seen eye to eye, but I ain't got to listen to that kind of talk this morning. Whatever was between you and your daddy . . . the time has come to put it aside. Just take it and set it over there on the shelf and forget about it. Disrespecting your daddy ain't gonna make you a man, Cory. You got to find a way to come to that on your own. Not going to your daddy's funeral ain't gonna make you a man.

CORY: The whole time I was growing up . . . living in his house . . . Papa was like a shadow that followed you everywhere. It weighed on you and sunk into your flesh. It would wrap around you and lay there until you couldn't tell which one was you anymore. That shadow digging in your flesh. Trying to crawl in. Trying to live through you. Everywhere I looked, Troy Maxson was staring back at me . . . hiding under the bed . . . in the closet. I'm just saying I've got to find a way to get rid of that shadow, Mama.

ROSE: You just like him. You got him in you good.

CORY: Don't you tell me that, Mama.

ROSE: You Troy Maxson all over again.

CORY: I don't want to be Troy Maxson. I want to be me.

ROSE: You can't be nobody but who you are, Cory. That shadow wasn't nothing but you growing into yourself. You either got to grow into it or cut it down to fit you. But that's all you got to make life with. That's all you got to measure yourself against that world out there. Your daddy wanted you to be everything he wasn't . . . and at the same time he tried to make you into everything he was. I don't know if he was right or wrong . . . but I do know he meant to do more good than he meant to do harm. He wasn't always right. Sometimes when he touched he bruised. And sometimes when he took me in his arms he cut.

When I first met your daddy I thought, "Here is a man I can lay down with and make a baby." That's the first thing I thought when I seen him. I was thirty years old and had done seen my share of men. But when he walked up to me and said, "I can dance a waltz that'll make you dizzy," I thought, "Rose Lee, here is a man that you can open yourself up to and be filled to bursting. Here is a man that can fill all them empty spaces you been tipping around the edges of." One of them empty spaces was being somebody's mother.

I married your daddy and settle down to cooking his supper and keeping clean sheets on the bed. When your daddy walked through the house he was so big he filled it up. That was my first mistake. Not to make him leave some room for me. For my part in the matter. But at that time I wanted that. I wanted a house that I could sing in. And that's what your daddy gave me. I didn't know to keep up his strength I had to give up little pieces of mine. I did that. I took on his life as mine and mixed up the pieces so that you couldn't hardly tell which was which anymore. It was my choice. It was my life and I didn't have to live it like that. But that's what life offered me in the way of being a woman and I took it. I grabbed hold of it with both hands.

By the time Raynell came into the house, me and your daddy had done lost touch with one another. I didn't want to make my blessing off of nobody's misfortune . . . but I took on to Raynell like she was all them babies I had wanted and never had. (The phone rings) Like I'd been blessed to relive a part of my life. And if the Lord see fit to keep up my strength . . . I'm gonna do her just like your daddy did you . . . I'm gonna give her the best of what's in me.

RAYNELL (Entering, still with her old shoes): Mama . . . Reverend Tolliver on the phone.

(Rose exits into the house.)

Hi.

CORY: Hi.

RAYNELL: You in the Army or the Marines?

CORY: Marines.

RAYNELL: Papa said it was the Army. Did you know Blue?

CORY: Blue? Who's Blue?

RAYNELL: Papa's dog what he sing about all the time.

CORY (Singing):

Hear it ring! Hear it ring!
 I had a dog his name was Blue
 You know Blue was mighty true
 You know Blue was a good old dog
 Blue treed a possum in a hollow log
 You know from that he was a good old dog.
 Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

(Raynell joins in singing.)

CORY AND RAYNELL:

Blue treed a possum out on a limb
 Blue looked at me and I looked at him
 Grabbed that possum and put him in a sack
 Blue stayed there till I came back
 Old Blue's feet was big and round
 Never allowed a possum to touch the ground.

Old Blue died and I dug his grave
 I dug his grave with a silver spade
 Let him down with a golden chain
 And every night I call his name
 Go on Blue, you good dog you
 Go on Blue, you good dog you

RAYNELL:

Blue laid down and died like a man
 Blue laid down and died . . .

CORY AND RAYNELL:

Blue laid down and died like a man
 Now he's treeing possums in the Promised Land
 I'm gonna tell you this to let you know

Blue's gone where the good dogs go
 When I hear Old Blue bark
 When I hear Old Blue bark
 Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark
 Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark.

(Rose comes to the screen door.)

ROSE: Cory, we gonna be ready to go in a minute.

CORY (To Raynell): You go on in the house and change them shoes like Mama told you so we can go to Papa's funeral.

RAYNELL: Okay, I'll be back.

(Raynell exits into the house. Cory gets up and crosses over to the tree. Rose stands at the screen door watching him. Gabriel enters from the alley.)

GABRIEL (Calling): Hey, Rose!

ROSE: Gabe?

GABRIEL: I'm here, Rose. Hey, Rose, I'm here!

(Rose enters from the house.)

ROSE: Lord . . . Look here, Lyons!

LYONS (Enters from the house): See, I told you, Rose . . . I told you they'd let him come.

CORY: How you doing, Uncle Gabe?

LYONS: How you doing, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL: Hey, Rose. It's time. It's time to tell Saint Peter to open the Gates. Troy, you ready? You ready, Troy. I'm gonna tell Saint Peter to open the Gates. You get ready now.

(Gabriel, with great fanfare, braces himself to blow. The trumpet is without a mouthpiece. He puts the end of it into his mouth and blows with great force, like a man who has been waiting some twenty-odd years for this single moment. No sound comes out of the trumpet. He braces himself and blows again with the same result. A third time he blows. There is a weight of impossible description that falls away and leaves him bare and exposed to a frightful realization. It is a trauma that a sane and normal mind would be unable to withstand. He begins to dance. A slow, strange dance, eerie and life-giving. A dance of atavistic³ signature and ritual. Lyons attempts to embrace him. Gabriel pushes Lyons away. Gabriel begins to howl in what is an attempt at song, or perhaps a song turning back into itself in an attempt at speech. He finishes his dance and the Gates of Heaven stand open as wide as God's closet.)

That's the way that go!

(Blackout.)

3. Characterized by a reversion to an ancient or ancestral form.

QUESTIONS

1. In interviews, August Wilson describes FENCES as revolving so completely around its central character that it might “almost” be called “The Life of Troy Maxson or just Troy Maxson.” To what extent does and doesn’t that seem true?
2. Wilson also describes the play as “examin[ing] Troy’s life layer by layer” to find out why he made the choices he made” (see “Authors on Their Work” below). How do you think the play ultimately answers that question? What does it seem to present as the key to Troy’s character or the thing he values most?
3. According to the play, how have circumstances helped to make Troy the man he is? How might he and his life have been different had he turned fifty-three in either 1947 or 1967? had he been white?
4. Does Troy’s character develop over the course of the play or only the way others see him? Why and how so?
5. What is the effect and significance of the fact that the play ends after Troy’s death? How would the play work and mean differently if its final scene were omitted? if Troy died onstage?
6. What might the fence come to stand for or symbolize in the play? Why might Fences, plural, be a more apt title than The Fence?
7. How are father-son relationships depicted in the play? How does Troy’s relationship with his father compare to and shape his relationship with his sons? Why do you think the play includes Lyons, as well as Cory?
8. How might Rose or your impression of her evolve over the course of the play? Why does she adopt Raynell, and what effect does this choice seem to have? Why might she begin to go to church?
9. What is the significance and effect of Wilson’s choice to set the play in the Maxson’s front yard? to punctuate the play with scenes that take place on Friday nights? not to show us Troy at work, Cory playing football, and so on?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Why is Troy Maxson so insistent that his son quit the football team? What about your own cultural and historical context might make his attitude seem surprising? Write a response paper or essay exploring these questions.
2. Write an essay exploring Gabriel’s role in the play. What is significant about his injuries and their cause, for example? about his fixation with Judgment Day? about his actions in the play’s final scene? What might his final, “frightful realization” (1237) be, and why, according to Wilson’s stage directions, might “the Gates of Heaven stand open as wide as God’s closet” only after that realization and the “atavistic” dance that follows it?
3. Write an essay exploring Wilson’s characterization of Rose. What might the play suggest, through her, about the options available to, or conflicts faced by, women in general or African American women in particular in the 1950s? To what extent might Wilson’s play reproduce or challenge our preconceptions about such women? Alternatively, consider how FENCES might reproduce or challenge stereotypical views of black men.
4. Write an epilogue to FENCES, a scene depicting Rose, Lyons, Cory, or Raynell in 1975. What do you imagine has happened to this character, and why and how so? If Cory had a child, for example, what would his relationship with that child be like? What might he say to his child about his father, his mother, and his own childhood?
5. Research theories of tragedy and the tragic hero. Drawing on both these and evidence from Wilson’s play, explain whether and how FENCES might be considered a tragedy or Troy Maxson a tragic hero.
6. Write an essay comparing Troy Maxson to Willie Lohman, in Arthur Miller’s DEATH OF A SALESMAN. How might Wilson’s character and play respond to Miller’s?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

AUGUST WILSON (1945–2005)

From Dennis Watlington, “Hurdling Fences” (1989)*

[. . .] I wanted to explore our commonalities of culture. What you have in Fences is a very specific situation, a black family which the forces of racism have molded and shaped, but you also have a husband-wife, father-son. White America looks at black America in this glancing manner. They pass right by the Troy Maxsons of the world and never stop to look at them. They talk about niggers as lazy and shiftless. Well, here’s a man with responsibilities as prime to his life. I wanted to examine Troy’s life layer by layer and find out why he made the choices he made. (109)

From “Men, Women, and Culture: A Conversation with August Wilson” (1993)

[INTERVIEWER]: What makes Troy heroic? He’s an ex-con, ex-baseball player, now a garbage collector; he exploits his brother and cheats on his wife—what is redeeming about him as an African American man?

WILSON: I think that, for me, this may be nothing more than his willingness to wrestle with his life, his willingness to engage no matter what the circumstances of his life. He hasn’t given up despite the twists and turns it’s given him. I find that both noble and heroic. (172)

QUIARA ALEGRÍA HUDES
 (b. 1977)

Water by the Spoonful

Though she now lives in New York City with her lawyer husband and two small children, Quiara Alegría Hudes hails from Philadelphia, the city that still serves as inspiration and setting for much of her work. The daughter of a Jewish carpenter and a Puerto Rican mother and stepfather, Hudes spent her childhood exploring the city’s ethnically and economically diverse neighborhoods, especially the predominantly African American West Philly area she called home and the North Philly barrios where many of her maternal relatives still live. Hudes had her first play produced by Philadelphia Young Playwrights when she was only ten. Yet when she became the first in her family to attend college, at Yale, she majored in music. After graduation, Hudes returned home, launching a successful career as a musician-composer before heading to Brown University. Here she earned an MFA (2003) and completed two plays—the award-winning Yamaya's Belly (2005), about a young Cuban boy who dreams of immigrating to the United States, and The Adventures of Barrio Grrll, which she later turned into a children's musical. Hudes received the first of three Pulitzer nominations for her work on another musical, the Tony Award-winning In the Heights (2007). But her real acclaim as a dramatist rests on a trilogy inspired by, and developed partly in collaboration with, her “story-centric family,” especially Elliot Ruiz, a cousin wounded in the Iraq War. Water by the Spoonful (2011), for which Hudes won the Pulitzer, is the second play in the sequence that also includes Elliot, a Soldier's Fugue (2006) and The Happiest Song Plays Last (2012). Together, says Hudes, these plays tell a distinctly “American story” about issues and people we too often “don't talk about,” in part by exploiting and exploring diverse, often distinctly twenty-first-century ways of both talking and storytelling.

CHARACTERS

ELLIOT ORTIZ, an Iraq vet with a slight limp, works at Subway sandwich shop, scores an occasional job as a model or actor, Yazmin's cousin, Odessa's birth son, Puerto Rican, twenty-four.

YAZMIN ORTIZ, in her first year as an adjunct professor of music, Odessa's niece and Elliot's cousin, Puerto Rican, twenty-nine.

HAIKUMOM, aka Odessa Ortiz, founder of www.recover-together.com, works odd janitorial jobs, lives one notch above squalor, Puerto Rican, thirty-nine.

FOUNTAINHEAD, aka John, a computer programmer and entrepreneur, lives on Philadelphia's Main Line,¹ white, forty-one.

CHUTES&LADDERS, lives in San Diego, has worked a low-level job at the IRS since the Reagan years,² his real name is Clayton “Buddy” Wilkie, African American, fifty-six.

ORANGUTAN, a recent community college graduate, her real name is Madeleine Mays and before that Yoshiko Sakai, Japanese by birth, thirty-one.

A GHOST, also plays Professor Aman, an Arabic professor at Swarthmore;³ also plays a Policeman in Japan.

SETTING: 2009. Six years after Elliot left for Iraq. Philadelphia, San Diego, Japan and Puerto Rico.

The stage has two worlds. The “real world” is populated with chairs. The chairs are from many locations—living rooms, an office, a seminar room, a church, a diner, internet cafés, etc. They all have the worn-in feel of life. A duct-taped La-Z-Boy. Salvaged trash chairs. A busted-up metal folding chair from a rec center. An Aero chair. An Eames chair.⁴ A chair/desk from a college classroom. Diner chairs. A chair from an internet café in Japan. Living room chairs. Library chairs. A church pew. Facing in all different directions.

1. Series of affluent towns in Philadelphia's western suburbs, along the old Main Line of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

2. 1981–89, during the presidency of Ronald Reagan (1911–2004). IRS: Internal Revenue Service (acronym).

3. Highly ranked private liberal arts college (founded 1864) located eleven miles southwest of Philadelphia.

4. High-end chair designed in 1956 by renowned husband-and-wife team Charles (1907–78) and Ray Eames (1912–88).

Liza Colón-Zayas, Sue Jean Kim, and Frankie R. Faison in the Second Stage Theatre production of Water by the Spoonful, 2012

The “online world” is an empty space. A space that connects the chairs.

MUSIC: Jazz. John Coltrane.⁵ The sublime stuff (A Love Supreme). And the noise (Ascension).

NOTE: Unless specifically noted, when characters are online, don’t have actors typing on a keyboard. Treat it like regular conversation rather than the act of writing or typing. They can be doing things people do in the comfort of their home, like eating potato chips, walking around in jammies, cooking, doing dishes, clipping nails, etc.

Scene One

Swarthmore College. Elliot and Yaz eat breakfast. Elliot wears a Subway sandwich shop polo shirt.

ELLIOT: This guy ain’t coming. How do you know him?

YAZ: We’re on a committee together.

ELLIOT: My shift starts in fifteen.

YAZ: All right, we’ll go.

ELLIOT: Five more minutes. Tonight on the way home, we gotta stop by Whole Foods.

YAZ: Sure, I need toothpaste.

ELLIOT: You gotta help me with my mom, Yaz.

YAZ: You said she had a good morning.

ELLIOT: She cooked breakfast.

5. American jazz saxophonist and composer (1926–67), pioneer of “free jazz.”

YAZ: Progress.

ELLIOT: No. The docs said she can't be eating all that junk, it'll mess with her chemo, so she crawls out of bed for the first time in days and cooks eggs for breakfast. In two inches of pork-chop fat. I'm like, Mom, recycle glass and plastic, not grease. She thinks putting the egg on top of a paper towel after you cook it makes it healthy. I told her, Mom, you gotta cook egg whites. In Pam spray. But it has to be her way. Like, "That's how we ate them in Puerto Rico and we turned out fine." You gotta talk to her. I'm trying to teach her about quinoa. Broccoli rabe. Healthy shit. So I get home the other day, she had made quinoa with bacon. She was like, "It's healthy!"

YAZ: That's Ginny. The more stubborn she's being, the better she's feeling.

ELLIOT: I gave those eggs to the dogs when she went to the bathroom.

YAZ (Pulls some papers from her purse): You wanna be my witness?

ELLIOT: To what?

(Yaz signs the papers.)

YAZ: My now-legal failure. I'm divorced.

ELLIOT: Yaz. I don't want to hear that.

YAZ: You've been saying that for months and I've been keeping my mouth closed. I just need a John Hancock.

ELLIOT: What happened to "trial separation"?

YAZ: There was a verdict. William fell out of love with me.

ELLIOT: I've never seen you two argue.

YAZ: We did, we just had smiles on our faces.

ELLIOT: That's bullshit. You don't divorce someone before you even have a fight with them. I'm calling him.

YAZ: Go ahead.

ELLIOT: He was just texting me about going to the Phillies game on Sunday.

YAZ: So, go. He didn't fall out of love with the family, just me.

ELLIOT: I'm going to ask him who he's been screwing behind your back.

YAZ: No one, Elliot.

ELLIOT: You were tappin' some extra on the side?

YAZ: He woke up one day and I was the same as any other person passing by on the street, and life is short, and you can only live in mediocrity so long.

ELLIOT: You two are the dog and the owner that look like each other. Ya'll are the Cosby Show.⁶ Conundrum, Yaz and William make a funny, end-of episode. You show all us cousins, maybe we can't ever do it ourselves, but it is possible.

YAZ: Did I ever say, "It's possible"?

ELLIOT: By example.

YAZ: Did I ever say those words?

(Professor Aman enters.)

AMAN: Yazmin, forgive me. You must be . . .

ELLIOT: Elliot Ortiz. Nice to meet you, I appreciate it.

AMAN: Professor Aman. (They shake) We'll have to make this short and sweet, my lecture begins . . . began . . . well, talk fast.

6. Television sitcom (1984–92) about a close-knit upper-middle-class African American family starring comedian Bill Cosby (b. 1937).

ELLIOT: Yaz, give us a second?

YAZ: I'll be in the car. (Exits)

ELLIOT: I'm late, too, so . . .

AMAN: You need something translated.

ELLIOT: Just a phrase. Thanks, man.

AMAN: Eh, your sister's cute.

ELLIOT: Cousin. I wrote it phonetically. You grow up speaking Arabic?

AMAN: English. What's your native tongue?

ELLIOT: Spanglish. (Hands Aman a piece of paper)

AMAN: Mom-ken men fad-luck ted-dini ga-waz saf-far-i. Mom-ken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari. Am I saying that right?

ELLIOT (Spooked): Spot on.

AMAN: You must have some familiarity with Arabic to remember it so clearly.

ELLIOT: Maybe I heard it on TV or something.

AMAN: An odd phrase.

ELLIOT: It's like a song I can't get out of my head.

AMAN: Yazmin didn't tell me what this is for.

ELLIOT: It's not for anything.

AMAN: Do you mind me asking, what's around your neck?

ELLIOT: Something my girl gave me.

AMAN: Can I see? (Elliot pulls dog tags from under his shirt) Romantic gift. You were in the army.

ELLIOT: Marines.

AMAN: Iraq?

ELLIOT: For a minute.

AMAN: Were you reluctant to tell me that?

ELLIOT: No.

AMAN: Still in the service?

ELLIOT: Honorable discharge. Leg injury.

AMAN: When?

ELLIOT: A few years ago.

AMAN: This is a long time to have a phrase stuck in your head.

ELLIOT: What is this, man?

AMAN: You tell me.

ELLIOT: It's just a phrase. If you don't want to translate, just say so.

AMAN: A college buddy is making a film about Marines in Iraq. Gritty, documentary-style. He's looking for some veterans to interview. Get an authentic point of view. Maybe I could pass your number onto him.

ELLIOT: Nope. No interviews for this guy.

AMAN: You're asking me for a favor. (Pause) Yazmin told me you're an actor. Every actor needs a break, right?

ELLIOT: I did enough Q&As about the service. People manipulate you with the questions.

AMAN: It's not just to interview. He needs a right-hand man, an expert to help him. How do Marines hold a gun? How do they kick in civilian doors, this sort of thing. How do they say "Ooh-rah" in a patriotic manner?

ELLIOT: Are you his headhunter or something?

AMAN: I'm helping with the translations, I have a small stake and I want the movie to be accurate. And you seem not unintelligent. For a maker of sandwiches.

(Hands him a business card) He's in L.A. In case you want a career change. I give you a cup of sugar, you give me a cup of sugar.

ELLIOT: If I have a minute, I'll dial the digits. (Takes the business card) So what's it mean?

AMAN: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari. Rough translation, "Can I please have my passport back?"

ORANGUTAN: Ninety-one days. Smiley face.

HAIKUMOM (Relieved): Orangutan! Jesus, I thought my primate friend had disappeared back to the jungle.

ORANGUTAN: Disappeared? Yes. Jungle? Happily, no.

HAIKUMOM: I'm trying to put a high-five emoticon, but my computer is being a capital B. So, high-five!

(They high-five in the air. Another computer screen lights up:)

CHUTES&LADDERS
STATUS: ONLINE

CHUTES&LADDERS: Orangutan? I was about to send a search party after your rear end. Kid, log on. No news is bad news.

ORANGUTAN: Chutes&Ladders, giving me a hard time as usual. I'd expect nothing less.

7. Originally Japanese poetic form that, in its English-language incarnations, traditionally consists of seventeen syllables divided into three lines of five, seven, and five syllables, respectively.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Your last post says: “Day One. Packing bags, gotta run,” and then you don’t log on for three months?

ORANGUTAN: I was going to Japan, I had to figure out what shoes to bring.

HAIKUMOM: The country?

CHUTES&LADDERS: What happened to Maine?

ORANGUTAN: And I quote, “Get a hobby, find a new job, an exciting city, go teach English in a foreign country.” Did you guys think I wouldn’t take your seasoned advice? I was batting 0 for ten, and for the first time, guys, I feel fucking free.

HAIKUMOM (Nonjudgmental): Censored.

ORANGUTAN: I wake up and I think, What’s the world got up its sleeve today? And I look forward to the answer. So, thank you.

CHUTES&LADDERS: We told you so.

ORANGUTAN (Playful): Shut up.

HAIKUMOM: You’re welcome.

ORANGUTAN: I gave my parents the URL. My username, my password. They logged on and read every post I’ve ever put on here and for once they said they understood. They had completely cut me off, but after reading this site they bought me the plane ticket. One way. I teach English in the mornings. I have a class of children, a class of teens, and a class of adults, most of whom are older than me. I am free in the afternoons. I have a paycheck which I use for legal things like ice cream, noodles and socks. I walk around feeling like maybe I am normal. Maybe, just possibly, I’m not that different. Or maybe it’s just homeland delusions.

CHUTES&LADDERS AND HAIKUMOM: Homeland?

HAIKUMOM: You’re Japanese?

ORANGUTAN: I was, for the first eight days of my life. Yoshiko Sakai. Then on day nine I was adopted and moved to Cape Lewiston, Maine, where I became Ma—M.M., and where in all my days I have witnessed one other Asian. In the Superfresh. Deli counter.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Japan . . . Wow, that little white rock sure doesn’t discriminate.

HAIKUMOM: Amen.

ORANGUTAN: Mango Internet Café. I’m sitting in an orange plastic chair, a little view of the Hokkaido waterfront.

HAIKUMOM: Japan has a waterfront?

CHUTES&LADDERS: It’s an island.

HAIKUMOM: Really? Are there beaches? Can you go swimming?

ORANGUTAN: The ocean reminds me of Maine. Cold water, very quiet, fisherman, boats, the breeze. I wouldn’t try swimming. I’m just a looker. I was never one to actually have an experience.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Ah, the ocean . . . There’s only one thing on this planet I’m more scared of than that big blue lady.

HAIKUMOM: Let me guess: landing on a sliding board square?⁸

8. In Milton Bradley’s board game Chutes & Ladders (based on the ancient Indian game Snakes and Ladders), some squares are connected by sliding boards, or “chutes.” Players landing on the square picturing the top of the chute advance or “slide” directly to the square picturing the bottom of the chute.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Lol, truer words have never been spoken. You know I was born just a few miles from the Pacific. In the fresh salt air. Back in “those days” I’m at Coronado Beach⁹ with a few “friends” doing my “thing” and I get sucked up under this wave. I gasp, I breathe in and my lungs fill with water. I’m like, this is it, I’m going to meet my maker. I had never felt so heavy, not even during my two OD’s.¹ I was sinking to the bottom and my head hit the sand like a lead ball. My body just felt like an anvil. The next thing I know there’s fingers digging in my ankles. This lifeguard pulls me out, I’m throwing up salt water. I say to him, “Hey blondie, you don’t know me from Adam but you are my witness: today’s the day I start to live.” And this lifeguard, I mean he was young with these muscles, this kid looks at me like, “Who is this big black dude who can’t even doggy paddle?” When I stand up and brush the sand off me, people applaud. An old lady touches my cheek and says, “I thought you were done for.” I get back to San Diego that night, make one phone call, the next day I’m in my first meeting, sitting in a folding chair, saying the serenity prayer.²

ORANGUTAN: I hate to inflate your already swollen ego, but that was a lucid, touching story. By the way, did you get the lifeguard’s name? He sounds hot.

HAIKUMOM: Hey Chutes&Ladders, it’s never too late to learn. Most YMCAs offer adult swimming classes.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I’ll do the world a favor and stay out of a speedo.

ORANGUTAN: Sober air toast. To lifeguards.

CHUTES&LADDERS AND HAIKUMOM: To lifeguards.

ORANGUTAN, CHUTES&LADDERS AND HAIKUMOM: Clink.

HAIKUMOM: Chutes&Ladders, I’m buying you a pair of water wings.

Scene Three

John Coltrane’s A Love Supreme plays. A Subway sandwich shop on Philadelphia’s Main Line. Elliot sits behind the counter. The phone rings. He gets up, hobbles to it—he walks with a limp.

ELLIOT: Subway Main Line. Lar! Laaar, what’s it doing for you today? Staying in the shade? I got you, how many you need? Listen, the delivery guy’s out and my little sports injury is giving me hell so can you pick up? Cool, sorry for the inconvenience. Let me grab a pen. A’ight, pick a hoagie, any hoagie!

(Elliot begins writing the order.)

Lights rise to a seminar room at Swarthmore College. We find Yaz mid-class. She hits a button on a stereo and the Coltrane stops playing.)

YAZ: Coltrane’s A Love Supreme, 1964. Dissonance is still a gateway to resolution. A B-diminished chord is still resolving to? C-major. A tritone is still

1. Overdoses (acronym).

2. Authored by American theologian Reinhold Niebuhr (1892–1971) and adopted by Alcoholics Anonymous and other twelve-step addiction-recovery programs, it reads, “God, grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, / The courage to change the things I can, / And the wisdom to know the difference.”

resolving up to? The major sixth. Diminished chords, tritones, still didn't have the right to be their own independent thought. In 1965 something changed. The ugliness bore no promise of a happy ending. The ugliness became an end in itself. Coltrane democratized the notes. He said, they're all equal. Freedom. It was called Free Jazz but freedom is a hard thing to express musically without spinning into noise. This is from Ascension, 1965.

(She plays Ascension. It sounds uglier than the first sample. In the Subway, a figure comes into view. It is the Ghost.)

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(Elliot tries to ignore the Ghost, reading off the order.)

ELLIOT: That's three teriyaki onion with chicken. First with hot and onions. Second with everything. Third with extra bacon. Two spicy Italian with American cheese on whole grain. One BMT on flatbread. Good so far?

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

ELLIOT: Five chocolate chip cookies, one oatmeal raisin. Three Baked Lay's, three Doritos. Two Sprite Zeros, one Barq's, one Coke, two orange sodas. How'd I do?

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

ELLIOT: All right, that'll be ready in fifteen minutes. One sec for your total.

(Elliot gets a text message. He reads it; his entire demeanor shifts.)

Lar, I just got a text. There's a family emergency, I can't do this order right now.

(Elliot hangs up. He exits, limping away.)

YAZ: Oh come on, don't make that face. I know it feels academic. You're going to leave here and become R&B hit makers and Sondheim³ clones and never think about this noise again. But this is Coltrane, people, this is not Schoenberg!⁴ This is jazz, stuff people listen to voluntarily. Shopping period is still on—go sit in one session of “Germans and Noise” down the hall and you'll come running back begging for this muzak.

(Yaz turns off the music.)

In fact, change the syllabus. No listening report next week. Instead, I want you to pinpoint the first time you really noticed dissonance. The composer, the piece, the measures. Two pages analyzing the notes and two pages describing the experience personally. This is your creation myth.⁵ Before you leave this school you better figure out that story and cling to it for dear life or you'll be a stockbroker within a year.

I was thirteen, I worked in a corrugated box factory all summer, I saved up enough to find my first music teacher—up to that point I was self-taught, playing to the radio. I walked into Don Rappaport's room at Settlement Music School.⁶ He was old, he had jowls, he was sitting at the piano and he said, "What do you do?" I said, "I'm a composer, sir." Presumptuous, right? I sat down and played Mr. Rappaport a Yazmin original. He said, "It's pretty, everything goes together. It's like an outfit where your socks are blue and your pants, shirt, hat are all blue." Then he said, "Play an F-sharp major in your left hand." Then he said, "Play a C-major in your right hand." "Now play them together." He asked me, "Does it go together?" I told him, "No, sir." He said, "Now go home and write." My first music lesson was seven minutes long. I had never really heard dissonance before.

(Yaz's phone vibrates. She sees the caller with concern.)

Let's take five.

(As students file out, Yaz makes a phone call. Lights up on Elliot outside the Subway.)

("What's the bad news?") You called three times.

ELLIOT: She's still alive.

YAZ: Okay.

ELLIOT: Jefferson Hospital. They admitted her three hours ago. Pop had the courtesy to text me.

YAZ: Are you still at work?

ELLIOT: Just smashed the bathroom mirror all over the floor. Boss sent me out to the parking lot.

YAZ: Wait there. I'm on my way.

ELLIOT: "Your mom is on breathing machine." Who texts that? Who texts that and then doesn't pick up the phone?

YAZ: I'll be there within twenty.

ELLIOT: Why did I come to work today?

YAZ: She had a good morning. You wanted your thing translated.

ELLIOT: She cooked and I wouldn't eat a bite off the fork. There's a Subway hoagies around the corner and I had to work half an hour away.

YAZ: You didn't want your buddies to see you working a normal job.

ELLIOT: Not normal job. Shit job. I'm a butler. A porter of sandwiches.

YAZ: Ginny's been to Hades and back, stronger each time.

ELLIOT: What is Hades?

YAZ: In Greek mythology, the river through the underworld—

ELLIOT: My mom's on a machine and you're dropping vocab words?!

(A ding.)

YAZ: Text message, don't hang up. (She looks at her phone. A moment, then) You still there?

ELLIOT: It was my dad wasn't it? Yaz, spit it out.

YAZ: It was your dad.

6. Philadelphia institution originally founded (1908) to provide free music instruction to newly arrived immigrants but today offering music, dance, and visual arts classes to children and adults across the city "without regard to age, race or financial circumstances." Hudes is an alumna.

ELLIOT: And? Yaz, I'm about to start walking down Lancaster Avenue for thirty miles till I get back to Philly and I don't care if I snap every wire out my leg and back—I need to get out of here. I need to see Mom, I need to talk to her!

YAZ: He said, "Waiting for Elliot till we turn off the machine."

Scene Four

The chat room. A screen lights up:

FOUNTAINHEAD⁷
STATUS: ONLINE

FOUNTAINHEAD: I've uh, wow, hello there everyone. Delete, delete. Good afternoon. Evening. Delete.

(Deep breath.)

Things I am taking:

—My life into my own hands.

—My gorgeous, deserving wife out for our seventh anniversary.

Me: mildly athletic, but work twice as hard. Won state for javelin two years straight. Ran a half marathon last fall. Animated arguer. Two medals for undergrad debate. MBA from Wharton.⁸ Beautiful wife, two sons. Built a programming company from the ground up, featured in the New York Times' Circuits section, sold it at its peak, bought a yellow Porsche, got a day job to keep myself honest. Salary was 300K, company was run by morons, got laid off, handsome severance, which left me swimming in cash and free time.

Me and crack: long story short, I was at a conference with our CFO and two programmers and a not-unattractive lady in HR.⁹ They snorted, invited me to join. A few weeks later that little rock waltzed right into my hand. I've been using off and on since. One eight ball every Saturday, strict rations, portion control. Though the last three or four weeks, it's less like getting high and more like trying to build a time machine. Anything to get back the romance of that virgin smoke.

Last weekend I let myself buy more than my predetermined allotment—I buy in small quantity, because as with my food, I eat what's on my plate. Anyway, I ran over a curb, damaged the underside of my Porsche. Now it's in the shop and I'm driving a rental Mustang. So, not rock bottom but a rental Ford is as close to rock bottom as I'd like to get. Fast forward to tonight. I'm watching my wife's eyelids fall and telling myself, "You are on punishment, Poppa. Daddy's on time out. Do not get out of bed, do not tiptoe down those stairs, do not go down to that basement, do not sit beside that foosball table, do not smoke, and please do not crawl on the carpet looking for one last hit in the fibers."

(Pause.)

7. Title of a best-selling 1943 novel by Ayn Rand (1905–82), a famous evocation of her individualist philosophy.

8. Famed business school (founded 1881) of the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia. MBA: master of business administration (acronym).

9. Human resources (acronym). CFO: chief financial officer.

In kindergarten my son tested into G and T. Gifted and talented. You meet with the school, they tailor the program to the kid. Math, reading, art, whatever the parent chooses. I said, “Teach my son how to learn. How to use a library. How to find original source material, read a map, track down the experts so he becomes an expert.” Which gets me to—

You: the experts. It’s the first day of school and I’m knocking at your classroom door. I got my No. 2 pencils, I’ll sit in the front row, pay attention, and do my homework. No lesson is too basic. Teach me every technique. Any tip so that Saturday doesn’t become every day. Any actions that keep you in the driver seat. Healthy habits and rational thoughts to blot out that voice in the back of my head.

Today, I quit. My wife cannot know, she’d get suspicious if I were at meetings all the time. There can be no medical records, so therapy is out. At least it’s not heroin, I’m not facing a physical war. It’s a psychological battle and I’m armed with two weapons: willpower and the experts.

I’m taking my wife out tomorrow for our seventh anniversary and little does she know that when we clink glasses, I’ll be toasting to Day One.

(Odessa is emotional. Chutes&Ladders and Orangutan seem awestruck.)

ORANGUTAN (Clapping): That was brave.

CHUTES&LADDERS: What. The.

HAIKUMOM: Careful.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fuck.

HAIKUMOM: Censored.

ORANGUTAN: I’m making popcorn. Oh, this is gonna be fun!

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fountainhead, speaking of experts, I’ve been meaning to become an asshole. Can you teach me how?

HAIKUMOM: Censored!

ORANGUTAN: “Tips”? This isn’t a cooking website. And what is a half marathon?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Maybe it’s something like a half crack addict. Or a half husband.

ORANGUTAN: Was that an addiction coming out or an online dating profile? “Married Male Dope Fiend. Smokin’ hot.”

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fountainhead, you sound like the kind of guy who’s read *The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People*¹ cover to cover. Was one of those habits crack? Give the essays a rest and type three words. “I’m. A. Crackhead.”

ORANGUTAN: You know, adderall is like totes² cool. Us crackheads, we’re like yucky and stuff. We’re like so nineties. Go try the adderall edge!

HAIKUMOM: Hey.

ORANGUTAN: The guy’s a hoax. Twenty bucks says he’s pranking. Let’s start a new thread.

HAIKUMOM: Hi, Fountainhead, welcome. As the site administrator, I want to honestly congratulate you for accomplishing what so many addicts only hope for: one clean day. Any time you feel like using, log on here instead. It’s worked for me. When it comes to junkies, I dug lower than the dungeon. Once upon a time I had a beautiful family, too. Now all I have is six years clean. Don't lose what I lost, what Chutes&Ladders lost.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Excuse me.

HAIKUMOM: Orangutan, I just checked and Fountainhead has no aliases and has never logged onto this site before under a different pseudonym, which are the usual markers of a scam.

ORANGUTAN: I'm just saying. Who toasts to their first day of sobriety?

CHUTES&LADDERS: I hope it's seltzer in that there champagne glass.

ORANGUTAN: Ginger ale, shirley temple.

CHUTES&LADDERS: "A toast, honey. I had that seven-year itch so I became a crackhead."

CHUTES&LADDERS AND ORANGUTAN: Clink.

HAIKUMOM: Hey; kiddos. Your smiley administrator doesn't want to start purging messages. For rules of the forums click on this link. No personal attacks.

ORANGUTAN: We don't come to this site for a pat on the back.

HAIKUMOM: I'm just saying. R-e-s-p-e-c-t.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I will always give crack the respect it deserves. Some pure-bred poodle comes pissing on my tree trunk? Damn straight I'll chase his ass out my forest.

HAIKUMOM: This here is my forest. You two think you were all humble pie when you started out? Check your original posts.

ORANGUTAN: Oh, I know mine. "I-am-scared-I-will-kill-myself-talk-me-off-the-ledge."

HAIKUMOM: So unless someone gets that desperate they don't deserve our noble company? "Suffer like me, or you ain't legit"?

ORANGUTAN: Haikumom's growing claws.

HAIKUMOM: Just don't act entitled because you got so low. (To Fountainhead) Sorry. Fountainhead, forgive us. We get very passionate because—

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fountainhead, your Porsche has a massive engine. You got bulging marathon muscles. I'm sure your penis is as big as that javelin you used to throw.

HAIKUMOM: Censored.

CHUTES&LADDERS: But none of those things come close to the size of your ego. If you can put that aside, you may, may stand a chance. Otherwise, you're fucked, my friend.

HAIKUMOM: Message purged.

ORANGUTAN: OH MY GOD, WE'RE DYING HERE, DO WE HAVE TO BE SO POLITE ABOUT IT?

HAIKUMOM: Censored.

ORANGUTAN: Oh my G-zero-D. Democracy or dictatorship?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Hey Fountainhead, why the silence?

(Fountainhead logs off.)

HAIKUMOM: Nice work, guys. Congratulations.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You don't suppose he's . . . crawling on the carpet looking for one last rock??

ORANGUTAN: Lordy lord lord, I'm about to go over his house and start looking for one myself!

HAIKUMOM: That's why you're in Japan, little monkey. For now, I'm closing this thread. Fountainhead, if you want to reopen it, email me directly.

Scene Five

A flower shop in Center City³ Philadelphia. Yaz looks over some brochures. Elliot enters, his limp looking worse.

YAZ: I was starting to get worried. How you holding?

ELLIOT: Joe's Gym, perfect remedy.

YAZ: You went boxing? Really?

ELLIOT: I had to blow off steam. Women don't get it.

YAZ: Don't be a pig. You've had four leg surgeries, no more boxing.

ELLIOT: Did Odessa call?

YAZ: You know how she is. Shutting herself out from the world.

ELLIOT: We need help this week.

YAZ: And I got your back.

ELLIOT: I'm just saying, pick up the phone and ask, "Do you need anything, Elliot?"

YAZ: I did speak to your dad. Everyone's gathering at the house. People start arriving from PR⁴ in a few hours. The next door neighbor brought over two trays of pigs feet.

ELLIOT: I just threw up in my mouth.

YAZ: Apparently a fight broke out over who gets your mom's pocketbooks.

ELLIOT: Those pleather things from the ten-dollar store?

YAZ: Thank you, it's not like she had Gucci purses!

ELLIOT: People just need to manufacture drama.

YAZ: He said they were tearing through Ginny's closets like it was a shopping spree. "I want this necklace!" "I want the photo album!" "Yo, those chancletas⁵ are mine!" I'm like, damn, let the woman be buried first.

ELLIOT: Yo, let's spend the day here.

YAZ (Handing him some papers): Brochures. I was being indecisive so the florist went to work on a wedding bouquet. I ruled out seven, you make the final call. Celebration of Life, Blooming Garden, Eternity Wreath.

ELLIOT: All of those have carnations. I don't want a carnation within a block of the church.

YAZ: You told me to eliminate seven. I eliminated seven. Close your eyes and point.

ELLIOT: Am I a particularly demanding person?

YAZ: Yes. What's so wrong with a carnation?

ELLIOT: You know what a carnation says to the world? That they were out of roses at the 7-Eleven. It should look something like Mom's garden.

YAZ (In agreement): Graveside Remembrances? That looks something like it . . . I'm renominating Graveside Remembrances. Putting it back on the table.

3. Downtown district, the city's business and transportation hub.

4. Puerto Rico (acronym).

5. Sandals or flip-flops (Spanish slang).

ELLIOT: You couldn't find anything tropical? Yaz, you could find a needle in a damn haystack and you couldn't find a bird of paradise or something?

YAZ: He just shoved some brochures in my hand.

ELLIOT (Stares her down): You have an awful poker face.

YAZ: Now, look here.

ELLIOT: You did find something.

YAZ: No. Not exactly.

ELLIOT: How much does it cost? Yaz, this is my mom we're talking about.

YAZ: Five hundred more. Just for the casket piece.

ELLIOT: You can't lie for shit, you never could.

YAZ: Orchid Paradise.

(Yaz hands him another brochure. They look at it together.)

ELLIOT: Aw damn. Damn. That looks like her garden.

YAZ: Spitting image.

ELLIOT (Pointing): I think she grew those.

YAZ: Right next to the tomatoes.

ELLIOT: But hers were yellow. Fuck.

YAZ: It's very odd to order flowers when someone dies. Because the flowers are just gonna die, too. "Would you like some death with your death?"

ELLIOT (A confession): I didn't water them.

YAZ (Getting it): What, are you supposed to be a gardener all of a sudden?

ELLIOT: It doesn't rain for a month and do I grab the hose and water Mom's garden one time?

YAZ: You were feeding her. Giving her meds. Bathing her. I could've come over and watered a leaf. A single petal.

ELLIOT: The last four days, she'd wake me up in the middle of the night. "Did you water the flowers?" "Yeah, Mom, just like you told me to yesterday." "Carry me out back, I want to see." "Mom, you're too heavy, I can't carry you down those steps one more time today."

YAZ: Little white lies.

ELLIOT: Can you do the sermon?

YAZ: This is becoming a second career.

ELLIOT: Because you're the only one who doesn't cry.

YAZ: Unlike Julia.

ELLIOT (Imitating): "¡Ay dios mio!⁶ ¡Ay! ¡Ay!"

YAZ: I hate public speaking.

ELLIOT: You're a teacher.

YAZ: It's different when it's ideas. Talking about ideas isn't saying something, it's making syllables with your mouth.

ELLIOT: You love ideas. All you ever wanted to do was have ideas.

YAZ: It was an elaborate bait and switch. The ideas don't fill the void, they just help you articulate it.

ELLIOT: You've spoken at city hall. On the radio.

YAZ: You're the face of Main Line Chevrolet. (Pause) Can I do it in English?

ELLIOT: You could do it in Russian for all I care. I'll just be in the front row acting like my cheek is itchy so no one sees me crying.

6. Oh Lord or Oh my God (Spanish).

YAZ: The elders want a good Spanish sermon.

ELLIOT: Mami Ginny was it. You're the elder now.

YAZ: I'm twenty-nine.

ELLIOT: But you don't look a day over fifty.

YAZ: You gotta do me a favor in return. I know this is your tragedy but . . . Call William. Ask him not to come to the funeral.

ELLIOT: Oh shit.

YAZ: He saw the obit in the Daily News.

ELLIOT: They were close. Mami Ginny loved that blond hair. She was the madrina⁷ of your wedding.

YAZ: William relinquished mourning privileges. You fall out of love with me, you lose certain rights. He calls talking about, "I want the condo." Fuck that. Fuck that. Coming from you it won't seem bitter. Wants the fucking condo all for hisself. That I decorated, that I painted. "Oh, and where's the funeral, by the way?" You know, he's been to four funerals in the Ortiz clan and I could feel it, there was a part of him, under it all, that was disgusted. The open casket. The prayers.

ELLIOT: It is disgusting.

YAZ: Sitting in the pew knowing what freaks we are.

ELLIOT: He's good people.

YAZ: I was probably at his side doing the same thing, thinking I'm removed, that I'm somehow different.

ELLIOT: Hey, hey, done.

YAZ: One more condition. I go to Puerto Rico with you. We scatter her ashes together.

ELLIOT: Mami Ginny couldn't be buried in Philly. She had to have her ashes thrown at a waterfall in El Yunque,⁸ just to be the most Puerto Rican motherfucker around.

YAZ: I saw your Colgate ad.

ELLIOT: Dang, cousin Yaz watches Spanish TV?

YAZ: Shut up.

ELLIOT: I walked into the casting office, flashed my pearly whites, showed them my military ID and I charmed them.

YAZ: Do it.

ELLIOT: Give me a dollar.

YAZ: For that big cheeseburger smile?

(She gives him a dollar.)

ELLIOT (Smiling): "Sonrisa,⁹ baby!"

(Yaz cracks up laughing, which devolves into tears.)

How we gonna pay for Orchid Paradise?

YAZ: They should have a frequent-flower card. They punch a hole. Buy nine funeral bouquets, get the tenth free. We'd be living in a house full of lilies.

7. Matron of honor (Spanish).

8. Tropical rain forest in Puerto Rico, part of the U.S. National Forest System.

9. Smile (Spanish).

Look at that guy. Arranging his daisies like little treasures. What do you think it's like to be him? To be normal?

ELLIOT: Normal? A hundred bucks says that dude has a closet full of animal porno at home.

YAZ: I bet in his family, funerals are rare occasions. I bet he's never seen a cousin get arrested. Let alone one under the age of eighteen. I bet he never saw his eight-year-old cousin sipping rum through a twisty straw or . . . I just remembered this time cousin Maria was babysitting me . . .

ELLIOT: Fat Maria or Buck Tooth Maria?

YAZ: Pig.

ELLIOT: Ah, Fat Maria.

YAZ: I was dyeing her hair. I had never dyed hair before so I asked her to read me the next step and she handed me the box and said, "You read it." And I said, "My rubber gloves are covered in toxic goop, I can't really hold that right now." And so she held it in front of my eyes and said, "You gonna have to read it because I sure as hell can't."

ELLIOT: I been knowed that.

YAZ: I said, "But you graduated from high school." She said, "They just pass you, I just stood in the back." I was in fourth grade. I could read! (Pause) I have a degree written in Latin that I don't even understand. I paid seventeen thousand dollars for my piano.

ELLIOT: Oh shit.

YAZ: I have a mortgage on my piano. Drive two miles north? William told me every time I went to North Philly, I'd come back different. His family has Quaker Oats for DNA. They play Pictionary on New Year's. I'd sit there wishing I could scoop the blood out my veins like you scoop the seeds out a pumpkin and he'd be like, "Whatchu thinking about, honey?" And I'd be like, "Nothing. Let's play some Pictionary."

ELLIOT: Yo, being the scholarship case at an all-white prep school really fucked with your head, didn't it?

YAZ: I should've gone to Edison.

ELLIOT: Public school in el barrio.¹ You wouldn't have survived there for a day.

YAZ: Half our cousins didn't survive there.

ELLIOT: True. But you would've pissed your pants. At least their pants was dry when they went down.

YAZ: You're sick.

ELLIOT: And the ladies love me.

YAZ: I thought abuela² dying, that would be the end of us. But Ginny grabbed the torch. Christmas, Easter. Now what? Our family may be fucked-up but we had somewhere to go. A kitchen that connected us. Plastic-covered sofas where we could park our communal asses.

ELLIOT: Pop's selling the house. And the plastic-covered sofas. He's moving back to the Bronx, be with his sisters.

YAZ: You going with him? (Elliot shrugs) Wow. I mean, once that living room is gone, I may never step foot in North Philly again.

1. Spanish-speaking district or neighborhood.

2. Grandmother (Spanish).

ELLIOT: Washed up at age twenty-four. Disabled vet. Motherless chil'. Working at Subway. Soon-to-be homeless.

YAZ: My couch is your couch.

ELLIOT: Until William takes your couch.

YAZ: My cardboard box is your cardboard box.

ELLIOT: I could go out to L.A. and be a movie star.

YAZ: You need a manager? Shoot I'm coming witchu. Forget Philly.

ELLIOT: Change of scene, baby. Dream team.

YAZ: Probably we should order some flowers first, though. Don'tcha think? (Elliot nods. To the florist) Sir?

Scene Six

The chat room. Orangutan is online, seems upset.

ORANGUTAN: 2:38 A.M. Tuesday. The witching hour.

(Chutes&Ladders logs on.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: 1:38 P.M. Monday. The lunch hour.

ORANGUTAN: I'm in a gay bar slash internet café in the city of Sapporo. Deafening dance music.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Sure you should be in a bar, little monkey?

ORANGUTAN (Disappointed): I flew halfway around the world and guess what? It was still me who got off the plane. (Taking comfort) Sapporo is always open. The world turns upside down at night.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You're in a city named after a beer sitting in a bar. Go home.

ORANGUTAN: Everything in this country makes sense but me. The noodles in soup make sense. The woodpecker outside my window every evening? Completely logical. The girls getting out of school in their miniskirts and shy smiles? Perfectly natural. I'm floating. I'm a cloud. My existence is one sustained out-of-body experience. It doesn't matter if I change my shoes, there's not a pair I've ever been able to fill. I'm a baby in a basket on an endless river. Wherever I go I don't make sense there.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Hey, little monkey. How many days you got?

ORANGUTAN: I think day ninety-six is when the demons really come out to play.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Ninety-six? Girl, hang your hat on that.

ORANGUTAN: I really really really want to smoke crack.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Yeah, well don't.

ORANGUTAN: Distract me from myself. What do you really really really want, Chutes&Ladders?

CHUTES&LADDERS: I wouldn't say no to a new car—my Tercel is one sorry sight.

ORANGUTAN: What else?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Tuesday's crossword. On Monday I'm done by the time I sit at my desk. I wish every day could be a Tuesday.

ORANGUTAN: What about your son? Don't you really really really want to call him?

CHUTES&LADDERS: By all accounts, having me be a stranger these ten years has given him the best decade of his life.

ORANGUTAN: I've known you for how long?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Three Christmas Eves. When you logged on you were a stone-cold user. We sang Christmas carols online all night. Now you've got ninety days.

ORANGUTAN: Can I ask you a personal question? What's your day job?

CHUTES&LADDERS: IRS. GS4 paper pusher.

ORANGUTAN: Got any vacation days?

CHUTES&LADDERS: A solid collection. I haven't taken a vacation in ten years.

ORANGUTAN: Do you have money?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Enough to eat steak on Friday nights. Enough to buy pay-per-view boxing.

ORANGUTAN: Yeah, I bet that's all the pay-per-view you buy. (Pause) Enough money to fly to Japan?

(Pause.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: You should know I'm fifty years old on a good day. I eat three and a half doughnuts for breakfast and save the remaining half for brunch. I have small hands, six toes on my left foot. And my face resembles a corgi.

ORANGUTAN: If I was looking for a hot screw I wouldn't be logging on to this site.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Damn, was it something I said?

ORANGUTAN (With honest admiration): I've been on this planet for thirty-one years and you're the only person I've ever met who's more sarcastic than I am yet still believes in God.

CHUTES&LADDERS (Taking the compliment): Says the agnostic.

ORANGUTAN: The atheist. Who is very envious of believers. My brain is my biggest enemy—always arguing my soul into a corner. (Pause) I like you. Come to Japan. We can go get an ice cream. I can show you the countryside.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I don't have a passport. If my Tercel can't drive there, I generally don't go.

ORANGUTAN: Come save me in Japan. Be my knight in shining armor.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I'll admit, I'm a dashing concept. If you saw my flesh and blood, you'd be disappointed.

ORANGUTAN: I see my flesh and blood every day and I've learned to live with the disappointment.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I'm the squarest of the square. I live in a square house on a square block watching a square box eating square-cut fries.

ORANGUTAN: I get it. You were the kid who colored inside the lines.

CHUTES&LADDERS: No, I was the kid who ate the crayons. Was. I went clean and all personality left my life. Flew right out the window. I had to take life on life's terms. Messy, disappointing, bad shit happens to good people, coffee stains on my necktie, boring life.

ORANGUTAN: Maybe we could hang out and have a relationship that has very little to do with crack or addiction or history. We could watch DVDs and microwave popcorn and take walks on the waterfront while we gossip about celebrities. It could be the land of the living.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Stay in the box. Keep things in their place. It's a simple, effective recipe for ten clean years.

ORANGUTAN: Forget simple. I want a goddamn challenge.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You're in recovery and work in a foreign country. That's a challenge.

ORANGUTAN: No. No it's fucking not. Not if I just stay anonymous and alone. Like every day of my shit life so far. A friend, the kind that is nice to you and you are nice to in return. That would push the comfort zone. The invitation is open. Come tear my shyness open.

CHUTES&LADDERS: All right, now you're being weird. Can we change the subject?

(Haikumom appears. She's reading the newspaper.)

HAIKUMOM: Orangutan, cover your ears.

ORANGUTAN: Big Brother, always watching.

HAIKUMOM: Cover your ears, kiddo.

ORANGUTAN: That doesn't really work online.

HAIKUMOM: Okay, Chutes and Ladders, can we g-chat? One on one?

ORANGUTAN: Come on! No talking behind backs.

HAIKUMOM: Fine. Chutes&Ladders, you listening?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Lord have mercy spit it out.

HAIKUMOM: Orangutan may be immature . . .

ORANGUTAN: Hey.

HAIKUMOM: She may be annoying at times . . .

ORANGUTAN: What the f?

HAIKUMOM: She may be overbearing and self-obsessed and a little bit of a concern troll and she can type faster than she can think which often leads to diarrhea of the keyboard—

CHUTES&LADDERS: Your point?

HAIKUMOM: But she's telling you, "Be my friend." When's the last time someone opened your closet door, saw all them skeletons, and said, "Wassup?! Can I join the party?"

CHUTES&LADDERS: All right, my wrist is officially slapped. Thank you, oh nagging wives.

HAIKUMOM: Internal Revenue Service, 300 North Los Angeles Street 90012? Is that you?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Need my name, too? It's Wilkie. I'll leave it at that.

HAIKUMOM: I'm sending you a care package. Orangutan, you can uncover your ears now. I love you.

ORANGUTAN: Middle finger.

(Fountainhead's log-on appears.)

FOUNTAINHEAD: Hey all, thanks for the warm two-by-four to my head.

HAIKUMOM: All right, look who's back.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Knives sharpened? Last night we ran out of butter while my wife was cooking and she sent me to the store and it took every bit of strength I could summon not to make a "wrong turn" to that parking lot I know so well. I got the butter and on the car ride home, I couldn't help it, I drove by the lot, and there was my dealer in the shadows. My brain went on attack. "Use one more time just to prove you won't need another hit tomorrow." I managed to keep on driving and bring the butter home. Major victory. And my wife pulls it out of the plastic bag and says, “This is unsalted. I said salted.” Then she feels guilty so she says never mind, never mind, she’ll just add a little extra salt to the pie crust but I insist. “No, no, no, my wife deserves the right kind of butter and she’s gonna get it!” I mean, I bark it, I’m already halfway out the door, my heart was racing all the way to the parking lot and raced even harder when I sat in the car and smoked. So, Michael Jordan³ is benched with a broken foot. But he’ll come back in the finals.

HAIKUMOM: Thanks for the update, Fountainhead. You may not believe this, but we were missing you and worried about you. Don’t beat yourself up about the slip. You had three days clean. This time you’ll make it to day four.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Be ambitious. Why not reach for a whopping five?

ORANGUTAN: Maybe you’ll make it to day thirty if you tell your wife.

FOUNTAINHEAD: I told you, I have my reasons, I cannot do that. My wife has some emotional issues.

ORANGUTAN (Sarcastic): No!

FOUNTAINHEAD: Listen? Please? Are you capable of that? She’s in therapy twice a week. Depression, manic. I don’t want to be the reason she goes down a tailspin. I actually have her best interest in mind.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Yawn.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Ah, Chutes&Ladders. I could feel you circling like a vulture. Weigh in, by all means.

CHUTES&LADDERS: And I repeat. Yawn.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Chutes&Ladders, why do I get the feeling you’d be the first in line for tickets to watch me smoke again? That you’d be in the bleachers cheering if I relapse?

CHUTES&LADDERS: How can you relapse when you don’t even think you’re addicted?

FOUNTAINHEAD: If you read my original post clearly, I wrote that it’s a psychological addiction, not like heroin.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Well see then, you’re not a junkie after all.

FOUNTAINHEAD: What is this, first-grade recess?

CHUTES&LADDERS: No, this is a site for crackheads trying not to be crackheads anymore. If you’re not a crackhead, leave, we don’t want you, you are irrelevant, get off my lawn, go.

HAIKUMOM: Chutes&Ladders, please.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I got this.

ORANGUTAN: He’s still logged on.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Hey Fountainhead, why did you come to this website?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Because I thoroughly enjoy getting shit on.

HAIKUMOM: Censored.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Why do you want to be here?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Want? The two times I’ve logged on here I’ve wanted to vomit.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Well? Did you receive some sort of invitation? Did one of us ask you here?

3. American basketball player (b. 1963) named in 1996 one of the fifty greatest players in National Basketball Association history.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Look, I'm the first to say it. I have a problem.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Adam had problems. Eve had problems. Why are you here?

FOUNTAINHEAD: To get information.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Go to Wikipedia. Why are you here?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Because I smoke crack.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Go to a dealer. Why are you here?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Because I plan to stop smoking crack.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fine, when your son has a tummy-ache in the middle of the night and walks in on you tweaking and geeking just tell him, "Don't worry, Junior, Daddy's sucking on a glass dick—"

HAIKUMOM (Overlaps): Hey!

CHUTES&LADDERS: "—but Daddy makes 300K and this is all a part of Daddy's Plan!"

FOUNTAINHEAD: I'M A FUCKING CRACKHEAD.

HAIKUMOM (Apologetic): Censored.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Fuck you, Chutes&Ladders.

HAIKUMOM: Bleep.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Fuck you . . . Don't talk about my sons. Don't fucking talk about my boys.

HAIKUMOM: Bleep again.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Are you happy, Chutes&Ladders?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Absolutely not, my friend. I'm a crackhead, too, and I wouldn't wish it on my worst enemy.

FOUNTAINHEAD: And I made 300K, I'm currently unemployed. An unemployed crackhead. At least I still have all my teeth. (They laugh) Better than I can say for my dealer.

CHUTES&LADDERS (Being a friend): Ex-dealer, man.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Ex-dealer. Thank you.

HAIKUMOM: Fountainhead, welcome to the dinner party. Granted, it's a party we never wanted to be invited to, but pull up a chair and pass the salt. Some people here may pour it in your wounds. Just like you, we've all crawled on the floor with a flashlight. We've thrown out the brillo and bought some more. But guess what? You had three days. For three days straight, you didn't try to kill yourself on an hourly basis. Please. Talk to your wife about your addiction. You need every supporting resource. You are in for the fight of your life. You mentioned Wharton. I live in Philly. If you're still in the area and you have an emergency or even a craving, email me directly. Any time of night. Don't take it lightly when I say a sober day for you is a sober day for me. I know you can do this but I know you can't do it alone. So stop being a highly functioning isolator and start being a highly dysfunctional person. The only way out it is through it.

ORANGUTAN (Nostalgic): Slogans . . .

HAIKUMOM: Ya'll know I know 'em all.

CHUTES&LADDERS: They saved my life.

ORANGUTAN: Your personal favorite. Go.

HAIKUMOM: "Nothing changes if nothing changes."

(Elliot appears at the boxing gym, punching a bag. The Ghost watches him.)

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

ORANGUTAN: "It came to pass, it didn't come to stay."

FOUNTAINHEAD: "I obsessively pursue feeling good, no matter how bad it makes me feel."

CHUTES&LADDERS: Okay, now!

ORANGUTAN: Nice!

HAIKUMOM: Rookie don't play!

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

ORANGUTAN: "One hit is too many, one thousand never enough."

HAIKUMOM: "Have an at-ti-tude of gra-ti-tude."

CHUTES&LADDERS: "If you are eating a shit sandwich, chances are you ordered it."

ORANGUTAN: Ding ding ding. We have a winner!

HAIKUMOM: Censored. But good one.

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

HAIKUMOM (Turning a page in the paper): Oh shit!

ORANGUTAN: CENSORED!!!!!! YES!!!!!! Whoooooo!

HAIKUMOM: You got me.

ORANGUTAN (Victorious): You know how long I've been waiting to do that?!

HAIKUMOM: My sister Ginny's in the Daily News! A nice big picture!

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

HAIKUMOM: "Eugenia P. Ortiz, A Force For Good In Philadelphia!" Okay, now!

(Elliot punches harder. His leg is starting to bother him.)

ELLIOT: Your leg feels great. Your leg feels like a million bucks. No pain. No pain.

HAIKUMOM: "In lieu of flowers contributions may be made to . . ."

(Haikumom drops the newspaper.

The Ghost blows on Elliot, knocking him to the floor.)

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(Intermission.)

Scene Seven

A diner. Odessa and John, aka Fountainhead, sit in a booth.

ODESSA: To lapsed Catholics. (They clink coffee mugs) And you thought we had nothing in common.

JOHN: When did you become interested in Buddhism?

ODESSA: My older brother used to terrorize me during mass. He would point to a statue, tell me about the evil spirit hiding behind it. Fangs, claws. I thought Saint Lazarus⁴ was gonna come to life and suck my eyes out. Buddhism? Not scary. If there's spirits, they're hiding inside you.

JOHN: Aren't those the scariest kind?

ODESSA: So, how many days do you have? It should be two now.

JOHN: I put my sons' picture on my cell phone so if I get the urge, I can just look at them instead.

4. In the Gospel of John, Jesus restores Lazarus to life four days after his death.

ODESSA: How many days?

JOHN (Small talk): I love Puerto Rico. On my honeymoon we stayed at that hotel in Old San Juan, the old convent. (Odessa shrugs) And that Spanish fort at the top of the city? El Morro?

ODESSA: I've always been meaning to make it there.

JOHN: There are these keyholes where the canons used to fit, and the view of the waves through them, you can practically see the Spanish armada approaching.

ODESSA: I mean, one of these days I've gotta make it to PR.

JOHN: Oh. I just figured . . .

ODESSA: The Jersey Shore. Atlantic City. The Philadelphia airport. Oh, I've been places.

JOHN: On an actual plane?

ODESSA: I only fly first-class, and I'm still saving for that ticket.

(Odessa's cell phone rings.)

JOHN: You're a popular lady.

ODESSA (Into her phone, her demeanor completely changing): What? I told you, the diner on Spring Garden and Third. I'm busy, come in an hour. One hour. Now stop calling me and asking fucking directions. (She hangs up)

JOHN: Says the one who censors.

ODESSA: My sister died.

JOHN: Right. You sure you're okay?

ODESSA: She's dead, ain't nothing left to do. People act like the world is going to fall apart.

JOHN: You write very Zen⁵ messages. And yet.

ODESSA: My family knows every button to push.

JOHN: My condolences. (Pause) You don't strike me as a computer nerd. I used to employ an entire floor of them.

ODESSA: You should've seen me at first, pecking with two fingers. Now I'm like an octopus with ten little tentacles. In my neck of the woods staying clean is like trying to tap-dance on a minefield. The website fills the hours. So how are we gonna fill yours, huh? When was the last time you picked up a javelin?

JOHN: Senior year of high school.

ODESSA (Hands him a sheet of paper): There's a sober softball league. Fairmount Park, games on Sundays. Sober bowling on Thursdays.

JOHN: I lied in my first post. I've been smoking crack for two years. I've tried quitting hundreds of times. Day two? Please, I'm in the seven-hundredth day of hell.

ODESSA: You got it out of your system. Most people lie at one time or another on the site. The good news is, two years in, there's still time. (Hands him another sheet of paper) Talbott Recovery Center in Atlanta. It's designed for professionals with addictions. Paradise Recovery in Hawaii. They actually check your income before admitting you. Just for the wealthy. This place in Jersey, it's right over the bridge, they have an outpatient program for professionals like you.

JOHN: I'm tenacious. I'm driven. I love my parents.

5. Japanese school of Buddhism stressing the achievement of enlightenment through meditation, often using brief, enigmatic, often paradoxical statements (koans) to transcend rational thought.

ODESSA: Pitchforks against tanks.

JOHN: I relish in paying my taxes.

ODESSA: And you could be dead tomorrow. (Pause) Is your dealer male or female?

JOHN: I had a few. Flushed their numbers down the toilet like you suggested.

ODESSA: Your original connection. The one who got you hooked.

JOHN: Female.

ODESSA: Did you have sex with her?

JOHN: You don't beat around the bush do you?

ODESSA: I'll take that as a yes. (No answer) Do you prefer sex when you're high to sex when you're sober?

JOHN: I've never really analyzed it.

ODESSA: It can be a dangerous cocktail. Some men get off on smoking and fucking.

JOHN: All men get off on fucking.

ODESSA: Are you scared your wife will find out you're addicted to crack? Or are you scared she'll find out what came of your wedding vows?

JOHN: I should go.

ODESSA: We just ordered.

JOHN: I promised my son. There's a science fair tomorrow. Something about dioramas and crazy glue.

ODESSA: Don't talk about them. Get sober for them.

JOHN: Fuck you.

ODESSA: Leave me three bucks for your coffee cuz I ain't got it.

(He stands, pulls out three dollars. She throws the money back at him.)

You picked up the phone and called me.

JOHN (He sits down again): I don't know how to do this. I've never done this before.

ODESSA: I have and it usually doesn't end up so good. One in twenty, maybe, hang around. Most people just don't write one day and then thirty days and then you're wondering . . . And sometimes you get the answer. Cuz their wife looks on their computer and sees the website and logs on and writes, "I found him face down in the snow."

JOHN: How many day ones did you have?

ODESSA: Seven years' worth.

JOHN: Do you still crave?

ODESSA: On the good days, only every hour. Would you rather be honest with your wife, or would you rather end up like me? (Pause) That wasn't rhetorical.

JOHN: You're not exactly what I wanted to be when I grew up.

ODESSA: Truth. Now we're talking.

(Elliot and Yaz enter.)

YAZ: There she is.

(Elliot and Yaz sit down in the booth.)

ELLIOT: You were supposed to meet us at the flower place.

YAZ: The deposit was due at nine.

ODESSA: My alarm clock didn't go off.

ELLIOT: Were you up on that chat room all night?

ODESSA (Ignoring him, to a waiter, off): Can I get a refill, please?

ELLIOT: Where's the money?

ODESSA: I told you I don't have any money.

ELLIOT: And you think I do? I been paying for Mami Ginny's meds for six months straight—

ODESSA: Well get it from Yaz's mom.

YAZ: My mom put in for the headstone. She got an expensive one.

ODESSA: Headstone? She's getting cremated.

YAZ: She still needs a proper Catholic piece of granite. Right beside abuela, right beside your dad and sister and brother.

ELLIOT: And daughter.

YAZ: Everyone agreed.

ODESSA: No one asked my opinion.

ELLIOT: Everyone who showed up to the family meeting.

ODESSA: I wasn't invited.

YAZ: I texted you twice.

ODESSA: I was out of minutes.

ELLIOT: We just spoke on the phone.

ODESSA: Whatchu want me to do, Elliot, if I say I ain't got no fucking money, I ain't got no money.

JOHN: Hi, I'm John, nice to meet you.

YAZ: Yazmin.

ELLIOT: You one of Mom's rehab buddies?

JOHN: We know each other from work.

ELLIOT: You scrub toilets?

ODESSA (To John): I'm a practitioner of the custodial arts.

ELLIOT: Is she your sponsor?

JOHN (To Odessa): I thought this was going to be a private meeting.

ELLIOT: I'm her son.

JOHN (To Odessa): You must have been young.

ELLIOT: But I was raised by my Aunt Ginny and that particular aunt just died.

(To Odessa) So now, you got three hours to find some money to pay for one basket of flowers in the funeral of the woman who changed my pampers.

YAZ: We're all supposed to be helping out.

ODESSA: You both know I run out of minutes all the time. No one could be bothered to drive by and tell me face to face?

ELLIOT: Because you always bothered to drive by and say hello to Mami Ginny when you knew she was sick? Because you bothered to hit me up one time this week and say, "Elliot, I'm sorry your mom died."

ODESSA: You still got one mom alive.

ELLIOT: Really? You want to go there?

YAZ: The flower place needs the money today.

ODESSA: She was my sister and you are my son, too.

YAZ: Guys. Two hundred dollars by end of business day.

ODESSA: That's my rent.

ELLIOT: Then fifty.

ODESSA: I just spent fifty getting my phone back on.

ELLIOT: Ten dollars. For the woman who raised your son! Do we hear ten dollars? Going once!

ODESSA: I spent my last ten at the post office.

ELLIOT: Going twice!

(John goes into his wallet.)

JOHN: Here's fifty.

(They all look at him like he's crazy. He pulls out some more money.)

Two hundred?

(Elliot pushes the money back to John with one pointer finger, as if the bills might be contaminated.)

ELLIOT: No offense, I don't take money from users.

JOHN: I'm not . . . I think that was my cue.

ODESSA: Sit down. My son was just going.

ELLIOT: Did World's Best Mom here tell you about her daughter?

ODESSA: I'm about to throw this coffee in your fucking face.

YAZ: Come on, Elliot, I'll pay for the flowers.

(Elliot doesn't get up.)

ELLIOT: I looked at that chat room once. The woman I saw there? She's literally not the same person I know. (To John) Did she tell you how she became such a saint?

JOHN: We all have skeletons.

ELLIOT: Yeah well she's an archaeological dig. Did she tell you about her daughter?

ODESSA (Suddenly resigned): Go ahead, I ain't got no secrets.

YAZ (Getting up): Excuse me.

ELLIOT: Sit here and listen, Yaz. You were born with a silver spoon and you need to know how it was for me.

YAZ: I said I'd pay for the goddamn flowers so LET'S GO. NOW!

ELLIOT: My sister and I had the stomach flu, right? For a whole day we couldn't keep nothing down.

ODESSA: Three days . . . You were vomiting three days straight.

ELLIOT: Medicine, juice, anything we ate, it would come right back up. (To John) Your co-worker here took us to Children's Hospital.

ODESSA: Jefferson.

ELLIOT: It was wall-to-wall packed. Every kid in Philly had this bug. ERs were turning kids away. They gave us a flier about stomach flu and sent us home. Bright blue paper. Little cartoon diagrams. It said give your kids a spoonful of water every five minutes.

ODESSA: A teaspoon.

ELLIOT: A small enough amount that they can keep it down. Five minutes. Spoon. Five minutes. Spoon. I remember thinking, Wow, this is it. Family time. Quality time. Just the three of us. Because it was gentle, the way you said, "Open up." I opened my mouth, you put that little spoon of water into my mouth. That little bit of relief. And then I watched you do the same thing with my little sister. And I remember being like, “Wow, I love you, Mom. My moms is all right.” Five minutes. Spoon. Five minutes. Spoon. But you couldn’t stick to something simple like that. You couldn’t sit still like that. You had to have your thing. That’s where I stop remembering.

ODESSA: I left.

ELLIOT: A Department of Human Services report. That’s my memory. Six hours later a neighbor kicks in the door. Me and my sister are lying in a pile of laundry. My shorts was all messed up. And what I really don’t remember is my sister. Quote: “Female infant, approximately two years, pamper and tear ducts dry, likely cause of death, dehydration.” Cuz when you dehydrate you can’t form a single tear.

JOHN (To Elliot): I’m very sorry . . . (He puts some money on the table) For the coffee. (Exits)

ELLIOT: That’s some friend you got there.

(Pause.)

YAZ: Mary Lou. We can at least say her name out loud. Mary Lou. Mary Lou. (To Odessa) One time you came to babysit me, you brought Elliot and Mary Lou—she was still in pampers—and Mary Lou had this soda from 7-Eleven. She didn’t want to give me a sip. You yelled at her so bad, you totally cursed her out and I said, “You’re not supposed to yell at people like that!” And you said, “No, Yaz, let her cry. She’s gotta learn that ya’ll are cousins, ya’ll are flesh and blood, and we share everything. You hear me, Yaz? In this family we share everything.” You walked out of the room, came back from the kitchen with four straws in your hand, sat us down on the floor in a circle, pointed to me and said, “You first.” I sipped. “Elliot’s turn.” He sipped. “Mary Lou’s turn.” She sipped. Then you sipped. You made us do like that, taking turns, going around the circle, till the cup was empty.

(Odessa hands Elliot a key.)

ODESSA: The pawn shop closes at five. Go into my house. Take my computer. Pawn it. However much you get, put towards a few flowers, okay?

(Odessa exits.)

Scene Eight

Split scene: Odessa’s living room and the chat room.

Chutes&Ladders holds a phone.

ORANGUTAN: Did you hit the call button yet?

CHUTES&LADDERS: I’m working on it.

ORANGUTAN: Where are you? Are you at home?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Jeopardy!’s on mute.

ORANGUTAN: Dude, turn off the tube. This is serious. Did you even dial?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Yeah, yeah. (He does) All right, it’s ringing. What am I going to say?

ORANGUTAN: “Hi, Son, it’s Dad.”

CHUTES&LADDERS: Wendell. That’s his name. (Hangs up) No answer.

ORANGUTAN: As in, you hung up?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Yes. I hung up.

ORANGUTAN: Dude, way too quick!

CHUTES&LADDERS: What do you have, a stopwatch? Do you know the average time before someone answers a telephone?

ORANGUTAN: 3.2 rings.

CHUTES&LADDERS: According to . . .

ORANGUTAN: I don't reveal my sources.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Look, my son's a grown man with a good life.

ORANGUTAN: Quit moping and dial Wendell's number.

CHUTES&LADDERS: This Japan thing is cramping my style. Different networks, different time zones. No concurrent Jeopardy! watching.

ORANGUTAN: Deflection: nostalgia.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Humor me.

ORANGUTAN (Humoring him): How's my little Trebek⁶ doing?

CHUTES&LADDERS: He's had work done. Man looks younger than he did twenty years ago.

ORANGUTAN: Needle or knife?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Needle. His eyes are still in the right place.

ORANGUTAN: Well, it's working. Meow. Purrrrr. Any good categories?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Before and After.

ORANGUTAN: I love Before and After! But I'll go with . . . Quit Stalling for two hundred. (She hums the Jeopardy! theme)

CHUTES&LADDERS: It's ringing.

ORANGUTAN: My stopwatch is running.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Still ringing.

ORANGUTAN: You're going to be great.

CHUTES&LADDERS: It rang again.

ORANGUTAN: You're a brave soul.

(We hear a man's voice at the other end of the line say, "Hello?" Chutes&Ladders hangs up.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: He must not be around.

ORANGUTAN: Leave a voice mail.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Maybe next time.

(Chutes&Ladders logs off.)

ORANGUTAN: Hey! Don't log off, come on. Chutes&Ladders. Whatever happened to tough love? Log back on, we'll do a crossword. You can't fly before "Final Jeopardy!" Sigh. Anyone else online? Haikumom? I'm still waiting for that daily poem . . . Bueller? Bueller?

(In Odessa's living room, Elliot and Yaz enter.)

YAZ: Wow, look at that computer. Stone age.

ELLIOT: Fred Flinstone shit.

YAZ: Positively Dr. Who.⁷

6. Alex Trebek (b. 1940), host of the television game show Jeopardy! since 1984.

7. British science-fiction television program (1963–present), a cult classic known for its cheesy props and special effects.

ELLIOT: Dr. Who?

YAZ: That computer is actually worse than what they give the adjuncts⁸ at Swarthmore.

ELLIOT: What does “adjunct” even mean?

YAZ: Exactly. It’s the nicest thing she owns.

ELLIOT: Let’s not act like this is some heroic sacrifice. Like this makes her the world’s martyr.

YAZ: We’re not going to get more than fifteen bucks for it.

ELLIOT: Symbols matter, Yaz. This isn’t about the money. This is shaking hands.

This is tipping your hat. This is holding the door open. This is the bare minimum, the least effort possible to earn the label “person.” (Looks at the screen)

What do you think her password is? (Types) “Odessa.” Nope. “Odessaortiz.” Nope.

YAZ: It’s probably Elliot.

(He types. Haikumom’s log-on appears.)

ELLIOT: The irony.

YAZ: I think legally that might be like breaking and entering.

ELLIOT (Typing): Hello? Oh shit it posted.

ORANGUTAN: Haikumom! Hit me with those seventeen syllables, baby!

YAZ: Haikumom? What the hell is that?

ELLIOT: Her username. She has the whole world thinking she’s some Chinese prophet.

YAZ: Haiku are Japanese.

ELLIOT: “Haiku are Japanese.” (Typing) Hello, Orangutan. How are you?

ORANGUTAN (Formal): I am fine. How are you?

ELLIOT (Typing): So, I guess you like monkeys, huh?

ORANGUTAN: An orangutan is a primate.

YAZ: Elliot.

ELLIOT: Chill.

ORANGUTAN: And this primate has ninety-eight days. That deserves a poem, don’t you think?

ELLIOT (Typing): I don’t have a poem, but I have a question. What does crack feel like?

ORANGUTAN: What?

YAZ: Elliot, cut it out.

ELLIOT (Typing): Sometimes I’m amazed I don’t know firsthand.

ORANGUTAN: Who is this?

ELLIOT (Typing): How does it make your brain feel?

ORANGUTAN: Like it’s flooded with dopamine.⁹ Listen, cyber-stalker, if you came here for shits and giggles, we are a sadly unfunny bunch.

ELLIOT (Typing): Are you just a smoker or do you inject it right into your eyeballs?

ORANGUTAN: Who the fuck is this?

ELLIOT (Typing): Haikumom.

8. College instructors hired on a temporary and usually part-time basis as opposed to permanent, tenure-track faculty.

9. A primary neurotransmitter (a chemical used to send signals between nerve cells), affecting motor function, emotions, learning, and behavior, associated especially with pleasure.

ORANGUTAN: Bullshit, you didn't censor me. Quit screwing around, hacker, who are you?

YAZ: You think Ginny would want you acting this way?

ELLIOT: I think Mami Ginny would want Mami Odessa to pay for a single flower on her fucking casket.

YAZ (Types): This is not Haikumom. It's her son.

ORANGUTAN: Well, if you're looking for the friends and family thread, you have to go to the home page and create a new log-on. This particular forum is for people actually in recovery. Wait, her son the actor? From the Crest ad?

ELLIOT (Typing): Colgate.

ORANGUTAN: "Sonrisa baby!" I saw that on YouTube! Your teeth are insanely white. Ever worked in Hollywood?

ELLIOT (Typing): Psh. I just had this guy begging me to do a feature film. Gritty, documentary-style, about Marines in Iraq. I just don't want to do anything cheesy.

ORANGUTAN: So you're the war hero . . .

ELLIOT (Typing): Haikumom brags.

ORANGUTAN: How's your recovery going? (No answer) This is the crack forum, but there's a really good pain-meds forum on this site, too. Link here.

YAZ: What is she talking about?

ORANGUTAN: There's a few war vets on that forum, just like you. You'd be in good company.

YAZ: Pain meds? Elliot? (He doesn't respond. Yaz types) What are you talking about?

ORANGUTAN: Haikumom told us about your history.

YAZ (Typing): What history?

ORANGUTAN: Sorry. Maybe she told us in confidence.

ELLIOT: Confidence? They call this shit "world wide" for a reason.

YAZ (Typing): I can search all the threads right now.

ORANGUTAN: That you had a bunch of leg surgeries in Iraq. That if a soldier said they hurt, the docs practically threw pills at them. That you OD'd three times and were in the hospital for it. She was real messed up about it. I guess she had hoped the fruit would fall a little farther from the tree.

YAZ (To Elliot): Is this true?

ELLIOT: I wasn't a soldier. I was a Marine. Soldiers is the army.

YAZ: Oh my god.

ELLIOT (Takes the keyboard, types): What I am: sober. What I am not and never will be: a pathetic junkie like you.

(He unplugs the computer. He throws the keyboard on the ground. He starts unplugging cables violently.)

YAZ: Hold on. Just stop it, Elliot! Stop it!

ELLIOT: The one time I ever reached out to her for anything and she made me a story on a website.

YAZ: Why wouldn't you ask me for help? Why would you deal with that alone?

ELLIOT: The opposite of alone. I seen barracks that looked like dope houses. It was four months in my life, it's over. We've chopped up a lot of shit together, Yaz, but we ain't gonna chop this up. This shit stays in the vault. You got me?

YAZ: No!

ELLIOT: Yaz. (He looks her straight in the eye) Please. Please.

YAZ: I want to grab the sky and smash it into pieces. Are you clean?

ELLIOT: The only thing I got left from those days is the nightmares. That's when he came, and some days I swear he ain't never gonna leave.

YAZ: Who?

(Elliot tries to walk away from the conversation, but the Ghost is there, blocking his path.)

Who?!

ELLIOT (Almost like a child): Please, Yaz. Please end this conversation. Don't make me beg, Yaz.

YAZ: The pawn shop closes in fifteen minutes. I'll get the monitor, you grab the computer.

Scene Nine

Chutes&Ladders is at work, on his desk phone. A bundled pile of mail is on his desk. He takes off the rubber band, browses. Junk, mostly.

CHUTES&LADDERS (Into the work phone): That's right. Three Ws. Dot. Not the word, the punctuation mark. I-R-S. Not "F" like flamingo; "S" like Sam. Dot. Yup, another one. Gov. Grover orange victor.

(Orangutan appears, online.)

ORANGUTAN: I'm doing it. I'm almost there. And I can chat! Japan is so advanced. Internet cafes are like parking meters here.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Where are you and what are you doing?

ORANGUTAN: Sapporo train station. Just did some research. Get this: in the early eighties, they straightened all the rivers in Hokkaido.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Why?

ORANGUTAN: To create jobs the government straightened the rivers! Huge bodies of water, manual laborers, scientists, engineers, bulldozers, and the rivers became straight! How nuts is that?

CHUTES&LADDERS: People can't leave good enough alone. Why are humans so damn restless?

ORANGUTAN: It's not restlessness. It's ego. Massive, bizarre ego.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Can't let a river be a river. (Into the phone) The forms link is on the left.

ORANGUTAN: Now it's the aughts, people keep being born, jobs still need creating, but there's no curves left to straighten, so, drum roll, the government is beginning a new program to put all the original turns back in the rivers!

CHUTES&LADDERS: Well good luck to them, but no amount of engineering can put a wrinkle back in Nicole Kidman's¹ forehead.

ORANGUTAN: Ever heard of Kushiro?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Is that your new boyfriend's name?

1. Australian actress (b. 1967) whose adventures in plastic surgery have been the stuff of tabloid rumor since at least 2008.

ORANGUTAN: Ha. Ha ha ha. It's home of the hundred-mile-long Kushiro River, which is the pilot project, the first river they're trying to recurve.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Kushiro River. Got it. Burned in the brain. One day I'll win a Trivial Pursuit's² wedge with that. (Into the phone) You, too, ma'am. (He hangs up)

ORANGUTAN: My train to Kushiro leaves in twenty minutes. My heart is pounding.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I don't follow.

ORANGUTAN: Kushiro is the town where I was born. I'm going. I'm doing it.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Hold on, now you're throwing curveballs.

ORANGUTAN: In my hand is a sheet of paper. On the paper is the address of the house where my birth parents once lived. I'm going to knock on their door.

(Chutes&Ladder's desk phone rings.)

CHUTES&LADDERS (Into the phone): Help desk, please hold. (To Orangutan) How long have you had that address for?

ORANGUTAN: It's been burning a hole in my pocket for two days. I hounded my mom before I left Maine. She finally wrote down the name of the adoption agency. The first clue, the first evidence of who I was I ever had. I made a vow to myself, if I could stay sober for three months, I would track my parents down. So a few days ago class ended early, I went to the agency, showed my passport, and thirty minutes later I had an address on a piece of paper. Ask me anything about Kushiro. All I've done the last two days is research it. I'm an expert. Population, 190,000. There's a tech school, there's an airport.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Why are you telling me this? To get my blessing?

ORANGUTAN: I tell you about the things I do.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You don't want my opinion, you want my approval.

ORANGUTAN: Hand it over.

CHUTES&LADDERS: No.

ORANGUTAN: Don't get monosyllabic.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Take that piece of paper and use it as kindling for a warm winter fire.

ORANGUTAN: Jeez, what did they slip into your Wheaties this morning?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Do a ritual burning and never look back. You have three months. Do you know the worth in gold of three months? Don't give yourself a reason to go back to the shadows.

ORANGUTAN: I'm in recovery. I have no illusions about catharsis. I realize what will most likely happen is nothing. Maybe something tiny. A microscopic butterfly flapping her microscopic wings.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Live in the past, follow your ass.

ORANGUTAN: Don't you have the slightest ambition?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Yes, and I achieve it every day: Don't use and don't hurt anyone. Two things I used to do on a daily basis. I don't do them anymore. Done. Dream realized. No more dreaming.

(His phone rings again.)

2. Board game in which players win wedge-shaped game pieces by correctly answering trivia questions.

(Into the phone) Continue holding, please.

ORANGUTAN: When was the last time you went out on a limb?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Three odd weeks ago.

ORANGUTAN: Did you try hazelnut instead of french roast? Did you listen to Soul Mornings instead of NPR?³

CHUTES&LADDERS: There's a new secretary down the hall, she's got a nice smile. I decided to go say hello. We had a little back and forth. I said, let's have lunch, she said maybe but meant no, I turned away, looked down and my tie was floating in my coffee cup.

ORANGUTAN: I waited three months to tell you this, every step of the way, the train ride, what the river looks like. What their front door looks like. (Pause) I'm quitting this site. I hate this site. I fucking hate this site.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You're already losing it and you haven't even gotten on the train.

ORANGUTAN: Three days ago I suggested you and I meet face to face and you blew a fucking gasket.

CHUTES&LADDERS: That's what this is about?

ORANGUTAN: Don't flatter yourself. This is about me wanting relationships. With humans, not ones and zeroes. So we were once junkies. It's superficial. It's not real friendship.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I beg to differ.

ORANGUTAN: Prove me wrong.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Search down that address and a hundred bucks says your heart comes back a shattered light bulb.

ORANGUTAN: You mean, gasp, I'll actually FEEL something?

CHUTES&LADDERS: What are you going to do if the address is wrong? What if the building's been bulldozed? What if some new tenant lives there? What if the woman who gave you birth then gave you away answers the door?

ORANGUTAN: I DON'T KNOW! A concept you clearly avoid at all costs. Learn how to live, that's all I'm goddamn trying to do!

(His phone rings. He picks up the receiver and hangs it up.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: I have three grandsons. You know how I know that? Because I rang my son's doorbell one day. Step 9,⁴ make amends. And his wife answered, and I don't blame her for hating me. But I saw three little boys in that living room and one of those boys said, "Daddy, who's that man at the door?" And my son said to my grandson, "I don't know. He must be lost." My son came outside, closed the door behind him, exchanged a few cordial words and then asked me to go.

ORANGUTAN: So I shouldn't even try.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I had five years sober until that day.

ORANGUTAN: You really believe in your heart of hearts I should not even try. (Pause) Coward.

(His phone rings. He unplugs the phone line.)

3. National Public Radio (acronym).

4. In the twelve-step addiction-recovery program first pioneered by Alcoholics Anonymous. In their original form, steps 8 and 9 read, "Made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all" and "Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others."

CHUTES&LADDERS: You think it's easy being your friend?

ORANGUTAN: Sissy. You walk the goddamn earth scared of your own shadow, getting smaller and smaller, until you disappear.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You tease me. You insult me. It's like breathing to you.

ORANGUTAN: You fucking idiot. Why do little girls tease little boys on the playground at recess? Why the fuck were cooties invented? You fucking imbecile!

CHUTES&LADDERS: You disappeared for three months. I couldn't sleep for three months!

ORANGUTAN: I wanted to impress you. I wanted to log on and show you I could be better. And I was an idiot because you're just looking for cowards like you. I'm logging off. This is it. It's over.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Orangutan.

ORANGUTAN: Into the abyss I climb, looking for a flesh-and-blood hand to grasp onto.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Little monkey, stop it.

ORANGUTAN: I'm in the station. My train is in five minutes, you gave me all the motivational speech I need, I'm going to the platform, I'm getting on the train, I'm going to see the house where I was born.

CHUTES&LADDERS: "To Chutes&Ladders Wilkie." "From Haikumom Ortiz."

(He rips it open, pulls out a deflated orange water wing, puts it over his hand.)

Scene Ten

Split scene. Lights rise on a church. Elliot and Yaz stand at the lectern.

YAZ: It is time to honor a woman.⁵

ELLIOT: A woman who built her community with a hammer and nails.

YAZ: A woman who knew her nation's history. Its African roots. European roots.

Indigenous roots. A woman who refused to be enslaved but lived to serve.

ELLIOT: A carpenter, a nurse, a comedian, a cook.

YAZ: Eugenia Ortiz.

ELLIOT: Mami Ginny.

(Lights rise on Odessa's house. She sits on her floor. She scoops a spoonful of water from a mug, pours it onto the floor in a slow ribbon.)

YAZ: She grew vegetables in her garden lot and left the gate open so anyone could walk in and pick dinner off the vine.

ELLIOT: She drank beer and told dirty jokes and even the never-crack-a-smile church ladies would be rolling laughing.

5. This eulogy is inspired by and owes much debt to Roger Zepernick's eulogy for Eugenia Burgos [Hudes's note]. Zepernick is an ordained Lutheran minister and onetime director of Centro Pedro Claver, a North Philadelphia social services organization. Eugenia "Jinny" Perez Burgos—Hudes's maternal aunt and a North Philadelphia neighborhood activist and city administrator—died of bone cancer in 2009 at age fifty-nine; obituaries credit her with raising two sons, Shawn Ortiz and Elliot Ruiz.

YAZ: She told me every time I visited, “Yaz, you’re going to Juilliard.”⁶

ELLIOT: Every morning when I left for school, “Elliot, nobody can make you invisible but you.”

LOUDSPEAKER (An announcement in Japanese): 3:00 express to Kushiro now boarding on track one. Please have tickets out and ready for inspection.

YAZ: Zero.

ELLIOT: Birth children.

YAZ: One.

ELLIOT: Adopted son.

(Odessa pours another spoonful of water on the floor. Again, it creates a slow ribbon.)

YAZ: Three.

ELLIOT: Years in the army nurse corps.

YAZ: Three.

ELLIOT: Arrests for civil disobedience. I was in Iraq and she was demonstrating for peace.

YAZ: Forty-seven.

ELLIOT: Wheelchair ramps she installed in homes with disabled children or elderly.

(Odessa pours another spoonful of water on the floor. A small pool is forming.)

YAZ: Twelve.

ELLIOT: Abandoned lots she turned into city-recognized public gardens.

(Another spoonful.)

YAZ: Twenty-two.

ELLIOT: Godchildren recognized by this church.

(Another spoonful.)

YAZ: One hundred and thirty.

ELLIOT: Abandoned homes she refurbished and sold to young families.

LOUDSPEAKER (Another announcement in Japanese): Final boarding call, 3:00 express to Kushiro, track one.

(Orangutan is still on the platform. She seems frozen, like she cannot move.)

YAZ: All while having a fresh pot of rice and beans on the stove every night. For any hungry stranger. And the pilgrims stopped. And they planted roots, because she was here. We are the living, breathing proof.

ELLIOT: I am the . . . Excuse me.

(He exits.)

YAZ: Elliot is the standing, walking testimony to a life. She. Was. Here.

(Odessa turns the cup upside down. It is empty.)

6. Elite performing arts conservatory (founded 1905) housed in New York City’s Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts.

Scene Eleven

Chutes&Ladders at his desk. In front of him: an inflated orange water wing.

CHUTES&LADDERS (On the phone): Yeah, it's a 1995 Tercel. Midnight blue. It's got a few miles. A hundred and twenty thousand. But like I said, I'll give it to you for three hundred below Kelley Blue Book. Yup, automatic. Just got new brake pads. Cassette deck, mint condition. I'll even throw in a few tapes. Tina Turner and Lionel Richie.⁷ Oh, hold on, call-waiting.

(He presses mute. Sings to himself:)

A tisket, a tasket.
A green and yellow basket.
I bought a basket for my mommy.
On the way I dropped it.
Was it red? No no no no!
Was it brown? No no no no!⁸

(Back into the phone) Sorry about that. I got someone else interested. No, it's all right, I have them on hold. You need to see this thing tonight if you're serious. I put this listing up thirty minutes ago, my phone is ringing off the hook. 6:30? Hey I didn't mention. Little lady has racing stripes.

Scene Twelve

Split scene. Lights rise on the Sapporo train station, same as before. Orangutan has laid down on the platform and fallen asleep, her backpack like a pillow.

Lights rise on Odessa's house, that night. Her phone rings. We hear loud knocking.

ELLIOT (Offstage): Mami Odessa! Open the door!

(More ringing.)

(Offstage) Yo, Mom!

YAZ (Offstage): She's not there.

ELLIOT (Offstage): Can't you hear her phone ringing? Move out the way.

YAZ (Offstage): Be careful, your leg!

(A few kicks and the door bursts open. Yaz and Elliot enter, switch on the lights. Odessa is in a heap, motionless, on the floor. Yaz runs and holds Odessa in her arms.)

Oh shit. Odessa! Odessa! Wake up.

(Yaz slaps Odessa's face a few times.)

7. American pop singer-songwriter (b. 1949) popular in the 1980s. Tina Turner: singer-actress (b. 1939) widely known as "the Queen of Rock 'n' Roll"; first rocketing to fame in the 1960s (alongside husband Ike), she enjoyed a new wave of international success thanks to her comeback album, Private Dancer (1984).

8. Slightly mangled version of "A-Tisket, A-Tasket," a song first recorded in 1938 by jazz legend Ella Fitzgerald (1917–96), based on a traditional nursery rhyme.

Her pulse is racing.

*(Yaz opens her cell phone, dials.
Elliot finds a spoon on the floor.)*

ELLIOT: Oh no. Oh no you fucking didn't! MOM!!! Get up!

YAZ (Into the phone): Hi, I need an ambulance. I have someone unconscious here.

I think it's an overdose, crack cocaine. Yes, she has a pulse. 33 Ontario Street.

No, no seizures, she's just a lump. Well what should we do while we wait?

Okay. Yes. (She hangs up) They're on their way. Elevate her feet.

ELLIOT: Help me get her to the sofa. One, two, three.

(Elliot lifts her with Yaz's help. They struggle under her weight. In fact they lift the air. Odessa stands up, lucid, and watches the action: Elliot and Yaz struggling under her invisible weight.)

YAZ: Watch her head.

ELLIOT: Aw, fuck, my leg.

YAZ: Careful.

(They set "Odessa" on the sofa, while Odessa watches, unseen, calm.)

ODESSA: I must be in the terminal. Between flights. The layover.

YAZ: Oh god, not two in one day, please.

ELLIOT: She's been through this shit a million times. She's a survivor! WAKE UP! Call your mom. She'll get here before the ambulance.

(Yaz dials.)

ODESSA: I've been to the airport, one time. My dad flew here from Puerto Rico. First time I met him. We stood by the baggage claim, his flight was late, we waited forever. There was one single, lone suitcase, spinning around a carousel.

YAZ (To Elliot): Voice mail. (Into the phone) Mom? Call me back immediately, it's an emergency.

ELLIOT: Give me that. (Grabs the phone) Titi, Odessa fucking OD'd and she's dying on her living room floor and I can't take this anymore! COME GET US before I walk off and leave her on the sofa! (He hangs up)

YAZ: If you need to, go. No guilt. I got this.

ELLIOT: She's my mom. Can I be angry? Can you let me be angry?

YAZ: Why is this family plagued? (Elliot moves to go) Where are you going?

ELLIOT: To find something fragile.

(He exits. We hear something shatter.)

ODESSA: Everyone had cleared away from the carousel. Everyone had their bags. But this one was unclaimed. It could still be there for all I know. Spiraling. Spinning. Looking for an owner. Abandoned.

(In the Sapporo station, a Policeman enters with a bright, beaming flashlight and points it at Orangutan.)

In Odessa's house, a radiant white light suddenly pours in from above. Odessa looks up, is overwhelmed. It is beautiful. Yaz sees it.)

YAZ: Dear god, do you see that?

(Elliot enters. Watching Yaz, he looks up.)

ELLIOT (Not seeing it): What?

YAZ (To Odessa): It's okay, Odessa, go, go, we love you, I love you Titi,⁹ you are good, you are good. Oh my god, she's beautiful.

ELLIOT: What are you talking about?

YAZ: It's okay, it's okay. We love you Odessa.

POLICEMAN (In Japanese): Miss, miss, are you okay?

ORANGUTAN (Waking): English, please.

POLICEMAN: No sleeping on the floor.

ORANGUTAN (Getting up slowly): Sorry.

POLICEMAN: Are you sick?

ORANGUTAN: No.

POLICEMAN: Are you intoxicated?

ORANGUTAN: No. I'm very sorry. I just got tired. I'll go. I'm going.

POLICEMAN: Please, can I give you a hand?

ORANGUTAN: No. I got it.

(Orangutan exits. The Policeman turns off his flashlight, exits.)

The sound of an ambulance siren. Suddenly the white light disappears. Odessa crawls onto the couch and slips into Yaz's arms, where she's been all along.)

YAZ: Holy shit . . .

ELLIOT: What's happening, Yaz? What the fuck was that?

YAZ: You've got to forgive her, Elliot. You have to.

Scene Thirteen

The chat room.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Oh nagging wives? Orangutan? Hello? Earth to Orangutan. Come on, three days straight I been worrying about you. I have time-sensitive information. Ground control to Major Orangutan.¹

ORANGUTAN: Ta-da.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Where you been?

ORANGUTAN: Here. There. Morrissey and Nine Inch Nails² on loop.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Is that what the kids like these days?

ORANGUTAN (Rolls eyes): That was me rolling my eyes.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Guess what I did.

ORANGUTAN (Shrugs): That was me shrugging.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Guess.

ORANGUTAN: Guess what I didn't do?

9. Auntie (Spanish).

1. David Bowie's 1969 song "Space Oddity" includes the lines "Ground Control to Major Tom: your circuit's dead, there's something wrong."

2. American industrial rock band (founded 1988). Morrissey: English singer-songwriter (b. 1959), vocalist of the influential rock band the Smiths (1982–87).

CHUTES&LADDERS: Meet your birth parents?

ORANGUTAN: Board the train.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Sorry.

ORANGUTAN: Don't apologize. You had my number.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Guess what I did.

ORANGUTAN: Told me so. Had my shit pegged.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I sold my Tercel. My plane lands in Narita Airport a week from this Wednesday.

ORANGUTAN: What?

CHUTES&LADDERS: American Airlines Flight 3312. Arriving 10:01 A.M.

ORANGUTAN: You're a dumbass. Tokyo? Do you have any idea how far that is from Hokkaido? And how much a ticket on the train costs? Oy, and how the hell am I going to get out of teaching that day? Oh, you dollface, you ducky!

CHUTES&LADDERS: I'll be wearing a jean jacket and a Padres cap. That's how you'll know me.

ORANGUTAN: Oh Chutes&Ladders. You old bag of bones, you! You old so-and-so, you mensch,³ you human being! Why the hell didn't you tell me?

CHUTES&LADDERS: I'm just hoping I have the guts to get on the plane.

ORANGUTAN: Of course you're getting on that damn plane! For me you did this?

(Fountainhead logs on.)

FOUNTAINHEAD: Hey everyone. I managed to find one computer here at the hospital that works. Odessa asked me to post a message on her behalf. She landed on: "Go." Hit reset on the timer. Back to day one.

ORANGUTAN: Who's Odessa?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Sorry. Haikumom.

ORANGUTAN: What? Do you log on here just to mock us?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Hold on, is she okay?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Cardiac arrest. They said she was one hair from a coma. She hadn't used in six years and her system went nuts.

CHUTES&LADDERS: So she's alive?

FOUNTAINHEAD: And just barely ticking. Tubes in and out of her nose. She's responsive, she mumbled a few words.

ORANGUTAN: You can't be serious.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Why are you there? Were you using with her?

FOUNTAINHEAD: No.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Did you sell her the stuff?

FOUNTAINHEAD: No, Jesus, of course not. She gave them my number, I'm her emergency contact. Why, I have no idea, we're practically strangers. Getting here to the hospital, seeing her like that . . . I don't mean this as an insult, but she looked not human. Bones with skin covering. Mummy-like.

ORANGUTAN: Fuck. You.

FOUNTAINHEAD: I'm being descriptive. I'm being honest. The thought of my boys walking in on me like that. My wife finding me . . .

ORANGUTAN: That woman is the reason I'm. Oh god, you get complacent for one second! One second! You get comfortable for one minute! Fountainhead, go to the stats page. You'll see. There's thousands of members on this site. People she has saved, people she may yet save some day. I am one of them. You are one of them.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fountainhead, does she have family there? Has anyone come through her room?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Apparently a son and a niece but they had to catch a flight to San Juan.⁴

CHUTES&LADDERS: No parents? No other children? A friend? A neighbor?

FOUNTAINHEAD: None showed up.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fountainhead. You have a family, I absolutely understand that, and I mean zero disrespect when I say, when I beg of you this: your job on this earth has just changed. It is not to stay clean. It's not to be a husband or a father or a CEO. It's to stay by that woman's side. Make sure she gets home safe. Bathe her. Feed her. Get her checked into a rehab, inpatient. Do not leave her side for a second. Can you do this?

FOUNTAINHEAD: I have one day clean. I'm not meant to be a saint.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Tell me now, swear on your mother's name, otherwise I'm on the first flight to Philadelphia.

FOUNTAINHEAD: I don't know.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Look man, do you believe in God?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Sure, along with unicorns and the boogeyman.

CHUTES&LADDERS: How about miracles?

FOUNTAINHEAD: When the Phils are winning.

CHUTES&LADDERS: How about actions? I bet you believe in those.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Yeah.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Your lifeboat has just arrived. Get on board or get out of the way.

FOUNTAINHEAD: I'll take care of Odessa. You have my word. My solemn word.

(Pause) She did manage to say one thing: Someone has to take over site admin. She doesn't want the chat room full of curse words.

FREEDOM&NOISE: I'm good with computers. I'll throw my hat in the ring.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Freedom&Noise, are you new here?

FREEDOM&NOISE: Yes. Very.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Freedom&Noise, email me offline. Link attached. I gotta go.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You gave us your word. Don't be a stranger.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Hi, honey, sorry I haven't called sooner. Something came up.

Listen, I'm not coming home tonight, just order in. I have a friend who got sick, she's having an emergency. No, it's not a romantic friend. I will tell you about it. When I get home. When I— Honey? Honey . . .

Puerto Rico. A hotel room. Yaz is online.

FREEDOM&NOISE: Hello, I am Freedom&Noise, your interim site manager, currently logging on from the Rainforest B&B in Puerto Rico. I am not a user, I’ve smoked pot twice, both times when I was thirteen, and am therefore unqualified for this position. There was a young woman I once knew. Let’s call her “O.” My crazy aunt, a fun babysitter, the baddest hide-and-seek player north of Girard Avenue. We played dress-up, built booby traps and forts, and when I was eight, she disappeared. No explanation, no acknowledgment she had ever existed, the grown-ups in the family had taken a vow of silence, and O. had been erased. My freshman year at college, I returned home for Thanksgiving, and thanks to a snow delay I walked into the middle of turkey dinner itself, and there was O., a plate full of food, chowing down. I hadn’t seen her in ten years. After dinner she told me to congratulate her, it was her anniversary. I said, “Did you get married?” She pulled a necklace out from under her shirt and said, “You know what these gold letters mean? The ‘N’ is for narcotics, the ‘A’ is for anonymous and today is my two-year anniversary of being clean.” (Pause) A few days ago I met a new woman: Haikumom. A woman who created a living, breathing ecosystem, and since I’ve never sown a single seed, let alone planted a garden, the least I can do is censor you, fix glitches—and one other thing . . . Formulating first line. Did Haikumom really do these on the fly? Five-seven-five, right? (Counting the syllables on her fingers) Box full of ashes . . .

(Elliot enters from the bathroom, freshly showered, pulling on a shirt)

ELLIOT: Whatchu looking at, Willis?⁵

YAZ: Sh. I’m counting syllables.

(Elliot looks over Yaz’s shoulder at the computer.)

ELLIOT: Hold up. Don’t read that shit, Yaz.

YAZ: You know how Odessa got into haiku in the first place?

ELLIOT: For real, close the computer.

YAZ: I went through this Japanese minimalist phase freshman year. Rock Gardens, Zen Buddhism, the works. I gave her a haiku collection for Christmas.

ELLIOT: Yeah, and you gave me a midget tree that died by New Year’s.

YAZ: Bonsai. You didn’t water it.

ELLIOT (Closing Yaz’s laptop): For the two days I’m away from Philly, let me be away from Philly?

YAZ: You know where I was gonna be by thirty? Two kids. Equal-housework marriage. Tenure, no question. Waaaay tenured, like by the age of twenty-four.

5. Play on “Whatchu talkin’ about, Willis?” catchphrase of a character (played by diminutive actor Gary Coleman [1968–2010]) on the popular 1980s American sitcom Diff’rent Strokes.

Carnegie Hall debuts: Yazmin Ortiz’s “Oratorio for Electric Guitar and Children’s Choir.” I wrote a list on a piece of paper and dug a hole in Fairmount Park and put it in the ground and said, “When I turn thirty, I’ll dig it up and cross it all off.” And I promise you I’ll never have the courage to go to that spot with a shovel and face my list full of crumbs, decoys and bandaids.

ELLIOT: Married with kids, what an awful goal.

YAZ: Odessa’s done things.

ELLIOT: Well, when you throw her a parade, don’t expect me to come.

YAZ: You’ve done things.

ELLIOT: I wouldn’t come to my own parade, either.

YAZ: Ginny did things. What have I done?

ELLIOT: Second-grade Language Arts. You glued my book report.

YAZ: I couldn’t stop your leg from getting chewed up.

ELLIOT: Fairmount little league basketball. You kept score, you brought our equipment.

YAZ: I didn’t hold your hand when you were in the desert popping pills trying to make yourself disappear. I didn’t keep Odessa away from that needle. I didn’t water a single plant in Ginny’s garden. We’re in PR and I’m gonna dig a new hole and I’m not putting a wish or a list in there, I’m putting a scream in there. And I’m gonna sow it like the ugliest foulest and most necessary seed in the world and it’s going to bloom! This time it’s going to fucking bloom!

ELLIOT: My eyes just did this weird thing. For a second, it was Mom standing in front of me.

YAZ: Odessa?

ELLIOT: Ginny.

YAZ: Elliot, your birth mother saved your life by giving you away. Tell me I’m wrong.

(Elliot doesn’t respond. Yaz begins gathering her stuff hastily.)

Now we got some ashes to throw. El Yunque closes in an hour and a half.

ELLIOT: Maybe we should do this tomorrow.

YAZ: I gotta make a call. I’ll be in the lobby!

(She exits.)

ELLIOT: Yaz?

(The Ghost appears. He’s probably been there the whole time.)

Yaz!

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(The Ghost reaches out his hand to touch Elliot.)

Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(The second they make contact, Elliot spins on his heels and grabs the Ghost. The Ghost defends himself, pulling away. They start pushing, grabbing, fighting. The Ghost is looking for something—is it Elliot’s wallet?)

Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(The Ghost finds Elliot's wallet and tears through it, hurling its contents onto the floor. Elliot attacks again, but this time the Ghost reaches out his hand and touches Elliot's face. Elliot freezes, unable to move, as the Ghost's hands glide across his features, considering each one with authority, taking inventory.)

Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(The Ghost is gone. Elliot catches his breath, shaken. He reaches into his pocket and pulls out a bottle of pills. He puts one pill in his hand. Then he empties the entire bottle of pills into his hand. He stares at the pills, wanting to throw them away.)

Scene Fifteen

Split scene. Odessa's bathroom. The bathtub is filled with water. John enters, carrying a very weak Odessa. Odessa is wearing shorts and a bra, a modest outfit for bathing. John lowers her gently into the bathtub.

JOHN: Does that feel okay?

(Odessa barely nods.)

It's not too hot or cold?

(Odessa shakes her head.)

I don't know how to do this. These are things women do. Take care of sick people. Make the wounds go away.

(He takes a sponge and starts to bathe her.)

Is this okay?

(He lifts her arms and washes her armpits. Embarrassed at first, but quickly gets the swing of it.)

We check you in at 4:30 so we have plenty of time to clean you up and get you in good clothes, okay? You'll go in there looking like a decent woman.

(Odessa whispers something inaudible.)

What was that?

(She gestures for him to lean in. She whispers into his ear.)

One more time.

(She whispers a little louder.)

Did someone take swimming lessons?

(She whispers again.)

Did someone put on water wings?

(She nods. He continues to bathe her, gently, in silence as:

Lights rise on Tokyo. Narita Airport. Orangutan sits on the floor by the luggage carousel. At her feet is a sign that says Chutes&Ladders. She throws the sign like a frisbee across the floor and gets up to leave. Chutes&Ladders enters, rolling a suitcase behind him. He waves to Orangutan.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: Orangutan?

ORANGUTAN: What the holy hell?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Sorry. Sorry. I tried calling but my cell doesn't work here. I told you I'm no good at this fancy kind of living.

ORANGUTAN: You were supposed to land yesterday, you were too scared to get on the plane. You rebook, you were supposed to land today, forty-five minutes ago. Everyone got their luggage already. The last person pulled the last suitcase from the carousel half an hour ago. I thought, Wow, this one sure knows how to play a joke on the ladies. I thought you had left me at the fucking altar.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I got sick on the flight. Totally embarrassing. I had a panic attack as the plane landed and I started tossing into the doggy bag right next to this nice old lady. I've been sitting on the bathroom floor emptying my stomach. Then I had to find a toothbrush and toothpaste and mouthwash because I didn't want to greet you with bad breath and all.

(She looks skeptical. She sniffs his mouth quickly.)

ORANGUTAN: Minty. (Pause) Oh, you dummy, you big old dummy. COME HERE, you San Diego Padre.

(They hug. A warm and brief greeting.)

What's your name?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Clay. Clayton "Buddy" Wilkie.

ORANGUTAN: I'm Madeleine Mays.

CHUTES&LADDERS: It's weird, huh?

ORANGUTAN: Totally weird. The land of the living.

(They hug. They melt into each other's arms. A hug of basic survival and necessary friendship. Then, they exit, rolling Chutes&Ladders's suitcase off as lights rise in:

Puerto Rico. A rock outcropping looking out over a waterfall. Elliot is there, looking down at the water.)

ELLIOT (Looking down): Oh shit! Yaz, you gotta see this! Yaz? Fucking Johnny Appleseed of El Yunque.

(Yaz enters holding a soil-covered flower bulb. She compares the root against a field book.)

YAZ: I found my spiral ginger! This is going right next to the aloe by the kitchen door, baby!

ELLIOT: Yo, this science experiment ain't getting past security.

YAZ: Experiment my ass. I'm planting these in Ginny's garden.

ELLIOT: Customs gonna sniff that shit from a mile away.

YAZ (Putting the bulb in a ziploc baggie full of dirt and bulbs): China rose . . . Sea grape . . . Some kind of fern . . .

ELLIOT: When they cuff those wrists, I don't know you.

YAZ: I'll hide them in my tampon box.

ELLIOT: That don't work. My first trip to PR, Mami Ginny smuggled a coqui⁶ back with her kotex and got arrested. Front page of the Daily News.

YAZ: Good shit. (A dirty little secret) You know what Grandma did?

ELLIOT: Do I want to?

YAZ: She used to smuggle stuff back, too. She'd tuck it below her boobs. She had storage space under there!

ELLIOT: Yeah after she was sixty and had nursed seven kids. Yo you think if I jumped off this rock right now and dove into that water, I'd survive?

YAZ: Just watch out for the huge boulders and the footbridge.

ELLIOT: It's tempting. That spray. (His phone beeps) Reception in the rainforest.

YAZ: Kind of ruins the romance.

ELLIOT (Reads a text message): Damn, that was fast.

YAZ: What?

ELLIOT: Pop sold the house. Did he even put out a listing?

YAZ: Not that I know of.

ELLIOT: That's like a VW bus going from zero to sixty in three seconds. Don't make no sense.

YAZ: Must have been an inside job.

ELLIOT: I guess so.

YAZ: A way way inside job . . .

ELLIOT: Yaz . . .

YAZ (Conspiratorially): Yeeees?

ELLIOT: What did you do?

YAZ (Very conspiratorially): Nothing . . .

ELLIOT: Holy shit!

YAZ: Put my Steinway⁷ on craigslist. Got four responses before you made it down to the lobby. My eighty-eight keys are worth more than Ginny's whole house. Sadly. I'll buy an upright.

ELLIOT: You are one crazy motherfucking adjunct! Yo, I don't know if el barrio is ready for you. I don't know if they can handle you!

YAZ: Oh, they gonna handle me.

ELLIOT: Wait wait wait. You need a title.

YAZ: Yaz will do just fine.

ELLIOT: Hells no. Command respect. I step on those corners, I'm Big El. (Pause) "Professor."

YAZ: "Professor."

ELLIOT: You like that, huh?

YAZ: It'll be the Cousins House. We'll renovate the kitchen. You redo the plumbing, I'll hook up a little tile backsplash.

ELLIOT: I watched Bob Vila⁸ with Pop, but I ain't no handyman.

YAZ: Just wait, Mr. Home Depot. You're gonna be like, "Fuacata,⁹ fuacata, fuacata," with your power drill and nail gun and vise grips.

9. Onomatopoeic interjection akin to "Wham!" or "Bam!" (Cuban Spanish).

ELLIOT: Something like that.

YAZ: Well? Get to it. Toss 'em.

ELLIOT: Me? Why the hell do you think I let you come along?

(He hands Yaz the box.)

YAZ: Well then say something. Pray.

ELLIOT: I'm all out of prayers.

YAZ: Me, too. Make a toast.

ELLIOT: To LAX. I'm not flying back with you.

YAZ: What do you mean?

ELLIOT: I called from the hotel and changed my flight. One-way ticket. Watch out, Hollywood. (Pause) You know how you had to shake me awake last night?

YAZ (Demeanor shifting): You were literally sobbing in your sleep.

ELLIOT: This dream was different than usual. I'm fixing a Subway hoagie, I feel eyes on the back of my neck, I turn around and expect to see him, the first guy I shot down in Iraq. But instead it's Mami Ginny. Standing next to the bread oven, smiling. You know how her eyes smile?

YAZ: Best smile in the world.

ELLIOT: Looking at me, her son. Coming to say good-bye.

YAZ: That's beautiful.

ELLIOT: She puts on her glasses to see my face even better. She squints and something changes. The moment I come into focus, her eyes widen. Her jaw drops, she starts trembling. Then she starts to cry. Something she's seeing scares her. Then she starts to scream. Loud, like, "Ahhh! Ahhh!" She won't stop looking at me, but she's terrified, horrified by what she sees. And I don't know if my lip is bleeding or there's a gash on my forehead or she's looking through my eyes and seeing straight into my fucking soul.

YAZ: Jesus.

ELLIOT: I wanted Mami Odessa to relapse, Yaz. I wanted her to pick up that needle. I knew precisely what to do, what buttons to push, I engineered that shit, I might as well have pushed the thing into her vein. Because I thought, Why would God take the good one? Yo, take the bad mom instead! I was like, Why wouldn't you take the bad fucking mom? If I stay in Philly, I'm gonna turn into it. I'm gonna become one of them. I'm already halfway there. You've got armor, you've got ideas, but I don't.

YAZ: Go. Go and don't you ever, ever look back.

(She takes his hand.)

But if you do, there will be a plastic-covered sofa waiting for you.

(Below them, in Philadelphia, John is done bathing Odessa. He lifts her and holds her like an angel above the bathtub. She is dripping wet and seems almost radiant, and yet deeply, deeply sick.)

I'm the elder now. I stay home. I hold down the fort.

ELLIOT: I'm walking.

YAZ: On three?

YAZ AND ELLIOT: One.

Two.

Three.

(They toss the ashes. Blackout.)

QUESTIONS

1. WATER BY THE SPOONFUL features many entirely fictional characters, situations, and events, including the online community created by “Haikumom” and the death of Elliot’s infant sister. Yet as the biographical headnote and textual footnotes suggest, the play was also inspired in part by real people and events: Hudes’s cousin Elliot Ruiz was raised by their aunt Ginny; she did die of cancer; he was wounded in Iraq; Odessa is based in part on a cousin who is a former drug addict; and so on. How, if at all, might this knowledge affect your response to the play and its characters?
2. How do the characters of Elliot and Yaz each develop over the course of the play? What role in that development is played by their experiences in both real and online worlds?
3. As readers or spectators of Hudes’s play, we first get to know Odessa via her online interactions, and throughout the play we see much more of these than does Elliott or Yaz. How does that affect how we view and feel about Odessa, Elliott, their individual and mutual conflicts? Why might Hudes have chosen to structure the play in this way?
4. How would you articulate the main theme of the play? Might it have to do with notions of family? with the ways we help and hurt others? with the process of trauma and recovery? something else entirely?
5. How might Yaz’s discussion of musical dissonance provide a language for articulating the play’s themes or describing its structure?
6. Especially in terms of conflict or theme, what role is played by Fountainhead, Chutes&Ladders, and Orangutan? How, if at all, might it matter that Fountainhead is the play’s only white or upper-middle-class character? that Chutes&Ladders and Orangutan end up meeting in the real world?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Though WATER BY THE SPOONFUL begins by alternating scenes set entirely in the real world with scenes set wholly in the virtual world, later scenes tend to be more complicated. Scene 10, for example, is a “split scene” that shifts among Ginny’s funeral, Odessa’s house, and a train station in Sapporo, Japan. Choose one of these “split scenes” and write an informal response paper about it. How do the various elements of the scene work together and perhaps comment on each other? How might the scene be staged so as to emphasize those connections without confusing the audience?
2. Write an essay exploring what WATER BY THE SPOONFUL seems to suggest about the power and limits of online selves and communities. What might the virtual world allow us to be and do that the real world doesn’t, and vice versa?
3. Write an essay exploring the water imagery in Hudes’s play. By its end, what various meanings might the phrase “water by the spoonful” accrue?
4. WATER BY THE SPOONFUL features a cast of characters who at first seem very different from each other in terms of their personalities, their backgrounds and situations in life, and their conflicts. Yet over the course of the play we and they arguably discover just how similar they are. Choose any two characters from the play, perhaps those that initially seem the most different or far removed from each other. Then write an essay comparing the characters and their development over the course of the play. What similarities emerge as the play progresses? To what extent and how do the characters themselves come to appreciate these similarities? What might the play ultimately say or show us through these characters?

5. Charles Isherwood, writing in the New York Times, describes WATER BY THE SPOONFUL's theme as having to do with “the myriad ways in which human lives can intersect, and the potentially great rewards—or irreparable damage—that can result from the unlikely spark of those connections.” Others instead describe the play as exploring the difficulty and importance of forgiving both ourselves and others; the idea “that no one is above reproach—or beyond redemption”; “the true meaning of family” (theatreworks.org); or the “life-affirming message” that “[p]eople instinctively take care of each other” and that “hitting bottom is the start of the trip back up” (Richard Zoglin, in Time). Write an essay defending and developing one of these claims.

Exploring Contexts

24 THE AUTHOR'S WORK AS CONTEXT: WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

When we read, we inevitably compare. We compare the writer's style to the styles of other writers; we compare characters within a story or play to one another and to people we know; we compare our life experiences to the many imaginary experiences that unfold before us as we read. Our interpretations of literature are fueled by such comparisons.

Reading several works by a single author is one of the most rewarding and enlightening types of comparison we can employ as active readers of literature. Such comparisons serve a variety of purposes: They help us develop a sense of the overall shape of the writer's work (that is, the writer's oeuvre, or canon); they reveal the kinds of characters, plots, and dramatic situations the author tends to create; they offer a glimpse into the author's particular way of looking at the world. At the same time, such comparisons can enrich our understanding of any one work by drawing our attention to features we might not have thought much about otherwise.

THE LIFE OF SHAKESPEARE: A BIOGRAPHICAL MYSTERY

This chapter offers you the opportunity to compare two plays by one of history's most vital and versatile playwrights: William Shakespeare. Shakespeare is a particularly enticing subject for this kind of comparative study in part because we know so little about him. While we can enhance our reading of many writers by studying the letters, essays, diaries, and other documents in which the writers comment directly on their lives and works, Shakespeare left behind no such record. The only records that exist are a handful of official ones—marriage licenses, property deeds, and wills.

William Shakespeare

Those records tell a brief story. Shakespeare's origins were humble: His grandfather, Richard, rented the land he farmed, near Stratford-upon-Avon, a market town in the English midlands. Richard's son, John, married the daughter of one of Richard's former landlords and moved to town. There he became a tradesman prosperous and respected enough to buy quite a bit of property and to hold several civic offices, including that of mayor. The family's star was on the rise by the time William was born (some time in April 1564). Though most likely neither of Shakespeare's parents could read or write (certainly they had no formal schooling), his father's involvement in city government brought with it the privilege of enrolling William in the local free grammar school. Here Shakespeare learned how to read and write, not only in English but also in Latin and perhaps Greek. His schoolmasters also probably required him to read such standard classical works as Ovid's Metamorphoses and the plays of Plautus and Terence (which greatly influenced the plays he would later write). In 1582, Shakespeare married Anne Hathaway, the daughter of a local farmer; in the next three years, the couple had three children, including a set of twins.

Shakespeare's birthplace

From the time of the twins' birth in 1585 until 1592, Shakespeare's life becomes—for us—a blank: All we know is that by the latter date he was a successful actor and playwright spending most of his time in London. (We know this, in part, because Shakespeare was prominent enough to be called an "upstart crow" in a book published by a rival playwright in 1592; apparently, this London-born, university-educated author felt a bit threatened by the undereducated provincial.) Though, in 1594, the "upstart crow" achieved a measure of renown as a poet by publishing two lengthy narrative poems (Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece), his career from this time until his death centered mainly on his work with the Lord Chamberlain's (later King's) Men—one of the two most prominent acting companies of his day. Shakespeare's work with the company was multifaceted: An actor with the troupe and its chief dramatist, he was also a shareholder who helped manage the troupe's affairs (including the building of the Globe Theatre, on the South Bank of the River Thames, in 1599). Being a shareholder ensured that he prospered along with the company (especially after they secured the patronage of the king in 1603). As a result, Shakespeare enjoyed a level of economic prosperity and a kind of status that wouldn't have been possible to a mere actor, playwright, or poet. The Crown granted Shakespeare's father (and thus the playwright) the title of "gentleman" in the late 1590s. And at his death in 1616, Shakespeare left his family substantial property in both London and Stratford (where the family had continued to live).

Model of the Globe Theater motives, his loves, his dislikes, his politics, his “philosophy.” These we can only infer, guess at, or imagine by reading and comparing his poems and plays. Luckily, Shakespeare left us a lot of these, including 154 sonnets (some of which are included in the poetry section of this book) and at least thirty-eight plays. Scholars believe Shakespeare cowrote at least one more play, and others may yet be discovered and authenticated.

Such facts remind us that Shakespeare was, after all, a real and in some ways rather ordinary person—who ultimately convinced audiences and rivals alike that he was more than an “upstart crow,” but who did not, as a recent biographer reminds us, “in his own day inspire the mysterious veneration that afterwards came to surround him.” These mundane facts tell us almost nothing, however, about the man’s or the artist’s inner life—his personal opinions, his

EXPLORING SHAKESPEARE’S WORK: A MIDSUMMER NIGHT’S DREAM AND HAMLET

Given that his plays include thirteen comedies, ten tragedies, ten English histories, and five romances, variety is a distinctive feature of Shakespeare’s work as a playwright. It is fitting, then, that the two plays included in this chapter—A MIDSUMMER NIGHT’S DREAM and HAMLET—seem, at first glance, so different. A Midsummer Night’s Dream, written in about 1595, is generally considered one of the last of Shakespeare’s “apprentice” plays—the work of a young writer just beginning to find his own voice and dramatic style, but still quite dependent on classical models. Though written only a few years later (c. 1599–1601), Hamlet is nonetheless regarded as one of the greatest works of a seasoned writer. Differences proliferate: Dream, a comedy, culminates in marriage (several marriages, in fact); Hamlet, a tragedy, concludes with the death and destruction of an entire royal family. Dream is among Shakespeare’s shortest plays; Hamlet, among his longest. Hamlet focuses squarely—almost relentlessly—on its title character, whom we leave the play feeling that we know inside and out. Dream, in contrast, flits among many characters. Though we may fall in love with some of them, we probably will not feel that we truly know any of them. (Indeed, part of the play’s humor comes from our having as hard a time as the characters themselves do remembering who is who and who loves whom.)

But while the plays have important and revealing differences, they have equally significant similarities, and by attending to these similarities we may come to understand and appreciate Shakespeare’s particular way of looking at the world. To begin with, we may approach such similarities (within these or any plays) by concentrating on the elements, looking for patterns in character, setting, structure, tone, and theme, remembering that these elements ultimately combine to shape our experience of any one play.

In thinking about character, for example, notice that both the protagonists and the antagonists of A Midsummer Night’s Dream and Hamlet are persons of high birth and position. These characters' choices and behavior deeply affect the communities that they lead. In fact, both plays repeatedly remind us of the general effects and communal significance of such characters' actions. Like all Shakespeare's plays, this comedy and tragedy both take for granted the idea that "on [a leader's] choice depends / The safety and health of th[e] whole state" (Hamlet 1.3.20–21), and both trace the effects of the particular choices made by kings, princes, and dukes.

Shakespeare and his contemporaries often compared the relationship between a king and his subjects to that between a father and his children or between a husband and his wife. For example, an early Shakespeare comedy, The Taming of the Shrew, concludes with a speech in which the tamed shrew declares, "Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper, / Thy head, thy sovereign." Building on this idea, she argues both that a woman's duty to her husband is the same "as the subject owes the prince" and that a woman who refuses to obey her husband is exactly like "a foul contending rebel / And graceless traitor." We can see similar analogies at work in A Midsummer Night's Dream and Hamlet: One begins with a duke and a father provoking a group of young Athenians to rebel against them; the other shows us a son who is also a prince struggling to choose the right response to the murder of a father who was also a king.

We pay attention to the effects of these high-born characters on their environments in part because Shakespeare's plays also include characters who occupy positions much lower on the social ladder than the main characters do. In addition to Titania, Oberon, Theseus, and Hippolyta (rulers of the divine and human realms), A Midsummer Night's Dream introduces us to the Athenian craftsmen (or "mechanicals") led by the fittingly named Bottom. And while Hamlet focuses predominantly on members of the Danish royal court, one of the most memorable scenes in the play features a lowly gravedigger and the skeletal remains of a court jester named Yorick. As a result, the two plays demonstrate Shakespeare's tendency to people his plays with a socially diverse cast of characters and to thereby create a socially inclusive dramatic world.

As inclusive as Shakespeare's dramatic world is, it is far from democratic (as the speech from The Taming of the Shrew suggests). As you read more plays by Shakespeare, you will probably become more attuned to the different ways in which they depict "high" and "low" characters. A Midsummer Night's Dream is typical, for example, in the way it associates socially low characters with low or physical comedy (as opposed to high or verbal comedy). Bottom, after all, wears an ass's head for much of the play. Yet Bottom is also typical of Shakespeare's socially humble characters because he possesses a kind of wisdom his social betters lack.

Despite the tendency to distinguish high from low, then, Shakespearean drama draws our attention to fundamental human experiences that cut across social lines. A Midsummer Night's Dream reminds us that a fairy queen is no more immune to love's magic or foolishness than the lowliest of mortals; Hamlet, that a king's life lasts no longer than a court jester's. The joys of love, the pain of death—these experiences link us and remind us of our common humanity.

Shakespeare suggests such links, in part, by structuring each play so that the main plot is complemented by parallel, yet often contrasting, subplots. A Midsummer Night's Dream offers at least four plots, each featuring a pair of lovers whose happiness is, or has been, threatened by their own failures to understand each other or by others' opposition to their relationship. Hamlet revolves around three intersecting, but distinct, plots featuring Hamlet, Laertes, and Fortinbras—

Titania and Bottom, from A Midsummer Night's Dream

three very different young men who must each figure out how to respond to, and perhaps avenge, his father's murder. In these, as in other Shakespeare plays, the secondary plots can be divided into underplots, which are romantic or parodic versions of the main plot, and overplots, which foreground its political dimensions. In A Midsummer Night's Dream, Bottom becomes the protagonist of the underplot, Theseus and Hippolyta (and, perhaps, Titania and Oberon) of the overplot(s). In Hamlet, the underplot focuses on Laertes; the overplot, on Fortinbras. However, all the subplots encourage us—and sometimes, as in Hamlet, the characters themselves—to compare the ways different people handle similar situations and thus to evaluate various choices and various responses. The parallel plots serve simultaneously as a structural device, a potent means of characterization, and a way of drawing our attention to general issues and themes.

Reading Hamlet and A Midsummer Night's Dream side by side may also help us appreciate the tonal complexity of Shakespeare's plays—their incorporation of both comic and tragic elements. While A Midsummer Night's Dream plunges us into a nighttime world dominated by the intertwining forces of magic, love, and humor, it also continually reminds us of the dangerous aspects of the night, of the struggles that human beings endure in their pursuit of love and happiness, of the brevity and fragility of human joy and life, even of what Hamlet calls the “thousand natural shocks / That flesh is heir to” (3.1.62–63). The specter of death hovers in the background of A Midsummer Night's Dream as surely as it occupies the foreground of Hamlet. And though Hamlet, like most tragedies, focuses primarily on mortality, violence, and time's destructive force, it also shows us the comic side of the human condition. In fact, one of the things that makes Hamlet such a sympathetic character is his sense of humor.

Turning from tone to theme, we find that both Hamlet and A Midsummer Night's Dream say something about the order of things and the rhythm of life. Although Hamlet ends with a body-strewn stage, the play encourages us to see those deaths as the necessary prelude to a restoration of order and health to a kingdom diseased and disordered as a result of a sovereign's choices. Claudius's crimes ultimately infect and poison everything and everyone, even innocent bystanders like Ophelia. Both to us and to Hamlet, Claudius's reign represents the triumph of humanity's worst impulses. By embracing his role as heaven's “scourge and minister” even at the risk of his own life (3.4.179–81), however, Hamlet reaffirms our faith in humanity's noblest qualities as he strives to set right all that is “rotten in the state of Denmark” (1.4.90). In A Midsummer Night's Dream, we again see the actions of a sovereign turn the world upside down: The young rebel against the old, women chase men, old friends turn on each other, an ass consorts with a queen. Clearly, the kinds of dissension and disorder at work in A Midsummer Night's Dream make us laugh, while those in Hamlet make us cringe or cry. Yet the rhythm of both plays turns out to be surprisingly similar, tracing the movement from disorder to order, from dissension to harmony. In the process, both plays ask us to think about the nature and causes of social, political, and moral disorder, of dissension within states and families.

As you read Hamlet and A Midsummer Night's Dream, you will discover many more parallels of theme, character, setting, and structure whose significance you will want to ponder and investigate. But you may also want to think about another, perhaps more elusive element:

language. Shakespeare is justly celebrated for his use of language, and we pay homage to it, unwittingly or not, every time we use any one of the many idiomatic expressions that originated in the plays. (If, for example, you conclude that Shakespeare is “Greek to me,” you have proved otherwise by quoting directly from his play Julius Caesar.) In Shakespearean drama, language is never an end in itself but instead establishes character and tone, structures the play, shapes our emotional response to it, and enunciates theme. Hamlet, for example, characterizes both Polonius and Hamlet in part through their penchant for wordplay. But as Polonius suggests, Hamlet’s wordplay is “pregnant” with significance in a way that his own is not (2.2.201). Here, subtle differences prove just as key to characterization as similarities.

In both Hamlet and A Midsummer Night's Dream, the musical and visual qualities of Shakespeare’s language are integral to its meaning. Though written mainly in verse, Shakespeare’s plays include prose passages; and though most of the poetry is blank verse (unrhymed iambic pentameter), Shakespeare also uses rhyme and rhythmic variation to great effect. As you read the plays, then, you will want to pay attention to the texture and rhythm of the language—to the effect of sound on sense. You will also want to attend to the way Shakespeare uses language to appeal to your eye, as well as your ear. Visual imagery, like sound, consistently serves both structural and thematic ends, linking various moments and ideas, actions and themes. In A Midsummer Night's Dream, for example, characters frequently refer to their eyes. Such references begin in the very first scene: When Hermia wishes that her father “look’d but with my eyes,” Theseus responds that “your eyes must with his judgment look” (lines 56–57). These lines prepare us for a drama in which eyes will play a major part, in which love and vision tend to go hand in hand, in which both love and vision often conflict with “judgment.” The characters’ talk of eyes thus connects directly to the plot; through both, the play asks us to think about the tremendous power of vision and the dangers of relying too heavily on it.

Reading multiple plays by a single playwright will help you better recognize stylistic as well as structural and thematic patterns within each play: Each additional play you read will bring you closer to an understanding and appreciation of its creator's unique way of looking at the world and of the way his or her views and technique changed over time. You will gain a sense of the author's development as a dramatist even as, ideally, you develop your own skills as a reader of drama.

Enter THESEUS, HIPPOLYTA, [and PHILOSTRATE,] with others.

THESEUS: Now, fair Hippolyta, our nuptial hour Draws on apace. Four happy days bring in Another moon; but, oh, methinks, how slow
 This old moon wanes! She lingers⁴ my desires
 5 Like to a stepdame or a dowager
 Long withering out a young man's revenue.⁵
 HIPPOLYTA: Four days will quickly steep⁶ themselves in night;
 Four nights will quickly dream away the time;
 And then the moon—like to a silver bow
 10 Now bent in heaven—shall behold the night

3. Location: Theseus's palace in Athens. 4. Delays fulfillment of.

5. A widow using up the inheritance that will go to her husband's (young) heir on her death. Stepdame: stepmother. 6. Plunge.

Of our solemnities.

THESEUS: Go, Philostrate,
 Stir up the Athenian youth to merriments,
 Awake the pert and nimble spirit of mirth,
 Turn melancholy forth to funerals;
 The pale companion is not for our pomp. [Exit PHILOSTRATE.] 15
 Hippolyta, I wooed thee with my sword
 And won thy love doing thee injuries;⁷
 But I will wed thee in another key,
 With pomp, with triumph,⁸ and with reveling.

Enter EGEUS and his daughter HERMIA, and LYSANDER and DEMETRIUS.

EGEUS: Happy be Theseus, our renownèd duke! 20
 THESEUS: Thanks, good Egeus. What's the news with thee?
 EGEUS: Full of vexation come I, with complaint Against my child, my daughter Hermia.
 —Stand forth, Demetrius. —My noble lord,
 This man hath my consent to marry her. 25
 —Stand forth, Lysander. —And, my gracious duke,
 This man hath bewitched the bosom of my child.
 —Thou, thou, Lysander, thou hast given her rhymes,
 And interchanged love tokens with my child.
 Thou hast by moonlight at her window sung 30
 With feigning⁹ voice verses of feigning love,
 And stolen the impression of her fantasy¹
 With bracelets of thy hair, rings, gauds, conceits,² Knacks, trifles, nosegays,³ sweetmeats—messenger
 Of strong prevailment⁴ in unhardened youth. 35
 With cunning hast thou filched my daughter's heart,
 Turned her obedience, which is due to me,
 To stubborn harshness. —And, my gracious duke,
 Be it so⁵ she will not here before your grace
 Consent to marry with Demetrius, 40
 I beg the ancient privilege of Athens:
 As she is mine, I may dispose of her,
 Which shall be either to this gentleman
 Or to her death, according to our law
 Immediately⁶ provided in that case. 45
 THESEUS: What say you, Hermia? Be advised, fair maid:
 To you your father should be as a god,
 One that composed⁷ your beauties, yea, and one
 To whom you are but as a form in wax

7. Theseus captured Hippolyta in his military conquest of the Amazons. 8. Public festivity.

9. A pun: deceitful; desiring (“faining”); soft (in music).

1. By craftily impressing your image on her imagination, like a seal in wax, (you have) stolen her love.

2. Clever gifts. Gauds: trinkets. 3. Bouquets. Knacks: knickknacks. 4. Persuasiveness. 5. If.

6. Expressly. 7. Fashioned.

50 By him imprinted,⁸ and within his power
 To leave the figure or disfigure⁹ it.
 Demetrius is a worthy gentleman.

HERMIA: So is Lysander.

THESEUS: In himself he is,
 But in this kind, wanting your father's voice,¹
 55 The other must be held the worthier.

HERMIA: I would my father looked but with my eyes.

THESEUS: Rather your eyes must with his judgment look.

HERMIA: I do entreat your grace to pardon me.
 I know not by what power I am made bold,
 60 Nor how it may concern² my modesty
 In such a presence here to plead my thoughts,
 But I beseech your grace that I may know
 The worst that may befall me in this case
 If I refuse to wed Demetrius.

65 THESEUS: Either to die the death³ or to abjure
 For ever the society of men.
 Therefore, fair Hermia, question your desires,
 Know of your youth, examine well your blood,⁴
 Whether, if you yield not to your father's choice,
 70 You can endure the livery of a nun,⁵
 For aye to be in shady cloister mewed,⁶
 To live a barren sister all your life,
 Chanting faint hymns to the cold fruitless moon.⁷
 Thrice blessed they that master so their blood
 75 To undergo such maiden pilgrimage;⁸
 But earthlier happy is the rose distilled⁹
 Than that which, withering on the virgin thorn,
 Grows, lives, and dies in single blessedness.¹

HERMIA: So will I grow, so live, so die, my lord,
 80 Ere I will yield my virgin patent² up
 Unto his lordship whose unwishèd yoke
 My soul consents not to give sovereignty.

THESEUS: Take time to pause, and by the next new moon—
 The sealing day betwixt my love and me
 85 For everlasting bond of fellowship—
 Upon that day either prepare to die
 For disobedience to your father's will,
 Or else to wed Demetrius, as he would,

8. You are merely a wax impression of his seal. 9. Destroy. Leave: maintain.

1. Lacking your father's consent or vote. Kind: respect. 2. Befit. 3. Be executed.

4. Passions. Know: inquire.

5. Christian orders of nuns were established in the Middle Ages, but Elizabethans used the term as well for women devoted to a religious life in classical antiquity. Livery: habit.

6. Caged. For aye: forever. 7. The emblem of Diana, goddess of chastity. 8. Life as a virgin.

9. Preserved in a perfume (figuratively, preserved in her children). Earthlier happy: happier on earth.

1. In celibacy. 2. My right to remain a virgin.

Or on Diana's altar to protest³
 For aye austerity and single life. 90

DEMETRIUS: Relent, sweet Hermia, and, Lysander, yield
 Thy crazèd title⁴ to my certain right.

LYSANDER: You have her father's love, Demetrius;
 Let me have Hermia's. Do you marry him.

EGEUS: Scornful Lysander! True, he hath my love,
 And what is mine my love shall render him; 95
 And she is mine, and all my right of her
 I do estate⁵ unto Demetrius.

LYSANDER: [to THESEUS] I am, my lord, as well derived⁶ as he,
 As well possessed,⁷ my love is more than his, 100
 My fortunes every way as fairly ranked,
 If not with vantage,⁸ as Demetrius'.
 And, which is more than all these boasts can be,
 I am beloved of beauteous Hermia.
 Why should not I then prosecute⁹ my right? 105
 Demetrius, I'll avouch it to his head,¹
 Made love to² Nedar's daughter, Helena,
 And won her soul, and she, sweet lady, dotes,
 Devoutly dotes, dotes in idolatry
 Upon this spotted and inconstant³ man. 110

THESEUS: I must confess that I have heard so much
 And with Demetrius thought to have spoke thereof,
 But, being overfull of self-affairs,⁴
 My mind did lose it. —But, Demetrius, come,
 —And come, Egeus; you shall go with me. 115
 I have some private schooling⁵ for you both.
 —For you, fair Hermia, look you arm⁶ yourself
 To fit your fancies⁷ to your father's will,
 Or else the law of Athens yields you up,
 Which by no means we may extenuate,⁸ 120
 To death or to a vow of single life.
 —Come, my Hippolyta. What cheer, my love?
 —Demetrius and Egeus, go along.
 I must employ you in some business
 Against⁹ our nuptial and confer with you 125
 Of something nearly that¹ concerns yourselves.

EGEUS: With duty and desire we follow you.

Exeunt [all but LYSANDER and HERMIA].

LYSANDER: How now, my love, why is your cheek so pale?

How chance the roses there do fade so fast?

HERMIA: Belike² for want of rain, which I could well

LYSANDER: Ay me! For aught that I could ever read,
Could ever hear by tale or history,

The course of true love never did run smooth,

135 But either it was different in blood⁴—

HERMIA: Oh, cross!⁵ Too high to be enthralled to low.

LYSANDER: Or else misgraffèd⁶ in respect of years—

HERMIA: Oh, spite! Too old to be engaged to young.

LYSANDER: Or else it stood upon the choice of friends⁷—

140 HERMIA: Oh, hell! To choose love by another's eyes.

LYSANDER: Or if there were a sympathy⁸ in choice,

War, death, or sickness did lay siege to it,

Making it momentary⁹ as a sound,

Swift as a shadow, short as any dream,

145 Brief as the lightning in the collied¹ night

That in a spleen unfolds² both heaven and earth

And ere a man hath power to say "Behold!"

The jaws of darkness do devour it up.

So quick bright things come to confusion.

150 HERMIA: If then true lovers have been ever³ crossed,

It stands as an edict in destiny.

Then let us teach our trial patience⁴

Because it is a customary cross,

As due to love as thoughts and dreams and sighs,

155 Wishes and tears, poor fancy's⁵ followers.

LYSANDER: A good persuasion.⁶ Therefore hear me, Hermia:

I have a widow aunt, a dowager

Of great revenue, and she hath no child.

From Athens is her house remote seven leagues,

160 And she respects⁷ me as her only son.

There, gentle Hermia, may I marry thee,

And to that place the sharp Athenian law

Cannot pursue us. If thou lovest me then

Steal forth thy father's house tomorrow night,

165 And in the wood, a league without⁸ the town,

Where I did meet thee once with Helena

To do observance to a morn of May,⁹

There will I stay for thee.

HERMIA: My good Lysander,

I swear to thee by Cupid's strongest bow,

 By all the vows that ever men have broke, 175
 In number more than ever women spoke,
 In that same place thou hast appointed me
 Tomorrow truly will I meet with thee.

LYSANDER: Keep promise, love. Look, here comes Helena.

Enter HELENA.

HERMIA: God speed, fair⁴ Helena! Whither away? 180

HELENA: Call you me fair? That "fair" again unsay.

Demetrius loves your fair; oh, happy fair!⁵

Your eyes are lodestars, and your tongue's sweet air⁶

More tunable⁷ than lark to shepherd's ear

When wheat is green, when hawthorn buds appear. 185

Sickness is catching; oh, were favor⁸ so,

Your words I catch, fair Hermia, ere I go;

My ear should catch your voice, my eye your eye,

My tongue should catch your tongue's sweet melody.

Were the world mine, Demetrius being bated,⁹ 190

The rest I'd give to be to you translated.

Oh, teach me how you look, and with what art

You sway the motion of Demetrius' heart.

HERMIA: I frown upon him, yet he loves me still.

HELENA: Oh, that your frowns would teach my smiles such skill! 195

HERMIA: I give him curses, yet he gives me love.

HELENA: Oh, that my prayers could such affection move!

HERMIA: The more I hate, the more he follows me.

HELENA: The more I love, the more he hateth me.

HERMIA: His folly, Helena, is no fault of mine. 200

HELENA: None but your beauty; would that fault were mine!

HERMIA: Take comfort: he no more shall see my face.

Lysander and myself will fly this place.

Before the time I did Lysander see

Seemed Athens as a paradise to me. 205

Oh, then, what graces in my love do dwell

That he hath turned a heaven unto a hell?

LYSANDER: Helen, to you our minds we will unfold:

Tomorrow night, when Phoebe¹ doth behold

 Through Athens' gates have we devised to steal.

HERMIA: And in the wood where often you and I
 215 Upon faint primrose beds were wont³ to lie,
 Emptying our bosoms of their counsel sweet,
 There my Lysander and myself shall meet,
 And thence from Athens turn away our eyes
 To seek new friends and stranger companies.⁴
 220 Farewell, sweet playfellow; pray thou for us,
 And good luck grant thee thy Demetrius.
 —Keep word, Lysander; we must starve our sight
 From lovers' food till morrow deep midnight.

Exit.

LYSANDER: I will, my Hermia. —Helena, adieu.
 225 As you on him, Demetrius dote on you.

Exit.

HELENA: How happy some o'er other some⁵ can be!
 Through Athens I am thought as fair as she.
 But what of that? Demetrius thinks not so.
 He will not know what all but he do know.
 230 And as he errs, doting on Hermia's eyes,
 So I, admiring of his qualities.
 Things base and vile, holding no quantity,⁶
 Love can transpose to form and dignity.
 Love looks not with the eyes but with the mind,⁷ 235 And therefore is winged Cupid painted blind.
 Nor hath love's mind of any judgment taste,⁸
 Wings and no eyes figure⁹ unheedy haste.
 And therefore is love said to be a child
 Because in choice he is so oft beguiled.
 240 As waggish boys in game¹ themselves forswear,
 So the boy Love is perjured everywhere.
 For ere Demetrius looked on Hermia's eyne,²
 He hailed down oaths that he was only mine.
 And when this hail some heat from Hermia felt,
 245 So he dissolved,³ and showers of oaths did melt.
 I will go tell him of fair Hermia's flight:
 Then to the wood will he tomorrow night
 Pursue her; and for this intelligence⁴
 If I have thanks, it is a dear⁵ expense.
 250 But herein mean I to enrich my pain,
 To have his sight thither and back again.

*Enter QUINCE the carpenter, and SNUG the joiner, and BOTTOM the weaver, and FLUTE the bellows-mender, and SNOOT the tinker, and STARVELING the tailor.*⁷

QUINCE: Is all our company here?

BOTTOM: You were best to call them generally,⁸ man by man, according to the scrip.⁹

QUINCE: Here is the scroll of every man's name which is thought fit through all Athens to play in our interlude¹ before the Duke and the Duchess on his wedding day at night. 5

BOTTOM: First, good Peter Quince, say what the play treats on; then read the names of the actors; and so grow to a point.²

QUINCE: Marry,³ our play is The Most Lamentable Comedy and Most Cruel Death of Pyramus and Thisbe.⁴ 10

BOTTOM: A very good piece of work, I assure you, and a merry. Now, good Peter Quince, call forth your actors by the scroll. Masters, spread yourselves.

QUINCE: Answer as I call you. —Nick Bottom, the weaver?

BOTTOM: Ready. Name what part I am for, and proceed.

QUINCE: You, Nick Bottom, are set down for Pyramus. 15

BOTTOM: What is Pyramus? A lover or a tyrant?

QUINCE: A lover that kills himself, most gallant, for love.

BOTTOM: That will ask some tears in the true performing of it. If I do it, let the audience look to their eyes. I will move storms. I will condole⁵ in some measure. To the rest. —Yet my chief humor is for a tyrant. I could play Ercles 20 rarely,⁶ or a part to tear a cat in, to make all split.⁷

The raging rocks
And shivering shocks⁸
Shall break the locks
Of prison gates,
And Phibbus' car⁹
Shall shine from far
And make and mar

6. Location: Somewhere in the city of Athens.

7. The artisans' names recall their occupations. Quince's name is probably derived from "quoins," wooden wedges used by carpenters who made buildings such as houses and theaters. The name "Snug" evokes well-finished wooden furniture made by joiners. A bottom was the piece of wood on which thread was wound; Bottom's name also connotes "ass" and "lowest point." As Flute's name suggests, domestic bellows whistle through holes when needing repair. Snout's name may refer either to the spouts of the kettles he repairs or to his nose. Tailors, as Starveling's name recalls, were proverbially thin.

8. Bottom's error for "individually" (he frequently misuses words in this manner). 9. Script; list.

1. Brief play. 2. Draw to a conclusion. 3. By the Virgin Mary.

4. Parodying titles such as that of Thomas Preston's Cambyses: A Lamentable Tragedy Mixed Full of Pleasant Mirth . . . (ca. 1570). 5. Lament; arouse pity.

6. Excellently. Ercles: Hercules (a stock ranting role in early plays). Humor: inclination.

7. Go to pieces. Cat: cant. 8. Shattering blows.

9. The chariot of Phoebus Apollo, the sun god (the odd spelling may represent Bottom's pronunciation).

30 This was lofty. Now name the rest of the players. This is Ercles' vein, a tyrant's vein. A lover is more condoling.

QUINCE: Francis Flute, the bellows-mender?

FLUTE: Here, Peter Quince.

QUINCE: Flute, you must take Thisbe on you.

35 FLUTE: What is Thisbe, a wandering knight?¹

QUINCE: It is the lady that Pyramus must love.

FLUTE: Nay, faith, let not me play a woman:² I have a beard coming.

QUINCE: That's all one. You shall play it in a mask,³ and you may speak as small⁴ as you will.

40 BOTTOM: An⁵ I may hide my face, let me play Thisbe too. I'll speak in a monstrous little voice, "Thisne, Thisne!"⁶ —"Ah, Pyramus, my lover dear, thy Thisbe dear and lady dear."

QUINCE: No, no, you must play Pyramus; and Flute, you Thisbe.

BOTTOM: Well, proceed.

45 QUINCE: Robin Starveling, the tailor?

STARVELING: Here, Peter Quince.

QUINCE: Robin Starveling, you must play Thisbe's mother. —Tom Snout, the tinker?

SNOUT: Here, Peter Quince.

50 QUINCE: You, Pyramus' father; myself, Thisbe's father; Snug the joiner, you, the lion's part; and I hope here is a play fitted.⁷

SNUG: Have you the lion's part written? Pray you, if it be, give it me, for I am slow of study.

QUINCE: You may do it extempore, for it is nothing but roaring.

55 BOTTOM: Let me play the lion too. I will roar that I will do any man's heart good to hear me. I will roar that I will make the Duke say, "Let him roar again! Let him roar again!"

QUINCE: An you should do it too terribly, you would fright the Duchess and the ladies that they would shriek, and that were enough to hang us all.

60 ALL: That would hang us, every mother's son.

BOTTOM: I grant you, friends, if you should fright the ladies out of their wits, they would have no more discretion but to hang us. But I will aggravate⁸ my voice so that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove. I will roar you an 'twere⁹ any nightingale.

65 QUINCE: You can play no part but Pyramus; for Pyramus is a sweet-faced man, a proper¹ man as one shall see in a summer's day, a most lovely, gentlemanlike man. Therefore you must needs play Pyramus.

BOTTOM: Well, I will undertake it. What beard were I best to play it in?

QUINCE: Why, what you will.

1. Knight-errant. 2. On the Elizabethan stage, women's parts were played by boys and young men.

3. Elizabethan ladies regularly wore masks to remain anonymous and to protect their complexions. One: irrelevant. 4. High-pitched; shrill. 5. If.

6. Probably intended as a pet name for Thisbe; or it may mean "in this manner" ("thissen").

7. (Well) cast. 8. (For "moderate.")

9. As though it were. Sucking dove: Bottom confuses "sitting dove" and "sucking lamb." 1. Handsome.

BOTTOM: I will discharge² it in either your straw-color beard, your orange-tawny beard, your purple-in-grain³ beard, or your French-crown-color⁴ beard, your perfect yellow. 70

QUINCE: Some of your French crowns have no hair at all,⁵ and then you will play bare-faced.⁶ —But, masters, here are your parts,⁷ and I am to entreat you, request you, and desire you to con⁸ them by tomorrow night, and meet me in 75 the palace wood, a mile without the town, by moonlight. There will we rehearse; for if we meet in the city, we shall be dogged with company, and our devices⁹ known. In the meantime, I will draw a bill¹ of properties such as our play wants. I pray you, fail me not.

BOTTOM: We will meet, and there we may rehearse most obscenely and courageously. Take pains; be perfect.² Adieu. 80

QUINCE: At the Duke's oak we meet.

BOTTOM: Enough! Hold, or cut bowstrings.³

Exeunt.

2.1⁴

Enter a FAIRY at one door and ROBIN Goodfellow[, a puck,] at another.

ROBIN: How now, spirit, whither wander you?

FAIRY: Over hill, over dale,
 Thorough⁵ bush, thorough briar,
 Over park, over pale,⁶
 Thorough flood, thorough fire, 5
 I do wander everywhere
 Swifter than the moon's sphere;⁷
 And I serve the Fairy Queen
 To dew her orbs⁸ upon the green.
 The cowslips tall her pensioners⁹ be; 10
 In their gold coats spots you see.
 Those be rubies, fairy favors,¹
 In those freckles live their savors.²
 I must go seek some dewdrops here
 And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear. 15
 Farewell, thou lob³ of spirits, I'll be gone.
 Our queen and all her elves come here anon.

2. Perform.

3. Very deep red. Orange-tawny: dark yellow, a recognized name for the dye. (Bottom the weaver shows his professional knowledge.) 4. Gold-coin-colored.

5. Referring to the baldness caused by venereal disease (called "the French disease").

6. Beardless; undisguised.

7. Literally; an Elizabethan actor was generally given only his own lines and cues. 8. Memorize.

9. Plans. 1. List.

2. Be letter perfect in learning your parts. Obscenely: a comic blunder, possibly for "out of sight" ("from the scene" or "from being seen"). 3. Be present at the rehearsal, or else quit the troupe (?).

4. Location: A wood near Athens. 5. Through. 6. Enclosure; fence.

7. Each planet, including the moon, was thought to be fixed in a transparent hollow globe revolving around the earth. 8. To sprinkle her fairy rings (circles of dark grass). 9. Royal bodyguards.

1. Gifts. 2. Scent. 3. Country bumpkin.

ROBIN: The King doth keep his revels here tonight.
 Take heed the Queen come not within his sight,
 20 For Oberon is passing fell and wrath⁴
 Because that she as her attendant hath
 A lovely boy stolen from an Indian king—
 She never had so sweet a changeling⁵—
 And jealous Oberon would have the child
 25 Knight of his train, to trace⁶ the forests wild.
 But she perforce⁷ withholds the lovèd boy,
 Crowns him with flowers, and makes him all her joy.
 And now they never meet in grove or green,
 By fountain clear or spangled starlight sheen,⁸
 30 But they do square,⁹ that all their elves for fear
 Creep into acorn cups and hide them there.

FAIRY: Either I mistake your shape and making¹ quite,
 Or else you are that shrewd² and knavish sprite Called Robin Goodfellow. Are not you he 35 That frights the maidens of the villagery,³
 Skim milk, and sometimes labor in the quern,⁴
 And bootless⁵ make the breathless housewife churn,
 And sometime make the drink to bear no barm,⁶
 Mislead night-wanderers, laughing at their harm?
 40 Those that “hobgoblin” call you, and “sweet puck,”
 You do their work, and they shall have good luck.
 Are not you he?

ROBIN: Thou speakest aright;
 I am that merry wanderer of the night.
 I jest to Oberon and make him smile
 45 When I a fat and bean-fed horse beguile,⁷ Neighing in likeness of a filly foal.
 And sometime lurk I in a gossip's⁸ bowl
 In very likeness of a roasted crab,⁹
 And when she drinks, against her lips I bob,
 50 And on her withered dewlap¹ pour the ale.
 The wisest aunt telling the saddest² tale
 Sometime for three-foot stool mistaketh me.
 Then slip I from her bum, down topples she,
 And “tailor” cries,³ and falls into a cough;
 55 And then the whole choir⁴ hold their hips and laugh,

4. Exceedingly fierce and angry.

5. Usually a child left by fairies in exchange for one stolen, but here the stolen child. 6. Range.

7. Forcibly. 8. Shining starlight. Fountain: spring. 9. Quarrel 1. Form. 2. Mischievous.

3. Villages. 4. Hand mill. 5. In vain. 6. Froth on ale. Sometime: at times. 7. Trick.

8. An old woman's.

9. Crab apple (“lamb's wool,” a winter drink, was made with roasted apples and warm ale).

1. Loose skin on neck. 2. Most serious. Aunt: old woman.

3. Possibly the old woman cries this because she ends up cross-legged on the floor, as tailors sat to do their work, or because she falls on her “tail.” 4. Company.

And waxen in their mirth, and neeze,⁵ and swear
 A merrier hour was never wasted there.
 But room, fairy: here comes Oberon.

FAIRY: And here my mistress. Would that he were gone.

Enter [OBERON,] the King of Fairies, at one door, with his train, and [TITANIA,] the Queen, at another, with hers.

OBERON: Ill met by moonlight, proud Titania. 60

TITANIA: What, jealous Oberon? —Fairy, skip hence.

I have forsworn his bed and company.

OBERON: Tarry, rash wanton!⁶ Am not I thy lord?

TITANIA: Then I must be thy lady; but I know
 When thou hast stolen away from fairyland 65

And in the shape of Corin⁷ sat all day

Playing on pipes of corn and versing love⁸

To amorous Phillida. Why art thou here

Come from the farthest step⁹ of India

But that, forsooth, the bouncing¹ Amazon, 70

Your buskined² mistress and your warrior love,

To Theseus must be wedded, and you come

To give their bed joy and prosperity?

OBERON: How canst thou thus, for shame, Titania,

Glance at my credit³ with Hippolyta, 75

Knowing I know thy love to Theseus?

Didst not thou lead him through the glimmering night

From Perigenia, whom he ravishèd,

And make him with fair Aegles⁴ break his faith,

With Ariadne, and Antiopa?⁵ 80

TITANIA: These are the forgeries of jealousy;

And never since the middle summer's spring⁶

Met we on hill, in dale, forest, or mead,

By pavèd fountain or by rushy⁷ brook,

Or in the beachèd margin⁸ of the sea 85

To dance our ringlets⁹ to the whistling wind,

But with thy brawls thou hast disturbed our sport.

Therefore the winds, piping to us in vain,

As in revenge have sucked up from the sea

5. Sneeze. Waxen: increase. 6. Impetuous creature.

7. "Corin" and "Phillida" [line 68] are typical names for a shepherd and shepherdess in pastoral poetry.

8. Making or reciting love poetry. Pipes of corn: musical instruments made of oat stalks. 9. Limit.

1. Vigorous. 2. Wearing hunting boots. 3. Question my good name.

4. In Plutarch's Lives, Theseus previously had mistresses named Perigouna and Aegles. "Perigenia" may be Shakespeare's alteration.

5. Taken from Plutarch; some writers used "Antiopa" as an alternative name for the Amazonian queen whom Theseus married, although here it seems to refer to a different woman. Ariadne helped Theseus to kill the Minotaur and escape from his labyrinth on Crete; she fled with Theseus, but he deserted her on Naxos. 6. Beginning of midsummer. 7. Fringed with reeds. Pavèd: pebbled. 8. Shore. In: on.

9. Circle dances.

90 Contagious fogs which, falling in the land,
 Hath every pelting¹ river made so proud
 That they have overborne their continents.²
 The ox hath therefore stretched his yoke in vain,
 The plowman lost his sweat, and the green corn³
 95 Hath rotted ere his youth attained a beard.
 The fold stands empty in the drownèd field,
 And crows are fattèd with the murrain⁴ flock;
 The nine-men's morris⁵ is filled up with mud,
 And the quaint mazes in the wanton green⁶
 100 For lack of tread are undistinguishable.
 The human mortals want their winter cheer;⁷
 No night is now with hymn or carol blessed.
 Therefore⁸ the moon, the governess of floods,
 Pale in her anger, washes⁹ all the air,
 105 That rheumatic¹ diseases do abound.
 And thorough this distemperature² we see
 The seasons alter; hoary-headed frosts
 Fall in the fresh lap of the crimson rose,
 And on old Hiems³ chin and icy crown
 110 An odorous chaplet⁴ of sweet summer buds
 Is, as in mockery, set. The spring, the summer,
 The childing⁵ autumn, angry winter, change
 Their wonted liveries, and the mazèd⁶ world
 By their increase⁷ now knows not which is which.
 115 And this same progeny of evils comes
 From our debate,⁸ from our dissension;
 We are their parents and original.⁹
 OBERON: Do you amend it then; it lies in you.
 Why should Titania cross her Oberon?
 120 I do but beg a little changeling boy
 To be my henchman.¹
 TITANIA: Set your heart at rest.²
 The fairyland buys not the child of me.
 His mother was a votress³ of my order,
 And in the spicèd Indian air by night
 125 Full often hath she gossiped by my side
 And sat with me on Neptune's yellow sands,

1. Paltry. 2. Banks. 3. Grain. 4. Dead of disease.

5. The playing area for this outdoor game (traditionally, a board game played with nine pebbles or pegs) was cut in turf.

6. Luxuriant grass. Quaint mazes: intricate arrangements of paths (kept visible by frequent use).

7. Winter cheer would include the hymns and carols of the Yuletide. Want: lack.

8. As in lines 88 and 93 above, referring to the consequences of their quarrel. 9. Moistens; wets.

1. Characterized by rheum: colds, coughs, and the like. 2. Bad weather; disturbance. 3. Winter's.

4. Wreath. 5. Fruitful. 6. Bewildered. Liveries: customary clothing. 7. Crop yield. 8. Quarrel.

9. Origin. 1. Page of honor. 2. Proverbial expression for "Abandon that idea."

3. A woman who has taken a vow to serve (often, religious).

Marking the embarkèd traders on the flood,⁴
 When we have laughed to see the sails conceive
 And grow big-bellied with the wanton⁵ wind,
 Which she, with pretty and with swimming⁶ gait
 Following⁷—her womb then rich with my young squire— 130
 Would imitate, and sail upon the land
 To fetch me trifles and return again,
 As from a voyage, rich with merchandise.
 But she, being mortal, of that boy did die, 135
 And for her sake do I rear up her boy,
 And for her sake I will not part with him.

OBERON: How long within this wood intend you stay?

TITANIA: Perchance till after Theseus' wedding day.

If you will patiently dance in our round 140
 And see our moonlight revels, go with us.

If not, shun me, and I will spare⁸ your haunts.

OBERON: Give me that boy, and I will go with thee.

TITANIA: Not for thy fairy kingdom. —Fairies, away!

We shall chide⁹ downright if I longer stay. 145

Exeunt [TITANIA and her train].

OBERON: Well, go thy way. Thou shalt not from¹ this grove

Till I torment thee for this injury.

—My gentle puck, come hither. Thou rememberest

Since² once I sat upon a promontory

And heard a mermaid on a dolphin's back 150

Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath³

That the rude⁴ sea grew civil at her song

And certain stars shot madly from their spheres⁵

To hear the sea-maid's music?

ROBIN: I remember.

OBERON: That very time I saw—but thou couldst not— 155

Flying between the cold moon and the earth,

Cupid, all armed. A certain aim he took

At a fair vestal thronèd by the west,⁶

And loosed his love-shaft⁷ smartly from his bow

As⁸ it should pierce a hundred thousand hearts. 160

But I might⁹ see young Cupid's fiery shaft

Quenched in the chaste beams of the watery moon;

And the imperial votress passèd on

In maiden meditation, fancy-free.¹

Yet marked I where the bolt² of Cupid fell. 165

4. Tide. Traders: merchant ships. 5. Playful; amorous. 6. As though gliding through the waves.

7. Copying. 8. Avoid. 9. Quarrel. 1. Go from. 2. When. 3. Voice; song. Dulcet: sweet.

4. Rough. 5. Orbits.

6. To the west of India; in England. Vestal: virgin (a compliment to Queen Elizabeth, the Virgin Queen, and possibly an allusion to a specific entertainment in her honor, such as the water pageant at Elvetham in 1591). 7. Golden arrow. 8. As though. 9. Could. 1. Free of love thoughts. 2. Arrow.

It fell upon a little western flower,
 Before milk-white, now purple with love's wound,
 And maidens call it "love-in-idleness."³
 Fetch me that flower. The herb I showed thee once:
 170 The juice of it on sleeping eyelids laid
 Will make or⁴ man or woman madly dote
 Upon the next live creature that it sees.
 Fetch me this herb, and be thou here again
 Ere the leviathan⁵ can swim a league.

175 ROBIN: I'll put a girdle⁶ round about the earth
 In forty minutes.

OBERON: Having once this juice,
 I'll watch Titania when she is asleep
 And drop the liquor⁷ of it in her eyes.
 The next thing then she waking looks upon—
 180 Be it on lion, bear, or wolf, or bull,
 On meddling monkey or on busy ape—
 She shall pursue it with the soul of love.
 And ere I take this charm from off her sight—
 As I can take it with another herb—185 I'll make her render up her page to me.
 But who comes here? I am invisible,
 And I will overhear their conference.

Enter DEMETRIUS, HELENA following him.

DEMETRIUS: I love thee not, therefore pursue me not.
 Where is Lysander and fair Hermia?
 190 The one I'll stay, the other stayeth me.⁸
 Thou told'st me they were stolen unto this wood,
 And here am I, and wood⁹ within this wood
 Because I cannot meet my Hermia.
 Hence, get thee gone, and follow me no more.

195 HELENA: You draw me, you hard-hearted adamant,¹
 But yet you draw not iron, for my heart
 Is true as steel. Leave you² your power to draw,
 And I shall have no power to follow you.

DEMETRIUS: Do I entice you? Do I speak you fair?³
 200 Or rather do I not in plainest truth
 Tell you I do not nor I cannot love you?

HELENA: And even for that do I love you the more.

3. Pansy. (Classical legend describes how the mulberry turned purple with Pyramus's blood and the hyacinth with Hyacinthus's, but it does not mention the pansy.) 4. Either.

5. Biblical sea monster, identified with the whale. 6. Circle. 7. Juice.

8. The one (Lysander) I'll bring to a halt, the other (Hermia) stops me in my tracks. 9. Insane.

1. Very hard stone supposed to have magnetic properties. Draw me: that is, with the magnetic power of attraction.

2. Relinquish. But yet . . . steel: Hermia contrasts the base metal iron with steel, which holds its temper.

3. Do I speak kindly to you?

I am your spaniel, and, Demetrius,
 The more you beat me I will fawn on you.
 Use me but as your spaniel: spurn me, strike me, 205
 Neglect me, lose me—only give me leave,
 Unworthy as I am, to follow you.
 What worser place can I beg in your love—
 And yet a place of high respect with me—
 Than to be usèd as you use your dog?² 210

DEMETRIUS: Tempt not too much the hatred of my spirit,
 For I am sick when I do look on thee.

HELENA: And I am sick when I look not on you.

DEMETRIUS: You do impeach⁴ your modesty too much
 To leave the city and commit yourself 215
 Into the hands of one that loves you not,
 To trust the opportunity of night
 And the ill counsel of a desert⁵ place
 With the rich worth of your virginity.

HELENA: Your virtue is my privilege. For that⁶ 220
 It is not night when I do see your face.
 Therefore I think I am not in the night,
 Nor doth this wood lack worlds of company,
 For you in my respect⁷ are all the world.
 Then how can it be said I am alone 225
 When all the world is here to look on me?

DEMETRIUS: I'll run from thee and hide me in the brakes,⁸
 And leave thee to the mercy of wild beasts.

HELENA: The wildest hath not such a heart as you.
 Run when you will. The story shall be changed: 230
 Apollo flies, and Daphne holds the chase;⁹
 The dove pursues the griffin; the mild hind¹
 Makes speed to catch the tiger: bootless² speed
 When cowardice pursues and valor flies.

DEMETRIUS: I will not stay thy questions.³ Let me go! 235
 Or if thou follow me, do not believe
 But I shall do thee mischief in the wood. [Exit.]⁴

HELENA: Ay, in the temple, in the town, the field,
 You do me mischief. Fie, Demetrius,
 Your wrongs do set a scandal on my sex.⁵ 240

4. Call into question. 5. Deserted. 6. Because. Privilege: protection.

7. As far as I am concerned. 8. Thickets.

9. A reversal of the traditional myth in which the nymph Daphne, flying from Apollo, was transformed into a laurel tree to escape him.

1. Doe. Griffin: A fabulous monster with a lion's body and an eagle's head and wings. 2. Useless.

3. I will not wait here any longer to hear you talk.

4. [Different editions of the play omit an exit for Demetrius in this scene; however, when exactly he leaves has important implications for the tone of Helena's speech.]

5. Your injustices to me cause me to behave in a way that disgraces my sex (by wooing him rather than being wooed).

We cannot fight for love as men may do;
 We should be wooed and were not made to woo.
 I'll follow thee and make a heaven of hell
 To die upon the hand I love so well.

[Exit.]

245 OBERON: Fare thee well, nymph. Ere he do leave this grove
 Thou shalt fly him, and he shall seek thy love.

Enter [ROBIN Goodfellow, the] puck.

Hast thou the flower there? Welcome, wanderer.

ROBIN: Ay, there it is.

OBERON: I pray thee give it me.

I know a bank where the wild thyme blows,
 250 Where oxlips⁶ and the nodding violet grows,
 Quite over-canopied with luscious woodbine,⁷
 With sweet musk-roses, and with eglantine.⁸
 There sleeps Titania sometime of the night,
 Lulled in these flowers with dances and delight;
 255 And there the snake throws⁹ her enameled skin,
 Weed¹ wide enough to wrap a fairy in.
 And with the juice of this I'll streak² her eyes,
 And make her full of hateful fantasies.
 Take thou some of it, and seek through this grove.
 260 A sweet Athenian lady is in love
 With a disdainful youth. Anoint his eyes,
 But do it when the next thing he espies
 May be the lady. Thou shalt know the man
 By the Athenian garments he hath on.
 265 Effect it with some care, that he may prove
 More fond³ on her than she upon her love.
 And look thou meet me ere the first cock crow.⁴

ROBIN: Fear not, my lord; your servant shall do so.

Exeunt.

2.2⁵

Enter TITANIA, Queen of Fairies, with her train.

TITANIA: Come, now a roundel⁶ and a fairy song;
 Then, for the third part of a minute,⁷ hence,
 Some to kill cankers⁸ in the musk-rose buds,
 Some war with resemice⁹ for their leathern wings
 5 To make my small elves coats, and some keep back
 The clamorous owl that nightly hoots and wonders

6. Hybrid between primrose and cowslip. 7. Honeysuckle.

8. Sweet brier (a type of rose). Musk-roses: Large rambling white roses. 9. Throws off; casts away.

1. Garment. 2. Anoint. 3. Doting.

4. Some spirits were thought unable to bear daylight (compare Hamlet 1.1.28–36).

5. Location: The wood. 6. Circle dance.

7. The fairies are quick enough to do their tasks in twenty seconds. 8. Caterpillars. 9. Bats.

At our quaint¹ spirits. Sing me now asleep;
Then to your offices, and let me rest.

[She lies down.] FAIRIES sing [and dance].

FIRST FAIRY: You spotted snakes with double² tongue,
Thorny hedgehogs, be not seen; 10
Newts and blindworms,³ do no wrong,
Come not near our Fairy Queen.

CHORUS: Philomel,⁴ with melody
Sing in our sweet lullaby;
Lulla, lulla, lullaby, lulla, lulla, lullaby. 15
Never harm,
Nor spell, nor charm
Come our lovely lady nigh.
So good night, with lullaby.

FIRST FAIRY: Weaving spiders, come not here; 20
Hence, you long-legged spinners, hence!
Beetles black, approach not near;
Worm nor snail, do no offense.

CHORUS: Philomel, with melody, etc.

[TITANIA sleeps.]

SECOND FAIRY: Hence, away! Now all is well. 25
One aloof⁵ stand sentinel. [Exeunt FAIRIES, leaving one sentinel.]

Enter OBERON. [He squeezes the juice on TITANIA'S eyes.]

OBERON: What thou seest when thou dost wake,
Do it for thy true love take;
Love and languish for his sake.
Be it ounce⁶ or cat or bear, 30
Pard,⁷ or boar with bristled hair,
In thy eye that shall appear
When thou wak'st, it is thy dear.
Wake when some vile thing is near. [Exit.]

Enter LYSANDER and HERMIA.

LYSANDER: Fair love, you faint with wandering in the wood, 35
And to speak truth, I have forgot our way.
We'll rest us, Hermia, if you think it good,
And tarry for the comfort of the day.

HERMIA: Be it so, Lysander. Find you out a bed,
For I upon this bank will rest my head. 40

LYSANDER: One turf shall serve as pillow for us both;
One heart, one bed, two bosoms, and one troth.⁸

1. Dainty. 2. Forked.

3. Newts (water lizards) and blindworms were thought to be poisonous, as were spiders (line 20).

4. Philomel, the nightingale (in classical mythology, a woman who, having been raped by her sister's husband, was transformed into a bird). 5. At a distance. 6. Lynx. 7. Leopard. 8. Pledged faith.

HERMIA: Nay, good Lysander: for my sake, my dear, Lie further off yet; do not lie so near.

45 LYSANDER: Oh, take the sense,⁹ sweet, of my innocence!
Love takes the meaning in love's conference.¹
I mean that my heart unto yours is knit,
So that but one heart we can make of it.
Two bosoms interchainèd with an oath;
50 So, then, two bosoms and a single troth.
Then by your side no bed-room me deny,
For lying so, Hermia, I do not lie.²

HERMIA: Lysander riddles very prettily.
Now much beshrew³ my manners and my pride
55 If Hermia meant to say Lysander lied.
But, gentle friend, for love and courtesy
Lie further off in human⁴ modesty.
Such separation as may well be said
Becomes a virtuous bachelor and a maid,
60 So far be distant. And good night, sweet friend;
Thy love ne'er alter till thy sweet life end.

LYSANDER: Amen, amen, to that fair prayer say I,
And then end life when I end loyalty.

Here is my bed. Sleep give thee all his rest.

65 HERMIA: With half that wish the wisher's eyes be pressed.⁵

[They sleep separately.]

Enter [ROBIN Goodfellow, the] puck.

ROBIN: Through the forest have I gone,
But Athenian found I none
On whose eyes I might approve⁶
This flower's force in stirring love.
70 Night and silence. Who is here?
Weeds of Athens he doth wear.
This is he my master said
Despisèd the Athenian maid;
And here the maiden, sleeping sound
75 On the dank and dirty ground.
Pretty soul, she durst not lie
Near this lack-love, this kill-courtesy.
Churl,⁷ upon thy eyes I throw
All the power this charm doth owe.⁸

[He squeezes the juice on LYSANDER's eyes.]

80 When thou wak'st, let love forbid

9. True meaning. 1. Love should enable lovers truly to understand each other.

2. Deceive; punning on "lie down." 3. Curse (used in a mild sense). 4. Courteous.

5. May sleep's rest be shared between us. Pressed: closed in sleep. 6. Test. 7. Rude fellow. 8. Own.

Sleep his seat on thy eyelid.⁹
 So awake when I am gone,
 For I must now to Oberon.

Exit.

Enter DEMETRIUS and HELENA, running.

HELENA: Stay, though thou kill me, sweet Demetrius.

DEMETRIUS: I charge thee: hence, and do not haunt me thus. 85

HELENA: Oh, wilt thou darkling¹ leave me? Do not so.

DEMETRIUS: Stay, on thy peril;² I alone will go. [Exit.]

HELENA: Oh, I am out of breath in this fond³ chase.

The more my prayer, the lesser is my grace.⁴

Happy is Hermia, wheresoe'er she lies, 90

For she hath blessèd and attractive⁵ eyes.

How came her eyes so bright? Not with salt tears;

If so, my eyes are oftener washed than hers.

No, no; I am as ugly as a bear,

For beasts that meet me run away for fear. 95

Therefore no marvel though Demetrius

Do, as⁶ a monster, fly my presence thus.

What wicked and dissembling glass of mine

Made me compare with Hermia's sphery eyne?⁷

But who is here? Lysander, on the ground? 100

Dead or asleep? I see no blood, no wound.

Lysander, if you live, good sir, awake.

LYSANDER: [awaking] And run through fire I will for thy sweet sake.

Transparent Helena, nature shows art⁸

That through thy bosom makes me see thy heart. 105

Where is Demetrius? Oh, how fit a word

Is that vile name to perish on my sword!

HELENA: Do not say so, Lysander; say not so.

What though he love your Hermia? Lord, what though?

Yet Hermia still loves you; then be content. 110

LYSANDER: Content with Hermia? No, I do repent

The tedious minutes I with her have spent.

Not Hermia but Helena I love.

Who will not change a raven for a dove?

The will of man is by his reason swayed,⁹ 115

And reason says you are the worthier maid.

Things growing are not ripe until their season,

So I, being young, till now ripe not to reason.

And, touching now the point of human skill,¹

Reason becomes the marshal² to my will 120

9. Prevent you from sleeping. 1. In darkness. 2. Stay here, or risk peril (if you follow me).

3. Foolish. 4. Reward. 5. Magnetic. 6. As if I were. 7. Starry eyes. Compare: Compete.

8. Skill; magic power. Transparent: radiant; capable of being seen through.

9. Renaissance psychology considered the will (that is, the passions) to be in constant conflict with, and ideally subject to, the faculty of reason. 1. Reaching (only) now the highest point of human judgment.

2. An officer who led guests to their appointed places.

And leads me to your eyes, where I o'erlook³
Love's stories written in love's richest book.

HELENA: Wherefore was I to this keen⁴ mockery born?

When at your hands did I deserve this scorn?

125 Is't not enough, is't not enough, young man,

That I did never—no, nor never can—

Deserve a sweet look from Demetrius' eye,

But you must flout my insufficiency?⁵

Good troth, you do me wrong—good sooth,⁶ you do—

130 In such disdainful manner me to woo.

But fare you well. Perforce I must confess

I thought you lord of more true gentleness.⁷

Oh, that a lady of one man refused

Should of⁸ another therefore be abused!

Exit.

135 LYSANDER: She sees not Hermia. —Hermia, sleep thou there,

And never mayst thou come Lysander near;

For as a surfeit of the sweetest things

The deepest loathing to the stomach brings,

Or as the heresies that men do leave

140 Are hated most of those they did deceive,⁹

So thou, my surfeit and my heresy,

Of all be hated, but the most of me!

And, all my powers, address¹ your love and might

To honor Helen and to be her knight.

Exit.

145 HERMIA: [awaking] Help me, Lysander, help me! Do thy best

To pluck this crawling serpent from my breast!

Ay me, for pity! What a dream was here!

Lysander, look how I do quake with fear.

Methought a serpent ate my heart away,

150 And you sat smiling at his cruel prey.²

Lysander? What, removed? Lysander! Lord!

What, out of hearing, gone? No sound, no word?

Alack, where are you? Speak an if³ you hear,

Speak, of⁴ all loves! I swoon almost with fear.

155 No? Then I well perceive you are not nigh.

Either death or you I'll find immediately.

Exit. [TITANIA remains lying asleep.]

3. Look over; read. 4. Sharp. 5. Mock my shortcomings by pretending they are wonderful qualities.

6. Indeed. Good troth: truly. 7. Courtesy; breeding. 8. By.

9. As men most hate the false opinions they once held. 1. Direct; apply. 2. Act of preying.

3. An if = if. 4. For the sake of.

3.1⁵

*Enter the clowns*⁶ [BOTTOM, QUINCE, SNOOT, STARVELING, FLUTE, and SNUG].

BOTTOM: Are we all met?

QUINCE: Pat,⁷ pat; and here's a marvelous convenient place for our rehearsal. This green plot shall be our stage, this hawthorn brake our tiring-house,⁸ and we will do it in action as we will do it before the Duke.

BOTTOM: Peter Quince?

QUINCE: What sayest thou, bully⁹ Bottom?

BOTTOM: There are things in this comedy of Pyramus and Thisbe that will never please. First, Pyramus must draw a sword to kill himself, which the ladies cannot abide. How answer you that?

SNOOT: By'r lakin, a parlous¹ fear.

STARVELING: I believe we must leave the killing out, when all is done.²

BOTTOM: Not a whit. I have a device to make all well. Write me a prologue, and let the prologue seem to say we will do no harm with our swords, and that Pyramus is not killed indeed. And for the more better assurance, tell them that I, Pyramus, am not Pyramus but Bottom the weaver. This will put them out of fear.

QUINCE: Well, we will have such a prologue, and it shall be written in eight and six.³

BOTTOM: No, make it two more: let it be written in eight and eight.

SNOOT: Will not the ladies be afeard of the lion?

STARVELING: I fear it, I promise you.

BOTTOM: Masters, you ought to consider with yourself, to bring in—God shield us!—a lion among ladies is a most dreadful thing. For there is not a more fearful⁴ wildfowl than your lion living. And we ought to look to't.

SNOOT: Therefore another prologue must tell he is not a lion.

BOTTOM: Nay, you must name his name, and half his face must be seen through the lion's neck, and he himself must speak through, saying thus or to the same defect:⁵ "Ladies," or "Fair Ladies, I would wish you," or "I would request you," or "I would entreat you not to fear, not to tremble. My life for yours.⁶ If you think I come hither as a lion, it were pity of⁷ my life. No, I am no such thing. I am a man as other men are"—and there indeed let him name his name, and tell them plainly he is Snug the joiner.

QUINCE: Well, it shall be so. But there is two hard things: that is, to bring the moonlight into a chamber—for you know Pyramus and Thisbe meet by moonlight.

SNOOT:⁸ Doth the moon shine that night we play our play?

5. [Location: Remains the same.] 6. Rustics. 7. On the dot.

8. Dressing room. Brake: thorn brake. 9. Good fellow; jolly.

1. Perilous. By'r lakin: by our ladykin (Virgin Mary): a mild oath. 2. When all is said and done.

3. Alternate lines of eight and six syllables (a common ballad measure).

4. Frightening. A lion . . . thing: In 1594, at a feast in honor of the christening of King James's son, a tame lion that was supposed to draw a chariot was replaced by a black African man in order to avoid frightening the audience. 5. (For "effect.") 6. I pledge my life to defend yours. 7. A threat to.

8. [Or Snug. Some sources use "Sn."]

BOTTOM: A calendar, a calendar! Look in the almanac; find out moonshine, find out moonshine!

QUINCE: Yes, it doth shine that night.

BOTTOM: Why, then may you leave a casement of the great chamber window 40 where we play open, and the moon may shine in at the casement.

QUINCE: Ay, or else one must come in with a bush of thorns and a lantern and say he comes to disfigure, or to present,⁹ the person of Moonshine. Then there is another thing: we must have a wall in the great chamber; for Pyramus and Thisbe, says the story, did talk through the chink of a wall.

45 SNOUT: You can never bring in a wall. What say you, Bottom?

BOTTOM: Some man or other must present Wall; and let him have some plaster, or some loam, or some roughcast¹ about him to signify "wall"; or let him hold his fingers thus, and through that cranny shall Pyramus and Thisbe whisper.

50 QUINCE: If that may be, then all is well. Come, sit down, every mother's son, and rehearse your parts. Pyramus, you begin. When you have spoken your speech, enter into that brake, and so everyone according to his cue.

Enter ROBIN[, invisible].

ROBIN: [aside] What hempen homespuns² have we swaggering here
So near the cradle of the Fairy Queen?

55 What, a play toward?³ I'll be an auditor—
An actor too perhaps, if I see cause.

QUINCE: Speak, Pyramus. —Thisbe, stand forth.

BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] "Thisbe, the flowers of odious⁴ savors sweet—"

QUINCE: Odors—"odorous"!

60 BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] "—Odors savors sweet.

So hath thy breath, my dearest Thisbe dear.
But hark, a voice! Stay thou but here a while,
And by and by I will to thee appear."

Exit.

QUINCE: A stranger Pyramus than e'er played here.

[Exit.]

65 FLUTE: Must I speak now?

QUINCE: Ay, marry, must you. For you must understand he goes but to see a noise that he heard and is to come again.

FLUTE: [as Thisbe] "Most radiant Pyramus, most lily-white of hue, 70 Of color like the red rose on triumphant briar,

Most brisky juvenal and eke most lovely Jew,⁵
As true as truest horse that yet would never tire,
I'll meet thee, Pyramus, at Ninny's tomb—"

9. Represent. Disfigure: blunder for "figure," represent. Bush of thorns: bundle of thornbush kindling (like the lantern, a traditional accessory of the man in the moon).

1. Mixture of lime and gravel used to plaster exterior walls.

2. Peasants, or country bumpkins, dressed in coarse homespun fabric made from hemp.

3. In preparation. 4. (For "odorous.")

5. Not often considered "lovely" by Elizabethan Christians; usually, a term of abuse (here, echoing the first syllable of "juvenal"). Eke: also. Juvenal: lively youth (juvenile).

QUINCE: "Ninus⁶ tomb," man! Why, you must not speak that yet; that you answer to Pyramus. You speak all your part at once, cues and all. —Pyramus, enter! Your cue is past; it is "never tire." 75

FLUTE: Oh,

[as Thisbe] "As true as truest horse that yet would never tire."

[Enter ROBIN, invisible, and BOTTOM with the ass head on.]

BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] "If I were fair, Thisbe, I were⁷ only thine."

QUINCE: Oh, monstrous! Oh, strange! We are haunted! Pray, masters! Fly, masters! Help! [Exeunt QUINCE, SNOOT, STARVELING, FLUTE, and SNUG.] 80

ROBIN: I'll follow you, I'll lead you about a round,⁸

Through bog, through bush, through brake, through briar.

Sometime a horse I'll be, sometime a hound,

A hog, a headless bear, sometime a fire,⁹

And neigh and bark and grunt and roar and burn, 85

Like horse, hound, hog, bear, fire, at every turn. Exit.

BOTTOM: Why do they run away? This is a knavery of them to make me afeard.

Enter SNOOT.

SNOOT: O Bottom, thou art changed! What do I see on thee?

BOTTOM: What do you see? You see an ass head of your own,¹ do you?

[Exit SNOOT.]

Enter QUINCE.

QUINCE: Bless thee, Bottom, bless thee! Thou art translated.² Exit. 90

BOTTOM: I see their knavery. This is to make an ass of me, to fright me, if they could. But I will not stir from this place, do what they can. I will walk up and down here, and I will sing, that they shall hear I am not afraid.

[Sings.]

The ouzel cock,³ so black of hue,

With orange-tawny bill, 95

The throstle⁴ with his note so true,

The wren with little quill⁵—

TITANIA: [awaking] What angel wakes me from my flowery bed?

BOTTOM: [sings]

The finch, the sparrow, and the lark,

The plainsong⁶ cuckoo gray, 100

Whose note full many a man doth mark

And dares not answer "Nay"⁷—

6. Mythical founder of Nineveh, whose wife, Semiramis, was believed to have founded Babylon, the setting for the story of Pyramus and Thisbe. Flute's mistake, "Ninny," means "fool."

7. Would be. Fair: handsome. 8. In circles. 9. Will-o'-the-wisp.

1. You see a figment of your own asinine imagination. 2. Transformed. 3. Male blackbird

4. Song thrush. 5. Feathers. 6. A melody sung without adornment (that is, the cuckoo's call).

7. Deny. (The cuckoo's call was associated with cuckoldry.)

for indeed, who would set his wit to so foolish a bird? Who would give a bird the lie, though he cry “cuckoo” never so?⁸

105 TITANIA: I pray thee, gentle mortal, sing again.
 Mine ear is much enamored of thy note;
 So is mine eye enthralled to thy shape,
 And thy fair virtue's force⁹ perforce doth move me
 On the first view to say, to swear, I love thee.

110 BOTTOM: Methinks, mistress, you should have little reason for that. And yet, to say the truth, reason and love keep little company together nowadays—the more the pity that some honest neighbors will not make them friends. Nay, I can gleek¹ upon occasion.

TITANIA: Thou art as wise as thou art beautiful.

115 BOTTOM: Not so neither; but if I had wit enough to get out of this wood, I have enough to serve mine own turn.²

TITANIA: Out of this wood do not desire to go.

Thou shalt remain here, whether thou wilt or no.
 I am a spirit of no common rate³—

120 The summer still doth tend upon my state⁴—
 And I do love thee. Therefore go with me.
 I'll give thee fairies to attend on thee,
 And they shall fetch thee jewels from the deep
 And sing while thou on pressed flowers dost sleep.
 125 And I will purge thy mortal grossness so
 That thou shalt like an airy spirit go.
 Peaseblossom, Cobweb, Moth,⁵ and Mustardseed!

Enter four FAIRIES[: PEASEBLOSSOM, COBWEB, MOTH, and MUSTARDSEED].

PEASEBLOSSOM: Ready.

COBWEB: And I.

MOTH: And I.

MUSTARDSEED: And I.

ALL: Where shall we go?

TITANIA: Be kind and courteous to this gentleman.

130 Hop in his walks and gambol in his eyes;
 Feed him with apricots and dewberries,
 With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries;
 The honey bags steal from the humble-bees,⁶
 And for night-tapers crop their waxen thighs,
 135 And light them at the fiery glowworms' eyes
 To have⁷ my love to bed and to arise;
 And pluck the wings from painted butterflies
 To fan the moonbeams from his sleeping eyes.
 Nod to him, elves, and do him courtesies.

8. Ever so much. Who . . . lie: Who would call a bird a liar? Set his wit to: pay heed to.

9. The power of your good or beautiful qualities. 1. Make jokes. 2. Purpose. 3. Rank.

4. Serves me, as part of my royal retinue. Still: always; continually.

5. [Speck. Some sources use the spelling “Mote.” Mote and Moth both had the same pronunciation.]

6. Bumblebees. 7. Lead.

PEASEBLOSSOM: Hail, mortal! 140
 COBWEB: Hail!
 MOTH: Hail!
 MUSTARDSEED: Hail!
 BOTTOM: I cry your worships' mercy,⁸ heartily. —I beseech your worship's name.
 COBWEB: Cobweb. 145
 BOTTOM: I shall desire you of more acquaintance, good Master Cobweb. If I cut my finger,⁹ I shall make bold with you. —Your name, honest gentleman?
 PEASEBLOSSOM: Peaseblossom.
 BOTTOM: I pray you commend me to Mistress Squash, your mother, and to Master Peascod,¹ your father. Good Master Peaseblossom, I shall desire you of 150 more acquaintance too. —Your name, I beseech you, sir?
 MUSTARDSEED: Mustardseed.
 BOTTOM: Good Master Mustardseed, I know your patience² well. That same cowardly, giant-like ox-beef³ hath devoured many a gentleman of your house.
 I promise you, your kindred hath made my eyes water ere now. I desire you 155 of more acquaintance, good Master Mustardseed.
 TITANIA: [to the FAIRIES] Come, wait upon him. Lead him to my bower.
 The moon methinks looks with a watery eye,
 And when she weeps, weeps every little flower,⁴
 Lamenting some enforcèd⁵ chastity. 160
 Tie up my lover's tongue;⁶ bring him silently. [Exeunt.]

3.2⁷

Enter [OBERON,] King of Fairies.

OBERON: I wonder if Titania be awaked;
 Then what it was that next came in her eye,
 Which she must dote on in extremity.

Enter ROBIN Goodfellow.

Here comes my messenger. How now, mad spirit?
 What night-rule⁸ now about this haunted grove? 5
 ROBIN: My mistress with a monster is in love.
 Near to her close⁹ and consecrated bower,
 While she was in her dull¹ and sleeping hour,
 A crew of patches, rude mechanicals²
 That work for bread upon Athenian stalls,³ 10
 Were met together to rehearse a play
 Intended for great Theseus' nuptial day.

8. I beg pardon of your honors. 9. Cobwebs were used to stop bleeding.

1. Ripe pea pod (called "your father" because it suggests "codpiece"). Squash: unripe pea pod.

2. What you have suffered with fortitude.

3. Because beef is often eaten with mustard, or because oxen munch on mustard plants.

4. Dew was thought to originate on the moon. 5. Violated; involuntary.

6. Bottom is perhaps making involuntary asinine noises. 7. Location: The wood.

8. Night revels; sports. 9. Private. 1. Drowsy. 2. Rough workmen. Patches: fools.

3. Market stands.

The shallowest thick-skin of that barren sort,⁴
 Who Pyramus presented⁵ in their sport,
 15 Forsook his scene⁶ and entered in a brake.
 When I did him at this advantage take,
 An ass's nole⁷ I fixèd on his head.
 Anon his Thisbe must be answerèd,
 And forth my mimic⁸ comes. When they him spy—
 20 As wild geese that the creeping fowler⁹ eye,
 Or russet-pated choughs, many in sort,¹
 Rising and cawing at the gun's report,
 Sever² themselves and madly sweep the sky—
 So at his sight away his fellows fly,
 25 And at our stamp³ here o'er and o'er one falls.
 He⁴ "Murder!" cries and help from Athens calls.
 Their sense thus weak, lost with their fears thus strong,
 Made senseless things begin to do them wrong.
 For briars and thorns at their apparel snatch,
 30 Some sleeves, some hats: from yielders all things catch.⁵
 I led them on in this distracted fear
 And left sweet Pyramus translated there,
 When in that moment, so it came to pass,
 Titania waked and straightway loved an ass.
 35 OBERON: This falls out better than I could devise.
 But hast thou yet latched⁶ the Athenian's eyes
 With the love juice, as I did bid thee do?
 ROBIN: I took him sleeping—that is finished, too—
 And the Athenian woman by his side,
 40 That when he waked, of force⁷ she must be eyed.

Enter DEMETRIUS and HERMIA.

OBERON: Stand close. This is the same Athenian.

ROBIN: This is the woman, but not this the man.

[OBERON and ROBIN stand apart.]

DEMETRIUS: Oh, why rebuke you him that loves you so?

Lay breath so bitter on your bitter foe.

45 HERMIA: Now I but chide, but I should use thee worse,

For thou, I fear, hast given me cause to curse.

If thou hast slain Lysander in his sleep,

Being o'er shoes⁸ in blood, plunge in the deep,

And kill me too.

50 The sun was not so true unto the day

As he to me. Would he have stolen away

4. Witless lot. 5. Acted. 6. Stage.

7. Head. 8. Burlesque actor. 9. Hunter of birds.

1. Together, in a flock. Russet-pated choughs: gray-headed jackdaws. 2. Scatter.

3. Editors have wondered how a fairy's presumably tiny foot could cause the human to fall.

4. One (workman). 5. Everything robs the timid. 6. Anointed. 7. Necessity. That: so that.

8. Having waded so far.

- From sleeping Hermia? I'll believe as soon
 This whole⁹ earth may be bored, and that the moon
 May through the center creep and so displease
 Her brother's noontide with the Antipodes.¹ 55
 It cannot be but thou hast murdered him.
 So should a murderer look: so dead,² so grim.
- DEMETRIUS: So should the murdered look, and so should I,
 Pierced through the heart with your stern cruelty.
 Yet you, the murderer, look as bright, as clear, 60
 As yonder Venus in her glimmering sphere.³
- HERMIA: What's this to my Lysander? Where is he?
 Ah, good Demetrius, wilt thou give him me?
- DEMETRIUS: I had rather give his carcass to my hounds.
- HERMIA: Out, dog! Out, cur! Thou driv'st me past the bounds 65
 Of maiden's patience. Hast thou slain him, then?
 Henceforth be never numbered among men.
 Oh, once tell true; tell true, even for my sake:
 Durst thou have looked upon him being awake,
 And hast thou killed him sleeping? Oh, brave touch!⁴ 70
 Could not a worm,⁵ an adder do so much?
 An adder did it; for with doubler⁶ tongue
 Than thine, thou serpent, never adder stung.
- DEMETRIUS: You spend your passion on a misprised mood.⁷
 I am not guilty of Lysander's blood, 75
 Nor is he dead, for aught that I can tell.
- HERMIA: I pray thee, tell me then that he is well.
- DEMETRIUS: And if I could, what should I get therefore?⁸
- HERMIA: A privilege, never to see me more;
 And from thy hated presence part I so. 80
 See me no more, whether he be dead or no. Exit.
- DEMETRIUS: There is no following her in this fierce vein.
 Here therefore for a while I will remain.
 So sorrow's heaviness⁹ doth heavier grow
 For debt that bankrupt sleep doth sorrow owe,¹ 85
 Which now in some slight measure it will pay,
 If for his tender here I make some stay.²
- [He] lies down [and sleeps].
- OSBERON: [to ROBIN] What hast thou done? Thou hast mistaken quite
 And laid the love juice on some true love's sight.
 Of thy misprision³ must perforce ensue 90

9. Solid.

1. That the moon could creep through a hole bored through the earth's center and emerge on the other side, the Antipodes, displeasing the inhabitants by displacing the noontide sun with the darkness of night. (Apollo, the sun god, was the brother of Diana, the moon goddess.) 2. Deathly pale.

3. Orbit. 4. Noble stroke. 5. Serpent. 6. More forked (of the adder); more duplicitous (of Demetrius).

7. In misconceived anger. 8. For that. 9. Sadness (punning on "heavy": drowsy).

1. Because sorrow worsens without sleep.

2. I will rest here awhile, giving sleep capital ("tender") to pay off some of its debt to sorrow. 3. Mistake

Some true love turned, and not a false turned true.

ROBIN: Then fate o'errules, that, one man holding troth,⁴

A million fail, confounding oath on oath.⁵

OBERON: About the wood go swifter than the wind,

95 And Helena of Athens look⁶ thou find.

All fancy-sick she is and pale of cheer⁷

With sighs of love that costs the fresh blood dear.⁸

By some illusion see thou bring her here;

I'll charm his eyes against⁹ she do appear.

100 ROBIN: I go, I go; look how I go,

Swifter than arrow from the Tartar's bow.¹

[Exit.]

OBERON: [squeezing the juice on DEMETRIUS' eyes] Flower of this purple dye,

Hit with Cupid's archery,

Sink in apple² of his eye.

105 When his love he doth espy,

Let her shine as gloriously

As the Venus of the sky.

When thou wak'st, if she be by,

Beg of her for remedy.

Enter [ROBIN Goodfellow, the] puck.

110 ROBIN: Captain of our fairy band,

Helena is here at hand,

And the youth mistook by me,

Pleading for a lover's fee.³

Shall we their fond⁴ pageant see?

115 Lord, what fools these mortals be!

OBERON: Stand aside. The noise they make

Will cause Demetrius to awake.

ROBIN: Then will two at once woo one;

That must needs be sport alone.⁵

120 And those things do best please me

That befall preposterously.⁶

[They stand apart.]

Enter LYSANDER and HELENA.

LYSANDER: Why should you think that I should woo in scorn?

Scorn and derision never come in tears.

Look when I vow, I weep, and vows so born,

125 In their nativity all truth appears.⁷

4. Faith. 5. Among the millions of faithless men, the one true man's oath has been subverted by fate.

6. Be sure. 7. Face. Fancy-sick: lovesick. 8. Sighs were thought to cause a loss of blood.

9. In readiness for when.

1. Tartars, a dark-skinned, supposedly savage people in Asia Minor, were famed for their skills in archery.

2. Pupil. 3. Reward. 4. Foolish. 5. In itself. 6. Ass backward.

7. The fact that I am weeping authenticates my vow's sincerity.

How can these things in me seem scorn to you,
 Bearing the badge of faith⁸ to prove them true?

HELENA: You do advance⁹ your cunning more and more.
 When truth kills truth¹—oh, devilish-holy fray!
 These vows are Hermia's. Will you give her o'er? 130
 Weigh oath with oath, and you will nothing weigh.²
 Your vows to her and me put in two scales
 Will even weigh, and both as light as tales.³

LYSANDER: I had no judgment when to her I swore.

HELENA: Nor none, in my mind, now you give her o'er. 135

LYSANDER: Demetrius loves her, and he loves not you.

DEMETRIUS: [awaking] O Helen, goddess, nymph, perfect, divine!
 To what, my love, shall I compare thine eyne?
 Crystal is muddy. Oh, how ripe in show⁴
 Thy lips, those kissing cherries, tempting grow! 140
 That pure congealèd white, high Taurus⁵ snow,
 Fanned with the eastern wind, turns to a crow⁶
 When thou hold'st up thy hand. Oh, let me kiss
 This princess of pure white, this seal⁷ of bliss!

HELENA: Oh, spite! Oh, hell! I see you all are bent 145
 To set against me for your merriment.
 If you were civil and knew courtesy,
 You would not do me thus much injury.
 Can you not hate me, as I know you do,
 But you must join in souls to mock me too? 150
 If you were men, as men you are in show,
 You would not use a gentle⁸ lady so,
 To vow and swear and superpraise my parts,⁹
 When I am sure you hate me with your hearts.
 You both are rivals and love Hermia, 155
 And now both rivals to mock Helena.
 A trim¹ exploit, a manly enterprise,
 To conjure tears up in a poor maid's eyes
 With your derision. None of noble sort²
 Would so offend a virgin and extort³ 160
 A poor soul's patience, all to make you sport.

LYSANDER: You are unkind, Demetrius; be not so.
 For you love Hermia; this you know I know.
 And here, with all good will, with all my heart,
 In Hermia's love I yield you up my part; 165
 And yours of Helena to me bequeath,
 Whom I do love and will do till my death.

8. Insignia, such as that worn on a servant's livery (here, his tears). 9. Increase; display.

1. When one vow nullifies another.

2. You will find that neither oath has any substance; you, Lysander, will be found to have no substance. 3. Lies; fiction. 4. Appearance. 5. Range of high mountains in Asia Minor.

6. Appears black by contrast. 7. Pledge 8. Well-born; mild. 9. Overpraise my qualities. 1. Fine.

2. Rank; nature. 3. Torture.

HELENA: Never did mockers waste more idle breath.

DEMETRIUS: Lysander, keep thy Hermia. I will none.⁴

170 If e'er I loved her, all that love is gone.
My heart to her but as guest-wise⁵ sojourned,
And now to Helen is it home returned,
There to remain.

LYSANDER: Helen, it is not so.

DEMETRIUS: Disparage not the faith thou dost not know,

175 Lest to thy peril thou aby it dear.⁶
Look where thy love comes; yonder is thy dear.

Enter HERMIA.

HERMIA: Dark night, that from the eye his⁷ function takes,
The ear more quick of apprehension makes.

180 Wherein it doth impair the seeing sense,
It pays the hearing double recompense.
Thou art not by mine eye, Lysander, found;
Mine ear, I thank it, brought me to thy sound.
But why unkindly didst thou leave me so?

LYSANDER: Why should he stay whom love doth press to go?

185 HERMIA: What love could press Lysander from my side?

LYSANDER: Lysander's love, that would not let him bide:

Fair Helena, who more engilds the night
Than all yon fiery oes and eyes of light.⁸

[to HERMIA] Why seek'st thou me? Could not this make thee know 190 The hate I bare thee made me leave thee so?

HERMIA: You speak not as you think; it cannot be.

HELENA: Lo, she is one of this confederacy.

Now I perceive they have conjoined all three
To fashion this false sport in spite of⁹ me.

195 Injurious Hermia, most ungrateful maid,
Have you conspired, have you with these contrived
To bait¹ me with this foul derision?

Is all the counsel² that we two have shared,
The sisters' vows, the hours that we have spent

200 When we have chid the hasty-footed time
For parting us—oh, is all forgot,
All schooldays' friendship, childhood innocence?

We, Hermia, like two artificial³ gods

Have with our needles created both one flower,

205 Both on one sampler, sitting on one cushion,
Both warbling of one song, both in one key,
As if our hands, our sides, voices, and minds

4. I will have nothing to do with her. 5. As a guest. 6. Pay for it dearly. 7. Its.

8. Stars (punning on the vowels and on lovers' exclamatory "oh"s and "ay"s). An "o" was a spangle.

9. To spite. 1. To torment (as Elizabethans set dogs to bait a bear). 2. Intimacy.

3. Artfully skilled.

- Had been incorporate.⁴ So we grew together
 Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,
 But yet an union in partition, 210
 Two lovely berries molded on one stem;
 So with two seeming bodies but one heart,
 Two of the first,⁵ like coats in heraldry,
 Due but to one and crownèd with one crest.
 And will you rent our ancient love asunder, 215
 To join with men in scorning your poor friend?
 It is not friendly, 'tis not maidenly.
 Our sex as well as I may chide you for it,
 Though I alone do feel the injury.
- HERMIA: I am amazèd at your words. 220
 I scorn you not; it seems that you scorn me.
- HELENA: Have you not set Lysander, as in scorn,
 To follow me and praise my eyes and face?
 And made your other love, Demetrius—
 Who even but now⁶ did spurn me with his foot— 225
 To call me goddess, nymph, divine, and rare,
 Precious, celestial? Wherefore speaks he this
 To her he hates? And wherefore doth Lysander
 Deny your love—so rich within his soul—
 And tender⁷ me, forsooth, affection, 230
 But by your setting on, by your consent?
 What though I be not so in grace⁸ as you,
 So hung upon with love, so fortunate,
 But miserable most, to love unloved?
 This you should pity rather than despise. 235
- HERMIA: I understand not what you mean by this.
- HELENA: I do. Persever, counterfeit sad⁹ looks,
 Make mouths upon¹ me when I turn my back,
 Wink each at other, hold the sweet jest up.²
 This sport well carried shall be chronicled. 240
 If you have any pity, grace, or manners,
 You would not make me such an argument.³
 But fare ye well. 'Tis partly my own fault,
 Which death or absence soon shall remedy.
- LYSANDER: Stay, gentle Helena, hear my excuse, 245
 My love, my life, my soul, fair Helena!
- HELENA: Oh, excellent!
- HERMIA: [to LYSANDER] Sweet, do not scorn her so.
- DEMETRIUS: If she cannot entreat, I can compel.⁴

4. Of one body.

5. A technical phrase in heraldry, referring to the first quartering in a coat of arms, which may be repeated. The friends then have two bodies but a single, overarching identity. 6. Just now. 7. Offer.

8. Favor. 9. Serious. 1. Make faces at. 2. Keep up the joke. 3. A subject of merriment.

4. If Hermia cannot entreat you to stop, I can make you do it.

- LYSANDER: Thou canst compel no more than she entreat.
 250 Thy threats have no more strength than her weak prayers.
 —Helen, I love thee, by my life, I do!
 I swear by that which I will lose for thee
 To prove him false that says I love thee not.
- DEMETRIUS: [to HELENA] I say I love thee more than he can do.
- 255 LYSANDER: If thou say so, withdraw,⁵ and prove it too.
 DEMETRIUS: Quick, come!
 HERMIA: Lysander, whereto tends all this?
 LYSANDER: Away, you Ethiope!⁶
- [He tries to break away from HERMIA.]*
- DEMETRIUS: [to HERMIA] No, no, he'll
 Seem to break loose. [to LYSANDER] Take on as⁷ you would follow,
 But yet come not. You are a tame man, go!
- 260 LYSANDER: [to HERMIA] Hang off,⁸ thou cat, thou burr! Vile thing, let loose,
 Or I will shake thee from me like a serpent.
- HERMIA: Why are you grown so rude? What change is this, Sweet love?
 LYSANDER: Thy love? Out, tawny Tartar, out!
 Out, loathèd medicine!⁹ O hated potion, hence!
- HERMIA: Do you not jest?
- 265 HELENA: Yes, sooth,¹ and so do you.
 LYSANDER: Demetrius, I will keep my word with thee.
 DEMETRIUS: I would I had your bond, for I perceive
 A weak bond² holds you. I'll not trust your word.
- LYSANDER: What? Should I hurt her, strike her, kill her dead?
 270 Although I hate her, I'll not harm her so.
- HERMIA: What? Can you do me greater harm than hate?
 Hate me? Wherefore? Oh, me, what news,³ my love?
 Am not I Hermia? Are not you Lysander?
 I am as fair now as I was erewhile.⁴
- 275 Since night you loved me, yet since night you left me.
 Why then, you left me—oh, the gods forbid—
 In earnest, shall I say?
- LYSANDER: Ay, by my life,
 And never did desire to see thee more.
 Therefore be out of hope, of question, of doubt;
 280 Be certain, nothing truer. 'Tis no jest
 That I do hate thee and love Helena.
- HERMIA: [to HELENA] Oh, me, you juggler, you canker-blossom,⁵

5. Come with me ("step outside").

6. Allusion to Hermia's dark hair and complexion. Elizabethans generally regarded light complexions as more beautiful than dark and often stigmatized dark-skinned peoples (such as Ethiopians or Tartars) as ugly. 7. Pretend. He'll . . . loose: Lysander will only pretend to break free from Hermia.

8. Let go. 9. Any drug (including poison). 1. Truly.

2. Hermia's weak grasp (with a pun on "bond": signed oath, the meaning in the previous line).

3. What has happened. 4. A while ago.

5. A worm that devours blossoms (of love). Juggler: trickster.

You thief of love! What, have you come by night
 And stolen my love's heart from him?

HELENA: Fine, i'faith. 285
 Have you no modesty, no maiden shame,
 No touch of bashfulness? What, will you tear
 Impatient answers from my gentle tongue?
 Fie, fie, you counterfeit, you puppet,⁶ you!

HERMIA: "Puppet"? Why so? —Ay, that way goes the game. 290
 Now I perceive that she hath made compare
 Between our statures; she hath urged her height,
 And with her personage, her tall personage,
 Her height, forsooth, she hath prevailed with him.
 —And are you grown so high in his esteem
 Because I am so dwarfish and so low? 295
 How low am I, thou painted maypole?⁷ Speak!
 How low am I? I am not yet so low
 But that my nails can reach unto thine eyes.

HELENA: I pray you, though you mock me, gentlemen,
 Let her not hurt me. I was never curst;⁸ 300
 I have no gift at all in shrewishness.
 I am a right⁹ maid for my cowardice.
 Let her not strike me. You perhaps may think Because she is something¹ lower than myself
 That I can match her.

HERMIA: "Lower"? Hark, again! 305

HELENA: Good Hermia, do not be so bitter with me.
 I evermore did love you, Hermia,
 Did ever keep your counsels, never wronged you,
 Save that, in love unto Demetrius,
 I told him of your stealth² unto this wood. 310
 He followed you; for love I followed him.
 But he hath chid me hence and threatened me
 To strike me, spurn me, nay, to kill me too.
 And now, so³ you will let me quiet go,
 To Athens will I bear my folly back 315
 And follow you no further. Let me go.
 You see how simple and how fond⁴ I am.

HERMIA: Why, get you gone. Who is't that hinders you?

HELENA: A foolish heart that I leave here behind.

HERMIA: What, with Lysander?

HELENA: With Demetrius. 320

LYSANDER: Be not afraid; she shall not harm thee, Helena.
 DEMETRIUS: No, sir, she shall not, though you take her part.
 HELENA: Oh, when she is angry she is keen and shrewd.⁵

6. Fraudulent imitation; but Hermia interprets "puppet" as a reference to her height.

7. Proverbial epithet for someone tall and skinny. Painted: insulting allusion to the use of cosmetics.

8. Quarrelsome. 9. Proper. 1. Somewhat. 2. Stealing away. 3. If only. 4. Foolish.

5. Shrewish. Keen: sharp.

325 She was a vixen when she went to school,
 And though she be but little, she is fierce.
 HERMIA: "Little" again? Nothing but "low" and "little"?
 Why will you suffer her to flout me thus?
 Let me come to her.

LYSANDER: Get you gone, you dwarf,
 You minimus of hind'ring knot-grass⁶ made,
 You bead, you acorn.

330 DEMETRIUS: You are too officious
 In her behalf that scorns your services.
 Let her alone: speak not of Helena;
 Take not her part. For if thou dost intend Never so little⁷ show of love to her,
 Thou shalt aby⁸ it.

335 LYSANDER: Now she holds me not;
 Now follow, if thou dar'st, to try whose right,
 Of thine or mine, is most in Helena.

DEMETRIUS: Follow? Nay, I'll go with thee, cheek by jowl.⁹

[Exeunt LYSANDER and DEMETRIUS.]

HERMIA: You, mistress, all this coil is long¹ of you.
 Nay, go not back.

340 HELENA: I will not trust you, I,
 Nor longer stay in your curst company.
 Your hands than mine are quicker for a fray;²
 My legs are longer, though, to run away.

[Exit.]

HERMIA: I am amazed and know not what to say.

[Exit.]

[OBERON and ROBIN come forward.]

345 OBERON: This is thy negligence. Still³ thou mistak'st
 Or else committ'st thy knaveries willfully.

ROBIN: Believe me, king of shadows,⁴ I mistook.
 Did not you tell me I should know the man
 By the Athenian garments he had on?

350 And so far⁵ blameless proves my enterprise
 That I have 'nointed an Athenian's eyes;
 And so far am I glad it so did sort,⁶
 As this their jangling⁷ I esteem a sport.

OBERON: Thou seest these lovers seek a place to fight.
 355 Hie⁸ therefore, Robin, overcast the night;
 The starry welkin⁹ cover thou anon
 With drooping fog as black as Acheron,¹
 And lead these testy rivals so astray
 As² one come not within another's way.

6. Creeping binding weed (its sap was thought to stunt human growth). Minimus: diminutive thing (Latin).

7. Even the smallest. 8. Pay for. 9. Proverbial saying for "side by side." 1. Because. Coil: turmoil.

2. Fight. 3. Always. 4. Fairy spirits. 5. To this extent. 6. Turn out. 7. Bickering. As: since.

8. Hurry. 9. Sky. 1. (River of hell). 2. So that.

Like to Lysander sometime frame thy tongue, 360
 Then stir Demetrius up with bitter wrong;³
 And sometime rail thou like Demetrius,
 And from each other look thou lead them thus
 Till o'er their brows death-counterfeiting sleep
 With leaden legs and batty⁴ wings doth creep. 365
 Then crush this herb into Lysander's eye,
 Whose liquor hath this virtuous⁵ property:
 To take from thence all error with his might
 And make his eyeballs roll with wonted⁶ sight.
 When they next wake, all this derision 370
 Shall seem a dream and fruitless⁷ vision,
 And back to Athens shall the lovers wend⁸
 With league whose date⁹ till death shall never end.
 Whiles I in this affair do thee employ,
 I'll to my queen and beg her Indian boy; 375
 And then I will her charmèd¹ eye release
 From monster's view, and all things shall be peace.
 ROBIN: My fairy lord, this must be done with haste,
 For night's swift dragons² cut the clouds full fast,
 And yonder shines Aurora's harbinger,³ 380
 At whose approach ghosts wandering here and there
 Troop home to churchyards; damnèd spirits all,
 That in crossways and floods⁴ have burial,
 Already to their wormy beds are gone,
 For fear lest day should look their shames upon: 385
 They willfully themselves exile from light
 And must for aye⁵ consort with black-browed night.
 OBERON: But we are spirits of another sort.
 I with the morning's love⁶ have oft made sport,
 And like a forester⁷ the groves may tread 390
 Even till the eastern gate, all fiery red,
 Opening on Neptune⁸ with fair blessèd beams
 Turns into yellow gold his salt⁹ green streams.
 But notwithstanding, haste, make no delay;
 We may effect this business yet ere day. [Exit.] 395
 ROBIN: Up and down, up and down,

3. Insults. 4. Batlike. 5. Potent. 6. Normal. 7. Inconsequential. 8. Go.

9. Duration. League: covenant. 1. Enchanted.

2. Imagined as drawing the chariots of the goddess of night.

3. Herald of the goddess of dawn; the morning star.

4. In which the drowned were "buried," without Christian sacrament. Crossways: crossroads (where suicides were buried, also without Christian sacrament). Robin is differentiating here between two types of spirits: those who wandered from their churchyard graves and those who have no proper resting place. These two types, both ghosts of former humans, are differentiated in turn from the fairy spirits by Oberon in the ensuing lines. 5. Forever.

6. The love of Aurora, goddess of dawn (or Cephalus, a brave hunter, Aurora's lover).

7. Keeper of a royal forest or private park. 8. (The sea.) 9. Salty.

I will lead them up and down.
 I am feared in field and town.
 Goblin,¹ lead them up and down.
 Here comes one.

400

Enter LYSANDER.

LYSANDER: Where art thou, proud Demetrius? Speak thou now.

ROBIN: Here, villain, drawn² and ready. Where art thou?

LYSANDER: I will be with thee straight.³

ROBIN: Follow me then

To plainer⁴ ground.

[Exit LYSANDER.]

Enter DEMETRIUS.

DEMETRIUS: Lysander, speak again.

405

Thou runaway, thou coward, art thou fled?

Speak! In some bush? Where dost thou hide thy head?

ROBIN: Thou coward, art thou bragging to the stars,

Telling the bushes that thou look'st for wars,

And wilt not come? Come, recreant;⁵ come, thou child.

410

I'll whip thee with a rod. He is defiled

That draws a sword on thee.⁶

DEMETRIUS: Yea, art thou there?

ROBIN: Follow my voice; we'll try⁷ no manhood here.

Exeunt.

[Enter LYSANDER.]

LYSANDER: He goes before me and still dares me on.

When I come where he calls, then he is gone.

415

The villain is much lighter-heeled than I.

I followed fast, but faster he did fly,

That⁸ fallen am I in dark uneven way,

And here will rest me.

[He lies down.]

Come, thou gentle day.

For if but once thou show me thy gray light,

420

I'll find Demetrius and revenge this spite.

[He sleeps.]

[Enter] ROBIN and DEMETRIUS.

ROBIN: Ho, ho, ho! Coward, why com'st thou not?

DEMETRIUS: Abide me, if thou dar'st; for well I wot⁹

1. (Robin himself.)

2. With sword drawn. Robin: In what follows, Robin presumably mimics the voices of Demetrius and Lysander. 3. Immediately. 4. He might instead wander about the stage. Plainer: clearer.

5. Coward; wretch. 6. That is, it would be a disgrace to treat you as an honorable opponent. 7. Test.

8. With the result that. 9. Know. Abide: wait for.

Thou runn'st before me, shifting every place,
 And dar'st not stand nor look me in the face.
 Where art thou now?

ROBIN: Come hither; I am here. 425

DEMETRIUS: Nay, then, thou mock'st me. Thou shalt buy this dear¹
 If ever I thy face by daylight see.
 Now, go thy way. Faintness constraineth me
 To measure out my length on this cold bed.

[He lies down.]

By day's approach look to be visited. 430

[He sleeps.]

Enter HELENA.

HELENA: O weary night, O long and tedious night,
 Abate² thy hours; shine comforts from the east,
 That I may back to Athens by daylight
 From these that my poor company detest;
 And sleep, that sometimes shuts up sorrow's eye,
 Steal me a while from mine own company. 435

[She lies down and] sleep[s].

ROBIN: Yet but three? Come one more;
 Two of both kinds makes up four.

[Enter HERMIA.]

Here she comes, curst³ and sad.
 Cupid is a knavish lad
 Thus to make poor females mad. 440

HERMIA: Never so weary, never so in woe,
 Bedabbled with the dew and torn with briars,
 I can no further crawl, no further go;
 My legs can keep no pace with my desires. 445
 Here will I rest me till the break of day.

[She lies down.]

Heavens shield Lysander, if they mean a fray.

[She sleeps.]

ROBIN: On the ground,
 Sleep sound.
 I'll apply
 To your eye,
 Gentle lover, remedy. 450

[He squeezes the juice on LYSANDER'S eyes.]

1. Dearly. Buy: pay for. 2. Shorten. 3. Angry.

When thou wak'st,
 Thou tak'st
 455 True delight
 In the sight
 Of thy former lady's eye;
 And the country proverb known,
 That every man should take his own,
 460 In your waking shall be shown.
 Jack shall have Jill,
 Naught shall go ill,
 The man shall have his mare again, and all shall be well.

[Exit. The lovers remain onstage, asleep.]

4.1⁴

Enter [TITANIA,] Queen of Fairies, and [BOTTOM, the] clown [with the ass head], and FAIRIES[, PEASEBLOSSOM, COBWEB, MOTH, and MUSTARDSEED], and [OBERON,] the King, behind them.

TITANIA: [to BOTTOM] Come, sit thee down upon this flowery bed
 While I thy amiable cheeks do coy,⁵
 And stick musk-roses in thy sleek smooth head,
 And kiss thy fair large ears, my gentle joy.

5 BOTTOM: Where's Peaseblossom?

PEASEBLOSSOM: Ready.

BOTTOM: Scratch my head, Peaseblossom. —Where's Monsieur Cobweb?

COBWEB: Ready.

BOTTOM: Monsieur Cobweb, good monsieur, get you your weapons in your hand
 10 and kill me a red-hipped humble-bee on the top of a thistle; and, good monsieur, bring me the honey-bag. Do not fret yourself too much in the action, monsieur; and, good monsieur, have a care the honey-bag break not. I would be loath to have you overflown with⁶ a honey-bag, signor. [Exit COBWEB.]
 —Where's Monsieur Mustardseed?

15 MUSTARDSEED: Ready.

BOTTOM: Give me your neaf,⁷ Monsieur Mustardseed. Pray you leave your courtesy,⁸ good monsieur.

MUSTARDSEED: What's your will?

BOTTOM: Nothing, good monsieur, but to help Cavalieri⁹ Cobweb to scratch. I 20 must to the barber's, monsieur, for methinks I am marvelous hairy about the face. And I am such a tender ass, if my hair do but tickle me, I must scratch.

TITANIA: What, wilt thou hear some music, my sweet love?

BOTTOM: I have a reasonable good ear in music. Let's have the tongs and the bones.¹

4. Location: The wood. 5. Caress. Amiable: lovable. 6. Submerged by. 7. Fist.

8. Stop bowing, or do not stand bareheaded.

9. Blunder for "Cavalier," perhaps influenced by the Italian term cavaliere.

1. Triangle and clappers (rustic musical instruments).

TITANIA: Or say, sweet love, what thou desir'st to eat. 25
 BOTTOM: Truly, a peck of provender.² I could munch your good dry oats. Methinks
 I have a great desire to a bottle³ of hay. Good hay, sweet hay, hath no fellow.⁴
 TITANIA: I have a venturous fairy that shall seek
 The squirrel's hoard and fetch thee off new nuts.
 BOTTOM: I had rather have a handful or two of dried peas. But, I pray you, let none of your people stir me; I have an exposition of⁵ sleep come upon me. 30 TITANIA: Sleep thou, and I will wind thee in my arms.
 —Fairies, be gone, and be always⁶ away. [Exeunt FAIRIES.]
 So doth the woodbine⁷ the sweet honeysuckle
 Gently entwist; the female ivy so 35
 Enrings the barky fingers of the elm.
 —Oh, how I love thee, how I dote on thee!
 [They sleep.]
 Enter ROBIN Goodfellow.

OBERON: [coming forward] Welcome, good Robin. Seest thou this sweet sight?
 Her dotage now I do begin to pity.
 For, meeting her of late behind the wood 40
 Seeking sweet favors⁸ for this hateful fool,
 I did upbraid her and fall out with her.
 For she his hairy temples then had rounded
 With coronet of fresh and fragrant flowers,
 And that same dew which sometime⁹ on the buds 45
 Was wont to swell like round and orient¹ pearls
 Stood now within the pretty flowerets' eyes
 Like tears that did their own disgrace bewail.
 When I had at my pleasure taunted her,
 And she in mild terms begged my patience, 50
 I then did ask of her her changeling child,
 Which straight she gave me, and her fairy sent
 To bear him to my bower in fairyland.
 And now I have the boy, I will undo
 This hateful imperfection of her eyes. 55
 And, gentle puck, take this transformèd scalp
 From off the head of this Athenian swain,
 That he, awaking when the other² do,
 May all to Athens back again repair
 And think no more of this night's accidents 60
 But as the fierce vexation of a dream.
 But first I will release the Fairy Queen.
 [He squeezes the juice on TITANIA's eyes.]

2. Fodder. 3. Bundle. 4. Equal. 5. (For "disposition to.") 6. In every direction.

7. Here, "woodbine" cannot mean "honeysuckle," as it did at 2.1.251, and thus must refer to a different plant. So: thus. 8. Love tokens. 9. Formerly.

1. Lustrous (the best pearls were from the Far East). Wont: accustomed. 2. Others.

- Be as thou wast wont to be;
 See as thou wast wont to see.
 65 Dian's bud o'er Cupid's flower³
 Hath such force and blessed power.
 Now, my Titania, wake you, my sweet queen.
 TITANIA: [awaking] My Oberon, what visions have I seen!
 Methought I was enamored of an ass.
 OBERON: There lies your love.
 70 TITANIA: How came these things to pass?
 Oh, how mine eyes do loathe his visage now!
 OBERON: Silence a while. —Robin, take off this head.
 —Titania, music call, and strike more dead
 Than common sleep of all these five⁴ the sense.
 75 TITANIA: Music, ho—music such as charmeth sleep!

[Music plays.]

- ROBIN: [to BOTTOM, removing the ass head] Now when thou wak'st with thine own fool's eyes peep.
 OBERON: Sound, music! Come, my queen, take hands with me,
 And rock the ground whereon these sleepers be.

[They dance.]

- 80 Now thou and I are new in amity
 And will tomorrow midnight solemnly
 Dance in Duke Theseus' house triumphantly
 And bless it to all fair prosperity.
 There shall the pairs of faithful lovers be 85 Wedded, with Theseus, all in jollity.
 ROBIN: Fairy King, attend and mark:
 I do hear the morning lark.
 OBERON: Then, my queen, in silence sad
 Trip we after night's shade.
 90 We the globe can compass⁵ soon,
 Swifter than the wandering moon.
 TITANIA: Come, my lord, and in our flight
 Tell me how it came this night
 That I sleeping here was found
 95 With these mortals on the ground.

Exeunt [OBERON, TITANIA, and ROBIN].

Wind horn. Enter THESEUS [with HIPPOLYTA, EGEUS,] and all his train.

- THESEUS: Go, one of you, find out the forester,
 For now our observation⁶ is performed.

3. "Dian's bud," the herb of 2.1.184 and 3.2.366, is perhaps Agnus castus, or chaste tree: said to preserve chastity and hence the antidote to "Cupid's flower," or the "love-in-idleness" of 2.1.168.

4. The lovers and Bottom. 5. Orbit. 6. "Observance to a morn of May," as at 1.1.167.

And since we have the vanguard⁷ of the day,
 My love shall hear the music of my hounds.
 Uncouple⁸ in the western valley; let them go. 100
 Dispatch, I say, and find the forester. [Exit an Attendant.]

—We will, fair Queen, up to the mountain's top
 And mark the musical confusion
 Of hounds and echo in conjunction.

HIPPOLYTA: I was with Hercules and Cadmus⁹ once 105
 When in a wood of Crete they bayed¹ the bear
 With hounds of Sparta.² Never did I hear
 Such gallant chiding;³ for besides the groves,
 The skies, the fountains, every region near Seemed all one mutual cry. I never heard 110
 So musical a discord, such sweet thunder.

THESEUS: My hounds are bred out of the Spartan kind,
 So flewed, so sanded;⁴ and their heads are hung
 With ears that sweep away the morning dew;
 Crook-kneed, and dewlapped⁵ like Thessalian bulls; 115
 Slow in pursuit, but matched in mouth like bells,
 Each under each. A cry more tunable⁶
 Was never holla'd to nor cheered with horn
 In Crete, in Sparta, nor in Thessaly.
 Judge when you hear. But soft,⁷ what nymphs are these? 120

EGEUS: My lord, this is my daughter here asleep,
 And this Lysander, this Demetrius is,
 This Helena, old Nedar's Helena.
 I wonder of their being here together.

THESEUS: No doubt they rose up early to observe 125
 The rite of May and, hearing our intent,
 Came here in grace of our solemnity.⁸
 But speak, Egeus: is not this the day
 That Hermia should give answer of her choice?

EGEUS: It is, my lord. 130

THESEUS: Go bid the huntsmen wake them with their horns.

[Exit an Attendant.]

Shout within; wind horns; [the lovers] all start up.

Good morrow, friends. Saint Valentine⁹ is past.
 Begin these woodbirds but to couple now?

7. Earliest part. 8. Release (the dogs, leashed in pairs).

9. Mythical founder of Thebes. (No source for the anecdote is known.) 1. Hunted.

2. Famous in antiquity as hunting dogs. 3. Barking.

4. Sandy-colored. Flewed: flews were large hanging, fleshy chaps.

5. With hanging folds of skin under the neck (compare 2.1.50).

6. A pack of hounds more well tuned. Matched . . . each: harmoniously matched in the pitch of their barking, like a set of bells. 7. Stop; look. 8. Ceremony.

9. Birds were said to choose their mates on Valentine's Day.

LYSANDER: Pardon, my lord.

[The lovers kneel.]

THESEUS: I pray you all, stand up.

[The lovers stand.]

135 [to DEMETRIUS and LYSANDER] I know you two are rival enemies.
How comes this gentle concord in the world,
That hatred is so far from jealousy¹
To sleep by hate and fear no enmity?

LYSANDER: My lord, I shall reply amazedly,²
140 Half sleep, half waking. But as yet, I swear,
I cannot truly say how I came here.
But as I think—for truly would I speak,
And now I do bethink me, so it is—

I came with Hermia hither. Our intent
145 Was to be gone from Athens where we might Without³ the peril of the Athenian law—

EGEUS: [to THESEUS] Enough, enough, my lord; you have enough.
I beg the law, the law upon his head!

—They would have stolen away, they would, Demetrius,
150 Thereby to have defeated⁴ you and me,
You of your wife and me of my consent,
Of my consent that she should be your wife.

DEMETRIUS: [to THESEUS] My lord, fair Helen told me of their stealth,
Of this their purpose hither to this wood,
155 And I in fury hither followed them,
Fair Helena in fancy⁵ following me.

But, my good lord, I wot not by what power—
But by some power it is—my love to Hermia,
Melted as the snow, seems to me now

160 As the remembrance of an idle gaud⁶
Which in my childhood I did dote upon;
And all the faith, the virtue of my heart,
The object and the pleasure of mine eye,
Is only Helena. To her, my lord,

165 Was I betrothed ere I saw Hermia,
But like a sickness⁷ did I loathe this food;
But, as in health come to my natural taste,
Now I do wish it, love it, long for it,
And will for evermore be true to it.

170 THESEUS: Fair lovers, you are fortunately met.
Of this discourse we more will hear anon.
—Egeus, I will overbear your will;

1. Suspicion. 2. Confusedly. 3. Outside. 4. Defrauded. 5. Love. 6. A worthless trinket.
7. Only as a person does when ill or nauseated.

For in the temple, by and by, with us
 These couples shall eternally be knit.
 And, for the morning now is something⁸ worn, 175
 Our purposed hunting shall be set aside.
 Away with us to Athens. Three and three,
 We'll hold a feast in great solemnity.
 —Come, Hippolyta.

[Exit THESEUS with HIPPOLYTA, EGEUS, and his train.]

DEMETRIUS: These things seem small and undistinguishable, 180
 Like far-off mountains turnèd into clouds.

HERMIA: Methinks I see these things with parted eye,⁹
 When everything seems double.

HELENA: So methinks;
 And I have found Demetrius like a jewel,
 Mine own and not mine own.

DEMETRIUS: Are you sure 185
 That we are awake? It seems to me
 That yet we sleep, we dream. Do not you think
 The Duke was here and bid us follow him?

HERMIA: Yea, and my father.

HELENA: And Hippolyta.

LYSANDER: And he did bid us follow to the temple. 190

DEMETRIUS: Why, then, we are awake. Let's follow him,

And by the way let's recount our dreams. [Exeunt lovers.]

BOTTOM: [awaking] When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer. My next is "Most fair Pyramus." Heigh-ho,¹ Peter Quince? Flute the bellows-mender?
 Snout the tinker? Starveling? God's my life!² Stolen hence and left me 195 asleep! I have had a most rare vision. I have had a dream past the wit of man to say what dream it was. Man is but an ass if he go about³ to expound this dream. Methought I was—there is no man can tell what. Methought I was—and methought I had—but man is but patched a fool if he will offer⁴ to say what methought I had. The eye of man hath not heard, the ear of man hath not seen, man's hand is not able to taste, his tongue to conceive, nor his heart to report⁵ what my dream was. I will get Peter Quince to write a ballad of this dream. It shall be called "Bottom's Dream," because it hath no bottom;⁶ and I will sing it in the latter end of a play, before the Duke.
 Peradventure,⁷ to make it the more gracious, I shall sing it at her⁸ death. 205

[Exit.]

8. Somewhat. For: since. 9. (Double vision.) 1. (A call; perhaps a yawn.) 2. Good Lord.

3. Try. 4. Venture. Patched a fool: patchwork or motley costumes were worn by jesters.

5. Burlesque of scripture: "The eye hath not seen, and the ear hath not heard, neither have entered into the heart of man" those things that God has prepared (1 Cor. 2:9–10 [Bishops' Bible]).

6. Because it is unfathomable, or has no substance (foundation).

7. Perhaps. 8. (Thisbe's?)

4.2⁹

Enter QUINCE, FLUTE[, SNOUT, and STARVELING].

QUINCE: Have you sent to Bottom's house? Is he come home yet?

STARVELING: He cannot be heard of. Out of doubt he is transported.¹

FLUTE: If he come not, then the play is marred. It goes not forward, doth it?

QUINCE: It is not possible. You have not a man in all Athens able to discharge²

5 Pyramus but he.

FLUTE: No, he hath simply the best wit³ of any handicraft man in Athens.

QUINCE: Yea, and the best person⁴ too; and he is a very paramour for a sweet voice.

FLUTE: You must say "paragon." A paramour is—God bless us—a thing of naught.⁵

Enter SNUG the joiner.

10 SNUG: Masters, the Duke is coming from the temple, and there is two or three lords and ladies more married. If our sport⁶ had gone forward, we had all been made men.⁷

FLUTE: Oh, sweet bully Bottom! Thus hath he lost sixpence a day⁸ during his life; he could not have 'scaped sixpence a day. An⁹ the Duke had not given 15 him sixpence a day for playing Pyramus, I'll be hanged. He would have deserved it. Sixpence a day in Pyramus, or nothing.

Enter BOTTOM.

BOTTOM: Where are these lads? Where are these hearts?¹

QUINCE: Bottom! Oh, most courageous² day! Oh, most happy hour!

20 BOTTOM: Masters, I am to discourse wonders; but ask me not what; for if I tell you, I am not true Athenian. I will tell you everything right as it fell out.

QUINCE: Let us hear, sweet Bottom.

BOTTOM: Not a word of³ me. All that I will tell you is that the Duke hath dined.

25 Get your apparel together, good strings⁴ to your beards, new ribbons to your pumps. Meet presently⁵ at the palace; every man look o'er his part. For the short and the long is, our play is preferred.⁶ In any case, let Thisbe have clean linen; and let not him that plays the lion pare his nails, for they shall hang out for the lion's claws. And, most dear actors, eat no onions nor garlic, for we are to utter sweet breath; and I do not doubt but to hear them say it is a sweet comedy. No more words. Away! Go, away! [Exeunt.]

5.1⁷

Enter THESEUS, HIPPOLYTA, PHILOSTRATE[, Lords, and Attendants].

HIPPOLYTA: 'Tis strange, my Theseus, that⁸ these lovers speak of.

THESEUS: More strange than true. I never may believe

9. Location: Athens. 1. Carried away (by the fairies); transformed. Out of doubt: doubtless.

2. Perform. 3. Intellect. 4. Looks. 5. Something wicked. 6. Entertainment.

7. Our fortunes would have been made.

8. As a royal pension, considerably more than the average daily wage of an Elizabethan workman.

9. If. 1. Mates. 2. Blunder for "brave," meaning "splendid." 3. Out of. 4. (To attach the beards.)

5. Immediately. 6. Recommended. 7. Location: Athens. Theseus's palace. 8. That which.

These antique fables, nor these fairy toys.⁹
 Lovers and madmen have such seething brains,
 Such shaping fantasies, that apprehend¹ more 5
 Than cool reason ever comprehends.
 The lunatic, the lover, and the poet
 Are of imagination all compact.²
 One sees more devils than vast hell can hold;
 That is the madman. The lover, all as frantic, 10
 Sees Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt.³
 The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
 Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven.
 And as imagination bodies forth
 The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen 15
 Turns them to shapes and gives to airy nothing
 A local habitation and a name.
 Such tricks hath strong imagination
 That if it would but apprehend some joy,
 It comprehends some bringer⁴ of that joy; 20
 Or in the night, imagining some fear,⁵
 How easy is a bush supposed a bear!

HIPPOLYTA: But all the story of the night told over,
 And all their minds transfigured so together,
 More witnesseth than fancy's images⁶ 25
 And grows to something of great constancy;⁷
 But, howsoever, strange and admirable.⁸

Enter [the] lovers, LYSANDER, DEMETRIUS, HERMIA, and HELENA.

THESEUS: Here come the lovers, full of joy and mirth.
 Joy, gentle friends, joy and fresh days of love
 Accompany your hearts.

LYSANDER: More than to us 30
 Wait in your royal walks, your board, your bed.⁹

THESEUS: Come now, what masques, what dances shall we have
 To wear away this long age of three hours
 Between our after-supper and bedtime?
 Where is our usual manager of mirth? 35
 What revels are in hand? Is there no play
 To ease the anguish of a torturing hour?
 Call Philostrate.

PHILOSTRATE: Here, mighty Theseus.

THESEUS: Say, what abridgement¹ have you for this evening,
 What masque, what music? How shall we beguile 40
 The lazy time if not with some delight?

9. Trifles. Antique: Ancient; strange, grotesque (as in "antic"). 1. Conceive. Fantasies: imaginations.
 2. Composed. 3. In a gypsy's face. Helen: Helen of Troy. 4. Source. 5. Object to be feared.
 6. More . . . images: Testifies to something more than mere figments of the imagination.
 7. Consistency. 8. Wondrous. Howsoever: in any case. 9. May even more joy and love attend your daily lives. 1. Pastime, something to make the evening seem shorter.

PHILOSTRATE: [giving THESEUS a paper] There is a brief² how many sports are ripe.
Make choice of which your highness will see first.

THESEUS: [reads] "The battle with the Centaurs,³ to be sung 45 By an Athenian eunuch to the harp."

We'll none of that. That have I told my love

In glory of my kinsman Hercules.⁴

[Reads.] "The riot of the tipsy Bacchanals Tearing the Thracian singer in their rage."⁵

50 That is an old device,⁶ and it was played

When I from Thebes came last a conqueror.

[Reads.] "The thrice-three muses mourning for the death
Of learning, late deceased in beggary."⁷

That is some satire, keen and critical,

55 Not sorting with⁸ a nuptial ceremony.

[Reads.] "A tedious brief scene of young Pyramus
And his love Thisbe; very tragical mirth."

Merry and tragical? Tedious and brief?

That is hot ice and wondrous strange snow!

60 How shall we find the concord of this discord?

PHILOSTRATE: A play there is, my lord, some ten words long,

Which is as brief as I have known a play,

But by ten words, my lord, it is too long,

Which makes it tedious. For in all the play

65 There is not one word apt, one player fitted.⁹

And tragical, my noble lord, it is,

For Pyramus therein doth kill himself,

Which, when I saw rehearsed, I must confess,

Made mine eyes water; but more merry tears

70 The passion of loud laughter never shed.

THESEUS: What are they that do play it?

PHILOSTRATE: Hard-handed men that work in Athens here,

Which never labored in their minds till now,

And now have toiled their unbreathed¹ memories

75 With this same play against² your nuptial.

THESEUS: And we will hear it.

PHILOSTRATE: No, my noble lord,

It is not for you. I have heard it over,

And it is nothing, nothing in the world;

Unless you can find sport in their intents,

2. Short list.

3. Probably the battle that occurred when the Centaurs tried to carry off the bride of Theseus's friend Pirithous.

4. According to Plutarch, Hercules and Theseus were cousins.

5. The murder of the poet Orpheus by drunken women, devotees of Dionysus. 6. Show.

7. Possibly a topical reference: Robert Greene, Christopher Marlowe, and Thomas Kyd, university wits who began writing for the stage in the 1580s, all died in desperate circumstances in 1592–94. But satiric laments on the poverty of scholars and poets were commonplace.

8. Befitting. 9. Appropriately cast. 1. Unexercised. Toiled: taxed. 2. In preparation for.

Extremely stretched and conned³ with cruel pain,
To do you service. 80

THESEUS: I will hear that play.

For never anything can be amiss
When simpleness and duty tender it.

Go, bring them in; and take your places, ladies. [Exit PHILOSTRATE.]

HIPPOLYTA: I love not to see wretchedness o'ercharged,⁴
And duty in his service⁵ perishing. 85

THESEUS: Why, gentle sweet, you shall see no such thing.

HIPPOLYTA: He says they can do nothing in this kind.⁶

THESEUS: The kinder we, to give them thanks for nothing.

Our sport shall be to take what they mistake. 90
And what poor duty cannot do, noble respect⁷
Takes it in might, not merit.⁸

Where I have come, great clerks⁹ have purposed

To greet me with premeditated welcomes,

Where I have seen them shiver and look pale, 95

Make periods in the midst of sentences,

Throttle their practised accent¹ in their fears,

And in conclusion dumbly have broke off,

Not paying me a welcome. Trust me, sweet,

Out of this silence yet I picked a welcome; 100

And in the modesty of fearful² duty

I read as much as from the rattling tongue

Of saucy and audacious eloquence.

Love, therefore, and tongue-tied simplicity

In least speak most, to my capacity.³ 105

[Enter PHILOSTRATE.]

PHILOSTRATE: So please your grace, the Prologue is addressed.⁴

THESEUS: Let him approach.

Enter [QUINCE as] the Prologue.

QUINCE: [as Prologue] If we offend, it is with our good will.

That you should think, we come not to offend

But with good will. To show our simple skill, 110

That is the true beginning of our end.

Consider, then, we come but in despite.

We do not come as minding⁵ to content you,

Our true intent is. All for your delight

We are not here. That you should here repent you 115

3. Memorized. Stretched: Strained.

4. Overburdened. Wretchedness: incompetence or weakness; poor people. 5. Its attempt to serve.

6. Kind of thing. 7. Consideration.

8. With respect to the giver's capacity, not the merit of the performance. 9. Scholars.

1. Rehearsed eloquence; usual manner of speaking. 2. Frightened. 3. In my judgment.

4. The speaker of the Prologue is ready. 5. Intending.

The actors are at hand; and by their show

You shall know all that you are like to know.⁶

THESEUS: This fellow doth not stand upon points.⁷

LYSANDER: He hath rid his prologue like a rough⁸ colt: he knows not the stop.⁹

120 A good moral, my lord: it is not enough to speak, but to speak true.

HIPPOLYTA: Indeed he hath played on this prologue like a child on a recorder: a sound, but not in government.¹

THESEUS: His speech was like a tangled chain: nothing² impaired, but all disordered. Who is next?

Enter [BOTTOM as] Pyramus, and [FLUTE as] Thisbe, and [SNOUT as] Wall, and [STARVELING as] Moonshine, and [SNUG as] Lion.

125 QUINCE: [as Prologue] Gentles, perchance you wonder at this show,
But wonder on till truth make all things plain.

This man is Pyramus, if you would know;

This beauteous lady Thisbe is, certain.

This man with lime and roughcast doth present

130 Wall, that vile wall which did these lovers sunder;

And through Wall's chink, poor souls, they are content

To whisper—at the which let no man wonder.

This man with lantern, dog, and bush of thorn

135 Presenteth Moonshine. For, if you will know,

By moonshine did these lovers think no scorn³

To meet at Ninus' tomb, there, there to woo.

This grisly beast, which "Lion" hight⁴ by name,

The trusty Thisbe, coming first by night,

Did scare away, or rather did affright;

140 And as she fled, her mantle she did fall,⁵

Which Lion vile with bloody mouth did stain.

Anon comes Pyramus, sweet youth and tall,⁶

And finds his trusty Thisbe's mantle slain;

Whereat with blade, with bloody, blameful blade,

145 He bravely broached⁷ his boiling bloody breast;

And Thisbe, tarrying in mulberry shade,

His dagger drew and died. For all the rest

Let Lion, Moonshine, Wall, and lovers twain

At large⁸ discourse, while here they do remain.

Exeunt [QUINCE as Prologue, SNUG as] Lion, [FLUTE as] Thisbe, and [STARVELING as] Moonshine.

150 THESEUS: I wonder if the lion be to speak.

DEMETRIUS: No wonder, my lord; one lion may when many asses do.

SNOUT: [as Wall] In this same interlude⁹ it doth befall

6. The humor of Quince's speech rests in its mispunctuation; repunctuated, it becomes a typical courteous address.

7. Bother about niceties; heed punctuation marks. 8. An unbroken.

9. How to rein the colt to a stop; punctuation mark. 1. Control. 2. Not at all.

3. (It) no disgrace. 4. Is called. 5. Drop. 6. Handsome. 7. Stabbed. 8. Lengthy. 9. Play.

That I, one Snout by name, present a wall;
 And such a wall as I would have you think
 That had in it a crannied hole or chink 155
 Through which the lovers, Pyramus and Thisbe,
 Did whisper often very secretly.

This loam, this roughcast, and this stone doth show
 That I am that same wall; the truth is so.
 And this the cranny is, right and sinister,¹ 160
 Through which the fearful lovers are to whisper.

THESEUS: Would you desire lime and hair to speak better?

DEMETRIUS: It is the wittiest partition² that ever I heard discourse, my lord.

THESEUS: Pyramus draws near the wall: silence!

BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] O grim-looking night, O night with hue so black, 165
 O night, which ever art when day is not,
 O night, O night, alack, alack, alack,
 I fear my Thisbe's promise is forgot.
 And thou, O wall, O sweet, O lovely wall,
 That stand'st between her father's ground and mine, 170
 Thou wall, O wall, O sweet and lovely wall,
 Show me thy chink, to blink through with mine eyne.

[SNOUT, as Wall, shows his chink.]

Thanks, courteous wall; Jove shield thee well for this.
 But what see I? No Thisbe do I see.
 O wicked wall, through whom I see no bliss, 175
 Cursed be thy stones³ for thus deceiving me!

THESEUS: The wall, methinks, being sensible, should curse again.⁴

BOTTOM: [to THESEUS] No, in truth, sir, he should not. "Deceiving me" is Thisbe's cue. She is to enter now, and I am to spy her through the wall. You shall see it will fall pat⁵ as I told you. Yonder she comes. 180

Enter [FLUTE as] Thisbe.

FLUTE: [as Thisbe] O wall, full often hast thou heard my moans
 For parting my fair Pyramus and me.
 My cherry lips have often kissed thy stones,
 Thy stones with lime and hair knit up in thee.

BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] I see a voice; now will I to the chink 185
 To spy an⁶ I can hear my Thisbe's face.
 Thisbe?

FLUTE: [as Thisbe] My love! Thou art my love, I think.

BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] Think what thou wilt, I am thy lover's grace,⁷
 And like Limander⁸ am I trusty still. 190

FLUTE: [as Thisbe] And I like Helen,⁹ till the fates me kill.

1. Left; running horizontally. Or on the one side (Pyramus's) and the other (Thisbe's).

2. Wall; formal term for part of an oration. 3. Punning, unintentionally, on "testicles."

4. Back. Sensible: capable of feeling. 5. Precisely. 6. If. 7. Gracious lover.

8. Blunder for "Leander," who drowned while swimming across the Hellespont to meet his lover, Hero.

9. Helen of Troy was notoriously untrustworthy; a blunder for "Hero."

BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] Not Shafalus to Procrus¹ was so true.

FLUTE: [as Thisbe] As Shafalus to Procrus, I to you.

BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] Oh, kiss me through the hole of this vile wall.

195 FLUTE: [as Thisbe] I kiss the wall's hole, not your lips at all.

BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] Wilt thou at Ninny's tomb meet me straightway?

FLUTE: [as Thisbe] Tide² life, tide death, I come without delay.

[Exeunt BOTTOM and FLUTE.]

SNOUT: [as Wall] Thus have I, Wall, my part discharged so;

And, being done, thus Wall away doth go. [Exit.]

200 THESEUS: Now is the mural³ down between the two neighbors.

DEMETRIUS: No remedy, my lord, when walls are so willful to hear without warning.⁴

HIPPOLYTA: This is the silliest stuff that ever I heard.

205 THESEUS: The best in this kind are but shadows,⁵ and the worst are no worse if imagination amend them.

HIPPOLYTA: It must be your imagination then, and not theirs.

THESEUS: If we imagine no worse of them than they of themselves, they may pass for excellent men. Here come two noble beasts in, a man and a lion.

Enter [SNUG as] Lion and [STARVELING as] Moonshine [with a lantern, thornbush, and dog].

SNUG: [as Lion] You ladies, you whose gentle hearts do fear

210 The smallest monstrous mouse that creeps on floor,

May now, perchance, both quake and tremble here

When lion rough in wildest rage doth roar.

Then know that I as Snug the joiner am

A lion fell,⁶ nor else no lion's dam.

215 For if I should as lion come in strife

Into this place, 'twere pity on my life.

THESEUS: A very gentle beast, and of a good conscience.

DEMETRIUS: The very best at a beast, my lord, that e'er I saw.

LYSANDER: This lion is a very fox⁷ for his valor.

220 THESEUS: True; and a goose⁸ for his discretion.

DEMETRIUS: Not so, my lord. For his valor cannot carry his discretion, and the fox carries the goose.

THESEUS: His discretion, I am sure, cannot carry his valor; for the goose carries not the fox. It is well. Leave it to his discretion, and let us listen to the 225 moon.

STARVELING: [as Moonshine] This lantern doth the hornèd⁹ moon present.

1. Blunder for "Cephalus" and "Procris." Procris was in fact seduced by her husband in disguise as another man; he later accidentally killed her. 2. Betide; come. 3. Wall.

4. Informing the parents. Hear: proverbially, "walls have ears." To: as to.

5. Mere likenesses without substance. Kind: profession (that is, actors).

6. Fierce; or skin (punning on the costume to which Snug reassuringly calls attention).

7. Symbolic of low cunning, rather than courage. 8. Symbolic of foolishness. 9. Crescent.

DEMETRIUS: He should have worn the horns on his head.¹

THESEUS: He is no crescent,² and his horns are invisible within the circumference.

STARVELING: [as Moonshine] This lantern doth the hornèd moon present;

Myself the man i'th' moon do seem to be.

230

THESEUS: This is the greatest error of all the rest: the man should be put into the lantern; how is it else the man i'th' moon?

DEMETRIUS: He dares not come there for³ the candle. For you see it is already in snuff.⁴

HIPPOLYTA: I am aweary of this moon; would he would change!

235

THESEUS: It appears by his small light of discretion that he is in the wane; but yet in courtesy, in all reason, we must stay the time.

LYSANDER: Proceed, Moon.

STARVELING: All that I have to say is to tell you that the lantern is the moon, I the man i'th' moon, this thornbush my thornbush, and this dog my dog.

240

DEMETRIUS: Why, all these should be in the lantern, for all these are in the moon. But silence; here comes Thisbe.

Enter [FLUTE as] Thisbe.

FLUTE: [as Thisbe] This is old Ninny's tomb. Where is my love?

SNUG: [as Lion] Oh!

[Lion roars.]

[Thisbe runs off, dropping her mantle.]

DEMETRIUS: Well roared, Lion!

245

THESEUS: Well run, Thisbe!

HIPPOLYTA: Well shone, Moon! Truly, the moon shines with a good grace.

[Lion worries⁵ Thisbe's mantle.]

THESEUS: Well moused,⁶ Lion!

Enter [BOTTOM as] Pyramus.

DEMETRIUS: And then came Pyramus.

[Exit SNUG as Lion.]

LYSANDER: And so the lion vanished.

250

BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] Sweet moon, I thank thee for thy sunny beams;

I thank thee, moon, for shining now so bright.

For by thy gracious, golden, glittering gleams

I trust to take of truest Thisbe sight.

But stay, oh, spite!

255

But mark, poor knight,

What dreadful dole⁷ is here?

Eyes, do you see?

How can it be?

1. The symbol of a cuckold. 2. Waxing moon. Perhaps a joke about Starveling's thinness. 3. For fear of. 4. In need of snuffing; angry. 5. Gnaws on. 6. The mantle is like a mouse in the mouth of a cat. 7. Grief.

260 O dainty duck! O dear!
 Thy mantle good,
 What, stained with blood?
 Approach, ye Furies fell!
 O Fates,⁸ come, come,
 265 Cut thread and thrum,⁹
 Quail, crush, conclude, and quell!¹

THESEUS: This passion, and² the death of a dear friend, would go near to make a man look sad.

HIPPOLYTA: Beshrew my heart, but I pity the man.

270 BOTTOM: [as Pyramus] Oh, wherefore, Nature, didst thou lions frame,
 Since lion vile hath here deflowered³ my dear?
 Which is—no, no, which was—the fairest dame
 That lived, that loved, that liked, that looked with cheer.
 Come, tears, confound!
 275 Out, sword, and wound
 The pap⁴ of Pyramus,
 Ay, that left pap,
 Where heart doth hop.

[He stabs himself.]

Thus die I, thus, thus, thus.

280 Now am I dead;
 Now am I fled.

My soul is in the sky.
 Tongue, lose thy light;
 Moon, take thy flight.

[Exit STARVELING as Moonshine.]

285 Now die, die, die, die, die.

[Pyramus dies.]

DEMETRIUS: No die, but an ace for him; for he is but one.⁵

LYSANDER: Less than an ace, man; for he is dead, he is nothing.

THESEUS: With the help of a surgeon he might yet recover, and yet prove an ass.

HIPPOLYTA: How chance Moonshine is gone before Thisbe comes back and 290 finds her lover?

THESEUS: She will find him by starlight.

[Enter FLUTE as Thisbe.]

Here she comes, and her passion⁶ ends the play.

HIPPOLYTA: Methinks she should not use a long one for such a Pyramus; I hope she will be brief.

8. The three Fates in Greek mythology spun and cut the thread of a person's life.

9. A technical term from Bottom's occupation: the tufted end of a weaver's warp, or set of yarns placed lengthwise in a loom when the woven fabric is cut.

1. Kill. Quail: overpower. 2. Only if combined with. Passion: suffering; extravagant speech.

3. Ruined (but commonly suggesting "deprived of her virginity"); his error for "devoured."

4. Breast. 5. Pun on "die" as one of a pair of dice. One: the ace, or lowest throw.

6. Passionate speech.

DEMETRIUS: A mote will turn the balance which Pyramus, which Thisbe,⁷ is the 295 better: he for a man, God warrant us; she for a woman, God bless us.

LYSANDER: She hath spied him already with those sweet eyes.

DEMETRIUS: And thus she means, videlicet:⁸

FLUTE: [as Thisbe] Asleep, my love?

What, dead, my dove? 300

O Pyramus, arise!

Speak, speak! Quite dumb?

Dead, dead? A tomb

Must cover thy sweet eyes.

These lily lips, 305

This cherry nose,

These yellow cowslip cheeks

Are gone, are gone.

Lovers, make moan.

His eyes were green as leeks. 310

O sisters three,⁹

Come, come to me

With hands as pale as milk;

Lay them in gore,

Since you have shore¹ 315

With shears his thread of silk.

Tongue, not a word!

Come, trusty sword,

Come, blade, my breast imbrue.²

[She stabs herself.]

And farewell, friends 320

Thus Thisbe ends.

Adieu, adieu, adieu.

[Thisbe dies.]

THESEUS: Moonshine and Lion are left to bury the dead.

DEMETRIUS: Ay, and Wall too.

BOTTOM: [starting up] No, I assure you, the wall is down that parted their 325 fathers. [FLUTE rises.] Will it please you to see the epilogue or to hear a Bergomask dance³ between two of our company?

THESEUS: No epilogue, I pray you; for your play needs no excuse. Never excuse; 330 for when the players are all dead, there need none to be blamed. Marry, if he that writ it had played Pyramus and hanged himself in Thisbe's garter, it would have been a fine tragedy; and so it is, truly, and very notably discharged. But come, your Bergomask; let your epilogue alone.

[BOTTOM and FLUTE⁴ dance; then exeunt.]

7. Whether Pyramus or Thisbe. Mote: speck.

8. As follows. Means: moans; lodges a formal legal complaint. 9. (The Fates.) 1. Shorn.

2. Stain with blood. 3. A dance named after Bergamo, in Italy (commonly ridiculed for its rusticity).

4. The only "two of our company" onstage at the end of the interlude. The role of Bottom may have been first performed by the actor Will Kemp, who was famous for his dancing.

The iron tongue of midnight hath told⁵ twelve.
 Lovers, to bed; 'tis almost fairy time.
 335 I fear we shall outsleep the coming morn
 As much as we this night have overwatched.⁶
 This palpable-gross⁷ play hath well beguiled
 The heavy⁸ gait of night. Sweet friends, to bed.
 A fortnight hold we this solemnity
 340 In nightly revels and new jollity.

Exeunt.

Enter [ROBIN Goodfellow, the] puck[, with a broom].

ROBIN: Now the hungry lion roars,
 And the wolf behowls the moon,
 Whilst the heavy⁹ plowman snores,
 All with weary task fordone.¹
 345 Now the wasted brands² do glow,
 Whilst the screech-owl, screeching loud,
 Puts the wretch that lies in woe
 In remembrance of a shroud.
 Now it is the time of night
 350 That the graves, all gaping wide,
 Every one lets forth his sprite³
 In the churchway paths to glide;
 And we fairies that do run
 By the triple Hecate's⁴ team
 355 From the presence of the sun,
 Following darkness like a dream,
 Now are frolic.⁵ Not a mouse
 Shall disturb this hallowed house.
 I am sent with broom⁶ before
 360 To sweep the dust behind⁷ the door.

Enter [OBERON and TITANIA,] King and Queen of Fairies, with all their train.

OBERON: Through the house give glimmering light
 By the dead and drowsy fire;
 Every elf and fairy sprite
 Hop as light as bird from briar;
 365 And this ditty after me
 Sing, and dance it trippingly.
 TITANIA: First rehearse your song by rote,
 To each word a warbling note.
 Hand in hand with fairy grace

5. Counted; tolled. 6. Stayed awake too late. 7. Palpably crude. 8. Drowsy; slow. 9. Weary.

1. "Done in"; exhausted. 2. Burned-out logs. 3. Each grave lets forth its ghost.

4. Hecate was goddess of the moon and night, and she had three realms: heaven (as Cynthia), earth (as Diana), and hell (as Proserpine). 5. Merry.

6. One of his traditional emblems; he helped good housekeepers and punished lazy ones.

7. From behind.

Will we sing and bless this place. 370

[The FAIRIES dance to a song.]

OBERON: Now until the break of day
 Through this house each fairy stray.
 To the best bride-bed will we,⁸
 Which by us shall blessèd be;
 And the issue there create⁹ 375
 Ever shall be fortunate.
 So shall all the couples three Ever true in loving be.
 And the blots of nature's hand
 Shall not in their issue stand; 380
 Never mole, harelip, nor scar,
 Nor mark prodigious,¹ such as are
 Despisèd in nativity,
 Shall upon their children be.
 With this field-dew consecrate² 385
 Every fairy take his gait,³
 And each several⁴ chamber bless
 Through this palace with sweet peace;
 And the owner of it blessed
 Ever shall in safety rest. 390
 Trip away, make no stay;
 Meet me all by break of day. Exeunt [all but ROBIN].

ROBIN: [to the audience] If we shadows have offended,
 Think but this, and all is mended,
 That you have but slumbered here 395
 While these visions did appear.
 And this weak and idle theme,
 No more yielding but⁵ a dream,
 Gentles, do not reprehend;
 If you pardon, we will mend. 400
 And as I am an honest puck,
 If we have unearnèd luck
 Now to 'scape the serpent's tongue,⁶
 We will make amends ere long;
 Else the puck a liar call. 405
 So, good night unto you all.
 Give me your hands,⁷ if we be friends,
 And Robin shall restore amends. [Exit.]

c. 1594–95

8. Oberon and Titania will bless the bed of Theseus and Hippolyta. 9. Created; conceived.

1. Ominous birthmarks.

2. Consecrated, blessed. Playfully alludes to the traditional Catholic custom of blessing the bride-bed with holy water. 3. Way. 4. Separate. 5. Than. 6. Hissing from the audience. 7. Applause.

ACT I

Scene 1

A guard station atop the castle. Enter BERNARDO and FRANCISCO, two sentinels.

BERNARDO: Who's there?

FRANCISCO: Nay, answer me. Stand and unfold yourself.

BERNARDO: Long live the king!

FRANCISCO: Bernardo?

5 BERNARDO: He.

FRANCISCO: You come most carefully upon your hour.

BERNARDO: 'Tis now struck twelve. Get thee to bed, Francisco.

FRANCISCO: For this relief much thanks. 'Tis bitter cold,

And I am sick at heart.

BERNARDO: Have you had quiet guard?

10 FRANCISCO: Not a mouse stirring.

BERNARDO: Well, good night.

If you do meet Horatio and Marcellus,

The rivals¹ of my watch, bid them make haste.

[Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.]

FRANCISCO: I think I hear them. Stand, ho! Who is there?

HORATIO: Friends to this ground.

15 MARCELLUS: And liegemen to the Dane.²

1. Companions.

2. The "Dane" is the king of Denmark, who is also called "Denmark," as in line 48 of this scene. In line 61 a similar reference is used for the king of Norway.

FRANCISCO: Give you good night.

MARCELLUS: O, farewell, honest soldier!

Who hath relieved you?

FRANCISCO: Bernardo hath my place.

Give you good night.

[Exit FRANCISCO.]

MARCELLUS: Holla, Bernardo!

BERNARDO: Say—

What, is Horatio there?

HORATIO: A piece of him.

BERNARDO: Welcome, Horatio. Welcome, good Marcellus.

20

HORATIO: What, has this thing appeared again tonight?

BERNARDO: I have seen nothing.

MARCELLUS: Horatio says 'tis but our fantasy,

And will not let belief take hold of him

Touching this dreaded sight twice seen of us.

25

Therefore I have entreated him along

With us to watch the minutes of this night,

That if again this apparition come,

He may approve³ our eyes and speak to it.

HORATIO: Tush, tush, 'twill not appear.

BERNARDO: Sit down awhile,

30

And let us once again assail your ears,

That are so fortified against our story,

What we have two nights seen.

HORATIO: Well, sit we down.

And let us hear Bernardo speak of this.

BERNARDO: Last night of all,

35

When yond same star that's westward from the pole⁴

Had made his course t' illume that part of heaven

Where now it burns, Marcellus and myself,

The bell then beating one—

[Enter GHOST.]

MARCELLUS: Peace, break thee off. Look where it comes again.

40

BERNARDO: In the same figure like the king that's dead.

MARCELLUS: Thou art a scholar; speak to it, Horatio.

BERNARDO: Looks 'a⁵ not like the king? Mark it, Horatio.

HORATIO: Most like. It harrows me with fear and wonder.

BERNARDO: It would be spoke to.

MARCELLUS: Speak to it, Horatio.

45

HORATIO: What art thou that usurp'st this time of night

Together with that fair and warlike form

In which the majesty of buried Denmark

Did sometimes march? By heaven I charge thee, speak.

MARCELLUS: It is offended.

BERNARDO: See, it stalks away.

50

3. Confirm the testimony of. 4. Polestar. 5. He.

HORATIO: Stay. Speak, speak. I charge thee, speak. [Exit GHOST.]

MARCELLUS: 'Tis gone and will not answer.

BERNARDO: How now, Horatio! You tremble and look pale.

Is not this something more than fantasy?

55 What think you on't?

HORATIO: Before my God, I might not this believe

Without the sensible⁶ and true avouch

Of mine own eyes.

MARCELLUS: It is not like the king?

HORATIO: As thou art to thyself.

60 Such was the very armor he had on

When he the ambitious Norway combated.

So frowned he once when, in an angry parle,⁷

He smote the sledded Polacks on the ice.

'Tis strange.

65 MARCELLUS: Thus twice before, and jump⁸ at this dead hour,

With martial stalk hath he gone by our watch.

HORATIO: In what particular thought to work I know not,

But in the gross and scope of mine opinion,

This bodes some strange eruption to our state.

70 MARCELLUS: Good now, sit down, and tell me he that knows,

Why this same strict and most observant watch

So nightly toils the subject⁹ of the land,

And why such daily cast of brazen cannon

And foreign mart for implements of war;

75 Why such impress of shipwrights, whose sore task

Does not divide the Sunday from the week.

What might be toward that this sweaty haste

Doth make the night joint-laborer with the day?

Who is't that can inform me?

HORATIO: That can I.

80 At least, the whisper goes so. Our last king,

Whose image even but now appeared to us,

Was as you know by Fortinbras of Norway,

Thereto pricked on by a most emulate pride,

Dared to the combat; in which our valiant Hamlet

85 (For so this side of our known world esteemed him)

Did slay this Fortinbras; who by a sealed compact

Well ratified by law and heraldry,

Did forfeit, with his life, all those his lands

Which he stood seized of,¹ to the conqueror;

90 Against the which a moiety competent²

Was gagèd³ by our king; which had returned

To the inheritance of Fortinbras,

Had he been vanquisher; as, by the same covenant

6. Perceptible. 7. Parley. 8. Precisely. 9. People. 1. Possessed.

2. Portion of similar value. 3. Pledged.

And carriage of the article designed,
 His fell to Hamlet. Now, sir, young Fortinbras, 95
 Of unimprovèd mettle hot and full,
 Hath in the skirts of Norway here and there
 Sharked up a list of lawless resolute
 For food and diet to some enterprise
 That hath a stomach in't; which is no other, 100
 As it doth well appear unto our state,
 But to recover of us by strong hand
 And terms compulsory, those foresaid lands
 So by his father lost; and this, I take it,
 Is the main motive of our preparations, 105
 The source of this our watch, and the chief head
 Of this post-haste and romage⁴ in the land.

BERNARDO: I think it be no other but e'en so.

Well may it sort⁵ that this portentous figure
 Comes armèd through our watch so like the king 110
 That was and is the question of these wars.

HORATIO: A mote⁶ it is to trouble the mind's eye.

In the most high and palmy state of Rome,
 A little ere the mightiest Julius fell,
 The graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted dead 115
 Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets;
 As stars with trains of fire, and dews of blood,
 Disasters in the sun; and the moist star,
 Upon whose influence Neptune's empire stands,⁷
 Was sick almost to doomsday with eclipse. 120
 And even the like precursor⁸ of feared events,
 As harbingers preceding still the fates
 And prologue to the omen coming on,
 Have heaven and earth together demonstrated
 Unto our climatures⁹ and countrymen. 125

[Enter GHOST.]

But soft, behold, lo where it comes again!
 I'll cross it¹ though it blast me.—Stay, illusion.

[It spreads (its) arms.]

If thou hast any sound or use of voice,
 Speak to me.
 If there be any good thing to be done, 130
 That may to thee do ease, and grace to me,
 Speak to me.

4. Stir. 5. Chance. 6. Speck of dust.

7. Neptune was the Roman sea god; the "moist star" is the moon. 8. Precursor. 9. Regions.

1. Horatio means either that he will move across the ghost's path in order to stop the ghost or that he will make the sign of the cross to gain power over the ghost. The stage direction that follows is somewhat ambiguous. "It" seems to refer to the ghost, but the movement would be appropriate to Horatio.

If thou art privy to thy country's fate,
 Which happily foreknowing may avoid,
 135 O, speak!
 Or if thou hast uphoarded in thy life
 Extorted treasure in the womb of earth,
 For which, they say, you spirits oft walk in death,

[The cock crows.]

Speak of it. Stay, and speak. Stop it, Marcellus.
 140 MARCELLUS: Shall I strike at it with my partisan?²

HORATIO: Do, if it will not stand.

BERNARDO: 'Tis here.

HORATIO: 'Tis here.

MARCELLUS: 'Tis gone.

[Exit GHOST.]

We do it wrong, being so majestic,
 To offer it the show of violence;
 145 For it is as the air, invulnerable,
 And our vain blows malicious mockery.

BERNARDO: It was about to speak when the cock crew.

HORATIO: And then it started like a guilty thing
 Upon a fearful summons. I have heard
 150 The cock, that is the trumpet to the morn,
 Doth with his lofty and shrill-sounding throat
 Awake the god of day, and at his warning,
 Whether in sea or fire, in earth or air,
 Th' extravagant and erring³ spirit hies
 155 To his confine; and of the truth herein
 This present object made probation.⁴

MARCELLUS: It faded on the crowing of the cock.
 Some say that ever 'gainst that season comes
 Wherein our Savior's birth is celebrated,
 160 This bird of dawning singeth all night long,
 And then, they say, no spirit dare stir abroad,
 The nights are wholesome, then no planets strike,
 No fairy takes,⁵ nor witch hath power to charm,
 So hallowed and so gracious is that time.

165 HORATIO: So have I heard and do in part believe it.

But look, the morn in russet mantle clad
 Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastward hill.
 Break we our watch up, and by my advice
 Let us impart what we have seen tonight
 170 Unto young Hamlet, for upon my life
 This spirit, dumb to us, will speak to him.
 Do you consent we shall acquaint him with it,
 As needful in our loves, fitting our duty?

MARCELLUS: Let's do't, I pray, and I this morning know
 175 Where we shall find him most conveniently.

[Exeunt.]

2. Halberd. 3. Errant, wandering out of bounds. 4. Proof. 5. Enchants.

Scene 2

A chamber of state. Enter KING CLAUDIUS, QUEEN GERTRUDE, HAMLET, POLONIUS, LAERTES, VOLTEMAND, CORNELIUS and other members of the court.

KING: Though yet of Hamlet our dear brother's death
 The memory be green, and that it us befitted
 To bear our hearts in grief, and our whole kingdom
 To be contracted in one brow of woe,
 Yet so far hath discretion fought with nature 5
 That we with wisest sorrow think on him,
 Together with remembrance of ourselves.
 Therefore our sometime sister, now our queen,
 Th' imperial jointress⁶ to this warlike state,
 Have we, as 'twere with a defeated joy, 10
 With an auspicious and a dropping eye,
 With mirth in funeral, and with dirge in marriage,
 In equal scale weighing delight and dole,
 Taken to wife; nor have we herein barred
 Your better wisdoms, which have freely gone 15
 With this affair along. For all, our thanks.
 Now follows that you know young Fortinbras,
 Holding a weak supposal of our worth,
 Or thinking by our late dear brother's death
 Our state to be disjoint and out of frame, 20
 Colleaguèd with this dream of his advantage,
 He hath not failed to pester us with message
 Importing the surrender of those lands
 Lost by his father, with all bonds of law,
 To our most valiant brother. So much for him. 25
 Now for ourself, and for this time of meeting,
 Thus much the business is: we have here writ
 To Norway, uncle of young Fortinbras—
 Who, impotent and bedrid, scarcely hears
 Of this his nephew's purpose—to suppress 30
 His further gait⁷ herein, in that the levies,
 The lists, and full proportions are all made
 Out of his subject; and we here dispatch
 You, good Cornelius, and you, Voltemand,
 For bearers of this greeting to old Norway, 35
 Giving to you no further personal power
 To business with the king, more than the scope
 Of these dilated⁸ articles allow.
 Farewell, and let your haste commend your duty.

CORNELIUS: }
 VOLTEMAND: } In that, and all things will we show our duty. 40

6. Widow who holds a jointure or life interest in the estate of her deceased husband.

7. Progress. 8. Fully expressed.

KING: We doubt it nothing, heartily farewell.

[Exeunt VOLTEMAND and CORNELIUS.]

And now, Laertes, what's the news with you?

You told us of some suit. What is't, Laertes?

You cannot speak of reason to the Dane

45 And lose your voice. What wouldst thou beg, Laertes,

That shall not be my offer, not thy asking?

The head is not more native to the heart,

The hand more instrumental⁹ to the mouth,

Than is the throne of Denmark to thy father.

What wouldst thou have, Laertes?

50 LAERTES: My dread lord,

Your leave and favor to return to France,

From whence, though willingly, I came to Denmark

To show my duty in your coronation,

Yet now I must confess, that duty done,

55 My thoughts and wishes bend again toward France,

And bow them to your gracious leave and pardon.

KING: Have you your father's leave? What says Polonius?

POLONIUS: He hath, my lord, wrung from me my slow leave

By laborsome petition, and at last

60 Upon his will I sealed my hard consent.

I do beseech you give him leave to go.

KING: Take thy fair hour, Laertes. Time be thine,

And thy best graces spend it at thy will.

But now, my cousin¹ Hamlet, and my son—

65 HAMLET: [Aside.] A little more than kin, and less than kind.

KING: How is it that the clouds still hang on you?

HAMLET: Not so, my lord. I am too much in the sun.

QUEEN: Good Hamlet, cast thy nighted color off,

And let thine eye look like a friend on Denmark.

70 Do not for ever with thy vailèd lids²

Seek for thy noble father in the dust.

Thou know'st 'tis common—all that lives must die,

Passing through nature to eternity.

HAMLET: Ay, madam, it is common.

QUEEN: If it be,

75 Why seems it so particular with thee?

HAMLET: Seems, madam? Nay, it is. I know not "seems."

'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother,

Nor customary suits of solemn black,

Nor windy suspiration of forced breath,

80 No, nor the fruitful river in the eye,

Nor the dejected havior³ of the visage,

Together with all forms, moods, shapes of grief,

9. Serviceable. 1. "Cousin" is used here as a general term of kinship. 2. Lowered eyes.
3. Appearance.

That can denote me truly. These indeed seem,
 For they are actions that a man might play,
 But I have that within which passes show— 85
 These but the trappings and the suits of woe.

KING: 'Tis sweet and commendable in your nature, Hamlet,
 To give these mourning duties to your father,
 But you must know your father lost a father,
 That father lost, lost his, and the survivor bound 90
 In filial obligation for some term
 To do obsequious⁴ sorrow. But to persevere
 In obstinate condolment is a course
 Of impious stubbornness. 'Tis unmanly grief.
 It shows a will most incorrect to⁵ heaven, 95
 A heart unfortified, a mind impatient,
 An understanding simple and unschooled.
 For what we know must be, and is as common
 As any the most vulgar thing to sense,
 Why should we in our peevish opposition 100
 Take it to heart? Fie, 'tis a fault to heaven,
 A fault against the dead, a fault to nature,
 To reason most absurd, whose common theme
 Is death of fathers, and who still hath cried,
 From the first corse⁶ till he that died today, 105
 "This must be so." We pray you throw to earth
 This unprevailing woe, and think of us
 As of a father, for let the world take note
 You are the most immediate⁷ to our throne,
 And with no less nobility of love 110
 Than that which dearest father bears his son
 Do I impart toward you. For your intent
 In going back to school in Wittenberg,
 It is most retrograde⁸ to our desire,
 And we beseech you, bend you to remain 115
 Here in the cheer and comfort of our eye,
 Our chiefest courtier, cousin, and our son.

QUEEN: Let not thy mother lose her prayers, Hamlet.
 I pray thee stay with us, go not to Wittenberg.

HAMLET: I shall in all my best obey you, madam. 120

KING: Why, 'tis a loving and a fair reply.
 Be as ourself in Denmark. Madam, come.
 This gentle and unforced accord of Hamlet
 Sits smiling to my heart, in grace whereof,
 No jocund health that Denmark drinks today 125
 But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell,
 And the king's rouse the heaven shall bruit⁹ again,

4. Suited for funeral obsequies. 5. Unsubmissive toward. 6. Corpse. 7. Next in line.
 8. Contrary. 9. Echo. Rouse: carousal.

Respeaking earthly thunder. Come away.

[Flourish. Exeunt all but HAMLET.]

HAMLET: O, that this too too solid flesh would melt,
 130 Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew,
 Or that the Everlasting had not fixed
 His canon¹ 'gainst self-slaughter. O God, God,
 How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable
 Seem to me all the uses of this world!
 135 Fie on't, ah, fie, 'tis an unweeded garden
 That grows to seed. Things rank and gross in nature Possess it merely.² That it should come to this,
 But two months dead, nay, not so much, not two.
 So excellent a king, that was to this 140 Hyperion to a satyr,³ so loving to my mother,
 That he might not beteem⁴ the winds of heaven
 Visit her face too roughly. Heaven and earth,
 Must I remember? Why, she would hang on him
 As if increase of appetite had grown
 145 By what it fed on, and yet, within a month—
 Let me not think on't. Frailty, thy name is woman—
 A little month, or ere those shoes were old
 With which she followed my poor father's body
 Like Niobe,⁵ all tears, why she, even she—150 O God, a beast that wants discourse of reason
 Would have mourned longer—married with my uncle,
 My father's brother, but no more like my father
 Than I to Hercules.⁶ Within a month,
 Ere yet the salt of most unrighteous tears
 155 Had left the flushing in her galled eyes,
 She married. O, most wicked speed, to post
 With such dexterity to incestuous sheets!
 It is not, nor it cannot come to good.
 But break my heart, for I must hold my tongue.

[Enter HORATIO, MARCELLUS, and BERNARDO.]

HORATIO: Hail to your lordship!

160 HAMLET: I am glad to see you well.
 Horatio—or I do forget myself.

HORATIO: The same, my lord, and your poor servant ever.

HAMLET: Sir, my good friend, I'll change that name with you.
 And what make you from⁷ Wittenberg, Horatio?
 165 Marcellus?

1. Law. 2. Entirely.

3. Hyperion, a Greek god, stands here for beauty in contrast to the monstrous satyr, a lecherous creature, half man and half goat. 4. Permit.

5. In Greek mythology, Niobe was turned to stone after a tremendous fit of weeping over the death of her fourteen children, a misfortune brought about by her boasting over her fertility.

6. The demigod Hercules was noted for his strength and the series of spectacular labors that he accomplished. 7. What are you doing away from? Change: exchange.

MARCELLUS: My good lord!

HAMLET: I am very glad to see you. [To BERNARDO.] Good even, sir.—

But what, in faith, make you from Wittenberg?

HORATIO: A truant disposition, good my lord.

HAMLET: I would not hear your enemy say so,

170

Nor shall you do my ear that violence

To make it truster of your own report

Against yourself. I know you are no truant.

But what is your affair in Elsinore?

We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart.

175

HORATIO: My lord, I came to see your father's funeral.

HAMLET: I prithee do not mock me, fellow-student,

I think it was to see my mother's wedding.

HORATIO: Indeed, my lord, it followed hard upon.

HAMLET: Thrift, thrift, Horatio. The funeral-baked meats

180

Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.

Would I had met my dearest⁸ foe in heaven

Or ever I had seen that day, Horatio!

My father—methinks I see my father.

HORATIO: Where, my lord?

HAMLET: In my mind's eye, Horatio.

185

HORATIO: I saw him once, 'a was a goodly king.

HAMLET: 'A was a man, take him for all in all,

I shall not look upon his like again.

HORATIO: My lord, I think I saw him yesternight.

HAMLET: Saw who?

190

HORATIO: My lord, the king your father.

HAMLET: The king my father?

HORATIO: Season your admiration⁹ for a while

With an attent ear till I may deliver¹

Upon the witness of these gentlemen

This marvel to you.

HAMLET: For God's love, let me hear!

195

HORATIO: Two nights together had these gentlemen,

Marcellus and Bernardo, on their watch

In the dead waste and middle of the night

Been thus encountered. A figure like your father,

Armèd at point exactly, cap-a-pe,²

200

Appears before them, and with solemn march

Goes slow and stately by them. Thrice he walked

By their oppressed and fear-surprisèd eyes

Within his truncheon's³ length, whilst they, distilled

Almost to jelly with the act of fear,

205

Stand dumb and speak not to him. This to me

In dreadful secrecy impart they did,

And I with them the third night kept the watch,

8. Bitterest. 9. Moderate your wonder. 1. Relate. Attent: attentive.

2. From head to toe. Exactly: completely. 3. Baton of office.

210 Where, as they had delivered, both in time,
 Form of the thing, each word made true and good,
 The apparition comes. I knew your father.
 These hands are not more like.

HAMLET: But where was this?
 MARCELLUS: My lord, upon the platform where we watch.

HAMLET: Did you not speak to it?

HORATIO: My lord, I did,
 215 But answer made it none. Yet once methought
 It lifted up it head and did address
 Itself to motion, like as it would speak;
 But even then the morning cock crew loud,
 And at the sound it shrunk in haste away
 And vanished from our sight.

220 HAMLET: 'Tis very strange.

HORATIO: As I do live, my honored lord, 'tis true,
 And we did think it writ down in our duty
 To let you know of it.

HAMLET: Indeed, sirs, but
 This troubles me. Hold you the watch tonight?

ALL: We do, my lord.

HAMLET: Armed, say you?

225 ALL: Armed, my lord.

HAMLET: From top to toe?

ALL: My lord, from head to foot.

HAMLET: Then saw you not his face.

HORATIO: O yes, my lord, he wore his beaver⁴ up.

HAMLET: What, looked he frowningly?

230 HORATIO: A countenance more in sorrow than in anger.

HAMLET: Pale or red?

HORATIO: Nay, very pale.

HAMLET: And fixed his eyes upon you?

HORATIO: Most constantly.

HAMLET: I would I had been there.

HORATIO: It would have much amazed you.

HAMLET: Very like.

235 Stayed it long?

HORATIO: While one with moderate haste might tell⁵ a hundred.

BOTH: Longer, longer.

HORATIO: Not when I saw't.

HAMLET: His beard was grizzled, no?

HORATIO: It was as I have seen it in his life,
 A sable silvered.

240 HAMLET: I will watch tonight.

Perchance 'twill walk again.

HORATIO: I warr'nt it will.

4. Hinged face protector. 5. Count.

HAMLET: If it assume my noble father's person,
 I'll speak to it though hell itself should gape
 And bid me hold my peace. I pray you all,
 If you have hitherto concealed this sight, 245
 Let it be tenable⁶ in your silence still,
 And whatsoever else shall hap tonight,
 Give it an understanding but no tongue.
 I will requite your loves. So fare you well.
 Upon the platform 'twixt eleven and twelve 250
 I'll visit you.

ALL: Our duty to your honor.

HAMLET: Your loves, as mine to you. Farewell. [Exeunt all but HAMLET.]
 My father's spirit in arms? All is not well.
 I doubt⁷ some foul play. Would the night were come!
 Till then sit still, my soul. Foul deeds will rise, 255
 Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes. [Exit.]

Scene 3

The dwelling of POLONIUS. Enter LAERTES and OPHELIA.

LAERTES: My necessities are embarked. Farewell.
 And, sister, as the winds give benefit
 And convoy is assistant,⁸ do not sleep,
 But let me hear from you.

OPHELIA: Do you doubt that?

LAERTES: For Hamlet, and the trifling of his favor, 5
 Hold it a fashion and a toy in blood,
 A violet in the youth of primy⁹ nature,
 Forward, not permanent, sweet, not lasting,
 The perfume and suppliance of a minute,
 No more.

OPHELIA: No more but so?

LAERTES: Think it no more. 10
 For nature crescent¹ does not grow alone
 In thews and bulk, but as this temple² waxes
 The inward service of the mind and soul
 Grows wide withal. Perhaps he loves you now,
 And now no soil nor cautel³ doth besmirch 15
 The virtue of his will, but you must fear,
 His greatness weighted,⁴ his will is not his own,
 For he himself is subject to his birth.
 He may not, as unvalued persons do,
 Carve for himself, for on his choice depends 20
 The safety and health of this whole state,

6. Held. 7. Suspect. 8. Means of transport is available. 9. Of the spring. 1. Growing.
 2. Body. Thews: muscles. 3. Deceit. 4. Rank considered.

And therefore must his choice be circumscribed
 Unto the voice⁵ and yielding of that body
 Whereof he is the head. Then if he says he loves you,
 25 It fits your wisdom so far to believe it
 As he in his particular act and place
 May give his saying deed, which is no further
 Than the main voice of Denmark goes withal.
 Then weigh what loss your honor may sustain 30 If with too credent⁶ ear you list his songs,
 Or lose your heart, or your chaste treasure open
 To his unmastered importunity.
 Fear it, Ophelia, fear it, my dear sister,
 And keep you in the rear of your affection,
 35 Out of the shot and danger of desire.
 The chariest⁷ maid is prodigal enough
 If she unmask her beauty to the moon.
 Virtue itself scapes not calumnious strokes.
 The canker⁸ galls the infants of the spring
 40 Too oft before their buttons⁹ be disclosed,
 And in the morn and liquid dew of youth
 Contagious blastments¹ are most imminent.
 Be wary then; best safety lies in fear.
 Youth to itself rebels, though none else near.
 45 OPHELIA: I shall the effect of this good lesson keep
 As watchman to my heart. But, good my brother,
 Do not as some ungracious pastors do,
 Show me the steep and thorny way to heaven,
 Whiles like a puffed and reckless libertine
 50 Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads
 And recks not his own rede.²

LAERTES: O, fear me not.

[Enter POLONIUS.]

I stay too long. But here my father comes.
 A double blessing is a double grace;
 Occasion smiles upon a second leave.
 55 POLONIUS: Yet here, Laertes? Aboard, aboard, for shame!
 The wind sits in the shoulder of your sail,
 And you are stayed for. There—my blessing with thee,
 And these few precepts in thy memory
 Look thou character.³ Give thy thoughts no tongue,
 60 Nor any unproportioned thought his act.
 Be thou familiar, but by no means vulgar.
 Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,
 Grapple them unto thy soul with hoops of steel;

5. Assent. 6. Credulous. List: listen to. 7. Most circumspect. 8. Cankerworm. 9. Buds.
 1. Blights. 2. Heeds not his own advice. 3. Write.

But do not dull⁴ thy palm with entertainment
 Of each new-hatched, unfledged comrade. Beware 65
 Of entrance to a quarrel, but being in,
 Bear't that th' opposèd⁵ may beware of thee.
 Give every man thy ear, but few thy voice;⁶
 Take each man's censure, but reserve thy judgment.
 Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy, 70
 But not expressed in fancy; rich not gaudy,
 For the apparel oft proclaims the man,
 And they in France of the best rank and station
 Are of a most select and generous chief⁷ in that.
 Neither a borrower nor a lender be, 75
 For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
 And borrowing dulls th' edge of husbandry.
 This above all, to thine own self be true,
 And it must follow as the night the day
 Thou canst not then be false to any man. 80
 Farewell. My blessing season this in thee!
 LAERTES: Most humbly do I take my leave, my lord.
 POLONIUS: The time invests you. Go, your servants tend.⁸
 LAERTES: Farewell, Ophelia, and remember well
 What I have said to you.
 OPHELIA: "Tis in my memory locked, 85
 And you yourself shall keep the key of it.
 LAERTES: Farewell. [Exit.]
 POLONIUS: What is't, Ophelia, he hath said to you?
 OPHELIA: So please you, something touching the Lord Hamlet.
 POLONIUS: Marry, well bethought. 90
 'Tis told me he hath very oft of late
 Given private time to you, and you yourself
 Have of your audience been most free and bounteous.
 If it be so—as so 'tis put on me,
 And that in way of caution—I must tell you, 95
 You do not understand yourself so clearly
 As it behooves my daughter and your honor.
 What is between you? Give me up the truth.
 OPHELIA: He hath, my lord, of late made many tenders
 Of his affection to me. 100
 POLONIUS: Affection? Pooh! You speak like a green girl,
 Unsifted in such perilous circumstance.
 Do you believe his tenders, as you call them?
 OPHELIA: I do not know, my lord, what I should think.
 POLONIUS: Marry, I will teach you. Think yourself a baby 105
 That you have ta'en these tenders for true pay
 Which are not sterling. Tender yourself more dearly,
 Or (not to crack the wind of the poor phrase,

4. Make callous. 5. Conduct it so that the opponent. 6. Approval. 7. Eminence. 8. Await.

Running it thus) you'll tender me a fool.

110 OPHELIA: My lord, he hath importuned me with love
In honorable fashion.

POLONIUS: Ay, fashion you may call it. Go to, go to.

OPHELIA: And hath given countenance⁹ to his speech, my lord,
With almost all the holy vows of heaven.

115 POLONIUS: Ay, springes¹ to catch woodcocks. I do know,
When the blood burns, how prodigal the soul
Lends the tongue vows. These blazes, daughter,
Giving more light than heat, extinct in both
Even in their promise, as it is a-making,
120 You must not take for fire. From this time
Be something scanted of your maiden presence.
Set your entreatments² at a higher rate

Than a command to parle. For Lord Hamlet,
Believe so much in him that he is young,

125 And with a larger tether may he walk
Than may be given you. In few, Ophelia,
Do not believe his vows, for they are brokers,³
Not of that dye which their investments⁴ show,
But mere implorators⁵ of unholy suits,
130 Breathing like sanctified and pious bawds,
The better to beguile. This is for all:

I would not, in plain terms, from this time forth
Have you so slander any moment leisure
As to give words or talk with the Lord Hamlet.

135 Look to't, I charge you. Come your ways.

OPHELIA: I shall obey, my lord.

[Exeunt.]

Scene 4

The guard station. Enter HAMLET, HORATIO and MARCELLUS.

HAMLET: The air bites shrewdly;⁶ it is very cold.

HORATIO: It is a nipping and an eager⁷ air.

HAMLET: What hour now?

HORATIO: I think it lacks of twelve.

MARCELLUS: No, it is struck.

HORATIO: Indeed? I heard it not.

5 It then draws near the season
Wherein the spirit held his wont to walk.

[A flourish of trumpets, and two pieces go off.]

What does this mean, my lord?

HAMLET: The king doth wake tonight and takes his rouse,

9. Confirmation. 1. Snares. 2. Negotiations before a surrender. 3. Panderers. 4. Garments.
5. Solicitors. 6. Sharply. 7. Keen.

Keeps wassail, and the swagg'ring up-spring reels,
 And as he drains his draughts of Rhenish⁸ down, 10
 The kettledrum and trumpet thus bray out
 The triumph of his pledge.

HORATIO: Is it a custom?

HAMLET: Ay, marry, is't,
 But to my mind, though I am native here
 And to the manner born, it is a custom 15
 More honored in the breach than the observance.
 This heavy-headed revel east and west
 Makes us traduced and taxed of other nations.
 They clepe⁹ us drunkards, and with swinish phrase
 Soil our addition,¹ and indeed it takes 20
 From our achievements, though performed at height,
 The pith and marrow of our attribute.²
 So oft it chanches in particular men,
 That for some vicious mole of nature in them,
 As in their birth, wherein they are not guilty 25
 (Since nature cannot choose his origin),
 By their o'ergrowth of some complexion,
 Oft breaking down the pales³ and forts of reason,
 Or by some habit that too much o'er-leavens
 The form of plausive⁴ manners—that these men, 30
 Carrying, I say, the stamp of one defect,
 Being nature's livery or fortune's star,
 His virtues else, be they as pure as grace,
 As infinite as man may undergo,
 Shall in the general censure take corruption 35
 From that particular fault. The dram of evil
 Doth all the noble substance often doubt⁵
 To his own scandal.

[Enter GHOST.]

HORATIO: Look, my lord, it comes.

HAMLET: Angels and ministers of grace defend us!
 Be thou a spirit of health or goblin damned, 40
 Bring with thee airs from heaven or blasts from hell,
 Be thy intents wicked or charitable,
 Thou com'st in such a questionable⁶ shape
 That I will speak to thee. I'll call thee Hamlet,
 King, father, royal Dane. O, answer me! 45
 Let me not burst in ignorance, but tell
 Why thy canonized⁷ bones, hearsèd in death,
 Have burst their cerements;⁸ why the sepulchre

8. Rhine wine. Up-spring: a German dance. 9. Call. 1. Reputation. 2. Honor. 3. Barriers.

4. Pleasing. 5. Extinguish. 6. Prompting question. 7. Buried in accordance with church canons.

8. Gravecloths.

50 Wherein we saw thee quietly inurned
 Hath oped his ponderous and marble jaws
 To cast thee up again. What may this mean
 That thou, dead corse, again in complete steel⁹
 Revisits thus the glimpses of the moon,
 Making night hideous, and we fools of nature
 55 So horribly to shake our disposition
 With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls?
 Say, why is this? Wherefore? What should we do?
 [GHOST beckons.]

HORATIO: It beckons you to go away with it,
 As if it some impartment¹ did desire
 To you alone.

60 MARCELLUS: Look with what courteous action
 It waves you to a more removed² ground.
 But do not go with it.

HORATIO: No, by no means.

HAMLET: It will not speak; then I will follow it.

HORATIO: Do not, my lord.

HAMLET: Why, what should be the fear?

65 I do not set my life at a pin's fee,³
 And for my soul, what can it do to that,
 Being a thing immortal as itself?
 It waves me forth again. I'll follow it.

HORATIO: What if it tempt you toward the flood, my lord,
 70 Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff
 That beetles⁴ o'er his base into the sea,
 And there assume some other horrible form,
 Which might deprive your sovereignty of reason⁵
 And draw you into madness? Think of it.
 75 The very place puts toys of desperation,⁶
 Without more motive, into every brain
 That looks so many fathoms to the sea
 And hears it roar beneath.

HAMLET: It wafts me still.
 Go on. I'll follow thee.

MARCELLUS: You shall not go, my lord.

80 HAMLET: Hold off your hands.

HORATIO: Be ruled. You shall not go.

HAMLET: My fate cries out
 And makes each petty artere in this body
 As hardy as the Nemean lion's nerve.⁷

9. Armor. 1. Communication. 2. Beckons you to a more distant. 3. Price.

4. Juts out. 5. Rational power. Deprive: take away. 6. Desperate fancies.

7. The Nemean lion was a mythological monster slain by Hercules as one of his twelve labors. Artere: artery.

Still am I called. Unhand me, gentlemen.
 By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that lets⁸ me. 85
 I say, away! Go on. I'll follow thee. [Exeunt GHOST and HAMLET.]

HORATIO: He waxes desperate with imagination.

MARCELLUS: Let's follow. 'Tis not fit thus to obey him.

HORATIO: Have after. To what issue will this come?

MARCELLUS: Something is rotten in the state of Denmark. 90

HORATIO: Heaven will direct it.

MARCELLUS: Nay, let's follow him. [Exeunt.]

Scene 5

Near the guard station. Enter GHOST and HAMLET.

HAMLET: Whither wilt thou lead me? Speak. I'll go no further.

GHOST: Mark me.

HAMLET: I will.

GHOST: My hour is almost come,
 When I to sulph'rous and tormenting flames
 Must render up myself.

HAMLET: Alas, poor ghost!

GHOST: Pity me not, but lend thy serious hearing
 To what I shall unfold. 5

HAMLET: Speak. I am bound to hear.

GHOST: So art thou to revenge, when thou shalt hear.

HAMLET: What?

GHOST: I am thy father's spirit,
 Doomed for a certain term to walk the night,
 And for the day confined to fast in fires,
 Till the foul crimes done in my days of nature⁹
 Are burnt and purged away. But that I am forbid
 To tell the secrets of my prison house,
 I could a tale unfold whose lightest word
 Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood,
 Make thy two eyes like stars start from their spheres,
 Thy knotted and combinèd¹ locks to part,
 And each particular hair to stand an end,
 Like quills upon the fretful porpentine.² 10
 But this eternal blazon³ must not be
 To ears of flesh and blood. List, list, O, list!
 If thou didst ever thy dear father love— 15

HAMLET: O God!

GHOST: Revenge his foul and most unnatural murder. 25

HAMLET: Murder!

GHOST: Murder most foul, as in the best it is,
 But this most foul, strange, and unnatural.

8. Hinders. 9. That is, while I was alive. 1. Tangled. 2. Porcupine. 3. Description of eternity.

HAMLET: Haste me to know't, that I, with wings as swift 30 As meditation or the thoughts of love,
 May sweep to my revenge.

GHOST: I find thee apt.
 And duller shouldst thou be than the fat weed
 That rots itself in ease on Lethe⁴ wharf,— Wouldst thou not stir in this. Now, Hamlet, hear.
 35 'Tis given out that, sleeping in my orchard,
 A serpent stung me. So the whole ear of Denmark
 Is by a forgèd process⁵ of my death
 Rankly abused. But know, thou noble youth,
 The serpent that did sting thy father's life
 Now wears his crown.

40 HAMLET: O my prophetic soul!
 My uncle!

GHOST: Ay, that incestuous, that adulterate beast,
 With witchcraft of his wits, with traitorous gifts—
 O wicked wit and gifts that have the power
 45 So to seduce!—won to his shameful lust
 The will of my most seeming virtuous queen.
 O Hamlet, what a falling off was there,
 From me, whose love was of that dignity
 That it went hand in hand even with the vow
 50 I made to her in marriage, and to decline⁶
 Upon a wretch whose natural gifts were poor
 To those of mine!
 But virtue, as it never will be moved,
 Though lewdness court it in a shape of heaven,
 55 So lust, though to a radiant angel linked,
 Will sate itself in a celestial bed
 And prey on garbage.
 But soft, methinks I scent the morning air.
 Brief let me be. Sleeping within my orchard,
 60 My custom always of the afternoon,
 Upon my secure hour thy uncle stole,
 With juice of cursed hebona⁷ in a vial,
 And in the porches of my ears did pour
 The leperous distilment, whose effect
 65 Holds such an enmity with blood of man
 That swift as quicksilver it courses through
 The natural gates and alleys of the body,
 And with a sudden vigor it doth posset⁸
 And curd, like eager⁹ droppings into milk,
 70 The thin and wholesome blood. So did it mine,

4. When drunk, the waters of the Lethe, one of the rivers of the classical underworld, induced forgetfulness. The "fat weed" is the asphodel that grew there; some texts have "roots" for "rots."

5. False report. 6. Sink. 7. A poison. 8. Coagulate. 9. Acid. Curd: curdle.

And a most instant tetter barked about¹
 Most lazar-like² with vile and loathsome crust
 All my smooth body.

Thus was I sleeping by a brother's hand
 Of life, of crown, of queen at once dispatched, 75
 Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,
 Unhouseled, disappointed, unaneled,³
 No reck'ning made, but sent to my account
 With all my imperfections on my head.

O, horrible! O, horrible, most horrible! 80
 If thou hast nature in thee, bear it not.

Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
 A couch of luxury⁴ and damnèd incest.

But howsomever thou pursues this act,
 Taint not thy mind, nor let thy soul contrive 85
 Against thy mother aught. Leave her to heaven,
 And to those thorns that in her bosom lodge
 To prick and sting her. Fare thee well at once.

The glowworm shows the matin⁵ to be near,
 And gins to pale his uneffectual fire. 90

Adieu, adieu, adieu. Remember me.

[Exit.]

HAMLET: O all you host of heaven! O earth! What else?

And shall I couple hell? O, fie! Hold, hold, my heart,
 And you, my sinews, grow not instant old,
 But bear me stiffly up. Remember thee? 95

Ay, thou poor ghost, whiles memory holds a seat
 In this distracted globe.⁶ Remember thee?

Yea, from the table⁷ of my memory
 I'll wipe away all trivial fond⁸ records,
 All saws of books, all forms, all pressures past 100

That youth and observation copied there,
 And thy commandment all alone shall live
 Within the book and volume of my brain,
 Unmixed with baser matter. Yes, by heaven!

O most pernicious woman! 105

O villain, villain, smiling, damnèd villain!

My tables—meet it is I set it down
 That one may smile, and smile, and be a villain.

At least I am sure it may be so in Denmark.

So, uncle, there you are. Now to my word:⁹ 110

It is "Adieu, adieu. Remember me."

I have sworn't.

[Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.]

1. Covered like bark. Tetter: a skin disease. 2. Leperlike.

3. The ghost means that he died without the customary rites of the church, that is, without receiving the Sacrament, without confession, and without Extreme Unction. 4. Lust. 5. Morning.

6. Skull. 7. Writing tablet. 8. Foolish. 9. For my motto.

HORATIO: My lord, my lord!

MARCELLUS: Lord Hamlet!

HORATIO: Heavens secure him!

HAMLET: So be it!

115 MARCELLUS: Illo, ho, ho,¹ my lord!

HAMLET: Hillo, ho, ho, boy! Come, bird, come.

MARCELLUS: How is't, my noble lord?

HORATIO: What news, my lord?

HAMLET: O, wonderful!

HORATIO: Good my lord, tell it.

HAMLET: No, you will reveal it.

HORATIO: Not I, my lord, by heaven.

120 MARCELLUS: Nor I, my lord.

HAMLET: How say you then, would heart of man once think it?
But you'll be secret?

BOTH: Ay, by heaven, my lord.

HAMLET: There's never a villain dwelling in all Denmark
But he's an arrant knave.

125 HORATIO: There needs no ghost, my lord, come from the grave
To tell us this.

HAMLET: Why, right, you are in the right,
And so without more circumstance at all
I hold it fit that we shake hands and part,
You, as your business and desire shall point you,
130 For every man hath business and desire
Such as it is, and for my own poor part,
Look you, I'll go pray.

HORATIO: These are but wild and whirling words, my lord.

HAMLET: I am sorry they offend you, heartily;
Yes, faith, heartily.

135 HORATIO: There's no offence, my lord.

HAMLET: Yes, by Saint Patrick, but there is, Horatio,
And much offence too. Touching this vision here,
It is an honest ghost, that let me tell you.
For your desire to know what is between us,
140 O'ermaster't as you may. And now, good friends,
As you are friends, scholars, and soldiers,
Give me one poor request.

HORATIO: What is't, my lord? We will.

HAMLET: Never make known what you have seen tonight.

BOTH: My lord, we will not.

HAMLET: Nay, but swear't.

145 HORATIO: In faith,

My lord, not I.

MARCELLUS: Nor I, my lord, in faith.

HAMLET: Upon my sword.

1. A falconer's cry.

MARCELLUS: We have sworn, my lord, already.

HAMLET: Indeed, upon my sword, indeed.

[GHOST cries under the stage.]

GHOST: Swear.

HAMLET: Ha, ha, boy, say'st thou so? Art thou there, truepenny?²

Come on. You hear this fellow in the cellarage.³

150

Consent to swear.

HORATIO: Propose the oath, my lord.

HAMLET: Never to speak of this that you have seen,

Swear by my sword.

GHOST: [Beneath.] Swear.

HAMLET: Hic et ubique?⁴ Then we'll shift our ground.

155

Come hither, gentlemen,

And lay your hands again upon my sword.

Swear by my sword

Never to speak of this that you have heard.

GHOST: [Beneath.] Swear by his sword.

160

HAMLET: Well said, old mole! Canst work i' th' earth so fast?

A worthy pioneer!⁵ Once more remove, good friends.

HORATIO: O day and night, but this is wondrous strange!

HAMLET: And therefore as a stranger give it welcome.

There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,

165

Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.

But come.

Here as before, never, so help you mercy,

How strange or odd some'er I bear myself

(As I perchance hereafter shall think meet

170

To put an antic⁶ disposition on),

That you, at such times, seeing me, never shall,

With arms encumbered⁷ thus, or this head-shake,

Or by pronouncing of some doubtful phrase,

As "Well, we know," or "We could, and if we would"

175

Or "If we list to speak," or "There be, and if they might"

Or such ambiguous giving out, to note

That you know aught of me—this do swear,

So grace and mercy at your most need help you.

GHOST: [Beneath.] Swear.

[They swear.] 180

HAMLET: Rest, rest, perturbèd spirit! So, gentlemen,

With all my love I do commend me to you,

And what so poor a man as Hamlet is

May do t'express his love and friending⁸ to you,

God willing, shall not lack. Let us go in together,

185

And still your fingers on your lips, I pray.

The time is out of joint. O cursèd spite

2. Trusty old fellow. 3. Below. 4. Here and everywhere? (Latin). 5. Soldier who digs trenches.
6. Mad. 7. Folded. 8. Friendship.

That ever I was born to set it right!
Nay, come, let's go together.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II

Scene 1

The dwelling of POLONIUS. Enter POLONIUS and REYNALDO.

POLONIUS: Give him this money and these notes, Reynaldo.

REYNALDO: I will, my lord.

POLONIUS: You shall do marvellous wisely, good Reynaldo,
Before you visit him, to make inquire⁹
Of his behavior.

5 REYNALDO: My lord, I did intend it.

POLONIUS: Marry, well said, very well said. Look you, sir.
Enquire me first what Danskers¹ are in Paris,
And how, and who, what means, and where they keep,²
What company, at what expense; and finding 10 By this encompassment³ and drift of question
That they do know my son, come you more nearer
Than your particular demands⁴ will touch it.
Take you as 'twere some distant knowledge of him,
As thus, "I know his father and his friends,
15 And in part him." Do you mark this, Reynaldo?

REYNALDO: Ay, very well, my lord.

POLONIUS: "And in part him, but," you may say, "not well,
But if't be he I mean, he's very wild,
Addicted so and so." And there put on him
20 What forgeries you please; marry, none so rank⁵
As may dishonor him. Take heed of that.
But, sir, such wanton, wild, and usual slips
As are companions noted and most known
To youth and liberty.

REYNALDO: As gaming, my lord.

25 POLONIUS: Ay, or drinking, fencing, swearing,
Quarrelling, drabbing⁶—you may go so far.

REYNALDO: My lord, that would dishonor him.

POLONIUS: Faith, no, as you may season it in the charge.⁷
You must not put another scandal on him,
30 That he is open to incontinency.⁸
That's not my meaning. But breathe his faults so quaintly⁹
That they may seem the taints of liberty,¹
The flash and outbreak of a fiery mind,
A savageness in unreclaimèd² blood,

9. Inquiry. 1. Danes. 2. Live. 3. Indirect means. 4. Direct questions.

5. Foul. Forgeries: lies. 6. Whoring. 7. Soften the accusation. 8. Sexual excess.

9. With delicacy. 1. Faults of freedom. 2. Untamed.

Of general assault.³

REYNALDO: But, my good lord— 35

POLONIUS: Wherefore should you do this?

REYNALDO: Ay, my lord,

I would know that.

POLONIUS: Marry, sir, here's my drift,

And I believe it is a fetch of warrant.⁴

You laying these slight sullies on my son,
As 'twere a thing a little soiled wi' th' working, 40

Mark you,

Your party in converse,⁵ him you would sound,

Having ever seen in the prenominate⁶ crimes

The youth you breathe⁷ of guilty, be assured

He closes with you in this consequence, 45

"Good sir," or so, or "friend," or "gentleman,"

According to the phrase or the addition

Of man and country.

REYNALDO: Very good, my lord.

POLONIUS: And then, sir, does 'a this—'a does—What was I about to say?

By the mass, I was about to say something. 50

Where did I leave?

REYNALDO: At "closes in the consequence."

POLONIUS: At "closes in the consequence"—ay, marry,

He closes thus: "I know the gentleman.

I saw him yesterday, or th' other day, 55

Or then, or then, with such, or such, and as you say,

There was 'a gaming, there o'ertook in's rouse,

There falling out at tennis," or perchance

"I saw him enter such a house of sale,"

Videlicet,⁸ a brothel, or so forth. 60

See you, now—

Your bait of falsehood takes this carp of truth,

And thus do we of wisdom and of reach,⁹

With windlasses and with assays of bias,¹

By indirections find directions out; 65

So by my former lecture and advice

Shall you my son. You have me, have you not?

REYNALDO: My lord, I have.

POLONIUS: God b'wi' ye; fare ye well.

REYNALDO: Good my lord.

POLONIUS: Observe his inclination in yourself. 70

REYNALDO: I shall, my lord.

POLONIUS: And let him ply² his music.

REYNALDO: Well, my lord.

POLONIUS: Farewell.

[Exit REYNALDO.]

[Enter OPHELIA.]

How now, Ophelia, what's the matter?

OPHELIA: O my lord, my lord, I have been so affrighted!

75 POLONIUS: With what, i' th' name of God?

OPHELIA: My lord, as I was sewing in my closet,³
 Lord Hamlet with his doublet all unbraced,⁴
 No hat upon his head, his stockings fouled,
 Ungartered and down-gyvèd⁵ to his ankle,
 80 Pale as his shirt, his knees knocking each other,
 And with a look so piteous in purport
 As if he had been loosèd out of hell
 To speak of horrors—he comes before me.

POLONIUS: Mad for thy love?

OPHELIA: My lord, I do not know,
 But truly I do fear it.

85 POLONIUS: What said he?

OPHELIA: He took me by the wrist, and held me hard,
 Then goes he to the length of all his arm,
 And with his other hand thus o'er his brow,
 He falls to such perusal of my face
 90 As 'a would draw it. Long stayed he so.
 At last, a little shaking of mine arm,
 And thrice his head thus waving up and down,
 He raised a sigh so piteous and profound
 As it did seem to shatter all his bulk,⁶
 95 And end his being. That done, he lets me go,
 And with his head over his shoulder turned
 He seemed to find his way without his eyes,
 For out adooors he went without their helps,
 And to the last bended⁷ their light on me.

100 POLONIUS: Come, go with me. I will go seek the king.

This is the very ecstasy of love,
 Whose violent property fordoes⁸ itself,
 And leads the will to desperate undertakings
 As oft as any passion under heaven

105 That does afflict our natures. I am sorry.

What, have you given him any hard words of late?

OPHELIA: No, my good lord, but as you did command
 I did repel⁹ his letters, and denied
 His access to me.

POLONIUS: That hath made him mad.

110 I am sorry that with better heed and judgment
 I had not quoted¹ him. I feared he did but trifle,
 And meant to wrack² thee; but beshrew my jealousy.
 By heaven, it is as proper to our age

To cast beyond ourselves in our opinions
 As it is common for the younger sort 115
 To lack discretion. Come, go we to the king.
 This must be known, which being kept close, might move
 More grief to hide than hate to utter love.
 Come. [Exeunt.]

Scene 2

A public room. Enter KING, QUEEN, ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: Welcome, dear Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.
 Moreover that³ we much did long to see you,
 The need we have to use you did provoke
 Our hasty sending. Something have you heard
 Of Hamlet's transformation—so call it, 5
 Sith⁴ nor th' exterior nor the inward man Resembles that it was. What it should be,
 More than his father's death, that thus hath put him
 So much from th' understanding of himself,
 I cannot deem of. I entreat you both 10
 That, being of so young days⁵ brought up with him,
 And sith so neighbored⁶ to his youth and havior,
 That you vouchsafe your rest here in our court
 Some little time, so by your companies
 To draw him on to pleasures, and to gather 15
 So much as from occasion you may glean,
 Whether aught to us unknown afflicts him thus,
 That opened lies within our remedy.

QUEEN: Good gentlemen, he hath much talked of you,
 And sure I am two men there are not living 20
 To whom he more adheres. If it will please you
 To show us so much gentry⁷ and good will
 As to expend your time with us awhile
 For the supply and profit of our hope,
 Your visitation shall receive such thanks 25
 As fits a king's remembrance.

ROSENCRANTZ: Both your majesties
 Might, by the sovereign power you have of us,
 Put your dread pleasures more into command
 Than to entreaty.

GUILDENSTERN: But we both obey,
 And here give up ourselves in the full bent⁸ 30
 To lay our service freely at your feet,
 To be commanded.

KING: Thanks, Rosencrantz and gentle Guildenstern.

3. In addition to the fact that. 4. Since. 5. From childhood. 6. Closely allied. 7. Courtesy.
 8. Completely.

QUEEN: Thanks, Guildenstern and gentle Rosencrantz.

35 And I beseech you instantly to visit
My too much changed son. Go, some of you,
And bring these gentlemen where Hamlet is.

GUILDENSTERN: Heavens make our presence and our practices
Pleasant and helpful to him!

QUEEN: Ay, amen!
[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

[Enter POLONIUS.]

40 POLONIUS: Th' ambassadors from Norway, my good lord,
Are joyfully returned.

KING: Thou still⁹ hast been the father of good news.

POLONIUS: Have I, my lord? I assure you, my good liege,
I hold my duty as I hold my soul,

45 Both to my God and to my gracious king;
And I do think—or else this brain of mine
Hunts not the trail of policy¹ so sure
As it hath used to do—that I have found
The very cause of Hamlet's lunacy.

50 KING: O, speak of that, that do I long to hear.

POLONIUS: Give first admittance to th' ambassadors.
My news shall be the fruit² to that great feast.

KING: Thyself do grace to them, and bring them in. [Exit POLONIUS.]

He tells me, my dear Gertrude, he hath found

55 The head and source of all your son's distemper.

QUEEN: I doubt it is no other but the main,
His father's death and our o'erhasty marriage.

KING: Well, we shall sift³ him.

[Enter Ambassadors (VOLTEMAND and CORNELIUS) with POLONIUS.]

Welcome, my good friends,

Say, Voltemand, what from our brother Norway?

60 VOLTEMAND: Most fair return of greetings and desires.

Upon our first,⁴ he sent out to suppress
His nephew's levies, which to him appeared
To be a preparation 'gainst the Polack,
But better looked into, he truly found

65 It was against your highness, whereat grieved,
That so his sickness, age, and impotence
Was falsely borne in hand, sends out arrests⁵
On Fortinbras, which he in brief obeys,

Receives rebuke from Norway, and in fine,

70 Makes vow before his uncle never more
To give th' assay⁶ of arms against your majesty.

9. Ever. 1. Statecraft. 2. Dessert. 3. Examine. 4. That is, first appearance.
5. Orders to stop. Falsely borne in hand: deceived. 6. Trial.

Whereon old Norway, overcome with joy,
 Gives him three thousand crowns in annual fee,
 And his commission to employ those soldiers,
 So levied as before, against the Polack, 75
 With an entreaty, herein further shown, [Gives CLAUDIUS a paper.]
 That it might please you to give quiet pass⁷
 Through your dominions for this enterprise,
 On such regards of safety and allowance
 As therein are set down.

KING: It likes⁸ us well, 80
 And at our more considered time⁹ we'll read,
 Answer, and think upon this business.
 Meantime we thank you for your well-took¹ labor.
 Go to your rest; at night we'll feast together.
 Most welcome home! [Exeunt AMBASSADORS.]

POLONIUS: This business is well ended. 85
 My liege and madam, to expostulate²
 What majesty should be, what duty is,
 Why day is day, night night, and time is time,
 Were nothing but to waste night, day, and time. 90
 Therefore, since brevity is the soul of wit,
 And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes,³
 I will be brief. Your noble son is mad.
 Mad call I it, for to define true madness,
 What is't but to be nothing else but mad?
 But let that go.

QUEEN: More matter with less art. 95

POLONIUS: Madam, I swear I use no art at all.
 That he is mad, 'tis true: 'tis true 'tis pity,
 And pity 'tis 'tis true. A foolish figure,
 But farewell it, for I will use no art.
 Mad let us grant him, then, and now remains 100
 That we find out the cause of this effect,
 Or rather say the cause of this defect,
 For this effect defective comes by cause.
 Thus it remains, and the remainder thus.
 Pepend.⁴ 105
 I have a daughter—have while she is mine—
 Who in her duty and obedience, mark,
 Hath given me this. Now gather, and surmise.
 [Reads] the letter.
 “To the celestial, and my soul's idol, the most beautified Ophelia.”—That's an ill phrase, a vile phrase, “beautified” is a vile phrase. But you shall hear. 110
 Thus:
 “In her excellent white bosom, these, etc.”

7. Safe conduct. 8. Pleases. 9. Time for more consideration. 1. Successful. 2. Discuss.
 3. Adornments. 4. Consider.

QUEEN: Came this from Hamlet to her?

POLONIUS: Good madam, stay awhile. I will be faithful.

115 "Doubt thou the stars are fire,
Doubt that the sun doth move;
Doubt truth to be a liar;
But never doubt I love.

O dear Ophelia, I am ill at these numbers.⁵ I have not art to reckon my 120 groans, but that I love thee best, O most best, believe it. Adieu.

Thine evermore, most dear lady,
whilst this machine⁶ is to him, Hamlet."

This in obedience hath my daughter shown me,
And more above, hath his solicitings,
125 As they fell out by time, by means, and place,
All given to mine ear.

KING: But how hath she Received his love?

POLONIUS: What do you think of me?

KING: As of a man faithful and honorable.

POLONIUS: I would fain prove so. But what might you think,
130 When I had seen this hot love on the wing.

(As I perceived it, I must tell you that,
Before my daughter told me), what might you,
Or my dear majesty your queen here, think,
If I had played the desk or table-book,

135 Or given my heart a winking, mute and dumb,
Or looked upon this love with idle sight,⁷
What might you think? No, I went round⁸ to work,
And my young mistress thus I did bespeak:
"Lord Hamlet is a prince out of thy star.⁹

140 This must not be." And then I prescripts¹ gave her,
That she should lock herself from his resort,
Admit no messengers, receive no tokens.
Which done, she took² the fruits of my advice;
And he repelled, a short tale to make,
145 Fell into a sadness, then into a fast,
Thence to a watch, thence into a weakness,
Thence to a lightness, and by this declension,
Into the madness wherein now he raves,
And all we mourn for.

KING: Do you think 'tis this?

150 QUEEN: It may be, very like.

POLONIUS: Hath there been such a time—I would fain know that—

5. Verses. 6. Body.

7. Polonius means that he would have been at fault if, having seen Hamlet's attention to Ophelia, he had winked at it or not paid attention, an "idle sight," and if he had remained silent and kept the information to himself, as if it were written in a "desk" or "table-book." 8. Directly. 9. Beyond your sphere.

1. Orders. 2. Followed.

That I have positively said "Tis so,"
When it proved otherwise?

KING: Not that I know.

POLONIUS: [Pointing to his head and shoulder.] Take this from this, if this be otherwise.

If circumstances lead me, I will find 155
Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed
Within the centre.³

KING: How may we try it further?

POLONIUS: You know sometimes he walks four hours together
Here in the lobby.

QUEEN: So he does, indeed.

POLONIUS: At such a time I'll loose⁴ my daughter to him. 160

Be you and I behind an arras⁵ then.
Mark the encounter. If he love her not,
And be not from his reason fall'n thereon,
Let me be no assistant for a state,
But keep a farm and carters.

KING: We will try it. 165

[Enter HAMLET reading a book.]

QUEEN: But look where sadly the poor wretch comes reading.

POLONIUS: Away, I do beseech you both away,
I'll board⁶ him presently. [Exeunt KING and QUEEN.]

O, give me leave.

How does my good Lord Hamlet?

HAMLET: Well, God-a-mercy. 170

POLONIUS: Do you know me, my lord?

HAMLET: Excellent well, you are a fishmonger.

POLONIUS: Not I, my lord.

HAMLET: Then I would you were so honest a man.

POLONIUS: Honest, my lord? 175

HAMLET: Ay, sir, to be honest as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.

POLONIUS: That's very true, my lord.

HAMLET: For if the sun breed maggots in a dead dog, being a god kissing carrion⁷—Have you a daughter? 180

POLONIUS: I have, my lord.

HAMLET: Let her not walk i' th' sun. Conception is a blessing, but as your daughter ter may conceive—friend, look to't.

POLONIUS: How say you by that? [Aside.] Still harping on my daughter. Yet he knew me not at first. 'A said I was a fishmonger. 'A is far gone. And truly in 185 my youth I suffered much extremity for love. Very near this. I'll speak to him again.—What do you read, my lord?

3. Of the earth. 4. Let loose. 5. Tapestry. 6. Accost.

7. Reference to the belief that maggots were produced spontaneously by the action of sunshine on carrion.

HAMLET: Words, words, words.

POLONIUS: What is the matter, my lord?

190 HAMLET: Between who?

POLONIUS: I mean the matter that you read, my lord.

HAMLET: Slanders, sir; for the satirical rogue says here that old men have grey beards, that their faces are wrinkled, their eyes purging thick amber and plumtree gum, and that they have a plentiful lack of wit, together with most 195 weak hams⁸—all which, sir, though I most powerfully and potently believe, yet I hold it not honesty to have it thus set down, for yourself, sir, shall grow old as I am, if like a crab you could go backward.

POLONIUS: [Aside.] Though this be madness, yet there is method in't.—Will you walk out of the air, my lord?

200 HAMLET: Into my grave?

POLONIUS: [Aside.] Indeed, that's out of the air. How pregnant sometime his replies are! a happiness that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously be delivered of. I will leave him, and suddenly contrive the means of meeting between him and my daughter.—My honorable 205 lord. I will most humbly take my leave of you.

HAMLET: You cannot take from me anything that I will more willingly part withal—except my life, except my life, except my life.

[Enter GUILDENSTERN and ROSENCRANTZ.]

POLONIUS: Fare you well, my lord.

HAMLET: These tedious old fools!

210 POLONIUS: You go to seek the Lord Hamlet. There he is.

ROSENCRANTZ: [To POLONIUS.] God save you, sir! [Exit POLONIUS.]

GUILDENSTERN: My honored lord!

ROSENCRANTZ: My most dear lord!

HAMLET: My excellent good friends! How dost thou, Guildenstern?

215 Ah, Rosencrantz! Good lads, how do you both?

ROSENCRANTZ: As the indifferent⁹ children of the earth.

GUILDENSTERN: Happy in that we are not over-happy;

On Fortune's cap we are not the very button.¹

HAMLET: Nor the soles of her shoe?

220 ROSENCRANTZ: Neither, my lord.

HAMLET: Then you live about her waist, or in the middle of her favors?

GUILDENSTERN: Faith, her privates we.

HAMLET: In the secret parts of Fortune? O, most true, she is a strumpet.² What news?

225 ROSENCRANTZ: None, my lord, but that the world's grown honest.

HAMLET: Then is doomsday near. But your news is not true. Let me question more in particular. What have you, my good friends, deserved at the hands of Fortune, that she sends you to prison hither?

8. Limbs. 9. Ordinary. 1. That is, on top.

2. Prostitute. Hamlet is indulging in characteristic ribaldry. Guildenstern means that they are "privates" = ordinary citizens, but Hamlet takes him to mean "privates" = sexual organs and "middle of her favors" = waist = sexual organs.

GUILDENSTERN: Prison, my lord?

HAMLET: Denmark's a prison. 230

ROSENCRANTZ: Then is the world one.

HAMLET: A goodly one, in which there are many confines, wards³ and dungeons. Denmark being one o' th' worst.

ROSENCRANTZ: We think not so, my lord.

HAMLET: Why then 'tis none to you; for there is nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so. To me it is a prison. 235

ROSENCRANTZ: Why then your ambition makes it one. 'Tis too narrow for your mind.

HAMLET: O God, I could be bounded in a nutshell and count myself a king of infinite space, were it not that I have bad dreams. 240

GUILDENSTERN: Which dreams indeed are ambition; for the very substance of the ambitious is merely the shadow of a dream.

HAMLET: A dream itself is but a shadow.

ROSENCRANTZ: Truly, and I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality that it is but a shadow's shadow. 245

HAMLET: Then are our beggars bodies, and our monarchs and outstretched heroes the beggars' shadows. Shall we to th' court? for, by my fay,⁴ I cannot reason.

BOTH: We'll wait upon you.

HAMLET: No such matter. I will not sort⁵ you with the rest of my servants; for to speak to you like an honest man, I am most dreadfully attended. But in the beaten way of friendship, what make you at Elsinore? 250

ROSENCRANTZ: To visit you, my lord; no other occasion.

HAMLET: Beggar that I am, I am even poor in thanks, but I thank you; and sure, dear friends, my thanks are too dear a halfpenny.⁶ Were you not sent for? Is it your own inclining? Is it a free visitation? Come, come, deal justly with me. 255
Come, come, nay speak.

GUILDENSTERN: What should we say, my lord?

HAMLET: Anything but to th' purpose. You were sent for, and there is a kind of confession in your looks, which your modesties have not craft enough to color. I know the good king and queen have sent for you. 260

ROSENCRANTZ: To what end, my lord?

HAMLET: That you must teach me. But let me conjure you by the rights of our fellowship, by the consonancy of our youth, by the obligation of our ever preserved love, and by what more dear a better proposer can charge you withal, be even and direct⁷ with me whether you were sent for or no. 265

ROSENCRANTZ: [Aside to GUILDENSTERN.] What say you?

HAMLET: [Aside.] Nay, then, I have an eye of you.—If you love me, hold not off.

GUILDENSTERN: My lord, we were sent for.

HAMLET: I will tell you why; so shall my anticipation prevent your discovery,⁸ and your secrecy to the king and queen moult no feather. I have of late— 270
but wherefore I know not—lost all my mirth, forgone all custom of exercises; and indeed it goes so heavily with my disposition, that this goodly frame the earth seems to me a sterile promontory, this most excellent canopy the air, look you, this brave o'er-hanging firmament, this majestical roof

3. Cells. 4. Faith. 5. Include. 6. Not worth a halfpenny. 7. Straightforward. 8. Disclosure.

275 fretted⁹ with golden fire, why it appeareth nothing to me but a foul and pessilent congregation of vapors. What a piece of work is a man, how noble in reason, how infinite in faculties, in form and moving, how express¹ and admirable in action, how like an angel in apprehension, how like a god: the 280 quintessence of dust? Man delights not me, nor woman neither, though by your smiling you seem to say so.

ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, there was no such stuff in my thoughts.

HAMLET: Why did ye laugh, then, when I said "Man delights not me"?

ROSENCRANTZ: To think, my lord, if you delight not in man, what lenten enter-285 tainment the players shall receive from you. We coted² them on the way, and hither are they coming to offer you service.

HAMLET: He that plays the king shall be welcome—his majesty shall have tribute of me; the adventurous knight shall use his foil and target; the lover shall not sigh gratis; the humorous³ man shall end his part in peace; the clown 290 shall make those laugh whose lungs are tickle o' th' sere;⁴ and the lady shall say her mind freely, or the blank verse shall halt for't. What players are they?

ROSENCRANTZ: Even those you were wont to take such delight in, the tragedians of the city.

HAMLET: How chances it they travel? Their residence, both in reputation and 295 profit, was better both ways.

ROSENCRANTZ: I think their inhibition comes by the means of the late innovation.

HAMLET: Do they hold the same estimation they did when I was in the city? Are they so followed?

300 ROSENCRANTZ: No, indeed, are they not.

HAMLET: How comes it? Do they grow rusty?

ROSENCRANTZ: Nay, their endeavor keeps in the wonted pace; but there is, sir, an eyrie of children, little eyases,⁵ that cry out on the top of question,⁶ and are most tyrannically clapped for't. These are now the fashion, and so berattle 305 the common stages (so they call them) that many wearing rapiers are afraid of goose quills⁷ and dare scarce come thither.⁸

HAMLET: What, are they children? Who maintains 'em? How are they escoted?⁹
 Will they pursue the quality no longer than they can sing? Will they not say afterwards, if they should grow themselves to common players (as it is most 310 like, if their means are no better), their writers do them wrong to make them exclaim against their own succession?¹

ROSENCRANTZ: Faith, there has been much todo on both sides; and the nation holds it no sin to tarre² them to controversy. There was for a while no money bid for argument,³ unless the poet and the player went to cuffs⁴ in the 315 question.

9. Ornamented with fretwork. 1. Well built. 2. Passed. Lenten: scanty.

3. Eccentric. Foil and target: sword and shield. 4. Easily set off.

5. Little hawks. 6. With a loud, high delivery. 7. Pens of satirical writers.

8. The passage refers to the emergence at the time of the play of theatrical companies made up of children from London choir schools. Their performances became fashionable and hurt the business of the established companies. Hamlet says that if they continue to act ("pursue the quality") when they are grown, they will find that they have been damaging their own future careers.

9. Supported. 1. Future careers. 2. Urge. 3. Paid for a play plot. 4. Blows.

HAMLET: Is't possible?

GUILDENSTERN: O, there has been much throwing about of brains.

HAMLET: Do the boys carry it away?

ROSENCRANTZ: Ay, that they do, my lord. Hercules and his load too.⁵

HAMLET: It is not very strange, for my uncle is King of Denmark, and those that would make mouths⁶ at him while my father lived give twenty, forty, fifty, a hundred ducats apiece for his picture in little.⁷ 'Sblood, there is something in this more than natural, if philosophy could find it out. 320

[A flourish.]

GUILDENSTERN: There are the players.

HAMLET: Gentlemen, you are welcome to Elsinore. Your hands. Come then, th' appurtenance of welcome is fashion and ceremony. Let me comply with you 325 in this garb, lest my extent⁸ to the players, which I tell you must show fairly outwards should more appear like entertainment⁹ than yours. You are welcome. But my uncle-father and aunt-mother are deceived.

GUILDENSTERN: In what, my dear lord? 330

HAMLET: I am but mad north-north-west; when the wind is southerly I know a hawk from a handsaw.¹

[Enter POLONIUS.]

POLONIUS: Well be with you, gentlemen.

HAMLET: Hark you, Guildenstern—and you too—at each ear a hearer. That great baby you see there is not yet out of his swaddling clouts.² 335

ROSENCRANTZ: Happily he is the second time come to them, for they say an old man is twice a child.

HAMLET: I will prophesy he comes to tell me of the players. Mark it.—You say right, sir, a Monday morning, 'twas then indeed.

POLONIUS: My lord, I have news to tell you. 340

HAMLET: My lord, I have news to tell you. When Roscius was an actor in Rome³—

POLONIUS: The actors are come hither, my lord.

HAMLET: Buzz, buzz.

POLONIUS: Upon my honor— 345

HAMLET: Then came each actor on his ass—

POLONIUS: The best actors in the world, either for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragicalcomical historical-pastoral, scene individable, or poem unlimited. Seneca cannot be too heavy nor Plautus too light. For the law of writ and the liberty, 350 these are the only men.⁴

5. During one of his labors Hercules assumed for a time the burden of the Titan Atlas, who supported the heavens on his shoulders. Also a reference to the effect on business at Shakespeare's theater, the Globe. 6. Sneer. 7. Miniature. 8. Fashion. Comply with: welcome.

9. Cordiality. 1. A "hawk" is a plasterer's tool; Hamlet may also be using "handsaw" = hernshaw = heron. 2. Wrappings for an infant. 3. Roscius was the most famous actor of classical Rome.

4. Seneca and Plautus were Roman writers of tragedy and comedy, respectively. The "law of writ" refers to plays written according to such rules as the classical unities, the "liberty" to those written otherwise.

HAMLET: O Jephtha, judge of Israel, what a treasure hadst thou!⁵

POLONIUS: What a treasure had he, my lord?

HAMLET: Why—

355 “One fair daughter, and no more,
 The which he loved passing well.”

POLONIUS: [Aside.] Still on my daughter.

HAMLET: Am I not i' th' right, old Jephtha?

POLONIUS: If you call me Jephtha, my lord, I have a daughter that I love passing 360 well.

HAMLET: Nay, that follows not.

POLONIUS: What follows then, my lord?

HAMLET: Why—

 “As by lot, God wot”

365 and then, you know,

 “It came to pass, as most like it was.”

The first row of the pious chanson⁶ will show you more, for look where my abridgement⁷ comes.

[Enter the PLAYERS.]

You are welcome, masters; welcome, all.—I am glad to see thee well.—
370 Welcome, good friends.—O, old friend! Why, thy face is valanced⁸ since I saw thee last. Com'st thou to beard me in Denmark?—What, my young lady and mistress? By'r lady, your ladyship is nearer to heaven than when I saw you last by the altitude of a chopine.⁹ Pray God your voice, like a piece of uncurrent gold, be not cracked within the ring.—Masters, you are all wel-375 come. We'll e'en to't like French falconers, fly at anything we see. We'll have a speech straight. Come give us a taste of your quality,¹ come a passionate speech.

FIRST PLAYER: What speech, my good lord?

HAMLET: I heard thee speak me a speech once, but it was never acted, or if it 380 was, not above once, for the play, I remember, pleased not the million; 'twas caviary to the general.² But it was—as I received it, and others whose judgments in such matters cried in the top of³ mine—an excellent play, well digested⁴ in the scenes, set down with as much modesty as cunning. I remember one said there were no sallets⁵ in the lines to make the matter savory, nor 385 no matter in the phrase that might indict the author of affectation, but called

5. To ensure victory, Jephtha promised to sacrifice the first creature to meet him on his return. Unfortunately, his only daughter outstripped his dog and was the victim of his vow. The biblical story is told in Judges 11. 6. Song. Row: stanza. 7. That which cuts short by interrupting.

8. Fringed (with a beard).

9. Reference to the contemporary theatrical practice of using boys to play women's parts. The company's "lady" has grown in height by the size of a woman's thick-soled shoe ("chopine") since Hamlet saw him last. The next sentence refers to the possibility, suggested by his growth, that the young actor's voice may soon begin to change. 1. Trade. 2. Caviar to the masses (i.e., pearls before swine).

3. Were weightier than. 4. Arranged. 5. Spicy passages.

it an honest method, as wholesome as sweet, and by very much more handsome than fine. One speech in't I chiefly loved. 'Twas Æneas' tale to Dido, and thereabout of it especially where he speaks of Priam's slaughter.⁶ If it live in your memory, begin at this line—let me see, let me see:

“The rugged Pyrrhus, like th' Hyrcanian beast”⁷—

390

'tis not so; it begins with Pyrrhus—

“The rugged Pyrrhus, he whose sable arms,
Black as his purpose, did the night resemble
When he lay couchéd in th' ominous horse,⁸
Hath now this dread and black complexion smeared
With heraldry more dismal; head to foot
Now is he total gules, horribly tricked⁹
With blood of fathers, mothers, daughters, sons,
Baked and impasted with the parching¹ streets,
That lend a tyrannous and a damnèd light
To their lord's murder. Roasted in wrath and fire,
And thus o'er-sizèd with coagulate² gore,
With eyes like carbuncles, the hellish Pyrrhus Old grandsire Priam seeks.”

395

400

So proceed you.

405

POLONIUS: For God, my lord, well spoken, with good accent and good discretion.

FIRST PLAYER: “Anon he finds him³

Striking too short at Greeks. His antique⁴ sword, Rebellious⁵ to his arm, lies where it falls,
Repugnant to command. Unequal matched,
Pyrrhus at Priam drives, in rage strikes wide.
But with the whiff and wind of his fell sword
Th' unnervèd father falls. Then senseless⁶ Ilium, Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top
Stoops⁷ to his base, and with a hideous crash
Takes prisoner Pyrrhus' ear. For, lo! his sword,
Which was declining⁸ on the milky head
Of reverend Priam, seemed i' th' air to stick.
So as a painted tyrant Pyrrhus stood,
And like a neutral to his will and matter,⁹
Did nothing.
But as we often see, against some storm,
A silence in the heavens, the rack¹ stand still,

410

420

6. Aeneas, fleeing with his band from fallen Troy (Ilium), arrives in Carthage, where he tells Dido, the queen of Carthage, of Troy's fall. Here he is describing the death of Priam, the aged king of Troy, at the hands of Pyrrhus, the son of the slain Achilles. 7. Tiger. 8. That is, the Trojan horse.

9. Adorned. Total gules: completely red. 1. Burning. Impasted: crusted.

2. Clotted. O'er-sizèd: glued over. 3. That is, Pyrrhus finds Priam.

4. Which he used when young. 5. Refractory. 6. Without feeling. 7. Falls. 8. About to fall.

9. Between his will and the fulfillment of it. 1. Clouds.

425 The bold winds speechless, and the orb below
 As hush as death, anon the dreadful thunder
 Doth rend the region; so, after Pyrrhus' pause,
 A rousèd vengeance sets him new awork,²
 And never did the Cyclops' hammers fall
 430 On Mars's armor, forged for proof eterne,³
 With less remorse than Pyrrhus' bleeding sword
 Now falls on Priam.
 Out, out, thou strumpet, Fortune! All you gods,
 In general synod take away her power,
 435 Break all the spokes and fellies⁴ from her wheel,
 And bowl the round nave⁵ down the hill of heaven
 As low as to the fiends."

POLONIUS: This is too long.

HAMLET: It shall to the barber's with your beard.—Prithee say on. He's for a jig,⁶ 440 or a tale of bawdry, or he sleeps. Say on; come to Hecuba.⁷

FIRST PLAYER: "But who, ah woe! had seen the moblèd⁸ queen—"

HAMLET: "The moblèd queen"?

POLONIUS: That's good. "Moblèd queen" is good.

FIRST PLAYER: "Run barefoot up and down, threat'ning the flames
 445 With bisson rheum, a clout⁹ upon that head
 Where late the diadem stood, and for a robe,
 About her lank and all o'er-teemèd loins,
 A blanket, in the alarm of fear caught up—
 Who this had seen, with tongue in venom steeped, 450 'Gainst Fortune's state¹ would treason have pronounced.
 But if the gods themselves did see her then,
 When she saw Pyrrhus make malicious sport
 In mincing² with his sword her husband's limbs,
 The instant burst of clamor that she made,
 455 Unless things mortal move them not at all,
 Would have made milch³ the burning eyes of heaven,
 And passion in the gods."

POLONIUS: Look whe'r⁴ he has not turned his color, and has tears in's eyes.
 Prithee no more.

460 HAMLET: 'Tis well. I'll have thee speak out the rest of this soon.—Good my lord, will you see the players well bestowed?⁵ Do you hear, let them be well used, for they are the abstract⁶ and brief chronicles of the time; after your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you live.

2. To work.

3. Mars, as befits a Roman war god, had armor made for him by the blacksmith god Vulcan and his assistants, the Cyclopes. It was suitably impenetrable (of "proof eterne"). 4. Parts of the rim.

5. Hub. Bowl: roll. 6. A comic act.

7. Hecuba was the wife of Priam and queen of Troy. Her "loins" are described below as "o'erteemèd" because of her unusual fertility. The number of her children varies in different accounts, but twenty is a safe minimum. 8. Muffled (in a hood). 9. Cloth. Bisson rheum: blinding tears.

1. Government. 2. Cutting up. 3. Tearful (literally, milk-giving). 4. Whether. 5. Provided for.

6. Summary.

POLONIUS: My lord, I will use them according to their desert.

HAMLET: God's bodkin, man, much better. Use every man after his desert, and who shall 'scape whipping? Use them after your own honor and dignity. The less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty. Take them in. 465

POLONIUS: Come, sirs.

HAMLET: Follow him, friends. We'll hear a play tomorrow.

[Aside to FIRST PLAYER.]

Dost thou hear me, old friend, can you play "The Murder of Gonzago"? 470

FIRST PLAYER: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: We'll ha't tomorrow night. You could for a need study a speech of some dozen or sixteen lines which I would set down and insert in't, could you not?

FIRST PLAYER: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: Very well. Follow that lord, and look you mock him not. 475

[Exeunt POLONIUS and PLAYERS.]

My good friends, I'll leave you till night. You are welcome to Elsinore.

ROSENCRANTZ: Good my lord. [Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GULDENSTERN.]

HAMLET: Ay, so God b'wi'ye. Now I am alone.

O, what a rogue and peasant slave am I!

Is it not monstrous that this player here, 480

But in a fiction, in a dream of passion,

Could force his soul so to his own conceit⁷

That from her working all his visage wanned;⁸

Tears in his eyes, distraction in his aspect⁹

A broken voice, and his whole function suiting 485

With forms to his conceit? And all for nothing,

For Hecuba!

What's Hecuba to him or he to Hecuba,

That he should weep for her? What would he do

Had he the motive and the cue for passion 490

That I have? He would drown the stage with tears,

And cleave the general ear with horrid speech,

Make mad the guilty, and appal the free,

Confound the ignorant, and amaze indeed

The very faculties of eyes and ears. 495

Yet I,

A dull and muddy-mettled rascal, peak¹

Like John-a-dreams, unpregnant² of my cause,

And can say nothing; no, not for a king

Upon whose property and most dear life 500

A damned defeat was made. Am I a coward?

Who calls me villain, breaks my pate across,

Plucks off my beard and blows it in my face,

Tweaks me by the nose, gives me the lie i' th' throat

As deep as to the lungs? Who does me this? 505

Ha, 'swoonds, I should take it; for it cannot be

7. Imagination. 8. Grew pale. 9. Face. 1. Mope. Muddy-mettled: dull-spirited.

2. Not quickened by. John-a-dreams: a man dreaming.

But I am pigeon-livered and lack gall³
 To make oppression bitter, or ere this
 I should 'a fatted all the region kites⁴
 510 With this slave's offal. Bloody, bawdy villain!
 Remorseless, treacherous, lecherous, kindless⁵ villain!
 O, vengeance!
 Why, what an ass am I! This is most brave,
 That I, the son of a dear father murdered,
 515 Prompted to my revenge by heaven and hell,
 Must like a whore unpack⁶ my heart with words,
 And fall a-cursing like a very drab,
 A scullion!⁷ Fie upon't! foh!
 About, my brains. Hum—I have heard
 520 That guilty creatures sitting at a play,
 Have by the very cunning of the scene
 Been struck so to the soul that presently
 They have proclaimed⁸ their malefactions;
 For murder, though it have no tongue, will speak
 525 With most miraculous organ. I'll have these players Play something like the murder of my father
 Before mine uncle. I'll observe his looks.
 I'll tent him to the quick. If 'a do blench,⁹
 I know my course. The spirit that I have seen
 530 May be a devil, and the devil hath power
 T' assume a pleasing shape, yea, and perhaps
 Out of my weakness and my melancholy,
 As he is very potent with such spirits,
 Abuses me to damn me. I'll have grounds
 535 More relative¹ than this. The play's the thing
 Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king. [Exit.]

ACT III

Scene 1

A room in the castle. Enter KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: And can you by no drift of conference²
 Get from him why he puts on this confusion,
 Grating so harshly all his days of quiet
 With turbulent³ and dangerous lunacy?

5 ROSENCRANTZ: He does confess he feels himself distracted,
 But from what cause 'a will by no means speak.

3. Bitterness. 4. Birds of prey of the area. 5. Unnatural. 6. Relieve.

7. In some versions of the play, the word "stallion," a slang term for prostitute, appears in place of "scullion." 8. Admitted. 9. Turn pale. Tent: try. 1. Conclusive. 2. Line of conversation.

3. Disturbing.

GUILDENSTERN: Nor do we find him forward to be sounded,⁴
 But with a crafty madness keeps aloof
 When we would bring him on to some confession
 Of his true state.

QUEEN: Did he receive you well? 10

ROSENCRANTZ: Most like a gentleman.

GUILDENSTERN: But with much forcing of his disposition.⁵

ROSENCRANTZ: Niggard of question, but of our demands⁶
 Most free in his reply.

QUEEN: Did you assay⁷ him
 To any pastime? 15

ROSENCRANTZ: Madam, it so fell out that certain players
 We o'er-raught⁸ on the way. Of these we told him,
 And there did seem in him a kind of joy
 To hear of it. They are here about the court,
 And as I think, they have already order 20
 This night to play before him.

POLONIUS: 'Tis most true,
 And he beseeched me to entreat your majesties
 To hear and see the matter.⁹

KING: With all my heart, and it doth much content me
 To hear him so inclined. 25

Good gentlemen, give him a further edge,
 And drive his purpose¹ into these delights.

ROSENCRANTZ: We shall, my lord. [Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

KING: Sweet Gertrude, leave us too,
 For we have closely sent for Hamlet hither,
 That he, as 'twere by accident, may here 30
 Affront² Ophelia.

Her father and myself (lawful espials³)
 Will so bestow ourselves that, seeing unseen,
 We may of their encounter frankly judge,
 And gather by him, as he is behaved, 35
 If't be th' affliction of his love or no
 That thus he suffers for.

QUEEN: I shall obey you.—
 And for your part, Ophelia, I do wish
 That your good beauties be the happy cause
 Of Hamlet's wildness. So shall I hope your virtues 40
 Will bring him to his wonted⁴ way again,
 To both your honors.

OPHELIA: Madam, I wish it may. [Exit QUEEN.]

POLONIUS: Ophelia, walk you here.—Gracious,⁵ so please you,
 We will bestow ourselves.—[To OPHELIA.] Read on this book,

4. Questioned. Forward: eager. 5. Mood. 6. To our questions. 7. Tempt. 8. Passed.

9. Performance. 1. Sharpen his intention. 2. Confront. 3. Justified spies. 4. Usual.

5. Majesty.

45 That show of such an exercise may color⁶
 Your loneliness.—We are oft to blame in this,
 'Tis too much proved, that with devotion's visage
 And pious action we do sugar o'er
 The devil himself.

KING: [Aside.] O, 'tis too true.

50 How smart a lash that speech doth give my conscience!
 The harlot's cheek, beautied with plast'ring⁷ art,
 Is not more ugly to the thing that helps it
 Than is my deed to my most painted word.
 O heavy burden!

55 POLONIUS: I hear him coming. Let's withdraw, my lord.

[Exeunt KING and POLONIUS.]

[Enter HAMLET.]

HAMLET: To be, or not to be, that is the question:
 Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
 The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,
 Or to take arms against a sea of troubles,
 60 And by opposing end them. To die, to sleep—
 No more; and by a sleep to say we end
 The heartache, and the thousand natural shocks
 That flesh is heir to. 'Tis a consummation
 Devoutly to be wished—to die, to sleep—
 65 To sleep, perchance to dream, ay there's the rub;
 For in that sleep of death what dreams may come
 When we have shuffled off this mortal coil⁸
 Must give us pause—there's the respect⁹
 That makes calamity of so long life.
 70 For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
 Th' oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,¹
 The pangs of despised love, the law's delay,
 The insolence of office, and the spurns²
 That patient merit of th' unworthy takes,
 75 When he himself might his quietus³ make
 With a bare bodkin? Who would fardels⁴ bear,
 To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
 But that the dread of something after death,
 The undiscovered country, from whose bourn⁵
 80 No traveller returns, puzzles the will,
 And makes us rather bear those ills we have
 Than fly to others that we know not of?
 Thus conscience does make cowards of us all;
 And thus the native⁶ hue of resolution

6. Explain. Exercise: act of devotion. 7. Thickly painted. 8. Turmoil. 9. Consideration.

1. Insulting behavior. 2. Rejections. 3. Settlement. 4. Burdens. Bodkin: dagger.

5. Boundary. 6. Natural.

- Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought,
 And enterprises of great pitch and moment⁷ 85
 With this regard their currents turn awry
 And lose the name of action.—Soft you now,
 The fair Ophelia.—Nymph, in thy orisons⁸
 Be all my sins remembered.
- OPHELIA: Good my lord, 90
 How does your honor for this many a day?
 HAMLET: I humbly thank you, well, well, well.
 OPHELIA: My lord, I have remembrances of yours
 That I have longèd long to re-deliver.
 I pray you now receive them.
- HAMLET: No, not I, 95
 I never gave you aught.
 OPHELIA: My honored lord, you know right well you did,
 And with them words of so sweet breath composed
 As made the things more rich. Their perfume lost,
 Take these again, for to the noble mind 100
 Rich gifts wax⁹ poor when givers prove unkind.
 There, my lord.
- HAMLET: Ha, ha! are you honest?¹
 OPHELIA: My lord?
 HAMLET: Are you fair? 105
 OPHELIA: What means your lordship?
 HAMLET: That if you be honest and fair, your honesty should admit no discourse to your beauty.
 OPHELIA: Could beauty, my lord, have better commerce² than with honesty?
 HAMLET: Ay, truly, for the power of beauty will sooner transform honesty from what it is to a bawd than the force of honesty can translate beauty into his likeness. This was sometimes a paradox, but now the time gives it proof. I did love you once.
 OPHELIA: Indeed, my lord, you made me believe so.
 HAMLET: You should not have believed me, for virtue cannot so inoculate³ our 115 old stock but we shall relish of it. I loved you not.
 OPHELIA: I was the more deceived.
 HAMLET: Get thee to a nunnery.⁴ Why wouldst thou be a breeder of sinners?
 I am myself indifferent⁵ honest, but yet I could accuse me of such things that it were better my mother had not borne me: I am very proud, revengeful, ambitious, with more offences at my beck⁶ than I have thoughts to put them in, imagination to give them shape, or time to act them in. What should such fellows as I do crawling between earth and heaven? We are arrant⁷ knaves all; believe none of us. Go thy ways to a nunnery. Where's your father? 120
 OPHELIA: At home, my lord. 125

7. Importance. Pitch: height. 8. Prayers. 9. Become. 1. Chaste. 2. Intercourse.

3. Change by grafting. 4. Hamlet uses "nunnery" in two senses, the second as a slang term for brothel.

5. Moderately. 6. Command. 7. Thorough.

HAMLET: Let the doors be shut upon him, that he may play the fool nowhere but in's own house. Farewell.

OPHELIA: O, help him, you sweet heavens!

130 HAMLET: If thou dost marry, I'll give thee this plague for thy dowry: be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny. Get thee to a nunnery, farewell. Or if thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool, for wise men know well enough what monsters⁸ you make of them. To a nunnery, go, and quickly too. Farewell.

135 OPHELIA: Heavenly powers, restore him!

HAMLET: I have heard of your paintings, too, well enough. God hath given you one face, and you make yourselves another. You jig, you amble, and you lisp;⁹ you nickname God's creatures, and make your wantonness your ignorance.¹ Go to, I'll no more on't, it hath made me mad. I say we will have no more marriage. Those that are married already, all but one, shall live. The rest shall keep as they are. To a nunnery, go. [Exit.]

OPHELIA: O, what a noble mind is here o'erthrown!

The courtier's, soldier's, scholar's, eye, tongue, sword,
Th' expectancy and rose² of the fair state,
145 The glass of fashion and the mould³ of form,
Th' observed of all observers, quite quite down!
And I of ladies most deject and wretched,
That sucked the honey of his music⁴ vows,
Now see that noble and most sovereign reason
150 Like sweet bells jangled, out of time and harsh;
That unmatched form and feature of blown⁵ youth
Blasted with ecstasy. O, woe is me
T' have seen what I have seen, see what I see!

[Enter KING and POLONIUS.]

KING: Love! His affections do not that way tend, 155 Nor what he spake, though it lacked form a little,
Was not like madness. There's something in his soul
O'er which his melancholy sits on brood,⁶
And I do doubt the hatch and the disclose⁷
Will be some danger; which to prevent,
160 I have in quick determination
Thus set it down: he shall with speed to England
For the demand of our neglected tribute.
Haply the seas and countries different,
With variable objects, shall expel
165 This something-settled matter in his heart
Whereon his brains still beating puts him thus
From fashion of himself. What think you on't?

8. Horned because cuckolded. 9. Walk and talk affectedly.

1. Hamlet means that women call things by pet names and then blame the affectation on ignorance.

2. Ornament. Expectancy: hope. 3. Model. Glass: mirror. 4. Musical. 5. Full-blown.

6. That is, like a hen. 7. Result. Doubt: fear.

POLONIUS: It shall do well. But yet do I believe
 The origin and commencement of his grief
 Sprung from neglected love.—How now, Ophelia? 170
 You need not tell us what Lord Hamlet said,
 We heard it all.—My lord, do as you please,
 But if you hold it fit, after the play
 Let his queen-mother all alone entreat him
 To show his grief. Let her be round⁸ with him, 175
 And I'll be placed, so please you, in the ear⁹
 Of all their conference. If she find him not,¹
 To England send him; or confine him where Your wisdom best shall think.

KING: It shall be so.
 Madness in great ones must not unwatched go. [Exeunt.] 180

Scene 2

A public room in the castle. Enter HAMLET and three of the PLAYERS.

HAMLET: Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you, trippingly on the tongue; but if you mouth it as many of our players do, I had as lief the town-crier spoke my lines. Nor do not saw the air too much with your hand thus, but use all gently, for in the very torrent, tempest, and as I may say, whirlwind of your passion, you must acquire and beget a temperance that may give it smoothness. O, it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious periwig-pated² fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings, who for the most part are capable of³ nothing but inexplicable dumb shows and noise. I would have such a fellow whipped for o'erdoing Termagant. It out-herods Herod.⁴ Pray you avoid it. 5 10

FIRST PLAYER: I warrant your honor.

HAMLET: Be not too tame neither, but let your own discretion be your tutor. Suit the action to the word, the word to the action, with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty of nature; for anything so o'erdone is from⁵ the purpose of playing, whose end both at the first, and now, was and is, to hold as 'twere the mirror up to nature, to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure.⁶ Now this overdone, or come tardy off, though it makes the unskilful⁷ laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve, the censure⁸ of the which one must in your allowance o'erweigh a whole theatre of others. O, there be 20 players that I have seen play—and heard others praise, and that highly—not to speak it profanely, that neither having th' accent of Christians, nor the gait of Christian, pagan, nor man, have so strutted and bellowed that I have

8. Direct. 9. Hearing. 1. Does not discover his problem. 2. Bewigged. Robustious: noisy.

3. That is, capable of understanding. Groundlings: the spectators who paid least and had to stand.

4. Termagant, a "Saracen" deity, and the biblical Herod were stock characters in popular drama noted for the excesses of sound and fury used by their interpreters. 5. Contrary to. 6. Shape.

7. Ignorant. 8. Judgment.

25 thought some of nature's journeymen⁹ had made men, and not made them well, they imitated humanity so abominably.

FIRST PLAYER: I hope we have reformed that indifferently¹ with us, sir.

HAMLET: O, reform it altogether. And let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them, for there be of them that will themselves laugh, to set on some quantity of barren² spectators to laugh too, though in 30 the meantime some necessary question of the play be then to be considered. That's villainous, and shows a most pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it. Go, make you ready. [Exeunt PLAYERS.]

[Enter POLONIUS, GUILDENSTERN, and ROSENCRANTZ.]

How now, my lord? Will the king hear this piece of work?

POLONIUS: And the queen too, and that presently.

35 HAMLET: Bid the players make haste. [Exit POLONIUS.]

Will you two help to hasten them?

ROSENCRANTZ: Ay, my lord. [Exeunt they two.]

HAMLET: What, ho, Horatio!

[Enter HORATIO.]

HORATIO: Here, sweet lord, at your service.

40 HAMLET: Horatio, thou art e'en as just a man

As e'er my conversation coped³ withal.

HORATIO: O my dear lord!

HAMLET: Nay, do not think I flatter,

For what advancement may I hope from thee,

That no revenue hast but thy good spirits

45 To feed and clothe thee? Why should the poor be flattered?

No, let the candied tongue lick absurd pomp,

And crook the pregnant⁴ hinges of the knee

Where thrift⁵ may follow fawning. Dost thou hear?

Since my dear soul was mistress of her choice

50 And could of men distinguish her election,

S'hath sealed thee for herself, for thou hast been

As one in suff'ring all that suffers nothing,

A man that Fortune's buffets and rewards

Hast ta'en with equal thanks; and blest are those

55 Whose blood and judgment are so well commingled

That they are not a pipe⁶ for Fortune's finger

To sound what stop⁷ she please. Give me that man

That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him

In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of heart,

60 As I do thee. Something too much of this.

There is a play tonight before the king.

One scene of it comes near the circumstance

Which I have told thee of my father's death.

I prithee, when thou seest that act afoot,

9. Inferior craftsmen. 1. Somewhat. 2. Dullwitted. 3. Encountered. 4. Quick to bend.

5. Profit. 6. Musical instrument. 7. Note. Sound: play.

Even with the very comment⁸ of thy soul 65
 Observe my uncle. If his occulted⁹ guilt
 Do not itself unkennel¹ in one speech,
 It is a damnèd ghost that we have seen,
 And my imaginations are as foul
 As Vulcan's stithy. Give him heedful note,² 70
 For I mine eyes will rivet to his face,
 And after we will both our judgments join
 In censure of his seeming.³

HORATIO: Well, my lord.
 If 'a steal aught the whilst this play in playing,
 And 'scape detecting, I will pay⁴ the theft. 75

[Enter Trumpets and Kettledrums, KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and other LORDS attendant.]

HAMLET: They are coming to the play. I must be idle.
 Get you a place.

KING: How fares our cousin Hamlet?

HAMLET: Excellent, i' faith, of the chameleon's dish. I eat the air, promise-crammed. You cannot feed capons⁵ so.

KING: I have nothing with this answer, Hamlet. These words are not mine. 80

HAMLET: No, nor mine now. [To POLONIUS.] My lord, you played once i' th' university, you say?

POLONIUS: That did I, my lord, and was accounted a good actor.

HAMLET: What did you enact?

POLONIUS: I did enact Julius Cæsar. I was killed i' th' Capitol; Brutus killed me.⁶ 85

HAMLET: It was a brute part of him to kill so capital a calf there. Be the players ready?

ROSENCRANTZ: Ay, my lord, they stay upon your patience.⁷

QUEEN: Come hither, my dear Hamlet, sit by me.

HAMLET: No, good mother, here's metal more attractive. 90

POLONIUS: [To the KING.] O, ho! do you mark that?

HAMLET: Lady, shall I lie in your lap?

[Lying down at OPHELIA's feet.]

OPHELIA: No, my lord.

HAMLET: I mean, my head upon your lap?

OPHELIA: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: Do you think I meant country matters?⁸ 95

OPHELIA: I think nothing, my lord.

8. Keenest observation. 9. Hidden. 1. Break loose. 2. Careful attention. Stithy: smithy.

3. Manner. 4. Repay.

5. Castrated male chickens fattened for slaughter; also a term for fool. Chameleon's dish: reference to a popular belief that the chameleon subsisted on a diet of air. Hamlet has deliberately misunderstood the king's question.

6. Julius Caesar's assassination by Brutus and others is the subject of another play by Shakespeare.

7. Leisure. Stay: wait.

8. Presumably, rustic misbehavior, but here and elsewhere in this exchange Hamlet treats Ophelia to some ribald double meanings.

HAMLET: That's a fair thought to lie between maids' legs.

OPHELIA: What is, my lord?

100 HAMLET: Nothing.

OPHELIA: You are merry, my lord.

HAMLET: Who, I?

OPHELIA: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: O God, your only jig-maker!⁹ What should a man do but be merry? For 105 look you how cheerfully my mother looks, and my father died within's two hours.

OPHELIA: Nay, 'tis twice two months, my lord.

HAMLET: So long? Nay then, let the devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of sables.
O heavens! die two months ago, and not forgotten yet? Then there's hope a 110 great man's memory may outlive his life half a year, but by'r lady 'a must build churches then, or else shall 'a suffer not thinking on, with the hobby-horse, whose epitaph is "For O, for O, the hobby-horse is forgot!"¹

The trumpets sound. Dumb Show follows. Enter a KING and a QUEEN very lovingly; the QUEEN embracing him and he her. She kneels, and makes show of protestation unto him. He takes her up, and declines² his head upon her neck. He lies him down upon a bank of flowers; she, seeing him asleep, leaves him. Anon come in another man, takes off his crown, kisses it, pours poison in the sleeper's ears, and leaves him. The QUEEN returns, finds the KING dead, makes passionate action. The POISONER with some three or four come in again, seem to condole with her. The dead body is carried away. The POISONER woos the QUEEN with gifts; she seems harsh awhile, but in the end accepts love. [Exeunt.]

OPHELIA: What means this, my lord?

HAMLET: Marry, this is miching mallecho;³ it means mischief.

115 OPHELIA: Belike this show imports the argument⁴ of the play.

[Enter PROLOGUE.]

HAMLET: We shall know by this fellow. The players cannot keep counsel; they'll tell all.

OPHELIA: Will 'a tell us what this show meant?

HAMLET: Ay, or any show that you will show him. Be not you ashamed to show, 120 he'll not shame to tell you what it means.

OPHELIA: You are naught, you are naught. I'll mark⁵ the play.

PROLOGUE: *For us, and for our tragedy,
Here stooping to your clemency,
We beg your hearing patiently.*

[Exit.]

125 HAMLET: Is this a prologue, or the posy⁶ of a ring?

OPHELIA: 'Tis brief, my lord.

9. Writer of comic scenes.

1. In traditional games and dances one of the characters was a man represented as riding a horse. The horse was made of something like cardboard and was worn about the "rider's" waist.

2. Lays. 3. Sneaking crime (from the Spanish malhecho, "evil deed"). 4. Plot. Imports: explains.

5. Attend to. Naught: obscene. 6. Motto engraved inside.

HAMLET: As woman's love.

[Enter the PLAYER KING and QUEEN.]

PLAYER KING: *Full thirty times hath Phœbus' cart gone round
Neptune's salt wash and Tellus' orbèd ground,
And thirty dozen moons with borrowed sheen*⁷ 130
*About the world have times twelve thirties been,
Since love our hearts and Hymen did our hands
Unite comutual in most sacred bands.*⁸

PLAYER QUEEN: *So many journeys may the sun and moon
Make us again count o'er ere love be done!* 135
*But woe is me, you are so sick of late,
So far from cheer and from your former state,
That I distrust⁹ you. Yet though I distrust, Discomfort you, my lord, it nothing must.
For women's fear and love hold quantity,¹ 140
In neither aught, or in extremity.²
Now what my love is proof hath made you know,
And as my love is sized,³ my fear is so.
Where love is great, the littlest doubts are fear;
Where little fears grow great, great love grows there.* 145

PLAYER KING: *Faith, I must leave thee, love, and shortly too;
My operant powers their functions leave⁴ to do.
And thou shalt live in this fair world behind,
Honored, beloved, and haply one as kind
For husband shalt thou—*

PLAYER QUEEN: O, confound the rest! 150
*Such love must needs be treason in my breast.
In second husband let me be accurst!
None wed the second but who killed the first.⁵*

HAMLET: *That's wormwood.*⁶

PLAYER QUEEN: The instances⁷ that second marriage move 155
*Are base respects⁸ of thrift, but none of love.
A second time I kill my husband dead,
When second husband kisses me in bed.*

PLAYER KING: *I do believe you think what now you speak,
But what we do determine oft we break.* 160
*Purpose is but the slave to memory,
Of violent birth, but poor validity;
Which now, like fruit unripe, sticks on the tree,*

7. Light.

8. The speech contains several references to Greek mythology. Phoebus was the sun god, and his chariot or "cart" is the sun. The "salt wash" of Neptune is the ocean; Tellus was an earth goddess, and her "orbèd ground" is the Earth, or globe. Hymen was the god of marriage. Comutual: mutually.

9. Fear for. 1. Agree in weight. 2. Without regard to too much or too little. 3. In size.

4. Cease. Operant powers: active forces.

5. Though there is some ambiguity, she seems to mean that the only kind of woman who would remarry is one who has killed or would kill her first husband. 6. Bitter medicine. 7. Causes. 8. Concerns.

But fall unshaken when they mellow be.
 165 Most necessary 'tis that we forget
 To pay ourselves what to ourselves is debt.
 What to ourselves in passion we propose,
 The passion ending, doth the purpose lose.
 The violence of either grief or joy
 170 Their own enactures⁹ with themselves destroy.
 Where joy most revels, grief doth most lament;
 Grief joys, joy grieves, on slender accident.
 This world is not for aye,¹ nor 'tis not strange
 That even our loves should with our fortunes change;
 175 For 'tis a question left us yet to prove,
 Whether love lead fortune, or else fortune love.
 The great man down, you mark his favorite flies;
 The poor advanced makes friends of enemies;
 And hitherto doth love on fortune tend,
 180 For who not needs shall never lack a friend,
 And who in want a hollow² friend doth try,
 Directly seasons him³ his enemy.
 But orderly to end where I begun,
 Our wills and fates do so contrary run
 185 That our devices⁴ still are overthrown;
 Our thoughts are ours, their ends none of our own.
 So think thou wilt no second husband wed,
 But die thy thoughts when thy first lord is dead.

190 PLAYER QUEEN: Nor earth to me give food, nor heaven light,
 Sport and repose lock from me day and night,
 To desperation turn my trust and hope,
 An anchor's cheer⁵ in prison be my scope,
 Each opposite that blanks⁶ the face of joy
 Meet what I would have well, and it destroy,
 195 Both here and hence⁷ pursue me lasting strife,
 If once a widow, ever I be wife!

HAMLET: If she should break it now!

200 PLAYER KING: 'Tis deeply sworn. Sweet, leave me here awhile.
 My spirits grow dull, and fain I would beguile
 The tedious day with sleep. [Sleeps.]

200 PLAYER QUEEN: Sleep rock thy brain,
 And never come mischance between us twain! [Exit.]

HAMLET: Madam, how like you this play?

QUEEN: The lady doth protest too much, methinks.

HAMLET: O, but she'll keep her word.

205 KING: Have you heard the argument? Is there no offence in't?

HAMLET: No, no, they do but jest, poison in jest; no offence i' th' world.

KING: What do you call the play?

9. Actions. 1. Eternal. 2. False. 3. Ripens him into. 4. Plans. 5. Anchorite's (hermit's) food.
 6. Blanches. 7. In the next world.

HAMLET: "The Mouse-trap." Marry, how? Tropically.⁸ This play is the image of a murder done in Vienna. Gonzago is the duke's name; his wife, Baptista. You shall see anon. 'Tis a knavish piece of work, but what of that? Your majesty, and we that have free souls, it touches us not. Let the galled jade wince, our withers are unwrung.⁹ 210

[Enter LUCIANUS.]

This is one Lucianus, nephew to the king.

OPHELIA: You are as good as a chorus, my lord.

HAMLET: I could interpret between you and your love, if I could see the puppets dallying. 215

OPHELIA: You are keen, my lord, you are keen.

HAMLET: It would cost you a groaning to take off mine edge.

OPHELIA: Still better, and worse.

HAMLET: So you mistake your husbands.—Begin, murderer. Leave thy damnable faces and begin. Come, the croaking raven doth bellow for revenge. 220

LUCIANUS: Thoughts black, hands apt, drugs fit, and time agreeing,

Confederate season,¹ else no creature seeing,

Thou mixture rank, of midnight weeds collected,

With Hecate's ban thrice blasted, thrice infected,² 225

Thy natural magic³ and dire property

On wholesome life usurp immediately. [Pours the poison in his ears.]

HAMLET: 'A poisons him i' th' garden for his estate. His name's Gonzago. The story is extant, and written in very choice Italian. You shall see anon how the murderer gets the love of Gonzago's wife. 230

OPHELIA: The king rises.

HAMLET: What, frightened with false fire?

QUEEN: How fares my lord?

POLONIUS: Give o'er the play.

KING: Give me some light. Away! 235

POLONIUS: Lights, lights, lights! [Exeunt all but HAMLET and HORATIO.]

HAMLET:

Why, let the stricken deer go weep,

The hart ungalled⁴ play.

For some must watch while some must sleep;

Thus runs the world away. 240

Would not this, sir, and a forest of feathers⁵—if the rest of my fortunes turn Turk with me—with two Provincial roses on my razed shoes, get me a fellowship in a cry of players?⁶

8. Figuratively.

9. A "galled jade" is a horse, particularly one of poor quality, with a sore back. The "withers" are the ridge between a horse's shoulders; "unwrung withers" are not chafed by the harness.

1. A helpful time for the crime. 2. Hecate was a classical goddess of witchcraft.

3. Native power. 4. Uninjured. 5. Plumes.

6. Hamlet asks Horatio if "this" recitation, accompanied with a player's costume, including plumes and rosettes on shoes that have been slashed for decorative effect, might not entitle him to become a shareholder in a theatrical company in the event that Fortune goes against him ("turn Turk"). Cry: company.

HORATIO: Half a share.

245 HAMLET: A whole one, I.

For thou dost know, O Damon dear,⁷
This realm dismantled was
Of Jove himself, and now reigns here
A very, very—peacock.

250 HORATIO: You might have rhymed.

HAMLET: O good Horatio, I'll take the ghost's word for a thousand pound. Didst perceive?

HORATIO: Very well, my lord.

HAMLET: Upon the talk of the poisoning.

255 HORATIO: I did very well note⁸ him.

HAMLET: Ah, ha! Come, some music. Come, the recorders.⁹

For if the king like not the comedy.
Why then, belike he likes it not, perdy.¹

Come, some music.

[Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

260 GUILDENSTERN: Good my lord, vouchsafe me a word with you.

HAMLET: Sir, a whole history.

GUILDENSTERN: The king, sir—

HAMLET: Ay, sir, what of him?

GUILDENSTERN: Is in his retirement marvellous distempered.²

265 HAMLET: With drink, sir?

GUILDENSTERN: No, my lord, with choler.³

HAMLET: Your wisdom should show itself more richer to signify this to the doctor, for for me to put him to his purgation⁴ would perhaps plunge him into more choler.

270 GUILDENSTERN: Good my lord, put your discourse into some frame,⁵ and start not so wildly from my affair.

HAMLET: I am tame, sir. Pronounce.

GUILDENSTERN: The queen your mother, in most great affliction of spirit, hath sent me to you.

275 HAMLET: You are welcome.

GUILDENSTERN: Nay, good my lord, this courtesy is not of the right breed. If it shall please you to make me a wholesome⁶ answer, I will do your mother's commandment. If not, your pardon and my return⁷ shall be the end of my business.

280 HAMLET: Sir, I cannot.

ROSENCRANTZ: What, my lord?

7. Damon was a common name for a young man or a shepherd in pastoral poetry. Jove was the chief god of the Romans. Readers may supply for themselves the rhyme referred to by Horatio.

8. Observe. 9. Wooden, end-blown flutes. 1. That is, par Dieu (French for "by God").

2. Vexed. Retirement: place to which he has retired. 3. Bile (anger).

4. Treatment with a laxative. 5. Order. Discourse: speech. 6. Reasonable.

7. That is, to the queen.

HAMLET: Make you a wholesome answer; my wit's diseased. But, sir, such answer as I can make, you shall command, or rather, as you say, my mother.

Therefore no more, but to the matter. My mother, you say—

ROSENCRANTZ: Then thus she says: your behavior hath struck her into amazement and admiration.⁸ 285

HAMLET: O wonderful son, that can so stonish a mother! But is there no sequel at the heels of his mother's admiration? Impart.⁹

ROSENCRANTZ: She desires to speak with you in her closet¹ ere you go to bed.

HAMLET: We shall obey, were she ten times our mother. Have you any further trade² with us? 290

ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, you once did love me.

HAMLET: And do still, by these pickers and stealers.³

ROSENCRANTZ: Good my lord, what is your cause of distemper? You do surely bar the door upon your own liberty, if you deny your griefs to your friend. 295

HAMLET: Sir, I lack advancement.

ROSENCRANTZ: How can that be, when you have the voice of the king himself for your succession in Denmark?

HAMLET: Ay, sir, but "while the grass grows"—the proverb⁴ is something musty.

[Enter the PLAYERS with recorders.]

O, the recorders! Let me see one. To withdraw with you⁵—why do you go about to recover the wind of me, as if you would drive me into a toil?⁶ 300

GUILDENSTERN: O my lord, if my duty be too bold, my love is too unmannerly.

HAMLET: I do not well understand that. Will you play upon this pipe?⁷

GUILDENSTERN: My lord, I cannot.

HAMLET: I pray you. 305

GUILDENSTERN: Believe me, I cannot.

HAMLET: I do beseech you.

GUILDENSTERN: I know no touch of it,⁸ my lord.

HAMLET: It is as easy as lying. Govern these ventages⁹ with your fingers and thumb, give it breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most eloquent music. Look you, these are the stops.¹ 310

GUILDENSTERN: But these cannot I command to any utt'rance of harmony. I have not the skill.

HAMLET: Why, look you now, how unworthy a thing you make of me! You would play upon me, you would seem to know my stops, you would pluck out the heart of my mystery, you would sound² me from my lowest note to the top of my compass;³ and there is much music, excellent voice, in this little organ, yet cannot you make it speak. 'Sblood, do you think I am easier to be played on than a pipe? Call me what instrument you will, though you can fret⁴ me, you cannot play upon me. 320

8. Wonder. 9. Tell me. 1. Bedroom. 2. Business. 3. Hands.

4. The proverb ends "the horse starves." 5. Let me step aside.

6. The simile refers to hunting. Hamlet asks why Guildenstern is attempting to get windward of him, as if he would drive him into a net. 7. Recorder. 8. Have no ability.

9. Holes. Govern: cover and uncover. 1. Windholes. 2. Play. 3. Range.

4. "Fret" is used in a double sense, to annoy and to play a guitar or similar instrument using the "frets" or small bars on the neck.

[Enter POLONIUS.]

God bless you, sir!

POLONIUS: My lord, the queen would speak with you, and presently.⁵

HAMLET: Do you see yonder cloud that's almost in shape of a camel?

POLONIUS: By th' mass, and 'tis like a camel indeed.

325 HAMLET: Methinks it is like a weasel.

POLONIUS: It is backed like a weasel.

HAMLET: Or like a whale.

POLONIUS: Very like a whale.

HAMLET: Then I will come to my mother by and by. [Aside.] They fool me to the 330 top of my bent.⁶—I will come by and by.

POLONIUS: I will say so. [Exit.]

HAMLET: "By and by" is easily said. Leave me, friends. [Exeunt all but HAMLET.]

'Tis now the very witching time of night,

When churchyards yawn, and hell itself breathes out

335 Contagion to this world. Now could I drink hot blood,

And do such bitter business as the day

Would quake to look on. Soft, now to my mother.

O heart, lose not thy nature; let not ever

The soul of Nero⁷ enter this firm bosom.

340 Let me be cruel, not unnatural;

I will speak daggers to her, but use none.

My tongue and soul in this be hypocrites—

How in my words somever she be shent,⁸

To give them seals⁹ never, my soul, consent!

[Exit.]

Scene 3

A room in the castle. Enter KING, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: I like him not,¹ nor stands it safe with us

To let his madness range.² Therefore prepare you.

I your commission will forthwith dispatch,

And he to England shall along with you.

5 The terms of our estate³ may not endure

Hazard so near's as doth hourly grow

Out of his brows.

GUILDENSTERN: We will ourselves provide,⁴

Most holy and religious fear it is

To keep those many many bodies safe

10 That live and feed upon your majesty.

ROSENCRANTZ: The single and peculiar⁵ life is bound

With all the strength and armor of the mind

5. At once. 6. Treat me as an utter fool.

7. The Roman emperor Nero, known for his excesses, was believed responsible for the death of his mother. 8. Shamed. 9. Fulfillment in action. 1. Distrust him. 2. Roam freely.

3. Condition of the state. 4. Equip (for the journey). 5. Individual.

To keep itself from noyance,⁶ but much more
 That spirit upon whose weal⁷ depends and rests
 The lives of many. The cess⁸ of majesty 15
 Dies not alone, but like a gulf⁹ doth draw
 What's near it with it. It is a massy¹ wheel
 Fixed on the summit of the highest mount,
 To whose huge spokes ten thousand lesser things
 Are mortised and adjoined,² which when it falls, 20
 Each small annexment, petty consequence,
 Attends³ the boist'rous ruin. Never alone
 Did the king sigh, but with a general groan.
 KING: Arm you, I pray you, to this speedy voyage,
 For we will fetters put about this fear, 25
 Which now goes too free-footed.

ROSENCRANTZ: We will haste us.
 [Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GULDENSTERN.]

[Enter POLONIUS.]

POLONIUS: My lord, he's going to his mother's closet.
 Behind the arras I'll convey⁴ myself
 To hear the process. I'll warrant she'll tax him home,⁵
 And as you said, and wisely was it said, 30
 'Tis meet that some more audience than a mother,
 Since nature makes them partial, should o'erhear
 The speech, of vantage.⁶ Fare you well, my liege.
 I'll call upon you ere you go to bed,
 And tell you what I know.

KING: Thanks, dear my lord. [Exit POLONIUS.] 35
 O, my offence is rank, it smells to heaven;
 It hath the primal eldest curse⁷ upon't,
 A brother's murder. Pray can I not,
 Though inclination be as sharp as will.
 My stronger guilt defeats my strong intent, 40
 And like a man to double business⁸ bound,
 I stand in pause where I shall first begin,
 And both neglect. What if this cursèd hand
 Were thicker than itself with brother's blood,
 Is there not rain enough in the sweet heavens 45
 To wash it white as snow? Whereto serves mercy
 But to confront the visage of offence?
 And what's in prayer but this twofold force,
 To be forestallèd⁹ ere we come to fall,
 Or pardoned being down?¹ Then I'll look up. 50
 My fault is past, But, O, what form of prayer

6. Harm. 7. Welfare. 8. Cessation. 9. Whirlpool. 1. Massive. 2. Attached. 3. Joins in.
 4. Station. 5. Sharply. Process: proceedings. 6. From a position of vantage.
 7. That is, of Cain. 8. Two mutually opposed interests. 9. Prevented (from sin). 1. Having sinned.

Can serve my turn? "Forgive me my foul murder"?
 That cannot be, since I am still possessed
 Of those effects² for which I did the murder—
 55 My crown, mine own ambition, and my queen.
 May one be pardoned and retain th' offence?³
 In the corrupted currents of this world
 Offence's gilded⁴ hand may shove by justice,
 And oft 'tis seen the wicked prize itself
 60 Buys out the law. But 'tis not so above.
 There is no shuffling; there the action⁵ lies
 In his true nature, and we ourselves compelled,
 Even to the teeth and forehead of⁶ our faults,
 To give in evidence. What then? What rests?⁷
 65 Try what repentance can. What can it not?
 Yet what can it when one cannot repent?
 O wretched state! O bosom black as death!
 O limèd⁸ soul, that struggling to be free
 Art more engaged! Help, angels! Make assay.
 70 Bow, stubborn knees, and heart with strings of steel,
 Be soft as sinews of the new-born babe.
 All may be well.

[He kneels.]

[Enter HAMLET.]

HAMLET: Now might I do it pat,⁹ now 'a is a-praying,
 And now I'll do't—and so 'a goes to heaven,
 75 And so am I revenged. That would be scanned.¹
 A villain kills my father, and for that,
 I, his sole son, do this same villain send
 To heaven.
 Why, this is hire and salary, not revenge.
 80 'A took my father grossly, full of bread,²
 With all his crimes broad blown, as flush³ as May;
 And how his audit stands who knows save heaven?
 But in our circumstance and course of thought
 'Tis heavy with him; and am I then revenged
 85 To take him in the purging of his soul,
 When he is fit and seasoned⁴ for his passage?
 No.
 Up, sword, and know thou a more horrid hent.⁵
 When he is drunk, asleep, or in his rage,
 90 Or in th' incestuous pleasure of his bed,
 At game a-swearing, or about some act
 That has no relish⁶ of salvation in't—

2. Gains. 3. That is, benefits of the offense. 4. Bearing gold as a bribe.

5. Case at law. 6. Face-to-face with. 7. Remains. 8. Caught as with birdlime. 9. Easily.

1. Deserves consideration. 2. In a state of sin and without fasting.

3. Vigorous. Broad blown: full blown. 4. Ready. 5. Opportunity. 6. Flavor.

Then trip him, that his heels may kick at heaven,
 And that his soul may be as damned and black
 As hell, whereto it goes. My mother stays. 95
 This physic⁷ but prolongs thy sickly days. [Exit.]
 KING: [Rising.] My words fly up, my thoughts remain below.
 Words without thoughts never to heaven go. [Exit.]

Scene 4

The Queen's chamber. Enter QUEEN and POLONIUS.

POLONIUS: 'A will come straight. Look you lay home to⁸ him.
 Tell him his pranks have been too broad⁹ to bear with,
 And that your grace hath screen'd¹ and stood between Much heat and him. I'll silence me even here.
 Pray you be round with him. 5
 HAMLET: [Within.] Mother, mother, mother!
 QUEEN: I'll warrant you. Fear² me not.
 Withdraw, I hear him coming.
 [POLONIUS goes behind the arras. Enter HAMLET.]
 HAMLET: Now, mother, what's the matter?
 QUEEN: Hamlet, thou hast thy father much offended. 10
 HAMLET: Mother, you have my father much offended.
 QUEEN: Come, come, you answer with an idle tongue.
 HAMLET: Go, go, you question with a wicked tongue.
 QUEEN: Why, how now, Hamlet?
 HAMLET: What's the matter now?
 QUEEN: Have you forgot me?
 HAMLET: No, by the rood,³ not so. 15
 You are the queen, your husband's brother's wife,
 And would it were not so, you are my mother.
 QUEEN: Nay, then I'll set those to you that can speak.
 HAMLET: Come, come, and sit you down. You shall not budge.
 You go not till I set you up a glass⁴ 20
 Where you may see the inmost part of you.
 QUEEN: What wilt thou do? Thou wilt not murder me?
 Help, ho!
 POLONIUS: [Behind.] What, ho! help!
 HAMLET: [Draws.] How now, a rat? 25
 Dead for a ducat, dead!
 [Kills POLONIUS with a pass through the arras.]
 POLONIUS: [Behind.] O, I am slain!
 QUEEN: O me, what hast thou done?

7. Medicine. 8. Be sharp with. 9. Outrageous. 1. Acted as a fire screen. 2. Doubt.
 3. Cross. 4. Mirror.

- HAMLET: Nay, I know not.
Is it the king?
- 30 QUEEN: O, what a rash and bloody deed is this!
- HAMLET: A bloody deed!—almost as bad, good mother,
As kill a king and marry with his brother.
- QUEEN: As kill a king?
- HAMLET: Ay, lady, it was my word. [Parting the arras.]
Thou wretched, rash, intruding fool, farewell!
35 I took thee for thy better. Take thy fortune.
Thou find'st to be too busy⁵ is some danger.—
Leave wringing of your hands. Peace, sit you down
And let me wring your heart, for so I shall
If it be made of penetrable stuff,
40 If damnèd custom have not brazed it⁶ so
That it be proof and bulwark against sense.⁷
- QUEEN: What have I done that thou dar'st wag thy tongue
In noise so rude against me?
- HAMLET: Such an act
That blurs the grace and blush of modesty,
45 Calls virtue hypocrite, takes off the rose
From the fair forehead of an innocent love.
And sets a blister⁸ there, makes marriage-vows
As false as dicers' oaths. O, such a deed
As from the body of contraction⁹ plucks
50 The very soul, and sweet religion makes
A rhapsody of words. Heaven's face does glow
O'er this solidity and compound mass¹
With heated visage, as against the doom²—
Is thought-sick at the act.
- QUEEN: Ay me, what act
55 That roars so loud and thunders in the index?³
- HAMLET: Look here upon this picture⁴ and on this,
The counterfeit presentment of two brothers.
See what a grace was seated on this brow:
Hyperion's curls, the front⁵ of Jove himself,
60 An eye like Mars, to threaten and command,
A station like the herald Mercury⁶
New lighted⁷ on a heaven-kissing hill—
A combination and a form indeed
Where every god did seem to set his seal,⁸
65 To give the world assurance of a man.
This was your husband. Look you now what follows.
Here is your husband, like a mildew'd ear
Blasting his wholesome brother. Have you eyes?

5. Officious. 6. Plated it with brass. 7. Feeling. Proof: armor. 8. Brand. 9. The marriage contract.
1. Meaningless mass (Earth). 2. Judgment Day. 3. Table of contents. 4. Portrait. 5. Forehead.
6. In Roman mythology, Mercury served as the messenger of the gods. Station: bearing.
7. Newly alighted. 8. Mark of approval.

- Could you on this fair mountain leave to feed,
 And batten⁹ on this moor? Ha! have you eyes? 70
 You cannot call it love, for at your age
 The heyday in the blood is tame, it's humble,
 And waits upon the judgment, and what judgment
 Would step from this to this? Sense sure you have Else could you not have motion, but sure that sense 75
 Is apoplexed¹ for madness would not err,
 Nor sense to ecstasy was ne'er so thrall'd
 But it reserved some quantity² of choice
 To serve in such a difference. What devil was't
 That thus hath cozened you at hoodman-blind?³ 80
 Eyes without feeling, feeling without sight,
 Ears without hands or eyes, smelling sans⁴ all,
 Or but a sickly part of one true sense
 Could not so mope.⁵ O shame! where is thy blush?
 Rebellious hell, 85
 If thou canst mutine⁶ in a matron's bones,
 To flaming youth let virtue be as wax
 And melt in her own fire. Proclaim no shame
 When the compulsive ardor gives the charge,⁷
 Since frost itself as actively doth burn, 90
 And reason panders⁸ will.
- QUEEN: O Hamlet, speak no more!
 Thou turn'st my eyes into my very soul;
 And there I see such black and grainèd⁹ spots
 As will not leave their tinct.¹
- HAMLET: Nay, but to live
 In the rank sweat of an enseamèd² bed, 95
 Stewed in curruption, honeying and making love
 Over the nasty sty—
- QUEEN: O, speak to me no more!
 These words like daggers enter in my ears;
 No more, sweet Hamlet.
- HAMLET: A murderer and a villain,
 A slave that is not twentieth part the tithe³ 100
 Of your precedent lord, a vice of kings,⁴
 A cutpurse⁵ of the empire and the rule,
 That from a shelf the precious diadem stole
 And put it in his pocket—
- QUEEN: No more. 105
- [Enter GHOST.]

9. Feed greedily. 1. Paralyzed. 2. Power. 3. Blindman's buff. Cozened: cheated. 4. Without.
 5. Be stupid. 6. Commit mutiny. 7. Attacks. 8. Pimps for. 9. Ingrained. 1. Lose their color.
 2. Greasy. 3. One-tenth.
 4. The "Vice," a common character in the popular drama, was a clown or buffoon. Precedent lord: first husband. 5. Pickpocket.

HAMLET: A king of shreds and patches—
 Save me and hover o'er me with your wings,
 You heavenly guards! What would your gracious figure?
 QUEEN: Alas, he's mad.

110 HAMLET: Do you not come your tardy⁶ son to chide,
 That lapsed in time and passion lets go by
 Th' important acting of your dread command?
 O, say!

GHOST: Do not forget. This visitation
 115 Is but to whet thy almost blunted purpose.
 But look, amazement on thy mother sits.
 O, step between her and her fighting soul!
 Conceit⁷ in weakest bodies strongest works.
 Speak to her, Hamlet.

HAMLET: How is it with you, lady?

120 QUEEN: Alas, how is't with you,
 That you do bend⁸ your eye on vacancy,
 And with th' incorporal air do hold discourse?
 Forth at your eyes your spirits wildly peep,
 And as the sleeping soldiers in th' alarm,
 125 Your bedded hairs like life in excrements⁹
 Start up and stand an end. O gentle son,
 Upon the heat and flame of thy distemper
 Sprinkle cool patience. Whereon do you look?

HAMLET: On him, on him! Look you how pale he glares.
 130 His form and cause conjoined,¹ preaching to stones,
 Would make them capable.²—Do not look upon me,
 Lest with this piteous action you convert
 My stern effects.³ Then what I have to do
 Will want true color—tears perchance for blood.

135 QUEEN: To whom do you speak this?

HAMLET: Do you see nothing there?

QUEEN: Nothing at all, yet all that is I see.

HAMLET: Nor did you nothing hear?

QUEEN: No, nothing but ourselves.

140 HAMLET: Why, look you there. Look how it steals away.
 My father, in his habit⁴ as he lived!

Look where he goes even now out at the portal.

[Exit GHOST.]

QUEEN: This is the very coinage⁵ of your brain.
 This bodiless creation ecstasy⁶
 Is very cunning⁷ in.

145 HAMLET: Ecstasy?
 My pulse as yours doth temperately keep time,
 And makes as healthful music. It is not madness
 That I have uttered. Bring me to the test,

6. Slow to act. 7. Imagination. 8. Turn. 9. Nails and hair. 1. Working together.
 2. Of responding. 3. Deeds. 4. Clothing. 5. Invention. 6. Madness. 7. Skilled.

And I the matter will re-word, which madness
 Would gambol⁸ from. Mother, for love of grace, 150
 Lay not that flattering unction⁹ to your soul,
 That not your trespass but my madness speaks.
 It will but skin and film the ulcerous place
 Whiles rank corruption, mining¹ all within,
 Infects unseen. Confess yourself to heaven, 155
 Repent what's past, avoid what is to come.
 And do not spread the compost on the weeds,
 To make them ranker. Forgive me this my virtue,
 For in the fatness of these pursy² times
 Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg, 160
 Yea, curb³ and woo for leave to do him good.

QUEEN: O Hamlet, thou hast cleft my heart in twain.

HAMLET: O, throw away the worser part of it,
 And live the purer with the other half.
 Good night—but go not to my uncle's bed. 165
 Assume a virtue, if you have it not.
 That monster custom⁴ who all sense doth eat
 Of habits devil, is angel yet in this,
 That to the use of actions fair and good
 He likewise gives a frock or livery 170
 That aptly⁵ is put on. Refrain tonight,
 And that shall lend a kind of easiness
 To the next abstinence; the next more easy;
 For use almost can change the stamp of nature,
 And either curb the devil, or throw him out 175
 With wondrous potency. Once more, good night,
 And when you are desirous to be blest,
 I'll blessing beg of you. For this same lord
 I do repent; but heaven hath pleased it so,
 To punish me with this, and this with me, 180
 That I must be their scourge and minister.
 I will bestow⁶ him and will answer well
 The death I gave him. So, again, good night.
 I must be cruel only to be kind.
 Thus bad begins and worse remains behind. 185
 One word more, good lady.

QUEEN: What shall I do?

HAMLET: Not this, by no means, that I bid you do:
 Let the bloat⁷ king tempt you again to bed,
 Pinch wanton⁸ on your cheek, call you his mouse,
 And let him, for a pair of reechy⁹ kisses, 190
 Or paddling in your neck with his damned fingers,
 Make you to ravel¹ all this matter out,

8. Shy away. 9. Ointment. 1. Undermining. 2. Bloated. 3. Bow. 4. Habit. 5. Easily.
 6. Dispose of. 7. Bloated. 8. Lewdly. 9. Foul. 1. Reveal.

That I essentially am not in madness,
 But mad in craft. 'Twere good you let him know,
 195 For who that's but a queen, fair, sober, wise,
 Would from a paddock, from a bat, a gib,²
 Such dear concernings hide? Who would so do?
 No, in despite of sense and secrecy,
 Unpeg the basket on the house's top,
 200 Let the birds fly, and like the famous ape,
 To try conclusions, in the basket creep
 And break your own neck down.³

QUEEN: Be thou assured, if words be made of breath
 And breath of life, I have no life to breathe
 205 What thou hast said to me.

HAMLET: I must to England; you know that?

QUEEN: Alack,
 I had forgot. 'Tis so concluded on.

HAMLET: There's letters sealed, and my two school-fellows,
 Whom I will trust as I will adders fanged,
 210 They bear the mandate; they must sweep⁴ my way
 And marshal me to knavery. Let it work,
 For 'tis the sport to have the engineer
 Hoist with his own petard;⁵ and't shall go hard
 But I will delve⁶ one yard below their mines
 215 And blow them at the moon. O, 'tis most sweet
 When in one line two crafts directly meet.
 This man shall set me packing.
 I'll lug the guts into the neighbor room.
 Mother, good night. Indeed, this counsellor
 220 Is now most still, most secret, and most grave,
 Who was in life a foolish prating knave.
 Come sir, to draw toward an end with you.
 Good night, mother.

[Exit the QUEEN. Then exit HAMLET tugging POLONIUS.]

ACT IV

Scene 1

A room in the castle. Enter KING, QUEEN, ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: There's matter in these sighs, these profound heaves,
 You must translate;⁷ 'tis fit we understand them.

2. Tomcat. Paddock: toad.

3. Apparently a reference to a now-lost fable in which an ape, finding a basket containing a cage of birds on a housetop, opens the cage. The birds fly away. The ape, thinking that if he were in the basket he too could fly, enters, jumps out, and breaks his neck. 4. Prepare. Mandate: command.

5. The "engineer," or engineer, is a military man who is here described as being blown up by a bomb of his own construction ("hoist with his own petard"). The military imagery continues in the succeeding lines where Hamlet describes himself as digging a countermine or tunnel beneath the one Claudius is digging to defeat Hamlet. In line 216, the two tunnels unexpectedly meet. 6. Dig. 7. Explain.

Where is your son?

QUEEN: Bestow this place on us a little while.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Ah, mine own lord, what have I seen tonight!

5

KING: What, Gertrude? How does Hamlet?

QUEEN: Mad as the sea and wind when both contend

Which is the mightier. In his lawless fit,

Behind the arras hearing something stir,

Whips out his rapier, cries "A rat, a rat!"

10

And in this brainish apprehension⁸ kills

The unseen good old man.

KING: O heavy deed!

It had been so with us had we been there.

His liberty is full of threats to all—

To you yourself, to us, to every one.

15

Alas, how shall this bloody deed be answered?

It will be laid to us, whose providence⁹

Should have kept short, restrained, and out of haunt,¹

This mad young man. But so much was our love,

We would not understand what was most fit;

20

But, like the owner of a foul disease,

To keep it from divulging, let it feed

Even on the pith of life. Where is he gone?

QUEEN: To draw apart the body he hath killed,

O'er whom his very madness, like some ore

25

Among a mineral of metals base,

Shows itself pure: 'a weeps for what is done.

KING: O Gertrude, come away!

The sun no sooner shall the mountains touch

But we will ship him hence, and this vile deed

30

We must with all our majesty and skill

Both countenance and excuse. Ho, Guildenstern!

[Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Friends both, go join you with some further aid.

Hamlet in madness hath Polonius slain,

And from his mother's closet hath he dragged him.

35

Go seek him out; speak fair, and bring the body

Into the chapel. I pray you haste in this.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Come, Gertrude, we'll call up our wisest friends

And let them know both what we mean to do

And what's untimely done;

40

Whose whisper o'er the world's diameter,

As level as the cannon to his blank,²

Transports his poisoned shot—may miss our name,

45 And hit the woundless air. O, come away!
My soul is full of discord and dismay. [Exeunt.]

Scene 2

A passageway. Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET: Safely stowed.

ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN: [Within.] Hamlet! Lord Hamlet!

HAMLET: But soft, what noise? Who calls on Hamlet?

O, here they come.

[Enter ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and OTHERS.]

5 ROSENCRANTZ: What have you done, my lord, with the dead body?

HAMLET: Compounded it with dust, whereto 'tis kin.

ROSENCRANTZ: Tell us where 'tis, that we may take it thence

And bear it to the chapel.

HAMLET: Do not believe it.

10 ROSENCRANTZ: Believe what?

HAMLET: That I can keep your counsel and not mine own. Besides, to be demanded of a sponge—what replication³ should be made by the son of a king?

ROSENCRANTZ: Take you me for a sponge, my lord?

15 HAMLET: Ay, sir, that soaks up the king's countenance,⁴ his rewards, his authorities. But such officers do the king best service in the end. He keeps them like an apple in the corner of his jaw, first mouthed to be last swallowed. When he needs what you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you and, sponge, you shall be dry again.

ROSENCRANTZ: I understand you not, my lord.

20 HAMLET: I am glad of it. A knavish speech sleeps in a foolish ear.

ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, you must tell us where the body is, and go with us to the king.

HAMLET: The body is with the king, but the king is not with the body.

The king is a thing—

25 GUILDENSTERN: A thing, my lord!

HAMLET: Of nothing. Bring me to him. Hide fox, and all after.⁵ [Exeunt.]

Scene 3

A room in the castle. Enter KING.

KING: I have sent to seek him, and to find the body.

How dangerous is it that this man goes loose!

Yet must not we put the strong law on him.

He's loved of the distracted⁶ multitude,

5 Who like not in their judgment but their eyes,

And where 'tis so, th' offender's scourge⁷ is weighed,

3. Answer. Demanded of: questioned by. 4. Favor.

5. Apparently a reference to a children's game like hide-and-seek. 6. Confused.

7. Punishment.

But never the offence. To bear all smooth and even,
 This sudden sending him away must seem Deliberate pause.⁸ Diseases desperate grown
 By desperate appliance are relieved, 10
 Or not at all.

[Enter ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and all the rest.]

How now! what hath befall'n?
 ROSENCRANTZ: Where the dead body is bestowed, my lord,
 We cannot get from him.

KING: But where is he?
 ROSENCRANTZ: Without, my lord; guarded, to know⁹ your pleasure.
 KING: Bring him before us.
 ROSENCRANTZ: Ho! bring in the lord. 15

[They enter with HAMLET.]

KING: Now, Hamlet, where's Polonius?
 HAMLET: At supper.
 KING: At supper? Where?
 HAMLET: Not where he eats, but where 'a is eaten. A certain convocation of politic¹ worms are e'en at him. Your worm is your only emperor for diet. We fat 20 all creatures else to fat us, and we fat ourselves for maggots. Your fat king and your lean beggar is but variable service—two dishes, but to one table.
 That's the end.

KING: Alas, alas!
 HAMLET: A man may fish with the worm that hath eat of a king, and eat of the 25 fish that hath fed of that worm.
 KING: What dost thou mean by this?
 HAMLET: Nothing but to show you how a king may go a progress through the guts of a beggar.

KING: Where is Polonius? 30
 HAMLET: In heaven. Send thither to see. If your messenger find him not there, seek him i' th' other place yourself. But if, indeed, you find him not within this month, you shall nose² him as you go up the stairs into the lobby.

KING: [To ATTENDANTS.] Go seek him there.
 HAMLET: 'A will stay till you come. [Exeunt ATTENDANTS.] 35

KING: Hamlet, this deed, for thine especial safety—
 Which we do tender, as we dearly³ grieve
 For that which thou hast done—must send thee hence
 With fiery quickness. Therefore prepare thyself.
 The bark is ready, and the wind at help, 40
 Th' associates tend, and everything is bent
 For England.

HAMLET: For England?
 KING: Ay, Hamlet.
 HAMLET: Good.

8. That is, not an impulse. 9. Await. 1. Scheming. Convocation: gathering. 2. Smell.
 3. Deeply. Tender: consider.

KING: So it is, if thou knew'st our purposes.

HAMLET: I see a cherub that sees them. But come, for England!

45 Farewell, dear mother.

KING: Thy loving father, Hamlet.

HAMLET: My mother. Father and mother is man and wife, man and wife is one flesh. So, my mother. Come, for England. [Exit.]

KING: Follow him at foot;⁴ tempt him with speed aboard.

50 Delay it not; I'll have him hence tonight.

Away! for everything is sealed and done

That else leans on th' affair. Pray you make haste. [Exeunt all but the KING.]

And, England, if my love thou hold'st at aught—

As my great power thereof may give thee sense,⁵

55 Since yet thy cicatrice⁶ looks raw and red

After the Danish sword, and thy free awe

Pays homage to us—thou mayst not coldly set⁷

Our sovereign process,⁸ which imports at full

By letters congruing⁹ to that effect

60 The present death of Hamlet. Do it, England,

For like the hectic¹ in my blood he rages,

And thou must cure me. Till I know 'tis done,

Howe'er my haps, my joys were ne'er begun. [Exit.]

Scene 4

Near Elsinore. Enter FORTINBRAS with his army.

FORTINBRAS: Go, captain, from me greet the Danish king.

Tell him that by his license Fortinbras

Craves the conveyance² of a promised march

Over his kingdom. You know the rendezvous.

5 If that his majesty would aught with us,

We shall express our duty in his eye,³

And let him know so.

CAPTAIN: I will do't, my lord.

FORTINBRAS: Go softly on. [Exeunt all but the CAPTAIN.]

[Enter HAMLET, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and OTHERS.]

HAMLET: Good sir, whose powers are these?

10 CAPTAIN: They are of Norway, sir.

HAMLET: How purposed, sir, I pray you?

CAPTAIN: Against some part of Poland.

HAMLET: Who commands them, sir?

CAPTAIN: The nephew to old Norway, Fortinbras.

15 HAMLET: Goes it against the main⁴ of Poland, sir,

Or for some frontier?

CAPTAIN: Truly to speak, and with no addition,⁵

4. Closely. 5. Of its value. 6. Wound scar. 7. Set aside. 8. Mandate. 9. Agreeing.
1. Chronic fever. 2. Escort. 3. Presence. 4. Central part. 5. Exaggeration.

We go to gain a little patch of ground
 That hath in it no profit but the name.
 To pay five ducats,⁶ five, I would not farm it; 20
 Nor will it yield to Norway or the Pole
 A ranker rate should it be sold in fee.⁷

HAMLET: Why, then the Polack never will defend it.

CAPTAIN: Yes, it is already garrisoned.

HAMLET: Two thousand souls and twenty thousand ducats 25
 Will not debate the question of this straw.
 This is th' imposthume⁸ of much wealth and peace,
 That inward breaks, and shows no cause without
 Why the man dies. I humbly thank you, sir.

CAPTAIN: God b'wi'ye, sir. [Exit.]

ROSENCRANTZ: Will't please you go, my lord? 30

HAMLET: I'll be with you straight. Go a little before. [Exeunt all but HAMLET.]

How all occasions do inform against me,
 And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,
 If his chief good and market⁹ of his time
 Be but to sleep and feed? A beast, no more. 35

Sure he that made us with such large discourse,¹
 Looking before and after, gave us not
 That capability and godlike reason
 To fust² in us unused. Now, whether it be Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple 40

Of thinking too precisely on th' event³—
 A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom
 And ever three parts coward—I do not know
 Why yet I live to say "This thing's to do,"
 Sith⁴ I have cause, and will, and strength, and means, 45

To do't. Examples gross as earth exhort me.
 Witness this army of such mass and charge,⁵
 Led by a delicate and tender prince,
 Whose spirit, with divine ambition puffed,
 Makes mouths at⁶ the invisible event, 50

Exposing what is mortal and unsure
 To all that fortune, death, and danger dare,
 Even for an eggshell. Rightly to be great
 Is not to stir without great argument,
 But greatly to find quarrel in a straw 55

When honor's at the stake. How stand I then,
 That have a father killed, a mother stained,
 Excitements of my reason and my blood,
 And let all sleep, while to my shame I see
 The imminent death of twenty thousand men 60
 That for a fantasy and trick of fame

6. That is, in rent. 7. Outright. Ranker: higher. 8. Abscess. 9. Occupation.

1. Ample reasoning power. 2. Grow musty. 3. Outcome. 4. Since. 5. Expense. 6. Scorns.

Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot
 Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,
 Which is not tomb enough and continent
 65 To hide the slain?⁷ O, from this time forth,
 My thoughts be bloody, or be nothing worth! [Exit.]

Scene 5

A room in the castle. Enter QUEEN, HORATIO and a GENTLEMAN.

QUEEN: I will not speak with her.

GENTLEMAN: She is importunate, indeed distract.

Her mood will needs to be pitied.

QUEEN: What would she have?

GENTLEMAN: She speaks much of her father, says she hears
 5 There's tricks i' th' world, and hems, and beats her heart,
 Spurns enviously at straws,⁸ speaks things in doubt
 That carry but half sense. Her speech is nothing,
 Yet the unshapèd use of it doth move
 The hearers to collection;⁹ they yawn at it,
 10 And botch the words up fit to their own thoughts,
 Which, as her winks and nods and gestures yield them,
 Indeed would make one think there might be thought,
 Though nothing sure, yet much unhappily.

HORATIO: 'Twere good she were spoken with, for she may strew
 15 Dangerous conjectures in ill-breeding minds.

QUEEN: Let her come in.

[Exit GENTLEMAN.]

[Aside.] To my sick soul, as sin's true nature is,
 Each toy seems prologue to some great amiss.¹
 20 So full of artless jealousy is guilt,
 It spills itself in fearing to be spilt.

[Enter OPHELIA distracted.]

OPHELIA: Where is the beauteous majesty of Denmark?

QUEEN: How now, Ophelia!

OPHELIA:

[Sings.]

How should I your true love know
 From another one?
 25 By his cockle hat and staff,²
 And his sandal shoon.³

7. The plot of ground involved is so small that it cannot contain the number of men involved in fighting or furnish burial space for the number of those who will die. 8. Takes offense at trifles.

9. An attempt to order. 1. Catastrophe. Toy: trifle.

2. A cockle hat, one decorated with a shell, indicated that its wearer had made a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. James at Compostela in Spain. The staff also marked the carrier as a pilgrim.

3. Shoes.

QUEEN: Alas, sweet lady, what imports this song?

OPHELIA: Say you? Nay, pray you mark.

[Sings.]

He is dead and gone, lady,
 He is dead and gone;
 At his head a grass-green turf,
 At his heels a stone.

30

O, ho!

QUEEN: Nay, but Ophelia—

OPHELIA: Pray you mark.

[Sings.]

White his shroud as the mountain snow—

[Enter KING.]

QUEEN: Alas, look here, my lord.

35

OPHELIA:

[Sings.]

Larded all with sweet flowers;
 Which bewept to the grave did not go
 With true-love showers.

KING: How do you, pretty lady?

OPHELIA: Well, God dild you! They say the owl was a baker's daughter.⁴ Lord, 40 we know what we are, but know not what we may be. God be at your table!

KING: Conceit⁵ upon her father.

OPHELIA: Pray let's have no words of this, but when they ask you what it means, say you this:

[Sings.]

Tomorrow is Saint Valentine's day,
 All in the morning betime,
 And I a maid at your window,
 To be your Valentine.

45

Then up he rose, and donn'd his clo'es,
 And dupped⁶ the chamber-door,
 Let in the maid, that out a maid
 Never departed more.

50

KING: Pretty Ophelia!

OPHELIA: Indeed, without an oath, I'll make an end on't.

4. Reference to a folktale about a young woman transformed into an owl when she failed to offer generosity to Jesus, who had asked for bread in her father's shop. Dild: yield, repay.

5. Thought. 6. Opened.

[Sings.]

55 By Gis⁷ and by Saint Charity,
Alack, and fie for shame!
Young men will do't, if they come to't;
By Cock,⁸ they are to blame.
60 Quoth she "before you tumbled me,
You promised me to wed."

He answers:

"So would I'a done, by yonder sun,
An thou hadst not come to my bed."

KING: How long hath she been thus?

65 OPHELIA: I hope all will be well. We must be patient, but I cannot choose but weep to think they would lay him i' th' cold ground. My brother shall know of it, and so I thank you for your good counsel. Come, my coach! Good night, ladies, good night. Sweet ladies, good night, good night. [Exit.]

KING: Follow her close; give her good watch, I pray you.

[Exeunt HORATIO and GENTLEMAN.]

70 O, this is the poison of deep grief; it springs
All from her father's death, and now behold!
O Gertrude, Gertrude!
When sorrows come, they come not single spies,
But in battalions: first, her father slain;
75 Next, your son gone, and he most violent author
Of his own just remove; the people muddied,⁹
Thick and unwholesome in their thoughts and whispers
For good Polonius' death; and we have done but greenly¹
In huggen-mugger² to inter him; poor Ophelia
80 Divided from herself and her fair judgment,
Without the which we are pictures, or mere beasts;
Last, and as much containing as all these,
Her brother is in secret come from France,
Feeds on his wonder, keeps himself in clouds,
85 And wants not buzzers to infect his ear
With pestilent speeches of his father's death,
Wherein necessity, of matter beggared,³
Will nothing stick our person to arraign⁴
In ear and ear.⁵ O my dear Gertrude, this,
90 Like to a murd'ring piece,⁶ in many places
Gives me superfluous death.

[A noise within.]

QUEEN: Alack, what noise is this?

KING: Attend!

Where are my Switzers?⁷ Let them guard the door.

7. Jesus. 8. Corruption of "God," with a sexual pun. 9. Disturbed. 1. Without judgment.

2. Haste. 3. Short on facts. 4. Accuse. Stick: hesitate. 5. From both sides.

6. Weapon designed to scatter its shot. 7. Swiss guards.

What is the matter?

MESSENGER: Save yourself, my lord. 95
 The ocean, overpeering of his list,⁸
 Eats not the flats with more impiteous⁹ haste
 Than young Laertes, in a riotous head,¹
 O'rbears your officers. The rabble call him lord,
 And as the world were now but to begin, 100
 Antiquity forgot, custom not known,
 The ratifiers and props of every word,
 They cry "Choose we, Laertes shall be king."
 Caps, hands, and tongues, applaud it to the clouds,
 "Laertes shall be king, Laertes king." 105

QUEEN: How cheerfully on the false trail they cry!²

[A noise within.]

O, this is counter,³ you false Danish dogs!

KING: The doors are broke.

[Enter LAERTES, with OTHERS.]

LAERTES: Where is this king?—Sirs, stand you all without.

ALL: No, let's come in.

LAERTES: I pray you give me leave. 110

ALL: We will, we will.

LAERTES: I thank you. Keep⁴ the door. [Exeunt his followers.]
 O thou vile king,
 Give me my father!

QUEEN: Calmly, good Laertes.

LAERTES: That drop of blood that's calm proclaims me bastard,
 Cries cuckold to my father, brands the harlot 115
 Even here between the chaste unsmirchèd brow
 Of my true mother.

KING: What is the cause, Laertes,
 That thy rebellion looks so giant-like?
 Let him go, Gertrude. Do not fear⁵ our person.
 There's such divinity doth hedge a king 120
 That treason can but peep to⁶ what it would,
 Acts little of his will. Tell me, Laertes.
 Why thou art thus incensed. Let him go, Gertrude.
 Speak, man.

LAERTES: Where is my father?

KING: Dead.

QUEEN: But not by him.

KING: Let him demand⁷ his fill. 125

LAERTES: How came he dead? I'll not be juggled with.
 To hell allegiance, vows to the blackest devil,

8. Towering above its limits. 9. Pitiless. 1. With an armed band. 2. As if following the scent.
 3. Backward. 4. Guard. 5. Fear for. 6. Look at over or through a barrier. 7. Question.

Conscience and grace to the profoundest pit!
 I dare damnation. To this point I stand,
 130 That both the worlds I give to negligence,⁸
 Let come what comes, only I'll be revenged
 Most thoroughly for my father.

KING: Who shall stay you?
 LAERTES: My will, not all the world's.
 And for my means, I'll husband⁹ them so well
 They shall go far with little.

135 KING: Good Laertes,
 If you desire to know the certainty
 Of your dear father, is't writ in your revenge
 That, swoopstake,¹ you will draw both friend and foe,
 Winner and loser?

LAERTES: None but his enemies.

140 KING: Will you know them, then?
 LAERTES: To his good friends thus wide I'll ope my arms,
 And like the kind life-rend'ring pelican,²
 Repast them with my blood.

KING: Why, now you speak
 Like a good child and a true gentleman.
 145 That I am guiltless of your father's death,
 And am most sensibly in grief for it,
 It shall as level³ to your judgment 'pear
 As day does to your eye.

[A noise within: "Let her come in."] LAERTES: How now? What noise is that?

[Enter OPHELIA.]

150 O, heat dry up my brains! tears seven times salt
 Burn out the sense and virtue⁴ of mine eye!
 By heaven, thy madness shall be paid with weight
 Till our scale turn the beam. O rose of May,
 Dear maid, kind sister, sweet Ophelia!
 155 O heavens, is't possible a young maid's wits
 Should be as mortal as an old man's life?
 Nature is fin⁵ in love, and where 'tis fine
 It sends some precious instances of itself
 After the thing it loves.⁶

OPHELIA:

[Sings.]

8. Disregard. Both the worlds: that is, this world and the next. 9. Manage.

1. Sweeping the board. 2. The pelican was believed to feed her young with her own blood.

3. Plain. 4. Function. Sense: feeling. 5. Refined.

6. Laertes means that Ophelia, because of her love for her father, gave up her sanity as a token of grief at his death.

They bore him barefac'd on the bier; 160
 Hey non nonny, nonny, hey nonny;
 And in his grave rain'd many a tear—

Fare you well, my dove!

LAERTES: Hadst thou thy wits, and didst persuade revenge,
 It could not move thus. 165

OPHELIA: You must sing "A-down, a-down, and you call him a-down-a." O, how the wheel becomes it! It is the false steward, that stole his master's daughter.⁷

LAERTES: This nothing's more than matter.

OPHELIA: There's a rosemary, that's for remembrance. Pray you, love, remember.
 And there is pansies, that's for thoughts. 170

LAERTES: A document⁸ in madness, thoughts and remembrance fitted.

OPHELIA: There's fennel for you, and columbines. There's rue for you, and here's some for me. We may call it herb of grace a Sundays. O, you must wear your rue with a difference. There's a daisy. I would give you some violets, but they withered all when my father died. They say 'a made a good end. 175

[Sings.]

For bonny sweet Robin is all my joy.

LAERTES: Thought and affliction, passion, hell itself,
 She turns to favor⁹ and to prettiness.

OPHELIA:

[Sings.]

And will 'a not come again?
 And will 'a not come again? 180
 No, no, he is dead,
 Go to thy death-bed,
 He never will come again.

His beard was as white as snow,
 All flaxen was his poll;¹ 185
 He is gone, he is gone,
 And we cast away moan:
 God-a-mercy on his soul!

And of all Christian souls, I pray God. God b'wi'you. [Exit.]

LAERTES: Do you see this, O God? 190

KING: Laertes, I must commune with your grief,
 Or you deny me right. Go but apart,
 Make choice of whom your wisest friends you will,
 And they shall hear and judge 'twixt you and me.

7. The "wheel" refers to the "burden" or refrain of a song, in this case "A-down, a-down, and you call him a-down-a." The ballad to which she refers was about a false steward. Others have suggested that the "wheel" is either the Wheel of Fortune, a spinning wheel to whose rhythm such a song might have been sung, or a kind of dance movement performed by Ophelia as she sings. 8. Lesson. 9. Beauty. 1. Head.

195 If by direct or by collateral² hand
 They find us touched,³ we will our kingdom give,
 Our crown, our life, and all that we call ours,
 To you in satisfaction; but if not,
 Be you content to lend your patience to us,
 200 And we shall jointly labor with your soul
 To give it due content.

LAERTES: Let this be so.
 His means of death, his obscure funeral—
 No trophy, sword, nor hatchment,⁴ o'er his bones,
 No noble rite nor formal ostentation⁵—
 205 Cry to be heard, as 'twere from heaven to earth,
 That I must call't in question.

KING: So you shall;
 And where th' offence is, let the great axe fall.
 I pray you go with me.

[Exeunt.]

Scene 6

Another room in the castle. Enter HORATIO and a GENTLEMAN.

HORATIO: What are they that would speak with me?

GENTLEMAN: Sea-faring men, sir. They say they have letters for you.

HORATIO: Let them come in.

[Exit GENTLEMAN.]

I do not know from what part of the world
 5 I should be greeted, if not from Lord Hamlet.

[Enter SAILORS.]

SAILOR: God bless you, sir.

HORATIO: Let him bless thee too.

SAILOR: 'A shall, sir, an't please him. There's a letter for you, sir—it came from 10 th' ambassador that was bound for England—if your name be Horatio, as I am let to know⁶ it is.

HORATIO: [Reads.] "Horatio, when thou shalt have overlooked⁷ this, give these fellows some means⁸ to the king. They have letters for him. Ere we were two days old at sea, a pirate of very warlike appointment⁹ gave us chase. Finding ourselves too slow of sail, we put on a compelled valor, and in the grapple I 15 boarded them. On the instant they got clear of our ship, so I alone became their prisoner. They have dealt with me like thieves of mercy, but they knew what they did; I am to do a good turn for them. Let the king have the letters
 I have sent, and repair thou to me with as much speed as thou wouldest fly death. I have words to speak in thine ear will make thee dumb; yet are they 20 much too light for the bore of the matter.¹ These good fellows will bring thee

2. Indirect. 3. By guilt. 4. Coat of arms. 5. Pomp. 6. Informed. 7. Read through.

where I am. Rosencrantz and Guildenstern hold their course for England. Of them I have much to tell thee. Farewell.

He that thou knowest thine, Hamlet.”

Come, I will give you way² for these your letters,
And do't the speedier that you may direct me 25
To him from whom you brought them. [Exeunt.]

Scene 7

Another room in the castle. Enter KING and LAERTES.

- KING: Now must your conscience my acquittance seal,³
And you must put me in your heart for friend,
Sith you have heard, and with a knowing ear,
That he which hath your noble father slain
Pursued my life.
- LAERTES: It well appears. But tell me 5
Why you proceeded not against these feats,
So criminal and so capital in nature,
As by your safety, greatness, wisdom, all things else,
You mainly were stirred up.
- KING: O, for two special reasons, 10
Which may to you, perhaps, seem much unsinewed,⁴
But yet to me th' are strong. The queen his mother
Lives almost by his looks, and for myself—
My virtue or my plague, be it either which—
She is so conjunctive⁵ to my life and soul
That, as the star moves not but in his sphere,⁶ 15
I could not but by her. The other motive,
Why to a public count⁷ I might not go,
Is the great love the general gender⁸ bear him,
Who, dipping all his faults in their affection,
Work like the spring that turneth wood to stone,⁹ 20
Convert his gyves¹ to graces; so that my arrows,
Too slightly timbered² for so loud a wind,
Would have reverted to my bow again,
But not where I had aimed them.
- LAERTES: And so have I a noble father lost, 25
A sister driven into desp'rate terms,
Whose worth, if praises may go back again,
Stood challenger on mount of all the age
For her perfections. But my revenge will come.
- KING: Break not your sleeps for that. You must not think 30

2. Means of delivery. 3. Grant me innocent. 4. Weak. 5. Closely joined.

6. Reference to the Ptolemaic cosmology, in which planets and stars were believed to revolve in crystal-line spheres concentrically about the Earth. 7. Reckoning. 8. Common people.

9. Certain English springs contain so much lime that a log placed in one of them for a length of time will be covered in limestone. 1. Fetters. 2. Shafted.

That we are made of stuff so flat and dull
 That we can let our beard be shook with danger,
 And think it pastime. You shortly shall hear more.
 I loved your father, and we love our self,
 35 And that, I hope, will teach you to imagine—

[Enter a MESSENGER with letters.]

How now? What news?

MESSENGER: Letters, my lord, from Hamlet.

These to your majesty; this to the queen.

KING: From Hamlet! Who brought them?

MESSENGER: Sailors, my lord, they say. I saw them not.

40 They were given me by Claudio; he received them
 Of him that brought them.

KING: Laertes, you shall hear them.—

Leave us. [Exit MESSENGER.]

[Reads.] “High and mighty, you shall know I am set naked on your kingdom. Tomorrow shall I beg leave to see your kingly eyes; when I shall, first 45 asking your pardon thereunto, recount the occasion of my sudden and more strange return.

Hamlet.”

What should this mean? Are all the rest come back?

Or is it some abuse,³ and no such thing?

LAERTES: Know you the hand?

50 KING: ’Tis Hamlet’s character.⁴ “Naked”!
 And in a postscript here, he says “alone.”
 Can you devise⁵ me?

LAERTES: I am lost in it, my lord. But let him come.

It warms the very sickness in my heart
 55 That I shall live and tell him to his teeth
 “Thus didest thou.”

KING: If it be so, Laertes—
 As how should it be so, how otherwise?—
 Will you be ruled by me?

LAERTES: Ay, my lord,
 So you will not o’errule me to a peace.

60 KING: To thine own peace. If he be now returned,
 As checking at⁶ his voyage, and that he means
 No more to undertake it, I will work him
 To an exploit now ripe in my device,
 Under the which he shall not choose but fall;
 65 And for his death no wind of blame shall breathe
 But even his mother shall uncharge⁷ the practice
 And call it accident.

LAERTES: My lord, I will be ruled;

3. Trick. 4. Handwriting. 5. Explain it to. 6. Turning aside from. 7. Not accuse.

The rather if you could devise it so
That I might be the organ.⁸

KING: It falls right.

You have been talked of since your travel much, 70
And that in Hamlet's hearing, for a quality
Wherein they say you shine. Your sum of parts
Did not together pluck such envy from him
As did that one, and that, in my regard,
Of the unworthiest siege.⁹

LAERTES: What part is that, my lord? 75

KING: A very riband in the cap of youth,
Yet needful too, for youth no less becomes
The light and careless livery that it wears
Than settled age his sables and his weeds,¹
Importing health and graveness. Two months since 80
Here was a gentleman of Normandy.
I have seen myself, and served against, the French,
And they can² well on horseback, but this gallant
Had witchcraft in't. He grew unto his seat,
And to such wondrous doing brought his horse, 85
As had he been incorpsed and demi-natured
With the brave beast. So far he topped my thought
That I, in forgery³ of shapes and tricks,
Come short of what he did.⁴

LAERTES: A Norman was't? 90

KING: A Norman.

LAERTES: Upon my life, Lamord.

KING: The very same.

LAERTES: I know him well. He is the brooch indeed
And gem of all the nation.

KING: He made confession⁵ of you, 95
And gave you such a masterly report
For art and exercise in your defence,⁶
And for your rapier most especial,
That he cried out 'twould be a sight indeed
If one could match you. The scrimers⁷ of their nation
He swore had neither motion, guard, nor eye, 100
If you opposed them. Sir, this report of his
Did Hamlet so envenom with his envy
That he could nothing do but wish and beg
Your sudden coming o'er, to play with you.
Now out of this—

8. Instrument. 9. Lowest rank. 1. Dignified clothing. 2. Perform. 3. Imagination.

4. The gentleman referred to was so skilled in horsemanship that he seemed to share one body with the horse ("incorpsed"). The king further extends the compliment by saying that he appeared like the mythical centaur, a creature who was man from the waist up and horse from the waist down, therefore "demi-natured." 5. Gave a report. 6. Skill in fencing. 7. Fencers.

- 105 LAERTES: What out of this, my lord?
 KING: Laertes, was your father dear to you?
 Or are you like the painting of a sorrow,
 A face without a heart?
 LAERTES: Why ask you this?
 KING: Not that I think you did not love your father,
 110 But that I know love is begun by time,
 And that I see in passages of proof,⁸
 Time qualifies the spark and fire of it.
 There lives within the very flame of love
 A kind of wick or snuff that will abate it, 115 And nothing is at a like goodness still,
 For goodness, growing to a pluriy,⁹
 Dies in his own too much.¹ That we would do,
 We should do when we would; for this “would” changes,
 And hath abatements and delays as many 120 As there are tongues, are hands, are accidents,
 And then this “should” is like a spendthrift’s sigh
 That hurts by easing. But to the quick of th’ ulcer²—
 Hamlet comes back; what would you undertake
 To show yourself in deed your father’s son
 More than in words?
 125 LAERTES: To cut his throat i’ th’ church.
 KING: No place indeed should murder sanctuarize;³
 Revenge should have no bounds. But, good Laertes,
 Will you do this? Keep close within your chamber.
 Hamlet returned shall know you are come home.
 130 We’ll put on those shall praise your excellence,
 And set a double varnish on the fame
 The Frenchman gave you, bring you in fine⁴ together,
 And wager on your heads. He, being remiss,⁵
 Most generous, and free from all contriving,
 135 Will not peruse⁶ the foils, so that with ease,
 Or with a little shuffling, you may choose
 A sword unbated,⁷ and in a pass of practice
 Requite him for your father.
 LAERTES: I will do’t,
 And for that purpose I’ll anoint my sword.
 140 I bought an unction of a mountebank
 So mortal that but dip a knife in it,
 Where it draws blood no cataplasm⁸ so rare,
 Collected from all simples⁹ that have virtue
 Under the moon, can save the thing from death

8. Tests of experience. 9. Fullness. 1. Excess.

2. Heart of the matter. Spendthrift’s sigh: a sigh was believed to draw a drop of blood from the heart and thus to “hurt” by “easing” sadness. 3. Provide sanctuary for murder. 4. In short.

5. Careless. 6. Examine. 7. Not blunted. 8. Poultice. 9. Herbs.

That is but scratched withal. I'll touch my point 145
 With this contagion, that if I gall¹ him slightly,
 It may be death.

KING: Let's further think of this,
 Weigh what convenience both of time and means
 May fit us to our shape. If this should fail,
 And that our drift look² through our bad performance, 150
 'Twere better not assayed. Therefore this project
 Should have a back or second that might hold
 If this did blast in proof.³ Soft, let me see.
 We'll make a solemn wager on your cunning—
 I ha't. 155
 When in your motion you are hot and dry—
 As make your bouts more violent to that end—
 And that he calls for drink, I'll have prepared him
 A chalice for the nonce, whereon but sipping,
 If he by chance escape your venom'd stuck,⁴ 160
 Our purpose may hold there.—But stay, what noise?

[Enter QUEEN.]

QUEEN: One woe doth tread upon another's heel,
 So fast they follow. Your sister's drowned, Laertes.

LAERTES: Drowned? O, where?

QUEEN: There is a willow grows aslant the brook 165
 That shows his hoar leaves in the glassy stream.
 Therewith fantastic garlands did she make
 Of crowflowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples
 That liberal shepherds give a grosser⁵ name,
 But our cold⁶ maids do dead men's fingers call them. 170
 There on the pendent boughs her coronet weeds
 Clamb'ring to hang, an envious⁷ sliver broke,
 When down her weedy trophies and herself
 Fell in the weeping brook. Her clothes spread wide,
 And mermaid-like awhile they bore her up, 175
 Which time she chanted snatches of old tunes,
 As one incapable⁸ of her own distress,
 Or like a creature native and indued⁹
 Unto that element. But long it could not be Till that her garments, heavy with their drink, 180
 Pulled the poor wretch from her melodious lay
 To muddy death.

LAERTES: Alas, then she is drowned?

QUEEN: Drowned, drowned.

LAERTES: Too much of water hast thou, poor Ophelia,

1. Scratch. 2. Intent become obvious. 3. Fail when tried. 4. Thrust.

5. Coarser. The "long purples" are purple orchises, a type of orchid known as "dog's cullions" (testicles) or "goat's cullions." Liberal: vulgar. 6. Chaste. 7. Malicious. 8. Unaware. 9. Habituated.

- 185 And therefore I forbid my tears; but yet
 It is our trick; nature her custom holds,
 Let shame say what it will. When these are gone,
 The woman will be out. Adieu, my lord.
 I have a speech o' fire that fain would blaze
 But that this folly drowns it. [Exit.]
- 190 KING: Let's follow, Gertrude.
 How much I had to do to calm his rage!
 Now fear I this will give it start again;
 Therefore let's follow. [Exeunt.]

ACT V

Scene 1

*A churchyard. Enter two CLOWNS.*¹

- CLOWN: Is she to be buried in Christian burial when she wilfully seeks her own salvation?
- OTHER: I tell thee she is. Therefore make her grave straight. The crowner hath sat on her,² and finds it Christian burial.
- 5 CLOWN: How can that be, unless she drowned herself in her own defence?
- OTHER: Why, 'tis found so.
- CLOWN: It must be "se offendendo";³ it cannot be else. For here lies the point: if I drown myself wittingly, it argues an act, and an act hath three branches—it is to act, to do, to perform; argal,⁴ she drowned herself wittingly.
- 10 OTHER: Nay, but hear you, Goodman Delver.
- CLOWN: Give me leave. Here lies the water; good. Here stands the man; good. If the man go to this water and drown himself, it is, will he, nill he, he goes—mark you that. But if the water come to him and drown him, he drowns not himself. Argal, he that is not guilty of his own death shortens not his own life.
- 15 OTHER: But is this law?
- CLOWN: Ay, marry, is't; crowner's quest⁵ law.
- OTHER: Will you ha' the truth on't? If this had not been a gentlewoman, she should have been buried out o' Christian burial.
- 20 CLOWN: Why, there thou say'st. And the more pity that great folk should have count'nance⁶ in this world to drown or hang themselves more than their even-Christen.⁷ Come, my spade. There is no ancient gentlemen but gard'ners, ditchers, and grave-makers. They hold up Adam's profession.
- OTHER: Was he a gentleman?
- 25 CLOWN: 'A was the first that ever bore arms.
- OTHER: Why, he had none.
- CLOWN: What, art a heathen? How dost thou understand the Scripture? The Scripture says Adam digged. Could he dig without arms? I'll put another question to thee. If thou answerest me not to the purpose, confess thyself—

1. Rustics; unsophisticated peasants. 2. Held an inquest. Crowner: coroner. 3. Error for se defendendo, in self-defense. 4. "Ergo," therefore. 5. Inquest. 6. Approval. 7. Fellow Christians.

OTHER: Go to. 30
 CLOWN: What is he that builds stronger than either the mason, the shipwright, or the carpenter?
 OTHER: The gallows-maker, for that frame outlives a thousand tenants.
 CLOWN: I like thy wit well, in good faith. The gallows does well. But how does it well? It does well to those that do ill. Now thou dost ill to say the gallows is 35 built stronger than the church. Argal, the gallows may do well to thee. To't again,⁸ come.
 OTHER: Who builds stronger than a mason, a shipwright, or a carpenter?
 CLOWN: Ay tell me that, and unyoke.⁹
 OTHER: Marry, now I can tell. 40
 CLOWN: To't.
 OTHER: Mass, I cannot tell.
 CLOWN: Cudgel thy brains no more about it, for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating. And when you are asked this question next, say "a grave maker." The houses he makes lasts till doomsday. Go, get thee in, and fetch 45 me a stoup¹ of liquor. [Exit OTHER CLOWN.]

[Enter HAMLET and HORATIO as CLOWN digs and sings.]

In youth, when I did love, did love,
 Methought it was very sweet,
 To contract the time for-a my behove,²
 O, methought there-a was nothing-a meet.³ 50

HAMLET: Has this fellow no feeling of his business, that 'a sings in grave-making?
 HORATIO: Custom hath made it in him a property of easiness.
 HAMLET: 'Tis e'en so. The hand of little employment hath the daintier sense.
 CLOWN:

[Sings.]

But age, with his stealing steps,
 Hath clawed me in his clutch, 55
 And hath shipped me into the land,
 As if I had never been such.

[Throws up a skull.]

HAMLET: That skull had a tongue in it, and could sing once. How the knave jowls⁴ it to the ground, as if 'twere Cain's jawbone, that did the first murder!
 This might be the pate of a politician, which this ass now o'erreaches;⁵ one 60 that would circumvent God, might it not?
 HORATIO: It might, my lord.
 HAMLET: Or of a courtier, which could say, "Good morrow, sweet lord! How does thou, sweet lord?" This might be my Lord Such-a-one, that praised my Lord Such-a-one's horse, when 'a meant to beg it, might it not? 65
 HORATIO: Ay, my lord.

8. Guess again. 9. Finish the matter. 1. Mug. 2. Advantage. Contract: shorten.

3. The gravedigger's song is a free version of "The aged lover renounceth love" by Thomas, Lord Vaux, published in Tottel's Miscellany (1557). 4. Hurls. 5. Gets the better of.

HAMLET: Why, e'en so, and now my Lady Worm's, chapless,⁶ and knock'd about the mazzard with a sexton's spade. Here's fine revolution,⁷ an we had the trick to see't. Did these bones cost no more the breeding but to play at loggets with them?⁸ Mine ache to think on't.

CLOWN:

[Sings.]

A pick-axe and a spade, a spade,
For and a shrouding sheet:
O, a pit of clay for to be made
For such a guest is meet.

[Throws up another skull.]

75 HAMLET: There's another. Why may not that be the skull of a lawyer? Where be his quiddities now, his quillets, his cases, his tenures, and his tricks? Why does he suffer this mad knave now to knock him about the sponce⁹ with a dirty shovel, and will not tell him of his action of battery? Hum! This fellow might be in's time a great buyer of land, with his statutes, his recognizances, 80 his fines, his double vouchers, his recoveries. Is this the fine¹ of his fines, and the recovery of his recoveries, to have his fine pate full of fine dirt? Will his vouchers vouch him no more of his purchases, and double ones too, than the length and breadth of a pair of indentures?² The very conveyances of his lands will scarcely lie in this box, and must th' inheritor himself have no
85 more, ha?³

HORATIO: Not a jot more, my lord.

HAMLET: Is not parchment made of sheepskins?

HORATIO: Ay, my lord, and of calves' skins too.

HAMLET: They are sheep and calves which seek out assurance in that. I will 90 speak to this fellow. Whose grave's this, sirrah?

CLOWN: Mine, sir.

[Sings.]

O, a pit of clay for to be made
For such a guest is meet.

HAMLET: I think it be thine indeed, for thou liest in't.

95 CLOWN: You lie out on't, sir, and therefore 'tis not yours. For my part, I do not lie in't, yet it is mine.

HAMLET: Thou dost lie in't, to be in't and say it is thine. 'Tis for the dead, not for the quick;⁴ therefore thou liest.

CLOWN: 'Tis a quick lie, sir; 'twill away again from me to you.

100 HAMLET: What man dost thou dig it for?

CLOWN: For no man, sir.

HAMLET: What woman, then?

6. Lacking a lower jaw. 7. Skill. Mazzard: head.

8. "Loggets" were small pieces of wood thrown as part of a game. 9. Head. 1. End. 2. Contracts.

3. In this speech Hamlet reels off a list of legal terms relating to property transactions. 4. Living.

CLOWN: For none neither.

HAMLET: Who is to be buried in't?

CLOWN: One that was a woman, sir; but, rest her soul, she's dead. 105

HAMLET: How absolute the knave is! We must speak by the card,⁵ or equivocation will undo us. By the Lord, Horatio, this three years I have took note of it, the age is grown so picked⁶ that the toe of the peasant comes so near the heel of the courtier, he galls his kibe.⁷ How long hast thou been a grave-maker?

CLOWN: Of all the days i' th' year, I came to't that day that our last King Hamlet overcame Fortinbras. 110

HAMLET: How long is that since?

CLOWN: Cannot you tell that? Every fool can tell that. It was that very day that young Hamlet was born—he that is mad, and sent into England.

HAMLET: Ay, marry, why was he sent into England? 115

CLOWN: Why, because 'a was mad. 'A shall recover his wits there; or, if 'a do not, 'tis no great matter there.

HAMLET: Why?

CLOWN: 'Twill not be seen in him there. There the men are as mad as he.

HAMLET: How came he mad? 120

CLOWN: Very strangely, they say.

HAMLET: How strangely?

CLOWN: Faith, e'en with losing his wits.

HAMLET: Upon what ground?

CLOWN: Why, here in Denmark. I have been sexton here, man and boy, thirty years. 125

HAMLET: How long will a man lie i' th' earth ere he rot?

CLOWN: Faith, if 'a be not rotten before 'a die—as we have many pocky⁸ corsenow-a-days that will scarce hold the laying in—'a will last you some eight year or nine year. A tanner will last you nine year. 130

HAMLET: Why he more than another?

CLOWN: Why, sir, his hide is so tanned with his trade that 'a will keep out water a great while; and your water is a sore decayer of your whoreson dead body. Here's a skull now hath lien⁹ you i' th' earth three and twenty years.

HAMLET: Whose was it? 135

CLOWN: A whoreson mad fellow's it was. Whose do you think it was?

HAMLET: Nay, I know not.

CLOWN: A pestilence on him for a mad rogue! 'A poured a flagon of Rhenish on my head once. This same skull, sir, was, sir, Yorick's skull, the king's jester.

HAMLET: [Takes the skull.] This? 140

CLOWN: E'en that.

HAMLET: Alas, poor Yorick! I knew him, Horatio—a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy. He hath bore me on his back a thousand times, and now how abhorred in my imagination it is! My gorg¹ rises at it. Here hung those lips that I have kissed I know not how oft. Where be your gibes now, your gambols, your songs, your flashes of merriment that were wont to set the table on a roar? Not one now to mock your own grinning? Quite chap-fall'n?² Now 145

5. Exactly. Absolute: precise. 6. Refined. 7. Rubs a blister on his heel. 8. Corrupted by syphilis. 9. Lain. Whoreson: bastard (not literally). 1. Throat. 2. Lacking a lower jaw.

get you to my lady's chamber, and tell her, let her paint an inch thick, to this favor³ she must come. Make her laugh at that. Prithee, Horatio, tell me one 150 thing.

HORATIO: What's that, my lord?

HAMLET: Dost thou think Alexander looked o' this fashion i' th' earth?

HORATIO: E'en so.

HAMLET: And smelt so? Pah! [Throws down the skull.]

155 HORATIO: E'en so, my lord.

HAMLET: To what base uses we may return, Horatio! Why may not imagination trace the noble dust of Alexander till 'a find it stopping a bung-hole?⁴

HORATIO: 'Twere to consider too curiously⁵ to consider so.

160 HAMLET: No, faith, not a jot, but to follow him thither with modesty⁶ enough, and likelihood to lead it. Alexander died, Alexander was buried, Alexander returneth to dust; the dust is earth; of earth we make loam; and why of that loam whereto he was converted might they not stop a beerbarrel?

Imperious Cæsar, dead and turned to clay,
Might stop a hole to keep the wind away.

165 O, that that earth which kept the world in awe
Should patch a wall t'expel the winter's flaw!⁷

But soft, but soft awhile! Here comes the king,
The queen, the courtiers.

[Enter KING, QUEEN, LAERTES, and the Corse with a PRIEST and LORDS attendant.]

Who is this they follow?
And with such maimèd⁸ rites? This doth betoken
170 The corse they follow did with desperate hand
Fordo its own life. 'Twas of some estate.⁹
Couch¹ we awhile and mark. [Retires with HORATIO.]

LAERTES: What ceremony else?²

HAMLET: That is Laertes, a very noble youth. Mark.

175 LAERTES: What ceremony else?

PRIEST: Here obsequies have been as far enlarged³
As we have warranty. Her death was doubtful,
And but that great command o'ersways the order,⁴
She should in ground unsanctified been lodged 180 Till the last trumpet. For charitable prayers,
Shards, flints, and pebbles, should be thrown on her.
Yet here she is allowed her virgin crants,⁵
Her maiden strewments,⁶ and the bringing home
Of bell and burial.

LAERTES: Must there no more be done?

3. Appearance. 4. Used as a cork in a cask. 5. Precisely. 6. Moderation. 7. Gusty wind.

8. Shortened. 9. Rank. Fordo: destroy. 1. Conceal ourselves. 2. More. 3. Extended.

4. Usual rules. 5. Wreaths. 6. Flowers strewn on the grave.

PRIEST: No more be done. 185
 We should profane the service of the dead
 To sing a requiem and such rest to her
 As to peace-parted souls.

LAERTES: Lay her i' th' earth,
 And from her fair and unpolluted flesh
 May violets spring! I tell thee, churlish priest, 190
 A minist'ring angel shall my sister be
 When thou liest howling.⁷

HAMLET: What, the fair Ophelia!
 QUEEN: Sweets to the sweet. Farewell! [Scatters flowers.]
 I hoped thou shouldst have been my Hamlet's wife.
 I thought thy bride-bed to have decked, sweet maid, 195
 And not t' have strewed thy grave.

LAERTES: O, treble woe
 Fall ten times treble on that cursèd head
 Whose wicked deed thy most ingenious sense⁸
 Deprived thee of! Hold off the earth awhile,
 Till I have caught her once more in mine arms. [Leaps into the grave.] 200
 Now pile your dust upon the quick and dead,
 Till of this flat a mountain you have made
 T' o'er-top old Pelion or the skyish head
 Of blue Olympus.⁹

HAMLET: [Coming forward.] What is he whose grief
 Bears such an emphasis, whose phrase of sorrow 205
 Conjures¹ the wand'ring stars, and makes them stand
 Like wonder-wounded hearers? This is I,
 Hamlet the Dane.
 [HAMLET leaps into the grave and they grapple.]

LAERTES: The devil take thy soul!
 HAMLET: Thou pray'st not well.
 I prithee take thy fingers from my throat, 210
 For though I am not splenitive² and rash,
 Yet have I in me something dangerous,
 Which let thy wisdom fear. Hold off thy hand.

KING: Pluck them asunder.
 QUEEN: Hamlet! Hamlet! 215
 ALL: Gentlemen!
 HORATIO: Good my lord, be quiet.
 [The ATTENDANTS part them, and they come out of the grave.]

7. In Hell. 8. Lively mind.

9. The rivalry between Laertes and Hamlet in this scene extends even to their rhetoric. Pelion and Olympus, mentioned here by Laertes, and Ossa, mentioned below by Hamlet, are Greek mountains noted in mythology for their height. Olympus was the reputed home of the gods, and the other two were piled one on top of the other by the Giants in an attempt to reach the top of Olympus and overthrow the gods. 1. Casts a spell on. 2. Hot tempered.

HAMLET: Why, I will fight with him upon this theme
Until my eyelids will no longer wag.³

220 QUEEN: O my son, what theme?

HAMLET: I loved Ophelia. Forty thousand brothers
Could not with all their quantity of love
Make up my sum. What wilt thou do for her?

KING: O, he is mad, Laertes.

225 QUEEN: For love of God, forbear⁴ him.

HAMLET: 'Swounds, show me what th'owt do.
Woo't⁵ weep, woo't fight, woo't fast, woo't tear thyself,
Woo't drink up eisel,⁶ eat a crocodile?
I'll do't. Dost come here to whine?

230 To outface⁷ me with leaping in her grave?
Be buried quick with her, and so will I.
And if thou prate of mountains, let them throw
Millions of acres on us, till our ground,
Singeing his pate against the burning zone,⁸
235 Make Ossa like a wart! Nay, an thou'lt mouth,
I'll rant as well as thou.

QUEEN: This is mere madness
And thus awhile the fit will work on him.
Anon, as patient as the female dove
When that her golden couplets⁹ are disclosed,
His silence will sit drooping.

HAMLET: Hear you, sir.

240 What is the reason that you use me thus?
I loved you ever. But it is no matter.
Let Hercules himself do what he may,
The cat will mew, and dog will have his day.

[Exit.]

KING: I pray thee, good Horatio, wait upon¹ him.

[Exit HORATIO.]

245 [To LAERTES.] Strengthen your patience in our last night's speech.
We'll put the matter to the present push.²—
Good Gertrude, set some watch over your son.—
This grave shall have a living monument.
An hour of quiet shortly shall we see;
250 Till then in patience our proceeding be.

[Exeunt.]

Scene 2

A hall or public room. Enter HAMLET and HORATIO.

HAMLET: So much for this, sir; now shall you see the other.
You do remember all the circumstance?

3. Move. 4. Bear with. 5. Will you. 6. Vinegar. 7. Get the best of. 8. Sky in the torrid zone.
9. Pair of eggs. 1. Attend. 2. Immediate trial.

HORATIO: Remember it, my lord!

HAMLET: Sir, in my heart there was a kind of fighting
 That would not let me sleep. Methought I lay 5
 Worse than the mutines in the bilboes.³ Rashly,
 And praised be rashness for it—let us know,
 Our indiscretion sometime serves us well,
 When our deep plots do pall; and that should learn⁴ us
 There's a divinity that shapes our ends, 10
 Rough-hew them how we will—

HORATIO: That is most certain.

HAMLET: Up from my cabin,
 My sea-gown scarfed⁵ about me, in the dark
 Groped I to find out them, had my desire,
 Fingered their packet, and in fine⁶ withdrew 15
 To mine own room again, making so bold,
 My fears forgetting manners, to unseal
 Their grand commission; where I found, Horatio—
 Ah, royal knavery!—an exact⁷ command,
 Larded⁸ with many several sorts of reasons, 20
 Importing Denmark's health, and England's too,
 With, ho! such bugs and goblins in my life,⁹
 That on the supervise,¹ no leisure bated,
 No, not to stay the grinding of the axe,
 My head should be struck off.

HORATIO: Is't possible? 25

HAMLET: Here's the commission; read it at more leisure.
 But wilt thou hear now how I did proceed?

HORATIO: I beseech you.

HAMLET: Being thus benetted² round with villainies,
 Ere I could make a prologue to my brains, 30
 They had begun the play. I sat me down,
 Devised a new commission, wrote it fair.³
 I once did hold it, as our statist⁴ do,
 A baseness to write fair, and labored much
 How to forget that learning; but sir, now 35
 It did me yeoman's service.⁵ Wilt thou know
 Th' effect⁶ of what I wrote?

HORATIO: Ay, good my lord.

HAMLET: An earnest conjuration from the king,
 As England was his faithful tributary,⁷
 As love between them like the palm might flourish, 40
 As peace should still her wheaten garland wear
 And stand a comma 'tween their amities⁸

3. Stocks. Mutines: mutineers. 4. Teach. 5. Wrapped. 6. Quickly. Fingered: stole.

7. Precisely stated. 8. Garnished. 9. Such dangers if I remained alive.

1. As soon as the commission was read. 2. Caught in a net. 3. Legibly. Devised: made.

4. Politicians. 5. Served me well. 6. Contents. 7. Vassal. 8. Link friendships.

And many such like as's of great charge,⁹
 That on the view and knowing of these contents,
 45 Without debatement¹ further more or less,
 He should those bearers put to sudden death,
 Not shriving-time allowed.²

HORATIO: How was this sealed?

HAMLET: Why, even in that was heaven ordinant,³
 I had my father's signet in my purse,
 50 Which was the model of that Danish seal,
 Folded the writ up in the form of th' other,
 Subscribed it, gave't th' impression,⁴ placed it safely,
 The changeling⁵ never known. Now, the next day
 Was our sea-fight, and what to this was sequent⁶
 55 Thou knowest already.

HORATIO: So Guildenstern and Rosencrantz go to't.

HAMLET: Why, man, they did make love to this employment.
 They are not near my conscience; their defeat⁷
 Does by their own insinuation grow.
 60 'Tis dangerous when the baser nature comes
 Between the pass and fell⁸ incensèd points
 Of mighty opposites.

HORATIO: Why, what a king is this!

HAMLET: Does it not, think thee, stand me now upon—
 He that hath killed my king and whored my mother,
 65 Popped in between th' election and my hopes,
 Thrown out his angle⁹ for my proper life,
 And with such coznage¹—is't not perfect conscience
 To quit² him with this arm? And is't not to be damned
 To let this canker of our nature come 70 In further evil?

HORATIO: It must be shortly known to him from England

What is the issue³ of the business there.

HAMLET: It will be short;⁴ the interim is mine.

And a man's life's no more than to say "one."
 75 But I am very sorry, good Horatio,
 That to Laertes I forgot myself;
 For by the image of my cause I see
 The portraiture of his. I'll court his favors.
 But sure the bravery⁵ of his grief did put me
 Into a tow'ring passion.

80 HORATIO: Peace; who comes here?

[Enter OSRIC.]

OSRIC: Your lordship is right welcome back to Denmark.

9. Import. 1. Consideration. 2. Without time for confession. 3. Operative. 4. With the seal.

5. Replacement. 6. Followed. 7. Death. Are not near: do not touch. 8. Cruel. Pass: thrust.

9. Fishhook. 1. Trickery. 2. Repay. 3. Outcome. 4. Soon. 5. Exaggerated display.

- HAMLET: I humbly thank you, sir. [Aside to HORATIO.] Dost know this water-fly?⁶
- HORATIO: [Aside to HAMLET.] No, my good lord.
- HAMLET: [Aside to HORATIO.] Thy state is the more gracious, for 'tis a vice to know him. He hath much land, and fertile. Let a beast be lord of beasts, and 85 his crib shall stand at the king's mess. 'Tis a chough,⁶ but as I say, spacious in the possession of dirt.
- OSRIC: Sweet lord, if your lordship were at leisure, I should impart a thing to you from his majesty.
- HAMLET: I will receive it, sir, with all diligence of spirit. Put your bonnet to his 90 right use. 'Tis for the head.⁷
- OSRIC: I thank your lordship, it is very hot.
- HAMLET: No, believe me, 'tis very cold; the wind is northerly.
- OSRIC: It is indifferent⁸ cold, my lord, indeed.
- HAMLET: But yet methinks it is very sultry and hot for my complexion.⁹ 95
- OSRIC: Exceedingly, my lord; it is very sultry, as 'twere—I cannot tell how. My lord, his majesty bade me signify to you that 'a has laid a great wager on your head. Sir, this is the matter—
- HAMLET: I beseech you, remember. [Moves him to put on his hat.]
- OSRIC: Nay, good my lord; for my ease, in good faith. Sir, here is newly come to 100 court Laertes; believe me, an absolute¹ gentleman, full of most excellent differences of very soft society and great showing.² Indeed, to speak feelingly of him, he is the card or calendar of gentry, for you shall find in him the conti-nent³ of what part a gentleman would see.
- HAMLET: Sir, his definement⁴ suffers no perdition in you, though I know to 105 divide him inventorially would dozy th' arithmetic of memory, and yet but yaw⁵ neither in respect of his quick sail. But in the verity of extolment, I take him to be a soul of great article, and his infusion⁶ of such dearth and rare-ness as, to make true diction of him, his semblage is his mirror,⁷ and who else would trace him, his umbrage,⁸ nothing more. 110
- OSRIC: Your lordship speaks most infallibly of him.
- HAMLET: The concernancy,⁹ sir? Why do we wrap the gentleman in our more rawer breath?¹
- OSRIC: Sir?
- HORATIO: Is't not possible to understand in another tongue? You will to't, sir, really. 115
- HAMLET: What imports the nomination² of this gentleman?
- OSRIC: Of Laertes?
- HORATIO: [Aside.] His purse is empty already. All's golden words are spent.
- HAMLET: Of him, sir.
- OSRIC: I know you are not ignorant— 120
- HAMLET: I would you did, sir; yet, in faith, if you did, it would not much approve me. Well, sir.

6. Jackdaw. 7. Osric has evidently removed his hat in deference to the prince. 8. Moderately.

9. Temperament. 1. Perfect. 2. Good manners. Excellent differences: qualities.

3. Sum total. Calendar: measure. 4. Description.

5. Steer wildly. Dozy: daze. Divide him inventorially: examine bit by bit. 6. Nature. Article: scope.

7. That is, his likeness ("semblage") is (only) his own mirror image; he is unrivaled. Diction: telling.

8. Shadow. Trace: keep pace with. 9. Meaning. (Hamlet is mocking Osric's affected speech.)

1. Cruder words. 2. Naming.

OSRIC: You are not ignorant of what excellence Laertes is—

HAMLET: I dare not confess that, lest I should compare³ with him in excellence;
125 but to know a man well were to know himself.

OSRIC: I mean, sir, for his weapon; but in the imputation⁴ laid on him by them, in his meed he's unfellowed.⁵

HAMLET: What's his weapon?

OSRIC: Rapier and dagger.

130 HAMLET: That's two of his weapons—but well.

OSRIC: The king, sir, hath wagered with him six Barbary horses, against the which he has impawned,⁶ as I take it, six French rapiers and poniards, with their assigns, as girdle, hangers,⁷ and so. Three of the carriages, in faith, are very 135 dear to fancy,⁸ very responsive to the hilts, most delicate carriages, and of very liberal conceit.⁹

HAMLET: What call you the carriages?

HORATIO: [Aside to HAMLET.] I knew you must be edified by the margent¹ ere you had done.

OSRIC: The carriages, sir, are the hangers.

140 HAMLET: The phrase would be more germane to the matter if we could carry a cannon by our sides. I would it might be hangers till then. But on! Six Barbary horses against six French swords, their assigns, and three liberal conceited carriages; that's the French bet against the Danish. Why is this all impawned, as you call it?

145 OSRIC: The king, sir, hath laid, sir, that in a dozen passes between yourself and him he shall not exceed you three hits; he hath laid on twelve for nine, and it would come to immediate trial if your lordship would vouchsafe the answer.

HAMLET: How if I answer no?

OSRIC: I mean, my lord, the opposition of your person in trial.

150 HAMLET: Sir, I will walk here in the hall. If it please his majesty, it is the breathing time² of day with me. Let the foils be brought, the gentleman willing, and the king hold his purpose; I will win for him an I can. If not, I will gain nothing but my shame and the odd hits.

OSRIC: Shall I deliver you so?

155 HAMLET: To this effect, sir, after what flourish your nature will.

OSRIC: I commend my duty to your lordship.

HAMLET: Yours, yours. [Exit OSRIC.] He does well to commend it himself; there are no tongues else for's turn.

HORATIO: This lapwing runs away with the shell on his head.³

160 HAMLET: 'A did comply, sir, with his dug⁴ before 'a sucked it. Thus has he, and many more of the same bevy that I know the drossy age dotes on, only got the tune of the time; and out of an habit of encounter, a king of yesty⁵ collection

3. That is, compare myself. 4. Reputation. 5. Unequaled in his excellence 6. Staked.

7. Sword belts. Assigns: appurtenances. 8. Finely designed.

9. Elegant design. Delicate: well adjusted. 1. Marginal gloss. 2. Time for exercise.

3. The lapwing was thought to be so precocious that it could run immediately after being hatched, even, as here, with bits of the shell still on its head. 4. Mother's breast. Comply: deal formally.

5. Yeasty.

which carries them through and through the most fanned and winnowed opinions; and do but blow them to their trial, the bubbles are out.

[Enter a LORD.]

LORD: My lord, his majesty commended him to you by young Osric, who brings back to him that you attend⁶ him in the hall. He sends to know if your pleasure hold to play with Laertes, or that you will take longer time. 165

HAMLET: I am constant to my purposes; they follow the king's pleasure. If his fitness speaks, mine is ready; now or whensoever, provided I be so able as now.

LORD: The king and queen and all are coming down. 170

HAMLET: In happy time.

LORD: The queen desires you to use some gentle entertainment⁷ to Laertes before you fall to play.

HAMLET: She well instructs me. [Exit LORD.]

HORATIO: You will lose this wager, my lord. 175

HAMLET: I do not think so. Since he went into France I have been in continual practice. I shall win at the odds. But thou wouldst not think how ill⁸ all's here about my heart. But it's no matter.

HORATIO: Nay, good my lord—

HAMLET: It is but foolery, but it is such a kind of gaingiving⁹ as would perhaps trouble a woman. 180

HORATIO: If your mind dislike anything, obey it. I will forestall their repair¹ hither, and say you are not fit.

HAMLET: Not a whit, we defy augury. There is special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, 'tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come. The readiness is all. Since no man of aught he leaves knows, what is't to leave betimes? Let be. 185

[A table prepared. Enter TRUMPETS, DRUMS, and OFFICERS with cushions; KING, QUEEN, OSRIC and ATTENDANTS with foils, daggers, and LAERTES.]

KING: Come, Hamlet, come and take this hand from me.

[The KING puts LAERTES' hand into HAMLET'S.]

HAMLET: Give me your pardon, sir. I have done you wrong, But pardon 't as you are a gentleman. 190

This presence² knows, and you must needs have heard, How I am punished with a sore distraction.

What I have done

That might your nature, honor, and exception,³

Roughly awake, I here proclaim was madness. 195

Was 't Hamlet wronged Laertes? Never Hamlet.

If Hamlet from himself be ta'en away,

And when he's not himself does wrong Laertes,

Then Hamlet does it not, Hamlet denies it.

Who does it then? His madness. If't be so, 200

6. Await. 7. Cordiality. 8. Uneasy. 9. Misgiving. 1. Coming. 2. Company. 3. Resentment.

Hamlet is of the faction that is wronged;
 His madness is poor Hamlet's enemy.
 Sir, in this audience,
 Let my disclaiming from⁴ a purposed evil
 205 Free⁵ me so far in your most generous thoughts
 That I have shot my arrow o'er the house
 And hurt my brother.

LAERTES: I am satisfied in nature,
 Whose motive in this case should stir me most
 To my revenge. But in my terms of honor
 210 I stand aloof, and will no reconcilment
 Till by some elder masters of known honor
 I have a voice⁶ and precedent of peace
 To keep my name ungoled.⁷ But till that time
 I do receive your offered love like love,
 And will not wrong it.

215 HAMLET: I embrace it freely,
 And will this brother's wager frankly⁸ play.
 Give us the foils. Come on.

LAERTES: Come, one for me.
 HAMLET: I'll be your foil, Laertes. In mine ignorance
 Your skill shall, like a star i' th' darkest night,
 Stick fiery off⁹ indeed.

220 LAERTES: You mock me, sir.
 HAMLET: No, by this hand.
 KING: Give them the foils, young Osric. Cousin Hamlet,
 You know the wager?

HAMLET: Very well, my lord;
 Your Grace has laid the odds o' th' weaker side.

225 KING: I do not fear it, I have seen you both;
 But since he is bettered¹ we have therefore odds.

LAERTES: This is too heavy; let me see another.

HAMLET: This likes me well. These foils have all a² length?

[They prepare to play.]

OSRIC: Ay, my good lord.

230 KING: Set me the stoups of wine upon that table.
 If Hamlet give the first or second hit,
 Or quit in answer of³ the third exchange,
 Let all the battlements their ordnance fire.
 The king shall drink to Hamlet's better breath,
 235 And in the cup an union⁴ shall he throw,
 Richer than that which four successive kings
 In Denmark's crown have worn. Give me the cups,
 And let the kettle⁵ to the trumpet speak,

4. Denying of. 5. Absolve. 6. Authority. 7. Unshamed. 8. Freely. 9. Shine brightly.
 1. Reported better. 2. The same. Likes: suits. 3. Repay. 4. Pearl. 5. Kettledrum.

The trumpet to the cannoneer without,
 The cannons to the heavens, the heaven to earth, 240
 "Now the king drinks to Hamlet." Come, begin—

[Trumpets the while.]

And you, the judges, bear a wary eye.

HAMLET: Come on, sir.

LAERTES: Come, my lord.

[They play.]

HAMLET: One.

LAERTES: No.

HAMLET: Judgment?

OSRIC: A hit, a very palpable hit.

[Drums, trumpets, and shot. Flourish; a piece goes off.]

LAERTES: Well, again. 245

KING: Stay, give me drink. Hamlet, this pearl is thine.

Here's to thy health. Give him the cup.

HAMLET: I'll play this bout first; set it by awhile.

Come.

[They play.]

Another hit; what say you? 250

LAERTES: A touch, a touch, I do confess't.

KING: Our son shall win.

QUEEN: He's fat,⁶ and scant of breath.

Here, Hamlet, take my napkin, rub thy brows.

The queen carouses to thy fortune, Hamlet.

HAMLET: Good madam! 255

KING: Gertrude, do not drink.

QUEEN: I will, my lord; I pray you pardon me.

KING: [Aside.] It is the poisoned cup; it is too late.

HAMLET: I dare not drink yet, madam; by and by.

QUEEN: Come, let me wipe thy face. 260

LAERTES: My lord, I'll hit him now.

KING: I do not think't.

LAERTES: [Aside.] And yet it is almost against my conscience.

HAMLET: Come, for the third, Laertes. You do but dally.

I pray you pass⁷ with your best violence;

I am afeard you make a wanton of me.⁸ 265

LAERTES: Say you so? Come on.

[They play.]

OSRIC: Nothing, neither way.

LAERTES: Have at you now!

6. Out of shape. 7. Attack. 8. Trifle with me.

[LAERTES wounds HAMLET: then, in scuffling, they change rapiers, and HAMLET wounds LAERTES.]

KING: Part them. They are incensed.

270 HAMLET: Nay, come again.

[The QUEEN falls.]

OSRIC: Look to the queen there, ho!

HORATIO: They bleed on both sides. How is it, my lord?

OSRIC: How is't, Laertes?

LAERTES: Why, as a woodcock to mine own springe,⁹ Osric.

275 I am justly killed with mine own treachery.

HAMLET: How does the queen?

KING: She swoons to see them bleed.

QUEEN: No, no, the drink, the drink! O my dear Hamlet!

The drink, the drink! I am poisoned.

[Dies.]

HAMLET: O, villainy! Ho! let the door be locked.

280 Treachery! seek it out.

LAERTES: It is here, Hamlet. Hamlet, thou art slain;

No med'cine in the world can do thee good.

In thee there is not half an hour's life.

The treacherous instrument is in thy hand,

285 Unbated¹ and envenomed. The foul practice

Hath turned itself on me. Lo, here I lie,

Never to rise again. Thy mother's poisoned.

I can no more. The king, the king's to blame.

HAMLET: The point envenomed too?

290 Then, venom, to thy work.

[Hurts the KING.]

ALL: Treason! treason!

KING: O, yet defend me, friends. I am but hurt.²

HAMLET: Here, thou incestuous, murd'rous, damnèd Dane,

Drink off this potion. Is thy union here?

Follow my mother.

[The KING dies.]

295 LAERTES: He is justly served.

It is a poison tempered³ by himself.

Exchange forgiveness with me, noble Hamlet.

Mine and my father's death come not upon thee,

Nor thine on me!

[Dies.]

300 HAMLET: Heaven make thee free of⁴ it! I follow thee.

I am dead, Horatio. Wretched queen, adieu!

You that look pale and tremble at this chance,⁵

That are but mutes or audience to this act,

Had I but time, as this fell sergeant Death

9. Snare. 1. Unblunted. 2. Wounded. 3. Mixed. 4. Forgive. 5. Circumstance.

Is strict in his arrest,⁶ O, I could tell you— 305
 But let it be. Horatio, I am dead:
 Thou livest; report me and my cause aright
 To the unsatisfied.⁷

HORATIO: Never believe it.
 I am more an antique Roman than a Dane.
 Here's yet some liquor left.

HAMLET: As th'art a man, 310
 Give me the cup. Let go. By heaven, I'll ha't.
 O God, Horatio, what a wounded name,
 Things standing thus unknown, shall live behind me!
 If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,
 Absent thee from felicity awhile, 315
 And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain,
 To tell my story.

[A march afar off.]

What warlike noise is this?

OSRIC: Young Fortinbras, with conquest come from Poland,
 To th' ambassadors of England gives
 This warlike volley.⁸

HAMLET: O, I die, Horatio! 320
 The potent poison quite o'er-crows⁹ my spirit.
 I cannot live to hear the news from England,
 But I do prophesy th' election¹ lights
 On Fortinbras. He has my dying voice.²
 So tell him, with th' occurrents,³ more and less, 325
 Which have solicited⁴—the rest is silence. [Dies.]

HORATIO: Now cracks a noble heart. Good night, sweet prince,
 And flights of angels sing thee to thy rest!

[March within.]

Why does the drum come hither?

[Enter FORTINBRAS, with the AMBASSADORS and with drum, colors, and ATTENDANTS.]

FORTINBRAS: Where is this sight?

HORATIO: What is it you would see? 330
 If aught of woe or wonder, cease your search.

FORTINBRAS: This quarry cries on havoc.⁵ O proud death,

6. Summons to court. 7. Uninformed.

8. The staging presents some difficulties here. Unless Osric is clairvoyant, he must have left the stage at some point and returned. One possibility is that he might have left to carry out Hamlet's order to lock the door (line 280) and returned when the sound of the distant march is heard.

9. Overcomes. 1. (Of a new king for Denmark.) 2. Support. 3. Circumstances.

4. Brought about this scene. 5. The game killed in the hunt proclaims a slaughter.

What feast is toward⁶ in thine eternal cell
 That thou so many princes at a shot
 So bloodily hast struck?

335 AMBASSADORS: The sight is dismal;
 And our affairs from England come too late.
 The ears are senseless⁷ that should give us hearing
 To tell him his commandment is fulfilled,
 That Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are dead.
 Where should we have our thanks?

340 HORATIO: Not from his mouth,
 Had it th' ability of life to thank you.
 He never gave commandment for their death.
 But since, so jump⁸ upon this bloody question,
 You from the Polack wars, and you from England,
 345 Are here arrived, give orders that these bodies
 High on a stage be placèd to the view,
 And let me speak to th' yet unknowing world
 How these things came about. So shall you hear
 Of carnal, bloody, and unnatural acts;

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. In A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM's best-known speech, Theseus asserts, "The lunatic, the lover, and the poet / Are of imagination all compact" (5.1.7–8). Citing evidence from the play, write an essay analyzing Shakespeare's characterization of love—not only in the play's action but also in the words of the love-obsessed characters. Is Shakespearean love merely a kind of madness, or does it contain hints of a guiding wisdom beyond the awareness of lovers themselves?
2. Early in A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM, Helena remarks, "Love looks not with the eyes, but with the mind" (1.1.234). The play is filled with references to eyes and vision; indeed, the plot hinges on the differences between what characters see and what they think they see. Using specific examples, write an essay exploring the significance of eyes, sight, and seeing in this play. What does the play suggest about the power and the limitations of human vision?
3. In ancient Greek tragedy, misfortune is often the result of hubris—the excessive pride that leads a hero to overstep the bounds of his destiny and thus to offend the gods. More recent writing about tragedy develops the concept of hamartia—the notion that the protagonist's fate is brought about by a tragic flaw or failing of character. What propels HAMLET—the prince's proud wish to avenge his father's death and assert his rights? a tragic flaw in Hamlet's otherwise noble character? or something else altogether? Write an essay examining the circumstances and motivations that lead to Hamlet's death and the fall of Denmark.
4. Some critics have focused on the psychological underpinnings of HAMLET; others have seen the play as political commentary. In 1600 (the approximate date of HAMLET's first performance), Queen Elizabeth I was sixty-seven and had no direct heirs, a situation that promised no end to the wars and rebellions over succession to the throne that had plagued England for the preceding two centuries. Drawing on the play and, if need be, your own research into the politics of Shakespeare's era, write an essay showing how England's historical circumstances may be reflected in HAMLET.
5. In both A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM and HAMLET, characters perform a play. What are the functions and effects of this device? What might the plays within plays suggest about the value of drama—including the value of plays like Shakespeare's own? What different attitudes toward drama are displayed by various characters in A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM and HAMLET? Write an essay exploring the function and significance of these plays within plays. What attitudes toward drama does Shakespeare encourage us to adopt?
6. Write an essay exploring the characterization of the socially lowly characters in A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM and HAMLET and their thematic significance. What might be noteworthy about when such characters appear in each play? Might some or all of these characters display a wisdom lacking in their social betters? If so, what is it, and is it the same or similar in the two plays?
7. Write an essay comparing the way relationships between fathers and daughters are portrayed in HAMLET and A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM. What might the plays suggest about how and why such relationships tend to go wrong? about how fathers should treat daughters and vice versa?

CULTURAL AND HISTORICAL CONTEXTS: LORRAINE HANSBERRY'S
A RAISIN IN THE SUN

Three different levels of time operate in most literary texts, including plays. First, a text represents a particular time—the temporal setting—in which the action takes place. We can call this plot time. Second, the text reflects the time when the author was writing, and, inevitably, the conditions and assumptions of that time inform the text's conception and style; this feature of textual time we may call authorial time. Third, readers read in a particular reader time, when conditions and assumptions may differ from those that obtain in either the text's or the author's present. (If we encounter a play on the stage, we might instead call this performance time.)

In some cases, plot, authorial, and reader time all differ. Wole Soyinka's Death and the King's Horseman, for example, is set in the early 1940s in the British colony of Nigeria. Yet it was written in the early 1970s, after Soyinka's country gained its independence. Thus, when we—as readers in the 2010s—read the play, three distinct historical and cultural contexts are operating at once. Values in these three times will not be identical. How we interpret the actions and thoughts of the characters in part depends not only on our own assumptions about what they should or might do, but also on what we know about the conditions that shaped people's lives in quite different historical and cultural milieus. Keeping these three contexts in mind as we read—and consciously making comparisons when we perceive conflicting values—is a vital part of our response and interpretation.

This can be equally true of plays that represent the times in which they were written. When Lorraine Hansberry's A Raisin in the Sun debuted in 1959, its audience watched scenes that might well have been unfolding at virtually the same moment just down the street. The stage directions, in fact, indicate that the action in the play occurs “in Chicago's Southside, sometime between World War II and the present.” In this case, almost no difference exists between plot time and authorial time. Indeed, the play asked its original audiences to believe that they were confronting life exactly as it was happening and being invited to consider issues of immediate consequence. And the play also drew, at least to some extent, on that audience's knowledge of current events, concerns, and issues—knowledge that we, living in a quite different reader time, may have to work to master.

Of course, this does not mean that A Raisin in the Sun or any great play can't speak to us unless we “study up” on the worlds about and in which it was written. “Inevitably, . . . every work belongs to a given moment,” as Wole Soyinka reminds us. But, he adds, “it transcends this” moment, too. Hansberry's play remains relevant in part because it shows us characters who are as hopeful, complex, funny, and flawed as we are. Indeed, one of Hansberry's major objectives was, as she explained in a letter, to “help . . . people to understand how we [‘Negroes’] are just as complicated as they are—and just as mixed up.” And we see her characters confronting questions that we face, too—about family, cultural and personal identity, gender, race and ethnicity, ambition, human dignity and honor, historical change, and generational conflict. Much of what happens in the play could and does still happen in our world, and in much the same way.

But not everything. Consider the abortion that Ruth Younger contemplates near the end of A Raisin in the Sun's first act. In 1959, abortion was illegal in the United States. Women who sought abortions had either to leave the country, usually traveling to Mexico or Puerto Rico (a relatively expensive option), or to seek out shady, back-alley practitioners like the one Ruth consults. Such abortionists typically had little medical expertise and often operated in highly unsanitary conditions. Disease and mortality rates were high, and some of the horror that the Younger family expresses at the thought of abortion can be attributed to reasonable fears about its physical consequences. But their horror also results from the moral and social stigma surrounding abortion. However individuals today might feel about the ethics of abortion, the law prohibited it in 1959, and public opinion weighed heavily against the practice. To appreciate Ruth's situation, understand other characters' responses, and imagine the original audience's reactions, it helps to know about the prevailing legal climate, as well as the various social attitudes and concerns of the day, especially within a respectable, proud, and aspiring African American family like the Youngers.

Some plays offer us a good deal of information about setting that is relevant to the interpretation of specific episodes. But sometimes we have to supply facts that the text doesn't give us. People may share some characteristics across ages and cultures, but behavior and motivation are often conditioned by historically and culturally specific circumstances. Often we have to adjust our expectations because the world of the play or that of its author differs greatly from our own. Identifying the play's setting—in time and place—and considering carefully the historical and cultural context in which the play was written can be crucial to understanding what happens and why.

The rest of this chapter seeks to introduce you to the contexts that inspired and shaped A Raisin in the Sun and to some of the historically specific conditions, concerns, and conflicts the play explores.

THE HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE OF A RAISIN IN THE SUN

The debut of A Raisin in the Sun was a significant historical and cultural event in its own right. The first play by an African American woman ever produced on Broadway, A Raisin in the Sun earned its creator, Lorraine Hansberry (1930–65), the New York Drama Critics Circle Award as the year's best play just two months after it opened. Hansberry thus became—at twenty-nine—the youngest American playwright, the first black writer, and only the fifth woman ever to receive this prestigious award. Yet when Hansberry's friend and fellow writer James Baldwin labeled her play a “historical achievement” of the greatest importance, he had something else in mind—the unprecedented way that A Raisin in the Sun brought African Americans into the theater and onto the stage. “I had never in my life seen so many black people in the theater,” Baldwin recalled. “And the reason was that never before, in the entire history of the American theater, had so much of the truth of black people's lives been seen on the stage. Black people [had] ignored the theater because the theater had always ignored them.” To

Lorraine Hansberry, 1959

Baldwin and others, A Raisin in the Sun was a “historical achievement” precisely because of its realism and contemporaneity, its truthful depiction of the sorts of lives lived by many ordinary African Americans in the late 1950s. In a sense, the play made history by accurately reflecting a historical and cultural reality previously ignored by dramatists.

THE GREAT MIGRATION

One factor that undoubtedly made the Younger family seem so realistic was the fact that their situation closely resembled that of the 6.5 million African Americans who moved from the rural South to the urban North between 1910 and 1970 as part of the Great Migration. Though these migrants settled in every northern city, the majority eventually made their homes in New York City and Chicago. By 1960, Chicago’s black population had grown to 813,000—25 percent of the city’s inhabitants.

Like Lena Younger and her husband, those migrant millions flew north on the wings of hope—hope for better jobs at higher wages and for greater safety and freedom than they enjoyed in the Jim Crow–era South. (By 1914, every southern state had passed “Jim Crow” laws mandating segregated railroad cars, waiting rooms, bathrooms, restaurants, theaters, recreation areas, and even hospitals.) Not coincidentally, migration increased when northern industries were expanding and when conditions in the South were particularly oppressive or violent. In the 1920s, when the Younger family would have arrived in Chicago, a government-sponsored report on race relations in that city pointed out that over 85 percent of the 2,881 lynchings that occurred in the United States between 1885 and 1918 occurred in southern states and “that numbers of migrants from towns where lynchings had occurred registered for jobs in Chicago very shortly after lynchings.” The same report also concluded that southern blacks were drawn to the city for more than economic reasons. When recent immigrants interviewed for the report were asked, “What do you like about the North?” their responses were remarkably similar:

1. Freedom in voting and conditions of colored people here.
2. Freedom and chance to make a living; privileges.
3. Freedom and opportunity to acquire something.

10. Freedom of speech and action. Can live without fear. No Jim Crow.

Songs and poems of the 1920s, as well as the African American press, fueled such hopes and imbued them with religious significance. The Great Migration was cast as the “Flight out of Egypt”; migrants were encouraged to see themselves as “Bound for the Promised Land,” “Going into Canaan.”

LIFE IN THE “BLACK METROPOLIS”

In reality, the vast majority of blacks who came north found themselves not in Canaan, but in the all-black, inner-city enclaves—the so-called Smoketowns, Bronzeveilles, and Black Belts—that had begun to develop in all of the North’s major cities before the First World War. In Chicago, that “distinct Negro world” was the South Side, a strip of land extending south along State Street from the Loop (the city’s central business district) and bounded by Lake Michigan (to the east), Chicago’s famous stockyards (to the west), and white neighborhoods (to the south). By the 1940s, the South Side had become what it remains to this day—“the largest contiguous settlement of African-Americans” (in the words of journalist Nicholas Lemann).

On the one hand, this “Black Metropolis” might well have looked to newcomers very like the African American Promised Land, a city within a city in which “a black person could be somebody.” By the 1940s, the South Side boasted bustling shopping districts; a spacious public park and lake-side beach; nationally known institutions such as the Regal Theater, the Savoy Ballroom, and the Hotel Grand; as well as countless movie houses and nightclubs featuring blues masters like Muddy Waters (1915–83), himself a migrant from the Mississippi Delta. It was also, as Lemann notes, home to the heavyweight boxing champion of the world (and the most famous black man in America), Joe Louis; the only black member of Congress, William Dawson; the most prominent black newspaper, the Defender; the largest black congregation, J. H. Jackson’s Oliver Baptist Church; the greatest black singer, Mahalia Jackson; and a host of lesser-known prosperous people[. . .].

Regal Theater, Chicago, 1953

Undoubtedly, the presence of so many African American luminaries, as well as the sheer existence of such a large black community, fueled the pride and aspirations of ordinary people like the Youngers.

On the other hand, however, those “prosperous people” were few and far between. And what lay between them were the thousands who, like the Youngers, occupied lower rungs of the social ladder. For even if northern cities offered African Americans greater economic opportunities than they enjoyed in the South, they were still paid much lower wages than their white counterparts, barred entirely from many good jobs, fired first in bad economic times, and hired last in good ones. In 1950 (nine years before A Raisin in the Sun’s debut), the African American unemployment rate in Chicago was about three times that of white workers. Of those Chicagoans who were employed, 70 percent of black men (versus 36 percent of white men) and 75 percent of black women (versus 33 percent of white women) held unskilled jobs. At the same time, 22 percent of black men and almost 36 percent of black women worked, like the Youngers, in the lowest, “service” sector—as cooks, maids, janitors, and chauffeurs; only 14 percent of white men and 11 percent of white women did so.

Housing and Residential Segregation

If the Youngers’ jobs make them representative, so, too, does the fact that they live in a small, “tired,” roach-infested apartment. In the 1940s, population density on the South Side averaged about 90,000 people per square mile (as compared with 20,000 in white neighborhoods). Landlords often charged South Side residents much higher rents than were charged elsewhere, while doing little to maintain the apartments hastily carved out of existing buildings. In their 1960 study Housing a Metropolis, sociologists Beverly Duncan and Philip M. Hauser estimated that Chicago's nonwhite renters were more than twice as likely as whites to live in substandard housing. For home-buyers in the South Side, the situation was even worse. Duncan and Hauser estimated that, in the late 1940s, those buyers paid 28 to 51 percent more than they would have in white neighborhoods. And they often got less for their money: In 1960, nonwhite homeowners were, according to the same source, six times as likely as their white counterparts to live in substandard homes.

Though Chicago's Black Belt expanded southward and westward throughout the Great Migration, this expansion meant movement into formerly white residential areas—an extraordinarily difficult, slow, and often violent process. This was so, as sociologists St. Clair Drake and Horace R. Cayton explain in their classic Black Metropolis (1945), “primarily because of white people's attitudes toward having Negroes as neighbors. Because some white Chicagoans do not wish colored neighbors, formal and informal social controls are used to isolate the latter within congested all-Negro neighborhoods.” The major “formal” means of maintaining residential segregation were restrictive covenants preventing property from being sold or rented to blacks. By 1930, about 75 percent of the city's residential property was bound by such agreements, while all agents who belonged to the real-estate trade association were bound by a code of ethics that forbade moving blacks into white areas. The Supreme Court declared such covenants legally unenforceable, though not themselves illegal, in 1948. But both before and after that time—in Chicago and every other northern U.S. city—violence was the chief “informal” means adopted by whites when restrictive covenants and codes failed. According to Drake and Cayton, almost five hundred attacks on black residents were reported in Chicago between 1945 and 1950, most involving arson. In 1956 and 1957 alone, 164 such racial “incidents” occurred.

It is here that Hansberry's personal experience intersects with the historical and cultural context about and in which she wrote, though her family was much more comfortably middle class than the fictional family she created. In 1938, when Hansberry was eight, her father, Carl—a prosperous real-estate broker and founder of one of Chicago's first black-owned banks—decided to test the legality of restrictive covenants by purchasing a house in an all-white neighborhood. When the local neighborhood association secured an injunction prohibiting him from occupying the property, Carl Hansberry, backed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), took the case all the way to the Supreme Court. Though he won the case (on a technicality) in 1940, his victory was a limited and costly one. As Lorraine Hansberry later recalled,

That fight [. . .] required that our family occupy the disputed property in a hellishly hostile “white neighborhood” in which, literally, howling mobs surrounded our house. One of their missiles almost took [my] life. [. . .] My memories [. . .] include being spat at, cursed, and pummeled in the daily trek to and from school. And I also remember my desperate and courageous mother, patrolling our house all night with a loaded German luger, doggedly guarding her four children, while my father fought [. . .] in the Washington court.

Crowded conditions in a Chicago tenement, 1941

[. . .] The cost, in emotional turmoil, time, and money [. . .] led to my father's early death as a permanently embittered exile in a foreign country when he saw that after such sacrificial efforts the Negroes of Chicago were as ghetto-locked as ever [. . .].

(The disillusioned Carl Hansberry was arranging to move his family to Mexico when he died in 1946.) Among other things, Hansberry's account of her experience might give readers of A Raisin in the Sun a deeper appreciation of the play's complex denouement and of the fact that its plot is propelled by a much-loved, hardworking father's death.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT

Hansberry's experiences remind us that the African American civil rights struggle was multifaceted and began well before the 1960s. Yet it was entering an entirely new phase in 1959. Just five years earlier, in 1954, the famous Brown v. Board of Education Supreme Court decision declared "separate but equal" education policies unconstitutional, initiating the long, often violent fight to integrate America's schools. One year later, in 1955, the Montgomery Bus Boycott began, eventually forcing full integration of public transportation and launching Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929–68) on his career as one of the nation's most famous and influential civil rights leaders. The modern civil rights movement had begun—one in which "gradualism" gave way to "direct action," and court battles to marches, sit-ins, and other forms of civil disobedience.

One factor propelling change was World War II (1939–45). James Baldwin was only one of many Americans to see that war as marking "a turning point in the Negro's relation to" his country because, as Baldwin wrote in The Fire Next Time (1963), a certain hope died, a certain respect for white Americans faded. One began to pity them, or to hate them. You must put yourself in the skin of a man who is wearing the uniform of his country, is a candidate for death in its defense, and who is called a

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., after being hit on a head by a rock at a housing discrimination protest in Chicago, 1966

“nigger” by his comrades-in-arms and his officers; who is almost always given the hardest, ugliest, most menial work to do; [. . .] who does not dance at the U.S.O. the night white soldiers dance there [. . .]; and who watches German prisoners of war being treated by Americans with more human dignity than he has ever received at their hands. And who, at the same time, as a human being, is far freer in a strange land than he has ever been at home [. . .]. You must consider what happens to this citizen, after all he has endured, when he returns home: search, in his shoes, for a job, for a place to live; ride, in his skin, on segregated buses; see, with his eyes, the signs saying “White” and “Colored” [. . .]; look into the eyes of his wife; look into the eyes of his son; listen, with his ears, to political speeches, North and South; imagine yourself being told to “wait.”

Though the modern civil rights movement involved people of every age, it was in some ways, as Howard Zinn would argue in 1964, the first major social movement in U.S. history “led by youngsters.” A political scientist and activist, Zinn was speaking specifically of the college students who, in 1960, began conducting sit-ins throughout the South and eventually formed the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). But Martin Luther King, Jr., was himself only twenty-six when he was chosen to lead the Montgomery boycott. In a sense, then, the modern civil rights movement was born out of the kinds of generational attitudes explored in A Raisin in the Sun. Hansberry, for example, described her father as “typical of a generation of Negroes who believed that the ‘American way’ could successfully be made to work to democratize the United States.” But, she said, it was “Negroes my own age and younger” who were beginning to question the “American way” and to advocate a more aggressively confrontational stance, “say[ing] that we must now lie down in the streets, tie up traffic, do whatever we can—take to the hills with guns if necessary—and fight back.”

Poster printed and distributed by SNCC in the late 1960s

Determined to act on their frustration in ways that their parents wouldn't or couldn't, thousands of young people—many the city-born children of the Great Migration—turned to activism in the 1950s and 1960s. Yet, through Walter's drinking and the crime at the heart of her play, Hansberry also subtly reminds us that there were other ways that frustration found expression. The very same impulses and emotions that inspired SNCC members to head south led many of their peers in a very different direction.

AFRICAN AMERICANS AND AFRICA

In A Raisin in the Sun, the differences between and within generations take a variety of shapes, but one such distinction whose meaning may be especially dependent on a knowledge of historical and cultural context involves the character Joseph Asagai. A Nigerian attending college in Chicago, Joseph plans to return home in order to help liberate his country from British colonial rule. Through him, Hansberry thus highlights parallels between the situation of blacks in the United States and in Africa, drawing on her audience's knowledge of contemporary events in Africa even as she suggests just how little real knowledge of Africa most Americans possess.

Historically speaking, Hansberry's (and Beneatha's) keen interest in both traditional African culture and events in contemporary Africa is no accident. As Earl Thorpe noted in 1959 (in an article excerpted below), various African American intellectuals and activists had worked to spread knowledge about Africa and to improve the situation of colonized Africans since at least the 1920s. But African American interest in Africa was becoming much more widespread and taking on a variety of unprecedented forms in the 1950s. Between the late 1950s and early 1970s more African Americans than ever before would, like Beneatha, seek to learn about, and embrace, their African cultural heritage, sometimes adopting African names, giving up hair straighteners in order to grow Afros, or wearing clothes modeled on African styles. Meanwhile, black activists drew inspiration from modern Africans' struggles to liberate their countries from colonial rule.

Between 1880 and 1912 all of Africa except Liberia and Ethiopia had come under the control of European powers. But in the 1950s, "the winds of change" suddenly began to blow hard across Africa, beginning in the north, where first Libya achieved independence (1951), and then Morocco, Sudan, and Tunisia (1956). In 1957 the process moved southward into sub-Saharan Africa when Britain's Gold Coast colony became independent Ghana. Thereafter, almost every year saw the birth of at least one new African nation. No wonder, then, that Africa was often in the news and on American minds in the 1950s and 1960s.

Developments in Africa stirred African American interest and pride for yet another reason. African independence was, in many cases, the result of hard-fought popular campaigns spearheaded by extraordinarily charismatic men very like Joseph Asagai, men educated partially in the West and quite familiar with its culture and ways, yet eager to liberate their people and to embrace and revitalize ancient African folkways. The first and most famous such leader to emerge on the world stage was Jomo Kenyatta (1893?–1978), whose career led him from an obscure village to the presidency of independent Kenya by way of the London School of Economics; a masterful book on the culture of his own people, the Kikuyu (Facing Mount Kenya [1938]), and a seven-year imprisonment for sedition against the British colonial state. At least in African American eyes, such leaders might very well seem like modern versions of the great warriors of African history and myth.

THE "AMERICANNES" OF A RAISIN IN THE SUN

As A Raisin in the Sun reminds us, however, the differences between African Americans and Africans are just as significant as their historical and cultural ties. And for all its characters' interest in Africa, A Raisin in the Sun is a distinctly American play in terms of both content and style. Hansberry herself was well aware of the way it complemented and contrasted with canonical American masterpieces such as Arthur Miller's DEATH OF A SALESMAN. As she pointed out, "Walter Younger is an American more than he is anything else," and there is "a simple line of descent between” her Walter and Miller’s Willy Loman—“the last great hero in American drama to also accept the values of his [American] culture.”

Hansberry’s play offers you the perfect opportunity to think further about how historical and cultural contexts shape literary texts and how those texts speak both to their historical moment and to ours. To help you make the most of that opportunity, the rest of this chapter contains the text of the play, a timeline, and contextual materials. Most of those materials focus on three interrelated, but distinct, topics. The first section documents the various challenges that confronted African Americans in Chicago and other northern cities throughout the Great Migration and especially in the late 1950s and early 1960s, focusing particularly on residential segregation as viewed from the perspective of both African Americans (in the excerpts from novelist Richard Wright’s semiautobiographical TWELVE MILLION BLACK VOICES and a New York Times article by Gertrude Samuels) and their white counterparts (in Robert Gruenberg’s article on the effort to integrate one Chicago housing project). The second section turns to the aims and aspirations of African Americans in the late 1950s and early 1960s, particularly the way they tended to be understood as distinctly American and/or middle class, while the third section instead considers African Americans’ changing attitudes toward Africa and Africans. All these contextual materials aim to bring more vividly to life the world out of which A Raisin in the Sun sprang and the historically and culturally specific conditions and concerns it explores. But the chapter ends with an excerpt that we hope will inspire you to think and talk, too, about the play’s relevance to our twenty-first-century world. That excerpt comes from CLYBOURNE PARK, a 2010 Pulitzer Prize–winning play that, by revisiting and updating settings, situations, and characters from Hansberry’s play, artfully invites us to ponder how America has and hasn’t changed since 1959.

LORRAINE HANSBERRY

A Raisin in the Sun

What happens to a dream deferred?

Does it dry up

Like a raisin in the sun?

Or fester like a sore—

And then run?

Does it stink like rotten meat?

Or crust and sugar over—

Like a syrupy sweet?

Maybe it just sags

Like a heavy load.

Or does it explode?

ACT I

Scene One

The Younger living room would be a comfortable and well-ordered room if it were not for a number of indestructible contradictions to this state of being. Its furnishings are typical and undistinguished and their primary feature now is that they have clearly had to accommodate the living of too many people for too many years—and they are tired. Still, we can see that at some time, a time probably no longer remembered by the family (except perhaps for MAMA), the furnishings of this room were actually selected with care and love and even hope—and brought to this apartment and arranged with taste and pride.

That was a long time ago. Now the once loved pattern of the couch upholstery has to fight to show itself from under acres of crocheted doilies and couch covers which have themselves finally come to be more important than the upholstery. And here a table or a chair has been moved to disguise the worn places in the carpet; but the carpet has fought back by showing its weariness, with depressing uniformity, elsewhere on its surface.

Weariness has, in fact, won in this room. Everything has been polished, washed, sat on, used, scrubbed too often. All pretenses but living itself have long since vanished from the very atmosphere of this room.

Moreover, a section of this room, for it is not really a room unto itself, though the landlord's lease would make it seem so, slopes backward to provide a small kitchen area, where the family prepares the meals that are eaten in the living room proper, which must also serve as dining room. The single window that has been provided for these "two" rooms is located in this kitchen area. The sole natural light the family may enjoy in the course of a day is only that which fights its way through this little window.

At left, a door leads to a bedroom which is shared by MAMA and her daughter, BENEATHA. At right, opposite, is a second room (which in the beginning of the life of this apartment was probably a breakfast room) which serves as a bedroom for WALTER and his wife, RUTH.

Time: Sometime between World War II and the present.

Place: Chicago's Southside.

At Rise: It is morning dark in the living room. TRAVIS is asleep on the make-down bed at center. An alarm clock sounds from within the bedroom at right, and presently RUTH enters from that room and closes the door behind her. She crosses sleepily toward the window. As she passes her sleeping son she reaches down and shakes him a little. At the window she raises the shade and a dusky Southside morning light comes in feebly. She fills a pot with water and puts it on to boil. She calls to the boy, between yawns, in a slightly muffled voice.

RUTH is about thirty. We can see that she was a pretty girl, even exceptionally so, but now it is apparent that life has been little that she expected, and disappointment has already begun to hang in her face. In a few years, before thirty-five even, she will be known among her people as a "settled woman."

She crosses to her son and gives him a good, final, rousing shake.

RUTH: Come on now, boy, it's seven thirty! [Her son sits up at last, in a stupor of sleepiness.] I say hurry up, Travis! You ain't the only person in the world got to use a bathroom! [The child, a sturdy, handsome little boy of ten or eleven, drags himself out of the bed and almost blindly takes his towels and "today's clothes" from drawers and a closet and goes out to the bathroom, which is in an outside hall and which is shared by another family or families on the same floor. RUTH crosses to the bedroom door at right and opens it and calls in to her husband.] Walter Lee! . . . It's after seven thirty! Lemme see you do some waking up in there now! [She waits.] You better get up from there, man! It's after seven thirty I tell you. [She waits again.] All right, you just go ahead and lay there and next thing you know Travis be finished and Mr. Johnson'll be in there and you'll be fussing and cussing round here like a mad man! And be late too! [She waits, at the end of patience.] Walter Lee—it's time for you to get up!

[She waits another second and then starts to go into the bedroom, but is apparently satisfied that her husband has begun to get up. She stops, pulls the door to, and returns to the kitchen area. She wipes her face with a moist cloth and runs her fingers through her sleep-disheveled hair in a vain effort and ties an apron around her housecoat. The bedroom door at right opens and her husband stands in the doorway in his pajamas, which are rumpled and mismatched. He is a lean, intense young man in his middle thirties, inclined to quick nervous movements and erratic speech habits—and always in his voice there is a quality of indictment.]

WALTER: Is he out yet?

RUTH: What you mean out? He ain't hardly got in there good yet.

WALTER: [Wandering in, still more oriented to sleep than to a new day.] Well, what was you doing all that yelling for if I can't even get in there yet? [Stopping and thinking.] Check coming today?

RUTH: They said Saturday and this is just Friday and I hopes to God you ain't going to get up here first thing this morning and start talking to me 'bout no money—'cause I 'bout don't want to hear it.

WALTER: Something the matter with you this morning?

RUTH: No—I'm just sleepy as the devil. What kind of eggs you want?

WALTER: Not scrambled. [RUTH starts to scramble eggs.] Paper come? [RUTH points impatiently to the rolled up Tribune on the table, and he gets it and spreads it out and vaguely reads the front page.] Set off another bomb yesterday.

RUTH: [Maximum indifference.] Did they?

WALTER: [Looking up.] What's the matter with you?

RUTH: Ain't nothing the matter with me. And don't keep asking me that this morning.

WALTER: Ain't nobody bothering you. [Reading the news of the day absently again.] Say Colonel McCormick² is sick.

RUTH: [Affecting tea-party interest.] Is he now? Poor thing.

WALTER: [Sighing and looking at his watch.] Oh, me. [He waits.] Now what is that boy doing in that bathroom all this time? He just going to have to start getting up earlier. I can't be late to work on account of him fooling around in there.

RUTH: [Turning on him.] Oh, no he ain't going to be getting up no earlier no such thing! It ain't his fault that he can't get to bed no earlier nights 'cause he got a bunch of crazy good-for-nothing clowns sitting up running their mouths in what is supposed to be his bedroom after ten o'clock at night . . .

2. Robert Rutherford McCormick (1880–1955), owner-publisher of the Chicago Tribune.

WALTER: That's what you mad about, ain't it? The things I want to talk about with my friends just couldn't be important in your mind, could they?

[He rises and finds a cigarette in her handbag on the table and crosses to the little window and looks out, smoking and deeply enjoying this first one.]

RUTH: [Almost matter of factly, a complaint too automatic to deserve emphasis.] Why you always got to smoke before you eat in the morning?

WALTER: [At the window.] Just look at 'em down there . . . Running and racing to work . . . [He turns and faces his wife and watches her a moment at the stove, and then, suddenly.] You look young this morning, baby.

RUTH: [Indifferently.] Yeah?

WALTER: Just for a second—stirring them eggs. It's gone now—just for a second it was—you looked real young again. [Then, drily.] It's gone now—you look like yourself again.

RUTH: Man, if you don't shut up and leave me alone.

WALTER: [Looking out to the street again.] First thing a man ought to learn in life is not to make love to no colored woman first thing in the morning. You all some evil people at eight o'clock in the morning.

[TRAVIS appears in the hall doorway, almost fully dressed and quite wide awake now, his towels and pajamas across his shoulders. He opens the door and signals for his father to make the bathroom in a hurry.]

TRAVIS: [Watching the bathroom.] Daddy, come on!

[WALTER gets his bathroom utensils and flies out to the bathroom.]

RUTH: Sit down and have your breakfast, Travis.

TRAVIS: Mama, this is Friday. [Gleefully.] Check coming tomorrow, huh?

RUTH: You get your mind off money and eat your breakfast.

TRAVIS: [Eating.] This is the morning we supposed to bring the fifty cents to school.

RUTH: Well, I ain't got no fifty cents this morning.

TRAVIS: Teacher say we have to.

RUTH: I don't care what teacher say. I ain't got it. Eat your breakfast, Travis.

TRAVIS: I am eating.

RUTH: Hush up now and just eat!

[The boy gives her an exasperated look for her lack of understanding, and eats grudgingly.]

TRAVIS: You think Grandmama would have it?

RUTH: No! And I want you to stop asking your grandmother for money, you hear me?

TRAVIS: [Outraged.] Gaaaleee! I don't ask her, she just gimme it sometimes!

RUTH: Travis Willard Younger—I got too much on me this morning to be—

TRAVIS: Maybe Daddy—

RUTH: Travis!

[The boy hushes abruptly. They are both quiet and tense for several seconds.]

TRAVIS: [Presently.] Could I maybe go carry some groceries in front of the supermarket for a little while after school then?

RUTH: Just hush, I said. [TRAVIS jabs his spoon into his cereal bowl viciously, and rests his head in anger upon his fists.] If you through eating, you can get over there and make up your bed.

[The boy obeys stiffly and crosses the room, almost mechanically, to the bed and more or less carefully folds the covering. He carries the bedding into his mother's room and returns with his books and cap.]

TRAVIS: [Sulking and standing apart from her unnaturally.] I'm gone.

RUTH: [Looking up from the stove to inspect him automatically.] Come here. [He crosses to her and she studies his head.] If you don't take this comb and fix this here head, you better! [TRAVIS puts down his books with a great sigh of oppression, and crosses to the mirror. His mother mutters under her breath about his "slubbornness."] 'Bout to march out of here with that head looking just like chickens slept in it! I just don't know where you get your slubborn ways . . . And get your jacket, too. Looks chilly out this morning.

TRAVIS: [With conspicuously brushed hair and jacket.] I'm gone.

RUTH: Get carfare and milk money—[Waving one finger.—]—and not a single penny for no caps, you hear me?

TRAVIS: [With sullen politeness.] Yes'm.

[He turns in outrage to leave. His mother watches after him as in his frustration he approaches the door almost comically. When she speaks to him, her voice has become a very gentle tease.]

RUTH: [Mocking; as she thinks he would say it.] Oh, Mama makes me so mad sometimes, I don't know what to do! [She waits and continues to his back as he stands stock-still in front of the door.] I wouldn't kiss that woman good-bye for nothing in this world this morning! [The boy finally turns around and rolls his eyes at her, knowing the mood has changed and he is vindicated; he does not, however, move toward her yet.] Not for nothing in this world! [She finally laughs aloud at him and holds out her arms to him and we see that it is a way between them, very old and practiced. He crosses to her and allows her to embrace him warmly but keeps his face fixed with masculine rigidity. She holds him back from her presently and looks at him and runs her fingers over the features of his face. With utter gentleness—] Now—whose little old angry man are you?

TRAVIS: [The masculinity and gruffness start to fade at last.] Aw gaalee—Mama . . .

RUTH: [Mimicking.] Aw—gaaaaalleeeee, Mama! [She pushes him, with rough playfulness and finality, toward the door.] Get on out of here or you going to be late.

TRAVIS: [In the face of love, new aggressiveness.] Mama, could I please go carry groceries?

RUTH: Honey, it's starting to get so cold evenings.

WALTER: [Coming in from the bathroom and drawing a make-believe gun from a make-believe holster and shooting at his son.] What is it he wants to do?

RUTH: Go carry groceries after school at the supermarket.

WALTER: Well, let him go . . .

TRAVIS: [Quickly, to the ally.] I have to—she won't gimme the fifty cents . . .

WALTER: [To his wife only.] Why not?

RUTH: [Simply, and with flavor.] 'Cause we don't have it.

WALTER: [To RUTH only.] What you tell the boy things like that for? [Reaching down into his pants with a rather important gesture.] Here, son—

[He hands the boy the coin, but his eyes are directed to his wife's. TRAVIS takes the money happily.]

TRAVIS: Thanks, Daddy.

[He starts out. RUTH watches both of them with murder in her eyes. WALTER stands and stares back at her with defiance, and suddenly reaches into his pocket again on an afterthought.]

WALTER: [Without even looking at his son, still staring hard at his wife.] In fact, here's another fifty cents . . . Buy yourself some fruit today—or take a taxicab to school or something!

TRAVIS: Whoopee—

[He leaps up and clasps his father around the middle with his legs, and they face each other in mutual appreciation; slowly WALTER LEE peeks around the boy to catch the violent rays from his wife's eyes and draws his head back as if shot.]

WALTER: You better get down now—and get to school, man.

TRAVIS: [At the door.] O.K. Good-bye.

[He exits.]

WALTER: [After him, pointing with pride.] That's my boy. [She looks at him in disgust and turns back to her work.] You know what I was thinking 'bout in the bathroom this morning?

RUTH: No.

WALTER: How come you always try to be so pleasant!

RUTH: What is there to be pleasant 'bout!

WALTER: You want to know what I was thinking 'bout in the bathroom or not!

RUTH: I know what you thinking 'bout.

WALTER: [Ignoring her.] 'Bout what me and Willy Harris was talking about last night.

RUTH: [Immediately—a refrain.] Willy Harris is a good-for-nothing loud mouth.

WALTER: Anybody who talks to me has got to be a good-for-nothing loud mouth, ain't he? And what you know about who is just a good-for-nothing loud mouth? Charlie Atkins was just a "good-for-nothing loud mouth" too, wasn't he! When he wanted me to go in the dry-cleaning business with him. And now—he's grossing a hundred thousand a year. A hundred thousand dollars a year! You still call him a loud mouth!

RUTH: [Bitterly.] Oh, Walter Lee . . .

[She folds her head on her arms over the table.]

WALTER: [Rising and coming to her and standing over her.] You tired, ain't you? Tired of everything. Me, the boy, the way we live—this beat-up hole—everything.

Ain't you? [She doesn't look up, doesn't answer.] So tired—moaning and groaning all the time, but you wouldn't do nothing to help, would you? You couldn't be on my side that long for nothing, could you?

RUTH: Walter, please leave me alone.

WALTER: A man needs for a woman to back him up . . .

RUTH: Walter—

WALTER: Mama would listen to you. You know she listen to you more than she do me and Bennie. She think more of you. All you have to do is just sit down with her when you drinking your coffee one morning and talking 'bout things like you do and— [He sits down beside her and demonstrates graphically what he thinks her methods and tone should be.] —you just sip your coffee, see, and say easy like that you been thinking 'bout that deal Walter Lee is so interested in, 'bout the store and all, and sip some more coffee, like what you saying ain't really that important to you—And the next thing you know, she be listening good and asking you questions and when I come home—I can tell her the details. This ain't no fly-by-night proposition, baby. I mean we figured it out, me and Willy and Bobo.

RUTH: [With a frown.] Bobo?

WALTER: Yeah. You see, this little liquor store we got in mind cost seventy-five thousand and we figured the initial investment on the place be 'bout thirty thousand, see. That be ten thousand each. Course, there's a couple of hundred you got to pay so's you don't spend your life just waiting for them clowns to let your license get approved—

RUTH: You mean graft?

WALTER: [Frowning impatiently.] Don't call it that. See there, that just goes to show you what women understand about the world. Baby, don't nothing happen for you in this world 'less you pay somebody off!

RUTH: Walter, leave me alone! [She raises her head and stares at him vigorously—then says, more quietly.] Eat your eggs, they gonna be cold.

WALTER: [Straightening up from her and looking off.] That's it. There you are. Man say to his woman: I got me a dream. His woman say: Eat your eggs. [Sadly, but gaining in power.] Man say: I got to take hold of this here world, baby! And a woman will say: Eat your eggs and go to work. [Passionately now.] Man say: I got to change my life, I'm choking to death, baby! And his woman say— [In utter anguish as he brings his fists down on his thighs.] —Your eggs is getting cold!

RUTH: [Softly.] Walter, that ain't none of our money.

WALTER: [Not listening at all or even looking at her.] This morning, I was lookin' in the mirror and thinking about it . . . I'm thirty-five years old; I been married eleven years and I got a boy who sleeps in the living room— [Very, very quietly.] —and all I got to give him is stories about how rich white people live . . .

RUTH: Eat your eggs, Walter.

WALTER: Damn my eggs . . . damn all the eggs that ever was!

RUTH: Then go to work.

WALTER: [Looking up at her.] See—I'm trying to talk to you 'bout myself— [Shaking his head with the repetition.] —and all you can say is eat them eggs and go to work.

RUTH: [Wearily.] Honey, you never say nothing new. I listen to you every day, every night and every morning, and you never say nothing new. [Shrugging.] So you would rather be Mr. Arnold than be his chauffeur. So—I would rather be living in Buckingham Palace.³

WALTER: That is just what is wrong with the colored woman in this world . . . Don't understand about building their men up and making 'em feel like they somebody. Like they can do something.

RUTH: [Drily, but to hurt.] There are colored men who do things.

WALTER: No thanks to the colored woman.

RUTH: Well, being a colored woman, I guess I can't help myself none.

[She rises and gets the ironing board and sets it up and attacks a huge pile of rough-dried clothes, sprinkling them in preparation for the ironing and then rolling them into tight fat balls.]

WALTER: [Mumbling.] We one group of men tied to a race of women with small minds.

[His sister BENEATHA enters. She is about twenty, as slim and intense as her brother. She is not as pretty as her sister-in-law, but her lean, almost intellectual face has a handsomeness of its own. She wears a bright-red flannel nightie, and her thick hair stands wildly about her head. Her speech is a mixture of many things; it is different from the rest of the family's insofar as education has permeated her sense of English—and perhaps the Midwest rather than the South has finally—at last—won out in her inflection; but not altogether, because over all of it is a soft slurring and transformed use of vowels which is the decided influence of the Southside. She passes through the room without looking at either RUTH or WALTER and goes to the outside door and looks, a little blindly, out to the bathroom. She sees that it has been lost to the Johnsons. She closes the door with a sleepy vengeance and crosses to the table and sits down a little defeated.]

BENEATHA: I am going to start timing those people.

WALTER: You should get up earlier.

BENEATHA: [Her face in her hands. She is still fighting the urge to go back to bed.]

Really—would you suggest dawn? Where's the paper?

WALTER: [Pushing the paper across the table to her as he studies her almost clinically, as though he has never seen her before.] You a horrible-looking chick at this hour.

BENEATHA: [Drily.] Good morning, everybody.

WALTER: [Senselessly.] How is school coming?

BENEATHA: [In the same spirit.] Lovely. Lovely. And you know, biology is the greatest. [Looking up at him.] I dissected something that looked just like you yesterday.

WALTER: I just wondered if you've made up your mind and everything.

BENEATHA: [Gaining in sharpness and impatience.] And what did I answer yesterday morning—and the day before that?

3. London residence of the queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

RUTH: [From the ironing board, like someone disinterested and old.] Don't be so nasty, Bennie.

BENEATHA: [Still to her brother.] And the day before that and the day before that!

WALTER: [Defensively.] I'm interested in you. Something wrong with that? Ain't many girls who decide—

WALTER AND BENEATHA: [In unison.]—"to be a doctor."

[Silence.]

WALTER: Have we figured out yet just exactly how much medical school is going to cost?

RUTH: Walter Lee, why don't you leave that girl alone and get out of here to work?

BENEATHA: [Exits to the bathroom and bangs on the door.] Come on out of there, please!

[She comes back into the room.]

WALTER: [Looking at his sister intently.] You know the check is coming tomorrow.

BENEATHA: [Turning on him with a sharpness all her own.] That money belongs to Mama, Walter, and it's for her to decide how she wants to use it. I don't care if she wants to buy a house or a rocket ship or just nail it up somewhere and look at it. It's hers. Not ours—hers.

WALTER: [Bitterly.] Now ain't that fine! You just got your mother's interest at heart, ain't you, girl? You such a nice girl—but if Mama got that money she can always take a few thousand and help you through school too—can't she?

BENEATHA: I have never asked anyone around here to do anything for me.

WALTER: No! And the line between asking and just accepting when the time comes is big and wide—ain't it!

BENEATHA: [With fury.] What do you want from me, Brother—that I quit school or just drop dead, which!

WALTER: I don't want nothing but for you to stop acting holy 'round here. Me and Ruth done made some sacrifices for you—why can't you do something for the family?

RUTH: Walter, don't be dragging me in it.

WALTER: You are in it—Don't you get up and go work in somebody's kitchen for the last three years to help put clothes on her back?

RUTH: Oh, Walter—that's not fair . . .

WALTER: It ain't that nobody expects you to get on your knees and say thank you, Brother; thank you, Ruth; thank you, Mama—and thank you, Travis, for wearing the same pair of shoes for two semesters—

BENEATHA: [Dropping to her knees.] Well—I do—all right?—thank everybody . . . and forgive me for ever wanting to be anything at all . . . forgive me, forgive me!

RUTH: Please stop it! Your mama'll hear you.

WALTER: Who the hell told you you had to be a doctor? If you so crazy 'bout messing 'round with sick people—then go be a nurse like other women—or just get married and be quiet . . .

BENEATHA: Well—you finally got it said . . . it took you three years but you finally got it said. Walter, give up; leave me alone—it's Mama's money.

WALTER: He was my father, too!

BENEATHA: So what? He was mine, too—and Travis' grandfather—but the insurance money belongs to Mama. Picking on me is not going to make her give it to you to invest in any liquor stores— [Underbreath, dropping into a chair.] — and I for one say, God bless Mama for that!

WALTER: [To RUTH.] See—did you hear? Did you hear!

RUTH: Honey, please go to work.

WALTER: Nobody in this house is ever going to understand me.

BENEATHA: Because you're a nut.

WALTER: Who's a nut?

BENEATHA: You—you are a nut. Thee is mad, boy.

WALTER: [Looking at his wife and his sister from the door, very sadly.] The world's most backward race of people, and that's a fact.

BENEATHA: [Turning slowly in her chair.] And then there are all those prophets who would lead us out of the wilderness—. [WALTER slams out of the house.] — into the swamps!

RUTH: Bennie, why you always gotta be pickin' on your brother? Can't you be a little sweeter sometimes? [Door opens. WALTER walks in.]

WALTER: [To RUTH.] I need some money for carfare.

RUTH: [Looks at him, then warms; teasing, but tenderly.] Fifty cents? [She goes to her bag and gets money.] Here, take a taxi.

[WALTER exits. MAMA enters. She is a woman in her early sixties, full-bodied and strong. She is one of those women of a certain grace and beauty who wear it so unobtrusively that it takes a while to notice. Her dark-brown face is surrounded by the total whiteness of her hair, and, being a woman who has adjusted to many things in life and overcome many more, her face is full of strength. She has, we can see, wit and faith of a kind that keep her eyes lit and full of interest and expectancy. She is, in a word, a beautiful woman. Her bearing is perhaps most like the noble bearing of the women of the Hereros of Southwest Africa—rather as if she imagines that as she walks she still bears a basket or a vessel upon her head. Her speech, on the other hand, is as careless as her carriage is precise—she is inclined to slur everything—but her voice is perhaps not so much quiet as simply soft.]

MAMA: Who that 'round here slamming doors at this hour?

[She crosses through the room, goes to the window, opens it, and brings in a feeble little plant growing doggedly in a small pot on the window sill. She feels the dirt and puts it back out.]

RUTH: That was Walter Lee. He and Bennie was at it again.

MAMA: My children and they tempers. Lord, if this little old plant don't get more sun than it's been getting it ain't never going to see spring again. [She turns from the window.] What's the matter with you this morning, Ruth? You looks right peaked. You aiming to iron all them things? Leave some for me. I'll get to 'em this afternoon. Bennie honey, it's too drafty for you to be sitting 'round half dressed. Where's your robe?

BENEATHA: In the cleaners.

MAMA: Well, go get mine and put it on.

BENEATHA: I'm not cold, Mama, honest.

MAMA: I know—but you so thin . . .

BENEATHA: [Irritably.] Mama, I'm not cold.

MAMA: [Seeing the make-down bed as TRAVIS has left it.] Lord have mercy, look at that poor bed. Bless his heart—he tries, don't he?

[She moves to the bed TRAVIS has sloppily made up.]

RUTH: No—he don't half try at all 'cause he knows you going to come along behind him and fix everything. That's just how come he don't know how to do nothing right now—you done spoiled that boy so.

MAMA: Well—he's a little boy. Ain't supposed to know 'bout housekeeping. My baby, that's what he is. What you fix for his breakfast this morning?

RUTH: [Angrily.] I feed my son, Lena!

MAMA: I ain't meddling— [Underbreath; busy-bodyish.] I just noticed all last week he had cold cereal, and when it starts getting this chilly in the fall a child ought to have some hot grits or something when he goes out in the cold—

RUTH: [Furious.] I gave him hot oats—is that all right!

MAMA: I ain't meddling. [Pause.] Put a lot of nice butter on it? [RUTH shoots her an angry look and does not reply.] He likes lots of butter.

RUTH: [Exasperated.] Lena—

MAMA: [To BENEATHA. MAMA is inclined to wander conversationally sometimes.]

What was you and your brother fussing 'bout this morning?

BENEATHA: It's not important, Mama.

[She gets up and goes to look out at the bathroom, which is apparently free, and she picks up her towels and rushes out.]

MAMA: What was they fighting about?

RUTH: Now you know as well as I do.

MAMA: [Shaking her head.] Brother still worrying hisself sick about that money?

RUTH: You know he is.

MAMA: You had breakfast?

RUTH: Some coffee.

MAMA: Girl, you better start eating and looking after yourself better. You almost thin as Travis.

RUTH: Lena—

MAMA: Un-hunh?

RUTH: What are you going to do with it?

MAMA: Now don't you start, child. It's too early in the morning to be talking about money. It ain't Christian.

RUTH: It's just that he got his heart set on that store—

MAMA: You mean that liquor store that Willy Harris want him to invest in?

RUTH: Yes—

MAMA: We ain't no business people, Ruth. We just plain working folks.

RUTH: Ain't nobody business people till they go into business. Walter Lee say colored people ain't never going to start getting ahead till they start gambling on some different kinds of things in the world—investments and things.

MAMA: What done got into you, girl? Walter Lee done finally sold you on investing.

RUTH: No. Mama, something is happening between Walter and me. I don't know what it is—but he needs something—something I can't give him anymore. He needs this chance, Lena.

MAMA: [Frowning deeply.] But liquor, honey—

RUTH: Well—like Walter say—I spec people going to always be drinking themselves some liquor.

MAMA: Well—whether they drinks it or not ain't none of my business. But whether I go into business selling it to 'em is, and I don't want that on my ledger this late in life. [Stopping suddenly and studying her daughter-in-law.] Ruth Younger, what's the matter with you today? You look like you could fall over right there.

RUTH: I'm tired.

MAMA: Then you better stay home from work today.

RUTH: I can't stay home. She'd be calling up the agency and screaming at them, "My girl didn't come in today—send me somebody! My girl didn't come in!" Oh, she just have a fit . . .

MAMA: Well, let her have it. I'll just call her up and say you got the flu—

RUTH: [Laughing.] Why the flu?

MAMA: 'Cause it sounds respectable to 'em. Something white people get, too. They know 'bout the flu. Otherwise they think you been cut up or something when you tell 'em you sick.

RUTH: I got to go in. We need the money.

MAMA: Somebody would of thought my children done all but starved to death the way they talk about money here late. Child, we got a great big old check coming tomorrow.

RUTH: [Sincerely, but also self-righteously.] Now that's your money. It ain't got nothing to do with me. We all feel like that—Walter and Bennie and me—even Travis.

MAMA: [Thoughtfully, and suddenly very far away.] Ten thousand dollars—

RUTH: Sure is wonderful.

MAMA: Ten thousand dollars.

RUTH: You know what you should do, Miss Lena? You should take yourself a trip somewhere. To Europe or South America or someplace—

MAMA: [Throwing up her hands at the thought.] Oh, child!

RUTH: I'm serious. Just pack up and leave! Go on away and enjoy yourself some. Forget about the family and have yourself a ball for once in your life—

MAMA: [Drily.] You sound like I'm just about ready to die. Who'd go with me? What I look like wandering 'round Europe by myself?

RUTH: Shoot—these here rich white women do it all the time. They don't think nothing of packing up they suitcases and piling on one of them big steamships and—swoosh!—they gone, child.

MAMA: Something always told me I wasn't no rich white woman.

RUTH: Well—what are you going to do with it then?

MAMA: I ain't rightly decided. [Thinking. She speaks now with emphasis.] Some of it got to be put away for Beneatha and her schoolin'—and ain't nothing going to touch that part of it. Nothing. [She waits several seconds, trying to make up her mind about something, and looks at RUTH a little tentatively before going on.] Been thinking that we maybe could meet the notes on a little old two-story somewhere, with a yard where Travis could play in the summertime, if we use part of the insurance for a down payment and everybody kind of pitch in. I could maybe take on a little day work again, few days a week—

RUTH: [Studying her mother-in-law furtively and concentrating on her ironing, anxious to encourage without seeming to.] Well, Lord knows, we've put enough rent into this here rat trap to pay for four houses by now . . .

MAMA: [Looking up at the words "rat trap" and then looking around and leaning back and sighing—in a suddenly reflective mood—] "Rat trap"—yes, that's all it is. [Smiling.] I remember just as well the day me and Big Walter moved in here. Hadn't been married but two weeks and wasn't planning on living here no more than a year. [She shakes her head at the dissolved dream.] We was going to set away, little by little, don't you know, and buy a little place out in Morgan Park. We had even picked out the house. [Chuckling a little.] Looks right dumpy today. But Lord, child, you should know all the dreams I had 'bout buying that house and fixing it up and making me a little garden in the back— [She waits and stops smiling.] And didn't none of it happen.

[Dropping her hands in a futile gesture.]

RUTH: [Keeps her head down, ironing.] Yes, life can be a barrel of disappointments, sometimes.

MAMA: Honey, Big Walter would come in here some nights back then and slump down on that couch there and just look at the rug, and look at me and look at the rug and then back at me—and I'd know he was down then . . . really down. [After a second very long and thoughtful pause; she is seeing back to times that only she can see.] And then, Lord, when I lost that baby—little Claude—I almost thought I was going to lose Big Walter too. Oh, that man grieved hisself! He was one man to love his children.

RUTH: Ain't nothin' can tear at you like losin' your baby.

MAMA: I guess that's how come that man finally worked hisself to death like he done. Like he was fighting his own war with this here world that took his baby from him.

RUTH: He sure was a fine man, all right. I always liked Mr. Younger.

MAMA: Crazy 'bout his children! God knows there was plenty wrong with Walter Younger—hard-headed, mean, kind of wild with women—plenty wrong with him. But he sure loved his children. Always wanted them to have something—be something. That's where Brother gets all these notions, I reckon. Big Walter used to say, he'd get right wet in the eyes sometimes, lean his head back with the water standing in his eyes and say, "Seem like God didn't see fit to give the black man nothing but dreams—but He did give us children to make them dreams seem worthwhile." [She smiles.] He could talk like that, don't you know.

RUTH: Yes, he sure could. He was a good man, Mr. Younger.

MAMA: Yes, a fine man—just couldn't never catch up with his dreams, that's all.

[BENEATHA comes in, brushing her hair and looking up to the ceiling, where the sound of a vacuum cleaner has started up.]

BENEATHA: What could be so dirty on that woman's rugs that she has to vacuum them every single day?

RUTH: I wish certain young women 'round here who I could name would take inspiration about certain rugs in a certain apartment I could also mention.

BENEATHA: [Shrugging.] How much cleaning can a house need, for Christ's sakes.

MAMA: [Not liking the Lord's name used thus.] Bennie!

RUTH: Just listen to her—just listen!

BENEATHA: Oh, God!

MAMA: If you use the Lord's name just one more time—

BENEATHA: [A bit of a whine.] Oh, Mama—

RUTH: Fresh—just fresh as salt, this girl!

BENEATHA: [Drily.] Well—if the salt loses its savor⁴—

MAMA: Now that will do. I just ain't going to have you 'round here reciting the scriptures in vain—you hear me?

BENEATHA: How did I manage to get on everybody's wrong side by just walking into a room?

RUTH: If you weren't so fresh—

BENEATHA: Ruth, I'm twenty years old.

MAMA: What time you be home from school today?

BENEATHA: Kind of late. [With enthusiasm.] Madeline is going to start my guitar lessons today.

[MAMA and RUTH look up with the same expression.]

MAMA: Your what kind of lessons?

BENEATHA: Guitar.

RUTH: Oh, Father!

MAMA: How come you done taken it in your mind to learn to play the guitar?

BENEATHA: I just want to, that's all.

MAMA: [Smiling.] Lord, child, don't you know what to do with yourself? How long it going to be before you get tired of this now—like you got tired of that little play-acting group you joined last year? [Looking at RUTH.] And what was it the year before that?

RUTH: The horseback-riding club for which she bought that fifty-five-dollar riding habit that's been hanging in the closet ever since!

MAMA: [To BENEATHA.] Why you got to flit so from one thing to another, baby?

BENEATHA: [Sharply.] I just want to learn to play the guitar. Is there anything wrong with that?

MAMA: Ain't nobody trying to stop you. I just wonders sometimes why you has to flit so from one thing to another all the time. You ain't never done nothing with all that camera equipment you brought home—

BENEATHA: I don't flit! I—I experiment with different forms of expression—

RUTH: Like riding a horse?

BENEATHA: —People have to express themselves one way or another.

MAMA: What is it you want to express?

4. See Matthew 5:13: "You are the salt of the earth. But if the salt loses its taste, with what can it be seasoned? It is no longer good for anything but to be thrown out and trampled underfoot."

BENEATHA: [Angrily.] Me! [MAMA and RUTH look at each other and burst into raucous laughter.] Don't worry—I don't expect you to understand.

MAMA: [To change the subject.] Who you going out with tomorrow night?

BENEATHA: [With displeasure.] George Murchison again.

MAMA: [Pleased.] Oh—you getting a little sweet on him?

RUTH: You ask me, this child ain't sweet on nobody but herself— [Underbreath.] Express herself!

[They laugh.]

BENEATHA: Oh—I like George all right, Mama. I mean I like him enough to go out with him and stuff, but—

RUTH: [For devilment.] What does and stuff mean?

BENEATHA: Mind your own business.

MAMA: Stop picking at her now, Ruth. [A thoughtful pause, and then a suspicious sudden look at her daughter as she turns in her chair for emphasis.] What does it mean?

BENEATHA: [Wearily.] Oh, I just mean I couldn't ever really be serious about George. He's—he's so shallow.

RUTH: Shallow—what do you mean he's shallow? He's rich!

MAMA: Hush, Ruth.

BENEATHA: I know he's rich. He knows he's rich, too.

RUTH: Well—what other qualities a man got to have to satisfy you, little girl?

BENEATHA: You wouldn't even begin to understand. Anybody who married Walter could not possibly understand.

MAMA: [Outraged.] What kind of way is that to talk about your brother?

BENEATHA: Brother is a flip—let's face it.

MAMA: [To RUTH, helplessly.] What's a flip?

RUTH: [Glad to add kindling.] She's saying he's crazy.

BENEATHA: Not crazy. Brother isn't really crazy yet—he—he's an elaborate neurotic.

MAMA: Hush your mouth!

BENEATHA: As for George. Well. George looks good—he's got a beautiful car and he takes me to nice places and, as my sister-in-law says, he is probably the richest boy I will ever get to know and I even like him sometimes—but if the Youngers are sitting around waiting to see if their little Bennie is going to tie up the family with the Murchisons, they are wasting their time.

RUTH: You mean you wouldn't marry George Murchison if he asked you someday? That pretty, rich thing? Honey, I knew you was odd—BENEATHA: No I would not marry him if all I felt for him was what I feel now. Besides, George's family wouldn't really like it.

MAMA: Why not?

BENEATHA: Oh, Mama—The Murchisons are honest-to-God-real-live-rich colored people, and the only people in the world who are more snobbish than rich white people are rich colored people. I thought everybody knew that. I've met Mrs. Murchison. She's a scene!

MAMA: You must not dislike people 'cause they well off, honey.

BENEATHA: Why not? It makes just as much sense as disliking people 'cause they are poor, and lots of people do that.

RUTH: [A wisdom-of-the-ages manner. To MAMA.] Well, she'll get over some of this—BENEATHA: Get over it? What are you talking about, Ruth? Listen, I'm going to be a doctor. I'm not worried about who I'm going to marry yet—if I ever get married.

MAMA AND RUTH: If!

MAMA: Now, Bennie—

BENEATHA: Oh, I probably will . . . but first I'm going to be a doctor, and George, for one, still thinks that's pretty funny. I couldn't be bothered with that. I am going to be a doctor and everybody around here better understand that!

MAMA: [Kindly.] 'Course you going to be a doctor, honey, God willing.

BENEATHA: [Drily.] God hasn't got a thing to do with it.

MAMA: Beneatha—that just wasn't necessary.

BENEATHA: Well—neither is God. I get sick of hearing about God.

MAMA: Beneatha!

BENEATHA: I mean it! I'm just tired of hearing about God all the time. What has
 He got to do with anything? Does He pay tuition?

MAMA: You 'bout to get your fresh little jaw slapped!

RUTH: That's just what she needs, all right!

BENEATHA: Why? Why can't I say what I want to around here, like everybody else?

MAMA: It don't sound nice for a young girl to say things like that—you wasn't brought up that way. Me and your father went to trouble to get you and Brother to church every Sunday.

BENEATHA: Mama, you don't understand. It's all a matter of ideas, and God is just one idea I don't accept. It's not important. I am not going out and be immoral or commit crimes because I don't believe in God. I don't even think about it. It's just that I get tired of Him getting credit for all the things the human race achieves through its own stubborn effort. There simply is no blasted God—there is only man and it is he who makes miracles!

[MAMA absorbs this speech, studies her daughter and rises slowly and crosses to BENEATHA and slaps her powerfully across the face. After, there is only silence and the daughter drops her eyes from her mother's face, and MAMA is very tall before her.]

MAMA: Now—you say after me, in my mother's house there is still God. [There is a long pause and BENEATHA stares at the floor wordlessly. MAMA repeats the phrase with precision and cool emotion.] In my mother's house there is still God.

BENEATHA: In my mother's house there is still God.

[A long pause.]

MAMA: [*Walking away from BENEATHA, too disturbed for triumphant posture.
 Stopping and turning back to her daughter.*] There are some ideas we ain't going to have in this house. Not long as I am at the head of this family.

BENEATHA: Yes, ma'am.

[MAMA walks out of the room.]

RUTH: [Almost gently, with profound understanding.] You think you a woman, Bennie—but you still a little girl. What you did was childish—so you got treated like a child.

BENEATHA: I see. [Quietly.] I also see that everybody thinks it's all right for Mama to be a tyrant. But all the tyranny in the world will never put a God in the heavens!

[She picks up her books and goes out.]

RUTH: [Goes to MAMA's door.] She said she was sorry.

MAMA: [Coming out, going to her plant.] They frightens me, Ruth. My children.

RUTH: You got good children, Lena. They just a little off sometimes—but they're good.

MAMA: No—there's something come down between me and them that don't let us understand each other and I don't know what it is. One done almost lost his mind thinking 'bout money all the time and the other done commence to talk about things I can't seem to understand in no form or fashion. What is it that's changing, Ruth?

RUTH: [Soothingly, older than her years.] Now . . . you taking it all too seriously. You just got strong-willed children and it takes a strong woman like you to keep 'em in hand.

MAMA: [Looking at her plant and sprinkling a little water on it.] They spirited all right, my children. Got to admit they got spirit—Bennie and Walter. Like this little old plant that ain't never had enough sunshine or nothing—and look at it . . .

[She has her back to RUTH, who has had to stop ironing and lean against something and put the back of her hand to her forehead.]

RUTH: [Trying to keep MAMA from noticing.] You . . . sure . . . loves that little old thing, don't you? . . .

MAMA: Well, I always wanted me a garden like I used to see sometimes at the back of the houses down home. This plant is close as I ever got to having one. [She looks out of the window as she replaces the plant.] Lord, ain't nothing as dreary as the view from this window on a dreary day, is there? Why ain't you singing this morning, Ruth? Sing that "No Ways Tired." That song always lifts me up so— [She turns at last to see that RUTH has slipped quietly into a chair, in a state of semiconsciousness.] Ruth! Ruth honey—what's the matter with you . . . Ruth!

[CURTAIN.]

Scene Two

It is the following morning; a Saturday morning, and house cleaning is in progress at the Youngers. Furniture has been shoved hither and yon and MAMA is giving the kitchen-area walls a washing down. BENEATHA, in dungarees, with a handkerchief tied around her face, is spraying insecticide into the cracks in the walls. As they work, the radio is on and a Southside disk-jockey program is inappropriately filling the house with a rather exotic saxophone blues. TRAVIS, the sole idle one, is leaning on his arms, looking out of the window.

TRAVIS: Grandmama, that stuff Bennie is using smells awful. Can I go downstairs, please?

MAMA: Did you get all them chores done already? I ain't seen you doing much.

TRAVIS: Yes'm—finished early. Where did Mama go this morning?

MAMA: [Looking at BENEATHA.] She had to go on a little errand.

TRAVIS: Where?

MAMA: To tend to her business.

TRAVIS: Can I go outside then?

MAMA: Oh, I guess so. You better stay right in front of the house, though . . . and keep a good lookout for the postman.

TRAVIS: Yes'm. [He starts out and decides to give his aunt BENEATHA a good swat on the legs as he passes her.] Leave them poor little old cockroaches alone, they ain't bothering you none.

[He runs as she swings the spray gun at him both viciously and playfully. WALTER enters from the bedroom and goes to the phone.]

MAMA: Look out there, girl, before you be spilling some of that stuff on that child!

TRAVIS: [Teasing.] That's right—look out now!

[He exits.]

BENEATHA: [Drily.] I can't imagine that it would hurt him—it has never hurt the roaches.

MAMA: Well, little boys' hides ain't as tough as Southside roaches.

WALTER: [Into phone.] Hello—Let me talk to Willy Harris.

MAMA: You better get over there behind the bureau. I seen one marching out of there like Napoleon yesterday.

WALTER: Hello, Willy? It ain't come yet. It'll be here in a few minutes. Did the lawyer give you the papers?

BENEATHA: There's really only one way to get rid of them, Mama—

MAMA: How?

BENEATHA: Set fire to this building.

WALTER: Good. Good. I'll be right over.

BENEATHA: Where did Ruth go, Walter?

WALTER: I don't know.

[He exits abruptly.]

BENEATHA: Mama, where did Ruth go?

MAMA: [Looking at her with meaning.] To the doctor, I think.

BENEATHA: The doctor? What's the matter? [They exchange glances.] You don't think—

MAMA: [With her sense of drama.] Now I ain't saying what I think. But I ain't never been wrong 'bout a woman neither.

[The phone rings.]

BENEATHA: [At the phone.] Hay-lo . . . [Pause, and a moment of recognition.] Well—when did you get back! . . . And how was it? . . . Of course I've missed you—in my way . . . This morning? No . . . house cleaning and all that and Mama hates it if I let people come over when the house is like this . . . You have? Well, that's different . . . What is it—Oh, what the hell, come on over . . . Right, see you then.

[She hangs up.]

MAMA: [Who has listened vigorously, as is her habit.] Who is that you inviting over here with this house looking like this? You ain't got the pride you was born with!

BENEATHA: Asagai doesn't care how houses look, Mama—he's an intellectual.

MAMA: Who?

BENEATHA: Asagai—Joseph Asagai. He's an African boy I met on campus. He's been studying in Canada all summer.

MAMA: What's his name?

BENEATHA: Asagai, Joseph. Ah-sah-guy . . . He's from Nigeria.

MAMA: Oh, that's the little country that was founded by slaves way back . . .

BENEATHA: No, Mama—that's Liberia.

MAMA: I don't think I never met no African before.

BENEATHA: Well, do me a favor and don't ask him a whole lot of ignorant questions about Africans. I mean, do they wear clothes and all that—

MAMA: Well, now, I guess if you think we so ignorant 'round here maybe you shouldn't bring your friends here—

BENEATHA: It's just that people ask such crazy things. All anyone seems to know about when it comes to Africa is Tarzan—

MAMA: [Indignantly.] Why should I know anything about Africa?

BENEATHA: Why do you give money at church for the missionary work?

MAMA: Well, that's to help save people.

BENEATHA: You mean save them from heathenism—

MAMA: [Innocently.] Yes.

BENEATHA: I'm afraid they need more salvation from the British and the French.

[RUTH comes in forlornly and pulls off her coat with dejection. They both turn to look at her.]

RUTH: [Dispiritedly.] Well, I guess from all the happy faces—everybody knows.

BENEATHA: You pregnant?

MAMA: Lord have mercy, I sure hope it's a little old girl. Travis ought to have a sister.

[BENEATHA and RUTH give her a hopeless look for this grandmotherly enthusiasm.]

BENEATHA: How far along are you?

RUTH: Two months.

BENEATHA: Did you mean to? I mean did you plan it or was it an accident?

MAMA: What do you know about planning or not planning?

BENEATHA: Oh, Mama.

RUTH: [Wearily.] She's twenty years old, Lena.

BENEATHA: Did you plan it, Ruth?

RUTH: Mind your own business.

BENEATHA: It is my business—where is he going to live, on the roof? [There is silence following the remark as the three women react to the sense of it.] Gee—I didn't mean that, Ruth, honest. Gee, I don't feel like that at all. I—I think it is wonderful.

RUTH: [Dully.] Wonderful.

BENEATHA: Yes—really.

MAMA: [Looking at RUTH, worried.] Doctor say everything going to be all right?

RUTH: [Far away.] Yes—she says everything is going to be fine . . .

MAMA: [Immediately suspicious.] “She”—What doctor you went to?

[RUTH folds over, near hysteria.]

MAMA: [Worriedly hovering over RUTH.] Ruth honey—what’s the matter with you—you sick?

[RUTH has her fists clenched on her thighs and is fighting hard to suppress a scream that seems to be rising in her.]

BENEATHA: What’s the matter with her, Mama?

MAMA: [Working her fingers in RUTH’s shoulder to relax her.] She be all right.

Women gets right depressed sometimes when they get her way. [Speaking softly, expertly, rapidly.] Now you just relax. That’s right . . . just lean back, don’t think ’bout nothing at all . . . nothing at all—

RUTH: I’m all right . . .

[The glassy-eyed look melts and then she collapses into a fit of heavy sobbing. The bell rings.]

BENEATHA: Oh, my God—that must be Asagai.

MAMA: [To RUTH.] Come on now, honey. You need to lie down and rest awhile . . . then have some nice hot food.

[They exit, RUTH’s weight on her mother-in-law. BENEATHA, herself profoundly disturbed, opens the door to admit a rather dramatic-looking young man with a large package.]

ASAGAI: Hello, Alaiyo—

BENEATHA: [Holding the door open and regarding him with pleasure.] Hello . . .

[Long pause.] Well—come in. And please excuse everything. My mother was very upset about my letting anyone come here with the place like this.

ASAGAI: [Coming into the room.] You look disturbed too . . . Is something wrong?

BENEATHA: [Still at the door, absently.] Yes . . . we’ve all got acute ghetto-itus.

[She smiles and comes toward him, finding a cigarette and sitting.] So—sit down! How was Canada?

ASAGAI: [A sophisticate.] Canadian.

BENEATHA: [Looking at him.] I’m very glad you are back.

ASAGAI: [Looking back at her in turn.] Are you really?

BENEATHA: Yes—very.

ASAGAI: Why—you were quite glad when I went away. What happened?

BENEATHA: You went away.

ASAGAI: Ahhhhhhhh.

BENEATHA: Before—you wanted to be so serious before there was time.

ASAGAI: How much time must there be before one knows what one feels?

BENEATHA: [Stalling this particular conversation. Her hands pressed together, in a deliberately childish gesture.] What did you bring me?

ASAGAI: [Handing her the package.] Open it and see.

BENEATHA: [Eagerly opening the package and drawing out some records and the colorful robes of a Nigerian woman.] Oh, Asagai! . . . You got them for me! . . . How beautiful . . . and the records too! [She lifts out the robes and runs to the mirror with them and holds the drapery up in front of herself.]

ASAGAI: [Coming to her at the mirror.] I shall have to teach you how to drape it properly. [He flings the material about her for the moment and stands back to look at her.] Ah—Oh-pay-gay-day, oh-gbah-mu-shay. [A Yoruba exclamation for admiration.] You wear it well . . . very well . . . mutilated hair and all.

BENEATHA: [Turning suddenly.] My hair—what's wrong with my hair?

ASAGAI: [Shrugging.] Were you born with it like that?

BENEATHA: [Reaching up to touch it.] No . . . of course not.

[She looks back to the mirror, disturbed.]

ASAGAI: [Smiling.] How then?

BENEATHA: You know perfectly well how . . . as crinkly as yours . . . that's how.

ASAGAI: And it is ugly to you that way?

BENEATHA: [Quickly.] Oh, no—not ugly . . . [More slowly, apologetically.] But it's so hard to manage when it's, well—raw.

ASAGAI: And so to accommodate that—you mutilate it every week?

BENEATHA: It's not mutilation!

ASAGAI: [Laughing aloud at her seriousness.] Oh . . . please! I am only teasing you because you are so very serious about these things. [He stands back from her and folds his arms across his chest as he watches her pulling at her hair and frowning in the mirror.] Do you remember the first time you met me at school? . . . [He laughs.] You came up to me and you said—and I thought you were the most serious little thing I had ever seen—you said: [He imitates her.] “Mr. Asagai—I want very much to talk with you. About Africa. You see, Mr. Asagai, I am looking for my identity!”

[He laughs.]

BENEATHA: [Turning to him, not laughing.] Yes—

[Her face is quizzical, profoundly disturbed.]

ASAGAI: [Still teasing and reaching out and taking her face in his hands and turning her profile to him.] Well . . . it is true that this is not so much a profile of a Hollywood queen as perhaps a queen of the Nile— [A mock dismissal of the importance of the question.] But what does it matter? Assimilationism is so popular in your country.

BENEATHA: [Wheeling, passionately, sharply.] I am not an assimilationist!

ASAGAI: [The protest hangs in the room for a moment and ASAGAI studies her, his laughter fading.] Such a serious one. [There is a pause.] So—you like the robes? You must take excellent care of them—they are from my sister's personal wardrobe.

BENEATHA: [With incredulity.] You—you sent all the way home—for me?

ASAGAI: [With charm.] For you—I would do much more . . . Well, that is what I came for. I must go.

BENEATHA: Will you call me Monday?

ASAGAI: Yes . . . We have a great deal to talk about. I mean about identity and time and all that.

BENEATHA: Time?

ASAGAI: Yes. About how much time one needs to know what one feels.

BENEATHA: You never understood that there is more than one kind of feeling which can exist between a man and a woman—or, at least, there should be.

ASAGAI: [Shaking his head negatively but gently.] No. Between a man and a woman there need be only one kind of feeling. I have that for you . . . Now even . . . right this moment . . .

BENEATHA: I know—and by itself—it won't do. I can find that anywhere.

ASAGAI: For a woman it should be enough.

BENEATHA: I know—because that's what it says in all the novels that men write. But it isn't. Go ahead and laugh—but I'm not interested in being someone's little episode in America or— [With feminine vengeance.] —one of them! [ASAGAI has burst into laughter again.] That's funny as hell, huh!

ASAGAI: It's just that every American girl I have known has said that to me. White—black—in this you are all the same. And the same speech, too!

BENEATHA: [Angrily.] Yuk, yuk, yuk!

ASAGAI: It's how you can be sure that the world's most liberated women are not liberated at all. You all talk about it too much!

[MAMA enters and is immediately all social charm because of the presence of a guest.]

BENEATHA: Oh—Mama—this is Mr. Asagai.

MAMA: How do you do?

ASAGAI: [Total politeness to an elder.] How do you do, Mrs. Younger. Please forgive me for coming at such an outrageous hour on a Saturday.

MAMA: Well, you are quite welcome. I just hope you understand that our house don't always look like this. [Chatterish.] You must come again. I would love to hear all about— [Not sure of the name.] —your country. I think it's so sad the way our American Negroes don't know nothing about Africa 'cept Tarzan and all that. And all that money they pour into these churches when they ought to be helping you people over there drive out them French and Englishmen done taken away your land.

[The mother flashes a slightly superior look at her daughter upon completion of the recitation.]

ASAGAI: [Taken aback by this sudden and acutely unrelated expression of sympathy.] Yes . . . yes . . .

MAMA: [Smiling at him suddenly and relaxing and looking him over.] How many miles is it from here to where you come from?

ASAGAI: Many thousands.

MAMA: [Looking at him as she would WALTER.] I bet you don't half look after yourself, being away from your mama either. I spec you better come 'round here from time to time and get yourself some decent home-cooked meals . . .

ASAGAI: [Moved.] Thank you. Thank you very much. [They are all quiet, then—] Well . . . I must go. I will call you Monday, Alaiyo.

MAMA: What's that he call you?

ASAGAI: Oh—"Alaiyo." I hope you don't mind. It is what you would call a nickname, I think. It is a Yoruba word. I am a Yoruba.

MAMA: [Looking at BENEATHA.] I—I thought he was from—

ASAGAI: [Understanding.] Nigeria is my country. Yoruba is my tribal origin—
 BENEATHA: You didn't tell us what Alaiyo means . . . for all I know, you might be calling me Little Idiot or something . . .
 ASAGAI: Well . . . let me see . . . I do not know how just to explain it . . . The sense of a thing can be so different when it changes languages.
 BENEATHA: You're evading.
 ASAGAI: No—really it is difficult . . . [Thinking.] It means . . . it means One for Whom Bread—Food—Is Not Enough. [He looks at her.] Is that all right?
 BENEATHA: [Understanding, softly.] Thank you.
 MAMA: [Looking from one to the other and not understanding any of it.] Well . . . that's nice . . . You must come see us again—Mr.—
 ASAGAI: Ah-sah-guy . . .
 MAMA: Yes . . . Do come again.
 ASAGAI: Good-bye.

[He exits.]

MAMA: [After him.] Lord, that's a pretty thing just went out here! [Insinuatingly, to her daughter.] Yes, I guess I see why we done commence to get so interested in Africa 'round here. Missionaries my aunt Jenny!

[She exits.]

BENEATHA: Oh, Mama! . . .

[She picks up the Nigerian dress and holds it up to her in front of the mirror again. She sets the headdress on haphazardly and then notices her hair again and clutches at it and then replaces the headdress and frowns at herself. Then she starts to wriggle in front of the mirror as she thinks a Nigerian woman might. TRAVIS enters and regards her.]

TRAVIS: You cracking up?

BENEATHA: Shut up.

[She pulls the headdress off and looks at herself in the mirror and clutches at her hair again and squinches her eyes as if trying to imagine something. Then, suddenly, she gets her raincoat and kerchief and hurriedly prepares for going out.]

MAMA: [Coming back into the room.] She's resting now. Travis, baby, run next door and ask Miss Johnson to please let me have a little kitchen cleanser. This here can is empty as Jacob's kettle.

TRAVIS: I just came in.

MAMA: Do as you told. [He exits and she looks at her daughter.] Where you going?

BENEATHA: [Halting at the door.] To become a queen of the Nile!

[She exits in a breathless blaze of glory. RUTH appears in the bedroom doorway.]

MAMA: Who told you to get up?

RUTH: Ain't nothing wrong with me to be lying in no bed for. Where did Bennie go?

MAMA: [Drumming her fingers.] Far as I could make out—to Egypt. [RUTH just looks at her.] What time is it getting to?

RUTH: Ten twenty. And the mailman going to ring that bell this morning just like he done every morning for the last umpteen years.

[TRAVIS comes in with the cleanser can.]

TRAVIS: She say to tell you that she don't have much.

MAMA: [Angrily.] Lord, some people I could name sure is tight-fisted! [Directing her grandson.] Mark two cans of cleanser down on the list there. If she that hard up for kitchen cleanser, I sure don't want to forget to get her none!

RUTH: Lena—maybe the woman is just short on cleanser—

MAMA: [Not listening.] —Much baking powder as she done borrowed from me all these years, she could of done gone into the baking business!

[The bell sounds suddenly and sharply and all three are stunned—serious and silent—mid-speech. In spite of all the other conversations and distractions of the morning, this is what they have been waiting for, even TRAVIS, who looks helplessly from his mother to his grandmother. RUTH is the first to come to life again.]

RUTH: [To TRAVIS.] Get down them steps, boy!

[TRAVIS snaps to life and flies out to get the mail.]

MAMA: [Her eyes wide, her hand to her breast.] You mean it done really come?

RUTH: [Excited.] Oh, Miss Lena!

MAMA: [Collecting herself.] Well . . . I don't know what we all so excited about 'round here for. We know it was coming for months.

RUTH: That's a whole lot different from having it come and being able to hold it in your hands . . . a piece of paper worth ten thousand dollars . . . [TRAVIS bursts back into the room. He holds the envelope high above his head, like a little dancer, his face is radiant and he is breathless. He moves to his grandmother with sudden slow ceremony and puts the envelope into her hands. She accepts it, and then merely holds it and looks at it.] Come on! Open it . . . Lord have mercy, I wish Walter Lee was here!

TRAVIS: Open it, Grandmama!

MAMA: [Staring at it.] Now you all be quiet. It's just a check.

RUTH: Open it . . .

MAMA: [Still staring at it.] Now don't act silly . . . We ain't never been no people to act silly 'bout no money—

RUTH: [Swiftly.] We ain't never had none before—open it!

[MAMA finally makes a good strong tear and pulls out the thin blue slice of paper and inspects it closely. The boy and his mother study it raptly over MAMA'S shoulders.]

MAMA: Travis! [She is counting off with doubt.] Is that the right number of zeros.

TRAVIS: Yes'm . . . ten thousand dollars. Gaalee, Grandmama, you rich.

MAMA: [She holds the check away from her, still looking at it. Slowly her face sobers into a mask of unhappiness.] Ten thousand dollars. [She hands it to RUTH.] Put it away somewhere, Ruth. [She does not look at RUTH; her eyes seem to be seeing something somewhere very far off.] Ten thousand dollars they give you. Ten thousand dollars.

TRAVIS: [To his mother, sincerely.] What's the matter with Grandmama—don't she want to be rich?

RUTH: [Distractedly.] You go on out and play now, baby. [TRAVIS exits. MAMA starts wiping dishes absently, humming intently to herself. RUTH turns to her, with kind exasperation.] You've gone and got yourself upset.

MAMA: [Not looking at her.] I spec if it wasn't for you all . . . I would just put that money away or give it to the church or something.

RUTH: Now what kind of talk is that. Mr. Younger would just be plain mad if he could hear you talking foolish like that.

MAMA: [Stopping and staring off.] Yes . . . he sure would. [Sighing.] We got enough to do with that money, all right. [She halts then, and turns and looks at her daughter-in-law hard; RUTH avoids her eyes and MAMA wipes her hands with finality and starts to speak firmly to RUTH.] Where did you go today, girl?

RUTH: To the doctor.

MAMA: [Impatiently.] Now, Ruth . . . you know better than that. Old Doctor Jones is strange enough in his way but there ain't nothing 'bout him make somebody slip and call him "she"—like you done this morning.

RUTH: Well, that's what happened—my tongue slipped.

MAMA: You went to see that woman, didn't you?

RUTH: [Defensively, giving herself away.] What woman you talking about?

MAMA: [Angrily.] That woman who—

[WALTER enters in great excitement.]

WALTER: Did it come?

MAMA: [Quietly.] Can't you give people a Christian greeting before you start asking about money?

WALTER: [To RUTH.] Did it come? [RUTH unfolds the check and lays it quietly before him, watching him intently with thoughts of her own. WALTER sits down and grasps it close and counts off the zeros.] Ten thousand dollars— [He turns suddenly, frantically to his mother and draws some papers out of his breast pocket.] Mama—look. Old Willy Harris put everything on paper—

MAMA: Son—I think you ought to talk to your wife . . . I'll go on out and leave you alone if you want—

WALTER: I can talk to her later—Mama, look—

MAMA: Son—

WALTER: WILL SOMEBODY PLEASE LISTEN TO ME TODAY!

MAMA: [Quietly.] I don't 'low no yellin' in this house, Walter Lee, and you know it— [WALTER stares at them in frustration and starts to speak several times.] And there ain't going to be no investing in no liquor stores. I don't aim to have to speak on that again.

[A long pause.]

WALTER: Oh—so you don't aim to have to speak on that again? So you have decided . . . [Crumpling his papers.] Well, you tell that to my boy tonight when you put him to sleep on the living-room couch . . . [Turning to MAMA and speaking directly to her.] Yeah—and tell it to my wife, Mama, tomorrow when she has to go out of here to look after somebody else's kids. And tell it to me, Mama, every time we need a new pair of curtains and I have to watch you go out and work in somebody's kitchen. Yeah, you tell me then!

[WALTER starts out.]

RUTH: Where you going?

WALTER: I'm going out!

RUTH: Where?

WALTER: Just out of this house somewhere—

RUTH: [Getting her coat.] I'll come too.

WALTER: I don't want you to come!

RUTH: I got something to talk to you about, Walter.

WALTER: That's too bad.

MAMA: [Still quietly.] Walter Lee— [She waits and he finally turns and looks at her.] Sit down.

WALTER: I'm a grown man, Mama.

MAMA: Ain't nobody said you wasn't grown. But you still in my house and my presence. And as long as you are—you'll talk to your wife civil. Now sit down.

RUTH: [Suddenly.] Oh, let him go on out and drink himself to death! He makes me sick to my stomach! [She flings her coat against him.]

WALTER: [Violently.] And you turn mine too, baby! [RUTH goes into their bedroom and slams the door behind her.] That was my greatest mistake—

MAMA: [Still quietly.] Walter, what is the matter with you?

WALTER: Matter with me? Ain't nothing the matter with me!

MAMA: Yes there is. Something eating you up like a crazy man. Something more than me not giving you this money. The past few years I been watching it happen to you. You get all nervous acting and kind of wild in the eyes—[WALTER jumps up impatiently at her words.] I said sit there now, I'm talking to you!

WALTER: Mama—I don't need no nagging at me today.

MAMA: Seem like you getting to a place where you always tied up in some kind of knot about something. But if anybody ask you 'bout it you just yell at 'em and bust out the house and go out and drink somewheres. Walter Lee, people can't live with that. Ruth's a good, patient girl in her way—but you getting to be too much. Boy, don't make the mistake of driving that girl away from you.

WALTER: Why—what she do for me?

MAMA: She loves you.

WALTER: Mama—I'm going out. I want to go off somewhere and be by myself for a while.

MAMA: I'm sorry 'bout your liquor store, son. It just wasn't the thing for us to do. That's what I want to tell you about—

WALTER: I got to go out, Mama—

[He rises.]

MAMA: It's dangerous, son.

WALTER: What's dangerous?

MAMA: When a man goes outside his home to look for peace.

WALTER: [Beseechingly.] Then why can't there never be no peace in this house then?

MAMA: You done found it in some other house?

WALTER: No—there ain't no woman! Why do women always think there's a woman somewhere when a man gets restless. [Coming to her.] Mama—Mama—I want so many things . . .

MAMA: Yes, son—

WALTER: I want so many things that they are driving me kind of crazy . . . Mama—look at me.

MAMA: I'm looking at you. You a good-looking boy. You got a job, a nice wife, a fine boy and—

WALTER: A job. [Looks at her.] Mama, a job? I open and close car doors all day long. I drive a man around in his limousine and I say, "Yes, sir; no, sir; very good, sir; shall I take the Drive, sir?" Mama, that ain't no kind of job . . . that ain't nothing at all. [Very quietly.] Mama, I don't know if I can make you understand.

MAMA: Understand what, baby?

WALTER: [Quietly.] Sometimes it's like I can see the future stretched out in front of me—just plain as day. The future, Mama. Hanging over there at the edge of my days. Just waiting for me—a big, looming blank space—full of nothing. Just waiting for me. [Pause.] Mama—sometimes when I'm downtown and I pass them cool, quiet-looking restaurants where them white boys are sitting back and talking 'bout things . . . sitting there turning deals worth millions of dollars . . . sometimes I see guys don't look much older than me—

MAMA: Son—how come you talk so much 'bout money?

WALTER: [With immense passion.] Because it is life, Mama!

MAMA: [Quietly.] Oh— [Very quietly.] So now it's life. Money is life. Once upon a time freedom used to be life—now it's money. I guess the world really do change . . .

WALTER: No—it was always money, Mama. We just didn't know about it.

MAMA: No . . . something has changed. [She looks at him.] You something new, boy. In my time we was worried about not being lynched and getting to the North if we could and how to stay alive and still have a pinch of dignity too . . . Now here come you and Beneatha—talking 'bout things we ain't never even thought about hardly, me and your daddy. You ain't satisfied or proud of nothing we done. I mean that you had a home; that we kept you out of trouble till you was grown; that you don't have to ride to work on the back of nobody's streetcar—You my children—but how different we done become.

WALTER: You just don't understand, Mama, you just don't understand.

MAMA: Son—do you know your wife is expecting another baby? [WALTER stands, stunned, and absorbs what his mother has said.] That's what she wanted to talk to you about. [WALTER sinks down into a chair.] This ain't for me to be telling—but you ought to know. [She waits.] I think Ruth is thinking 'bout getting rid of that child.⁵

WALTER: [Slowly understanding.] No—no—Ruth wouldn't do that.

MAMA: When the world gets ugly enough—a woman will do anything for her family. The part that's already living.

5. Abortions were illegal and dangerous in the United States prior to the 1973 Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision.

WALTER: You don't know Ruth, Mama, if you think she would do that.

[RUTH opens the bedroom door and stands there a little limp.]

RUTH: [Beaten.] Yes I would too, Walter. [Pause.] I gave her a five-dollar down payment.

[There is total silence as the man stares at his wife and the mother stares at her son.]

MAMA: [Presently.] Well— [Tightly.] Well—son, I'm waiting to hear you say something . . . I'm waiting to hear how you be your father's son. Be the man he was . . . [Pause.] Your wife say she going to destroy your child. And I'm waiting to hear you talk like him and say we a people who give children life, not who destroys them— [She rises.] I'm waiting to see you stand up and look like your daddy and say we done give up one baby to poverty and that we ain't going to give up nary another one . . . I'm waiting.

WALTER: Ruth—

MAMA: If you a son of mine, tell her! [WALTER turns, looks at her and can say nothing. She continues, bitterly.] You . . . you are a disgrace to your father's memory. Somebody get me my hat.

[CURTAIN.]

ACT II

Scene One

Time: Later the same day.

At rise: RUTH is ironing again. She has the radio going. Presently BENEATHA'S bedroom door opens and RUTH'S mouth falls and she puts down the iron in fascination.

RUTH: What have we got on tonight!

BENEATHA: [Emerging grandly from the doorway so that we can see her thoroughly robed in the costume ASAGAI brought.] You are looking at what a well-dressed Nigerian woman wears— [She parades for RUTH, her hair completely hidden by the headdress; she is coquettishly fanning herself with an ornate oriental fan, mistakenly more like Butterfly⁶ than any Nigerian that ever was.] Isn't it beautiful? [She promenades to the radio and, with an arrogant flourish, turns off the good loud blues that is playing.] Enough of this assimilationist junk! [RUTH follows her with her eyes as she goes to the phonograph and puts on a record and turns and waits ceremoniously for the music to come up. Then, with a shout—] OCOMOGOSIAY!

[RUTH jumps. The music comes up, a lovely Nigerian melody. BENEATHA listens, enraptured, her eyes far away—"back to the past." She begins to dance. RUTH is dumbfounded.]

6. Madame Butterfly, a Japanese woman married to and then abandoned by an American man in the opera Madama Butterfly (1904), by the Italian composer Giacomo Puccini (1858–1924).

RUTH: What kind of dance is that?

BENEATHA: A folk dance.

RUTH: [Pearl Bailey.]⁷ What kind of folks do that, honey?

BENEATHA: It's from Nigeria. It's a dance of welcome.

RUTH: Who you welcoming?

BENEATHA: The men back to the village.

RUTH: Where they been?

BENEATHA: How should I know—out hunting or something. Anyway, they are coming back now . . .

RUTH: Well, that's good.

BENEATHA: [With the record.]

Alundi, alundi
Alundi alunya
Jop pu a jeepua
Ang gu soooooooooo

Ai yai yae . . .
Ayehaye—alundi . . .

[WALTER comes in during this performance; he has obviously been drinking. He leans against the door heavily and watches his sister, at first with distaste. Then his eyes look off—"back to the past"—as he lifts both his fists to the roof, screaming.]

WALTER: YEAH . . . AND ETHIOPIA STRETCH FORTH HER HANDS AGAIN! . . .⁸

RUTH: [Drily, looking at him.] Yes—and Africa sure is claiming her own tonight. [She gives them both up and starts ironing again.]

WALTER: [All in a drunken, dramatic shout.] Shut up! . . . I'm digging them drums . . . them drums move me! . . . [He makes his weaving way to his wife's face and leans in close to her.] In my heart of hearts— [He thumps his chest.]—I am much warrior!

RUTH: [Without even looking up.] In your heart of hearts you are much drunkard.

WALTER: [Coming away from her and starting to wander around the room, shouting.] Me and Jomo . . . [Intently, in his sister's face. She has stopped dancing to watch him in this unknown mood.] That's my man, Kenyatta.⁹ [Shouting and thumping his chest.] FLAMING SPEAR! HOT DAMN! [He is suddenly in possession of an imaginary spear and actively spearing enemies all over the room.] OCOMOGOSIAY . . . THE LION IS WAKING . . . OWIMOWEH! [He pulls his shirt open and leaps up on a table and gestures with his spear. The bell rings. RUTH goes to answer.]

BENEATHA: [To encourage WALTER, thoroughly caught up with this side of him.] OCOMOGOSIAY, FLAMING SPEAR!

7. That is, in the manner of the popular African American singer and entertainer (1918–90).

8. See Psalms 68.31: "Princes shall come out of Egypt; Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God."

9. Jomo Kenyatta (1893–1978), African political leader and first president of Kenya (1964–78) following its independence from British colonial rule.

WALTER: [On the table, very far gone, his eyes pure glass sheets. He sees what we cannot, that he is a leader of his people, a great chief, a descendant of Chaka,¹ and that the hour to march has come.] Listen, my black brothers—

BENEATHA: OCOMOGOSIAY!

WALTER: —Do you hear the waters rushing against the shores of the coastlands—

BENEATHA: OCOMOGOSIAY!

WALTER: —Do you hear the screeching of the cocks in yonder hills beyond where the chiefs meet in council for the coming of the mighty war—

BENEATHA: OCOMOGOSIAY!

WALTER: —Do you hear the beating of the wings of the birds flying low over the mountains and the low places of our land—

[RUTH opens the door. GEORGE MURCHISON enters.]

BENEATHA: OCOMOGOSIAY!

WALTER: —Do you hear the singing of the women, singing the war songs of our fathers to the babies in the great houses . . . singing the sweet war songs?

OH, DO YOU HEAR, MY BLACK BROTHERS!

BENEATHA: [Completely gone.] We hear you, Flaming Spear—

WALTER: Telling us to prepare for the greatness of the time— [To GEORGE.] Black Brother!

[He extends his hand for the fraternal clasp.]

GEORGE: Black Brother, hell!

RUTH: [Having had enough, and embarrassed for the family.] Beneatha, you got company—what's the matter with you? Walter Lee Younger, get down off that table and stop acting like a fool . . .

[WALTER comes down off the table suddenly and makes a quick exit to the bathroom.]

RUTH: He's had a little to drink . . . I don't know what her excuse is.

GEORGE: [To BENEATHA.] Look honey, we're going to the theatre—we're not going to be in it . . . so go change, huh?

RUTH: You expect this boy to go out with you looking like that?

BENEATHA: [Looking at GEORGE.] That's up to George. If he's ashamed of his heritage—

GEORGE: Oh, don't be so proud of yourself, Bennie—just because you look eccentric.

BENEATHA: How can something that's natural be eccentric?

GEORGE: That's what being eccentric means—being natural. Get dressed.

BENEATHA: I don't like that, George.

RUTH: Why must you and your brother make an argument out of everything people say?

BENEATHA: Because I hate assimilationist Negroes!

RUTH: Will somebody please tell me what assimila-who-ever means!

1. Zulu chief (1786–1828), also known as “Shaka” and called “The Black Napoleon” for his strategic and organizational genius.

GEORGE: Oh, it's just a college girl's way of calling people Uncle Toms—but that isn't what it means at all.

RUTH: Well, what does it mean?

BENEATHA: [Cutting GEORGE off and staring at him as she replies to RUTH.] It means someone who is willing to give up his own culture and submerge himself completely in the dominant, and in this case, oppressive culture!

GEORGE: Oh, dear, dear, dear! Here we go! A lecture on the African past! On our Great West African Heritage! In one second we will hear all about the great Ashanti empires; the great Songhay civilizations; and the great sculpture of Bénin—and then some poetry in the Bantu—and the whole monologue will end with the word heritage! [Nastily.] Let's face it, baby, your heritage is nothing but a bunch of raggedy-assed spirituals and some grass huts!

BENEATHA: Grass huts! [RUTH crosses to her and forcibly pushes her toward the bedroom.] See there . . . you are standing there in your splendid ignorance talking about people who were the first to smelt iron on the face of the earth! [RUTH is pushing her through the door.] The Ashanti were performing surgical operations when the English— [RUTH pulls the door to, with BENEATHA on the other side, and smiles graciously at GEORGE. BENEATHA opens the door and shouts the end of the sentence defiantly at GEORGE.] —were still tattooing themselves with blue dragons . . . [She goes back inside.]

RUTH: Have a seat, George. [They both sit. RUTH folds her hands rather primly on her lap, determined to demonstrate the civilization of the family.] Warm, ain't it? I mean for September. [Pause.] Just like they always say about Chicago weather: If it's too hot or cold for you, just wait a minute and it'll change. [She smiles happily at this cliché of clichés.] Everybody say it's got to do with them bombs and things they keep setting off.² [Pause.] Would you like a nice cold beer?

GEORGE: No, thank you. I don't care for beer. [He looks at his watch.] I hope she hurries up.

RUTH: What time is the show?

GEORGE: It's an eight-thirty curtain. That's just Chicago, though. In New York standard curtain time is eight forty.

[He is rather proud of this knowledge.]

RUTH: [Properly appreciating it.] You get to New York a lot?

GEORGE: [Offhand.] Few times a year.

RUTH: Oh—that's nice. I've never been to New York.

[WALTER enters. We feel he has relieved himself, but the edge of unreality is still with him.]

WALTER: New York ain't got nothing Chicago ain't. Just a bunch of hustling people all squeezed up together—being “Eastern.”

[He turns his face into a screw of displeasure.]

GEORGE: Oh—you've been?

WALTER: Plenty of times.

RUTH: [Shocked at the lie.] Walter Lee Younger!

2. In the 1950s, people commonly blamed weather fluctuations on atomic testing.

WALTER: [Staring her down.] Plenty! [Pause.] What we got to drink in this house? Why don't you offer this man some refreshment. [To GEORGE.] They don't know how to entertain people in this house, man.

GEORGE: Thank you—I don't really care for anything.

WALTER: [Feeling his head; sobriety coming.] Where's Mama?

RUTH: She ain't come back yet.

WALTER: [Looking MURCHISON over from head to toe, scrutinizing his carefully casual tweed sports jacket over cashmere V-neck sweater over soft eyelet shirt and tie, and soft slacks, finished off with white buckskin shoes.] Why all you college boys wear them fairyish-looking white shoes?

RUTH: Walter Lee!

[GEORGE MURCHISON ignores the remark.]

WALTER: [To RUTH.] Well, they look crazy as hell—white shoes, cold as it is.

RUTH: [Crushed.] You have to excuse him—

WALTER: No he don't! Excuse me for what? What you always excusing me for! I'll excuse myself when I needs to be excused! [A pause.] They look as funny as them black knee socks Beneatha wears out of here all the time.

RUTH: It's the college style, Walter.

WALTER: Style, hell, She looks like she got burnt legs or something!

RUTH: Oh, Walter—

WALTER: [An irritable mimic.] Oh, Walter! Oh, Walter! [To MURCHISON.] How's your old man making out? I understand you all going to buy that big hotel on the Drive?³ [He finds a beer in the refrigerator, wanders over to MURCHISON, sipping and wiping his lips with the back of his hand, and straddling a chair backwards to talk to the other man.] Shrewd move. Your old man is all right, man. [Tapping his head and half winking for emphasis.] I mean he knows how to operate. I mean he thinks big, you know what I mean, I mean for a home, you know? But I think he's kind of running out of ideas now. I'd like to talk to him. Listen, man, I got some plans that could turn this city upside down. I mean I think like he does. Big. Invest big, gamble big, hell, lose big if you have to, you know what I mean. It's hard to find a man on this whole Southside who understands my kind of thinking—you dig? [He scrutinizes MURCHISON again, drinks his beer, squints his eyes and leans in close, confidential, man to man.] Me and you ought to sit down and talk sometimes, man. Man, I got me some ideas . . .

GEORGE: [With boredom.] Yeah—sometimes we'll have to do that, Walter.

WALTER: [Understanding the indifference, and offended.] Yeah—well, when you get the time, man. I know you a busy little boy.

RUTH: Walter, please—

WALTER: [Bitterly, hurt.] I know ain't nothing in this world as busy as you colored college boys with your fraternity pins and white shoes . . .

RUTH: [Covering her face with humiliation.] Oh, Walter Lee—

WALTER: I see you all the time—with the books tucked under your arms—going to your [British A—a mimic.] “clahsses.” And for what! What the hell you learning over there? Filling up your heads— [Counting off on his fingers.]—with the sociology and the psychology—but they teaching you how to be a man? How to take over and run the world? They teaching you how to run a rubber plantation or a steel mill? Naw—just to talk proper and read books and wear white shoes . . .

GEORGE: [Looking at him with distaste, a little above it all.] You're all wacked up with bitterness, man.

WALTER: [Intently, almost quietly, between the teeth, glaring at the boy.] And you—ain't you bitter, man? Ain't you just about had it yet? Don't you see no stars gleaming that you can't reach out and grab? You happy?—You contented son-of-a-bitch—you happy? You got it made? Bitter? Man, I'm a volcano. Bitter? Here I am a giant—surrounded by ants! Ants who can't even understand what it is the giant is talking about.

RUTH: [Passionately and suddenly.] Oh, Walter—ain't you with nobody!

WALTER: [Violently.] No! 'Cause ain't nobody with me! Not even my own mother!

RUTH: Walter, that's a terrible thing to say!

[BENEATHA enters, dressed for the evening in a cocktail dress and earrings.]

GEORGE: Well—hey, you look great.

BENEATHA: Let's go, George. See you all later.

RUTH: Have a nice time.

GEORGE: Thanks. Good night. [To WALTER, sarcastically.] Good night, Prometheus.⁴

[BENEATHA and GEORGE exit.]

WALTER: [To RUTH.] Who is Prometheus?

RUTH: I don't know. Don't worry about it.

WALTER: [In fury, pointing after GEORGE.] See there—they get to a point where they can't insult you man to man—they got to go talk about something ain't nobody never heard of!

RUTH: How do you know it was an insult? [To humor him.] Maybe Prometheus is a nice fellow.

WALTER: Prometheus! I bet there ain't even no such thing! I bet that simple-minded clown—

RUTH: Walter—

[She stops what she is doing and looks at him.]

WALTER: [Yelling.] Don't start!

RUTH: Start what?

WALTER: Your nagging! Where was I? Who was I with? How much money did I spend?

RUTH: [Plaintively.] Walter Lee—why don't we just try to talk about it . . .

4. In Greek mythology, Prometheus represented the bold creative spirit; defying the gods, he stole fire from Olympus (the locale of the gods) and gave it to humankind. Though successful, he was harshly punished by Zeus.

WALTER: [Not listening.] I been out talking with people who understand me.

People who care about the things I got on my mind.

RUTH: [Wearily.] I guess that means people like Willy Harris.

WALTER: Yes, people like Willy Harris.

RUTH: [With a sudden flash of impatience.] Why don't you all just hurry up and go into the banking business and stop talking about it!

WALTER: Why? You want to know why? 'Cause we all tied up in a race of people that don't know how to do nothing but moan, pray and have babies!

[The line is too bitter even for him and he looks at her and sits down.]

RUTH: Oh, Walter . . . [Softly.] Honey, why can't you stop fighting me?

WALTER: [Without thinking.] Who's fighting you? Who even cares about you?

[This line begins the retardation of his mood.]

RUTH: Well— [She waits a long time, and then with resignation starts to put away her things.] I guess I might as well go on to bed . . . [More or less to herself.] I don't know where we lost it . . . but we have . . . [Then, to him.] I—I'm sorry about this new baby, Walter. I guess maybe I better go on and do what I started . . . I guess I just didn't realize how bad things was with us . . . I guess I just didn't really realize— [She starts out to the bedroom and stops.] You want some hot milk?

WALTER: Hot milk?

RUTH: Yes—hot milk.

WALTER: Why hot milk?

RUTH: 'Cause after all that liquor you come home with you ought to have something hot in your stomach.

WALTER: I don't want no milk.

RUTH: You want some coffee then?

WALTER: No, I don't want no coffee. I don't want nothing hot to drink. [Almost plaintively.] Why you always trying to give me something to eat?

RUTH: [Standing and looking at him helplessly.] What else can I give you, Walter Lee Younger?

[She stands and looks at him and presently turns to go out again. He lifts his head and watches her going away from him in a new mood which began to emerge when he asked her "Who cares about you?"]

WALTER: It's been rough, ain't it, baby? [She hears and stops but does not turn around and he continues to her back.] I guess between two people there ain't never as much understood as folks generally thinks there is. I mean like between me and you— [She turns to face him.] How we gets to the place where we scared to talk softness to each other. [He waits, thinking hard himself.] Why you think it got to be like that? [He is thoughtful, almost as a child would be.] Ruth, what is it gets into people ought to be close?

RUTH: I don't know, honey. I think about it a lot.

WALTER: On account of you and me, you mean? The way things are with us. The way something done come down between us.

RUTH: There ain't so much between us, Walter . . . Not when you come to me and try to talk to me. Try to be with me . . . a little even.

WALTER: [Total honesty.] Sometimes . . . sometimes . . . I don't even know how to try.

RUTH: Walter—

WALTER: Yes?

RUTH: [Coming to him, gently and with misgiving, but coming to him.] Honey . . . life don't have to be like this. I mean sometimes people can do things so that things are better . . . You remember how we used to talk when Travis was born . . . about the way we were going to live . . . the kind of house . . . [She is stroking his head.] Well, it's all starting to slip away from us . . .

[MAMA enters, and WALTER jumps up and shouts at her.]

WALTER: Mama, where have you been?

MAMA: My—them steps is longer than they used to be. Whew! [She sits down and ignores him.] How you feeling this evening, Ruth?

[RUTH shrugs, disturbed some at having been prematurely interrupted and watching her husband knowingly.]

WALTER: Mama, where have you been all day?

MAMA: [Still ignoring him and leaning on the table and changing to more comfortable shoes.] Where's Travis?

RUTH: I let him go out earlier and he ain't come back yet. Boy, is he going to get it!

WALTER: Mama!

MAMA: [As if she has heard him for the first time.] Yes, son?

WALTER: Where did you go this afternoon?

MAMA: I went downtown to tend to some business that I had to tend to.

WALTER: What kind of business?

MAMA: You know better than to question me like a child, Brother.

WALTER: [Rising and bending over the table.] Where were you, Mama? [Bringing his fists down and shouting.] Mama, you didn't go do something with that insurance money, something crazy?

[The front door opens slowly, interrupting him, and TRAVIS peeks his head in, less than hopefully.]

TRAVIS: [To his mother.] Mama, I—

RUTH: "Mama I" nothing! You're going to get it, boy! Get on in that bedroom and get yourself ready!

TRAVIS: But I—

MAMA: Why don't you all never let the child explain hisself.

RUTH: Keep out of it now, Lena.

[MAMA clamps her lips together, and RUTH advances toward her son menacingly.]

RUTH: A thousand times I have told you not to go off like that—

MAMA: [Holding out her arms to her grandson.] Well—at least let me tell him something. I want him to be the first one to hear . . . Come here, Travis. [The boy obeys, gladly.] Travis— [She takes him by the shoulder and looks into his face.] —you know that money we got in the mail this morning?

TRAVIS: Yes'm—

MAMA: Well—what you think your grandmama gone and done with that money?

TRAVIS: I don't know, Grandmama.

MAMA: [Putting her finger on his nose for emphasis.] She went out and she bought you a house! [The explosion comes from WALTER at the end of the revelation and he jumps up and turns away from all of them in a fury. MAMA continues, to TRAVIS.] You glad about the house? It's going to be yours when you get to be a man.

TRAVIS: Yeah—I always wanted to live in a house.

MAMA: All right, gimme some sugar then— [TRAVIS puts his arms around her neck as she watches her son over the boy's shoulder. Then, to TRAVIS, after the embrace.] Now when you say your prayers tonight, you thank God and your grandfather—'cause it was him who give you the house—in his way.

RUTH: [Taking the boy from MAMA and pushing him toward the bedroom.] Now you get out of here and get ready for your beating.

TRAVIS: Aw, Mama—

RUTH: Get on in there— [Closing the door behind him and turning radiantly to her mother-in-law.] So you went and did it!

MAMA: [Quietly, looking at her son with pain.] Yes, I did.

RUTH: [Raising both arms classically.] Praise God! [Looks at WALTER a moment, who says nothing. She crosses rapidly to her husband.] Please, honey—let me be glad . . . you be glad too. [She has laid her hands on his shoulders, but he shakes himself free of her roughly, without turning to face her.] Oh, Walter . . . a home . . . a home. [She comes back to MAMA.] Well—where is it? How big is it? How much it going to cost?

MAMA: Well—

RUTH: When we moving?

MAMA: [Smiling at her.] First of the month.

RUTH: [Throwing back her head with jubilation.] Praise God!

MAMA: [Tentatively, still looking at her son's back turned against her and RUTH.] It's—it's a nice house too . . . [She cannot help speaking directly to him. An imploring quality in her voice, her manner, makes her almost like a girl now.] Three bedrooms—nice big one for you and Ruth . . . Me and Beneatha still have to share our room, but Travis have one of his own—and [With difficulty.] I figure if the—new baby—is a boy, we could get one of them double-decker outfits . . . And there's a yard with a little patch of dirt where I could maybe get to grow me a few flowers . . . And a nice big basement . . .

RUTH: Walter honey, be glad—

MAMA: [Still to his back, fingering things on the table.] 'Course I don't want to make it sound fancier than it is . . . It's just a plain little old house—but it's made good and solid—and it will be ours. Walter Lee—it makes a difference in a man when he can walk on floors that belong to him . . .

RUTH: Where is it?

MAMA: [Frightened at this telling.] Well—well—it's out there in Clybourne Park⁵—

[RUTH's radiance fades abruptly, and WALTER finally turns slowly to face his mother with incredulity and hostility.]

5. On Chicago's Near North Side.

RUTH: Where?

MAMA: [Matter-of-factly.] Four o six Clybourne Street, Clybourne Park.

RUTH: Clybourne Park? Mama, there ain't no colored people living in Clybourne Park.

MAMA: [Almost idiotically.] Well, I guess there's going to be some now.

WALTER: [Bitterly.] So that's the peace and comfort you went out and bought for us today!

MAMA: [Raising her eyes to meet his finally.] Son—I just tried to find the nicest place for the least amount of money for my family.

RUTH: [Trying to recover from the shock.] Well—well—'course I ain't one never been 'fraid of no crackers⁶ mind you—but—well, wasn't there no other houses nowhere?

MAMA: Them houses they put up for colored in them areas way out all seem to cost twice as much as other houses. I did the best I could.

RUTH: [Struck senseless with the news, in its various degrees of goodness and trouble, she sits a moment, her fists propping her chin in thought, and then she starts to rise, bringing her fists down with vigor, the radiance spreading from cheek to cheek again.] Well—well!—All I can say is—if this is my time in life—my time—to say good-bye— [And she builds with momentum as she starts to circle the room with an exuberant, almost tearfully happy release.] —to these God-damned cracking walls!— [She pounds the walls.] —and these marching roaches!— [She wipes at an imaginary army of marching roaches.] —and this cramped little closet which ain't now or never was no kitchen! . . . then I say it loud and good, Hallelujah! and good-bye misery . . . I don't never want to see your ugly face again! [She laughs joyously, having practically destroyed the apartment, and flings her arms up and lets them come down happily, slowly, reflectively, over her abdomen, aware for the first time perhaps that the life therein pulses with happiness and not despair.] Lena?

MAMA: [Moved, watching her happiness.] Yes, honey?

RUTH: [Looking off.] Is there—is there a whole lot of sunlight?

MAMA: [Understanding.] Yes, child, there's a whole lot of sunlight.

[Long pause.]

RUTH: [Collecting herself and going to the door of the room TRAVIS is in.] Well—I guess I better see 'bout Travis. [To MAMA.] Lord, I sure don't feel like whipping nobody today!

[She exits.]

MAMA: [The mother and son are left alone now and the mother waits a long time, considering deeply, before she speaks.] Son—you—you understand what I done, don't you? [WALTER is silent and sullen.] I—I just seen my family falling apart today . . . just falling to pieces in front of my eyes . . . We couldn't of gone on like we was today. We was going backwards 'stead of forwards—talking 'bout killing babies and wishing each other was dead . . . When it gets like that in life—you just got to do something different, push on out and do something bigger . . . [She waits.] I wish you say something, son . . . I wish you'd say how deep inside you you think I done the right thing—

WALTER: [Crossing slowly to his bedroom door and finally turning there and speaking measuredly.] What you need me to say you done right for? You the head of this family. You run our lives like you want to. It was your money and you did what you wanted with it. So what you need for me to say it was all right for? [Bitterly, to hurt her as deeply as he knows is possible.] So you butchered up a dream of mine—you—who always talking 'bout your children's dreams . . .

MAMA: Walter Lee—

[He just closes the door behind him. MAMA sits alone, thinking heavily.]

[CURTAIN.]

Scene Two

Time: Friday night. A few weeks later.

At rise: Packing crates mark the intention of the family to move. BENEATHA and GEORGE come in, presumably from an evening out again.

GEORGE: O.K. . . . O.K., whatever you say . . . [They both sit on the couch. He tries to kiss her. She moves away.] Look, we've had a nice evening; let's not spoil it, huh? . . .

[He again turns her head and tries to nuzzle in and she turns away from him, not with distaste but with momentary lack of interest; in a mood to pursue what they were talking about.]

BENEATHA: I'm trying to talk to you.

GEORGE: We always talk.

BENEATHA: Yes—and I love to talk.

GEORGE: [Exasperated; rising.] I know it and I don't mind it sometimes . . . I want you to cut it out, see—The moody stuff, I mean. I don't like it. You're a nice-looking girl . . . all over. That's all you need, honey, forget the atmosphere. Guys aren't going to go for the atmosphere—they're going to go for what they see. Be glad for that. Drop the Garbo⁷ routine. It doesn't go with you. As for myself, I want a nice— [Groping.] —simple [Thoughtfully.] —sophisticated girl . . . not a poet— O.K.?

[She rebuffs him again and he starts to leave.]

BENEATHA: Why are you angry?

GEORGE: Because this is stupid! I don't go out with you to discuss the nature of "quiet desperation"⁸ or to hear all about your thoughts—because the world will go on thinking what it thinks regardless—

BENEATHA: Then why read books? Why go to school?

GEORGE: [With artificial patience, counting on his fingers.] It's simple. You read books—to learn facts—to get grades—to pass the course—to get a degree. That's all—it has nothing to do with thoughts.

7. Greta Garbo (1905–90), Swedish-born American film star whose sultry, remote, and European femininity was widely imitated.

8. In Walden (1854), Henry Thoreau asserts that "the mass of men lead lives of quiet desperation."

[A long pause.]

BENEATHA: I see. [A longer pause as she looks at him.] Good night, George.

[GEORGE looks at her a little oddly, and starts to exit. He meets MAMA coming in.]

GEORGE: Oh—hello, Mrs. Younger.

MAMA: Hello, George, how you feeling?

GEORGE: Fine—fine, how are you?

MAMA: Oh, a little tired. You know them steps can get you after a day's work.

You all have a nice time tonight?

GEORGE: Yes—a fine time. Well, good night.
