MAMA: Good night. [He exits. MAMA closes the door behind her.] Hello, honey.

What you sitting like that for?

BENEATHA: I'm just sitting.

MAMA: Didn't you have a nice time?

BENEATHA: No.

MAMA: No? What's the matter?

BENEATHA: Mama, George is a fool—honest. [She rises.]

MAMA: [Hustling around unloading the packages she has entered with. She stops.]

Is he, baby?

BENEATHA: Yes.

[BENEATHA makes up TRAVIS' bed as she talks.]

MAMA: You sure?

BENEATHA: Yes.

MAMA: Well—I guess you better not waste your time with no fools.

[BENEATHA looks up at her mother, watching her put groceries in the refrigerator. Finally she gathers up her things and starts into the bedroom. At the door she stops and looks back at her mother.]

BENEATHA: Mama—

MAMA: Yes, baby—

BENEATHA: Thank you.

MAMA: For what?

BENEATHA: For understanding me this time.

[She exits quickly and the mother stands, smiling a little, looking at the place where BENEATHA just stood. RUTH enters.]

RUTH: Now don't you fool with any of this stuff, Lena—

MAMA: Oh, I just thought I'd sort a few things out.

[The phone rings. RUTH answers.]

RUTH: [At the phone.] Hello—Just a minute. [Goes to door.] Walter, it's Mrs. Arnold. [Waits. Goes back to the phone. Tense.] Hello. Yes, this is his wife speaking . . . He's lying down now. Yes . . . well, he'll be in tomorrow. He's been very sick. Yes—I know we should have called, but we were so sure he'd be able to come in today. Yes—yes, I'm very sorry. Yes . . . Thank you very much. [She hangs up. WALTER is standing in the doorway of the bedroom behind her.] That was Mrs. Arnold.

WALTER: [Indifferently.] Was it?

RUTH: She said if you don't come in tomorrow that they are getting a new man . . .

WALTER: Ain't that sad—ain't that crying sad.

RUTH: She said Mr. Arnold has had to take a cab for three days . . . Walter, you ain't been to work for three days! [This is a revelation to her.] Where you been, Walter Lee Younger? [WALTER looks at her and starts to laugh.] You're going to lose your job.

WALTER: That's right . . .

RUTH: Oh, Walter, and with your mother working like a dog every day—

WALTER: That's sad too—Everything is sad.

MAMA: What you been doing for these three days, son?

WALTER: Mama—you don't know all the things a man what got leisure can find to do in this city . . . What's this—Friday night? Well—Wednesday I borrowed Willy Harris' car and I went for a drive . . . just me and myself and I drove and drove . . . Way out . . . way past South Chicago, and I parked the car and I sat and looked at the steel mills all day long. I just sat in the car and looked at them big black chimneys for hours. Then I drove back and I went to the Green Hat. [Pause.] And Thursday—Thursday I borrowed the car again and I got in it and I pointed it the other way and I drove the other way—for hours—way, way up to Wisconsin, and I looked at the farms. I just drove and looked at the farms. Then I drove back and I went to the Green Hat. [Pause.] And today—today I didn't get the car. Today I just walked. All over the Southside. And I looked at the Negroes and they looked at me and finally I just sat down on the curb at Thirty-ninth and South Parkway and I just sat there and watched the Negroes go by. And then I went to the Green Hat. You all sad? You all depressed? And you know where I am going right now—

[RUTH goes out quietly.]

MAMA: Oh, Big Walter, is this the harvest of our days?

WALTER: You know what I like about the Green Hat? [He turns the radio on and a steamy, deep blues pours into the room.] I like this little cat they got there who blows a sax . . . He blows. He talks to me. He ain't but 'bout five feet tall and he's got a conked head⁹ and his eyes is always closed and he's all music—

MAMA: [Rising and getting some papers out of her handbag.] Walter—

WALTER: And there's this other guy who plays the piano . . . and they got a sound. I mean they can work on some music . . . They got the best little combo in the world in the Green Hat . . . You can just sit there and drink and listen to them three men play and you realize that don't nothing matter worth a damn, but just being there—

MAMA: I've helped do it to you, haven't I, son? Walter, I been wrong.

WALTER: Naw—you ain't never been wrong about nothing, Mama.

MAMA: Listen to me, now. I say I been wrong, son. That I been doing to you what the rest of the world been doing to you. [She stops and he looks up slowly

9. Straightened hair.

at her and she meets his eyes pleadingly.] Walter—what you ain't never understood is that I ain't got nothing, don't own nothing, ain't never really wanted nothing that wasn't for you. There ain't nothing as precious to me . . . There ain't nothing worth holding on to, money, dreams, nothing else—if it means—if it means it's going to destroy my boy. [She puts her papers in front of him and he watches her without speaking or moving.] I paid the man thirty-five hundred dollars down on the house. That leaves sixty-five hundred dollars. Monday morning I want you to take this money and take three thousand dollars and put it in a savings account for Beneatha's medical schooling. The rest you put in a checking account—with your name on it. And from now on any penny that come out of it or that go in it is for you to look after. For you to decide. [She drops her hands a little helplessly.] It ain't much, but it's all I got in the world and I'm putting it in your hands. I'm telling you to be the head of this family from now on like you supposed to be.

WALTER: [Stares at the money.] You trust me like that, Mama?

MAMA: I ain't never stop trusting you. Like I ain't never stop loving you.

[She goes out, and WALTER sits looking at the money on the table as the music continues in its idiom, pulsing in the room. Finally, in a decisive gesture, he gets up, and, in mingled joy and desperation, picks up the money. At the same moment, TRAVIS enters for bed.]

TRAVIS: What's the matter, Daddy? You drunk?

WALTER: [Sweetly, more sweetly than we have ever known him.] No, Daddy ain't drunk. Daddy ain't going to never be drunk again. . . .

TRAVIS: Well, good night, Daddy.

[The father has come from behind the couch and leans over, embracing his son.]

WALTER: Son, I feel like talking to you tonight.

TRAVIS: About what?

WALTER: Oh, about a lot of things. About you and what kind of man you going to be when you grow up . . . Son—son, what do you want to be when you grow up?

TRAVIS: A bus driver.

WALTER: [Laughing a little.] A what? Man, that ain't nothing to want to be!

TRAVIS: Why not?

WALTER: 'Cause, man—it ain't big enough—you know what I mean.

TRAVIS: I don't know then. I can't make up my mind. Sometimes Mama asks me that too. And sometimes when I tell her I just want to be like you—she says she don't want me to be like that and sometimes she says she does . . .

WALTER: [Gathering him up in his arms.] You know what, Travis? In seven years you going to be seventeen years old. And things is going to be very different with us in seven years, Travis . . . One day when you are seventeen I'll come home—home from my office downtown somewhere—

TRAVIS: You don't work in no office, Daddy.

WALTER: No—but after tonight. After what your daddy gonna do tonight, there's going to be offices—a whole lot of offices . . .

TRAVIS: What you gonna do tonight, Daddy?

WALTER: You wouldn't understand yet, son, but your daddy's gonna make a transaction . . . a business transaction that's going to change our lives . . . That's how come one day when you 'bout seventeen years old I'll come home and I'll be pretty tired, you know what I mean, after a day of conferences and secretaries getting things wrong the way they do . . . 'cause an executive's life is hell, man— [The more he talks the farther away he gets.] And I'll pull the car up on the driveway . . . just a plain black Chrysler, I think, with white walls—no—black tires. More elegant. Rich people don't have to be flashy . . . though I'll have to get something a little sportier for Ruth—maybe a Cadillac convertible to do her shopping in . . . And I'll come up the steps to the house and the gardener will be clipping away at the hedges and he'll say, "Good evening, Mr. Younger." And I'll say, "Hello, Jefferson, how are you this evening?" And I'll go inside and Ruth will come downstairs and meet me at the door and we'll kiss each other and she'll take my arm and we'll go up to your room to see you sitting on the floor with the catalogues of all the great schools in America around you . . . All the great schools in the world. And—and I'll say, all right son—it's your seventeenth birthday, what is it you've decided? . . . Just tell me where you want to go to school and you'll go. Just tell me, what it is you want to be—and you'll be it . . . Whatever you want to be—Yessir! [He holds his arms open for TRAVIS.] You just name it, son . . . [TRAVIS leaps into them.] and I hand you the world!

[WALTER'S voice has risen in pitch and hysterical promise and on the last line he lifts TRAVIS high.]

[BLACKOUT.]

Scene Three

Time: Saturday, moving day, one week later.

Before the curtain rises, RUTH'S voice, a strident, dramatic church alto, cuts through the silence.

It is, in the darkness, a triumphant surge, a penetrating statement of expectation: "Oh, Lord, I don't feel no ways tired! Children, oh, glory hallelujah!"

As the curtain rises we see that RUTH is alone in the living room, finishing up the family's packing. It is moving day. She is nailing crates and tying cartons. BENEATHA enters, carrying a guitar case, and watches her exuberant sister-in-law.

RUTH: Hey!

BENEATHA: [Putting away the case.] Hi.

RUTH: [Pointing at a package.] Honey—look in that package there and see what I found on sale this morning at the South Center. [RUTH gets up and moves to the package and draws out some curtains.] Lookahere—hand-turned hems!

BENEATHA: How do you know the window size out there?

RUTH: [Who hadn't thought of that.] Oh—Well, they bound to fit something in the whole house. Anyhow, they was too good a bargain to pass up. [RUTH slaps her head, suddenly remembering something.] Oh, Bennie—I meant to put a special note on that carton over there. That's your mama's good china and she wants 'em to be very careful with it.

BENEATHA: I'll do it.

[BENEATHA finds a piece of paper and starts to draw large letters on it.]

RUTH: You know what I'm going to do soon as I get in that new house?

BENEATHA: What?

RUTH: Honey—I'm going to run me a tub of water up to here . . . [With her fingers practically up to her nostrils.] And I'm going to get in it—and I am going to sit . . . and sit . . . and sit in that hot water and the first person who knocks to tell me to hurry up and come out—

BENEATHA: Gets shot at sunrise.

RUTH: [Laughing happily.] You said it, sister! [Noticing how large BENEATHA is absentmindedly making the note.] Honey, they ain't going to read that from no airplane.

BENEATHA: [Laughing herself.] I guess I always think things have more emphasis if they are big, somehow.

RUTH: [Looking up at her and smiling.] You and your brother seem to have that as a philosophy of life. Lord, that man—done changed so 'round here. You know—you know what we did last night? Me and Walter Lee?

BENEATHA: What?

RUTH: [Smiling to herself.] We went to the movies. [Looking at BENEATHA to see if she understands.] We went to the movies. You know the last time me and Walter went to the movies together?

BENEATHA: No.

RUTH: Me neither. That's how long it been. [Smiling again.] But we went last night. The picture wasn't much good, but that didn't seem to matter. We went—and we held hands.

BENEATHA: Oh, Lord!

RUTH: We held hands—and you know what?

BENEATHA: What?

RUTH: When we come out of the show it was late and dark and all the stores and things was closed up . . . and it was kind of chilly and there wasn't many people on the streets . . . and we was still holding hands, me and Walter.

BENEATHA: You're killing me.

[WALTER enters with a large package. His happiness is deep in him; he cannot keep still with his new-found exuberance. He is singing and wiggling and snapping his fingers. He puts his package in a corner and puts a phonograph record, which he has brought in with him, on the record player. As the music comes up he dances over to RUTH and tries to get her to dance with him. She gives in at last to his raunchiness and in a fit of giggling allows herself to be drawn into his mood and together they deliberately burlesque an old social dance of their youth.]

BENEATHA: [Regarding them a long time as they dance, then drawing in her breath for a deeply exaggerated comment which she does not particularly mean.] Talk about—old-fashioned—Negroes!

WALTER: [Stopping momentarily.] What kind of Negroes?

[He says this in fun. He is not angry with her today, nor with anyone. He starts to dance with his wife again.]

BENEATHA: Old-fashioned.

WALTER: [As he dances with RUTH.] You know, when these New Negroes have their convention— [Pointing at his sister.] —that is going to be the chairman of the Committee on Unending Agitation. [He goes on dancing, then stops.] Race, race, race! . . . Girl, I do believe you are the first person in the history of the entire human race to successfully brainwash yourself. [BENEATHA breaks up and he goes on dancing. He stops again, enjoying his tease.] Damn, even the N double A C P¹ takes a holiday sometimes! [BENEATHA and RUTH laugh. He dances with RUTH some more and starts to laugh and stops and pantomimes someone over an operating table.] I can just see that chick someday looking down at some poor cat on an operating table before she starts to slice him, saying . . . [Pulling his sleeves back maliciously.] “By the way, what are your views on civil rights down there? . . .”

[He laughs at her again and starts to dance happily. The bell sounds.]

BENEATHA: Sticks and stones may break my bones but . . . words will never hurt me!

[BENEATHA goes to the door and opens it as WALTER and RUTH go on with the clowning. BENEATHA is somewhat surprised to see a quiet-looking middle-aged white man in a business suit holding his hat and a briefcase in his hand and consulting a small piece of paper.]

MAN: Uh—how do you do, miss. I am looking for a Mrs.— [He looks at the slip of paper.] Mrs. Lena Younger?

BENEATHA: [Smoothing her hair with slight embarrassment.] Oh—yes, that’s my mother. Excuse me [She closes the door and turns to quiet the other two.] Ruth! Brother! Somebody’s here. [Then she opens the door. The MAN casts a curious quick glance at all of them.] Uh—come in please.

MAN: [Coming in.] Thank you.

BENEATHA: My mother isn’t here just now. Is it business?

MAN: Yes . . . well, of a sort.

WALTER: [Freely, the Man of the House.] Have a seat. I’m Mrs. Younger’s son. I look after most of her business matters.

[RUTH and BENEATHA exchange amused glances.]

MAN: [Regarding WALTER, and sitting.] Well—My name is Karl Lindner . . .

WALTER: [Stretching out his hand.] Walter Younger. This is my wife— [RUTH nods politely.] —and my sister.

LINDNER: How do you do.

WALTER: [Amiably, as he sits himself easily on a chair, leaning with interest forward on his knees and looking expectantly into the newcomer’s face.] What can we do for you, Mr. Lindner!

LINDNER: [Some minor shuffling of the hat and briefcase on his knees.] Well—I am a representative of the Clybourne Park Improvement Association—

WALTER: [Pointing.] Why don’t you sit your things on the floor?

1. National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, civil rights organization founded in 1909.

LINDNER: Oh—yes. Thank you. [He slides the briefcase and hat under the chair.]
 And as I was saying—I am from the Clybourne Park Improvement Association and we have had it brought to our attention at the last meeting that you people—or at least your mother—has bought a piece of residential property at— [He digs for the slip of paper again.]—four o six Clybourne Street . . .

WALTER: That's right. Care for something to drink? Ruth, get Mr. Lindner a beer.

LINDNER: [Upset for some reason.] Oh—no, really. I mean thank you very much, but no thank you.

RUTH: [Innocently.] Some coffee?

LINDNER: Thank you, nothing at all.

[BENEATHA is watching the man carefully.]

LINDNER: Well, I don't know how much you folks know about our organization. [He is a gentle man; thoughtful and somewhat labored in his manner.] It is one of these community organizations set up to look after—oh, you know, things like block upkeep and special projects and we also have what we call our New Neighbors Orientation Committee . . .

BENEATHA: [Drily.] Yes—and what do they do?

LINDNER: [Turning a little to her and then returning the main force to WALTER.]

Well—it's what you might call a sort of welcoming committee, I guess. I mean they, we, I'm the chairman of the committee—go around and see the new people who move into the neighborhood and sort of give them the low-down on the way we do things out in Clybourne Park.

BENEATHA: [With appreciation of the two meanings, which escape RUTH and WALTER.] Un-huh.

LINDNER: And we also have the category of what the association calls— [He looks elsewhere.]—uh—special community problems . . .

BENEATHA: Yes—and what are some of those?

WALTER: Girl, let the man talk.

LINDNER: [With understated relief.] Thank you. I would sort of like to explain this thing in my own way. I mean I want to explain to you in a certain way.

WALTER: Go ahead.

LINDNER: Yes. Well. I'm going to try to get right to the point. I'm sure we'll all appreciate that in the long run.

BENEATHA: Yes.

WALTER: Be still now!

LINDNER: Well—

RUTH: [Still innocently.] Would you like another chair—you don't look comfortable.

LINDNER: [More frustrated than annoyed.] No, thank you very much. Please. Well—to get right to the point I— [A great breath, and he is off at last.] I am sure you people must be aware of some of the incidents which have happened in various parts of the city when colored people have moved into certain areas— [BENEATHA exhales heavily and starts tossing a piece of fruit up and down in the air.] Well—because we have what I think is going to be a unique type of organization in American community life—not only do we deplore that kind of thing—but we are trying to do something about it.

[BENEATHA stops tossing and turns with a new and quizzical interest to the man.] We feel— [Gaining confidence in his mission because of the interest in the faces of the people he is talking to.] —we feel that most of the trouble in this world, when you come right down to it— [He hits his knee for emphasis.] —most of the trouble exists because people just don't sit down and talk to each other.

RUTH: [Nodding as she might in church, pleased with the remark.] You can say that again, mister.

LINDNER: [More encouraged by such affirmation.] That we don't try hard enough in this world to understand the other fellow's problem. The other guy's point of view.

RUTH: Now that's right.

[BENEATHA and WALTER merely watch and listen with genuine interest.]

LINDNER: Yes—that's the way we feel out in Clybourne Park. And that's why I was elected to come here this afternoon and talk to you people. Friendly like, you know, the way people should talk to each other and see if we couldn't find some way to work this thing out. As I say, the whole business is a matter of caring about the other fellow. Anybody can see that you are a nice family of folks, hard working and honest I'm sure. [BENEATHA frowns slightly, quizzically, her head tilted regarding him.] Today everybody knows what it means to be on the outside of something. And of course, there is always somebody who is out to take the advantage of people who don't always understand.

WALTER: What do you mean?

LINDNER: Well—you see our community is made up of people who've worked hard as the dickens for years to build up that little community. They're not rich and fancy people; just hard-working, honest people who don't really have much but those little homes and a dream of the kind of community they want to raise their children in. Now, I don't say we are perfect and there is a lot wrong in some of the things they want. But you've got to admit that a man, right or wrong, has the right to want to have the neighborhood he lives in a certain kind of way. And at the moment the overwhelming majority of our people out there feel that people get along better, take more of a common interest in the life of the community, when they share a common background. I want you to believe me when I tell you that race prejudice simply doesn't enter into it. It is a matter of the people of Clybourne Park believing, rightly or wrongly, as I say, that for the happiness of all concerned that our Negro families are happier when they live in their own communities.

BENEATHA: [With a grand and bitter gesture.] This, friends, is the Welcoming Committee!

WALTER: [Dumfounded, looking at LINDNER.] Is this what you came marching all the way over here to tell us?

LINDNER: Well, now we've been having a fine conversation. I hope you'll hear me all the way through.

WALTER: [Tightly.] Go ahead, man.

LINDNER: You see—in the face of all things I have said, we are prepared to make your family a very generous offer . . .

BENEATHA: Thirty pieces and not a coin less!²

WALTER: Yeah?

LINDNER: [Putting on his glasses and drawing a form out of the briefcase.] Our association is prepared, through the collective effort of our people, to buy the house from you at a financial gain to your family.

RUTH: Lord have mercy, ain't this the living gall!

WALTER: All right, you through?

LINDNER: Well, I want to give you the exact terms of the financial arrangement—

WALTER: We don't want to hear no exact terms of no arrangements. I want to know if you got any more to tell us 'bout getting together?

LINDNER: [Taking off his glasses.] Well—I don't suppose that you feel . . .

WALTER: Never mind how I feel—you got any more to say 'bout how people ought to sit down and talk to each other? . . . Get out of my house, man.

[He turns his back and walks to the door.]

LINDNER: [Looking around at the hostile faces and reaching and assembling his hat and briefcase.] Well—I don't understand why you people are reacting this way. What do you think you are going to gain by moving into a neighborhood where you just aren't wanted and where some elements—well—people can get awful worked up when they feel that their whole way of life and everything they've ever worked for is threatened.

WALTER: Get out.

LINDNER: [At the door, holding a small card.] Well—I'm sorry it went like this.

WALTER: Get out.

LINDNER: [Almost sadly regarding WALTER.] You just can't force people to change their hearts, son.

[He turns and puts his card on a table and exits. WALTER pushes the door to with stinging hatred, and stands looking at it. RUTH just sits and BENEATHA just stands. They say nothing. MAMA and TRAVIS enter.]

MAMA: Well—this all the packing got done since I left out of here this morning. I testify before God that my children got all the energy of the dead. What time the moving men due?

BENEATHA: Four o'clock. You had a caller, Mama.

[She is smiling, teasingly.]

MAMA: Sure enough—who?

BENEATHA: [Her arms folded saucily.] The Welcoming Committee.

[WALTER and RUTH giggle.]

MAMA: [Innocently.] Who?

BENEATHA: The Welcoming Committee. They said they're sure going to be glad to see you when you get there.

WALTER: [Devilishly.] Yeah, they said they can't hardly wait to see your face.

[Laughter.]

2. See Matthew 26.15, in which Judas Iscariot is paid thirty pieces of silver to betray Jesus.

MAMA: [Sensing their facetiousness.] What's the matter with you all?

WALTER: Ain't nothing the matter with us. We just telling you 'bout the gentleman who came to see you this afternoon. From the Clybourne Park Improvement Association.

MAMA: What he want?

RUTH: [In the same mood as BENEATHA and WALTER.] To welcome you, honey.

WALTER: He said they can't hardly wait. He said the one thing they don't have, that they just dying to have out there is a fine family of colored people! [To RUTH and BENEATHA.] Ain't that right!

RUTH AND BENEATHA: [Mockingly.] Yeah! He left his card in case—

[They indicate the card, and MAMA picks it up and throws it on the floor—understanding and looking off as she draws her chair up to the table on which she has put her plant and some sticks and some cord.]

MAMA: Father, give us strength. [Knowingly—and without fun.] Did he threaten us?

BENEATHA: Oh—Mama—they don't do it like that anymore. He talked Brotherhood. He said everybody ought to learn how to sit down and hate each other with good Christian fellowship.

[She and WALTER shake hands to ridicule the remark.]

MAMA: [Sadly.] Lord, protect us . . .

RUTH: You should hear the money those folks raised to buy the house from us. All we paid and then some.

BENEATHA: What they think we going to do—eat 'em?

RUTH: No, honey, marry 'em.

MAMA: [Shaking her head.] Lord, Lord, Lord . . .

RUTH: Well—that's the way the crackers crumble. Joke.

BENEATHA: [Laughingly noticing what her mother is doing.] Mama, what are you doing?

MAMA: Fixing my plant so it won't get hurt none on the way . . .

BENEATHA: Mama, you going to take that to the new house?

MAMA: Un-huh—

BENEATHA: That raggedy-looking old thing?

MAMA: [Stopping and looking at her.] It expresses me.

RUTH: [With delight, to BENEATHA.] So there, Miss Thing!

[WALTER comes to MAMA suddenly and bends down behind her and squeezes her in his arms with all his strength. She is overwhelmed by the suddenness of it and, though delighted, her manner is like that of RUTH with TRAVIS.]

MAMA: Look out now, boy! You make me mess up my thing here!

WALTER: [His face lit, he slips down on his knees beside her, his arms still about her.] Mama . . . you know what it means to climb up in the chariot?

MAMA: [Gruffly, very happy.] Get on away from me now . . .

RUTH: [Near the gift-wrapped package, trying to catch WALTER's eye.] Psst—

WALTER: What the old song say, Mama . . .

RUTH: Walter—Now?

[She is pointing at the package.]

WALTER: [Speaking the lines, sweetly, playfully, in his mother's face.]

I got wings . . . you got wings . . .
All God's Children got wings³ . . .

MAMA: Boy—get out of my face and do some work . . .

WALTER:

When I get to heaven gonna put on my wings,
Gonna fly all over God's heaven . . .

BENEATHA: [Teasingly, from across the room.] Everybody talking 'bout heaven ain't going there!

WALTER: [To RUTH, who is carrying the box across to them.] I don't know, you think we ought to give her that . . . Seems to me she ain't been very appreciative around here.

MAMA: [Eying the box, which is obviously a gift.] What is that?

WALTER: [Taking it from RUTH and putting it on the table in front of MAMA.]

Well—what you all think? Should we give it to her?

RUTH: Oh—she was pretty good today.

MAMA: I'll good you—

[She turns her eyes to the box again.]

BENEATHA: Open it, Mama.

[She stands up, looks at it, turns and looks at all of them, and then presses her hands together and does not open the package.]

WALTER: [Sweetly.] Open it, Mama. It's for you. [MAMA looks in his eyes. It is the first present in her life without its being Christmas. Slowly she opens her package and lifts out, one by one, a brand-new sparkling set of gardening tools.

WALTER continues, prodding.] Ruth made up the note—read it . . .

MAMA: [Picking up the card and adjusting her glasses.] “To our own Mrs. Miniver⁴—Love from Brother, Ruth and Beneatha.” Ain't that lovely . . .

TRAVIS: [Tugging at his father's sleeve.] Daddy, can I give her mine now?

WALTER: All right, son. [TRAVIS flies to get his gift.] Travis didn't want to go in with the rest of us, Mama. He got his own. [Somewhat amused.] We don't know what it is . . .

TRAVIS: [Racing back in the room with a large hatbox and putting it in front of his grandmother.] Here!

MAMA: Lord have mercy, baby. You done gone and bought your grandmother a hat?

TRAVIS: [Very proud.] Open it!

[She does and lifts out an elaborate, but very elaborate, wide gardening hat, and all the adults break up at the sight of it.]

RUTH: Travis, honey, what is that?

3. Lines from an African American spiritual. Walter's and Beneatha's next lines are also from the song.

4. Courageous, charismatic title character of a 1942 film starring Greer Garson.

TRAVIS: [Who thinks it is beautiful and appropriate.] It's a gardening hat! Like the ladies always have on in the magazines when they work in their gardens.

BENEATHA: [Giggling fiercely.] Travis—we were trying to make Mama Mrs. Miniver—not Scarlett O'Hara!⁵

MAMA: [Indignantly.] What's the matter with you all! This here is a beautiful hat! [Absurdly.] I always wanted me one just like it!

[She pops it on her head to prove it to her grandson, and the hat is ludicrous and considerably oversized.]

RUTH: Hot dog! Go, Mama!

WALTER: [Doubled over with laughter.] I'm sorry, Mama—but you look like you ready to go out and chop you some cotton sure enough!

[They all laugh except MAMA, out of deference to TRAVIS' feelings.]

MAMA: [Gathering the boy up to her.] Bless your heart—this is the prettiest hat I ever owned— [WALTER, RUTH and BENEATHA chime in—noisily, festively and insincerely congratulating TRAVIS on his gift.] What are we all standing around here for? We ain't finished packin' yet. Bennie, you ain't packed one book.

[The bell rings.]

BENEATHA: That couldn't be the movers . . . it's not hardly two good yet—

[BENEATHA goes into her room. MAMA starts for door.]

WALTER: [Turning, stiffening.] Wait—wait—I'll get it.

[He stands and looks at the door.]

MAMA: You expecting company, son?

WALTER: [Just looking at the door.] Yeah—yeah . . .

[MAMA looks at RUTH, and they exchange innocent and unfrightened glances.] MAMA: [Not understanding.] Well, let them in, son.

BENEATHA: [From her room.] We need some more string.

MAMA: Travis—you run to the hardware and get me some string cord.

[MAMA goes out and WALTER turns and looks at RUTH. TRAVIS goes to a dish for money.]

RUTH: Why don't you answer the door, man?

WALTER: [Suddenly bounding across the floor to her.] 'Cause sometimes it hard to let the future begin! [Stooping down in her face.]

I got wings! You got wings!
All God's children got wings!

[He crosses to the door and throws it open. Standing there is a very slight little man in a not too prosperous business suit and with haunted frightened eyes and a hat pulled down tightly, brim up, around his forehead. TRAVIS passes] between the men and exits. WALTER leans deep in the man's face, still in his jubilation.]

When I get to heaven gonna put on my wings,
Gonna fly all over God's heaven . . .

[The little man just stares at him.]

Heaven—

[Suddenly he stops and looks past the little man into the empty hallway.]
Where's Willy, man?

BOBO: He ain't with me.

WALTER: [Not disturbed.] Oh—come on in. You know my wife.

BOBO: [Dumbly, taking off his hat.] Yes—h'you, Miss Ruth.

RUTH: [Quietly, a mood apart from her husband already, seeing BOBO.] Hello, Bobo.

WALTER: You right on time today . . . Right on time. That's the way! [He slaps BOBO on his back.] Sit down . . . lemme hear.

[RUTH stands stiffly and quietly in back of them, as though somehow she senses death, her eyes fixed on her husband.]

BOBO: [His frightened eyes on the floor, his hat in his hands.] Could I please get a drink of water, before I tell you about it, Walter Lee?

[WALTER does not take his eyes off the man. RUTH goes blindly to the tap and gets a glass of water and brings it to BOBO.]

WALTER: There ain't nothing wrong, is there?

BOBO: Lemme tell you—

WALTER: Man—didn't nothing go wrong?

BOBO: Lemme tell you—Walter Lee. [Looking at RUTH and talking to her more than to WALTER.] You know how it was. I got to tell you how it was. I mean first I got to tell you how it was all the way . . . I mean about the money I put in, Walter Lee . . .

WALTER: [With taut agitation now.] What about the money you put in?

BOBO: Well—it wasn't much as we told you—me and Willy— [He stops.] I'm sorry, Walter. I got a bad feeling about it. I got a real bad feeling about it . . .

WALTER: Man, what you telling me about all this for? . . . Tell me what happened in Springfield . . .

BOBO: Springfield.

RUTH: [Like a dead woman.] What was supposed to happen in Springfield?

BOBO: [To her.] This deal that me and Walter went into with Willy—Me and Willy was going to go down to Springfield and spread some money 'round so's we wouldn't have to wait so long for the liquor license . . . That's what we were going to do. Everybody said that was the way you had to do, you understand, Miss Ruth?

WALTER: Man—what happened down there?

BOBO: [A pitiful man, near tears.] I'm trying to tell you, Walter.

WALTER: [Screaming at him suddenly.] THEN TELL ME, GODDAMMIT . . .
 WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH YOU?

BOBO: Man . . . I didn't go to no Springfield, yesterday.

WALTER: [Halted, life hanging in the moment.] Why not?

BOBO: [The long way, the hard way to tell.] 'Cause I didn't have no reasons to . . .

WALTER: Man, what are you talking about!

BOBO: I'm talking about the fact that when I got to the train station yesterday morning—eight o'clock like we planned . . . Man—Willy didn't never show up.

WALTER: Why . . . where was he . . . where is he?

BOBO: That's what I'm trying to tell you . . . I don't know . . . I waited six hours . . . I called his house . . . and I waited . . . six hours . . . I waited in that train station six hours . . . [Breaking into tears.] That was all the extra money I had in the world . . . [Looking up at WALTER with the tears running down his face.] Man, Willy is gone.

WALTER: Gone, what you mean Willy is gone? Gone where? You mean he went by himself. You mean he went off to Springfield by himself—to take care of getting the license— [Turns and looks anxiously at RUTH.] You mean maybe he didn't want too many people in on the business down there? [Looks to RUTH again, as before.] You know Willy got his own ways. [Looks back to BOBO.] Maybe you was late yesterday and he just went on down there without you. Maybe—maybe—he's been callin' you at home tryin' to tell you what happened or something. Maybe—maybe—he just got sick. He's somewhere—he's got to be somewhere. We just got to find him—me and you got to find him. [Grabs BOBO senselessly by the collar and starts to shake him.] We got to!

BOBO: [In sudden angry, frightened agony.] What's the matter with you, Walter! When a cat take off with your money he don't leave you no maps!

WALTER: [Turning madly, as though he is looking for WILLY in the very room.] Willy! . . . Willy . . . don't do it . . . Please don't do it . . . Man, not with that money . . . Man, please, not with that money . . . Oh, God . . . Don't let it be true . . . [He is wandering around, crying out for WILLY and looking for him or perhaps for help from God.] Man . . . I trusted you . . . Man, I put my life in your hands . . . [He starts to crumple down on the floor as RUTH just covers her face in horror. MAMA opens the door and comes into the room, with BENEATHA behind her.] Man . . . [He starts to pound the floor with his fists, sobbing wildly.] That money is made out of my father's flesh . . .

BOBO: [Standing over him helplessly.] I'm sorry, Walter . . . [Only WALTER's sobs reply. BOBO puts on his hat.] I had my life staked on this deal, too . . .

[He exits.]

MAMA: [To WALTER.] Son— [She goes to him, bends down to him, talks to his bent head.] Son . . . Is it gone? Son, I gave you sixty-five hundred dollars. Is it gone? All of it? Beneatha's money too?

WALTER: [Lifting his head slowly.] Mama . . . I never . . . went to the bank at all . . .

MAMA: [Not wanting to believe him.] You mean . . . your sister's school money . . . you used that too . . . Walter? . . .

WALTER: Yessss! . . . All of it . . . It's all gone . . . [There is total silence. RUTH stands with her face covered with her hands; BENEATHA leans forlornly against a wall, fingering a piece of red ribbon from the mother's gift. MAMA stops and looks at her son without recognition and then, quite without thinking about it, starts to beat him senselessly in the face. BENEATHA goes to them and stops it.]

BENEATHA: Mama!

[MAMA stops and looks at both of her children and rises slowly and wanders vaguely, aimlessly away from them.]

MAMA: I seen . . . him . . . night after night . . . come in . . . and look at that rug . . . and then look at me . . . the red showing in his eyes . . . the veins moving in his head . . . I seen him grow thin and old before he was forty . . . working and working and working like somebody's old horse . . . killing himself . . . and you—you give it all away in a day . . .

BENEATHA: Mama—

MAMA: Oh, God . . . [She looks up to Him.] Look down here—and show me the strength.

BENEATHA: Mama—

MAMA: [Folding over.] Strength . . .

BENEATHA: [Plaintively.] Mama . . .

MAMA: Strength!

[CURTAIN.]

ACT III

An hour later.

At curtain, there is a sullen light of gloom in the living room, gray light not unlike that which began the first scene of Act I. At left we can see WALTER within his room, alone with himself. He is stretched out on the bed, his shirt out and open, his arms under his head. He does not smoke, he does not cry out, he merely lies there, looking up at the ceiling, much as if he were alone in the world.

In the living room BENEATHA sits at the table, still surrounded by the now almost ominous packing crates. She sits looking off. We feel that this is a mood struck perhaps an hour before, and it lingers now, full of the empty sound of profound disappointment. We see on a line from her brother's bedroom the sameness of their attitudes. Presently the bell rings and BENEATHA rises without ambition or interest in answering. It is ASAGAI, smiling broadly, striding into the room with energy and happy expectation and conversation.

ASAGAI: I came over . . . I had some free time. I thought I might help with the packing. Ah, I like the look of packing crates! A household in preparation for a journey! It depresses some people . . . but for me . . . it is another feeling. Something full of the flow of life, do you understand? Movement, progress . . . It makes me think of Africa.

BENEATHA: Africa!

ASAGAI: What kind of a mood is this? Have I told you how deeply you move me?

BENEATHA: He gave away the money, Asagai . . .

ASAGAI: Who gave away what money?

BENEATHA: The insurance money. My brother gave it away.

ASAGAI: Gave it away?

BENEATHA: He made an investment! With a man even Travis wouldn't have trusted.

ASAGAI: And it's gone?

BENEATHA: Gone!

ASAGAI: I'm very sorry . . . And you, now?

BENEATHA: Me? . . . Me? . . . Me, I'm nothing . . . Me. When I was very small . . . we used to take our sleds out in the wintertime and the only hills we had were the ice-covered stone steps of some houses down the street. And we used to fill them in with snow and make them smooth and slide down them all day . . . and it was very dangerous you know . . . far too steep . . . and sure enough one day a kid named Rufus came down too fast and hit the sidewalk . . . and we saw his face just split open right there in front of us . . . And I remember standing there looking at his bloody open face thinking that was the end of Rufus. But the ambulance came and they took him to the hospital and they fixed the broken bones and they sewed it all up . . . and the next time I saw Rufus he just had a little line down the middle of his face . . . I never got over that . . .

[WALTER sits up, listening on the bed. Throughout this scene it is important that we feel his reaction at all times, that he visibly respond to the words of his sister and ASAGAI.]

ASAGAI: What?

BENEATHA: That that was what one person could do for another, fix him up—sew up the problem, make him all right again. That was the most marvelous thing in the world . . . I wanted to do that. I always thought it was the one concrete thing in the world that a human being could do. Fix up the sick, you know—and make them whole again. This was truly being God . . .

ASAGAI: You wanted to be God?

BENEATHA: No—I wanted to cure. It used to be so important to me. I wanted to cure. It used to matter. I used to care. I mean about people and how their bodies hurt . . .

ASAGAI: And you've stopped caring?

BENEATHA: Yes—I think so.

ASAGAI: Why?

[WALTER rises, goes to the door of his room and is about to open it, then stops and stands listening, leaning on the door jamb.]

BENEATHA: Because it doesn't seem deep enough, close enough to what ails mankind—I mean this thing of sewing up bodies or administering drugs. Don't you understand? It was a child's reaction to the world. I thought that doctors had the secret to all the hurts . . . That's the way a child sees things—or an idealist.

ASAGAI: Children see things very well sometimes—and idealists even better.

BENEATHA: I know that's what you think. Because you are still where I left off—you still care. This is what you see for the world, for Africa. You with the dreams of the future will patch up all Africa—you are going to cure the Great Sore of colonialism with Independence—

ASAGAI: Yes!

BENEATHA: Yes—and you think that one word is the penicillin of the human spirit: “Independence!” But then what?

ASAGAI: That will be the problem for another time. First we must get there.

BENEATHA: And where does it end?

ASAGAI: End? Who even spoke of an end? To life? To living?

BENEATHA: An end to misery!

ASAGAI: [Smiling.] You sound like a French intellectual.

BENEATHA: No! I sound like a human being who just had her future taken right out of her hands! While I was sleeping in my bed in there, things were happening in this world that directly concerned me—and nobody asked me, consulted me—they just went out and did things—and changed my life. Don’t you see there isn’t any real progress, Asagai, there is only one large circle that we march in, around and around, each of us with our own little picture—in front of us—our own little mirage that we think is the future.

ASAGAI: That is the mistake.

BENEATHA: What?

ASAGAI: What you just said—about the circle. It isn’t a circle—it is simply a long line—as in geometry, you know, one that reaches into infinity. And because we cannot see the end—we also cannot see how it changes. And it is very odd but those who see the changes are called “idealists”—and those who cannot, or refuse to think, they are the “realists.” It is very strange, and amusing too, I think.

BENEATHA: You—you are almost religious.

ASAGAI: Yes . . . I think I have the religion of doing what is necessary in the world—and of worshipping man—because he is so marvelous, you see.

BENEATHA: Man is foul! And the human race deserves its misery!

ASAGAI: You see: you have become the religious one in the old sense. Already, and after such a small defeat, you are worshipping despair.

BENEATHA: From now on, I worship the truth—and the truth is that people are puny, small and selfish . . .

ASAGAI: Truth? Why is it that you despairing ones always think that only you have the truth? I never thought to see you like that. You! Your brother made a stupid, childish mistake—and you are grateful to him. So that now you can give up the ailing human race on account of it. You talk about what good is struggle; what good is anything? Where are we all going? And why are we bothering?

BENEATHA: And you cannot answer it! All your talk and dreams about Africa and Independence. Independence and then what? What about all the crooks and petty thieves and just plain idiots who will come into power to steal and plunder the same as before—only now they will be black and do it in the name of the new Independence—You cannot answer that.

ASAGAI: [Shouting over her.] I live the answer! [Pause.] In my village at home it is the exceptional man who can even read a newspaper . . . or who ever sees a book at all. I will go home and much of what I will have to say will seem strange to the people of my village . . . But I will teach and work and things will happen, slowly and swiftly. At times it will seem that nothing changes at all . . . and then again . . . the sudden dramatic events which make history leap into the future. And then quiet again. Retrogression even. Guns, murder, revolution. And I even will have moments when I wonder if the quiet was not better than all that death and hatred. But I will look about my village at the illiteracy and disease and ignorance and I will not wonder long. And perhaps . . . perhaps I will be a great man . . . I mean perhaps I will hold on to the substance of truth and find my way always with the right course . . . and perhaps for it I will be butchered in my bed some night by the servants of empire . . .

BENEATHA: The martyr!

ASAGAI: . . . or perhaps I shall live to be a very old man, respected and esteemed in my new nation . . . And perhaps I shall hold office and this is what I'm trying to tell you, Alaiyo; perhaps the things I believe now for my country will be wrong and outmoded, and I will not understand and do terrible things to have things my way or merely to keep my power. Don't you see that there will be young men and women, not British soldiers then, but my own black countrymen . . . to step out of the shadows some evening and slit my then useless throat? Don't you see they have always been there . . . that they always will be. And that such a thing as my own death will be an advance? They who might kill me even . . . actually replenish me!

BENEATHA: Oh, Asagai, I know all that.

ASAGAI: Good! Then stop moaning and groaning and tell me what you plan to do.

BENEATHA: Do?

ASAGAI: I have a bit of a suggestion.

BENEATHA: What?

ASAGAI: [Rather quietly for him.] That when it is all over—that you come home with me—

BENEATHA: [Slapping herself on the forehead with exasperation born of misunderstanding.] Oh—Asagai—at this moment you decide to be romantic!

ASAGAI: [Quickly understanding the misunderstanding.] My dear, young creature of the New World—I do not mean across the city—I mean across the ocean; home—to Africa.

BENEATHA: [Slowly understanding and turning to him with murmured amazement.] To—to Nigeria?

ASAGAI: Yes! . . . [Smiling and lifting his arms playfully.] Three hundred years later the African Prince rose up out of the seas and swept the maiden back across the middle passage⁶ over which her ancestors had come—BENEATHA: [Unable to play.] Nigeria?

ASAGAI: Nigeria. Home. [Coming to her with genuine romantic flippancy.] I will show you our mountains and our stars; and give you cool drinks from gourds and teach you the old songs and the ways of our people—and, in time, we will pretend that— [Very softly.] —you have only been away for a day—

[She turns her back to him, thinking. He swings her around and takes her full in his arms in a long embrace which proceeds to passion.]

BENEATHA: [Pulling away.] You're getting me all mixed up—

6. Term denoting the route traveled by slaves transported from Africa to the Americas.

ASAGAI: Why?

BENEATHA: Too many things—too many things have happened today. I must sit down and think. I don't know what I feel about anything right this minute.

[She promptly sits down and props her chin on her fist.]

ASAGAI: [Charmed.] All right, I shall leave you. No—don't get up. [Touching her, gently, sweetly.] Just sit awhile and think . . . Never be afraid to sit awhile and think. [He goes to door and looks at her.] How often I have looked at you and said, "Ah—so this is what the New World hath finally wrought . . ."⁷

[He exits. BENEATHA sits on alone. Presently WALTER enters from his room and starts to rummage through things, feverishly looking for something. She looks up and turns in her seat.]

BENEATHA: [Hissingly.] Yes—just look at what the New World hath wrought! . . . Just look! [She gestures with bitter disgust.] There he is! *Monsieur le petit bourgeois noir*⁸—himself! There he is—Symbol of a Rising Class! Entrepreneur! Titan of the system! [WALTER ignores her completely and continues frantically and destructively looking for something and hurling things to the floor and tearing things out of their place in his search. BENEATHA ignores the eccentricity of his actions and goes on with the monologue of insult.] Did you dream of yachts on Lake Michigan, Brother? Did you see yourself on that Great Day sitting down at the Conference Table, surrounded by all the mighty bald-headed men in America? All halted, waiting, breathless, waiting for your pronouncements on industry? Waiting for you—Chairman of the Board? [WALTER finds what he is looking for—a small piece of white paper—and pushes it in his pocket and puts on his coat and rushes out without ever having looked at her. She shouts after him.] I look at you and I see the final triumph of stupidity in the world!

[The door slams and she returns to just sitting again. RUTH comes quickly out of MAMA'S room.]

RUTH: Who was that?

BENEATHA: Your husband.

RUTH: Where did he go?

BENEATHA: Who knows—maybe he has an appointment at U.S. Steel.

RUTH: [Anxiously, with frightened eyes.] You didn't say nothing bad to him, did you?

BENEATHA: Bad? Say anything bad to him? No—I told him he was a sweet boy and full of dreams and everything is strictly peachy keen, as the ofay⁹ kids say!

[MAMA enters from her bedroom. She is lost, vague, trying to catch hold, to make some sense of her former command of the world, but it still eludes her. A sense of waste overwhelms her gait; a measure of apology rides on her shoulders. She goes to her plant, which has remained on the table, looks at it, picks it up and takes it to the window sill and sits it outside, and she stands and looks at it a long moment. Then she closes the window, straightens her body with effort and turns around to her children.]

MAMA: Well—ain't it a mess in here, though? [A false cheerfulness, a beginning of something.] I guess we all better stop moping around and get some work done. All this unpacking and everything we got to do. [RUTH raises her head slowly in response to the sense of the line; and BENEATHA in similar manner turns very slowly to look at her mother.] One of you all better call the moving people and tell 'em not to come.

RUTH: Tell 'em not to come?

MAMA: Of course, baby. Ain't no need in 'em coming all the way here and having to go back. They charges for that too. [She sits down, fingers to her brow, thinking.] Lord, ever since I was a little girl, I always remembers people saying, “Lena—Lena Eggleston, you aims too high all the time. You needs to slow down and see life a little more like it is. Just slow down some.” That's what they always used to say down home—“Lord, that Lena Eggleston is a high-minded thing. She'll get her due one day!”

RUTH: No, Lena . . .

MAMA: Me and Big Walter just didn't never learn right.

RUTH: Lena, no! We gotta go. Bennie—tell her . . . [She rises and crosses to BENEATHA with her arms outstretched. BENEATHA doesn't respond.] Tell her we can still move . . . the notes ain't but a hundred and twenty-five a month. We got four grown people in this house—we can work . . .

MAMA: [To herself.] Just aimed too high all the time—

RUTH: [Turning and going to MAMA fast—the words pouring out with urgency and desperation.] Lena—I'll work . . . I'll work twenty hours a day in all the kitchens in Chicago . . . I'll strap my baby on my back if I have to and scrub all the floors in America and wash all the sheets in America if I have to—but we got to move . . . We got to get out of here . . .

[MAMA reaches out absently and pats RUTH's hand.]

MAMA: No—I sees things differently now. Been thinking 'bout some of the things we could do to fix this place up some. I seen a second-hand bureau over on Maxwell Street¹ just the other day that could fit right there. [She points to where the new furniture might go. RUTH wanders away from her.] Would need some new handles on it and then a little varnish and then it look like something brand-new. And—we can put up them new curtains in the kitchen . . . Why this place be looking fine. Cheer us all up so that we forget trouble ever came . . . [To RUTH.] And you could get some nice screens to put up in your room round the baby's bassinet . . . [She looks at both of them, pleadingly.] Sometimes you just got to know when to give up some things . . . and hold on to what you got.

[WALTER enters from the outside, looking spent and leaning against the door, his coat hanging from him.]

MAMA: Where you been, son?

WALTER: [Breathing hard.] Made a call.

1. Street market southwest of the Loop.

MAMA: To who, son?

WALTER: To The Man.

MAMA: What man, baby?

WALTER: The Man, Mama. Don't you know who The Man is?

RUTH: Walter Lee?

WALTER: The Man. Like the guys in the streets say—The Man. Captain Boss—

Mistuh Charley . . . Old Captain Please Mr. Bossman . . .

BENEATHA: [Suddenly.] Lindner!

WALTER: That's right! That's good. I told him to come right over.

BENEATHA: [Fiercely, understanding.] For what? What do you want to see him for!

WALTER: [Looking at his sister.] We going to do business with him.

MAMA: What you talking 'bout, son?

WALTER: Talking 'bout life, Mama. You all always telling me to see life like it is.

Well—I laid in there on my back today . . . and I figured it out. Life just like it is. Who gets and who don't get. [He sits down with his coat on and laughs.]

Mama, you know it's all divided up. Life is. Sure enough. Between the takers and the "tooken." [He laughs.] I've figured it out finally. [He looks around at them.] Yeah. Some of us always getting "tooken." [He laughs.] People like Willy Harris, they don't never get "tooken." And you know why the rest of us do? 'Cause we all mixed up. Mixed up bad. We get to looking 'round for the right and the wrong, and we worry about it and cry about it and stay up nights trying to figure out 'bout the wrong and the right of things all the time . . . And all the time, man, them takers is out there operating, just taking and taking. Willy Harris? Shoot—Willy Harris don't even count. He don't even count in the big scheme of things. But I'll say one thing for old Willy Harris . . . he's taught me something. He's taught me to keep my eye on what counts in this world. Yeah— [Shouting out a little.] Thanks, Willy!

RUTH: What did you call that man for, Walter Lee?

WALTER: Called him to tell him to come on over to the show. Gonna put on a show for the man. Just what he wants to see. You see, Mama, the man came here today and he told us that them people out there where you want us to move—well they so upset they willing to pay us not to move out there. [He laughs again.]

And—and oh, Mama—you would of been proud of the way me and Ruth and Bennie acted. We told him to get out . . . Lord have mercy! We told the man to get out. Oh, we was some proud folks this afternoon, yeah.

[He lights a cigarette.] We were still full of that old-time stuff . . .

RUTH: [Coming toward him slowly.] You talking 'bout taking them people's money to keep us from moving in that house?

WALTER: I ain't just talking 'bout it, baby—I'm telling you that's what's going to happen.

BENEATHA: Oh, God! Where is the bottom! Where is the real honest-to-God bottom so he can't go any farther!

WALTER: See—that's the old stuff. You and that boy that was here today. You all want everybody to carry a flag and a spear and sing some marching songs, huh? You wanna spend your life looking into things and trying to find the right and the wrong part, huh? Yeah. You know what's going to happen to that boy someday—he'll find himself sitting in a dungeon, locked in forever—and the takers will have the key! Forget it, baby! There ain't no causes—there ain't nothing but taking in this world, and he who takes most is smartest—and it don't make a damn bit of difference how.

MAMA: You making something inside me cry, son. Some awful pain inside me.

WALTER: Don't cry, Mama. Understand. That white man is going to walk in that door able to write checks for more money than we ever had. It's important to him and I'm going to help him . . . I'm going to put on the show, Mama.

MAMA: Son—I come from five generations of people who was slaves and sharecroppers—but ain't nobody in my family never let nobody pay 'em no money that was a way of telling us we wasn't fit to walk the earth. We ain't never been that poor. [Raising her eyes and looking at him.] We ain't never been that dead inside.

BENEATHA: Well—we are dead now. All the talk about dreams and sunlight that goes on in this house. All dead.

WALTER: What's the matter with you all! I didn't make this world! It was give to me this way! Hell, yes, I want me some yachts someday! Yes, I want to hang some real pearls 'round my wife's neck. Ain't she supposed to wear no pearls? Somebody tell me—tell me, who decides which women is suppose to wear pearls in this world. I tell you I am a man—and I think my wife should wear some pearls in this world!

[This last line hangs a good while and WALTER begins to move about the room. The word "Man" has penetrated his consciousness; he mumbles it to himself repeatedly between strange agitated pauses as he moves about.]

MAMA: Baby, how you going to feel on the inside?

WALTER: Fine! . . . Going to feel fine . . . a man . . .

MAMA: You won't have nothing left then, Walter Lee.

WALTER: [Coming to her.] I'm going to feel fine, Mama. I'm going to look that son-of-a-bitch in the eyes and say— [He falters.] —and say, "All right, Mr. Lindner— [He falters even more.] —that's your neighborhood out there. You got the right to keep it like you want. You got the right to have it like you want. Just write the check and—the house is yours." And, and I am going to say— [His voice almost breaks.] And you—you people just put the money in my hand and you won't have to live next to this bunch of stinking niggers! . . . [He straightens up and moves away from his mother, walking around the room.] Maybe—maybe I'll just get down on my black knees . . . [He does so; RUTH and BENNIE and MAMA watch him in frozen horror.] Captain, Mistuh, Bossman. [He starts crying.] A-hee-hee-hee! [Wringing his hands in profoundly anguished imitation.] Yassss-suh! Great White Father, just gi' ussen de money, fo' God's sake, and we's ain't gwine come out deh and dirty up yo' white folks neighborhood . . .

BENEATHA: That is not a man. That is nothing but a toothless rat.

MAMA: Yes—death done come in this here house. [She is nodding, slowly, reflectively.] Done come walking in my house. On the lips of my children. You what supposed to be my beginning again. You—what supposed to be my harvest. [To BENEATHA.] You—you mourning your brother?

BENEATHA: He's no brother of mine.

MAMA: What you say?

BENEATHA: I said that that individual in that room is no brother of mine.

MAMA: That's what I thought you said. You feeling like you better than he is today? [BENEATHA does not answer.] Yes? What you tell him a minute ago? That he wasn't a man? Yes? You give him up for me? You done wrote his epitaph too—like the rest of the world? Well, who give you the privilege?

BENEATHA: Be on my side for once! You saw what he just did, Mama! You saw him—down on his knees. Wasn't it you who taught me—to despise any man who would do that. Do what he's going to do.

MAMA: Yes—I taught you that. Me and your daddy. But I thought I taught you something else too . . . I thought I taught you to love him.

BENEATHA: Love him? There is nothing left to love.

MAMA: There is always something left to love. And if you ain't learned that, you ain't learned nothing. [Looking at her.] Have you cried for that boy today? I don't mean for yourself and for the family 'cause we lost the money. I mean for him; what he been through and what it done to him. Child, when do you think is the time to love somebody the most; when they done good and made things easy for everybody? Well then, you ain't through learning—because that ain't the time at all. It's when he's at his lowest and can't believe in himself 'cause the world done whipped him so. When you starts measuring somebody, measure him right, child, measure him right. Make sure you done taken into account what hills and valleys he come through before he got to wherever he is.

[TRAVIS bursts into the room at the end of the speech, leaving the door open.]

TRAVIS: Grandmama—the moving men are downstairs! The truck just pulled up.

MAMA: [Turning and looking at him.] Are they, baby? They downstairs?

[She sighs and sits. LINDNER appears in the doorway. He peers in and knocks lightly, to gain attention, and comes in. All turn to look at him.]

LINDNER: [Hat and briefcase in hand.] Uh—hello . . . [RUTH crosses mechanically to the bedroom door and opens it and lets it swing open freely and slowly as the lights come up on WALTER within, still in his coat, sitting at the far corner of the room. He looks up and out through the room to LINDNER.]

RUTH: He's here.

[A long minute passes and WALTER slowly gets up.]

LINDNER: [Coming to the table with efficiency, putting his briefcase on the table and starting to unfold papers and unscrew fountain pens.] Well, I certainly was glad to hear from you people. [WALTER has begun the trek out of the room, slowly and awkwardly, rather like a small boy, passing the back of his sleeve across his mouth from time to time.] Life can really be so much simpler than people let it be most of the time. Well—with whom do I negotiate? You, Mrs. Younger, or your son here? [MAMA sits with her hands folded on her lap and her eyes closed as WALTER advances. TRAVIS goes close to LINDNER and looks at the papers curiously.] Just some official papers, sonny.

RUTH: Travis, you go downstairs.

MAMA: [Opening her eyes and looking into WALTER's.] No. Travis, you stay right here. And you make him understand what you doing, Walter Lee. You teach him good. Like Willy Harris taught you. You show where our five generations done come to. Go ahead, son—

WALTER: [Looks down into his boy's eyes. TRAVIS grins at him merrily and WALTER draws him beside him with his arm lightly around his shoulders.] Well, Mr. Lindner. [BENEATHA turns away.] We called you— [There is a profound, simple groping quality in his speech.] —because, well, me and my family [He looks around and shifts from one foot to the other.] Well—we are very plain people . . .

LINDNER: Yes—

WALTER: I mean—I have worked as a chauffeur most of my life—and my wife here, she does domestic work in people's kitchens. So does my mother. I mean—we are plain people . . .

LINDNER: Yes, Mr. Younger—

WALTER: [Really like a small boy, looking down at his shoes and then up at the man.] And—uh—well, my father, well, he was a laborer most of his life.

LINDNER: [Absolutely confused.] Uh, yes—

WALTER: [Looking down at his toes once again.] My father almost beat a man to death once because this man called him a bad name or something, you know what I mean?

LINDNER: No, I'm afraid I don't.

WALTER: [Finally straightening up.] Well, what I mean is that we come from people who had a lot of pride. I mean—we are very proud people. And that's my sister over there and she's going to be a doctor—and we are very proud—

LINDNER: Well—I am sure that is very nice, but—

WALTER: [Starting to cry and facing the man eye to eye.] What I am telling you is that we called you over here to tell you that we are very proud and that this is—this is my son, who makes the sixth generation of our family in this country, and that we have all thought about your offer and we have decided to move into our house because my father—my father—he earned it. [MAMA has her eyes closed and is rocking back and forth as though she were in church, with her head nodding the amen yes.] We don't want to make no trouble for nobody or fight no causes—but we will try to be good neighbors. That's all we got to say. [He looks the man absolutely in the eyes.] We don't want your money.

[He turns and walks away from the man.]

LINDNER: [Looking around at all of them.] I take it then that you have decided to occupy.

BENEATHA: That's what the man said.

LINDNER: [To MAMA in her reverie.] Then I would like to appeal to you, Mrs. Younger. You are older and wiser and understand things better I am sure . . .

MAMA: [Rising.] I am afraid you don't understand. My son said we was going to move and there ain't nothing left for me to say. [Shaking her head with double meaning.] You know how these young folks is nowadays, mister. Can't do a thing with 'em. Good-bye.

LINDNER: [Folding up his materials.] Well—if you are that final about it . . . There is nothing left for me to say. [He finishes. He is almost ignored by the family, who are concentrating on WALTER LEE. At the door LINDNER halts and looks around.] I sure hope you people know what you're doing.

[He shakes his head and exits.]

RUTH: [Looking around and coming to life.] Well, for God's sake—if the moving men are here—LET'S GET THE HELL OUT OF HERE!

MAMA: [Into action.] Ain't it the truth! Look at all this here mess. Ruth, put Travis' good jacket on him . . . Walter Lee, fix your tie and tuck your shirt in, you look just like somebody's hoodlum. Lord have mercy, where is my plant? [She flies to get it amid the general bustling of the family, who are deliberately trying to ignore the nobility of the past moment.] You all start on down . . . Travis child, don't go empty-handed . . . Ruth, where did I put that box with my skillet in it? I want to be in charge of it myself . . . I'm going to make us the biggest dinner we ever ate tonight . . . Beneatha, what's the matter with them stockings? Pull them things up, girl . . .

[The family starts to file out as two moving men appear and begin to carry out the heavier pieces of furniture, bumping into the family as they move about.]

BENEATHA: Mama, Asagai—asked me to marry him today and go to Africa—

MAMA: [In the middle of her getting-ready activity.] He did? You ain't old enough to marry nobody— [Seeing the moving men lifting one of her chairs precariously.] Darling, that ain't no bale of cotton, please handle it so we can sit in it again. I had that chair twenty-five years . . .

[The movers sigh with exasperation and go on with their work.]

BENEATHA: [Girlishly and unreasonably trying to pursue the conversation.] To go to Africa, Mama—be a doctor in Africa . . .

MAMA: [Distracted.] Yes, baby—

WALTER: Africa! What he want you to go to Africa for?

BENEATHA: To practice there . . .

WALTER: Girl, if you don't get all them silly ideas out your head! You better marry yourself a man with some loot . . .

BENEATHA: [Angrily, precisely as in the first scene of the play.] What have you got to do with who I marry!

WALTER: Plenty. Now I think George Murchison—

[He and BENEATHA go out yelling at each other vigorously; BENEATHA is heard saying that she would not marry GEORGE MURCHISON if he were Adam and she were Eve, etc. The anger is loud and real till their voices diminish. RUTH stands at the door and turns to MAMA and smiles knowingly.]

MAMA: [Fixing her hat at last.] Yeah—they something all right, my children . . .

RUTH: Yeah—they're something. Let's go, Lena.

MAMA: [Stalling, starting to look around at the house.] Yes—I'm coming. Ruth—RUTH: Yes?

MAMA: [Quietly, woman to woman.] He finally come into his manhood today, didn't he? Kind of like a rainbow after the rain . . .

RUTH: [Biting her lip lest her own pride explode in front of MAMA.] Yes, Lena.

[WALTER'S voice calls for them raucously.]

MAMA: [Waving RUTH out vaguely.] All right, honey—go on down. I be down directly.

[RUTH hesitates, then exits. MAMA stands, at last alone in the living room, her plant on the table before her as the lights start to come down. She looks around at all the walls and ceilings and suddenly, despite herself, while the children call below, a great heaving thing rises in her and she puts her fist to her mouth, takes a final desperate look, pulls her coat about her, pats her hat and goes out. The lights dim down. The door opens and she comes back in, grabs her plant, and goes out for the last time.]

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

LORRAINE HANSBERRY (1930–65)

From “Willie Loman, Walter Younger, and He Who Must Live” (1959)*

[. . .] Walter Younger is an American more than he is anything else. His ordeal [. . .] is not extraordinary but intensely familiar like Willy [Loman]’s [in Arthur Miller’s Death of a Salesman]. The two of them have virtually no values which have not come out of their culture, and to a significant point, no view of the possible solutions to their problems which do not also come out of the selfsame culture. Walter can find no peace with that part of society which seems to permit him no entry into that which has willfully excluded him. He shares with Willy Loman the acute awareness that something is obstructing some abstract progress that he feels he should be making; that something is in the way of his ascendancy. It does not occur to either of them to question the nature of this desired “ascendancy.” Walter accepts, he believes in the “world” as it has been presented to him. When we first meet him, he does not wish to alter it; merely to change his position in it. His mentors and his associates all take the view that the institutions which frustrate him are somehow impeccable, or, at best, “unfortunate.” “Things being as they are,” he must look to himself as the only source of any rewards he may expect. Within himself, he is encouraged to believe, are the only seeds of defeat or victory within the universe. And Walter believes this and when opportunity, haphazard and rooted in death, prevails, he acts.

HUGE OBSTACLES

But the obstacles [. . .] are gigantic; the weight of the loss of the money is in fact, the weight of death. In Walter Lee Younger’s life, somebody has to die for ten thousand bucks to pile up—if then. Elsewhere in the world, in the face of catastrophe, he might be tempted to don the saffron robes of acceptance and sit on a mountain top all day contemplating the divine justice of his misery. Or, history being what it is turning out to be, he might wander down to his first Communist Party meeting. But here in the dynamic and confusing postwar years on the Southside of Chicago, his choices of action are equal to those gestures only in symbolic terms. The American ghetto hero may give up and contemplate his misery in rose-colored bars to the melodies of hypnotic saxophones, but revolution seems alien to him in his circumstances (America), and it is easier to dream of personal wealth than of a communal state wherein universal dignity is supposed to be a corollary. Yet his position in time and space does allow for one other alternative; he may take his place on any one of a number of frontiers of challenge. Challenges (such as helping to break down restricted neighborhoods) which are admittedly limited because they most certainly do not threaten the basic social order.

NOT SO SMALL

But why is even this final choice possible [. . .]? Well, that is where Walter departs from Willy Loman; there is a second pulse in his still-dual culture. His people have had “somewhere” they have been trying to get for so long that more sophisticated confusions do not yet bind them. [. . .] Walter is, despite his lack of consciousness of it, inextricably as much wedded to his special mass as Willy was to his, and the moods of each are able to decisively determine the dramatic typicality. Furthermore, the very nature of the situation of American Negroes can force their representative hero to recognize that for his true ascendancy he must ultimately be at cross-purposes with at least certain of his culture’s values. It is to the pathos of Willy Loman that his section of American life seems to have momentarily lost that urgency; that he cannot, like Walter, draw on the strength of an incredible people who, historically, have simply refused to give up.

In other words, the symbolism of moving into the new house is quite as small as it seems and quite as significant. For if there are no waving flags and marching songs at the barricades as Walter marches out with his little battalion, it is not because the battle lacks nobility. On the contrary, he has picked up in his way, still imperfect and wobbly in his small view of human destiny, what I believe Arthur Miller once called “the golden thread of history.” He becomes, in spite of those who are too intrigued with despair and hatred of man to see it, King Oedipus refusing to tear out his eyes, but attacking the Oracle instead. He is that last Jewish patriot manning his rifle in the burning ghetto at Warsaw; [. . .] he is the nine small heroes of Little Rock; he is Michelangelo creating David and Beethoven bursting forth with the Ninth Symphony. He is all those things because he has finally reached out in his tiny moment and caught that sweet essence which is human dignity, and it shines like the gold star-touched dream that it is in his eyes. We see, in the moment, I think, what becomes, and not for Negroes alone, but for Willy and all of us, entirely an American responsibility.

Out in the darkness where we watch, most of us are not afraid to cry.

THE GREAT MIGRATION AND LIFE IN THE “BLACK METROPOLIS”

Richard Wright

*From Twelve Million Black Voices: A Folk History of the Negro in the United States (1941)*¹

Perhaps never in history has a more utterly unprepared folk wanted to go to the city; we were barely born as a folk when we headed for the tall and sprawling centers of steel and stone. We, who were landless upon the land; we, who had barely managed to live in family groups; [. . .] we who had never belonged to any organizations except the church and burial societies; we, who had had our personalities blasted with two hundred years of slavery and had been turned loose to shift for ourselves—we were such a folk as this when we moved into a world that was destined to test all we were, that threw us into the scales of competition to weigh our mettle. And how were we to know that, the moment we landless millions of the land—we men who were struggling to be born—set our awkward feet upon the pavements of the city, life would begin to exact of us a heavy toll in death?

We did not know what would happen, what was in store for us. We went innocently, longing and hoping for a life that the Lords of the Land would not let us live. Our hearts were high as we moved northward to the cities. What emotions, fears, what a complex of sensations we felt when, looking out of a train window at the revolving fields, we first glimpsed the sliding waters of the gleaming Ohio! What memories that river evoked in us, memories black and gloomy, yet tinged with the bright border of a wild and desperate hope! The Ohio is more than a river. It is a symbol, a line that runs through our hearts, dividing hope from despair, just as once it bisected the nation, dividing freedom from slavery.

[Once in the North w]e [. . .] live in the clinging soot just beyond the factory areas, behind the railroad tracks, near the river banks, under the viaducts, by the steel and iron mills, on the edges of the coal and lumber yards. We live in crowded, barn-like rooms, in old rotting buildings where once dwelt rich native whites of a century ago [. . .]. When we return home at night from our jobs, we are afraid to venture into other sections of the city, for we fear that the white boys will gang up and molest us. When we do go out into white neighborhoods, we always go in crowds, for that is the best mode of protection.

White people say that they are afraid of us, and it often makes us laugh. When they see one of us, they either smile with contempt or amusement. [. . .] When they see six of us, they become downright apprehensive and alarmed. And because they are afraid of us, we are afraid of them. Especially do we feel fear when we meet the gangs of white boys who have been taught—at home and at school—that we black folk are making their parents lose their homes and life's savings because we have moved into their neighborhoods.

They say our presence in their neighborhoods lowers the value of their property. We do not understand why this should be so. We are poor; but they were once poor, too. They make up their minds, because others tell them to, that they must move at once if we rent an apartment near them. Having been warned against us by the Bosses of the Buildings, having heard tall tales about us, about how “bad” we are, they react emotionally as though we had the plague when we move into their neighborhoods. Is it any wonder, then, that their homes are suddenly and drastically reduced in value? They hastily abandon them, sacrificing them to the Bosses of the Buildings [. . .].

And the Bosses of the Buildings take these old houses and convert them into “kitchenettes,” and then rent them to us at rates so high that they make fabulous fortunes before the houses are too old for habitation. What they do is this: they take, say, a seven-room apartment, [. . .] and cut it up into seven small apartments, of one room each; they install one small gas stove and one small sink in each room.

Sometimes five or six of us live in a one-room kitchenette, a place where simple folk such as we should never be held captive. A war sets up in our emotions: one part of our feelings tells us that it is good to be in the city, that we have a chance at life here, that we need but turn a corner to become a stranger, that we no longer need bow and dodge at the sight of the Lords of the Land. Another part of our feelings tells us that, in terms of worry and strain, the cost of living in the kitchenettes is too high, that the city heaps too much responsibility upon us and gives too little security in return.

The kitchenette is the author of the glad tidings that new suckers are in town, ready to be cheated, plundered, and put in their places.

The kitchenette is our prison, our death sentence without a trial, the new form of mob violence that assaults not only the lone individual, but all of us, in its ceaseless attacks.

The kitchenette, with its filth and foul air, with its one toilet for thirty or more tenants, kills our black babies so fast that in many cities twice as many of them die as white babies.

The kitchenette is the seed bed for scarlet fever, dysentery, typhoid, tuberculosis, gonorrhea, syphilis, pneumonia, and malnutrition.

The kitchenette scatters death so widely among us that our death rate exceeds our birth rate, and if it were not for the trains and autos bringing us daily into the city from the plantations, we black folks who dwell in northern cities would die out entirely over the course of a few years.

The kitchenette, with its crowded rooms and incessant bedlam, provides an enticing place for crimes of all sort—crimes against women and children or any stranger who happens to stray into its dark hallways. The noise of our living, boxed in stone and steel, is so loud that even a pistol shot is smothered.

The kitchenette throws desperate and unhappy people into an unbearable closeness of association, thereby increasing latent friction, giving birth to never-ending quarrels of recrimination, accusation, and vindictiveness, producing warped personalities.

The kitchenette injects pressure and tension into our individual personalities, making many of us give up the struggle, walk off and leave wives, husbands, and even children behind to shift as best they can.

The kitchenette creates thousands of one-room homes where our black mothers sit, deserted, with their children about their knees.

The kitchenette blights the personalities of our growing children, disorganizes them, blinds them to hope, creates problems whose effects can be traced in the characters of its child victims for years afterward.

The kitchenette jams our farm girls, while still in their teens, into rooms with men who are restless and stimulated by the noise and lights of the city; and more of our girls have bastard babies than the girls in any other sections of the city.

The kitchenette fills our black boys with longing and restlessness, urging them to run off from home, to join together with other restless black boys in gangs, that brutal form of city courage.

The kitchenette piles up mountains of profits for the Bosses of the Buildings and makes them ever more determined to keep things as they are.

The kitchenette reaches out with fingers full of golden bribes to the officials of the city, persuading them to allow old firetraps to remain standing and occupied long after they should have been torn down.

The kitchenette is the funnel through which our pulverized lives flow to ruin and death on the city pavements, at a profit.

Despite our new worldliness, [. . .] we keep our churches alive. In fact, we have built more of them than ever here on the city pavements, for it is only when we are within the walls of our churches that we are wholly ourselves, that we keep alive a sense of our personalities in relation to the total world in which we live, that we maintain a quiet and constant communion with all that is deepest in us. Our going to church of a Sunday is like placing one's ear to another's chest to hear the unquenchable murmur of the human heart. In our collective outpourings of song and prayer, the fluid emotions of others make us feel the strength in ourselves [. . .]. Our churches are where we dip our tired bodies in cool springs of hope, where we retain our wholeness and humanity [. . .].

Our churches are centers of social and community life, for we have virtually no other mode of communion and we are usually forbidden to worship God in the temples of the Bosses of the Buildings [. . .].

In the Black Belts of the northern cities, our women are the most circumscribed and tragic objects to be found in our lives, and it is to the churches that our black women cling for emotional security and the release of their personalities. Because their orbit of life is narrow—from their kitchenette to the white folk's kitchen and back home again—they love the church more than do our men, who find a large measure of the expression of their lives in the mills and factories. Surrounding our black women are many almost insuperable barriers: they are black, they are women, they are workers; they are triply anchored and restricted in their movements within and without the Black Belts.

So they keep thousands of Little Bethels and Pilgrims and Calvarys and White Rocks and Good Hopes and Mount Olives going with their nickels and dimes [. . .]. Sometimes, even in crowded northern cities, elderly black women, hungry for the South but afraid to return, will cultivate tiny vegetable gardens in the narrow squares of ground in front of their hovels.

Many of our children scorn us; they say that we still wear the red bandanna about our heads, that we are still Uncle Toms. We lean upon our God and scold our children and try to drag them to church with us, but just as we once, years ago, left the plantation to roam the South, so now they leave us for the city pavements. But deep down in us we are glad that our children feel the world hard enough to yearn to wrestle with it. We, the mothers and fathers of the black children, try to hold them back from death, but if we persuade them to stay, or if they come back because we call them, we will pour out our pity upon them. Always our deepest love is toward those children of ours who turn their backs upon our way of life, for our instincts tell us that those brave ones who struggle against death are the ones who bring new life into the world, even though they die to do so, even though our hearts are broken when they die.

We watch strange moods fill our children, and our hearts swell with pain. The streets, with their noise and flaring lights, the taverns, the automobiles, and the poolrooms claim them, and no voice of ours can call them back. They spend their nights away from home; they forget our ways of life, our language, our God. Their swift speech and impatient eyes make us feel weak and foolish. We cannot keep them in school [. . .]. We fall upon our knees and pray for them, but in vain. The city has beaten us, evaded us; but they, with young bodies filled with warm blood, feel bitter and frustrated at the sight of the alluring hopes and prizes denied them. It is not their eagerness to fight that makes us afraid, but that they go to death on the city pavements faster than even disease and starvation can take them [. . .]. The courts and the morgues become crowded with our lost children [. . .].

Robert Gruenberg

From Chicago Fiddles While Trumbull Park Burns (1954)¹

Chicago

On July 30, 1953, Donald Howard, a war veteran, with his wife and two small children became the first Negro tenants of Trumbull Park Homes, a federal housing project operated by the Chicago Housing Authority in the steel-mill belt of Chicago's South Side. Less than a week later the 462-unit development and surrounding lawns were a fire-gutted, rubble-strewn waste-land. Since then ten other Negro families have moved into the development, and "racial disturbances" ranging from rock-tossing to rioting and arson have become an almost daily occurrence.

Two weeks ago the Howard family, importuned by well-intentioned friends, moved out, in the hope that order would be restored and the other Negro tenants left in peace. But rocks continue to fly and aerial bombs puncture the night. Recently tension rose to such a point that civic, labor, and church leaders, meeting under the sponsorship of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, warned Chicago's Mayor Kennelly that unless he took immediate steps to stop the disturbances he would have to face "continuous" mass demonstrations at the City Hall.

In the three months before the Howard family moved into Trumbull Park Homes only three fire alarms were turned in from the area, two of them for minor blazes. Since last summer alarms have averaged two dozen a month, about half of them false. There have been forty-four fires in sheds, garages, and barns, eight in the Trumbull Park project itself, and two in liquor stores. A tavern which had served Negroes was completely destroyed.

Many people have dismissed the incidents as either youthful exuberance or genuine expressions of protest by aroused owners of nearby property. Others, however, have been aware for some time that the trouble at Trumbull Park is not altogether spontaneous. All the evidence shows it has been fanned by two small groups, one of them a professional race-baiting outfit.

These are the South Deering Improvement Association, one of scores of “improvement” associations intent on keeping the Negro out of “all white” areas, and the National Citizens’ Protective Association, a hate group founded by a former aide of Gerald L. K. Smith, the anti-Semitic race baiter, and boasting among its national officers a former Ku Klux Klan “emperor.” The president of the home-grown South Deering association is Louis P. Dinnocenzo, a $6,000-a-year highway engineer on the Cook County pay roll. His organization, he claims, has about 500 members, each of whom pays dues of a dollar a year. They meet once a month in the Trumbull Park fieldhouse.

If you ask Dinnocenzo about the part played by his association in the racial disorders, he answers straightforwardly: “We are requesting our aldermen and our representatives to do everything within their ability to get them [the ten Negro families living in the project] out.” What else are you doing? “We’re parading around at night—within the law—like we’re entitled to do—to picket.” Doesn’t parading create an atmosphere begetting violence? “Yes, it sometimes does,” he admits, “but we don’t want the violence. It’s the teenagers.” Dinnocenzo calls the moving in of Negroes “an encroachment on our right.” He explains “While the law is opposed to us, morally we’re right.”

GOING WITH GOD IN TRUMBULL PARK

The Trumbull Park housing project is a white housing project. . . . Only the ignoble and shameful and the base can be suppressed, never the heroic truth, for we go with God. If you live like a good American, you don’t need the police department and a pressure group to keep you by force in a community where you know you don’t belong. Get out, and get off our backs.

—From a letter to the editor of the Daily Calumet in South Chicago.

Mayor Kennelly has yet to come out with a strong statement condemning the South Deering lawlessness.

The most outspoken support for the South Deering troublemakers comes from the Daily Calumet, a paper published in a neighboring area. Its editor is Colonel Horace F. Wulf, an army-reserve officer. Here is a sample of his writing: “Some white areas may welcome other races with open arms, bless them. But the folks of South Deering have not been sufficiently brainwashed to consent to such practice. Any race mixing must be done with a policeman’s nightstick.”

Ironically, part of the Daily Calumet’s financial support comes from the tax dollars of Chicago’s citizens, Negro and white. As a newspaper of “general circulation” it can bid for advertising contracts of the Chicago Sanitary District, and this year it obtained the contract. One of the Republican trustees of the Sanitary District is John Henneberger, for ten years president of United Steelworkers Local 1008 at the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company’s South Chicago plant before he retired in 1951 with a lifetime honorary presidency. On February 1 the Daily Calumet reported as follows on Henneberger’s talk at a dinner held by the South Deering Improvement Association attended by 500 persons. “He said, ‘It is an inspiring sight to see a community fight for what it thinks is right.’ He added the Republican Party stands ready to lend its hand to any group of citizens engaged in a struggle for a just cause.” Questioned about this, Henneberger denied making the statement.

Donald Howard’s decision to leave Trumbull Park was sudden and known in advance to only a few police officials and Howard’s attorneys. One of Chicago’s police captains helped Howard get a new job and a new home. Howard authorized his attorneys to say in his behalf Police officials and well-meaning human-relations experts have visited me and they have approached me through well-intentioned persons, all with the view that my continued occupancy of an apartment [. . .] represents a threat to civil peace and tranquility in Trumbull Park Homes. Having in mind the fact that there are ten other Negro families in Trumbull Park Homes and hoping that there is something my family and I can do to contribute to a restoration of order in Trumbull Park I have decided to succumb to the pressures placed on me.

Gertrude Samuels

From Even More Crucial Than in the South (1963)¹

A report on the forms the Negro revolution is taking against discrimination, economic and social, in the North.

A policeman tells a street vender to move on and sets off a series of clashes between Negroes and police . . .

A human chain of Negro parents blocks a dozen buses loaded with Negro children going to schools where they will be separated from white children . . .

A thousand whites gather menacingly at a brick house on an all-white street where a Negro family is attempting to move in . . .

Police rush lines of Negro pickets who are protesting bias in hiring practices. Negroes are beaten and black-jacked; policemen, stabbed . . .

These incidents of recent weeks took place not in the South but in the North. For the past year the attention of the country has been largely concentrated on the racial crisis in the South. Now there is growing awareness that the crisis in the North is boiling, and that it is perhaps more dangerous.

1. Gertrude Samuels. “Even More Crucial Than in the South.” The New York Times, 30 June 1963, pp. 143+. nyti.ms/29W7hgl.

The civil-rights struggle in the South is still largely in its legal, elementary stage: Negro strategy there is to attempt to crumble barriers to school integration, to accommodation at such public facilities as lunch counters, hotels and playgrounds, and in transportation.

But in the North Negroes say the problem revolves around the far more sinister moral questions of private policy—what Negro leaders describe as “the snide, subtle and insidious practice” of economic and social discrimination.

Of the nation’s nearly 20,000,000 Negroes—about 10 per cent of the population—some 48 per cent live outside the South. What is the extent of their dissatisfaction?

What is clear from all these reports is that there is an intensification of militancy at the Negro leadership level [. . .]. But there is also a great response at the “followership” level—a willingness to follow, to demonstrate, to be involved in the struggle more decisively than ever before.

The Negro drive in the North is aimed at four main targets: residential segregation, job discrimination, de facto school segregation and, above all, affronts to personal dignity.

RESIDENTIAL SEGREGATION

All over the North, but particularly in the giant industrial cities, there are “gentlemen’s agreements” to hold the Negro down residentially. How else explain the largest slum area in the country—Negro Harlem in upper Manhattan, with about half a million black persons crowded into its tenements and crumbling brownstones? [. . .]

A few Negro families have escaped—finding enough money, and enough community acceptance to move into integrated neighborhoods in some suburbs—but most are as rigidly held back from living and mixing with whites as in the South. More so in fact, for in many cities of the South—in Little Rock[, Arkansas,] and Vicksburg[, Mississippi,] and Louisville[, Kentucky,]—Negro and white families have lived side by side for years.

The situation is particularly acute on Chicago’s South Side, where half of Illinois’ Negro population is segregated. Friction starts when Negroes move—or try to move—into adjoining white neighborhoods.

Recently, a crowd of whites gathered around a two-family brick house in an all-white neighborhood on the South Side when it was rumored that Negroes were about to come. Two Negro men did appear, and some furniture was moved in. Rocks were thrown, the police arrived, according to a well-designed plan, and the situation was brought under control. But the Negro family gave up the idea of “breaking the block,” as whites charged they were trying to do.

Horror runs through all white economic levels in the North at the idea of having a Negro family move into the neighborhood—largely because of the belief that their presence will reduce property values. It is a fear seldom substantiated by any person's firsthand knowledge, but Negroes acknowledge its pervasiveness with a bitter saying: "In the South, the whites say, 'I don't care how close you get but don't get too high.' In the North, the whites say, 'I don't care how high you get, but don't get too close.'"

Deerfield, Ill., an upper-income suburb of Chicago, dramatized the extent to which whites will go to avoid having Negro neighbors—even those who can afford $30,000 homes. The village was to have been the site of an interracial real-estate development. The project was killed when the community, encouraged by the Rev. Jack D. Parker of St. Gregory Episcopal Church, condemned the land and floated a bond issue to make a park out of it. Court action up to the Supreme Court resulted in a victory for the village.

JOB DISCRIMINATION

And it is certainly "gentlemen's agreements" or naked prejudice that operate against Northern Negroes in job-hiring practices.

The North has on its books many laws and directives against job discrimination that have meant well. The cause of the seething unrest is that in practice, down at the individual level, the laws don't work. Municipalities and state governments lack the courage to enforce them, and private enterprise is apathetic or worse.

The situation is boiling up because jobs are growing scarcer—twice as many Negroes compared with whites are jobless.

SCHOOL SEGREGATION

But if housing and job discrimination hurt, the greatest outrage that the Northern Negro feels is over the segregation of his children.

In Chicago, where only about 10 per cent of pupils go to school with children of another race, "the hottest item for the last two years has been the issue of secondary education for Negroes." The charge is that the "neighborhood" school-district system [. . .] creates segregation—overcrowding all-Negro schools while white classrooms stand empty. At a recent civil-rights rally, a speaker said school segregation in Chicago and Alabama is as similar as the names [of Chicago School Superintendent Benjamin] Willis and ([Alabama] Governor [George]) Wallace.

Such segregation in the North is, obviously, a direct consequence of residential segregation. John H. Johnson, editor and publisher of the Negro magazine Ebony, says bluntly: "If we had integrated housing, the school problem would automatically be solved." [. . .]

THE PSYCHOLOGICAL FACTOR

Above all these grievances looms the main factor—and that is psychological. Negroes in all walks—from porters and taxi drivers to college professors and political leaders—say that the real drive that is now rising ominously is a demand for personal dignity.

As Roy Wilkins, executive director of the N.A.A.C.P. puts it: “[. . .] We’re making the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence real and alive. We’re taking them off parchment and putting them into people’s lives, white and black. One of these days, after the fist-shaking is over, the whites are going to understand and to thank us.”

THE BLACK MIDDLE CLASS, THE AMERICAN DREAM, AND THE CAMPAIGN FOR CIVIL RIGHTS

Wilma Dykeman and James Stokely

*From New Southerner: The Middle-Class Negro (1959)*¹

His emergence, while its greatest impact is in the South, has meaning for the nation.

Paradoxically, the change may mean both a short step back and a leap forward in race relations.

A young Negro father in one of the South’s larger cities said recently, “I can’t understand why they [certain white politicians in his city] keep shouting that when we try to send our children to the best schools we can, it means we want them to marry whites. What it means is that we want our children to have a chance at owning a station wagon and a ranch-style house and carrying a briefcase instead of a shovel.”

If many white Southerners could understand the implications of this man’s statement, then the equality which they envision largely as nightmare might be reappraised as closer to the fulfillment of a dream—the American dream. For one of the major forces shaping and energizing the Negro’s drive toward full integration into our national life today is a strengthened belief in every man’s right to earn his living, own his home and better his place in society, the traditional goals of the white middle class.

And one of the major forces hindering the Negro in this drive, especially in the South, is the white man’s persistent image of the Negro as the eternal hewer of wood and drawer of water. One of the matters to which professional segregationist orators have given closest attention is reviving the picture of the “African savage” whom slavery “rescued” from the jungles and brought into beneficent contact with white civilization. Even thus, a century ago, slavery was made to seem the appropriately inferior role of an inferior race.

There are two points of departure from which to examine the importance of the emerging Southern Negro middle class. It may be compared with its white counterpart and the total American economy—in which case it appears small and severely handicapped. For instance, individual Negro incomes are still only 52 percent as large as white incomes, and two out of every five Negro families still earn less than $2,000 per year.

Or, this middle class may be studied in the light of its own background and recent history—in which case it appears highly significant. For instance, the pre-war percentage difference between Negro and white incomes has been cut by better than 20 per cent and today the total annual cash purchasing power of the Negro population equals the market of the whole of Canada.

Contributing to the growth of this middle class are two basic movements. They can be summarized in two colloquialisms: “going to town” and “heading North.”

Both the Negro and white South are “going to town” in a drama of change gripping the entire region. The South is in the process of shifting from a rural, predominantly single-crop economy to urban industrialization. In the brief period between 1940 and 1944, a million Negroes left farming in the South. From 1950 to 1954, the number of Negro farmers in the South declined 17.1 per cent.

Many of these “headed North.” Their exodus has meant not only that the South is getting whiter all the time but also that new ways, new standards, new ambitions filter down the family grapevine (as well as the TV serial which sprouts on every roof), replacing the familiar old acceptance of subservience.

As the Southern Negro comes closer to entering the total pattern of American life, he also becomes more aware of those educational and economic opportunities essential to securing and maintaining position in the middle class. His status is still low—but it is changing for the better; it is the combination of these two facts that provides part of the dynamic behind the Negro protest. Because this dynamic is also such a firm part of the American ideal of self-betterment and progress, the protest will neither diminish nor disappear, as so many important white leaders, both North and South, who have not yet understood its full meaning, seem to hope.

The question is frequently asked, and not only in the South, why Negro leadership did not wage to a successful conclusion the fight for full equality in civil rights or the field of health or housing, before tackling the emotion-laden realm of schools. To ask this is to underrate the Negro’s powerful push from peasantry, combined with the pull toward the middle class which is one of the real revolutions of our time. One sociologist has observed that “education is a passion with the middle-class Negro.” The reasons are obvious.

Education is one of the master keys unlocking the door of opportunity—economic, political, social—into the middle class world.

If the Southern white father could stop seeing the Southern Negro father as a Negro and could see him, even for a moment, as another father, he might comprehend more clearly some of the determination behind the drive for desegregation.

When Princeton's Dr. Melvin Tumin and associates published their recent study of a North Carolina county, "Desegregation, Resistance and Readiness," one of their ten major findings included the majority image of the Negro as inferior to the white in morality, intelligence, responsibility and ambition—but with an impressive minority disagreement. "Approximately 27 per cent consider the Negro to be equal or superior to the white in responsibility, 31 per cent in morality, 33 per cent in ambition, and 40 percent in intelligence. [. . .]"

From Letter from Birmingham Jail (1963)

My Dear Fellow Clergymen:

While confined here in the Birmingham city jail, I came across your recent statement calling my present activities "unwise and untimely." Seldom do I pause to answer criticism of my work and ideas. If I sought to answer all the criticisms that cross my desk, my secretaries would have little time for anything other than such correspondence in the course of the day, and I would have no time for constructive work. But since I feel that you are men of genuine good will and that your criticisms are sincerely set forth, I want to try to answer your statement in what I hope will be patient and reasonable terms.

I think I should indicate why I am here in Birmingham, since you have been influenced by the view which argues against "outsiders coming in."

[. . .] I am cognizant of the interrelatedness of all communities and states. I cannot sit idly by in Atlanta and not be concerned about what happens in Birmingham. Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere. We are caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, tied in a single garment of destiny. Whatever affects one directly, affects all indirectly. Never again can we afford to live with the narrow, provincial "outside agitator" idea. Anyone who lives inside the United States can never be considered an outsider anywhere within its bounds.

We know through painful experience that freedom is never voluntarily given by the oppressor; it must be demanded by the oppressed. Frankly, I have yet to engage in a direct-action campaign that was “well timed” in the view of those who have not suffered unduly from the disease of segregation. For years now I have heard the word “Wait!” It rings in the ear of every Negro with piercing familiarity. This “Wait” has almost always meant “Never.” We must come to see, with one of our distinguished jurists, that “justice too long delayed is justice denied.”

We have waited for more than 340 years for our constitutional and God-given rights. The nations of Asia and Africa are moving with jetlike speed toward gaining political independence, but we still creep at horse-and-buggy pace toward gaining a cup of coffee at a lunch counter. Perhaps it is easy for those who have never felt the stinging darts of segregation to say, “Wait.” But when you have seen vicious mobs lynch your mothers and fathers at will and drown your sisters and brothers at whim; when you have seen hate-filled policemen curse, kick, and even kill your black brothers and sisters; when you see the vast majority of your twenty million Negro brothers smothering in an airtight cage of poverty in the midst of an affluent society; when you suddenly find your tongue twisted and your speech stammering as you seek to explain to your six-year-old daughter why she can’t go to the public amusement park that has just been advertised on television, and see tears welling up in her eyes when she is told that Funtown is closed to colored children, and see ominous clouds of inferiority beginning to form in her little mental sky, and see her beginning to distort her personality by developing an unconscious bitterness toward white people; when you have to concoct an answer for a five-year-old son who is asking, “Daddy, why do white people treat colored people so mean?”; when you take a cross-country drive and find it necessary to sleep night after night in the uncomfortable corners of your automobile because no motel will accept you; when you are humiliated day in and day out by nagging signs reading “white” and “colored”; when your first name becomes “nigger,” your middle name becomes “boy” (however old you are) and your last name becomes “John,” and your wife and mother are never given the respected title “Mrs.”; when you are harried by day and haunted by night by the fact that you are a Negro, living constantly at tiptoe stance, never quite knowing what to expect next, and are plagued with inner fears and outer resentments; when you are forever fighting a degenerating sense of “nobodiness”—then you will understand why we find it difficult to wait. There comes a time when the cup of endurance runs over, and men are no longer willing to be plunged into the abyss of despair. I hope, sirs, you can understand our legitimate and unavoidable impatience.

Oppressed people cannot remain oppressed forever. The yearning for freedom eventually manifests itself, and that is what has happened to the American Negro. Something within has reminded him of his birthright of freedom, and something without has reminded him that it can be gained. Consciously or unconsciously, he has been caught up by the Zeitgeist,¹ and with his black brothers of Africa and his brown and yellow brothers of Asia, South America, and the Caribbean, the United States Negro is moving with a sense of great urgency toward the promised land of racial justice. If one recognizes this vital urge that has engulfed the Negro community, one should readily understand why public demonstrations are taking place. The Negro has many pent-up resentments and latent frustrations, and he must release them. So let him march; let him make prayer pilgrimages to the city hall; let him go on freedom rides—and try to understand why he must do so. If his repressed emotions are not released in nonviolent ways, they will seek expression through violence; this is not a threat but a fact of history. So I have not said to my people, “Get rid of your discontent.” Rather, I have tried to say that this normal and healthy discontent can be channeled into the creative outlet of nonviolent direct action. And now this approach is being termed extremist.

1. The spirit of the times (German).

But though I was initially disappointed at being categorized as an extremist, as I continued to think about the matter I gradually gained a measure of satisfaction from the label. Was not Jesus an extremist for love: “Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you.”² Was not Amos an extremist for justice: “Let justice roll down like waters and righteousness like an ever-flowing stream.”³ Was not Paul an extremist for the Christian gospel: “I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.”⁴ Was not Martin Luther an extremist: “Here I stand; I cannot do otherwise, so help me God.”⁵ And John Bunyan: “I will stay in jail to the end of my days before I make a butchery of my conscience.”⁶ And Abraham Lincoln: “This nation cannot survive half slave and half free.” And Thomas Jefferson: “We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal. . . .” So the question is not whether we will be extremists, but what kind of extremists we will be. Will we be extremists for hate or for love? Will we be extremists for the preservation of injustice or for the extension of justice?

Robert C. Weaver

From “The Negro as an American”: The Yearning for Human Dignity (1963)¹

Delivered before the Symposium on Challenges to Democracy of the Fund for the Republic, Chicago, Illinois, June 13, 1963

Most middle-class white Americans frequently ask, “Why do Negroes push so? They have made phenomenal progress in 100 years of freedom, so why don’t their leaders do something about the crime rate and illegitimacy?” To them I would reply that when Negroes press for full equality now they are behaving as all other Americans would under similar circumstances. Every American has the right to be treated as a human being and striving for human dignity is a national characteristic.

Negroes who are constantly confronted or threatened by discrimination and inequality articulate a sense of outrage. Many react with hostility, sometimes translating their feelings into overt anti-social actions. In parts of the Negro community a separate culture with deviant values develops. To the members of this subculture I would observe that ours is a middle-class society and those who fail to evidence most of its values and behavior are headed toward difficulties. But I am reminded that the rewards for those who do are often minimal, providing insufficient inducement for large numbers to emulate them.

The Negro here—as he has so frequently and eloquently demonstrated—is an American. And his status, no less than his aspirations, can be measured meaningfully only in terms of American standards.

Viewed from this point of view what are the facts?

Median family income among non-whites was slightly less than 55 per cent of that for whites in 1959; for individuals the figure was 50 per cent.

Only a third of the Negro families in 1959 earned sufficient to sustain an acceptable American standard of living. [. . .]

Undergirding these overall figures are many paradoxes. Negroes have made striking gains in historical terms, yet their current rate of unemployment is well over double that among whites. Over two-thirds of our colored workers are still concentrated in five major unskilled and semi-skilled occupations, as contrasted to slightly over a third of the white labor force. [. . .]

In 1959 non-white males who were high school graduates earned, on the average, 32 per cent less than whites; for non-white college graduates the figure was 38 per cent less. Among women a much different situation exists. Non-white women who were high school graduates earned on the average some 24 per cent less than whites. Non-white female college graduates, however, earned but slightly over one per cent less average annual salaries than white women college graduates. Significantly, the median annual income of non-white female college graduates was more than double that of non-white women with only high school education.

Is it any wonder that among non-whites, as contrasted to whites, a larger proportion of women than of men attend and finish college? [. . .]

There is much in these situations that reflects the continuing matriarchal character of Negro society—a situation which had its roots in the family composition under slavery where the father, if identified, had no established role. Subsequent and continuing economic advantages of Negro women who found steady employment as domestics during the post Civil War era and thereafter perpetuated the pattern. This [. . .] served to emasculate many Negro men economically and psychologically. It also explains, in part, the high prevalence of broken homes, illegitimacy, and lack of motivation in the Negro community.

The tragedy of discrimination is that it provides an excuse for failure while erecting barriers to success.

Most colored Americans still are not only outside the mainstream of our society but see no hope of entering it. The lack of motivation and anti-social behavior which result are capitalized upon by the champions of the status quo. They say that the average Negro must demonstrate to the average white that the latter's fears are groundless. One proponent of this point of view has stated that Negro crime and illegitimacy must decline and Negro Neighborhoods must stop deteriorating.

In these observations lie a volume on race relations. In the first place, those who articulate this point of view fail to differentiate between acceptance as earned by individual merit and enjoyment of rights guaranteed to everyone. Implicit, also, is the assumption that Negroes can lift themselves by their bootstraps, and that once they become brown counterparts of white middle-class Americans, they will be accepted on the basis of individual merit. Were this true, our race problem would be no more than a most recent phase in the melting pot tradition of the nation.

As compared to the earlier newcomers to our cities from Europe, the later ones who are colored face much greater impediments in moving from the slums or from the bottom of the economic ladder. At the same time, they have less resources to meet the more difficult problems which confront them.

Enforced residential segregation, the most stubborn and universal of the Negro's disadvantages, often leads to exploitation and effects a spatial pattern which facilitates neglect of public services in the well-defined areas where Negroes live. It restricts the opportunities of the more successful as well as the least successful in the group, augmenting artificially the number of non-whites who live in areas of blight and neglect and face impediments to the attainment of values and behavior required for upward social and economic mobility.

The most obvious consequence of involuntary residential segregation is that the housing dollar in a dark hand usually commands less purchasing power than one in a white hand. Clearly, this is a denial of a basic promise of a free economy.

For immigrant groups in the nation, the trend toward improved socio-economic status has gone hand-and-hand with decreasing residential segregation. The reverse has been true of the Negro.

I happen to have been born a Negro and to have devoted a large part of my adult energies to the problem of the role of the Negro in America. But I am also a government administrator [. . .].

My responsibilities as a Negro and an American are part of the heritage I received from my parents—a heritage that included a wealth of moral and social values that don't have anything to do with my race. [. . .]

The challenge frequently thrown to me is why I don't go out into the Negro community and exhort Negro youths to prepare themselves for present and future opportunities. [. . .]

Many of the youth which I am urged to exhort come from broken homes. They live in communities where the fellow who stays in school and follows the rules is a "square." They reside in a neighborhood where the most successful are often engaged in shady—if not illegal—activities. They know that the very policeman who may arrest them for violation of the law is sometimes the pay-off man for the racketeers. And they recognize that the majority society, which they frequently believe to be the "enemy," condones this situation. Their experience also leads some of them to believe that getting the kind of job the residents in the neighborhood hold is unrewarding—a commitment to hard work and poverty. For almost all of them, the precepts of Ben Franklin are lily-white in their applicability.

For many successful older colored Americans, middle-class status has been difficult. Restricted, in large measure, to racial ghettos, they have expended great effort to protect their children from falling back into the dominant values of that environment. And these values are probably more repugnant to them than to most Americans. This is understandable in terms of their social origins. For the most part, they come from lower-middle class families, where industry, good conduct, family ties, and a willingness to postpone immediate rewards for future successes are stressed. Their values and standards of conduct are those of success-oriented middle-class Americans. [. . .]

These attitudes, too, are shifting. The younger middle-class Negroes are more secure and consequently place less stress upon the quest for respectability. But few Negroes are immune from the toll of upward mobility. Frequently their struggle has been difficult, and the maintenance of their status demands a heavy input. As long as this is true, they will have less energy to devote to the problems of the Negro subculture. It is significant, however, that the sit-ins and Freedom Marches in the South were planned and executed by Negro college students most of whom come from middle-class families.

Middle-class Negroes have long led the fight for civil rights; today its youthful members do not hesitate to resort to direct action, articulating the impatience which is rife throughout the Negro community. In so doing they are forging a new solidarity in the struggle for human dignity.

The ultimate responsibilities of Negro leadership, however, are to show results and maintain a following. This means that it cannot be so "responsible" that it forgets the trials and tribulations of others who are less fortunate or less recognized than itself. It cannot stress progress—the emphasis which is so palatable to the majority group—without, at the same time, delineating the unsolved business of democracy.

Most Negroes in leadership capacities have articulated the fact that they and those who follow them are a part of America. They have striven for realization of the American dream. Most recognize their responsibilities as citizens and urge others to follow their example. Sophisticated whites realize that the status of Negroes in our society depends not only upon what the Negro does to achieve his goals and prepare himself for opportunities but, even more, upon what all America does to expand these opportunities. And the quality and nature of future Negro leadership depends upon how effective those leaders who relate to the total society can be in satisfying the yearnings for human dignity which reside in the hearts of all Americans.

From Clybourne Park (2010)

TOM [holding up a document] Okay. Here's the wording from the City Council, and I quote: "In recognition of the historic status of the Clybourne Park neighborhood, and its distinctive collection of low-rise single-family homes— (cont'd.)

LINDSEY
Aren't we a single family?

KEVIN
Hey. Hey.
Everything's cool.

TOM (continuous)— intended to house a community of working-class families."

LINDSEY: And you know, the thing is? Communities change.

STEVE: They do.

LINDSEY: That's just the reality.

STEVE: It is.

LENA: And some change is inevitable, and we all support that, but it might be worth asking yourself who exactly is responsible for that change?

[Little pause.]

LINDSEY
I'm not sure what you—?

KEVIN
Wait, what are you trying to—?

Damon Gupton as Kevin, Crystal A. Dickinson as Lena, Annie Parisse as Lindsey, and Jeremy Shamos as Steve in the Playwrights Horizon production of Clybourne Park

LENA: I'm asking you to think about the motivation behind the long-range political initiative to change the face of this neighborhood.

[Another little pause.]

LINDSEY
What does that mean? I don't know what that—?

STEVE
(to LENA)
Wait, say that again?

KEVIN
The long-range
what?

LENA: I mean that this is a highly desirable area.

STEVE: Well, we desire it.

LENA: I know you do.

LINDSEY: Same as you.

LENA: And now the area is changing.

KATHY: And for the better, right?

LENA: And I'm saying that there are certain economic interests that are being served by those changes and others that are not. That's all.

STEVE: (suspiciously) And . . . which interests are being—?

LENA: (systematically) If you have a residential area, in direct proximity to downtown?

STEVE: Right?

LENA: And if that area is occupied by a particular group?

STEVE
Which group?

LINDSEY
(to LENA) You know what? We're talking about one house.

LENA: (to LINDSEY) I understand that.

STEVE: Which group?

LINDSEY: A house for our family?

STEVE: Which group?

LENA: That's how it happens.

LINDSEY: In which to raise our child?

STEVE: No no. Which group?

LENA: It happens one house at a time.

STEVE: Whoa whoa whoa. Okay. Stop right there.

LINDSEY: What are you doing?

STEVE: No. I'm sorry, but can we just come out and say what it is we're actually—? Shouldn't we maybe do that? Because if that's what this is really about, then . . . jesus, maybe we oughta save ourselves some time and and and and just . . . say what it is we're really saying instead of doing this elaborate little dance around it.

[Dead stop. All stare at STEVE]

Never mind.

KATHY: What dance?

STEVE: I—I—I—I shouldn't have—whatever.

LENA (parsing his meaning): So . . . you think I haven't been saying what I actually—?

STEVE (laughs): Uhhh . . . Not to my way of thinking, no.

LENA: Well, what is it you think I'm—?

STEVE: I—I—I . . . (laughs incredulously): . . . like we don't all know?

LINDSEY: I don't.

STEVE: Oh, yes you do. Of course you do.

KEVIN: Well, maybe you oughta tell us what you think she was saying.

STEVE: Oh oh, but it has to be me?

LENA: Well, you're the one who raised the question as to—(cont'd.)

STEVE (laughs, overlapping): Oh, come on. It was blatant.

LENA (continuous): —the sincerity of my speech.

LINDSEY: What the fuck, Steve?

STEVE: You know what? Forget I said it.

LINDSEY

You didn't say anything. Oh no, I'm interested. Let's forget the whole—

STEVE (continuous): —Okay. Okay. If you really want to—It's . . . (tries to laugh, then, sotto) . . . it's race. Isn't it? You're trying to tell me that that . . . That implicit in what you said—That this entire conversation . . . isn't at least partly informed—am I right? (laughs nervously) By the issue of . . . (sotto) of racism?

[Beat, then]

STEVE

(to STEVE)

(to LINDSEY)

Are you out of your—?

And please don't do that to me, okay? I've asked you repeatedly.

(to LENA)

I have no idea where this is coming from.

LENA: Well, the original issue was the inappropriately large house that—(cont'd.)

STEVE (to LENA, overlapping): Oh, come on.

LENA (continuous): —you're planning to build. Only, now I'm fairly certain that I've been called a racist.

STEVE: But I didn't say that, did I?

LENA: Sounded like you did.

STEVE (to KEVIN) Did I say that?

KEVIN: Yeah, you kinda did.

STEVE: In what way did I say that?

KEVIN: Uh, somebody said racism.

STEVE: -Cism! -Cism! Not -cist!!

KEVIN: Which must originate from somewhere.

STEVE: And which we all find totally reprehensi—

KEVIN: So—are you the racist?

STEVE: Can I just—?

KEVIN: Is it your wife?

KATHY: Don't look at me.

STEVE: Look:

KEVIN: 'Cause, by process of elimination—

STEVE: Here's what I'm saying:

LINDSEY: What are you saying?!

STEVE: I'm saying: Was race not a factor—

LINDSEY: (re: STEVE, exonerating herself) I don't know this person.

STEVE: Were there not these differences—

LINDSEY: What differences!!? There's no—

STEVE (to LINDSEY re: LENA): Okay: She walks in here, from the very beginning, with all these issues—(cont'd.)

LENA (overlapping): About your house.

STEVE (continuous): —and I'm only asking whether, were we not, shall we say—?

LINDSEY: You're creating an issue. Where none exists.

STEVE: Oh oh oh you heard what she said. She as much as claimed that there's some kind of, of, of secret conspiracy—

LENA: Oh, it's not a secret.

KEVIN

STEVE

(to LENA)

(to KEVIN)

Ohh, c'mon.

Oh, please don't be

There. Thank you.

Are you seriously—?

purposely naive.

Now you see what I'm—?

LENA: This has been under discussion for at least four decades now—(cont'd.)

KEVIN (overlapping, to LENA): You can't prove that.

LENA (continuous): —at the highest institutional levels of—

(to KEVIN—): oh, don't act like you don't know it's true.

STEVE (to LENA): What, and now we're the evil invaders who are—

LINDSEY (to STEVE): She never said that!!!!

STEVE: —appropriating your ancestral homeland?

LINDSEY (to STEVE): This, this, this—No. I'm sorry, this is the most asinine—

(to LENA and KEVIN): Half of my friends are black!

STEVE (sputtering): What!?!??

LINDSEY (to STEVE, as to a child): As is true for most normal people.

STEVE: Name one.

LINDSEY: Normal people? Tend to have many friends of a diverse and wide-ranging—

STEVE: You can't name one!

LINDSEY: Candace.

STEVE (beat, then): Name another.

LINDSEY: I don't have to stand here compiling a list of—

STEVE: You said half. You specifically—

LINDSEY: Theresa.

STEVE: She works in your office!! She's not your "friend".

LINDSEY: She was at the baby shower, Steve! I hope she's not my enemy!!

TOM: Well, this is all fascinating—

STEVE (to LINDSEY): Name another.

TOM: And while I'd love to sit here and review all of American History, maybe we should concentrate on the plans for your property—(cont'd)

STEVE (overlapping): Yes!! Yes!! (cont'd)

TOM (continuous): —which had been the original topic of the convers—

STEVE (overlapping, continuous): The history of America is the history of private property.

LENA: That may be—

STEVE: Read De Tocqueville.¹

1. Reference to Democracy in America (1835–40), a comprehensive two-volume study of American society by the Frenchman Alexis de Tocqueville (1805–59).

LENA: —though I rather doubt your grandparents were sold as private property.
 STEVE (to KEVIN & LENA): Ohhhhhh my god. Look. Look. Humans are territorial, okay?

LINDSEY (to STEVE): Who are you?

STEVE: This is why we have wars. One group, one tribe, tries to usurp some territory—and now you guys have this territory, right? And you don't like having it stolen away from you, the way white people stole everything else from black America. We get it, And we apologize. But what good does it do, if we perpetually fall into the same, predictable little euphemistic tap dance around the topic?

KEVIN: You know how to tap dance?

STEVE: See? See what he's doing?!!

LINDSEY: Maybe quit while you're ahead.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

- Langston Hughes's poem HARLEM poses a question: "What happens to a dream deferred?" Why do you think Lorraine Hansberry chose this poem as the epigraph for A RAISIN IN THE SUN? Write an essay in which you discuss the various "dreams" that come into conflict in the play. Which "dream" does the play seem to endorse? Does it ultimately answer Hughes's question?
- In A RAISIN IN THE SUN's third act, Beneatha asserts that "there isn't any real progress [. . .] there is only one large circle that we march in, around and around, each of us with our own little picture—in front of us—our own little mirage that we think is the future." Asagai counters that progress follows "a long line—as in geometry, [. . .] one that reaches into infinity." Write an essay in which you compare these two views of progress as they are depicted in A RAISIN IN THE SUN. Does the play seem to favor one view over the other?
- In EVEN MORE CRUCIAL THAN IN THE SOUTH, New York Times reporter Gertrude Samuels suggests that what African Americans were increasingly demanding in the late 1950s and early 1960s was not only an end to racial discrimination in housing, schooling, and employment, but also and above all "personal dignity" (1530), a point echoed in Martin Luther King, Jr.'s reference, in LETTER FROM BIRMINGHAM JAIL, to "the stinging darts of segregation" (1535). Drawing on these and other contextual excerpts in this chapter, as well as A RAISIN IN THE SUN, write an essay exploring what the play might contribute to our understanding of the psychological and emotional effects of racial discrimination. How does the latter seem to affect the way the characters perceive themselves and each other?
- A RAISIN IN THE SUN* is set in Chicago, but in many ways its heart is in Africa—the Africa of the mythical past, the Africa of the slave trade, and the Africa of the play's own temporal setting. Write an essay in which you explore the many ways in which both African history and culture and American attitudes toward them inform Hansberry's play. To what extent might the play illustrate ideas found in Earl E. Thorpe's AFRICA IN THE THOUGHT OF NEGRO AMERICANS and/or Phaon Goldman's THE SIGNIFICANCE OF AFRICAN FREEDOM FOR THE NEGRO AMERICAN?
- Hansberry's play explores not only the evolving social and economic positions of African Americans in the mid-twentieth century, but also their evolving gender roles, a subject on which Robert C. Weaver also comments briefly in THE NEGRO AS AN AMERICAN. Write an essay in which you discuss the crucial role that gender plays in the action of A RAISIN IN THE SUN. Does the play seem to uphold any particular vision of gender roles, especially within the family? Might it in any way endorse Weaver's rather provocative claims on the subject?

CRITICAL CONTEXTS:
SOPHOCLES'S ANTIGONE

Even more than other forms of literature, drama has a relatively stable canon, a select group of plays that the theater community thinks of as especially worthy of frequent performance. New plays join this canon, of course, but theater companies worldwide tend to perform the same ones over and over, especially those by Shakespeare, Ibsen, and Sophocles. The reasons are many, involving the plays' themes and continued appeal across times and cultures as well as their formal literary and theatrical features. But their repeated performance means that a relatively small number of plays become much better known than all the others and that there is a tradition of "talk" about those plays. A lot of this talk is informal and local, resulting from the fact that people see plays communally, viewing performances together and often comparing responses afterward. But more permanent and more formal responses also exist; individual productions of plays are often reviewed in newspapers and magazines, on radio and television, and on the Internet. Such reviews concentrate primarily on evaluating specific productions. But because every production of a play involves a particular interpretation of the text, cumulative accounts of performances add up to a body of interpretive criticism—that is, analytical commentary about many aspects of the play as text and as performance. Scholars add to that body of criticism by publishing their own interpretations of a play in academic journals and books.

Sophocles's ANTIGONE, for instance, attracts attention from a wide variety of perspectives—from Greek scholars, who view it in relation to classical myth or ancient Greek language and culture; from philosophers, who may see in it examinations of classic ideas and ethical problems; from theater historians, who may think about it in relation to traditions of staging and visualization or the particulars of gestures and stage business; and from historians of rhetoric, who may consider the interactions between the chorus and the players or the way characters use or abuse classical rhetorical conventions.

As a reader of plays in a textbook like this one, you may or may not bring to your reading an awareness of what others have thought about a particular play, but that body of material is available if you choose to use it as a way of getting additional perspectives on the text. You don't have to read this accumulated criticism to understand what happens in a text. But reading what others have said about a text can help you—by offering historical information that you hadn't known or hadn't considered relevant, by pointing to problems or possibilities of interpretation you had not yet thought of, or by supporting a reading you had already arrived at. In a sense, reading published criticism is like talking with your fellow students or being involved in a class discussion. In general, you shouldn't read "the critics" until after you have read the play at least once, just as you should read the text in full before you discuss it with others. That way, your initial responses to the play are your own; if you don't understand some things, you can always discuss them later or read a few pieces of good criticism.

Reading criticism can be especially helpful when you have to write an essay. Critics will often guide you to crucial points of debate or to a place in the text that is a crux for deciding on a particular interpretation. You will likely get the most help if you read several critics with different perspectives—not because more is better, but because you will see their differences and, more important, the grounds for their differences in the kinds of evidence they use and the various inferences they draw from it. Their disagreements will likely be very useful to you as a new interpreter. But don't regard critics as "authorities" (an interpretation is not true simply because it is published or because it is written by somebody famous); instead, look to critics and their work as a spur to your own thinking.

Often, when you're just starting to think about the essay you want to write, reading criticism can help you see some of the critical issues in the play. Critics frequently disagree on the interpretation of particular issues or passages or even on what the issues really are, but reading their work can make your own thoughts concrete, especially when you're just starting to sort things out. Reacting to someone else's view, especially one that is strongly argued, can help you articulate what you think and can suggest a line of interpretation and argument. Sorting out the important issues can be complicated, and issues do shift from era to era and culture to culture. But often the arguments posed in one era interest subsequent critics in whatever age and from whatever perspective. More generally, studying how professional critics make arguments and what makes some arguments more compelling and effective than others can help you both assess and improve your own.

If you draw on published criticism in your paper, you should acknowledge the critic up front and then work his or her words into your paper the way you have learned to do with lines or phrases from a literary text, though you will often find that summary or paraphrase—stating a source's ideas in your own words—is more effective. Sometimes a particular critic can be especially helpful in focusing your thoughts because you so clearly disagree with what she or he says. In that case, you may well get a good paper out of a rebuttal. Pitting one critic against another—sorting out the issues that interpreters disagree on and showing what their differences consist of—can also be a good way to frame your own contribution. But remember that the point of reading criticism is to use it for your own interpretive purposes, to make your responses more sensitive and resonant, to make you a more informed reader of the play, and to make you a better reader and writer in general.

Antigone's performance history goes back more than twenty-four centuries, and over that time readers and viewers have recorded many thousands of responses. Following the text of the play below, we reprint only a small sample, all from the twentieth century. But earlier views are often referred to and sometimes still argued about. The famous comments of the German philosopher G. W. F. Hegel (1770–

A bust of Sophocles

Scene from the 1982 New York Shakespeare Festival production of Antigone

1831), for example, continue to set the agenda for an astonishing number of interpreters. Many answer him directly; others use him to sharpen, complicate, or flesh out their views or simply to position themselves in some larger debate about specific issues in the play or about literary criticism or philosophy more generally.

In the following selections, you will find various interpretations of crucial scenes and issues in Antigone. Especially prominent are questions about how to read the opinions of the chorus, how to interpret the character of Antigone, and how to assess Creon's flaws. As you read the critics, pay attention to the way they argue—what kinds of textual evidence they use to back up their claims and how they structure their arguments—as well as the main interpretive claims they make. (Following the chapter is a sample student essay about Antigone that draws on one of the critical excerpts in this chapter, as well as other secondary sources.)

CHARACTERS

ANTIGONE	HAEMON
ISMENE	TEIRESIAS
CHORUS OF THEBAN ELDERS	A MESSENGER
CREON	EURYDICE
A SENTRY	SECOND MESSENGER

The two sisters ANTIGONE and ISMENE meet in front of the palace gates in Thebes.

1. Translated by David Grene.

- ANTIGONE: Ismene, my dear sister, whose father was my father, can you think of any of all the evils that stem from Oedipus² that Zeus does not bring to pass for us, while we yet live?
 5 No pain, no ruin, no shame, and no dishonor but I have seen it in our mischiefs, yours and mine.
 And now what is the proclamation that they tell of made lately by the commander, publicly,
 10 to all the people? Do you know it? Have you heard it?
 Don't you notice when the evils due to enemies are headed towards those we love?
- ISMENE: Not a word, Antigone, of those we love, either sweet or bitter, has come to me since the moment 15 when we lost our two brothers, on one day, by their hands dealing mutual death.
 Since the Argive³ army fled in this past night,
 I know of nothing further, nothing of better fortune or of more destruction.
- 20 ANTIGONE: I knew it well; that is why I sent for you to come outside the palace gates to listen to me, privately.
- ISMENE: What is it? Certainly your words come of dark thoughts.
- 25 ANTIGONE: Yes, indeed; for those two brothers of ours, in burial has not Creon honored the one, dishonored the other?
 Eteocles, they say he has used justly with lawful rites and hid him in the earth to have his honor among the dead men there.
 30 But the unhappy corpse of Polyneices he has proclaimed to all the citizens, they say, no man may hide in a grave nor mourn in funeral, but leave unwept, unburied, a dainty treasure 35 for the birds that see him, for their feast's delight.
 That is what, they say, the worthy Creon has proclaimed for you and me—for me, I tell you—and he comes here to clarify to the unknowing his proclamation; he takes it seriously; 40 for whoever breaks the edict death is prescribed, and death by stoning publicly.

2. In Greek legend, Oedipus became king of Thebes by inadvertently fulfilling the prophecy that he was destined to kill his father and marry his mother (as depicted in Sophocles's Oedipus the King); for these offenses against nature and the gods, Creon sent Oedipus, along with his daughters Antigone and Ismene, into exile at Colonus. Oedipus's sons, Eteocles and Polyneices, agreed to take turns ruling Thebes. But when Eteocles refused to give up the throne at the end of his first allotted year, Polyneices gathered an "Argive army" (line 17) and attacked the city.

3. From Argos, a rival Greek city-state.

- There you have it; soon you will show yourself as noble both in your nature and your birth, or yourself as base, although of noble parents.
- ISMENE: If things are as you say, poor sister, how can I better them? how loose or tie the knot? 45
- ANTIGONE: Decide if you will share the work, the deed.
- ISMENE: What kind of danger is there? How far have your thoughts gone?
- ANTIGONE: Here is this hand. Will you help it to lift the dead man?
- ISMENE: Would you bury him, when it is forbidden the city? 50
- ANTIGONE: At least he is my brother—and yours, too, though you deny him. I will not prove false to him.
- ISMENE: You are so headstrong. Creon has forbidden it.
- ANTIGONE: It is not for him to keep me from my own.
- ISMENE: O God! 55
- Consider, sister, how our father died, hated and infamous; how he brought to light his own offenses; how he himself struck out the sight of his two eyes; his own hand was their executioner. 60
- Then, mother and wife, two names in one, did shame violently on her life, with twisted cords.
- Third, our two brothers, on a single day, poor wretches, themselves worked out their mutual doom.
Each killed the other, hand against brother's hand. 65
- Now there are only the two of us, left behind, and see how miserable our end shall be if in the teeth of law we shall transgress against the sovereign's decree and power.
- You ought to realize we are only women, 70 not meant in nature to fight against men, and that we are ruled, by those who are stronger, to obedience in this and even more painful matters.
- I do indeed beg those beneath the earth to give me their forgiveness, 75 since force constrains me, that I shall yield in this to the authorities.
Extravagant action is not sensible.
- ANTIGONE: I would not urge you now; nor if you wanted to act would I be glad to have you with me. 80
Be as you choose to be; but for myself
I myself will bury him. It will be good to die, so doing. I shall lie by his side, loving him as he loved me; I shall be a criminal—but a religious one. 85
- The time in which I must please those that are dead is longer than I must please those of this world.
For there I shall lie forever. You, if you like, can cast dishonor on what the gods have honored.

90 ISMENE: I will not put dishonor on them, but to act in defiance of the citizenry, my nature does not give me means for that.

ANTIGONE: Let that be your excuse. But I will go to heap the earth on the grave of my loved brother.

95 ISMENE: How I fear for you, my poor sister!

ANTIGONE: Do not fear for me. Make straight your own path to destiny.

ISMENE: At least do not speak of this act to anyone else;
bury him in secret; I will be silent, too.

100 ANTIGONE: Oh, oh, no! shout it out. I will hate you still worse for silence—should you not proclaim it, to everyone.

ISMENE: You have a warm heart for such chilly deeds.

ANTIGONE: I know I am pleasing those I should please most.

105 ISMENE: If you can do it. But you are in love with the impossible.

ANTIGONE: No. When I can no more, then I will stop.

ISMENE: It is better not to hunt the impossible at all.

110 ANTIGONE: If you will talk like this I will loathe you, and you will be adjudged an enemy—justly—by the dead's decision. Let me alone and my folly with me, to endure this terror.
No suffering of mine will be enough to make me die ignobly.

115 ISMENE: Well, if you will, go on.

Know this; that though you are wrong to go, your friends are right to love you.

120 CHORUS: Sun's beam, fairest of all that ever till now shone on seven-gated Thebes;
O golden eye of day, you shone coming over Dirce's stream;⁴
You drove in headlong rout
the whiteshielded man from Argos, 125 complete in arms;
his bits rang sharper under your urging.

130 Polyneices brought him here against our land, Polyneices, roused by contentious quarrel;
like an eagle he flew into our country,
with many men-at-arms,
with many a helmet crowned with horsehair.

4. River near Thebes.

He stood above the halls, gaping with murderous lances, encompassing the city's seven-gated mouth⁵ 135

But before his jaws would be sated with our blood, before the fire, pine fed, should capture our crown of towers, he went hence— 140
 such clamor of war stretched behind his back, from his dragon foe, a thing he could not overcome.

For Zeus, who hates the most the boasts of a great tongue, saw them coming in a great tide, 145 insolent in the clang of golden armor.
 The god struck him down with hurled fire,
 as he strove to raise the victory cry,
 now at the very winning post.

The earth rose to strike him as he fell swinging. 150
 In his frantic onslaught, possessed, he breathed upon us with blasting winds of hate.
 Sometimes the great god of war was on one side, and sometimes he struck a staggering blow on the other;
 the god was a very wheel horse⁶ on the right trace. 155

At seven gates stood seven captains, ranged equals against equals, and there left their brazen suits of armor to Zeus, the god of trophies.
 Only those two wretches born of one father and mother 160 set their spears to win a victory on both sides;
 they worked out their share in a common death.

Now Victory, whose name is great, has come to Thebes of many chariots with joy to answer her joy, 165 to bring forgetfulness of these wars; let us go to all the shrines of the gods and dance all night long.
 Let Bacchus lead the dance, shaking Thebes to trembling. 170

But here is the king of our land,
 Creon,⁷ son of Menoeceus;

5. Thebes was known throughout the ancient world for having seven gateways through the walls protecting the city.

6. Strongest and ablest horse in a team pulling a vehicle, harnessed nearest the front wheels "on the right trace."

7. Brother of Jocasta, mother and wife of Oedipus; he became king of Thebes after the deaths of Oedipus's sons.

in our new contingencies with the gods, he is our new ruler.

175 He comes to set in motion some design—what design is it? Because he has proposed the convocation of the elders.

He sent a public summons for our discussion.

CREON: Gentlemen: as for our city's fortune, 180 the gods have shaken her, when the great waves broke,
but the gods have brought her through again to safety.
For yourselves, I chose you out of all and summoned you to come to me, partly because I knew you as always loyal to the throne—at first, 185 when Laïus⁸ was king, and then again when Oedipus saved our city and then again when he died and you remained with steadfast truth to their descendants, until they met their double fate upon one day,
190 striking and stricken, defiled each by a brother's murder.
Now here I am, holding all authority and the throne, in virtue of kinship with the dead.
It is impossible to know any man—
I mean his soul, intelligence, and judgment—
195 until he shows his skill in rule and law.
I think that a man supreme ruler of a whole city, if he does not reach for the best counsel for her, but through some fear, keeps his tongue under lock and key,
him I judge the worst of any;
200 I have always judged so; and anyone thinking another man more a friend than his own country,
I rate him nowhere. For my part, God is my witness, who sees all, always, I would not be silent
if I saw ruin, not safety, on the way 205 towards my fellow citizens. I would not count any enemy of my country as a friend—because of what I know, that she it is which gives us our security. If she sails upright and we sail on her, friends will be ours for the making.
210 In the light of rules like these, I will make her greater still.

In consonance with this, I here proclaim to the citizens about Oedipus' sons.

For Eteocles, who died this city's champion, showing his valor's supremacy everywhere, 215 he shall be buried in his grave with every rite of sanctity given to heroes under earth.
However, his brother, Polyneices, a returned exile, who sought to burn with fire from top to bottom

8. Father of Oedipus.

his native city, and the gods of his own people; who sought to taste the blood he shared with us, 220
 and lead the rest of us to slavery—

I here proclaim to the city that this man shall no one honor with a grave and none shall mourn.
 You shall leave him without burial; you shall watch him chewed up by birds and dogs and violated. 225

Such is my mind in the matter; never by me shall the wicked man have precedence in honor over the just. But he that is loyal to the state in death, in life alike, shall have my honor.

CHORUS: Son of Menoeceus, so it is your pleasure 230 to deal with foe and friend of this our city.

To use any legal means lies in your power, both about the dead and those of us who live.

CREON: I understand, then, you will do my bidding.

CHORUS: Please lay this burden on some younger man. 235

CREON: Oh, watchers of the corpse I have already.

CHORUS: What else, then, do your commands entail?

CREON: That you should not side with those who disagree.

CHORUS: There is none so foolish as to love his own death.

CREON: Yes, indeed those are the wages, but often greed 240 has with its hopes brought men to ruin.

[The SENTRY whose speeches follow represents a remarkable experiment in Greek tragedy in the direction of naturalism of speech. He speaks with marked clumsiness, partly because he is excited and talks almost colloquially. But also the royal presence makes him think apparently that he should be rather grand in his show of respect. He uses odd bits of archaism or somewhat stale poetical passages, particularly in catch phrases. He sounds something like lower-level Shakespearean characters, e.g. Constable Elbow, with his uncertainty about benefactor and malefactor.]

SENTRY: My lord, I will never claim my shortness of breath is due to hurrying, nor were there wings in my feet.
 I stopped at many a lay-by in my thinking;
 I circled myself till I met myself coming back. 245

My soul accosted me with different speeches.

“Poor fool, yourself, why are you going somewhere when once you get there you will pay the piper?”

“Well, aren’t you the daring fellow! stopping again?”

and suppose Creon hears the news from someone else— 250 don’t you realize that you will smart for that?”

I turned the whole matter over. I suppose I may say

“I made haste slowly” and the short road became long.

However, at last I came to a resolve:

I must go to you; even if what I say 255 is nothing, really, still I shall say it.

I come here, a man with a firm clutch on the hope that nothing can betide him save what is fated.

CREON: What is it then that makes you so afraid?

260 SENTRY: No, I want first of all to tell you my side of it.

I didn't do the thing; I never saw who did it.

It would not be fair for me to get into trouble.

CREON: You hedge, and barricade the thing itself.

Clearly you have some ugly news for me.

265 SENTRY: Well, you know how disasters make a man hesitate to be their messenger.

CREON: For God's sake, tell me and get out of here!

SENTRY: Yes, I will tell you. Someone just now buried the corpse and vanished. He scattered on the skin

270 some thirsty dust; he did the ritual, duly, to purge the body of desecration.

CREON: What! Now who on earth could have done that?

SENTRY: I do not know. For there was there no mark of axe's stroke nor casting up of earth

275 of any mattock; the ground was hard and dry, unbroken; there were no signs of wagon wheels.

The doer of the deed had left no trace.

But when the first sentry of the day pointed it out, there was for all of us a disagreeable

280 wonder. For the body had disappeared; not in a grave, of course; but there lay upon him a little dust as of a hand avoiding the curse of violating the dead body's sanctity.

There were no signs of any beast nor dog

285 that came there; he had clearly not been torn.

There was a tide of bad words at one another, guard taunting guard, and it might well have ended in blows, for there was no one there to stop it.

Each one of us was the criminal but no one 290 manifestly so; all denied knowledge of it.

We were ready to take hot bars in our hands or walk through fire,⁹ and call on the gods with oaths that we had neither done it nor were privy to a plot with anyone, neither in planning

295 nor yet in execution.

At last when nothing came of all our searching,

there was one man who spoke, made every head bow to the ground in fear. For we could not either contradict him nor yet could we see how 300 if we did what he said we would come out all right.

9. Ancient legal custom in which an accused person was required to undergo a "trial by ordeal," such as walking through fire; if the resulting injuries were not serious, the person was thought to be innocent and therefore divinely protected.

His word was that we must lay information about the matter to yourself; we could not cover it.
 This view prevailed and the lot of the draw chose me, unlucky me, to win that prize. So here
 I am. I did not want to come, and you don't want to have me. I know that.

305

For no one likes the messenger of bad news.

CHORUS: My lord: I wonder, could this be God's doing?

This is the thought that keeps on haunting me.

CREON: Stop, before your words fill even me with rage, that you should be exposed as a fool, and you so old.

310

For what you say is surely insupportable when you say the gods took forethought for this corpse.

Is it out of excess of honor for the man, for the favors that he did them, they should cover him?

315

This man who came to burn their pillared temples, their dedicated offerings—and this land and laws he would have scattered to the winds?

Or do you see the gods as honoring criminals? This is not so. But what I am doing now, and other things before this, some men disliked, within this very city, and muttered against me, secretly shaking their heads; they would not bow justly beneath the yoke to submit to me.

320

I am very sure that these men hired others to do this thing. I tell you the worse currency that ever grew among mankind is money. This sacks cities, this drives people from their homes, this teaches and corrupts the minds of the loyal to acts of shame. This displays all kinds of evil for the use of men, instructs in the knowledge of every impious act.

325

330

Those that have done this deed have been paid to do it, but in the end they will pay for what they have done.

It is as sure as I still reverence Zeus—know this right well—and I speak under oath—

335

if you and your fellows do not find this man who with his own hand did the burial and bring him here before me face to face, your death alone will not be enough for me.

340

You will hang alive till you open up this outrage.
 That will teach you in the days to come from what you may draw profit—safely—from your plundering.

It's not from anything and everything you can grow rich. You will find out that ill-gotten gains ruin more than they save.

345

SENTRY: Have I your leave to say something—or should
I just turn and go?

CREON: Don't you know your talk is painful enough already?

350 SENTRY: Is the ache in your ears or in your mind?

CREON: Why do you dissect the whereabouts of my pain?

SENTRY: Because it is he who did the deed who hurts your mind. I only hurt your ears that listen.

CREON: I am sure you have been a chatterbox since you were born.

355 SENTRY: All the same, I did not do this thing.

CREON: You might have done this, too, if you sold your soul.

SENTRY: It's a bad thing if one judges and judges wrongly.

CREON: You may talk as wittily as you like of judgment.

360 Only, if you don't bring to light those men who have done this, you will yet come to say that your wretched gains have brought bad consequences.

SENTRY: [Aside.] It were best that he were found, but whether the criminal is taken or he isn't—

365 for that chance will decide—one thing is certain, you'll never see me coming here again.

I never hoped to escape, never thought I could.

But now I have come off safe, I thank God heartily.

CHORUS: Many are the wonders, none is more wonderful than what is man.

370 This it is that crosses the sea with the south winds storming and the waves swelling, breaking around him in roaring surf.

375 He it is again who wears away the Earth, oldest of gods, immortal, unwearied, as the ploughs wind across her from year to year when he works her with the breed that comes from horses.

380 The tribe of the lighthearted birds he snares and takes prisoner the races of savage beasts and the brood of the fish of the sea, with the close-spun web of nets.

385 A cunning fellow is man. His contrivances make him master of beasts of the field and those that move in the mountains.
So he brings the horse with the shaggy neck to bend underneath the yoke;

390 and also the untamed mountain bull; and speech and windswift thought and the tempers that go with city living he has taught himself, and how to avoid the sharp frost, when lodging is cold under the open sky

and pelting strokes of the rain.
He has a way against everything, and he faces nothing that is to come without contrivance. 395

 Only against death can he call on no means of escape;
 but escape from hopeless diseases
 he has found in the depths of his mind.
 With some sort of cunning, inventive 400 beyond all expectation
 he reaches sometimes evil, and sometimes good.

If he honors the laws of earth, and the justice of the gods he has confirmed by oath, 405 high is his city; no city has he with whom dwells dishonor prompted by recklessness.
 He who is so, may he never share my hearth! 410 may he never think my thoughts!

Is this a portent sent by God?
 I cannot tell.
 I know her. How can I say that this is not Antigone? 415 Unhappy girl, child of unhappy Oedipus, what is this?
 Surely it is not you they bring here as disobedient to the royal edict, surely not you, taken in such folly. 420

SENTRY: She is the one who did the deed;

we took her burying him. But where is Creon?

CHORUS: He is just coming from the house, when you most need him.

CREON: What is this? What has happened that I come so opportunely? 425

SENTRY: My lord, there is nothing that a man should swear he would never do.
 Second thoughts make liars of the first resolution.
 I would have vowed it would be long enough before I came again, lashed hence by your threats. 430
 But since the joy that comes past hope, and against all hope, is like no other pleasure in extent,
 I have come here, though I break my oath in coming.
 I bring this girl here who has been captured giving the grace of burial to the dead man. 435
 This time no lot chose me; this was my jackpot, and no one else's. Now, my lord, take her and as you please judge her and test her; I am justly free and clear of all this trouble.

CREON: This girl—how did you take her and from where? 440

SENTRY: She was burying the man. Now you know all.

CREON: Do you know what you are saying? Do you mean it?

SENTRY: She is the one; I saw her burying the dead man you forbade the burial of.

445 Now, do I speak plainly and clearly enough?

CREON: How was she seen? How was she caught in the act?

SENTRY: This is how it was. When we came there, with those dreadful threats of yours upon us, we brushed off all the dust that lay upon 450 the dead man's body, heedfully leaving it moist and naked.

We sat on the brow of the hill, to windward, that we might shun the smell of the corpse upon us.

455 Each of us wakefully urged his fellow with torrents of abuse, not to be careless in this work of ours. So it went on, until in the midst of the sky the sun's bright circle stood still; the heat was burning. Suddenly 460 a squall lifted out of the earth a storm of dust, a trouble in the sky. It filled the plain, ruining all the foliage of the wood that was around it. The great empty air was filled with it. We closed our eyes, enduring this plague sent by the gods. When at long last 465 we were quit of it, why, then we saw the girl.

She was crying out with the shrill cry of an embittered bird that sees its nest robbed of its nestlings and the bed empty. So, too, when she saw 470 the body stripped of its cover, she burst out in groans, calling terrible curses on those that had done that deed;

and with her hands immediately brought thirsty dust to the body; from a shapely brazen urn, held high over it, poured a triple stream

475 of funeral offerings; and crowned the corpse.

When we saw that, we rushed upon her and caught our quarry then and there, not a bit disturbed.

We charged her with what she had done, then and the first time.

She did not deny a word of it—to my joy,

480 but to my pain as well. It is most pleasant to have escaped oneself out of such troubles but painful to bring into it those whom we love.

However, it is but natural for me to count all this less than my own escape.

485 CREON: You there, that turn your eyes upon the ground, do you confess or deny what you have done?

ANTIGONE: Yes, I confess; I will not deny my deed.

CREON: [To the SENTRY.] You take yourself off where you like.

You are free of a heavy charge.

Now, Antigone, tell me shortly and to the point, did you know the proclamation against your action?

ANTIGONE: I knew it; of course I did. For it was public.

CREON: And did you dare to disobey that law?

ANTIGONE: Yes, it was not Zeus that made the proclamation;

nor did Justice, which lives with those below, enact such laws as that, for mankind. I did not believe your proclamation had such power to enable one who will someday die to override

495

God's ordinances, unwritten and secure.

They are not of today and yesterday;

500

they live forever; none knows when first they were.

These are the laws whose penalties I would not incur from the gods, through fear of any man's temper.

I know that I will die—of course I do—even if you had not doomed me by proclamation.

505

If I shall die before my time, I count that a profit. How can such as I, that live among such troubles, not find a profit in death?

So for such as me, to face such a fate as this is pain that does not count. But if I dared to leave the dead man, my mother's son, dead and unburied, that would have been real pain. The other is not.

510

Now, if you think me a fool to act like this, perhaps it is a fool that judges so.

CHORUS: The savage spirit of a savage father shows itself in this girl. She does not know how to yield to trouble.

515

CREON: I would have you know the most fanatic spirits fall most of all. It is the toughest iron, baked in the fire to hardness, you may see 520

most shattered, twisted, shivered to fragments.

I know hot horses are restrained by a small curb. For he that is his neighbor's slave cannot be high in spirit. This girl had learned her insolence before this, when she broke the established laws.

But here is still another insolence in that she boasts of it, laughs at what she did.

I swear I am no man and she the man

if she can win this and not pay for it.

No; though she were my sister's child or closer in blood than all that my hearth god acknowledges as mine, neither she nor her sister should escape the utmost sentence—death. For indeed I accuse her, the sister, equally of plotting the burial.

530

535 Summon her. I saw her inside, just now, crazy, distraught. When people plot mischievous in the dark, it is the mind which first is convicted of deceit. But surely I hate indeed 540 the one that is caught in evil and then makes that evil look like good.

ANTIGONE: Do you want anything beyond my taking and my execution?

CREON: Oh, nothing! Once I have that I have everything.

ANTIGONE: Why do you wait, then? Nothing that you say 545 pleases me; God forbid it ever should.
So my words, too, naturally offend you.

Yet how could I win a greater share of glory than putting my own brother in his grave?
All that are here would surely say that's true, 550 if fear did not lock their tongues up. A prince's power is blessed in many things, not least in this,
that he can say and do whatever he likes.

CREON: You are alone among the people of Thebes to see things in that way.

555 ANTIGONE: No, these do, too, but keep their mouths shut for the fear of you.

CREON: Are you not ashamed to think so differently from them?

ANTIGONE: There is nothing shameful in honoring my brother.

560 CREON: Was not he that died on the other side your brother?

ANTIGONE: Yes, indeed, of my own blood from father and mother.

CREON: Why then do you show a grace that must be impious in his sight?

ANTIGONE: That other dead man

565 would never bear you witness in what you say.

CREON: Yes he would, if you put him only on equality with one that was a desecrator.

ANTIGONE: It was his brother, not his slave, that died.

CREON: He died destroying the country the other defended.

570 ANTIGONE: The god of death demands these rites for both.

CREON: But the good man does not seek an equal share only, with the bad.

ANTIGONE: Who knows
if in that other world this is true piety?

CREON: My enemy is still my enemy, even in death.

575 ANTIGONE: My nature is to join in love, not hate.

CREON: Go then to the world below, yourself, if you must love. Love them. When I am alive no woman shall rule.

CHORUS: Here before the gates comes Ismene shedding tears for the love of a brother.

580 A cloud over her brow casts shame on her flushed face, as the tears wet her fair cheeks.

CREON: You there, who lurked in my house, viper-like—secretly drawing its lifeblood; I never thought that I was raising two sources of destruction, 585 two rebels against my throne. Come tell me now, will you, too, say you bore a hand in the burial or will you swear that you know nothing of it?

ISMENE: I did it, yes—if she will say I did it
I bear my share in it, bear the guilt, too. 590

ANTIGONE: Justice will not allow you what you refused and I will have none of your partnership.

ISMENE: But in your troubles I am not ashamed to sail with you the sea of suffering.

ANTIGONE: Where the act was death, the dead are witnesses. 595
I do not love a friend who loves in words.

ISMENE: Sister, do not dishonor me, denying me a common death with you, a common honoring of the dead man.

ANTIGONE: Don't die with me, nor make your own 600
what you have never touched. I that die am enough.

ISMENE: What life is there for me, once I have lost you?

ANTIGONE: Ask Creon; all your care was on his behalf.

ISMENE: Why do you hurt me, when you gain nothing by it?

ANTIGONE: I am hurt by my own mockery—if I mock you. 605

ISMENE: Even now—what can I do to help you still?

ANTIGONE: Save yourself; I do not grudge you your escape.

ISMENE: I cannot bear it! Not even to share your death!

ANTIGONE: Life was your choice, and death was mine.

ISMENE: You cannot say I accepted that choice in silence. 610

ANTIGONE: You were right in the eyes of one party, I in the other.

ISMENE: Well then, the fault is equally between us.

ANTIGONE: Take heart; you are alive, but my life died long ago, to serve the dead.

CREON: Here are two girls; I think that one of them 615 has suddenly lost her wits—the other was always so.

ISMENE: Yes, for, my lord, the wits that they are born with do not stay firm for the unfortunate.

They go astray.

CREON: Certainly yours do, when you share troubles with the troublemaker. 620

ISMENE: What life can be mine alone without her?

CREON: Do not speak of her. She isn't, anymore.

ISMENE: Will you kill your son's wife to be?¹

1. Antigone, betrothed to Creon's son Haemon.

CREON: Yes, there are other fields for him to plough.

625 ISMENE: Not with the mutual love of him and her.

CREON: I hate a bad wife for a son of mine.

ANTIGONE: Dear Haemon, how your father dishonors you.

CREON: There is too much of you—and of your marriage!

CHORUS: Will you rob your son of this girl?

630 CREON: Death—it is death that will stop the marriage for me.

CHORUS: Your decision it seems is taken: she shall die.

CREON: Both you and I have decided it. No more delay.

[He turns to the SERVANTS.]

Bring her inside, you. From this time forth, these must be women, and not free to roam.

635 For even the stout of heart shrink when they see the approach of death close to their lives.

CHORUS: Lucky are those whose lives know no taste of sorrow.

640 But for those whose house has been shaken by God there is never cessation of ruin;

it steals on generation after generation within a breed. Even as the swell is driven over the dark deep by the fierce Thracian winds

645 I see the ancient evils of Labdacus' house² are heaped on the evils of the dead.

No generation frees another, some god strikes them down; there is no deliverance.

650 Here was the light of hope stretched over the last roots of Oedipus' house, and the bloody dust due to the gods below has mowed it down—that and the folly of speech and ruin's enchantment of the mind.

655 Your power, O Zeus, what sin of man can limit?
All-aging sleep does not overtake it, nor the unwearied months of the gods; and you,
for whom time brings no age,
you hold the glowing brightness of Olympus.

660 For the future near and far, and the past, this law holds good:
nothing very great comes to the life of mortal man without ruin to accompany it.

665 For Hope, widely wandering, comes to many of mankind as a blessing,
but to many as the deceiver,
using light-minded lusts;

2. Theban royal lineage that included Labdacus; his son, Laïus; and his grandson, Oedipus.

she comes to him that knows nothing till he burns his foot in the glowing fire.
With wisdom has someone declared 670
a word of distinction:

that evil seems good to one whose mind
the god leads to ruin, and but for the briefest moment of time is his life outside of calamity. 675

Here is Haemon, youngest of your sons.
Does he come grieving for the fate of his bride to be, in agony at being cheated of his marriage?

CREON: Soon we will know that better than the prophets. 680

My son, can it be that you have not heard of my final decision on your betrothed?
Can you have come here in your fury against your father?
Or have I your love still, no matter what I do?

HAEMON: Father, I am yours; with your excellent judgment 685 you lay the right before me, and I shall follow it.

No marriage will ever be so valued by me as to override the goodness of your leadership.

CREON: Yes, my son, this should always be in your very heart, that everything else 690 shall be second to your father's decision.

It is for this that fathers pray to have obedient sons begotten in their halls, that they may requite with ill their father's enemy and honor his friend no less than he would himself. 695

If a man have sons that are no use to him, what can one say of him but that he has bred so many sorrows to himself, laughter to his enemies?

Do not, my son, banish your good sense through pleasure in a woman, since you know 700 that the embrace grows cold

when an evil woman shares your bed and home.
What greater wound can there be than a false friend?

No. Spit on her, throw her out like an enemy, this girl, to marry someone in Death's house. 705

I caught her openly in disobedience alone out of all this city and I shall not make myself a liar in the city's sight. No, I will kill her.

So let her cry if she will on the Zeus of kinship; for if I rear those of my race and breeding 710 to be rebels, surely I will do so with those outside it.

For he who is in his household a good man will be found a just man, too, in the city.
But he that breaches the law or does it violence or thinks to dictate to those who govern him 715 shall never have my good word.

The man the city sets up in authority must be obeyed in small things and in just but also in their opposites.

720 I am confident such a man of whom I speak will be a good ruler, and willing to be well ruled.
He will stand on his country's side, faithful and just, in the storm of battle. There is nothing worse than disobedience to authority.

725 It destroys cities, it demolishes homes;
it breaks and routs one's allies. Of successful lives the most of them are saved by discipline.
So we must stand on the side of what is orderly;
we cannot give victory to a woman.

730 If we must accept defeat, let it be from a man;
we must not let people say that a woman beat us.

CHORUS: We think, if we are not victims of Time the Thief, that you speak intelligently of what you speak.

HAEMON: Father, the natural sense that the gods breed
735 in men is surely the best of their possessions.
I certainly could not declare you wrong—may I never know how to do so!—Still there might be something useful that some other than you might think.
It is natural for me to be watchful on your behalf 740 concerning what all men say or do or find to blame.

Your face is terrible to a simple citizen;
it frightens him from words you dislike to hear.
But what I can hear, in the dark, are things like these:
the city mourns for this girl; they think she is dying 745 most wrongly and most undeservedly of all womenkind, for the most glorious acts.

Here is one who would not leave her brother unburied,
a brother who had fallen in bloody conflict, to meet his end by greedy dogs or by 750 the bird that chanced that way. Surely what she merits is golden honor, isn't it? That's the dark rumor that spreads in secret. Nothing I own
I value more highly, father, than your success.

755 What greater distinction can a son have than the glory of a successful father, and for a father the distinction of successful children?

Do not bear this single habit of mind, to think that what you say and nothing else is true.
A man who thinks that he alone is right, 760 or what he says, or what he is himself, unique, such men, when opened up, are seen to be quite empty. For a man, though he be wise, it is no shame to learn—learn many things, and not maintain his views too rigidly.

 You notice how by streams in wintertime 765
 the trees that yield preserve their branches safely, but those that fight the tempest perish utterly.
 The man who keeps the sheet³ of his sail tight and never slackens capsizes his boat and makes the rest of his trip keel uppermost. 770
 Yield something of your anger, give way a little.
 If a much younger man, like me, may have a judgment, I would say it were far better to be one altogether wise by nature, but, as things incline not to be so, then it is good 775 also to learn from those who advise well.

CHORUS: My lord, if he says anything to the point, you should learn from him, and you, too, Haemon, learn from your father. Both of you have spoken well. 780

CREON: Should we that are my age learn wisdom from young men such as he is?

HAEMON: Not learn injustice, certainly. If I am young, do not look at my years but what I do.

CREON: Is what you do to have respect for rebels?

HAEMON: I 785 would not urge you to be scrupulous towards the wicked.

CREON: Is she not tainted by the disease of wickedness?

HAEMON: The entire people of Thebes says no to that.

CREON: Should the city tell me how I am to rule them? 790

HAEMON: Do you see what a young man's words these are of yours?

CREON: Must I rule the land by someone else's judgment rather than my own?

HAEMON: There is no city possessed by one man only.

CREON: Is not the city thought to be the ruler's? 795

HAEMON: You would be a fine dictator of a desert.

CREON: It seems this boy is on the woman's side.

HAEMON: If you are a woman—my care is all for you.

CREON: You villain, to bandy words with your own father!

HAEMON: I see your acts as mistaken and unjust. 800

CREON: Am I mistaken, reverencing my own office?

HAEMON: There is no reverence in trampling on God's honor.

CREON: Your nature is vile, in yielding to a woman.

HAEMON: You will not find me yield to what is shameful.

CREON: At least, your argument is all for her. 805

3. Rope attached to the corner of a sail to hold it at the proper angle to the wind.

HAEMON: Yes, and for you and me—and for the gods below.

CREON: You will never marry her while her life lasts.

HAEMON: Then she must die—and dying destroy another.

CREON: Has your daring gone so far, to threaten me?

810 HAEMON: What threat is it to speak against empty judgments?

CREON: Empty of sense yourself, you will regret your schooling of me in sense.

HAEMON: If you were not my father, I would say you are insane.

CREON: You woman's slave, do not try to wheedle me.

815 HAEMON: You want to talk but never to hear and listen.

CREON: Is that so? By the heavens above you will not—be sure of that—get off scot-free, insulting, abusing me.

[He speaks to the SERVANTS.]

You people bring out this creature, this hated creature, that she may die before 820 his very eyes, right now, next her would-be husband.

HAEMON: Not at my side! Never think that! She will not die by my side. But you will never again set eyes upon my face. Go then and rage with such of your friends as are willing to endure it.

825 CHORUS: The man is gone, my lord, quick in his anger.

A young man's mind is fierce when he is hurt.

CREON: Let him go, and do and think things superhuman.

But these two girls he shall not save from death.

CHORUS: Both of them? Do you mean to kill them both?

830 CREON: No, not the one that didn't do anything.

You are quite right there.

CHORUS: And by what form of death do you mean to kill her?

CREON: I will bring her where the path is loneliest, and hide her alive in a rocky cavern there.

835 I'll give just enough of food as shall suffice for a bare expiation, that the city may avoid pollution.

In that place she shall call on Hades, god of death, in her prayers. That god only she reveres.

Perhaps she will win from him escape from death

840 or at least in that last moment will recognize her honoring of the dead is labor lost.

CHORUS: Love undefeated in the fight,

Love that makes havoc of possessions,

Love who lives at night in a young girl's soft cheeks,

845 Who travels over sea, or in huts in the countryside—there is no god able to escape you nor anyone of men, whose life is a day only, and whom you possess is mad.

You wrench the minds of just men to injustice, to their disgrace; this conflict among kinsmen it is you who stirred to turmoil. 850

The winner is desire. She gleaming kindles from the eyes of the girl good to bed.
Love shares the throne with the great powers that rule.
For the golden Aphrodite⁴ holds her play there 855 and then no one can overcome her.

Here I too am borne out of the course of lawfulness when I see these things, and I cannot control the springs of my tears when I see Antigone making her way 860 to her bed—but the bed that is rest for everyone.

ANTIGONE: You see me, you people of my country, as I set out on my last road of all, looking for the last time on this light of this sun— 865 never again. I am alive but Hades who gives sleep to everyone is leading me to the shores of Acheron,⁵ though I have known nothing of marriage songs nor the chant that brings the bride to bed.
My husband is to be the Lord of Death. 870

CHORUS: Yes, you go to the place where the dead are hidden, but you go with distinction and praise.
You have not been stricken by wasting sickness;
you have not earned the wages of the sword;
it was your own choice and alone among mankind 875
you will descend, alive, to that world of death.

ANTIGONE: But indeed I have heard of the saddest of deaths—of the Phrygian stranger,⁶ daughter of Tantalus, whom the rocky growth subdued, like clinging ivy. 880
The rains never leave her, the snow never fails, as she wastes away. That is how men tell the story.
From streaming eyes her tears wet the crags;
most like to her the god brings me to rest.

CHORUS: Yes, but she was a god, and god born, 885 and you are mortal and mortal born.
Surely it is great renown for a woman that dies, that in life and death her lot is a lot shared with demigods.

ANTIGONE: You mock me. In the name of our fathers' gods 890 why do you not wait till I am gone to insult me?

4. Goddess of love and beauty. 5. River in Hades.

6. Niobe, whose children were slain because of her boastfulness and who was herself turned into a stone on Mount Sipylus. Her tears became the mountain's streams.

Must you do it face to face?
 My city! Rich citizens of my city!
 You springs of Dirce, you holy groves of Thebes, 895 famed for its chariots! I would still have you as my witnesses, with what dry-eyed friends, under what laws
 I make my way to my prison sealed like a tomb.
 Pity me. Neither among the living nor the dead do I have a home in common—900 neither with the living nor the dead.

CHORUS: You went to the extreme of daring and against the high throne of Justice you fell, my daughter, grievously.
 But perhaps it was for some ordeal of your father 905 that you are paying requital.

ANTIGONE: You have touched the most painful of my cares—the pity for my father, ever reawakened, and the fate of all of our race, the famous Labdacids;
 the doomed self-destruction of my mother's bed 910 when she slept with her own son, my father.

What parents I was born of, God help me!
 To them I am going to share their home,
 the curse on me, too, and unmarried.

915 Brother, it was a luckless marriage you made,
 and dying killed my life.

CHORUS: There is a certain reverence for piety.
 But for him in authority,
 he cannot see that authority defied; 920 it is your own self-willed temper that has destroyed you.

ANTIGONE: No tears for me, no friends, no marriage. Brokenhearted
 I am led along the road ready before me.
 I shall never again be suffered 925 to look on the holy eye of the day.
 But my fate claims no tears—
 no friend cries for me.

CREON: [To the SERVANTS.] Don't you know that weeping and wailing before death would never stop if one is allowed to weep and wail?

930 Lead her away at once. Enfold her in that rocky tomb of hers—as I told you to.
 There leave her alone, solitary, to die if she so wishes or live a buried life in such a home;

 935 we are guiltless in respect of her, this girl.
 But living above, among the rest of us, this life she shall certainly lose.

ANTIGONE: Tomb, bridal chamber, prison forever dug in rock, it is to you I am going to join my people, that great number that have died, 940 whom in their death Persephone⁷ received.

 I am the last of them and I go down in the worst death of all—for I have not lived the due term of my life. But when I come to that other world my hope is strong 945 that my coming will be welcome to my father, and dear to you, my mother, and dear to you,
 my brother deeply loved. For when you died, with my own hands I washed and dressed you all,
 and poured the lustral offerings on your graves. 950
 And now, Polyneices, it was for such care of your body that I have earned these wages.
 Yet those who think rightly will think I did right in honoring you. Had I been a mother of children, and my husband been dead and rotten, 955
 I would not have taken this weary task upon me against the will of the city. What law backs me when I say this? I will tell you:
 If my husband were dead, I might have had another, and child from another man, if I lost the first. 960
 But when father and mother both were hidden in death no brother's life would bloom for me again.
 That is the law under which I gave you precedence, my dearest brother, and that is why Creon thinks me wrong, even a criminal, and now takes me 965
 by the hand and leads me away, unbedded, without bridal, without share in marriage and in nurturing of children;
 as lonely as you see me; without friends;
 with fate against me I go to the vault of death 970 while still alive. What law of God have I broken?
 Why should I still look to the gods in my misery?
 Whom should I summon as ally? For indeed because of piety I was called impious.
 If this proceeding is good in the gods' eyes 975
 I shall know my sin, once I have suffered.
 But if Creon and his people are the wrongdoers let their suffering be no worse than the injustice they are meting out to me.

CHORUS: It is the same blasts, the tempests of the soul, 980 possess her.

CREON: Then for this her guards, who are so slow, will find themselves in trouble.

ANTIGONE: [Cries out.] Oh, that word has come very close to death.

7. Abducted by Pluto (known to the Greeks as Hades), god of the underworld, who made her his queen.

985 CREON: I will not comfort you with hope that the sentence will not be accomplished.

ANTIGONE: O my father's city, in Theban land,
O gods that sired my race,
I am led away, I have no more stay.

990 Look on me, princes of Thebes, the last remnant of the old royal line;
see what I suffer and who makes me suffer because I gave reverence to what claims reverence.

CHORUS: Danae suffered, too, when, her beauty lost, she gave 995 the light of heaven in exchange for brassbound walls, and in the tomb-like cell was she hidden and held;
yet she was honored in her breeding, child, and she kept, as guardian, the seed of Zeus that came to her in a golden shower.⁸

1000 But there is some terrible power in destiny and neither wealth nor war nor tower nor black ships, beaten by the sea, can give escape from it.

The hot-tempered son of Dryas,⁹ the Edonian king, 1005 in fury mocked Dionysus, who then held him in restraint
in a rocky dungeon.
So the terrible force and flower of his madness drained away. He came to know the god 1010 whom in frenzy he had touched with his mocking tongue, when he would have checked the inspired women and the fire of Dionysus, when he provoked the Muses¹ that love the lyre.

By the black rocks, dividing the sea in two,
1015 are the shores of the Bosphorus, Thracian Salmydessus.²
There the god of war who lives near the city saw the terrible blinding wound dealt by his savage wife on Phineus' two sons.³

1020 She blinded and tore with the points of her shuttle, and her bloodied hands, those eyes that else would have looked on her vengefully.
As they wasted away, they lamented their unhappy fate that they were doomed

8. Danae was locked away because it was prophesized that her son would kill her father. Zeus entered her cell as a shower of gold, impregnated her, and thus fathered Perseus, the child who fulfilled the prophecy. 9. Stricken with madness by Dionysus.

1. Nine sister goddesses of poetry, music, and the arts.

2. City in the land of Thrace, in ancient times erroneously believed to lie on the Bosphorus, the strait separating Europe and Asia at the outlet of the Black Sea.

3. King Phineus's second wife blinded the children of his first wife, whom Phineus had imprisoned in a cave.

to be born of a mother cursed in her marriage. 1025
 She traced her descent from the seed of the ancient Erechtheidae.
 In far-distant caves she was raised among her father's storms, that child of Boreas⁴ quick as a horse, over the steep hills, 1030
 a daughter of the gods.
 But, my child, the long-lived Fates⁵ bore hard upon her, too.

[Enter TEIRESIAS, the blind prophet, led by a BOY.]

TEIRESIAS: My lords of Thebes, we have come here together, one pair of eyes serving us both. For the blind 1035 such must be the way of going, by a guide's leading.
 CREON: What is the news, my old Teiresias?
 TEIRESIAS: I will tell you; and you, listen to the prophet.
 CREON: Never in the past have I turned from your advice.
 TEIRESIAS: And so you have steered well the ship of state. 1040
 CREON: I have benefited and can testify to that.
 TEIRESIAS: Then realize you are on the razor edge of danger.
 CREON: What can that be? I shudder to hear those words.
 TEIRESIAS: When you learn the signs recognized by my art 1045 you will understand.
 I sat at my ancient place of divination for watching the birds, where every bird finds shelter;
 and I heard an unwonted voice among them;
 they were horribly distressed, and screamed unmeaningly. 1050
 I knew they were tearing each other murderously;
 the beating of their wings was a clear sign.
 I was full of fear; at once on all the altars,
 as they were fully kindled, I tasted the offerings, but the god of fire refused to burn from the sacrifice, 1055 and from the thighbones a dark stream of moisture oozed from the embers, smoked and sputtered.
 The gall bladder burst and scattered to the air and the streaming thighbones lay exposed from the fat wrapped round them— 1060 so much I learned from this boy here,
 the fading prophecies of a rite that failed.
 This boy here is my guide, as I am others'.
 This is the city's sickness—and your plans are the cause of it.
 For our altars and our sacrificial hearths 1065

4. God of the cold north wind, who sometimes took the form of a stallion.

5. Supernatural forces, usually represented as three old women, who determine the quality and length of life.

are filled with the carrion meat of birds and dogs, torn from the flesh of Oedipus' poor son.

1070 So the gods will not take our prayers or sacrifice nor yet the flame from the thighbones, and no bird cries shrill and clear, so gluttoned are they with fat of the blood of the killed man.

1075 Reflect on these things, son. All men can make mistakes; but, once mistaken, a man is no longer stupid nor accursed who, having fallen on ill, tries to cure that ill, not taking a fine undeviating stand.

1080 It is obstinacy that convicts of folly.
Yield to the dead man; do not stab him—now he is gone—what bravery is this,
to inflict another death upon the dead?

I mean you well and speak well for your good.
It is never sweeter to learn from a good counselor than when he counsels to your benefit.

1085 CREON: Old man, you are all archers, and I am your mark.
I must be tried by your prophecies as well.

By the breed of you I have been bought and sold and made a merchandise, for ages now.

1090 But I tell you: make your profit from silver-gold from Sardis⁶ and the gold from India if you will. But this dead man you shall not hide in a grave, not though the eagles of Zeus should bear the carrion, snatching it to the throne of Zeus itself.
Even so, I shall not so tremble at the pollution to let you bury him.

1095 No, I am certain no human has the power to pollute the gods.
They fall, you old Teiresias, those men, —so very clever—in a bad fall whenever they eloquently speak vile words for profit.

1100 TEIRESIAS: I wonder if there's a man who dares consider—CREON: What do you mean? What sort of generalization is this talk of yours?

TEIRESIAS: How much the best of possessions is the ability to listen to wise advice?

1105 CREON: As I should imagine that the worst injury must be native stupidity.

TEIRESIAS: Now that is exactly where your mind is sick.

CREON: I do not like to answer a seer with insults.

TEIRESIAS: But you do, when you say my prophecies are lies.

CREON: Well,

6. Capital of the ancient kingdom of Lydia, part of modern-day Turkey, and an important trading center, famed for its wealth.

- the whole breed of prophets certainly loves money. 1110 TEIRESIAS: And the breed that comes from princes loves to take advantage—base advantage.
- CREON: Do you realize you are speaking in such terms of your own prince?
 TEIRESIAS: I know. But it is through me you have saved the city.
 CREON: You are a wise prophet, but what you love is wrong. 1115 TEIRESIAS: You will force me to declare what should be hidden in my own heart.
- CREON: Out with it—
 but only if your words are not for gain.
 TEIRESIAS: They won't be for your gain—that I am sure of.
 CREON: But realize you will not make a merchandise 1120
 of my decisions.
- TEIRESIAS: And you must realize that you will not outlive many cycles more of this swift sun before you give in exchange one of your own loins bred, a corpse for a corpse, for you have thrust one that belongs above 1125 below the earth, and bitterly dishonored a living soul by lodging her in the grave; while one that belonged indeed to the underworld gods you have kept on this earth without due share of rites of burial, of due funeral offerings, 1130 a corpse unhallowed. With all of this you, Creon, have nothing to do, nor have the gods above.
 These acts of yours are violence, on your part.
 And in requital the avenging Spirits of Death itself and the gods' Furies shall 1135 after your deeds, lie in ambush for you, and in their hands you shall be taken cruelly.
 Now, look at this and tell me I was bribed to say it! The delay will not be long before the cries of mourning in your house, 1140 of men and women. All the cities will stir in hatred against you, because their sons in mangled shreds received their burial rites from dogs, from wild beasts or when some bird of the air brought a vile stink to each city that contained the hearths of the dead. 1145
 These are the arrows that archer-like I launched—you vexed me so to anger—at your heart.
 You shall not escape their sting. You, boy, lead me away to my house, so he may discharge his anger on younger men; so may he come to know 1150 to bear a quieter tongue in his head and a better mind than that now he carries in him.
- CHORUS: That was a terrible prophecy, my lord.
 The man has gone. Since these hairs of mine grew white 1155 from the black they once were, he has never spoken a word of a lie to our city.

CREON: I know, I know.

My mind is all bewildered. To yield is terrible.

1160 But by opposition to destroy my very being with a self-destructive curse must also be reckoned in what is terrible.

CHORUS: You need good counsel, son of Menoecus, and need to take it.

CREON: What must I do, then? Tell me; I shall agree.

1165 CHORUS: The girl—go now and bring her up from her cave, and for the exposed dead man, give him his burial.

CREON: That is really your advice? You would have me yield.

CHORUS: And quickly as you may, my lord. Swift harms sent by the gods cut off the paths of the foolish.

1170 CREON: Oh, it is hard; I must give up what my heart would have me do. But it is ill to fight against what must be.

CHORUS: Go now, and do this;
do not give the task to others.

1175 CREON: I will go, just as I am. Come, servants, all of you; take axes in your hands; away with you to the place you see, there.

1180 For my part, since my intention is so changed, as I bound her myself, myself will free her.

I am afraid it may be best, in the end of life, to have kept the old accepted laws.

CHORUS: You of many names,⁷ glory of the Cadmeian bride, breed of loud thundering Zeus;

1185 you who watch over famous Italy;
you who rule where all are welcome in Eleusis;
in the sheltered plains of Deo—

O Bacchus that dwells in Thebes, the mother city of Bacchanals,

1190 by the flowing stream of Ismenus, in the ground sown by the fierce dragon's teeth.

You are he on whom the murky gleam of torches glares, above the twin peaks of the crag where come the Corycean nymphs

1195 to worship you, the Bacchanals; and the stream of Castalia has seen you, too;
and you are he that the ivy-clad

7. Refers to Dionysus, known also as Bacchus (especially to the later Romans); son of Zeus and Semele, a mortal princess of Thebes. As god of wine, Dionysus presided over frenzied rites known as Bacchanals.

slopes of Nisaeae hills, and the green shore ivy-clustered, sent to watch over the roads of Thebes, 1200 where the immortal Evoe chant⁸ rings out.

It is Thebes which you honor most of all cities,
 you and your mother both,
 she who died by the blast of Zeus' thunderbolt.
 And now when the city, with all its folk, 1205 is gripped by a violent plague, come with healing foot, over the slopes of Parnassus,⁹ over the moaning strait.
 You lead the dance of the fire-breathing stars, you are master of the voices of the night. 1210
 True-born child of Zeus, appear, my lord, with your Thyiad attendants, who in frenzy all night long dance in your house, Iacchus, dispenser of gifts. 1215

MESSENGER: You who live by the house of Cadmus and Amphion,¹ hear me. There is no condition of man's life that stands secure. As such I would not praise it or blame. It is chance that sets upright; it is chance that brings down the lucky and the unlucky, 1220 each in his turn. For men, that belong to death, there is no prophet of established things.
 Once Creon was a man worthy of envy—of my envy, at least. For he saved this city of Thebes from her enemies, and attained 1225 the throne of the land, with all a king's power.
 He guided it right. His race bloomed with good children. But when a man forfeits joy
 I do not count his life as life, but only a life trapped in a corpse. 1230
 Be rich within your house, yes greatly rich, if so you will, and live in a prince's style.
 If the gladness of these things is gone, I would not give the shadow of smoke for the rest, as against joy. 1235

CHORUS: What is the sorrow of our princes of which you are the messenger?

MESSENGER: Death; and the living are guilty of their deaths.

CHORUS: But who is the murderer? Who the murdered? Tell us.

MESSENGER: Haemon is dead; the hand that shed his blood 1240 was his very own.

8. Come forth, come forth!

9. Mountain in central Greece sacred to Apollo, Dionysus, and the Muses; Apollo's shrine, Delphi, lies at the foot of Parnassus. 1. A name for Thebes.

CHORUS: Truly his own hand? Or his father's?

MESSENGER: His own hand, in his anger against his father for a murder.

1245 CHORUS: Prophet, how truly you have made good your word!

MESSENGER: These things are so; you may debate the rest.

Here I see Creon's wife Eurydice approaching. Unhappy woman!

1250 Does she come from the house as hearing about her son or has she come by chance?

EURYDICE: I heard your words, all you men of Thebes, as I was going out to greet Pallas² with my prayers.

1255 I was just drawing back the bolts of the gate to open it when a cry struck through my ears telling of my household's ruin. I fell backward in terror into the arms of my servants; I fainted.

But tell me again, what is the story? I will hear it as one who is no stranger to sorrow.

MESSENGER: Dear mistress, I will tell you, for I was there, 1260 and I will leave out no word of the truth.

Why should I comfort you and then tomorrow be proved a liar? The truth is always best.

1265 I followed your husband, at his heels, to the end of the plain where Polyneices' body still lay unpitied, and torn by dogs. We prayed to Hecate, goddess of the crossroads, and also to Pluto³ that they might restrain their anger and turn kind.

1270 And him we washed with sacred lustral water and with fresh-cut boughs we burned what was left of him and raised a high mound of his native earth;
then we set out again for the hollowed rock, death's stone bridal chamber for the girl.

Someone then heard a voice of bitter weeping while we were still far off, coming from that unblest room.

1275 The man came to tell our master Creon of it.

As the king drew nearer, there swarmed about him a cry of misery but no clear words.

1280 He groaned and in an anguished mourning voice cried "Oh, am I a true prophet? Is this the road that I must travel, saddest of all my wayfaring?

It is my son's voice that haunts my ear. Servants, get closer, quickly. Stand around the tomb and look. There is a gap there where the stones

1285 have been wrenched away; enter there, by the very mouth, and see whether I recognize the voice of Haemon or if the gods deceive me." On the command

2. Athena, goddess of wisdom.

3. King of the underworld, known to the Greeks as Hades. Hecate: goddess of witchcraft.

of our despairing master we went to look.
 In the furthest part of the tomb we saw her, hanging by her neck. She had tied a noose of muslin on it.
 Haemon's hands were about her waist embracing her, 1290 while he cried for the loss of his bride gone to the dead, and for all his father had done, and his own sad love.
 When Creon saw him he gave a bitter cry, went in and called to him with a groan: "Poor son!
 what have you done? What can you have meant? 1295
 What happened to destroy you? Come out, I pray you!"
 The boy glared at him with savage eyes, and then spat in his face, without a word of answer.
 He drew his double-hilted sword. As his father ran to escape him, Haemon failed to strike him, 1300 and the poor wretch in anger at himself leaned on his sword and drove it halfway in, into his ribs. Then he folded the girl to him, in his arms, while he was conscious still,
 and gasping poured a sharp stream of bloody drops 1305 on her white cheeks. There they lie, the dead upon the dead. So he has won the pitiful fulfillment of his marriage within death's house. In this human world he has shown how the wrong choice in plans is for a man 1310 his greatest evil.

CHORUS: What do you make of this? My lady is gone, without a word of good or bad.

MESSENGER: I, too, am lost in wonder. I am inclined to hope that hearing of her son's death she could not 1315 open her sorrow to the city, but chose rather within her house to lay upon her maids the mourning for the household grief. Her judgment is good; she will not make any false step.

CHORUS: I do not know. To me this over-heavy silence seems just as dangerous as much empty wailing. 1320

MESSENGER: I will go in and learn if in her passionate heart she keeps hidden some secret purpose.
 You are right; there is sometimes danger in too much silence.

CHORUS: Here comes our king himself. He bears in his hands 1325 a memorial all too clear;
 it is a ruin of none other's making, purely his own if one dare to say that.

CREON: The mistakes of a blinded man are themselves rigid and laden with death. 1330
 You look at us the killer and the killed of the one blood. Oh, the awful blindness of those plans of mine. My son, you were so young,

1335 so young to die. You were freed from the bonds of life through no folly of your own—only through mine.

CHORUS: I think you have learned justice—but too late.

1340 CREON: Yes, I have learned it to my bitterness. At this moment God has sprung on my head with a vast weight and struck me down. He shook me in my savage ways;
he has overturned my joy, has trampled it, underfoot. The pains men suffer are pains indeed.

1345 SECOND MESSENGER: My lord, you have troubles and a store besides; some are there in your hands, but there are others
you will surely see when you come to your house.

CREON: What trouble can there be beside these troubles?

SECOND MESSENGER: The queen is dead. She was indeed true mother of the dead son. She died, poor lady, by recent violence upon herself.

1350 CREON: Haven of death, you can never have enough.
Why, why do you destroy me?
You messenger, who have brought me bitter news,
what is this tale you tell?
It is a dead man that you kill again—
1355 what new message of yours is this, boy?
Is this new slaughter of a woman
a doom to lie on the pile of the dead?

CHORUS: You can see. It is no longer hidden in a corner.

[By some stage device, perhaps the so-called eccyclema,⁴ the inside of the palace is shown, with the body of the dead QUEEN.]

1360 CREON: Here is yet another horror for my unhappy eyes to see.
What doom still waits for me?
I have but now taken in my arms my son, and again I look upon another dead face.

1365 Poor mother and poor son!

SECOND MESSENGER: She stood at the altar, and with keen whetted knife she suffered her darkening eyes to close.

1370 First she cried in agony recalling the noble fate of Megareus,⁵ who died before all this,

CRITICAL EXCERPTS

Richard C. Jebb

*From Introduction to The Antigone of Sophocles (1902)*¹

The issue defined in the opening scene,—the conflict of divine with human law,—remains the central interest throughout. The action, so simple in plan, is varied by masterly character-drawing, both in the two principal figures, and in those lesser persons who contribute gradations of light and shade to the picture. There is no halting in the march of the drama; at each successive step we become more and more keenly interested to see how this great conflict is to end; and when the tragic climax is reached, it is worthy of such a progress.

The simplicity of the plot is due to the clearness with which two principles are opposed to each other. Creon represents the duty of obeying the State's laws; Antigone, the duty of listening to the private conscience. The definiteness and the power with which the play puts the case on each side are conclusive proofs that the question had assumed a distinct shape before the poet's mind. It is the only instance in which a Greek play has for its central theme a practical problem of conduct, involving issues, moral and political, which might be discussed on similar grounds in any age and in any country of the world. Greek tragedy, owing partly to the limitations which it placed on detail, was better suited than modern drama to raise such a question in a general form. The Antigone, indeed, raises the question in a form as nearly abstract as is compatible with the nature of drama. The case of Antigone is a thoroughly typical one for the private conscience, because the particular thing which she believes that she ought to do was, in itself, a thing which every Greek of that age recognised as a most sacred duty,—viz.,² to render burial rites to kinsfolk. This advantage was not devised by Sophocles; it came to him as part of the story which he was to dramatise; but it forms an additional reason for thinking that, when he dramatised that story in the precise manner which he has chosen, he had a consciously dialectical purpose. Such a purpose was wholly consistent, in this instance, with the artist's first aim,—to produce a work of art. It is because Creon and Antigone are so human that the controversy which they represent becomes so vivid.

But how did Sophocles intend us to view the result? What is the drift of the words at the end, which say that “wisdom is the supreme part of happiness”? If this wisdom, or prudence [. . .], means, generally, the observance of due limit, may not the suggested moral be that both the parties to the conflict were censurable? As Creon overstepped the due limit when, by his edict, he infringed the divine law, so Antigone also overstepped it when she defied the edict. The drama would thus be a conflict between two persons, each of whom defends an intrinsically sound principle, but defends it in a mistaken way; and both persons are therefore punished. This view, of which Boeckh³ is the chief representative, has found several supporters. Among them is Hegel:—“In the view of the Eternal

Justice, both were wrong, because they were one-sided, but at the same time both were right."⁴

Or does the poet rather intend us to feel that Antigone is wholly in the right,—i.e., that nothing of which the human lawgiver could complain in her was of a moment's account beside the supreme duty which she was fulfilling;—and that Creon was wholly in the wrong,—i.e., that the intrinsically sound maxims of government on which he relies lose all validity when opposed to the higher law which he was breaking? If that was the poet's meaning, then the "wisdom" taught by the issue of the drama means the sense which duly subordinates human to divine law,—teaching that, if the two come into conflict, human law must yield.

A careful study of the play itself will suffice (I think) to show that the second of these two views is the true one. Sophocles has allowed Creon to put his case ably, and (in a measure from which an inferior artist might have shrunk) he has been content to make Antigone merely a nobly heroic woman, not a being exempt from human passion and human weakness; but none the less does he mean us to feel that, in this controversy, the right is wholly with her, and the wrong wholly with her judge.

Modern critics who do not share Sophocles' conviction about the paramount duty of burying the dead and who attach more importance than he did to the claims of political authority have tended to underestimate the way in which he justifies Antigone against Creon. To their support they have called in the great name of Hegel, who was fascinated by the play and advanced remarkable views on it.² [. . .] He has been made responsible for the opinion that Sophocles dramatized a conflict not between right and wrong but between right and right, that Antigone and Creon are equally justified in their actions and that the tragedy arises out of this irreconcilable conflict. [. . .] Hegel used the Antigone to illustrate his view of tragedy and his view of existence. He drew his own conclusions about the actions portrayed in it, as he was fully entitled to do. But his views are not those of Sophocles, and he should not be thought to maintain that Creon and Antigone were equally right in the eyes of their creator.

Sophocles leaves no doubt what conclusion should be drawn from the Antigone. He closes with a moral on the lips of the Chorus which tells the audience what to think:

Wisdom has first place in happiness,
And to fail not in reverence to the gods.
The big words of the arrogant
Lay big stripes on the boasters' backs.

They pay the price
And learn in old age to be wise.³

This can refer to no one but Creon, whose lack of wisdom has brought him to misery, who has shown irreverence to the gods in refusing burial to Polynices, been chastened for his proud words, and learned wisdom in his old age. To this lesson the preceding action in which Creon has lost son and wife and happiness has already made its effective contribution. We may be sure that the Chorus speak for the poet. It is as silent about Antigone as it is emphatic about Creon. There is no hint that she has in any way acted wrongly or that her death should be regarded as a righteous punishment. Of course the final words do not sum up everything important in the play, but we may reasonably assume that they pass judgement on its salient events as they appear in retrospect when the action is finished. There is no real problem about the ethical intention of the Antigone. It shows the fall of a proud man, and its lesson is that the gods punish pride and irreverence. But what matters much more than the actual conclusion is the means by which it is reached, the presentation of the different parties in the conflict, the view that we take of each, the feelings that are forced on us. The interest and power of the Antigone lie in the tangled issues which are unravelled in it.

A conclusion so clear as this is only worth reaching if it has been preceded by a drama in which the issues are violent and complex. The rights and wrongs of the case must not throughout be so obvious as they are at the end; the audience must feel that the issue is difficult, that there is much to be said on both sides, that the ways of the gods are hard to discern. Without this the play will fail in dramatic and human interest. And Sophocles has taken great care to show the issues in their full difficulty before he provides a solution for them. He makes the two protagonists appear in such a light that at intervals we doubt if all the right is really with Antigone and all the wrong with Creon. To Creon, who defies the divine ordinance of burial, he gives arguments and sentiments which sound convincing enough when they are put forward, and many must feel that he has some good reason to act as he does. On the other hand Antigone, who fearlessly vindicates the laws of the gods, is by no means a gentle womanly creature who suffers martyrdom for the right. She may be right, but there are moments when we qualify our approval of her, when she seems proud and forbidding in her determination to do her duty and to do it alone. For these variations in our feelings Sophocles is responsible. He makes us find some right in Creon, some wrong in Antigone, even if we are misled about both. He built his play on a contrast not between obvious wrong and obvious right but between the real arrogance of Creon and the apparent arrogance of Antigone. The first deceives by its fine persuasive sentiments; the second works through Antigone's refusal to offer concessions or to consider any point of view but her own. This contrast runs through much of the play, accounts for misunderstandings of what takes place in it, provides false clues and suggests wrong conclusions, and adds greatly to the intensity of the drama. When a play is written round a moral issue, that issue must be a real problem about which more than one view is tenable until all the relevant facts are known. So the Antigone dramatizes a conflict which was familiar to the Periclean age,³ would excite divergent judgements and feelings, and make some support Antigone, some Creon, until the end makes all clear.

Bernard Knox

From Introduction to Antigone (1982)¹

The opening scenes show us the conflicting claims and loyalties of the two adversaries, solidly based, in both cases, on opposed political and religious principles. This is of course the basic insight of Hegel's famous analysis of the play: he sees it as "a collision between the two highest moral powers." What is wrong with them, in his view, is that they are both "one-sided." But Hegel goes much further than that. He was writing in the first half of the nineteenth century, a period of fervent German nationalism in which the foundations of the unified German state were laid: his views on loyalty to the state were very much those of Creon. "Creon," he says, "is not a tyrant, he is really a moral power. He is not in the wrong."

However, as the action develops the favorable impression created by Creon's opening speech is quickly dissipated. His announcement of his decision to expose the corpse, the concluding section of his speech, is couched in violent, vindictive terms—"carrion for the birds and dogs to tear" (225)²—which stand in shocking contrast to the ethical generalities that precede it. This hint of a cruel disposition underlying the statesmanlike façade is broadened by the threat of torture leveled at the sentry (335–41) and the order to execute Antigone in the presence of Haemon, her betrothed (818–20). And as he meets resistance from a series of opponents—Antigone's contemptuous defiance, the rational, political advice of his son Haemon, the imperious summons to obedience of the gods' spokesman, Tiresias—he swiftly abandons the temperate rhetoric of his inaugural address for increasingly savage invective. Against the two sanctions invoked by Antigone, the demands of blood relationship, the rights and privileges of the gods below, he rages in terms ranging from near-blasphemous defiance to scornful mockery.

Sister's child or closer in blood than all my family clustered at my altar worshiping Guardian Zeus—she'll never escape,
... the most barbaric death. (530–33)

He will live to regret this wholesale denial of the family bond, for it is precisely through that family clustered at his altar that his punishment will be administered, in the suicides of his son and his wife, both of whom die cursing him.

And for Antigone's appeals to Hades, the great god of the underworld to whom the dead belong, Creon has nothing but contempt; for him "Hades" is simply a word meaning “death,” a sentence he is prepared to pass on anyone who stands in his way. He threatens the sentry with torture as a prelude: “simple death won’t be enough for you” (340). When asked if he really intends to deprive Haemon of his bride he answers sarcastically: “Death will do it for me” (630). He expects to see Antigone and Ismene turn coward “once they see Death coming for their lives” (635–36). With a derisive comment he tells his son to abandon Antigone: “Spit her out, / . . . Let her find a husband down among the dead [in Hades’ house]” (704–05). And he dismisses Antigone’s reverence for Hades and the rights of the dead with mockery as he condemns her to be buried alive: “There let her pray to the one god she worships: / Death” (837–38). But this Hades is not something to be so lightly referred to, used or mocked. In the great choral ode which celebrated Man’s progress and powers this was the one insurmountable obstacle that confronted him:

ready, resourceful man!
 Never without resources never an impasse as he marches on the future—only Death, from Death alone he will find no rescue . . . (381, 393–97)

And Creon, in the end, looking at the corpse of his son and hearing the news of his wife’s suicide, speaks of Hades for the first time with the fearful respect that is his due, not as an instrument of policy or a subject for sardonic word-play, but as a divine power, a dreadful presence: “harbor of Death, so choked, so hard to cleanse!— / why me? why are you killing me?” (1350–51).

Creon is forced at last to recognize the strength of those social and religious imperatives that Antigone obeys, but long before this happens he has abandoned the principles which he had proclaimed as authority for his own actions. His claim to be representative of the whole community is forgotten as he refuses to accept Haemon’s report that the citizens, though they dare not speak out, disapprove of his action; he denies the relevance of such a report even if true—“And is Thebes about to tell me how to rule?” (790)—and finally repudiates his principles in specific terms by an assertion that the city belongs to him—“The city is the king’s—that’s the law!” (795). This autocratic phrase puts the finishing touch to the picture Sophocles is drawing for his audience: Creon has now displayed all the characteristics of the “tyrant,” a despotic ruler who seizes power and retains it by intimidation and force. Athens had lived under the rule of a “tyrant” before the democracy was established in 508 B.C., and the name and institution were still regarded with abhorrence. Creon goes on to abandon the gods whose temples crown the city’s high places, the gods he once claimed as his own, and his language is even more violent. The blind prophet Tiresias tells him that the birds and dogs are fouling the altars of the city’s gods with the carion flesh of Polynices; he must bury the corpse. His furious reply begins with a characteristic accusation that the prophet has been bribed (the sentry had this same accusation flung at him), but what follows is a hideously blasphemous defiance of those gods Creon once claimed to serve:

You’ll never bury that body in the grave, not even if Zeus’s eagles rip the corpse and wing their rotten pickings off to the throne of god! (1090–92)

At this high point in his stubborn rage (he will break by the end of the scene and try, too late, to avoid the divine wrath), he is sustained by nothing except his tyrannical insistence on his own will, come what may, and his outraged refusal to be defeated by a woman. "No woman," he says, "is going to lord it over me" (577). "I'm not the man, not now: she is the man / if this victory goes to her and she goes free" (528–29).

Antigone, on her side, is just as indifferent to Creon's principles of action as he is to hers. She mentions the city only in her last agonized laments before she is led off to her living death:

O my city, all your fine rich sons!
 . . . springs of the Dirce, holy grove of Thebes . . . (893–94)

But here she is appealing for sympathy to the city over the heads of the chorus, the city's symbolic representative on stage. In all her arguments with Creon and Ismene she speaks as one wholly unconscious of the rights and duties membership in the city confers and imposes, as if no unit larger than the family existed. It is a position just as extreme as Creon's insistence that the demands of the city take precedence over all others, for the living and the dead alike.

Like Creon, she acts in the name of gods, but they are different gods. There is more than a little truth in Creon's mocking comment that Hades is "the one god she worships (838)." She is from the beginning "much possessed by death"; together with Ismene she is the last survivor of a doomed family, burdened with such sorrow that she finds life hardly worth living. "Who on earth," she says to Creon, "alive in the midst of so much grief as I, / could fail to find his death a rich reward?" (507–08). She has performed the funeral rites for mother, father and her brother Eteocles:

I washed you with my hands,
 I dressed you all, I poured the cups across your tombs. (948–50)

She now sacrifices her life to perform a symbolic burial, a handful of dust sprinkled on the corpse, for Polynices, the brother left to rot on the battlefield. She looks forward to her reunion with her beloved dead in that dark kingdom where Persephone, the bride of Hades, welcomes the ghosts (939–41). It is in the name of Hades, one of the three great gods who rule the universe, that she defends the right of Polynices and of all human beings to proper burial. "Death [Hades] longs for the same rites for all" (570), she tells Creon—for patriot and traitor alike; she rejects Ismene's plea to be allowed to share her fate with an appeal to the same stern authority: "Who did the work? / Let the dead and the god of death bear witness!" (595). In Creon's gods, the city's patrons and defenders, she shows no interest at all. Zeus she mentions twice: once as the source of all the calamities that have fallen and are still to fall on the house of Oedipus (2–5), and once again at the beginning of her famous speech about the unwritten laws. But the context here suggests strongly that she is thinking about Zeus in his special relationship to the underworld, Zeus Chthonios (Underworld Zeus). "It wasn't Zeus," she says, who made this proclamation. . . .

 Nor did that Justice, dwelling with the gods beneath the earth, ordain such laws for men. (494–96)

From first to last her religious devotion and duty are to the divine powers of the world below, the masters of that world where lie her family dead, to which she herself, reluctant but fascinated, is irresistibly drawn.

But, like Creon, she ends by denying the great sanctions she invoked to justify her action. In his case the process was spread out over the course of several scenes, as he reacted to each fresh pressure that was brought to bear on him; Antigone turns her back on the claims of blood relationship and the nether gods in one sentence: three lines in Greek, no more. They are the emotional high point of the speech she makes just before she is led off to her death.

Never, I tell you,
 if I had been the mother of children or if my husband died, exposed and rotting—I'd never have taken this ordeal upon myself, never defied our people's will. (954–57)

These unexpected words are part of the long speech that concludes a scene of lyric lamentation and is in effect her farewell to the land of the living. They are certainly a total repudiation of her proud claim that she acted as the champion of the unwritten laws and the infernal gods, for, as she herself told Creon, those laws and those gods have no preferences, they long “for the same rites for all” (570). And her assertion that she would not have done for her children what she has done for Polynices is a spectacular betrayal of that fanatical loyalty to blood relationship which she urged on Ismene and defended against Creon, for there is no closer relationship imaginable than that between the mother and the children of her own body. Creon turned his back on his guiding principles step by step, in reaction to opposition based on those principles; Antigone's rejection of her public values is just as complete, but it is the sudden product of a lonely, brooding introspection, a last-minute assessment of her motives, on which the imminence of death confers a merciless clarity. She did it because Polynices was her brother; she would not have done it for husband or child. She goes on to justify this disturbing statement by an argument which is more disturbing still: husband and children, she says, could be replaced by others but, since her parents are dead, she could never have another brother. It so happens that we can identify the source of this strange piece of reasoning; it is a story in the Histories of Sophocles' friend Herodotus (a work from which Sophocles borrowed material more than once). Darius the Great King had condemned to death for treason a Persian noble, Intaphrenes, and all the men of his family. The wife of Intaphrenes begged importunately for their lives; offered one, she chose her brother's. When Darius asked her why, she replied in words that are unmistakably the original of Antigone's lines. But what makes sense in the story makes less in the play. The wife of Intaphrenes saves her brother's life, but Polynices is already dead; Antigone's phrase “no brother could ever spring to light again” (962) would be fully appropriate only if Antigone had managed to save Polynices' life rather than bury his corpse.

For this reason, and also because of some stylistic anomalies in this part of the speech, but most of all because they felt that the words are unworthy of the Antigone who spoke so nobly for the unwritten laws, many great scholars and also a great poet and dramatist, Goethe, have refused to believe that Sophocles wrote them. "I would give a great deal," Goethe told his friend Eckermann in 1827, "if some talented scholar could prove that these lines were interpolated, not genuine." Goethe did not know that the attempt had already been made, six years earlier; many others have tried since—Sir Richard Jebb, the greatest English editor of Sophocles, pronounced against them—and opinion today is still divided. Obviously a decision on this point is of vital significance for the interpretation of the play as a whole: with these lines removed, Antigone goes to her prison-tomb with no flicker of self-doubt, the flawless champion of the family bond and the unwritten laws, "whole as the marble, founded as the rock"³—unlike Creon, she is not, in the end, reduced to recognizing that her motive is purely personal.

There is however one objective piece of evidence that speaks volumes for the authenticity of the disputed lines. Aristotle, writing his treatise on rhetoric less than a century after the death of Sophocles, summarizes this part of Antigone's speech and quotes the two lines about the irreplaceability of a brother. He is telling the would-be orator that if, in a law-court speech for the defense, he has to describe an action that seems inappropriate for the character of his client and hard to believe, he must provide an explanation for it "as in the example Sophocles gives, the one from Antigone"—the phrasing suggests that the passage was well known to Aristotle's readers. Evidently he does not find the passage as repellent as Goethe and Jebb did; he recognizes that Antigone's initial statement is, in terms of her character, "hard to believe" [. . .], but apparently he finds her explanation rhetorically satisfactory. He does not, however, for one moment suspect the authenticity of the lines. [. . .] His acceptance of Antigone's speech as genuine demands that rather than suppress it we should try to understand it.

This is Antigone's third and last appearance on stage; in the prologue she planned her action, in the confrontation with Creon she defended it, and now, under guard, she is on her way to the prison which is to be her tomb. In lyric meters, the dramatic medium for unbridled emotion, she appeals to the chorus for sympathy and mourns for the marriage hymn she will never hear (this is as close as she ever comes to mentioning Haemon). She gets little comfort from the Theban elders; the only consolation they offer is a reminder that she may be the victim of a family curse—"do you pay for your father's terrible ordeal?" (904–05)—a suggestion that touches her to the quick and provokes a horror-struck rehearsal of the tormented loves and crimes of the house of Oedipus. There is, as she goes on to say, no one left to mourn her; the lyric lament she sings in this scene is her attempt to provide for herself that funeral dirge which her blood relatives would have wailed over her corpse, if they had not already preceded her into the realm of Hades. This is recognized by Creon, who cuts off the song with a sarcastic comment: "if a man could wail his own dirge before he dies, / he'd never finish" (928–29). And he orders the guards to take her away.

Her song cut off, she turns from the lyric medium of emotion to spoken verse, the vehicle of reasoned statement, for her farewell speech. It is not directed at anyone on stage; it resembles a soliloquy, a private meditation. It is an attempt to understand the real reasons for the action that has brought her to the brink of death. After an address to the tomb and prison where she expects to be reunited with her family she speaks to Polynices (Creon is referred to in the third person). It is to Polynices that she is speaking when she says that she would not have given her life for anyone but a brother; it is as if she had already left the world of the living and joined that community of the family dead she speaks of with such love. Now, in the face of death, oblivious of the presence of Creon and the chorus, with no public case to make, no arguments to counter, she can at last identify the driving force behind her action, the private, irrational imperative which was at the root of her championship of the rights of family and the dead against the demands of the state. It is her fanatical devotion to one particular family, her own, the doomed, incestuous, accursed house of Oedipus and especially to its most unfortunate member, the brother whose corpse lay exposed to the birds and dogs. When she tells him that she has done for him what she would not have done for husband or children she is not speaking in wholly hypothetical terms, for in sober fact she has sacrificed, for his sake, her marriage to Haemon and the children that might have issued from it.

And in this moment of self-discovery she realizes that she is absolutely alone, not only rejected by men but also abandoned by gods. “What law of the mighty gods have I transgressed?” (971) she asks—as well she may, for whatever her motive may have been, her action was a blow struck for the rights of Hades and the dead. Unlike Christians whose master told them not to look for signs from heaven (Matthew 16:4),⁴ the ancient Greek expected if not direct intervention at least some manifestation of favor or support from his gods when he believed his cause was just—a flight of eagles, the bird of Zeus, or lightning and thunder, the signs which, in the last play,⁵ summon Oedipus to his resting place. But Antigone has to renounce this prospect: “Why look to heavens any more . . . ?” (972). She must go to her death as she has lived, alone, without a word of approval or a helping hand from men or gods.

Antigone’s discovery that her deepest motives were purely personal has been overinterpreted by those who would suppress the passage on the grounds that, to quote Jebb’s eloquent indictment, “she suddenly gives up that which, throughout the drama, has been the immovable basis of her action—the universal and unqualified validity of the divine law.” This formulation is too absolute. Before the raw immediacy of death, which, as Doctor Johnson remarked, wonderfully concentrates the mind,⁶ she has sounded the depths of her own soul and identified the determinant of those high principles she proclaimed in public. But that does not mean that they were a pretense, still less that she has now abandoned them. She dies for them. In her very last words, as she calls on the chorus to bear witness to her unjust fate, she claims once more and for the last time that she is the champion of divine law—she suffers “all for reverence, my reverence for the gods!” (993).

4. “A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given unto it [. . .].”

6. Samuel Johnson (1709–84), as quoted in James Boswell’s Life of Samuel Johnson (1791): “when a man knows he is to be hanged in a fortnight, it concentrates his mind wonderfully.”

Unlike Creon, who after proclaiming the predominance of the city's interests rides roughshod over them, speaking and acting like a tyrant, who after extolling the city's gods dismisses Tiresias, their spokesman, with a blasphemous insult, Antigone does not betray the loyalties she spoke for. No word of compromise or surrender comes to her lips, no plea for mercy [. . .].

This is a pattern of character and behavior which is found in other Sophoclean dramatic figures also; not only in the Oedipus of the other two plays of this volume but also in the protagonists of Ajax, Electra and Philoctetes. They are of course very different from each other, but they all have in common the same uncompromising determination, the same high sense of their own worth and a consequent quickness to take offense, the readiness to die rather than surrender—a heroic temper. This figure of the tragic hero [. . .] seems, as far as we can tell from what remains of Attic tragedy, to have been a peculiarly Sophoclean creation. In his plays he explores time and again the destinies of human beings who refuse to recognize the limits imposed on the individual will by men and gods, and go to death or triumph, magnificently defiant to the last.

Antigone is such a heroic figure, and this is another of the ways in which she is different from Creon. Not only does Creon, unlike Antigone, betray in action the principles he claimed to stand for; he also, subjected to pressure that falls short of the death Antigone is faced with, collapses in abject surrender. He was sure Antigone would give way when force was applied; he has seen “the stiffest stubborn wills / fall the hardest; the toughest iron . . . crack and shatter” (518–21)—but he is wrong. He is the one who is shattered. Tiresias tells him that he will lose a child of his own to death in return for the living being he has imprisoned in the tomb and the corpse he has kept in the sunlight. He hesitates: “I’m shaken, torn. / It’s a dreadful thing to yield . . .” (1158). But yield he does. “What should I do?” he asks the chorus (1164) and they tell him: release Antigone, bury Polynices. But he arrives too late; Antigone, independent to the last, has chosen her own way to die [. . .].

Antigone asked the gods to punish Creon if he was wrong [975–79], and they have. They have shown to all the world that her action was right. But she did not live to see her vindication. [. . . T]he will of the gods remains, as in all three of these plays, mysterious; revealed partially, if at all, through prophets rejected and prophecies misunderstood, it is the insoluble riddle at the heart of Sophocles' tragic vision. The gods told Creon he was wrong, but it is noticeable that

Tiresias, their spokesman, does not say Antigone was right, he does not praise her—in fact he does not mention her. Antigone was ready to admit, if the gods did not save her and she suffered death, that she was wrong (975–76); these words suggest that she hanged herself not just to cut short the lingering agony of starvation and imprisonment but in a sort of existential despair. [. . .]

The gods do not praise Antigone, nor does anyone else in the play—except the young man who loves her so passionately that he cannot bear to live without her. Haemon tells his father what the Thebans are saying behind his back, the “murmurs in the dark” (743): that Antigone deserves not death but “a glowing crown of gold!” (751). Whether this is a true report (and the chorus does not praise Antigone even when they have been convinced that she was right) or just his own feelings attributed to others for the sake of his argument, it is a timely reminder of Antigone’s heroic status. In the somber world of the play, against the background of so many sudden deaths and the dark mystery of the divine dispensation, her courage and steadfastness are a gleam of light; she is the embodiment of the only consolation tragedy can offer—that in certain heroic natures unmerited suffering and death can be met with a greatness of soul which, because it is purely human, brings honor to us all.

From Sophocles’ Antigone: Conflict, Vision, and Simplification (1986, 2001)¹

[. . . A]most all interpreters of this play have agreed that the play shows Creon to be morally defective, though they might not agree about the particular nature of his defect. The situation of Antigone is more controversial. Hegel assimilated her defect to Creon’s; some more recent writers uncritically hold her up as a blameless heroine. Without entering into an exhaustive study of her role in the tragedy, I should like to claim (with the support of an increasing number of recent critics) that there is at least some justification for the Hegelian assimilation—though the criticism needs to be focused more clearly and specifically than it is in Hegel’s brief remarks. I want to suggest that Antigone, like Creon, has engaged in a ruthless simplification of the world of value which effectively eliminates conflicting obligations. Like Creon, she can be blamed for refusal of vision. But there are important differences, as well, between her project and Creon’s. When these are seen, it will also emerge that this criticism of Antigone is not incompatible with the judgment that she is morally superior to Creon.

There has been a war. On one side was an army led by Eteocles, brother of Antigone and Ismene. On the other side was an invading army, made up partly of foreigners, but led by a Theban brother, Polynices. This heterogeneity is denied, in different ways, by both Creon and Antigone. Creon's strategy is to draw, in thought, a line between the invading and defending forces. What falls to one side of this line is a foe, bad, unjust; what falls to the other (if loyal to the city's cause) becomes, indiscriminately, friend or loved one. Antigone, on the other hand, denies the relevance of this distinction entirely. She draws, in imagination, a small circle around the members of her family: what is inside (with further restrictions which we shall mention) is family, therefore loved one and friend; what is outside is non-family, therefore, in any conflict with the family, enemy. If one listened only to Antigone, one would not know that a war had taken place or that anything called "city" was ever in danger.² To her it is a simple injustice that Polynices should not be treated like a friend.

"Friend" (philos) and "enemy," then, are functions solely of family relationship.³ When Antigone says, "It is my nature to join in loving (sumphilein), not to join in hating," she is expressing not a general attachment to love, but a devotion to the philia of the family. It is the nature of these philia bonds to make claims on one's commitments and actions regardless of one's occurrent desires. This sort of love is not something one decides about; the relationships involved may have little to do with liking or fondness. We might say (to use terminology borrowed from Kant⁴) that Antigone, in speaking of love, means "practical," not "pathological" love (a love that has its source in fondness or inclination). "He is my own brother," she says to Ismene in explanation of her defiance of the city's decree, "and yours too, even if you don't want it. I certainly will never be found a traitor to him" (51–52). Relationship is itself a source of obligation, regardless of the feelings involved. When Antigone speaks of Polynices as "my dearest [. . .] brother" (94), even when she proclaims, "I shall lie with him as a loved one with a loved one [. . .]" (83–84), there is no sense of closeness, no personal memory, no particularity animating her speech.⁵ Ismene, the one person who ought, historically, to be close to her, is treated from the beginning with remote coldness; she is even called enemy (110) when she takes the wrong stand on matters of pious obligation. It is Ismene whom we see weeping "sister-loving tears," who acts out of commitment to a felt love. "What life is worth living for me, bereft of you?" (602) she asks with an intensity of feeling that never animates her sister's piety. To Haemon, the man who passionately loves and desires her, Antigone never addresses a word throughout the entire play.⁶ It is Haemon, not Antigone, whom the Chorus views as inspired by erōs (842–56). Antigone is as far from erōs as Creon.⁷ For Antigone, the dead are “those whom it is most important to please” (103). “You have a warm heart for the cold” (102), observes her sister, failing to comprehend this impersonal and single-minded passion.

M.] Linforth, "Antigone and Creon" [University of California Publications in Classical Philology 15 (1961): 183–260.] 250. Perrotta correctly observes that she loves Polynices not qua Polynices, but qua falling under a family duty. [. . .] With her abstract and cold remarks of mourning we might contrast, for example, the agonized mourning of Hecuba (in Euripides' Trojan Women [. . .]) over the corpse of her grandchild, where each part of the loved body conjures up a new memory of shared affection. There are many similar cases [Nussbaum's note].

Duty to the family dead is the supreme law and the supreme passion. And Antigone structures her entire life and her vision of the world in accordance with this simple, self-contained system of duties. Even within this system, should a conflict ever arise, she is ready with a fixed priority ordering that will clearly dictate her choice. The strange speech (954–64) in which she ranks duties to different family dead, placing duty to brother above duties to husband and children, is in this sense (if genuine) highly revealing: it makes us suspect that she is capable of a strangely ruthless simplification of duties, corresponding not so much to any known religious law as to the exigencies of her own practical imagination.⁸

Other values fall into place, confirming these suspicions. Her single-minded identification with duties to the dead (and only some of these) effects a strange reorganization of piety, as well as of honor and justice. She is truly, in her own words, hosia panourgēsasa, one who will do anything for the sake of the pious;⁹ and her piety takes in only a part of conventional religion.¹ She speaks of her allegiance to Zeus [. . .], but she refuses to recognize his role as guardian of the

6. Cf. Perrotta, op. cit. 112. We must ascribe “O dearest Haemon, how your father dishonors you,” to Ismene as in all the manuscripts. Pearson and other editors have assigned it to Antigone, out of their desire to have Antigone say something affectionate about Haemon. But philtate, “dearest,” is not unusually strong inside a close family relationship, and it is perfectly appropriate to the affectionate Ismene; it need not, in fact, even designate close affection. Creon’s reply that the speaker’s continued harping on marriage “irritates him is appropriate to his relationship with Ismene (who is, in any case, the one who has been “harping” on marriage), but is far too mild to express his deep hatred for and anger against Antigone. See the arguments of Linforth, op. cit. 209, Bernardete ad loc [Nussbaum’s note].

7. On Antigone’s refusal of eros, see [J.-P.] Vernant, “Tensions [et ambiguïtés dans la tragédie grecque],” in [J.-P.] Vernant and [P.] Vidal-Naquet, Mythe et tragédie en grèce ancienne (Paris, 1972), 34–5, Bernardete, “A reading” 8.6; compare Segal, Tragedy §VIII [Nussbaum’s note, here abbreviated].

8. This speech is notoriously controversial. It would surely have been branded spurious had it not been quoted as genuine by Aristotle in the Rhetoric; this dates it so early that, if spurious, it could only be an actor’s interpolation. And it is difficult to imagine an actor giving himself such an oddly legalistic and unemotional speech at a climactic moment in the dramatic action. It is, then, [. . .] almost certainly genuine; and it is very difficult to explain as a confused and incoherent outpouring of passionate love—though this approach has indeed been tried (e.g. by Winnington-Ingram, Sophocles 145ff., Knox, Heroic Temper 144ff.). The best explanation for this coldly determined priority-ordering of duties is that Antigone is not animated by personal love at all, but by a stern determination to have a fixed set of ordered requirements that will dictate her actions without engendering conflict; her refusal of the erotic [. . .] is then sufficient to explain her choice of the brother. 1. See Knox, Heroic Temper 94ff., Segal, Tragedy §VIII. Winnington-Ingram calls the way in which she denies the hatred of brothers for one another after death a “heroic fiat,” “a supreme effort to impose heroic will upon a recalcitrant world” (Sophocles 132) [Nussbaum’s note].

city and backer of Eteocles. The very expression of her devotion is suspect: “Zeus did not decree this, as far as I am concerned” ([. . .] 494). She sets herself up as the arbiter of what Zeus can and cannot have decreed, just as Creon took it upon himself to say whom the gods could and could not have covered: no other character bears out her view of Zeus as single-mindedly backing the rights of the dead. She speaks, too, of the goddess Dikē, Justice; but Dikē, for her is, simply, “the Justice who lives together with the gods below” (495). The Chorus recognizes another Dikē.² Later they will say to her, “Having advanced to the utmost limit of boldness, you struck hard against the altar of Dikē on high, o child” (901–3). Justice is up here in the city, as well as below the earth. It is not as simple as she says it is. Antigone, accordingly, is seen by them not as a conventionally pious person, but as one who improvised her piety, making her own decisions about what to honor. She is a “maker of her own law [. . .]”; her defiance is “self-invented passion” ([. . .]920). Finally they tell her unequivocally that her pious respect is incomplete: “[This] reverent action [. . .] is a part of piety [. . .]” (917). Antigone’s rigid adherence to a single narrow set of duties has caused her to misinterpret the nature of piety itself, a virtue within which a more comprehensive understanding would see the possibility of conflict.

Creon’s strategy of simplification led him to regard others as material for his aggressive exploitation. Antigone’s dutiful subservience to the dead leads to an equally strange, though different (and certainly less hideous) result. Her relation to others in the world above is characterized by an odd coldness. “You are alive,” she tells her sister, “but my life [. . .] is long since dead, to the end of serving the dead.” The safely dutiful human life requires, or is, life’s annihilation.³ Creon’s attitude towards others is like necrophilia: he aspires to possess the inert and unresisting. Antigone’s subservience to duty is, finally, the ambition to be a nekros, a corpse beloved of corpses. (Her apparent similarity to martyrs in our own tradition, who expect a fully active life after death, should not conceal from us the strangeness of this goal.) In the world below, there are no risks of failure or wrongdoing.

Neither Creon nor Antigone, then, is a loving or passionate being in anything like the usual sense. Not one of the gods, not one human being escapes the power of erōs, says the Chorus (842–47); but these two oddly inhuman beings do, it appears, escape. Creon sees loved persons as functions of the civic good, replaceable producers of citizens. For Antigone, they are either dead, fellow servants of the dead, or objects of complete indifference. No living being is loved for his or her personal qualities, loved with the sort of love that Haemon feels and Ismene praises. By altering their beliefs about the nature and value of persons, they have, it seems, altered or restructured the human passions themselves. They achieve harmony in this way; but at a cost. The Chorus speaks of erōs as a force as important and obligating as the ancient thesmoi or laws of right, a force against which it is both foolish and, apparently, blameworthy to rebel [. . .].

2. On Antigone’s conception of dikē and its novelty, see R. Hirzel, Themis, Dikē, and Verwandtes (Leipzig, 1907) 147ff.; also Santirocco, “Justice” 186, Segal, op. cit. 170 [Nussbaum’s note].

3. Segal, op. cit. provides an excellent discussion of this aspect of Antigone in several places—esp. 156ff., §VIII, §IV, 196 [Nussbaum’s note].

Antigone learns too—like Creon, by being forced to recognize a problem that lies at the heart of her single-minded concern. Creon saw that the city itself is pious and loving; that he could not be its champion without valuing what it values, in all its complexity. Antigone comes to see that the service of the dead requires the city, that her own religious aims cannot be fulfilled without civic institutions. By being her own law, she has not only ignored a part of piety, she has also jeopardized the fulfillment of the very pious duties to which she is so attached. Cut off from friends, from the possibility of having children, she cannot keep herself alive in order to do further service to the dead; nor can she guarantee the pious treatment of her own corpse. In her last speeches she laments not so much the fact of imminent death as, repeatedly, her isolation from the continuity of offspring, from friends and mourners. She emphasizes the fact that she will never marry; she will remain childless. Acheron will be her husband, the tomb her bridal chamber. Unless she can successfully appeal to the citizens whose needs as citizens she had refused to consider, she will die without anyone to mourn her death or to replace her as guardian of her family religion. She turns therefore increasingly, in this final scene, to the citizens and the gods of the city [. . .], until her last words closely echo an earlier speech made by Creon [. . .] and blend his concerns with hers:

O city of my fathers in this land of Thebes. O gods, progenitors of our race. I am led away, and wait no longer. Look, leaders of Thebes, the last of your royal line. Look what I suffer, at whose hands, for having respect for piety. (987–93)

We have, then, two narrowly limited practical worlds, two strategies of avoidance and simplification. In one, a single human value has become the final end; in the other, a single set of duties has eclipsed all others. But we can now acknowledge that we admire Antigone, nonetheless, in a way that we do not admire Creon. It seems important to look for the basis of this difference.

First, in the world of the play, it seems clear that Antigone's actual choice is preferable to Creon's. The dishonour to civic values involved in giving pious burial to an enemy's corpse is far less radical than the violation of religion involved in Creon's act. Antigone shows a deeper understanding of the community and its values than Creon does when she argues that the obligation to bury the dead is an unwritten law, which cannot be set aside by the decree of a particular ruler. The belief that not all values are utility-relative, that there are certain claims whose neglect will prove deeply destructive of communal attunement and individual character, is a part of Antigone's position left untouched by the play's implicit criticism of her single-mindedness.

Furthermore, Antigone's pursuit of virtue is her own. It involves nobody else and commits her to abusing no other person. Rulership must be rulership of something; Antigone's pious actions are executed alone, out of a solitary commitment. She may be strangely remote from the world; but she does no violence to it.

Finally, and perhaps most important, Antigone remains ready to risk and to sacrifice her ends in a way that is not possible for Creon, given the singleness of his conception of value. There is a complexity in Antigone's virtue that permits genuine sacrifice within the defense of piety. She dies recanting nothing; but still she is torn by a conflict. Her virtue is, then, prepared to admit a contingent conflict, at least in the extreme case where its adequate exercise requires the cancellation of the conditions of its exercise. From within her single-minded devotion to the dead, she recognizes the power of these contingent circumstances and yields to them, comparing herself to Niobe wasted away by nature's snow and rain (878–84).⁴ (Earlier she had been compared, in her grief, to a mother bird crying out over an empty nest; so she is, while heroically acting, linked with the openness and vulnerability of the female.) The Chorus here briefly tries to console her with the suggestion that her bad luck does not really matter, in view of her future fame; she calls their rationalization a mockery of her loss. This vulnerability in virtue, this ability to acknowledge the world of nature by mourning the constraints that it imposes on virtue, surely contributes to making her the more humanly rational and the richer of the two protagonists: both active and receptive, neither exploiter nor simply victim.

I. INTRODUCTION

Sophokles' Antigone is an easy play for moderns, even modern classicists, to get wrong.² We are likely to see Antigone as the champion of moral right, or conscience, or religion against the authority of the state, as represented by Kreon. She is then a martyr for a cause, and our age is rather drawn to causes and martyrs. This does much to explain the scholarly predilection for what Hester called "the orthodox view" of the play: Antigone right and noble, Kreon wrong and tyrannical.³ But these terms for describing the conflict—and even more the ethical weight and emotional coloring these terms carry—are relatively modern.

4. The importance of this link with the yielding world of nature is seen by Segal, Tragedy 154ff [Nussbaum's note, here abbreviated].

3. Hester's extensive review of scholarship on the play found this view to be far more popular than what he called the "Hegelian" view, which sees Antigone and Kreon as being more evenly matched with flaws on both sides: D. A. Hester, Sophocles the Unphilosophical: A Study in the Antigone, Mnemosyne 24 (1971), 11–59. For a similar tilt in Germany (Schlegel over Hegel), see Erick Eberlein, Über die verschiedenen Deutungen des tragischen Konflikts in der Tragödie 'Antigone' des Sophokles, Gymnasium 68 (1961), 16–34 at 16–9.

“The state” to us means a nation-state with extensive powers over the lives of its citizens and an extensive apparatus of bureaucrats and police to enforce its dictates. We worry about its powers and want to protect our freedom within it, especially after twentieth-century experience with totalitarian regimes. “Conscience” and “morality” to us mean the personal values of an autonomous individual, influenced by society but often at variance with it. “Religion” to us is likely to include notions of divinely revealed truth and an organized body of believers, both of them distinct from, and often at odds with, political authority. For us, then, conscience, morality, and religion set the individual apart from, perhaps even against, the state. It is easy for us to make Antigone into a heroic dissident. She upholds principle against political authority, and she is right.

We must understand fifth-century Athenian beliefs about the state, the role of the individual within it, and its relations to religion, funerals, and related matters—the “polis” part of my title—before we can make sense of the Antigone. These will be surveyed, with some large debts to previous work, in part II. Here the “orthodox” view is particularly weak, and its weaknesses still need attention. [. . .]

Still, understanding Greek beliefs and attitudes is only a first step towards interpretation. We need to consider not so much what Greeks thought and felt generally as how they are likely to have thought and felt under the conditions of a tragic performance, this tragedy in particular. Hence the “tragedy” part of my title: a discussion of how decent Greek opinion fares over the course of the Antigone (part III) and a coda on how it might fare in tragedy generally (part IV). Tragedy is the polis’ partner in an intricate dialogue. She has her own agenda and her own ways of making her points, some of them quite sly,⁴ and she is rather more on Antigone’s side than the polis is. The main burden of this essay is to understand better her side of the conversation, an area where history-minded critics, straining to catch the voice of the polis, often miss things.

II. POLIS

Broad construction of the public interest gave the Athenian polis considerable power to regulate what its citizens did. Among other things, the polis could regulate funerals. A funeral was basically a family function, but the display and ostentation which the family could employ were restricted by the state.⁵ The state could also restrict funeral rites for certain classes of people—suicides, for example.⁶

4. “Drama . . . unfolds as a complex dialogue that refuses to be bound in any direct fashion by the discourses of the agora” (Foley, 132); it provides a “radical critique” of “the city’s discourse” (Goldhill, 78; on how this applies to some particular issues in the Antigone, see 104–6, 174–80).

5. Erwin Rohde, Psyche: The Cult of Souls and Belief in Immortality among the Greeks, English trans. (London 1925), 164f.; Robert Garland, The Greek Way of Death (Ithaca, N.Y. 1985), 21–3.

6. Thalheim, Selbstmord, RE II A.1 (1921), 1134f.

This brings us to a fact which is troublesome for devotees of St. Antigone the Martyr but important for assessing how an Athenian audience would respond to the play: Athenian law forbade the burial of traitors and sacrilegious people in Athenian territory. There is abundant evidence of this law, and of similar laws in other states.⁷ Now, Polyneikes, who led an army against his homeland, was certainly a traitor, and if Kreon is right that he planned to burn the temples of the gods (Ant. 199–201, 284–7), he aspired to sacrilege as well. Hence in refusing him burial, Kreon was imposing a sanction that was recognizable to the audience as part of their law. He had good reasons for it. In a small city-state, defeat in war could mean civic destruction and the loss of everything one had; treason was a serious business, a threat to the survival of the community.

To sum up, in fifth-century terms Kreon is within his rights as the leader of his polis, and his ban on burying Polyneikes is a reasonable sanction. In fifth-century terms, Antigone's defiance of that ban is seriously, perhaps even shockingly, out of line: an individual defying due authority in the polis, in time of crisis, on behalf of a national enemy, and moreover a woman defying due male authority.

Critics often see Antigone as an isolated figure, willful and obstinate, proud and cold to others, acting from a mixed bag of reasons, both principled and personal.⁸ There are good reasons why they should. To a degree which may be hard for us to imagine, she stands alone, forced to rely heavily on her own heroic temper. A modern Antigone comes with some ready-made bases for defying the community, respected and well-articulated values to which she can appeal. The ancient Antigone is not so well equipped. Conscience and religious authority are largely out. "The wide range of ideals, eccentricities and obsessions which we nowadays amalgamate under the name of 'conscience' did not seem to Greeks to be good reasons for defying the law."⁹ Religion was focused more on prayer and ritual than on beliefs and ethical demands, more apt to produce traditionalists and conformists than dissidents and martyrs. Far from providing a basis for criticizing the polis, religion was an integral part of it. The polis, Foley, Antigone as Moral Agent, in: M. S. Silk (ed.), Tragedy and the Tragic: Greek Theatre and Beyond (Oxford 1996), 49–73; Matt Neuburg, How Like a Woman: Antigone's "Inconsistency," CQ 40 (1990): 54–76. But her consistent reasons are nevertheless complicated and strongly rooted in the specifics of her unusual situation, dying unmarried (Neuburg, 66–70) and acting on behalf of a brother (Foley, 51–7). Complex situations produce complex motives. It is possible to see her as both consistent and self-willed: Martin Cropp, Antigone's Final Speech (Sophocles, Antigone 891–928), G&R 44 (1997), 137–60.

after all, administered, financed, and regulated much of the religious activity within it.¹ It had large scope in making decisions about religious matters.

There remains the family, whose entanglements with the polis, interdependent yet often conflicting, were important in Greek history and have been important in Antigone criticism at least since Hegel. There is no anachronism in raising family concerns. Antigone does, after all, break Kreon's edict on behalf of her brother, precisely because he is her brother, and she appeals repeatedly to that blood-tie to justify her action.² Still, family and polis do not meet in the play as an evenly balanced pair of opposites, a thesis and antithesis in search of a synthesis.³ The Antigone presents a situation which the fifth-century polis had already decided in its own favor. As we have seen, the polis could override the family to regulate funerals, or even ban them for certain classes of people—including traitors like Polyneikes. [. . .]

Sophokles, then, gives Kreon a strong position, far stronger than we moderns are generally prepared or able to recognize. What becomes of that position on the stage, however, is another matter.

III. THE ANTIGONE

It should not escape the reader's notice that the discussion so far is aimed at estimating how fifth-century Athenians would react to Antigone's action if it were a real event in civic life—if they were debating it in the assembly or judging it as jurors in a court of law or discussing it as a piece of recent news. [. . .] But of course, Polyneikes' burial is not an event in real life. It is part of a tragic drama, which is to say, it is presented to the audience by the playwright in a certain way and observed by the audience under certain conditions. This complicates the task of interpretation. We may know, more or less, what decent Athenian opinion held; but what does the play do with it?

I shall argue that the structure of Sophokles' drama—his arrangement and presentation of events, the playwright's devices for getting his story across—does much to encourage sympathy for Antigone, undercutting the shock and condemnation that her action would likely arouse in real life. Moreover, this sympathy for a lawbreaker is of a piece with what tragedy does elsewhere: it tests limits, defies norms, gives a certain kind of outlet for antisocial feelings. The audience

Kreon's valuation of kinship ties is considerably lower (486–9, 658 f.) Antigone's notorious declaration that she would not have broken Kreon's edict to bury anyone but her brother (904–20), however odd critics find it, is consistent with her motives as repeatedly stated elsewhere. Antigone's loyalty to Polyneikes may not be simply a matter of blood-ties: Patricia J. Johnson, Woman's Third Face: A Psycho/Social Reconsideration of Sophocles' Antigone, Arethusa 30 (1997), 369–98 raises the issue, with a highly speculative answer.

3. One can question more broadly whether Antigone's action really respects proper family loyalties and proper responsibilities in burying dead kin: Sourvinou-Inwood, Bad Woman, 17–21 and 29–31. I find some of the arguments too intricate to be helpful in estimating a theatre audience's responses to the play, but the question deserves fuller consideration. I confine my remarks here to narrow grounds involving funerals.

did not come to a tragedy to vent its orthodoxies upon the characters; it came, I suggest, partly for the more interesting and exciting experience of watching the characters defy the orthodoxies.

We may begin with the premise of Sophokles' drama—Kreon's edict forbidding the burial of Polyneikes. As we have seen, the edict was in keeping with Athenian law; but that does not settle the question of how an Athenian audience would have regarded it. Denying burial to traitors and temple-robbers was, after all, a circumscribed exception to a widely accepted norm, the right to a decent funeral. It was an extreme reprisal, and it may well have occasioned doubts, reservations, and ambivalence in the community that resorted to it.

To a large extent, the action of the Antigone is taken up with unfolding th[e "heavy unanticipated"] costs [of Kreon's edict]. Kreon's position is repeatedly challenged, he repeatedly resists, but each challenge reveals new weaknesses, and eventually he crumbles. Orthodox critics tend to regard this result as a foregone conclusion: Kreon's position is of course wrong, so he is bound to end badly. This is too harsh: it underestimates the basic reasonableness (in Greek terms) of Kreon's position, and it tends to read the play backwards, interpreting the early scenes out of our advance knowledge of how things will turn out and magnifying small hints in those early scenes accordingly.⁴ Historically minded critics, on the other hand, sometimes appear to regard the outcome as a surprise, as though we had to wait for Teiresias to tell us how wrong Kreon is.⁵ This is too sanguine: it scants some important signs in the text of the stages by which Kreon's edict is undone. We would do better to see the play as a progression of complications, with Kreon's position undermined bit by bit. The outcome is not clear from the start, but we can see it coming as the play goes on. Tragic complications encroach more and more upon the dictates of the polis. Sophokles first deals Kreon a strong hand and then has us watch him lose with it.

The play opens towards dawn, with two women in conversation. Kreon, we are told, has already issued his edict but is on his way "to proclaim it clearly to those who do not know it" (Ant. 31–4).⁶ This cusp of time gives Antigone a chance to respond to the edict in advance, after it is formulated but before any other character or the audience hears it. Sophokles uses this bit of timing to let her launch a pre-emptive strike upon it to win the audience's sympathy.

Her strike is an impressive one. The terms of the edict are revealed only after a dramatic buildup. The house of Oidipous has suffered everything imaginable, she says, "for there is nothing painful or destructive or shameful or dishonorable which I have not seen among your sufferings and mine" (Ant. 4–6). And now [. . .] on top of it all, this terrible proclamation [. . .]. We have not yet heard what the proclamation says, but by the time Ismene asks [. . .], twenty lines into this scene, we are primed to hear something terrible.

Terrible indeed [. . .]. Eteokles' burial is described simply and approvingly (23–5), but the other brother and his treatment are described more fully, in more emotional terms [. . .] (26–30). Polyneikes is “wretchedly dead,” and the consequences of exposing his corpse are graphically depicted: no lamentation, no funeral, only the birds to devour him. [. . .] First impressions are powerful, and our first impression of Kreon's edict comes to us filtered through Antigone's grief and indignation.⁷

We need not wait long for a second impression, even before Kreon's entrance. Ismene elicits gradually, through a series of questions, the details of Antigone's plan to bury Polyneikes (Ant. 39–48), and she finds it bold and dangerous. The series of questions brings out Antigone's plan in stages, each more shocking than the last, and we are invited to share Ismene's surprise and alarm [. . .]. Like Antigone, she can rehearse the sad history of the family (49–57), but it affects her differently. It does not sting her to outrage, it urges her to caution: “Consider how we two, left alone, will perish wretchedly if despite the law we transgress the ruler's decision and power” (58–60). Ismene also reminds us that Antigone's plan is illegal. [. . .]

Ismene, notoriously, is no tragic heroine. We could, like many critics, cheer Antigone's heroism and castigate Ismene's cowardice, but the scene is not quite so one-sided. At the very least, Ismene reminds us that more than one reaction to Kreon's edict is possible. [. . .]

Still, Antigone has had the chance to strike the first blow, and she has done it well, passionately, and dramatically. The audience may well sympathize with her, not necessarily because they would agree with her, but because shock and distress seen up close arouse sympathy. Ismene's objections, although often underrated, do not erase this. Kreon comes to the plate with one strike against him.

After the parados, we move from the private world of Antigone to the public world of Kreon. Despite Antigone's pre-emptive strike, Kreon's opening address to the Chorus gives him every chance to look good in the audience's eyes. The Chorus has just given thanks to the gods for delivering Thebes from great danger, and their song has reminded us vividly of the impiety and violence of Polyneikes' army, the sufferings that awaited the Thebans had they lost the battle.⁸ As a new ruler in a difficult time, Kreon has a claim on our sympathy, and for the most part he comes off well. His speech is reasoned, his tone moderate under the circumstances. His heart is clearly in the right place: he seeks good advice in guiding the city (Ant. 178–81), he puts the city first, before private connections (182–91), and he is determined to distinguish between the patriotic Eteokles and the treacherous Polyneikes. [. . .]

Still, the question is raised whether Thebes is in good hands, and the answer is not altogether satisfactory.⁹ “It is impossible to know any man's soul and thought and mind,” Kreon says, “before he is experienced in office and law” (Ant. 175–7). This puts us on notice that Kreon is untested at this point in the play, hence unknown. More telling, his edict forbidding funeral rites for Polyneikes, presented after a slow, careful buildup, gets a remarkably lukewarm reception from the Chorus. [. . .] Indeed, all through the play the merits of Kreon’s edict (as distinguished from his authority to impose it) go unsupported by anybody but him. Saying that he has the power or the right to command something is not the same as saying that it is a good idea.

Kreon’s position is almost immediately challenged. The Guard enters with news that Polyneikes’ corpse has been sprinkled with dust. Kreon, untried in “office and law” (Ant. 177), is on trial here, for we will see how he stands up to the first test of his new regime. Our attention begins to shift, and will shift more markedly in the following scene, from the proclamation to the ruler who issues it. The ruler does not come off well, for he meets the challenge with anger, error, and obstinacy.

In the Guard’s narrative as in the prologue, Antigone’s grief and outrage are given play, stressing the terrible consequences of Kreon’s edict. She wails like a bird robbed of its young, laments the corpse “when she saw it bare,” and curses those who left it that way (422–8). Kreon does not change his plans when he finds out that the perpetrator of the crime is his own niece and his son’s fiancée; he is still determined to put her to death. These developments show Kreon persisting in his intention as the emotional costs mount. Kreon’s edict may be based on sound principles, but it takes a tough heart and a strong stomach to maintain his position in the extreme situation which the play presents. Unfortunately, Kreon possesses both these qualities.

By this point in the play, principles have gotten mixed up with personalities. We have come away from the noble abstractions of Kreon’s “inaugural address” and gotten a chance to see something of Kreon himself. He is less impressive than his ideals, and he is not doing terribly well on the test he set for himself—how well he performs “in office and law” (Ant. 175–7). Still, a Greek audience might well hold back from shifting all its sympathy to Antigone. Her ringing declaration of the unwritten laws, eternal and not to be altered by human decree, makes a fine sound to modern ears, but fifth-century Greeks were not so well primed to hear it. More important, the unwritten laws occupy only half her speech to Kreon (450–60). The other half (460–70) is more specific and personal [. . .]. The Chorus’ response to all this is that she is her father’s daughter, all right, “raw” and stubborn (471 f.). This is not an endorsement of the unwritten laws, and it is not altogether complimentary to Antigone either. Like Kreon’s rule, Antigone’s defiance is a complex combination of principle and personality, and she is driven by will, pride, and family honor at least as much as by devotion to the unwritten laws.¹ The conflict is between two characters,

1. This deserves fuller discussion, for which I must refer the reader to Bongie [. . .] and Knox, inter alia. Bongie, 252 goes so far as to call the speech on the unwritten laws “a rationalization of the more compelling personal motives.”

Kreon and Antigone, not between the principles of state and family, or human and divine law, to which they appeal.² It is more personal and thereby more dramatic, and neither comes off unscathed.

Kreon's scene with Haimon shows his weaknesses as a ruler to a higher degree.

Nestled in all Haimon's deference is one piece of information: the people of Thebes pity Antigone and support her (Ant. 692–700). [. . .] Popular opinion is beginning to tilt against Kreon.

Kreon, predictably, [. . .] reacts with rage and disbelief. His world is being turned upside down: a younger man is venturing to instruct an elder (Ant. 726f.), Antigone is rebellious (730–2), the city is not submitting to its ruler (734–9). Perhaps worst of all, women are getting the better of men (740, 746, 756; the point has also appeared at 484f., 525, 677–80). The world thus disturbed is actually that of the polis to a large degree; most Greeks in the audience would probably have been quite content with the idea that the young ought to submit to the old, people to authority, women to men.³ But accepting a principle does not mean that we will automatically agree with everyone who invokes it. Kreon's nervous insistence on these principles begins to look like a sign of weakness, inflexibility, or even tyranny. He does not so much espouse civic norms as hide behind them.

The denouement of the play can be discussed more briefly, at least for the issues that concern us here. Antigone's kommos and final speech draw critical attention mostly for what they tell us about her, about her motives for defying Kreon and her feelings as she faces death. These are important questions, but for this enquiry it is worth stressing a simpler and more obvious point, what Kreon is doing to her. [. . .] Amid the many problems of this scene—whether the Chorus is sympathetic or aloof, what Antigone means in comparing herself to Niobe, why she values her brother over other kin—we are invited to grieve over her. This echoes in a different key something which we encountered in the prologue, when we saw at close range Antigone's grief and outrage over Kreon's edict. In both scenes, whatever we might think of the practice of throwing out traitors unburied, or of Antigone herself, we are invited to pity her.⁴ Pity can be potent. The Thebans, Haimon tells us, grieved for Antigone [. . .] and so came to support her. The Chorus grieves in spite of Kreon's rulings⁵ and does not break with him openly. We may turn our pity into a political position, like the Thebans, or decide not to, like the Chorus. Either way, we are invited again to contemplate the costs of Kreon's edict, and of his way of running the polis.

4. Sourvinou-Inwood, Bad Woman, 17 notes the shift from portraying Antigone as a threatening rebellious woman earlier in the play to showing her as a pitiable bride of Hades here.

5. The Chorus says that they are “carried outside the thesmoi” ([. . .] 801f.) upon seeing Antigone and are unable to restrain their tears. I take it that the thesmoi here are Kreon's (Jebb, Kamerbeek), whether his sentence against Antigone or his royal authority generally.

The costs become far more apparent in the Teiresias scene, when the seer first reports dire omens and disruptions in the kosmos and then announces that it is all because of Kreon. Kreon tries to make amends, but too late: three people die, and Kreon is left ruined.

The verdict of the gods is in at last, but as often, the verdict is plainer than the story leading up to it. We miss much of the story, and much of the achievement of the Antigone, if we make Kreon merely impious in issuing his proclamation and Antigone merely noble in defying him. As we have seen, Kreon starts in a stronger position, and one more in keeping with fifth-century values, than we often recognize. Consequently, the play takes on a larger task than we often recognize in making his ruin credible and satisfying. In succeeding, it is a better play than we often recognize—not only a great one, but a deft one as well. [. . .]

[. . .] the modern picture of Antigone as a heroic dissenter is not altogether wrong. Only we must recognize that the play does not generate sympathy for Antigone by appealing to any widely held notions about martyrs for causes or conscience against tyranny. Rather, it works by the way it arranges events and shades their presentation—perhaps even by manipulation. Antigone's distress and passion are given full play, her opponent is made to appear weak and foolish, and she and her allies get most of the good lines.⁶ The play encourages the audience to root for a rebel against the values which they would likely espouse and practice in real life.

IV. TRAGEDY

If this reading of the play is reasonably close to the truth, then the Antigone does something which tragedy does generally. Defiance of the norms is part of its stock in trade. Tragedy is a “genre of transgression” and features an “interplay between norm and transgression”—an important part of the current lively discussion of drama in relation to the polis.⁷ The Antigone presents quite a lot of transgression. Antigone's defiance of Kreon involves a degree of self-assertion and boldness which would be hard to find, perhaps even hard to conceive of, in a real-life Greek city, but her play lets the antisocial voice speak on stage and gives the audience reason to root for it in spite of itself.

6. A few “zingers”: The doer grieves your mind, I grieve your ears (Ant. 319); I would have died even if you hadn't sentenced me (460f.); if my actions seem foolish, I'm accused of folly by a fool (469f.); there is no city which belongs to one man (737); you'd rule well over a desert alone (739); I speak for her—and you and me and the gods below (749). Kreon's only approach to pithiness (as distinguished from his usual maxim-spouting) is his declaration that one of his nieces has just lost her mind and the other never had any (561 f.).

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. The first two scenes or episodes of ANTIGONE introduce us to each of the play's two main characters—first Antigone herself, then Creon. Write an essay in which you explore what each scene shows us about who these characters are, what motives and values drive them, and why they come into conflict. What does Sophocles achieve by showing us Antigone in conversation with her sister, or Creon with a “convocation of the elders” (line 177)? In terms of characterization and conflict, what is the significance of the choral songs that end each episode?
2. As is conventional in Greek drama, ANTIGONE ends with a final choral song that articulates the theme of the play, while also leaving a great deal of room for interpretation about just what that theme is. Drawing on evidence from the entire play, explain how we should interpret the final song and the play's theme.
3. Write an essay that draws on evidence from this ancient Greek play to explore precisely how and why it remains relevant to the world in which you live. Does ANTIGONE, for example, depict a type of person or a conflict still common in the twenty-first century, or might it articulate a theme that still applies?
4. Many of the critical excerpts in this chapter focus on the conflict between Antigone and Creon, debating not only how that conflict is ultimately resolved but also what the nature of the conflict is. To take just two examples, Richard C. Jebb takes the conflict to be one between “the duty of obeying the State's laws” and “the duty of listening to the private conscience,” while Maurice Bowra implies that the conflict is instead between duty to the laws of man versus those of the gods and/or between the human tendency toward “arrogance” versus the need for humility and reverence. Carefully read the other critical excerpts in the chapter, working to understand how each characterizes the conflict between Creon and Antigone. Then, write an essay in which you first describe the views of all the critics and then draw on evidence from the play either to defend one of these views or to offer an alternative interpretation of the conflict between Antigone and Creon.
5. Though he acknowledges that ANTIGONE depicts an external conflict between Antigone and Creon and the views and values each represents, Bernard Knox suggests that the play also presents Creon as internally conflicted. Carefully read the excerpt from Knox's introduction, and write an essay exploring whether the play supports his interpretation of Creon's internal conflict and its resolution.
6. Re-read the critical excerpts in this chapter and then make a list of at least three moments in ANTIGONE or aspects or elements of the play that strike you as important, but that aren't given adequate attention in the critical excerpts. Then write an essay that explains why any one of these moments, aspects, or elements is especially important to the play's effect and meaning.

SAMPLE WRITING: RESEARCH ESSAY

The student essay below was written in response to an assignment that asked students to draw on at least five works of literary criticism, including any relevant excerpts in this chapter and at least one journal article not included here, in order to develop their own interpretations of any aspect of ANTIGONE. Student writer Jackie Izawa decided to explore rival interpretations of Antigone's treatment of her siblings and her fiancé. The resulting essay demonstrates unusual strengths and a few common problems, particularly in the way it uses, presents, and quotes from both primary and secondary sources. The instructor's comments that accompany the essay highlight some of those strengths and weaknesses.

Perhaps the weakest moment in the essay is a conclusion that does not fulfill the promise made in the introduction that the essay will ultimately "draw a conclusion" about Antigone's motives. The simplest way to fix that inconsistency would be to change the thesis statement so that it matches up with the conclusion and to devote the conclusion to discussing why it's so "essential that we consider different perspectives" and interpretations rather than simply endorsing one. What might the play itself say about that issue, particularly through Haemon's remarks to his father?

The Two Faces of Antigone

Antigone's strong yet harsh nature motivates her to defy Creon's edict, but it also isolates her from those who love her. Throughout the play, Antigone tries to convince Creon that her fallen brother, Polyneices, deserves a proper burial. Her unwavering loyalty to her brother shows she might be capable of love. But if so, why does she only seem to love the person who's dead before the play even begins? She barely shows any affection for her only living sibling, Ismene, and none for her Introduce quotations from sources with a signal phrase that provides the information about the source necessary to understand the quotation and its relationship to your statement.

Is Simpson endorsing one of the two possible interpretations you've just offered of Antigone, or does the statement suggest a third possibility? Also, make sure that the quotation makes sense on its own. The sentence fragment you quote here is confusing.

You provide good evidence from your primary source to support your claims about Ismene's natural reluctance to defy the law, but none to back up your other claim—that her reluctance is also due to her sense of her particular position and duties "as an obedient woman."

betrothed, Haemon. It is possible that Antigone is so overwhelmed by a desire for justice for her brother that she becomes blinded to every other person. The other possibility is that she is creating the illusion that she does not love Ismene and Haemon because she wants to spare them. "Namely, that although now Antigone does not mean to be stern and hard, as she is simply being herself, yet all the same she is stern and hard" (Simpson and Millar 79). Before drawing a conclusion about Antigone's motives, it is important to recognize and acknowledge both positions.

Ismene is Antigone's opposite in every way, in W. H. D. Rouse's words, "a nice girl, soft-hearted and devoted, but a shadow of her strong sister" (41). In the opening scene of Antigone, the two sisters have just heard of Creon's edict, and both have different opinions about how to handle it.

While Antigone is set on burying her brother, Ismene tries to reason with her. She recalls all the horrible events that happened in their family history. First Oedipus "himself struck out / the sight of his two eyes," and then his wife and mother "did shame / violently on her life, with twisted cords" (lines 58-59, 61-62). Ismene continues talking about the family's tragedies, ending with the deaths of her brothers. Both sisters know that the sentence for burying Polyneices is death. Ismene does not want herself or Antigone to follow in the steps of her deceased family members or to "put dishonor on them" by defying Creon (line 90). Ismene is timid and fearful of breaking the law. By nature, Ismene is submissive.

She views herself as an obedient woman, a compliant citizen. Naturally, when Antigone asks for Ismene's help in burying their brother, Ismene declines. Ismene would like to bury her brother, but she cannot break the law. She tells Antigone, "to act in defiance of the citizenry, / my nature does not give me means for that" (lines 91-92).

In the play's very first line, Antigone calls Ismene "my dear sister." But this is the first and only time that Antigone shows affection for Ismene. Because Ismene is afraid to go against Creon's edict, Antigone regards Ismene as a coward and disowns her. Immediately, Antigone verbally attacks her sister, showing that she is unable to view things as others do: "At least he is my brother—and yours, too, / though you deny him. I will not prove false to him" (lines 51-52). The emphasis on the "I" shows that Antigone feels a degree of rivalry. It is likely she feels that because she is determined to bury Polyneices, she is better than Ismene. This kind of rivalry is common between siblings even today. The idea of proving your superiority is always attractive, especially if you can demonstrate it publicly, to an entire city. Antigone is rather cruel and ruthless to her sister, whether out of pure anger, rivalry, or pain at her betrayal of the family. Towards the end of their first encounter, Ismene promises that she will keep silent, but Antigone retorts, "Oh, oh, no! shout it out. I will hate you still worse / for silence—should you not proclaim it, / to everyone" (lines 99-101). Despite all that both of them have endured because of their shared family history, Antigone is willing to throw it away when Ismene does not help her:

If you will talk like this I will loathe you,
and you will be adjudged an enemy—
justly—by the dead's decision. Let me alone and my folly with me, to endure this terror.

No suffering of mine will be enough to make me die ignobly. (lines 109-14)

The two sisters are seen together only briefly later in the play, but the dynamic between them is much the same. After Antigone attempts to bury Polyneices and both sisters are brought to Creon, Antigone lashes out at Ismene, effectively severing any ties she has with her sister. As Charles Levy argues, "in [a . . .] tense stichomythic exchange with Ismene" shortly after her argument with Creon, "she reacts with still greater vehemence than during their earlier encounter to what she regards as her sister's irremediable betrayal of her, scorning Ismene . . ." (142). Ismene wants to share the sentence of death with her sister, Interesting observation! Does this introduce a third possible interpretation of Antigone (in addition to the two you introduce early on)?

What exactly do you mean to demonstrate with this quotation? Does this provide evidence for your point about Antigone's desire to publicly demonstrate her superiority? or the point about her cruelty? or something else?

This quotation from your secondary source consists mainly of plot summary. It would be more effective to describe the action yourself, while acknowledging that Levy, too, notes its importance.

pleading, "Sister, do not dishonor me, denying me / a common death with you, a common honoring / of the dead man." But Antigone refuses to listen, saying, "Don't die with me, nor make your own / what you have never touched" (lines 597-601). Antigone is consistently cold towards her sister.

Showing the same consistency (in the opposite way), Ismene seems to disregard the ill treatment she receives from her sister, continuing to show love for Antigone though Ismene knows that she is no longer welcome in Antigone's eyes. Being the compassionate and devoted sister that she is, Ismene still does her best to save Antigone. Even after being rejected, Ismene tries to reason with Creon. She pleads again that her life would be incomplete without Antigone. When Creon refuses to change his mind, Ismene brings up Haemon, hoping that Creon is not cruel enough to execute his future daughter-in-law. Unfortunately, even that does not budge Creon. Ismene is loving and caring, showing as much loyalty to her sister as Antigone does for their brother, but Ismene's gesture is never acknowledged.

Or might Antigone in fact be making a gesture of love even greater than her sister's? As A. W. Simpson and C. M. H. Millar argue, Antigone's treatment of Ismene could in fact be viewed as liberating Ismene or saving her from death (79). They believe that Antigone is brutal with Ismene because she is "unwillingly" putting up a façade for Creon (80). One of the main driving factors in their argument is the irony in Antigone's decision:

"The irony of the situation is brought out, because, from love for Ismene, Antigone alienates herself from her, in order to save her, and goes to her death thinking she has failed; and she never finds out that she succeeded after all" (80).

Likewise, there are also two different ways of interpreting Antigone's interaction with her betrothed. Haemon, from the first moment he is introduced, immediately sides with Antigone and is completely devoted to her. He defends his wife-to-be and defies his father, Creon, ironically with as much passion as Antigone shows. When he first appears in the play, he is naturally dedicated to his father. He shows that he respects his father, but at the same time he also reasons with Creon both about the rule of the city and about the punishment of Antigone:

Haemon: You will not find me yield to what is shameful.

Creon: At least, your argument is all for her.

Haemon: Yes, and for you and me—and for the gods below.

Creon: You will never marry her while her life lasts.

Haemon: Then she must die—and dying destroy another. (lines 804-08)

Haemon is showing his devotion to Antigone as well as foreshadowing his own fate in the play. Even though Creon tells him he can find another wife, Haemon refuses. His love for Antigone dooms him to his death. All of his actions following his argument with his father are undertaken for Antigone. When Haemon finds Antigone dead in the cave, he is consumed with rage and anger. As Walter H. Johns puts it, because “Haemon hears his father’s voice and realizes that the cause of all his grief is close at hand,” he “turn[s] his sword against himself and d[ies] with his arms about the body of Antigone” (100). Haemon’s rage is likely equivalent to his love for Antigone, and for him to kill himself because of his grief over her death only supports this likelihood.

The reader empathizes with and even pities Haemon because although he speaks of great affection for Antigone, she does not do the same for him.

In fact, as Martha Nussbaum points out, “Antigone never [even] addresses a word throughout the entire play” to this “man who passionately loves and desires her” (1596). And Antigone says his name only once in the play when she responds to Creon, “Dear Haemon, how your father dishonors you” (line 627). Though “dear” is usually a term of endearment, the context in which it is used and Antigone’s silence about Haemon

Again, this section seems a bit light on evidence (versus secondary source material), while the latter consists of plot summary.

Great point! Is it one any other critic makes as well?

in the rest of the play suggest that she says it in a pitying manner. Perhaps she felt sympathy for Haemon because he had a father who was willing to kill the love of his life, but that's not the same as loving him as he does her. The relationship is completely one-sided, and Antigone's lack of affection for her betrothed seems to give a new kind of meaning to Ismene's remark much earlier in the play that her sister is "in love / with the impossible" (lines 104-05). Antigone does seem to be more in love with the idea of burying her brother than she is with Haemon.

Again, though, is hard-heartedness or single-heartedness the only explanation for Antigone's behavior? Some critics argue that it isn't, that Antigone's lack of attention to Haemon is inspired by her desire to ensure that he does not share her fate. She could very well love him, but because she is sentenced to death, she breaks off ties with him. Simpson and Millar, for example, conclude that "Antigone has broken the ties between herself and her sister, in order to save her, and is now completely alone in the world. Haemon cannot reach her, as far as she knows, because Creon has just forbidden the marriage" (80). Perhaps Antigone realized that she and Haemon would never have a happy marriage, so she let him go. Unfortunately, Haemon does not realize her intentions.

The true motive behind Antigone's actions will always be debated. There are always at least two sides to everything, and it is essential that we consider different perspectives. Antigone can be viewed as hard-hearted and cruel, able to cut herself off from those who love and cherish her. However, she can also be seen as the type of heroine who does everything for the greater good of those she is closest to. In this view, she is compassionate, loyal, and unafraid to make sacrifices. Either way, Antigone remains a heroine who has made a huge impact not only on other characters in the play, but on those who read it as well.

The Cherry Orchard¹

The son of a grocer and the grandson of an emancipated serf, Anton Pavlovich Chekhov was born in the Russian town of Taganrog. In 1875, his father, facing bankruptcy and imprisonment, fled to Moscow; shortly thereafter, the rest of the family lost their house to a former friend and lodger, a misfortune that Chekhov would revisit in The Cherry Orchard. In 1884, Chekhov received his MD from the University of Moscow; in the early 1890s, he purchased an estate near Moscow and became both an industrious landowner and a doctor to the local peasants. Throughout the 1880s, he supported his family and financed his medical studies by writing the sketches and stories that would eventually win him enduring international acclaim. Chekhov began writing for the stage in 1887. Early productions of his plays were poorly received: The Wood Demon (later rewritten as Uncle Vanya) was performed only a few times in 1889 before closing; the 1896 premiere of The Seagull turned into a riot when an audience expecting comedy found themselves watching an experimental tragedy. Konstantin Stanislavsky, director at the Moscow Art Theater, helped restore Chekhov's reputation with successful productions of The Seagull and Uncle Vanya in 1899, The Three Sisters in 1901, and The Cherry Orchard in 1904.

ACT I

A room, which has always been called the nursery. One of the doors leads into ANYA'S room. Dawn, sun rises during the scene. May, the cherry trees in flower, but it is cold in the garden with the frost of early morning. Windows closed.

Enter DUNYASHA with a candle and LOPAHIN with a book in his hand.

LOPAHIN: The train's in, thank God. What time is it?

DUNYASHA: Nearly two o'clock. [Puts out the candle.] It's daylight already.

LOPAHIN: The train's late! Two hours, at least. [Yawns and stretches.] I'm a pretty one; what a fool I've been. Came here on purpose to meet them at the station and dropped asleep. . . . Dozed off as I sat in the chair. It's annoying. . . . You might have waked me.

DUNYASHA: I thought you had gone. [Listens.] There, I do believe they're coming!

LOPAHIN: [Listens.] No, what with the luggage and one thing and another. [A pause.] Lyubov Andreyevna has been abroad five years; I don't know what she is like now. . . . She's a splendid woman. A good-natured, kind-hearted woman. I remember when I was a lad of fifteen, my poor father—he used to keep a little shop here in the village in those days—gave me a punch in the face with his fist and made my nose bleed. We were in the yard here, I forget what we'd come about—he had had a drop. Lyubov Andreyevna—I can see her now—she was a slim young girl then—took me to wash my face, and then brought me into this very room, into the nursery. "Don't cry, little peasant," says she, "it will be well in time for your wedding day." . . . [A pause.] Little peasant. . . . My father was a peasant, it's true, but here am I in a white waistcoat and brown shoes, like a pig in a bun shop. Yes, I'm a rich man, but for all my money, come to think, a peasant I was, and a peasant I am. [Turns over the pages of the book.] I've been reading this book and I can't make head or tail of it. I fell asleep over it. [A pause.]

DUNYASHA: The dogs have been awake all night, they feel that the mistress is coming.

LOPAHIN: Why, what's the matter with you, Dunyasha?

DUNYASHA: My hands are all of a tremble. I feel as though I should faint.

LOPAHIN: You're a spoilt soft creature, Dunyasha. And dressed like a lady too, and your hair done up. That's not the thing. One must know one's place.

[Enter EPIHODOV with a nosegay;² he wears a pea-jacket and highly polished creaking topboots; he drops the nosegay as he comes in.]

EPIHODOV: [Picking up the nosegay.] Here! the gardener's sent this, says you're to put it in the dining-room. [Gives DUNYASHA the nosegay.]

LOPAHIN: And bring me some kvass.³

DUNYASHA: I will. [Goes out.]

EPIHODOV: It's chilly this morning, three degrees of frost,⁴ though the cherries are all in flower. I can't say much for our climate. [Sighs.] I can't. Our climate is not often propitious to the occasion. Yermolay Alexeyevitch, permit me to call your attention to the fact that I purchased myself a pair of boots the day before yesterday, and they creak, I venture to assure you, so that there's no tolerating them. What ought I to grease them with?

2. Bouquet. 3. Weak homemade beer. 4. That is, 29°F (−2°C).

LOPAHIN: Oh, shut up! Don't bother me.

EPIHODOV: Every day some misfortune befalls me. I don't complain, I'm used to it, and I wear a smiling face.

[DUNYASHA comes in, hands LOPAHIN the kvass.]

EPIHODOV: I am going. [Stumbles against a chair, which falls over.] There! [As though triumphant.] There you see now, excuse the expression, an accident like that among others. . . . It's positively remarkable. [Goes out.] DUNYASHA: Do you know, Yermolay Alexeyevitch, I must confess, Epikhodov has made me a proposal.

LOPAHIN: Ah!

DUNYASHA: I'm sure I don't know. . . . He's a harmless fellow, but sometimes when he begins talking, there's no making anything of it. It's all very fine and expressive, only there's no understanding it. I've a sort of liking for him too. He loves me to distraction. He's an unfortunate man; every day there's something. They tease him about it—two and twenty misfortunes they call him.

LOPAHIN: [Listening.] There! I do believe they're coming.

DUNYASHA: They are coming! What's the matter with me? . . . I'm cold all over.

LOPAHIN: They really are coming. Let's go and meet them. Will she know me? It's five years since I saw her.

DUNYASHA: [In a flutter.] I shall drop this very minute. . . . Ah, I shall drop.

[There is a sound of two carriages driving up to the house. LOPAHIN and DUNYASHA go out quickly. The stage is left empty. A noise is heard in the adjoining rooms. FIRS, who has driven to meet MADAME RANEVSKY, crosses the stage hurriedly leaning on a stick. He is wearing old-fashioned livery and a high hat. He says something to himself, but not a word can be distinguished. The noise behind the scenes goes on increasing. A voice: "Come, let's go in here." Enter LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA, ANYA, and CHARLOTTA IVANOVNA with a pet dog on a chain, all in traveling dresses. VARYA in an outdoor coat with a kerchief over her head, GAEV, SEMYONOV-PISHTCHIK, LOPAHIN, DUNYASHA with bag and parasol, servants with other articles. All walk across the room.]

ANYA: Let's come in here. Do you remember what room this is, mamma?

LYUBOV: [Joyfully, through her tears.] The nursery!

VARYA: How cold it is, my hands are numb. [To LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA.] Your rooms, the white room and the lavender one, are just the same as ever, mamma.

LYUBOV: My nursery, dear delightful room. . . . I used to sleep here when I was little. . . . [Cries.] And here I am, like a little child. . . . [Kisses her brother and VARYA, and then her brother again.] Varya's just the same as ever, like a nun. And I knew Dunyasha. [Kisses DUNYASHA.]

GAEV: The train was two hours late. What do you think of that? Is that the way to do things?

CHARLOTTA: [To PISHTCHIK.] My dog eats nuts, too.

PISHTCHIK: [Wonderingly.] Fancy that!

[They all go out except ANYA and DUNYASHA.]

DUNYASHA: We've been expecting you so long. [Takes ANYA's hat and coat.]

ANYA: I haven't slept for four nights on the journey. I feel dreadfully cold.

DUNYASHA: You set out in Lent, there was snow and frost, and now? My darling! [Laughs and kisses her.] I have missed you, my precious, my joy. I must tell you . . . I can't put it off a minute. . . .

ANYA: [Wearily.] What now?

DUNYASHA: Epiphodov, the clerk, made me a proposal just after Easter.

ANYA: It's always the same thing with you. . . . [Straightening her hair.] I've lost all my hairpins. . . . [She is staggering from exhaustion.]

DUNYASHA: I don't know what to think, really. He does love me, he does love me so!

ANYA: [Looking towards her door, tenderly.] My own room, my windows just as though I had never gone away. I'm home! To-morrow morning I shall get up and run into the garden. . . . Oh, if I could get to sleep! I haven't slept all the journey, I was so anxious and worried.

DUNYASHA: Pyotr Sergejevitch came the day before yesterday.

ANYA: [Joyfully.] Petya!

DUNYASHA: He's asleep in the bath house, he has settled in there. I'm afraid of being in their way, says he. [Glancing at her watch.] I was to have waked him, but Varvara Mihalovna told me not to. Don't you wake him, says she.

[Enter VARYA with a bunch of keys at her waist.]

VARYA: Dunyasha, coffee and make haste. . . . Mamma's asking for coffee.

DUNYASHA: This very minute. [Goes out.]

VARYA: Well, thank God, you've come. You're home again. [Petting her.] My little darling has come back! My precious beauty has come back again!

ANYA: I have had a time of it!

VARYA: I can fancy.

ANYA: We set off in Holy Week—it was so cold then, and all the way Charlotta would talk and show off her tricks. What did you want to burden me with Charlotta for?

VARYA: You couldn't have traveled all alone, darling. At seventeen!

ANYA: We got to Paris at last, it was cold there—snow. I speak French shockingly. Mamma lives on the fifth floor, I went up to her and there were a lot of French people, ladies, an old priest with a book. The place smelt of tobacco and so comfortless. I felt sorry, oh! so sorry for mamma all at once, I put my arms round her neck, and hugged her and wouldn't let her go. Mamma was as kind as she could be, and she cried. . . .

VARYA: [Through her tears.] Don't speak of it, don't speak of it!

ANYA: She had sold her villa at Mentone, she had nothing left, nothing. I hadn't a farthing left either, we only just had enough to get here. And mamma doesn't understand! When we had dinner at the stations, she always ordered the most expensive things and gave the waiters a whole rouble. Charlotta's just the same. Yasha too must have the same as we do; it's simply awful. You know Yasha is mamma's valet now, we brought him here with us.

VARYA: Yes, I've seen the young rascal.

ANYA: Well, tell me—have you paid the arrears on the mortgage?

VARYA: How could we get the money?

ANYA: Oh, dear! Oh, dear!

VARYA: In August the place will be sold.

ANYA: My goodness!

LOPAHIN: [Peeps in at the door and moos like a cow.] Moo! [Disappears.]

VARYA: [Weeping.] There, that's what I could do to him. [Shakes her fist.]

ANYA: [Embracing VARYA, softly.] Varya, has he made you an offer? [VARYA shakes her head.] Why, but he loves you. Why is it you don't come to an understanding? What are you waiting for?

VARYA: I believe that there never will be anything between us. He has a lot to do, he has no time for me . . . and takes no notice of me. Bless the man, it makes me miserable to see him. . . . Everyone's talking of our being married, everyone's congratulating me, and all the while there's really nothing in it; it's all like a dream. [In another tone.] You have a new brooch like a bee.

ANYA: [Mournfully.] Mamma bought it. [Goes into her own room and in a light-hearted childish tone.] And you know, in Paris I went up in a balloon!

VARYA: My darling's home again! My pretty is home again!

[DUNYASHA returns with the coffee-pot and is making the coffee.]

VARYA: [Standing at the door.] All day long, darling, as I go about looking after the house, I keep dreaming all the time. If only we could marry you to a rich man, then I should feel more at rest. Then I would go off by myself on a pilgrimage to Kiev, to Moscow . . . and so I would spend my life going from one holy place to another. . . . I would go on and on. . . . What bliss!

ANYA: The birds are singing in the garden. What time is it?

VARYA: It must be nearly three. It's time you were asleep, darling. [Going into ANYA'S room.] What bliss!

[YASHA enters with a rug and a traveling bag.]

YASHA: [Crosses the stage, mincingly.] May one come in here, pray?

DUNYASHA: I shouldn't have known you, Yasha. How you have changed abroad.

YASHA: H'm! . . . And who are you?

DUNYASHA: When you went away, I was that high. [Shows distance from floor.]

Dunyasha, Fyodor's daughter. . . . You don't remember me!

YASHA: H'm! . . . You're a peach! [Looks round and embraces her: she shrieks and drops a saucer. YASHA goes out hastily.] VARYA: [In the doorway, in a tone of vexation.] What now?

DUNYASHA: [Through her tears.] I have broken a saucer.

VARYA: Well, that brings good luck.

ANYA: [Coming out of her room.] We ought to prepare mamma: Petya is here.

VARYA: I told them not to wake him.

ANYA: [Dreamily.] It's six years since father died. Then only a month later little brother Grisha was drowned in the river, such a pretty boy he was, only seven. It was more than mamma could bear, so she went away, went away without looking back. [Shuddering.] . . . How well I understand her, if only she knew! [A pause.] And Petya Trofimov was Grisha's tutor, he may remind her.

[Enter FIRS: he is wearing a pea-jacket and a white waistcoat.]

FIRS: [Goes up to the coffee-pot, anxiously.] The mistress will be served here. [Puts on white gloves.] Is the coffee ready? [Sternly to DUNYASHA.] Girl! Where's the cream?

DUNYASHA: Ah, mercy on us! [Goes out quickly.]

FIRS: [Fussing round the coffee-pot.] Ech! you good-for-nothing! [Muttering to himself.] Come back from Paris. And the old master used to go to Paris too . . . horses all the way. [Laughs.]

VARYA: What is it, Firs?

FIRS: What is your pleasure? [Gleefully.] My lady has come home! I have lived to see her again! Now I can die. [Weeps with joy.]

[Enter LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA, GAEV and SEMYONOV-PISHTCHIK; the latter is in a short-waisted full coat of fine cloth, and full trousers. GAEV, as he comes in, makes a gesture with his arms and his whole body, as though he were playing billiards.]

LYUBOV: How does it go? Let me remember. Cannon off the red!

GAEV: That's it—in off the white! Why, once, sister, we used to sleep together in this very room, and now I'm fifty-one, strange as it seems.

LOPAHIN: Yes, time flies.

GAEV: What do you say?

LOPAHIN: Time, I say, flies.

GAEV: What a smell of patchouli!

ANYA: I'm going to bed. Good-night, mamma. [Kisses her mother.]

LYUBOV: My precious darling. [Kisses her hands.] Are you glad to be home? I can't believe it.

ANYA: Good-night, uncle.

GAEV: [Kissing her face and hands.] God bless you! How like you are to your mother! [To his sister.] At her age you were just the same, Lyuba.

[ANYA shakes hands with LOPAHIN and PISHTCHIK, then goes out, shutting the door after her.]

LYUBOV: She's quite worn out.

PISHTCHIK: Aye, it's a long journey, to be sure.

VARYA: [To LOPAHIN and PISHTCHIK.] Well, gentlemen? It's three o'clock and time to say good-bye.

LYUBOV: [Laughs.] You're just the same as ever, Varya. [Draws her to her and kisses her.] I'll just drink my coffee and then we will all go and rest. [FIRS puts a cushion under her feet.] Thanks, friend. I am so fond of coffee, I drink it day and night. Thanks, dear old man. [Kisses FIRS.]

VARYA: I'll just see whether all the things have been brought in. [Goes out.]

LYUBOV: Can it really be me sitting here? [Laughs.] I want to dance about and clap my hands. [Covers her face with her hands.] And I could drop asleep in a moment! God knows I love my country, I love it tenderly; I couldn't look out of the window in the train, I kept crying so. [Through her tears.] But I must drink my coffee, though. Thank you, Firs, thanks, dear old man. I'm so glad to find you still alive.

FIRS: The day before yesterday.

GAEV: He's rather deaf.

LOPAHIN: I have to set off for Harkov⁵ directly, at five o'clock. . . . It is annoying! I wanted to have a look at you, and a little talk. . . . You are just as splendid as ever.

PISHTCHIK: [Breathing heavily.] Handsomer, indeed. . . . Dressed in Parisian style . . . completely bowled me over.

LOPAHIN: Your brother, Leonid Andreyevitch here, is always saying that I'm a low-born knave, that I'm a money-grubber, but I don't care one straw for that. Let him talk. Only I do want you to believe in me as you used to. I do want your wonderful tender eyes to look at me as they used to in the old days. Merciful God! My father was a serf of your father and of your grandfather, but you—you—did so much for me once, that I've forgotten all that; I love you as though you were my kin . . . more than my kin.

LYUBOV: I can't sit still, I simply can't. . . . [Jumps up and walks about in violent agitation.] This happiness is too much for me. . . . You may laugh at me, I know I'm silly. . . . My own bookcase. [Kisses the bookcase.] My little table.

GAEV: Nurse died while you were away.

LYUBOV: [Sits down and drinks coffee.] Yes, the Kingdom of Heaven be hers! You wrote me of her death.

GAEV: And Anastasy is dead. Squinting Petruchka has left me and is in service now with the police captain in the town. [Takes a box of caramels out of his pocket and sucks one.]

PISHTCHIK: My daughter, Dashenka, wishes to be remembered to you.

LOPAHIN: I want to tell you something very pleasant and cheering. [Glancing at his watch.] I'm going directly . . . there's no time to say much . . . well, I can say it in a couple of words. I needn't tell you your cherry orchard is to be sold to pay your debts; the 22nd of August is the date fixed for the sale; but don't you worry, dearest lady, you may sleep in peace, there is a way of saving it. . . . This is what I propose. I beg your attention! Your estate is not twenty miles from the town, the railway runs close by it, and if the cherry orchard and the land along the river bank were cut up into building plots and then let on lease for summer villas, you would make an income of at least 25,000 roubles a year out of it.⁶

GAEV: That's all rot, if you'll excuse me.

LYUBOV: I don't quite understand you, Yermolay Alexeyevitch.

LOPAHIN: You will get a rent of at least 25 roubles a year for a three-acre plot from summer visitors, and if you say the word now, I'll bet you what you like there won't be one square foot of ground vacant by the autumn, all the plots will be taken up. I congratulate you; in fact, you are saved. It's a perfect situation with that deep river. Only, of course, it must be cleared—all the old buildings, for example, must be removed, this house too, which is really good for nothing and the old cherry orchard must be cut down.

LYUBOV: Cut down? My dear fellow, forgive me, but you don't know what you are talking about. If there is one thing interesting—remarkable indeed—in the whole province, it's just our cherry orchard.

5. Kharkov, the second-largest city in Ukraine, was part of the Russian Empire at the time of the play.

6. Nearly $500,000 per year in today's U.S. currency; a rental fee of 25 roubles is the equivalent of about $500.

LOPAHIN: The only thing remarkable about the orchard is that it's a very large one. There's a crop of cherries every alternate year, and then there's nothing to be done with them, no one buys them.

GAEV: This orchard is mentioned in the Encyclopædia.⁷

LOPAHIN: [Glancing at his watch.] If we don't decide on something and don't take some steps, on the 22nd of August the cherry orchard and the whole estate too will be sold by auction. Make up your minds! There is no other way of saving it, I'll take my oath on that. No, no!

FIRS: In old days, forty or fifty years ago, they used to dry the cherries, soak them, pickle them, make jam too, and they used—

GAEV: Be quiet, Firs.

FIRS: And they used to send the preserved cherries to Moscow and to Harkov by the wagon-load. That brought the money in! And the preserved cherries in those days were soft and juicy, sweet and fragrant. . . . They knew the way to do them then. . . .

LYUBOV: And where is the recipe now?

FIRS: It's forgotten. Nobody remembers it.

PISHTCHIK: [To LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA.] What's it like in Paris? Did you eat frogs there?

LYUBOV: Oh, I ate crocodiles.

PISHTCHIK: Fancy that now!

LOPAHIN: There used to be only the gentlefolks and the peasants in the country, but now there are these summer visitors. All the towns, even the small ones, are surrounded nowadays by these summer villas. And one may say for sure, that in another twenty years there'll be many more of these people and that they'll be everywhere. At present the summer visitor only drinks tea in his verandah, but maybe he'll take to working his bit of land too, and then your cherry orchard would become happy, rich, and prosperous. . . .

GAEV: [Indignant.] What rot!

[Enter VARYA and YASHA.]

VARYA: There are two telegrams for you, mamma. [Takes out keys and opens an old-fashioned bookcase with a loud crack.] Here they are.

LYUBOV: From Paris. [Tears the telegrams, without reading them.] I have done with Paris.

GAEV: Do you know, Lyuba, how old that bookcase is? Last week I pulled out the bottom drawer and there I found the date branded on it. The bookcase was made just a hundred years ago. What do you say to that? We might have celebrated its jubilee. Though it's an inanimate object, still it is a book case.

PISHTCHIK: [Amazed.] A hundred years! Fancy that now.

GAEV: Yes. . . . It is a thing. . . . [Feeling the bookcase.] Dear, honored, bookcase! Hail to thee who for more than a hundred years hast served the pure ideals of good and justice; thy silent call to fruitful labor has never flagged in those hundred years, maintaining [In tears.] in the generations of man, courage and faith in a brighter future and fostering in us ideals of good and social consciousness. [A pause.]

LOPAHIN: Yes. . . .

LYUBOV: You are just the same as ever, Leonid.

GAEV: [A little embarrassed.] Cannon off the right into the pocket!

LOPAHIN: [Looking at his watch.] Well, it's time I was off.

YASHA: [Handing LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA medicine.] Perhaps you will take your pills now.

PISHTCHIK: You shouldn't take medicines, my dear madam . . . they do no harm and no good. Give them here . . . honored lady. [Takes the pill-box, pours the pills into the hollow of his hand, blows on them, puts them in his mouth and drinks off some kvass.] There!

LYUBOV: [In alarm.] Why, you must be out of your mind!

PISHTCHIK: I have taken all the pills.

LOPAHIN: What a glutton! [All laugh.]

FIRS: His honor stayed with us in Easter week, ate a gallon and a half of cucumbers. . . . [Mutters.]

LYUBOV: What is he saying?

VARYA: He has taken to muttering like that for the last three years. We are used to it.

YASHA: His declining years!

[CHARLOTTA IVANOVNA, a very thin, lanky figure in a white dress with a lorgette in her belt, walks across the stage.]

LOPAHIN: I beg your pardon, Charlotta Ivanovna, I have not had time to greet you. [Tries to kiss her hand.]

CHARLOTTA: [Pulling away her hand.] If I let you kiss my hand, you'll be wanting to kiss my elbow, and then my shoulder.

LOPAHIN: I've no luck to-day! [All laugh.] Charlotta Ivanovna, show us some tricks!

LYUBOV: Charlotta, do show us some tricks!

CHARLOTTA: I don't want to. I'm sleepy. [Goes out.]

LOPAHIN: In three weeks' time we shall meet again. [Kisses LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA'S hand.] Good-bye till then—I must go. [To GAEV.] Good-bye. [Kisses PISHTCHIK.] Good-bye. [Gives his hand to VARYA, then to FIRS and YASHA.] I don't want to go. [To LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA.] If you think over my plan for the villas and make up your mind, then let me know; I will lend you 50,000 roubles.⁸ Think of it seriously.

VARYA: [Angrily.] Well, do go, for goodness sake.

LOPAHIN: I'm going, I'm going. [Goes out.]

GAEV: Low-born knave! I beg pardon, though . . . Varya is going to marry him, he's Varya's fiancé.

VARYA: Don't talk nonsense, uncle.

LYUBOV: Well, Varya, I shall be delighted. He's a good man.

PISHTCHIK: He is, one must acknowledge, a most worthy man. And my Dashenka . . . says too that . . . she says . . . various things. [Snores, but at once wakes up.] But all the same, honored lady, could you oblige me . . . with a loan of 240 roubles⁹ . . . to pay the interest on my mortgage to-morrow?

VARYA: [Dismayed.] No, no.

LYUBOV: I really haven't any money.

PISHTCHIK: It will turn up. [Laughs.] I never lose hope. I thought everything was over, I was a ruined man, and lo and behold—the railway passed through my land and . . . they paid me for it. And something else will turn up again, if not to-day, then to-morrow . . . Dashenka'll win two hundred thousand . . . she's got a lottery ticket.

LYUBOV: Well, we've finished our coffee, we can go to bed.

FIRS: [Brushes GAEV, reprovingly.] You have got on the wrong trousers again! What am I to do with you?

VARYA: [Softly.] Anya's asleep. [Softly opens the window.] Now the sun's risen, it's not a bit cold. Look, mamma, what exquisite trees! My goodness! And the air! The starlings are singing!

GAEV: [Opens another window.] The orchard is all white. You've not forgotten it, Lyuba? That long avenue that runs straight, straight as an arrow, how it shines on a moonlight night. You remember? You've not forgotten?

LYUBOV: [Looking out of the window into the garden.] Oh, my childhood, my innocence! It was in this nursery I used to sleep, from here I looked out into the orchard, happiness waked with me every morning and in those days the orchard was just the same, nothing has changed. [Laughs with delight.] All, all white! Oh, my orchard! After the dark gloomy autumn, and the cold winter; you are young again, and full of happiness, the heavenly angels have never left you. . . . If I could cast off the burden that weighs on my heart, if I could forget the past!

GAEV: H'm! and the orchard will be sold to pay our debts; it seems strange. . . .

LYUBOV: See, our mother walking . . . all in white, down the avenue! [Laughs with delight.] It is she!

GAEV: Where?

VARYA: Oh, don't, mamma!

LYUBOV: There is no one. It was my fancy. On the right there, by the path to the arbor, there is a white tree bending like a woman. . . .

[Enter TROFIMOV wearing a shabby student's uniform and spectacles.]

LYUBOV: What a ravishing orchard! White masses of blossom, blue sky. . . .

TROFIMOV: Lyubov Andreyevna! [She looks round at him.] I will just pay my respects to you and then leave you at once. [Kisses her hand warmly.] I was told to wait until morning, but I hadn't the patience to wait any longer. . . .

[LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA looks at him in perplexity.]

VARYA: [Through her tears.] This is Petya Trofimov.

TROFIMOV: Petya Trofimov, who was your Grisha's tutor. . . . Can I have changed so much?

[LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA embraces him and weeps quietly.]

9. A loan of nearly $5,000 in today's U.S. currency.

GAEV: [In confusion.] There, there, Lyuba.

VARYA: [Crying.] I told you, Petya, to wait till to-morrow.

LYUBOV: My Grisha . . . my boy . . . Grisha . . . my son!

VARYA: We can't help it, mamma, it is God's will.

TROFIMOV: [Softly through his tears.] There . . . there.

LYUBOV: [Weeping quietly.] My boy was lost . . . drowned. Why? Oh, why, dear Petya? [More quietly.] Anya is asleep in there, and I'm talking loudly . . . making this noise. . . . But, Petya? Why have you grown so ugly? Why do you look so old?

TROFIMOV: A peasant-woman in the train called me a mangy-looking gentleman.

LYUBOV: You were quite a boy then, a pretty little student, and now your hair's thin—and spectacles. Are you really a student still? [Goes towards the door.]

TROFIMOV: I seem likely to be a perpetual student.

LYUBOV: [Kisses her brother, then VARYA.] Well, go to bed. . . . You are older too, Leonid.

PISHTCHIK: [Follows her.] I suppose it's time we were asleep. . . . Ugh! my gout. I'm staying the night! Lyubov Andreyevna, my dear soul, if you could . . . to-morrow morning . . . 240 roubles.

GAEV: That's always his story.

PISHTCHIK: 240 roubles . . . to pay the interest on my mortgage.

LYUBOV: My dear man, I have no money.

PISHTCHIK: I'll pay it back, my dear . . . a trifling sum.

LYUBOV: Oh, well, Leonid will give it you. . . . You give him the money, Leonid.

GAEV: Me give it him! Let him wait till he gets it!

LYUBOV: It can't be helped, give it him. He needs it. He'll pay it back.

[LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA, TROFIMOV, PISHTCHIK and FIRS go out. GAEV, VARYA and YASHA remain.]

GAEV: Sister hasn't got out of the habit of flinging away her money. [To YASHA.]

Get away, my good fellow, you smell of the hen-house.

YASHA: [With a grin.] And you, Leonid Andreyevitch, are just the same as ever.

GAEV: What's that? [To VARYA.] What did he say?

VARYA: [To YASHA.] Your mother has come from the village; she has been sitting in the servants' room since yesterday, waiting to see you.

YASHA: Oh, bother her!

VARYA: For shame!

YASHA: What's the hurry? She might just as well have come to-morrow. [Goes out.]

VARYA: Mamma's just the same as ever, she hasn't changed a bit. If she had her own way, she'd give away everything.

GAEV: Yes. [A pause.] If a great many remedies are suggested for some disease, it means that the disease is incurable. I keep thinking and racking my brains; I have many schemes, a great many, and that really means none. If we could only come in for a legacy from somebody, or marry our Anya to a very rich man, or we might go to Yaroslavl¹ and try our luck with our old aunt, the Countess. She's very, very rich, you know.

1. Major industrial city located on the Volga River, 170 miles northeast of Moscow.

VARYA: [Weeps.] If God would help us.

GAEV: Don't blubber. Aunt's very rich, but she doesn't like us. First, sister married a lawyer instead of a nobleman. . . .

[ANYA appears in the doorway.]

GAEV: And then her conduct, one can't call it virtuous. She is good, and kind, and nice, and I love her, but, however one allows for extenuating circumstances, there's no denying that she's an immoral woman. One feels it in her slightest gesture.

VARYA: [In a whisper.] Anya's in the doorway.

GAEV: What do you say? [A pause.] It's queer, there seems to be something wrong with my right eye. I don't see as well as I did. And on Thursday when I was in the district Court . . .

[Enter ANYA.]

VARYA: Why aren't you asleep, Anya?

ANYA: I can't get to sleep.

GAEV: My pet. [Kisses ANYA'S face and hands.] My child. [Weeps.] You are not my niece, you are my angel, you are everything to me. Believe me, believe. . . .

ANYA: I believe you, uncle. Everyone loves you and respects you . . . but, uncle dear, you must be silent . . . simply be silent. What were you saying just now about my mother, about your own sister? What made you say that?

GAEV: Yes, yes. . . . [Puts his hand over his face.] Really, that was awful! My God, save me! And to-day I made a speech to the bookcase . . . so stupid! And only when I had finished, I saw how stupid it was.

VARYA: It's true, uncle, you ought to keep quiet. Don't talk, that's all.

ANYA: If you could keep from talking, it would make things easier for you, too.

GAEV: I won't speak. [Kisses ANYA'S and VARYA'S hands.] I'll be silent. Only this is about business. On Thursday I was in the district Court; well, there was a large party of us there and we began talking of one thing and another, and this and that, and do you know, I believe that it will be possible to raise a loan on an I.O.U. to pay the arrears on the mortgage.

VARYA: If the Lord would help us!

GAEV: I'm going on Tuesday; I'll talk of it again. [To VARYA.] Don't blubber. [To ANYA.] Your mamma will talk to Lopahin; of course, he won't refuse her. And as soon as you're rested you shall go to Yaroslavl to the Countess, your great-aunt. So we shall all set to work in three directions at once, and the business is done. We shall pay off arrears, I'm convinced of it. [Puts a caramel in his mouth.] I swear on my honor, I swear by anything you like, the estate shan't be sold. [Excitedly.] By my own happiness, I swear it! Here's my hand on it, call me the basest, vilest of men, if I let it come to an auction! Upon my soul I swear it!

ANYA: [Her equanimity has returned, she is quite happy.] How good you are, uncle, and how clever! [Embraces her uncle.] I'm at peace now! Quite at peace! I'm happy!

[Enter FIRS.]

FIRS: [Reproachfully.] Leonid Andreyevitch, have you no fear of God? When are you going to bed?

GAEV: Directly, directly. You can go, Firs. I'll . . . yes, I will undress myself. Come, children, bye-bye. We'll go into details to-morrow, but now go to bed. [Kisses ANYA and VARYA.] I'm a man of the eighties.² They run down that period, but still I can say I have had to suffer not a little for my convictions in my life, it's not for nothing that the peasant loves me. One must know the peasant! One must know how. . . .

ANYA: At it again, uncle!

VARYA: Uncle dear, you'd better be quiet!

FIRS: [Angrily.] Leonid Andreyevitch!

GAEV: I'm coming. I'm coming. Go to bed. Potted the shot—there's a shot for you!³ A beauty! [Goes out, FIRS hobbling after him.]

ANYA: My mind's at rest now. I don't want to go to Yaroslavl, I don't like my great-aunt, but still my mind's at rest. Thanks to uncle. [Sits down.]

VARYA: We must go to bed. I'm going. Something unpleasant happened while you were away. In the old servants' quarters there are only the old servants, as you know—Efimushka, Polya, and Yevstigney—and Karp too. They began letting stray people in to spend the night—I said nothing. But all at once I heard they had been spreading a report that I gave them nothing but pease pudding to eat. Out of stinginess, you know. . . . And it was all Yevstigney's doing. . . . Very well, I said to myself. . . . If that's how it is, I thought, wait a bit. I sent for Yevstigney. . . . [Yawns.] He comes. . . . "How's this, Yevstigney," I said, "you could be such a fool as to?" . . ." [Looking at ANYA.] Anitchka! [A pause.] She's asleep. [Puts her arm around ANYA.] Come to bed . . . come along! [Leads her.] My darling has fallen asleep! Come. . . . [They go.]

[Far away beyond the orchard a shepherd plays on a pipe. TROFIMOV crosses the stage and, seeing VARYA and ANYA, stands still.]

VARYA: 'Sh! asleep, asleep. Come, my own.

ANYA: [Softly, half asleep.] I'm so tired. Still those bells. Uncle . . . dear . . . mamma and uncle. . . .

VARYA: Come, my own, come along.

[They go into ANYA'S room.]

TROFIMOV: [Tenderly.] My sunshine! My spring.

CURTAIN.

ACT II

The open country. An old shrine,⁴ long abandoned and fallen out of the perpendicular; near it a well, large stones that have apparently once been tombstones, and an old garden seat. The road to GAEV'S house is seen. On one side rise dark poplars; and there the cherry orchard begins. In the distance a row of telegraph poles and far, far away on the horizon there is faintly outlined a great town, only visible in very fine clear weather. It is near sunset. CHARLOTTA, YASHA and DUNYASHA are sitting on the seat. EPIHODOV is standing near, playing something mournful on a guitar. All sit plunged in thought. CHARLOTTA wears an old forage cap; she has taken a gun from her shoulder and is tightening the buckle on the strap.

CHARLOTTA: [Musingly.] I haven't a real passport⁵ of my own, and I don't know how old I am, and I always feel that I'm a young thing. When I was a little girl, my father and mother used to travel about to fairs and give performances—very good ones. And I used to dance *salto-mortale*⁶ and all sorts of things. And when papa and mamma died, a German lady took me and had me educated. And so I grew up and become a governess. But where I came from, and who I am, I don't know. . . . Who my parents were, very likely they weren't married. . . . I don't know. [Takes a cucumber out of her pocket and eats.] I know nothing at all. [A pause.] One wants to talk and has no one to talk to. . . . I have nobody.

EPIHODOV: [Plays on the guitar and sings.] "What care I for the noisy world! What care I for friends or foes!"⁷ How agreeable it is to play on the mandoline!

DUNYASHA: That's a guitar, not a mandoline. [Looks in a hand-mirror and powders herself.]

EPIHODOV: To a man mad with love, it's a mandoline. [Sings.] "Were her heart but aglow with love's mutual flame." [YASHA joins in.]

CHARLOTTA: How shockingly these people sing! Foo! Like jackals!

DUNYASHA: [To YASHA.] What happiness, though, to visit foreign lands.

YASHA: Ah, yes! I rather agree with you there. [Yawns, then lights a cigar.] EPIHODOV: That's comprehensible. In foreign lands everything has long since reached full complexion.

YASHA: That's so, of course.

EPIHODOV: I'm a cultivated man, I read remarkable books of all sorts, but I can never make out the tendency I am myself precisely inclined for, whether to live or to shoot myself, speaking precisely, but nevertheless I always carry a revolver. Here it is. . . . [Shows revolver.]

CHARLOTTA: I've had enough, and now I'm going. [Puts on the gun.] Epihodov, you're a very clever fellow, and a very terrible one too, all the women must be wild about you. Br-r-r! [Goes.] These clever fellows are all so stupid; there's not a creature for me to speak to. . . . Always alone, alone, nobody belonging to me. . . . and who I am, and why I'm on earth, I don't know. [Walks away slowly.]

EPIHODOV: Speaking precisely, not touching upon other subjects, I'm bound to admit about myself, that destiny behaves mercilessly to me, as a storm to a little boat. If, let us suppose, I am mistaken, then why did I wake up this morning, to quote an example, and look round, and there on my chest was a spider of fearful magnitude . . . like this. [Shows with both hands.] And then I take up a jug of kvass, to quench my thirst, and in it there is something in the highest degree unseemly of the nature of a cockroach. [A pause.] Have you read Buckle?⁸ [A pause.] I am desirous of troubling you, Dunyasha, with a couple of words.

DUNYASHA: Well, speak.

EPIHODOV: I should be desirous to speak with you alone. [Sighs.]

DUNYASHA: [Embarrassed.] Well—only bring me my mantle first. It's by the cupboard. It's rather damp here.

EPIHODOV: Certainly. I will fetch it. Now I know what I must do with my revolver. [Takes guitar and goes off playing on it.]

YASHA: Two and twenty misfortunes! Between ourselves, he's a fool. [Yawns.]

DUNYASHA: God grant he doesn't shoot himself! [A pause.] I am so nervous, I'm always in a flutter. I was a little girl when I was taken into our lady's house, and now I have quite grown out of peasant ways, and my hands are white, as white as a lady's. I'm such a delicate, sensitive creature, I'm afraid of everything. I'm so frightened. And if you deceive me, Yasha, I don't know what will become of my nerves.

YASHA: [Kisses her.] You're a peach! Of course a girl must never forget herself; what I dislike more than anything is a girl being flighty in her behavior.

DUNYASHA: I'm passionately in love with you, Yasha; you are a man of culture—you can give your opinion about anything. [A pause.]

YASHA: [Yawns.] Yes, that's so. My opinion is this: if a girl loves anyone, that means that she has no principles. [A pause.] It's pleasant smoking a cigar in the open air. [Listens.] Someone's coming this way . . . it's the gentlefolk. [DUNYASHA embraces him impulsively.] Go home, as though you had been to the river to bathe; go by that path, or else they'll meet you and suppose I have made an appointment with you here. That I can't endure.

DUNYASHA: [Coughing softly.] The cigar has made my head ache. . . . [Goes off.]

[YASHA remains sitting near the shrine. Enter LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA, GAEV and LOPAHIN.]

LOPAHIN: You must make up your mind once for all—there's no time to lose. It's quite a simple question, you know. Will you consent to letting the land for building or not? One word in answer: Yes or no? Only one word!

LYUBOV: Who is smoking such horrible cigars here? [Sits down.]

GAEV: Now the railway line has been brought near, it's made things very convenient. [Sits down.] Here we have been over and lunched in town. Cannon off the white! I should like to go home and have a game.

LYUBOV: You have plenty of time.

LOPAHIN: Only one word! [Beseechingly.] Give me an answer!

GAEV: [Yawning.] What do you say?

LYUBOV: [Looks in her purse.] I had quite a lot of money here yesterday, and there's scarcely any left to-day. My poor Varya feeds us all on milk soup for the sake of economy; the old folks in the kitchen get nothing but pease pudding, while I waste my money in a senseless way. [Drops purse, scattering gold pieces.] There, they have all fallen out! [Annoyed.]

8. Henry Thomas Buckle (1821–61), a learned but eccentric historian known as a freethinker; his History of Civilization in England (1857) was the talk of Moscow a generation earlier. His work, initially respected for its empirical methods, quickly fell into disrepute in sophisticated intellectual circles.

YASHA: Allow me, I'll soon pick them up. [Collects the coins.]

LYUBOV: Pray do, Yasha. And what did I go off to the town to lunch for? Your restaurant's a wretched place with its music and the tablecloth smelling of soap. . . . Why drink so much, Leonid? And eat so much? And talk so much? To-day you talked a great deal again in the restaurant, and all so inappropriately. About the era of the seventies, about the decadents.⁹ And to whom? Talking to waiters about decadents!

LOPAHIN: Yes.

GAEV: [Waving his hand.] I'm incorrigible; that's evident. [Irritably to YASHA.]

Why is it you keep fidgeting about in front of us!

YASHA: [Laughs.] I can't help laughing when I hear your voice.

GAEV: [To his sister.] Either I or he. . . .

LYUBOV: Get along! Go away, Yasha.

YASHA: [Gives LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA her purse.] Directly. [Hardly able to suppress his laughter.] This minute. . . . [Goes off.]

LOPAHIN: Deriganov, the millionaire, means to buy your estate. They say he is coming to the sale himself.

LYUBOV: Where did you hear that?

LOPAHIN: That's what they say in town.

GAEV: Our aunt in Yaroslavl has promised to send help; but when, and how much she will send, we don't know.

LOPAHIN: How much will she send? A hundred thousand? Two hundred?

LYUBOV: Oh, well! . . . Ten or fifteen thousand, and we must be thankful to get that.

LOPAHIN: Forgive me, but such reckless people as you are—such queer, unbusiness-like people—I never met in my life. One tells you in plain Russian your estate is going to be sold, and you seem not to understand it.

LYUBOV: What are we to do? Tell us what to do.

LOPAHIN: I do tell you every day. Every day I say the same thing. You absolutely must let the cherry orchard and the land on building leases; and do it at once, as quick as may be—the auction's close upon us! Do understand! Once make up your mind to build villas, and you can raise as much money as you like, and then you are saved.

LYUBOV: Villas and summer visitors—forgive me saying so—it's so vulgar.

GAEV: There I perfectly agree with you.

LOPAHIN: I shall sob, or scream, or fall into a fit. I can't stand it! You drive me mad! [To GAEV.] You're an old woman!

GAEV: What do you say?

LOPAHIN: An old woman! [Gets up to go.]

LYUBOV: [In dismay.] No, don't go! Do stay, my dear friend! Perhaps we shall think of something.

LOPAHIN: What is there to think of?

9. Probably a reference to the group of flamboyant French poets of the 1880s who called themselves les décadents. The era of the seventies: the 1870s, a relatively liberal period in Russia that ended abruptly with the assassination of Alexander II in 1881.

LYUBOV: Don't go, I entreat you! With you here it's more cheerful, anyway. [A pause.] I keep expecting something, as though the house were going to fall about our ears.

GAEV: [In profound dejection.] Potted the white! It fails—a kiss.

LYUBOV: We have been great sinners. . . .

LOPAHIN: You have no sins to repent of.

GAEV: [Puts a caramel in his mouth.] They say I've eaten up my property in caramels. [Laughs.]

LYUBOV: Oh, my sins! I've always thrown my money away recklessly like a lunatic. I married a man who made nothing but debts. My husband died of champagne—he drank dreadfully. To my misery I loved another man, and immediately—it was my first punishment—the blow fell upon me, here, in the river . . . my boy was drowned and I went abroad—went away for ever, never to return, not to see that river again . . . I shut my eyes, and fled, distracted, and he after me . . . pitilessly, brutally. I bought a villa at Mentone,¹ for he fell ill there, and for three years I had no rest day or night. His illness wore me out, my soul was dried up. And last year, when my villa was sold to pay my debts, I went to Paris and there he robbed me of everything and abandoned me for another woman; and I tried to poison myself. . . . So stupid, so shameful! . . . And suddenly I felt a yearning for Russia, for my country, for my little girl. . . . [Dries her tears.] Lord, Lord, be merciful! Forgive my sins! Do not chastise me more! [Takes a telegram out of her pocket.] I got this to-day from Paris. He implores forgiveness, entreats me to return. [Tears up the telegram.] I fancy there is music somewhere. [Listens.]

GAEV: That's our famous Jewish orchestra. You remember, four violins, a flute, and a double bass.

LYUBOV: That still in existence? We ought to send for them one evening, and give a dance.

LOPAHIN: [Listens.] I can't hear. . . . [Hums softly.] "For money the Germans will turn a Russian into a Frenchman." [Laughs.] I did see such a piece at the theater yesterday! It was funny!

LYUBOV: And most likely there was nothing funny in it. You shouldn't look at plays, you should look at yourselves a little oftener. How gray your lives are! How much nonsense you talk.

LOPAHIN: That's true. One may say honestly, we live a fool's life. [Pause.] My father was a peasant, an idiot; he knew nothing and taught me nothing, only beat me when he was drunk, and always with his stick. In reality I am just such another blockhead and idiot. I've learnt nothing properly. I write a wretched hand. I write so that I feel ashamed before folks, like a pig.

LYUBOV: You ought to get married, my dear fellow.

LOPAHIN: Yes . . . that's true.

LYUBOV: You should marry our Varya, she's a good girl.

LOPAHIN: Yes.

LYUBOV: She's a good-natured girl, she's busy all day long, and what's more, she loves you. And you have liked her for ever so long.

1. Resort town on the French Mediterranean coast.

LOPAHIN: Well? I'm not against it. . . . She's a good girl. [Pause.]

GAEV: I've been offered a place in the bank: 6,000 roubles a year.² Did you know?

LYUBOV: You would never do for that! You must stay as you are.

[Enter FIRS with overcoat.]

FIRS: Put it on, sir, it's damp.

GAEV: [Putting it on.] You bother me, old fellow.

FIRS: You can't go on like this. You went away in the morning without leaving word. [Looks him over.] LYUBOV: You look older, Firs!

FIRS: What is your pleasure?

LOPAHIN: You look older, she said.

FIRS: I've had a long life. They were arranging my wedding before your papa was born. . . . [Laughs.] I was the head footman before the emancipation came.³

I wouldn't consent to be set free then; I stayed on with the old master. . . . [A pause.] I remember what rejoicings they made and didn't know themselves what they were rejoicing over.

LOPAHIN: Those were fine old times. There was flogging anyway.

FIRS: [Not hearing.] To be sure! The peasants knew their place, and the masters knew theirs; but now they're all at sixes and sevens,⁴ there's no making it out.

GAEV: Hold your tongue, Firs. I must go to town to-morrow. I have been promised an introduction to a general, who might let us have a loan.

LOPAHIN: You won't bring that off. And you won't pay your arrears, you may rest assured of that.

LYUBOV: That's all his nonsense. There is no such general.

[Enter TROFIMOV, ANYA and VARYA.]

GAEV: Here come our girls.

ANYA: There's mamma on the seat.

LYUBOV: [Tenderly.] Come here, come along. My darlings! [Embraces ANYA and VARYA.] If you only knew how I love you both. Sit beside me, there, like that. [All sit down.]

LOPAHIN: Our perpetual student is always with the young ladies.

TROFIMOV: That's not your business.

LOPAHIN: He'll soon be fifty, and he's still a student.

TROFIMOV: Drop your idiotic jokes.

LOPAHIN: Why are you so cross, you queer fish?

TROFIMOV: Oh, don't persist!

LOPAHIN: [Laughs.] Allow me to ask you what's your idea of me?

TROFIMOV: I'll tell you my idea of you, Yermolay Alexeyevitch: you are a rich man, you'll soon be a millionaire. Well, just as in the economy of nature a wild beast is of use, who devours everything that comes in his way, so you too have your use.

[All laugh.]

VARYA: Better tell us something about the planets, Petya.

LYUBOV: No, let us go on with the conversation we had yesterday.

TROFIMOV: What was it about?

GAEV: About pride.

TROFIMOV: We had a long conversation yesterday, but we came to no conclusion.

In pride, in your sense of it, there is something mystical. Perhaps you are right from your point of view; but if one looks at it simply, without subtlety, what sort of pride can there be, what sense is there in it, if man in his physiological formation is very imperfect, if in the immense majority of cases he is coarse, dull-witted, profoundly unhappy? One must give up glorification of self. One should work, and nothing else.

GAEV: One must die in any case.

TROFIMOV: Who knows? And what does it mean—dying? Perhaps man has a hundred senses, and only the five we know are lost at death, while the other ninety-five remain alive.

LYUBOV: How clever you are, Petya!

LOPAHIN: [Ironically.] Fearfully clever!

TROFIMOV: Humanity progresses, perfecting its powers. Everything that is beyond its ken now will one day become familiar and comprehensible; only we must work, we must with all our powers aid the seeker after truth. Here among us in Russia the workers are few in number as yet. The vast majority of the intellectual people I know, seek nothing, do nothing, are not fit as yet for work of any kind. They call themselves intellectual, but they treat their servants as inferiors, behave to the peasants as though they were animals, learn little, read nothing seriously, do practically nothing, only talk about science and know very little about art. They are all serious people, they all have severe faces, they all talk of weighty matters and air their theories, and yet the vast majority of us—ninety-nine per cent—live like savages, at the least thing fly to blows and abuse, eat piggishly, sleep in filth and stuffiness, bugs everywhere, stench and damp and moral impurity. And it's clear all our fine talk is only to divert our attention and other people's. Show me where to find the crèches there's so much talk about, and the reading-rooms?⁵ They only exist in novels: in real life there are none of them. There is nothing but filth and vulgarity and Asiatic apathy. I fear and dislike very serious faces. I'm afraid of serious conversations. We should do better to be silent.

LOPAHIN: You know, I get up at five o'clock in the morning, and I work from morning to night; and I've money, my own and other people's, always passing through my hands, and I see what people are made of all round me. One has only to begin to do anything to see how few honest, decent people there are. Sometimes when I lie awake at night, I think: "Oh! Lord, thou hast given us immense forests, boundless plains, the widest horizons, and living here we ourselves ought really to be giants.”

LYUBOV: You ask for giants! They are no good except in story-books; in real life they frighten us.

[EPIHODOV advances in the background, playing on the guitar.]

LYUBOV: [Dreamily.] There goes Epihodov.

ANYA: [Dreamily.] There goes Epihodov.

GAEV: The sun has set, my friends.

TROFIMOV: Yes.

GAEV: [Not loudly, but, as it were, declaiming.] O nature, divine nature, thou art bright with eternal luster, beautiful and indifferent! Thou, whom we call mother, thou dost unite within thee life and death! Thou dost give life and dost destroy!

VARYA: [In a tone of supplication.] Uncle!

ANYA: Uncle, you are at it again!

TROFIMOV: You'd much better be cannoning off the red!

GAEV: I'll hold my tongue, I will.

[All sit plunged in thought. Perfect stillness. The only thing audible is the muttering of FIRS. Suddenly there is a sound in the distance, as it were from the sky—the sound of a breaking harp-string, mournfully dying away.]

LYUBOV: What is that?

LOPAHIN: I don't know. Somewhere far away a bucket fallen and broken in the pits. But somewhere very far away.

GAEV: It might be a bird of some sort—such as a heron.

TROFIMOV: Or an owl.

LYUBOV: [Shudders.] I don't know why, but it's horrid. [A pause.]

FIRS: It was the same before the calamity—the owl hooted and the samovar hissed all the time.

GAEV: Before what calamity?

FIRS: Before the emancipation. [A pause.]

LYUBOV: Come, my friends, let us be going; evening is falling. [To ANYA.] There are tears in your eyes. What is it, darling? [Embraces her.]

ANYA: Nothing, mamma; it's nothing.

TROFIMOV: There is somebody coming.

[The WAYFARER appears in a shabby white forage cap and an overcoat; he is slightly drunk.]

WAYFARER: Allow me to inquire, can I get to the station this way?

GAEV: Yes. Go along that road.

WAYFARER: I thank you most feelingly. [Coughing.] The weather is superb. [Declaims.] My brother, my suffering brother! . . . Come out to the Volga!⁶

6. Line from a poem by Nikolai Nekrasov (1821–78), a poet known as a champion of the lower classes. (The Volga is Europe's longest river and Russia's principal waterway.) My brother, my suffering brother!: Line from a poem by Semen Nadson (1862–87), persecuted in Russia because of his Jewish origins.

Whose groan do you hear? . . . [To VARYA.] Mademoiselle, vouchsafe a hungry Russian thirty kopecks.⁷

[VARYA utters a shriek of alarm.]

LOPAHIN: [Angrily.] There's a right and a wrong way of doing everything!

LYUBOV: [Hurriedly.] Here, take this. [Looks in her purse.] I've no silver. No matter—here's gold for you.

WAYFARER: I thank you most feelingly! [Goes off.]

[Laughter.]

VARYA: [Frightened.] I'm going home—I'm going. . . . Oh, mamma, the servants have nothing to eat, and you gave him gold!

LYUBOV: There's no doing anything with me. I'm so silly! When we get home, I'll give you all I possess. Yermolay Alexeyevitch, you will lend me some more! . . .

LOPAHIN: I will.

LYUBOV: Come, friends, it's time to be going. And Varya, we have made a match of it for you. I congratulate you.

VARYA: [Through her tears.] Mamma, that's not a joking matter.

LOPAHIN: "Ophelia, get thee to a nunnery!"⁸

GAEV: My hands are trembling; it's a long while since I had a game of billiards.

LOPAHIN: "Ophelia! Nymph, in thy orisons be all my sins remember'd."

LYUBOV: Come, it will soon be supper-time.

VARYA: How he frightened me! My heart's simply throbbing.

LOPAHIN: Let me remind you, ladies and gentlemen: on the 22nd of August the cherry orchard will be sold. Think about that! Think about it!

[All go off, except TROFIMOV and ANYA.]

ANYA: [Laughing.] I'm grateful to the wayfarer! He frightened Varya and we are left alone.

TROFIMOV: Varya's afraid we shall fall in love with each other, and for days together she won't leave us. With her narrow brain she can't grasp that we are above love. To eliminate the petty and transitory which hinder us from being free and happy—that is the aim and meaning of our life. Forward! We go forward irresistibly towards the bright star that shines yonder in the distance. Forward! Do not lag behind, friends.

ANYA: [Claps her hands.] How well you speak! [A pause.] It is divine here today.

TROFIMOV: Yes, it's glorious weather.

ANYA: Somehow, Petya, you've made me so that I don't love the cherry orchard as I used to. I used to love it so dearly. I used to think that there was no spot on earth like our garden.

TROFIMOV: All Russia is our garden. The earth is great and beautiful—there are many beautiful places in it. [A pause.] Think only, Anya, your grandfather, 7. About $6 in today's U.S. currency.

8. For this quotation and the one below, see Hamlet 3.1.

and great-grandfather, and all your ancestors were slave-owners—the owners of living souls—and from every cherry in the orchard, from every leaf, from every trunk there are human creatures looking at you. Cannot you hear their voices? Oh, it is awful! Your orchard is a fearful thing, and when in the evening or at night one walks about the orchard, the old bark on the trees glimmers dimly in the dusk, and the old cherry trees seem to be dreaming of centuries gone by and tortured by fearful visions.⁹ Yes! We are at least two hundred years behind, we have really gained nothing yet, we have no definite attitude to the past, we do nothing but theorize or complain of depression or drink vodka. It is clear that to begin to live in the present we must first expiate our past, we must break with it; and we can expiate it only by suffering, by extraordinary unceasing labor. Understand that, Anya.

ANYA: The house we live in has long ceased to be our own, and I shall leave it, I give you my word.

TROFIMOV: If you have the house keys, fling them into the well and go away. Be free as the wind.

ANYA: [In ecstasy.] How beautifully you said that!

TROFIMOV: Believe me, Anya, believe me! I am not thirty yet, I am young, I am still a student, but I have gone through so much already! As soon as winter comes I am hungry, sick, careworn, poor as a beggar, and what ups and downs of fortune have I not known! And my soul was always, every minute, day and night, full of inexplicable forebodings. I have a foreboding of happiness, Anya. I see glimpses of it already.

ANYA: [Pensively.] The moon is rising.

[EPIHODOV is heard playing still the same mournful song on the guitar. The moon rises. Somewhere near the poplars VARYA is looking for ANYA and calling "Anya! where are you?"]

TROFIMOV: Yes, the moon is rising. [A pause.] Here is happiness—here it comes! It is coming nearer and nearer; already I can hear its footsteps. And if we never see it—if we may never know it—what does it matter? Others will see it after us.

VARYA'S VOICE: Anya! Where are you?

TROFIMOV: That Varya again! [Angrily.] It's revolting!

ANYA: Well, let's go down to the river. It's lovely there.

TROFIMOV: Yes, let's go. [They go.]

VARYA'S VOICE: Anya! Anya!

CURTAIN

9. Oh, it is awful! [. . .] fearful visions. Chekhov wrote this passage to replace one that official censors found objectionable: "To own human beings has affected every one of you—those who lived before and those who live now. Your mother, your uncle, and you don't notice that you are living off the labors of others—in fact, the very people you won't even let in the front door." This passage was restored following the 1917 revolution.

ACT III

A drawing-room divided by an arch from a larger drawing-room.¹ A chandelier burning. The Jewish orchestra, the same that was mentioned in Act II, is heard playing in the ante-room. It is evening. In the larger drawing-room they are dancing the grand chain. The voice of SEMYONOV-PISHTCHIK: “Promenade à une paire!”² Then enter the drawing-room in couples first PISHTCHIK and CHARLOTTA IVANOVNA, then TROFIMOV and LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA, thirdly ANYA with the POST-OFFICE CLERK, fourthly VARYA with the STATION MASTER, and other guests. VARYA is quietly weeping and wiping away her tears as she dances. In the last couple is DUNYASHA. They move across the drawing-room. PISHTCHIK shouts: “Grand rond, balancez!” and “Les Cavaliers à genou et remerciez vos dames.”

FIRS in a swallow-tail coat brings in seltzer water on a tray. PISHTCHIK and TROFIMOV enter the drawing-room.

PISHTCHIK: I am a full-blooded man; I have already had two strokes. Dancing’s hard work for me, but as they say, if you’re in the pack, you must bark with the rest. I’m as strong, I may say, as a horse. My parent, who would have his joke—may the Kingdom of Heaven be his!—used to say about our origin that the ancient stock of the Semyonov-Pishtchiks was derived from the very horse that Caligula made a member of the senate.³ [Sits down.] But I’ve no money, that’s where the mischief is. A hungry dog believes in nothing but meat. [Snores, but at once wakes up.] That’s like me . . . I can think of nothing but money.

TROFIMOV: There really is something horsey about your appearance.

PISHTCHIK: Well . . . a horse is a fine beast . . . a horse can be sold.

[There is the sound of billiards being played in an adjoining room. VARYA appears in the arch leading to the larger drawing-room.]

TROFIMOV: [Teasing.] Madame Lopahin! Madame Lopahin!

VARYA: [Angrily.] Mangy-looking gentleman!

TROFIMOV: Yes, I am a mangy-looking gentleman, and I’m proud of it!

VARYA: [Pondering bitterly.] Here we have hired musicians and nothing to pay them! [Goes out.]

TROFIMOV: [To PISHTCHIK.] If the energy you have wasted during your lifetime in trying to find the money to pay your interest had gone to something else, you might in the end have turned the world upside down.

PISHTCHIK: Nietzsche, the philosopher, a very great and celebrated man⁴ . . . of enormous intellect . . . says in his works, that one can make forged banknotes.

TROFIMOV: Why, have you read Nietzsche?

1. That is, ballroom.

2. In this French phrase and those quoted below, Semyonov-Pishtchik is calling out the moves in the “grand chain” dance: promenade (walk) to a couple; grand circle, step to the side (that is, balancez as in ballet); and gentlemen (knights), kneel and thank your ladies. (French was widely spoken as a second language among the upper classes in pre-Soviet Russia.)

3. Caligula (12–41 CE), Roman emperor known for tyrannical cruelty, is said to have gone insane and to have appointed his horse as a consul.

4. Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche (1844–1900), German philosopher who rejected what he termed the “slave morality” of Western bourgeois civilization.

PISHTCHIK: What next . . . Dashenka told me. . . . And now I am in such a position, I might just as well forge banknotes. The day after to-morrow I must pay 310 roubles⁵—130 I have procured. [Feels in his pockets, in alarm.] The money's gone! I have lost my money! [Through his tears.] Where's the money? [Gleefully.] Why, here it is behind the lining. . . . It has made me hot all over.

[Enter LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA and CHARLOTTA IVANOVNA.]

LYUBOV: [Hums the Lezginka.] Why is Leonid so long? What can he be doing in town? [To DUNYASHA.] Offer the musicians some tea.

TROFIMOV: The sale hasn't taken place, most likely.

LYUBOV: It's the wrong time to have the orchestra, and the wrong time to give a dance. Well, never mind. [Sits down and hums softly.]

CHARLOTTA: [Gives PISHTCHIK a pack of cards.] Here's a pack of cards. Think of any card you like.

PISHTCHIK: I've thought of one.

CHARLOTTA: Shuffle the pack now. That's right. Give it here, my dear Mr. Pishtchik. *Eins, zwei, drei*⁶—now look, it's in your breast pocket.

PISHTCHIK: [Taking a card out of his breast pocket.] The eight of spades! Perfectly right! [Wonderingly.] Fancy that now!

CHARLOTTA: [Holding pack of cards in her hands, to TROFIMOV.] Tell me quickly which is the top card.

TROFIMOV: Well, the queen of spades.

CHARLOTTA: It is! [To PISHTCHIK.] Well, which card is uppermost?

PISHTCHIK: The ace of hearts.

CHARLOTTA: It is! [Claps her hands, pack of cards disappears.] Ah! what lovely weather it is to-day!

[A mysterious feminine voice which seems coming out of the floor answers her. "Oh, yes, it's magnificent weather, madam."]

CHARLOTTA: You are my perfect ideal.

VOICE: And I greatly admire you too, madam.

STATION MASTER: [Applauding.] The lady ventriloquist—bravo!

PISHTCHIK: [Wonderingly.] Fancy that now! Most enchanting Charlotta Ivanovna. I'm simply in love with you.

CHARLOTTA: In love? [Shrugging shoulders.] What do you know of love, guter Mensch, aber schlechter Musikant.⁷

TROFIMOV: [Pats PISHTCHIK on the shoulder.] You dear old horse. . . .

CHARLOTTA: Attention, please! Another trick! [Takes a traveling rug from a chair.] Here's a very good rug; I want to sell it. [Shaking it out.] Doesn't anyone want to buy it?

PISHTCHIK: [Wonderingly.] Fancy that!

CHARLOTTA: Ein, zwei, drei! [Quickly picks up rug she has dropped; behind the rug stands ANYA; she makes a curtsey, runs to her mother, embraces her and runs back into the larger drawing-room amidst general enthusiasm.]

LYUBOV: [Applauds.] Bravo! Bravo!

5. The equivalent of over $6,000 in today's U.S. currency.

6. One, two, three (German). Charlotta speaks the language she associates with her childhood of performing at carnivals.

7. A good man, but a poor musician (German).

CHARLOTTA: Now again! Ein, zwei, drei! [Lifts up the rug; behind the rug stands VARYA, bowing.] PISHTCHIK: [Wonderingly.] Fancy that now!

CHARLOTTA: That's the end. [Throws the rug at PISHTCHIK, makes a curtsy, runs into the larger drawing-room.]

PISHTCHIK: [Hurries after her.] Mischievous creature! Fancy! [Goes out.]

LYUBOV: And still Leonid doesn't come. I can't understand what he's doing in the town so long! Why, everything must be over by now. The estate is sold, or the sale has not taken place. Why keep us so long in suspense?

VARYA: [Trying to console her.] Uncle's bought it. I feel sure of that.

TROFIMOV: [Ironically.] Oh, yes!

VARYA: Great-aunt sent him an authorization to buy it in her name, and transfer the debt. She's doing it for Anya's sake, and I'm sure God will be merciful. Uncle will buy it.

LYUBOV: My aunt in Yaroslavl sent fifteen thousand to buy the estate in her name, she doesn't trust us—but that's not enough even to pay the arrears. [Hides her face in her hands.] My fate is being sealed to-day, my fate. . . .

TROFIMOV: [Teasing VARYA.] Madame Lopahin.

VARYA: [Angrily.] Perpetual student! Twice already you've been sent down⁸ from the University.

LYUBOV: Why are you angry, Varya? He's teasing you about Lopahin. Well, what of that? Marry Lopahin if you like, he's a good man, and interesting; if you don't want to, don't! Nobody compels you, darling.

VARYA: I must tell you plainly, mamma, I look at the matter seriously; he's a good man, I like him.

LYUBOV: Well, marry him. I can't see what you're waiting for.

VARYA: Mamma. I can't make him an offer myself. For the last two years, everyone's been talking to me about him. Everyone talks; but he says nothing or else makes a joke. I see what it means. He's growing rich, he's absorbed in business, he has no thoughts for me. If I had money, were it ever so little, if I had only a hundred roubles, I'd throw everything up and go far away. I would go into a nunnery.

TROFIMOV: What bliss!

VARYA: [To TROFIMOV.] A student ought to have sense! [In a soft tone with tears.] How ugly you've grown, Petya! How old you look! [To LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA, no longer crying.] But I can't do without work, mamma; I must have something to do every minute.

[Enter YASHA.]

YASHA: [Hardly restraining his laughter.] Epihodov has broken a billiard cue! [Goes out.]

VARYA: What is Epihodov doing here? Who gave him leave to play billiards? I can't make these people out. [Goes out.]

LYUBOV: Don't tease her, Petya. You see she has grief enough without that.

TROFIMOV: She is so very officious, meddling in what's not her business. All the summer she's given Anya and me no peace. She's afraid of a love affair between us. What's it to do with her? Besides, I have given no grounds for it. Such triviality is not in my line. We are above love!

8. Expelled.

LYUBOV: And I suppose I am beneath love. [Very uneasily.] Why is it Leonid's not here? If only I could know whether the estate is sold or not! It seems such an incredible calamity that I really don't know what to think. I am distracted . . . I shall scream in a minute . . . I shall do something stupid. Save me, Petya, tell me something, talk to me!

TROFIMOV: What does it matter whether the estate is sold to-day or not? That's all done with long ago. There's no turning back, the path is overgrown. Don't worry yourself, dear Lyubov Andreyevna. You mustn't deceive yourself; for once in your life you must face the truth!

LYUBOV: What truth? You see where the truth lies, but I seem to have lost my sight, I see nothing. You settle every great problem so boldly, but tell me, my dear boy, isn't it because you're young—because you haven't yet understood one of your problems through suffering? You look forward boldly, and isn't it that you don't see and don't expect anything dreadful because life is still hidden from your young eyes? You're bolder, more honest, deeper than we are, but think, be just a little magnanimous, have pity on me. I was born here, you know, my father and mother lived here, my grandfather lived here, I love this house. I can't conceive of life without the cherry orchard, and if it really must be sold, then sell me with the orchard. [Embraces TROFIMOV, kisses him on the forehead.] My boy was drowned here. [Weeps.] Pity me, my dear kind fellow.

TROFIMOV: You know I feel for you with all my heart.

LYUBOV: But that should have been said differently, so differently. [Takes out her handkerchief, telegram falls on the floor.] My heart is so heavy to-day. It's so noisy here, my soul is quivering at every sound, I'm shuddering all over, but I can't go away; I'm afraid to be quiet and alone. Don't be hard on me, Petya . . . I love you as though you were one of ourselves. I would gladly let you marry Anya—I swear I would—only, my dear boy, you must take your degree, you do nothing—you're simply tossed by fate from place to place. That's so strange. It is, isn't it? And you must do something with your beard to make it grow somehow. [Laughs.] You look so funny!

TROFIMOV: [Picks up the telegram.] I've no wish to be a beauty.

LYUBOV: That's a telegram from Paris. I get one every day. One yesterday and one to-day. That savage creature is ill again, he's in trouble again. He begs forgiveness, beseeches me to go, and really I ought to go to Paris to see him. You look shocked, Petya. What am I to do, my dear boy, what am I to do? He is ill, he is alone and unhappy, and who'll look after him, who'll keep him from doing the wrong thing, who'll give him his medicine at the right time? And why hide it or be silent? I love him, that's clear. I love him! I love him! He's a millstone about my neck, I'm going to the bottom with him, but I love that stone and can't live without it. [Presses TROFIMOV's hand.] Don't think ill of me, Petya, don't tell me anything, don't tell me. . . .

TROFIMOV: [Through his tears] For God's sake forgive my frankness: why, he robbed you!

LYUBOV: No! No! No! You mustn't speak like that. [Covers her ears.]

TROFIMOV: He is a wretch! You're the only person that doesn't know it! He's a worthless creature! A despicable wretch!

LYUBOV: [Getting angry, but speaking with restraint.] You're twenty-six or twenty-seven years old, but you're still a schoolboy.

TROFIMOV: Possibly.

LYUBOV: You should be a man at your age! You should understand what love means! And you ought to be in love yourself. You ought to fall in love! [Angrily.]

Yes, yes, and it's not purity in you, you're simply a prude, a comic fool, a freak.

TROFIMOV: [In horror.] The things she's saying!

LYUBOV: I am above love! You're not above love, but simply as our Firs here says, "You are a good-for-nothing." At your age not to have a mistress!

TROFIMOV: [In horror.] This is awful! The things she is saying! [Goes rapidly into the larger drawing-room clutching his head.] This is awful! I can't stand it! I'm going. [Goes off, but at once returns.] All is over between us! [Goes off into the ante-room.]

LYUBOV: [Shouts after him.] Petya! Wait a minute! You funny creature! I was joking! Petya! [There is a sound of somebody running quickly downstairs and suddenly falling with a crash. ANYA and VARYA scream, but there is a sound of laughter at once.]

LYUBOV: What has happened?

[ANYA runs in.]

ANYA: [Laughing.] Petya's fallen downstairs! [Runs out.]

LYUBOV: What a queer fellow that Petya is!

[The STATION MASTER stands in the middle of the larger room and reads The Magdalene, by Alexey Tolstoy.⁹ They listen to him, but before he has recited many lines strains of a waltz are heard from the ante-room and the reading is broken off. All dance. TROFIMOV, ANYA, VARYA and LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA come in from the ante-room.]

LYUBOV: Come, Petya—come, pure heart! I beg your pardon. Let's have a dance! [Dances with PETYA.]

[ANYA and VARYA dance. FIRS comes in, puts his stick down near the side door. YASHA also comes into the drawing-room and looks on at the dancing.]

YASHA: What is it, old man?

FIRS: I don't feel well. In old days we used to have generals, barons, and admirals dancing at our balls, and now we send for the post-office clerk and the station master and even they're not overanxious to come. I am getting feeble. The old master, the grandfather, used to give sealing-wax for all complaints. I have been taking sealing-wax for twenty years or more. Perhaps that's what's kept me alive.

YASHA: You bore me, old man! [Yawns.] It's time you were done with.

FIRS: Ach, you're a good-for-nothing! [Mutters.]

[TROFIMOV and LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA dance in larger room and then on to the stage.]

LYUBOV: Merci. I'll sit down a little. [Sits down.] I'm tired.

9. Poem sometimes translated as "The Sinful Woman," by Alexsey Tolstoy (1817–75), a distant cousin of novelist Leo Tolstoy.

[Enter ANYA.]

ANYA: [Excitedly.] There's a man in the kitchen has been saying that the cherry orchard's been sold to-day.

LYUBOV: Sold to whom?

ANYA: He didn't say to whom. He's gone away.

[She dances with TROFIMOV, and they go off into the larger room.]

YASHA: There was an old man gossiping there, a stranger.

FIRS: Leonid Andreyevitch isn't here yet, he hasn't come back. He has his light overcoat on, demi-saison,¹ he'll catch cold for sure. Ach! Foolish young things!

LYUBOV: I feel as though I should die. Go, Yasha, find out to whom it has been sold.

YASHA: But he went away long ago, the old chap. [Laughs.]

LYUBOV: [With slight vexation.] What are you laughing at? What are you pleased at?

YASHA: Epikhodov is so funny. He's a silly fellow, two and twenty misfortunes.

LYUBOV: Firs, if the estate is sold, where will you go?

FIRS: Where you bid me, there I'll go.

LYUBOV: Why do you look like that? Are you ill? You ought to be in bed.

FIRS: Yes. [Ironically.] Me go to bed and who's to wait here? Who's to see to things without me? I'm the only one in all the house.

YASHA: [To LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA.] Lyubov Andreyevna, permit me to make a request of you; if you go back to Paris again, be so kind as to take me with you. It's positively impossible for me to stay here. [Looking about him; in an undertone.] There's no need to say it, you see for yourself—an uncivilized country, the people have no morals, and then the dullness! The food in the kitchen's abominable, and then Firs runs after one muttering all sorts of unsuitable words. Take me with you, please do!

[Enter PISHTCHIK.]

PISHTCHIK: Allow me to ask you for a waltz, my dear lady. [LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA goes with him.] Enchanting lady, I really must borrow of you just 180 roubles,² [Dances.] only 180 roubles. [They pass into the larger room.]

[In the larger drawing-room, a figure in a gray top hat and in check trousers is gesticulating and jumping about. Shouts of "Bravo, Charlotta Ivanovna."]

DUNYASHA: [She has stopped to powder herself.] My young lady tells me to dance.

There are plenty of gentlemen, and too few ladies, but dancing makes me giddy and makes my heart beat. Firs, the post-office clerk said something to me just now that quite took my breath away.

[Music becomes more subdued.]

FIRS: What did he say to you?

DUNYASHA: He said I was like a flower.

YASHA: [Yawns.] What ignorance! [Goes out.]

DUNYASHA: Like a flower. I am a girl of such delicate feelings, I am awfully fond of soft speeches.

1. Literally, "half-season" (French). 2. Roughly $4,000 in today's U.S. currency.

FIRS: Your head's being turned.

[Enter EPIHODOV.]

EPIHODOV: You have no desire to see me, Dunyasha. I might be an insect. [Sighs.] Ah! life!

DUNYASHA: What is it you want?

EPIHODOV: Undoubtedly you may be right. [Sighs.] But, of course, if one looks at it from that point of view, if I may so express myself, you have, excuse my plain speaking, reduced me to a complete state of mind. I know my destiny. Every day some misfortune befalls me and I have long ago grown accustomed to it, so that I look upon my fate with a smile. You gave me your word, and though I—

DUNYASHA: Let us have a talk later, I entreat you, but now leave me in peace, for I am lost in reverie. [Plays with her fan.]

EPIHODOV: I have a misfortune every day, and if I may venture to express myself, I merely smile at it, I even laugh.

[VARYA enters from the larger drawing-room.]

VARYA: You still have not gone, Epikhodov. What a disrespectful creature you are, really! [To DUNYASHA.] Go along, Dunyasha! [To EPIHODOV.] First you play billiards and break the cue, then you go wandering about the drawing-room like a visitor!

EPIHODOV: You really cannot, if I may so express myself, call me to account like this.

VARYA: I'm not calling you to account, I'm speaking to you. You do nothing but wander from place to place and don't do your work. We keep you as a counting-house clerk, but what use you are I can't say.

EPIHODOV: [Offended.] Whether I work or whether I walk, whether I eat or whether I play billiards, is a matter to be judged by persons of understanding and my elders.

VARYA: You dare to tell me that! [Firing up.] You dare! You mean to say I've no understanding. Begone from here! This minute!

EPIHODOV: [Intimidated.] I beg you to express yourself with delicacy.

VARYA: [Beside herself with anger.] This moment! get out! away! [He goes towards the door, she following him.] Two and twenty misfortunes! Take yourself off! Don't let me set eyes on you! [EPIHODOV has gone out, behind the door his voice, "I shall lodge a complaint against you."] What! You're coming back? [Snatches up the stick FIRS has put down near the door.] Come! Come! Come! I'll show you! What! you're coming? Then take that! [She swings the stick, at the very moment that LOPAHIN comes in.]

LOPAHIN: Very much obliged to you!

VARYA: [Angrily and ironically.] I beg your pardon!

LOPAHIN: Not at all! I humbly thank you for your kind reception!

VARYA: No need of thanks for it. [Moves away, then looks round and asks softly.] I haven't hurt you?

LOPAHIN: Oh, no! Not at all! There's an immense bump coming up, though!

VOICES FROM LARGER ROOM: Lopahin has come! Yermolay Alexeyevitch!

PISHTCHIK: What do I see and hear? [Kisses LOPAHIN.] There's a whiff of cognac about you, my dear soul, and we're making merry here too!

[Enter LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA.]

LYUBOV: Is it you, Yermolay Alexeyevitch? Why have you been so long? Where's Leonid?

LOPAHIN: Leonid Andreyevitch arrived with me. He is coming.

LYUBOV: [In agitation.] Well! Well! Was there a sale? Speak!

LOPAHIN: [Embarrassed, afraid of betraying his joy.] The sale was over at four o'clock. We missed our train—had to wait till half-past nine. [Sighing heavily.] Ugh! I feel a little giddy.

[Enter GAEV. In his right hand he has purchases, with his left hand he is wiping away his tears.]

LYUBOV: Well, Leonid? What news? [Impatiently, with tears.] Make haste, for God's sake!

GAEV: [Makes her no answer, simply waves his hand. To FIRS, weeping.] Here, take them; there's anchovies, Kertch herrings. I have eaten nothing all day. What I have been through! [Door into the billiard room is open. There is heard a knocking of balls and the voice of YASHA saying "Eighty-seven." GAEV's expression changes, he leaves off weeping.] I am fearfully tired. Firs, come and help me change my things. [Goes to his own room across the larger drawing-room.]

PISHTCHIK: How about the sale? Tell us, do!

LYUBOV: Is the cherry orchard sold?

LOPAHIN: It is sold.

LYUBOV: Who has bought it?

LOPAHIN: I have bought it. [A pause. LYUBOV is crushed; she would fall down if she were not standing near a chair and table.]

[VARYA takes keys from her waistband, flings them on the floor in middle of drawing-room and goes out.]

LOPAHIN: I have bought it! Wait a bit, ladies and gentlemen, pray. My head's a bit muddled, I can't speak. [Laughs.] We came to the auction. Deriganov was there already. Leonid Andreyevitch only had 15,000 and Deriganov bid 30,000, besides the arrears, straight off. I saw how the land lay. I bid against him. I bid 40,000, he bid 45,000, I said 55, and so he went on, adding 5 thousands and I adding 10. Well . . . So it ended. I bid 90, and it was knocked down to me.³ Now the cherry orchard's mine! Mine! [Chuckles.] My God, the cherry orchard's mine! Tell me that I'm drunk, that I'm out of my mind, that it's all a dream. [Stamps with his feet.] Don't laugh at me! If my father and my grandfather could rise from their graves and see all that has happened! How their Yermolay, ignorant, beaten Yermolay, who used to run about barefoot in winter, how that very Yermolay has bought the finest estate in the world! I have bought the estate where my father and grandfather were slaves, where they weren't even admitted into the kitchen. I am asleep, I am dreaming! It is all fancy, it is the work of your imagination plunged in the darkness of ignorance. [Picks up keys, smiling fondly.] She threw away the keys; she means to show she's not the housewife now. [Jingles the keys.] Well, no matter. [The orchestra

3. Lopahin's winning bid for the estate was 90,000 roubles, nearly $2 million in today's U.S. currency—about twice what Lopahin had offered to lend Lyubov and her family to save the estate (act 1).

is heard tuning up.] Hey, musicians! Play! I want to hear you. Come, all of you, and look how Yermolay Lopahin will take the ax to the cherry orchard, how the trees will fall to the ground! We will build houses on it and our grandsons and great-grandsons will see a new life springing up there. Music! Play up!

[Music begins to play. LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA has sunk into a chair and is weeping bitterly.]

LOPAHIN: [Reproachfully.] Why, why didn't you listen to me? My poor friend! Dear lady, there's no turning back now. [With tears.] Oh, if all this could be over, oh, if our miserable disjointed life could somehow soon be changed!

PISHTCHIK: [Takes him by the arm, in an undertone.] She's weeping, let us go and leave her alone. Come. [Takes him by the arm and leads him into the larger drawing-room.]

LOPAHIN: What's that? Musicians, play up! All must be as I wish it. [With irony.] Here comes the new master, the owner of the cherry orchard! [Accidentally tips over a little table, almost upsetting the candelabra.] I can pay for everything! [Goes out with PISHTCHIK. No one remains on the stage or in the larger drawing-room except LYUBOV, who sits huddled up, weeping bitterly. The music plays softly. ANYA and TROFIMOV come in quickly. ANYA goes up to her mother and falls on her knees before her. TROFIMOV stands at the entrance to the larger drawing-room.]

ANYA: Mamma! Mamma, you're crying, dear, kind, good mamma! My precious! I love you! I bless you! The cherry orchard is sold, it is gone, that's true, that's true! But don't weep, mamma! Life is still before you, you have still your good, pure heart! Let us go, let us go, darling, away from here! We will make a new garden, more splendid than this one; you will see it, you will understand. And joy, quiet, deep joy, will sink into your soul like the sun at evening! And you will smile, mamma! Come, darling, let us go!

ACT IV

SCENE: Same as in First Act. There are neither curtains on the windows nor pictures on the walls: only a little furniture remains piled up in a corner as if for sale. There is a sense of desolation; near the outer door and in the background of the scene are packed trunks, traveling bags, etc. On the left the door is open, and from here the voices of VARYA and ANYA are audible. LOPAHIN is standing waiting. YASHA is holding a tray with glasses full of champagne. In front of the stage EPIHODOV is tying up a box. In the background behind the scene a hum of talk from the peasants who have come to say good-bye. The voice of GAEV: "Thanks, brothers, thanks!"

YASHA: The peasants have come to say good-bye. In my opinion, Yermolay Alexeyevitch, the peasants are good-natured, but they don't know much about things.

[The hum of talk dies away. Enter across front of stage LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA and GAEV. She is not weeping, but is pale; her face is quivering—she cannot speak.]

GAEV: You gave them your purse, Lyuba. That won't do—that won't do!

LYUBOV: I couldn't help it! I couldn't help it!

[Both go out.]

LOPAHIN: [In the doorway, calls after them.] You will take a glass at parting? Please do. I didn't think to bring any from the town, and at the station I could only get one bottle. Please take a glass. [A pause.] What? You don't care for any? [Comes away from the door.] If I'd known, I wouldn't have bought it. Well, and I'm not going to drink it. [YASHA carefully sets the tray down on a chair.] You have a glass, Yasha, anyway.

YASHA: Good luck to the travelers, and luck to those that stay behind! [Drinks.] This champagne isn't the real thing, I can assure you.

LOPAHIN: It cost eight roubles the bottle. [A pause.] It's devilish cold here.

YASHA: They haven't heated the stove today—it's all the same since we're going. [Laughs.]

LOPAHIN: What are you laughing for?

YASHA: For pleasure.

LOPAHIN: Though it's October, it's as still and sunny as though it were summer. It's just right for building! [Looks at his watch; says in doorway.] Take note, ladies and gentlemen, the train goes in forty-seven minutes; so you ought to start for the station in twenty minutes. You must hurry up!

[TROFIMOV comes in from out of doors wearing a great-coat.]

TROFIMOV: I think it must be time to start, the horses are ready. The devil only knows what's become of my goloshes; they're lost. [In the doorway.] Anya! My goloshes aren't here. I can't find them.

LOPAHIN: And I'm getting off to Harkov. I am going in the same train with you. I'm spending all the winter at Harkov. I've been wasting all my time gossiping with you and fretting with no work to do. I can't get on without work. I don't know what to do with my hands, they flap about so queerly, as if they didn't belong to me.

TROFIMOV: Well, we're just going away, and you will take up your profitable labors again.

LOPAHIN: Do take a glass.

TROFIMOV: No, thanks.

LOPAHIN: Then you're going to Moscow now?

TROFIMOV: Yes. I shall see them as far as the town, and to-morrow I shall go on to Moscow.

LOPAHIN: Yes, I daresay, the professors aren't giving any lectures, they're waiting for your arrival.

TROFIMOV: That's not your business.

LOPAHIN: How many years have you been at the University?

TROFIMOV: Do think of something newer than that—that's stale and flat. [Hunts for goloshes.] You know we shall most likely never see each other again, so let me give you one piece of advice at parting: don't wave your arms about—get out of the habit. And another thing, building villas, reckoning up that the summer visitors will in time become independent farmers—reckoning like that, that's not the thing to do either. After all, I am fond of you: you have fine delicate fingers like an artist, you've a fine delicate soul.

LOPAHIN: [Embraces him.] Good-bye, my dear fellow. Thanks for everything.

Let me give you money for the journey, if you need it.

TROFIMOV: What for? I don't need it.

LOPAHIN: Why, you haven't got a half-penny.

TROFIMOV: Yes, I have, thank you. I got some money for a translation. Here it is in my pocket, [Anxiously.] but where can my goloshes be!

VARYA: [From the next room.] Take the nasty things! [Flings a pair of goloshes on to the stage.]

TROFIMOV: Why are you so cross, Varya? h'm! . . . but those aren't my goloshes.

LOPAHIN: I sowed three thousand acres with poppies in the spring, and now I have cleared forty thousand profit.⁴ And when my poppies were in flower, wasn't it a picture! So here, as I say, I made forty thousand, and I'm offering you a loan because I can afford to. Why turn up your nose? I am a peasant—I speak bluntly.

TROFIMOV: Your father was a peasant, mine was a chemist⁵—and that proves absolutely nothing whatever. [LOPAHIN takes out his pocket-book.] Stop that—stop that. If you were to offer me two hundred thousand I wouldn't take it. I am an independent man, and everything that all of you, rich and poor alike, prize so highly and hold so dear, hasn't the slightest power over me—it's like so much fluff fluttering in the air. I can get on without you. I can pass by you. I am strong and proud. Humanity is advancing towards the highest truth, the highest happiness, which is possible on earth, and I am in the front ranks.

LOPAHIN: Will you get there?

TROFIMOV: I shall get there. [A pause.] I shall get there, or I shall show others the way to get there.

[In the distance is heard the stroke of an ax on a tree.]

LOPAHIN: Good-bye, my dear fellow; it's time to be off. We turn up our noses at one another, but life is passing all the while. When I am working hard without resting, then my mind is more at ease, and it seems to me as though I too know what I exist for; but how many people there are in Russia, my dear boy, who exist, one doesn't know what for. Well, it doesn't matter. That's not what keeps things spinning. They tell me Leonid Andreyevitch has taken a situation. He is going to be a clerk at the bank—6,000 roubles a year.⁶ Only, of course, he won't stick to it—he's too lazy.

ANYA: [In the doorway.] Mamma begs you not to let them chop down the orchard until she's gone.

TROFIMOV: Yes, really, you might have the tact. [Walks out across the front of the stage.]

LOPAHIN: I'll see to it! I'll see to it! Stupid fellows! [Goes out after him.]

ANYA: Has Firs been taken to the hospital?

4. That is, a profit equivalent to well over $800,000 in today's U.S. currency. 5. Pharmacist.

6. Salary equivalent to over $120,000 in today's U.S. currency.

YASHA: I told them this morning. No doubt they have taken him.

ANYA: [To EPIHODOV, who passes across the drawing-room.] Semyon Pantaleyevitch, inquire, please, if Firs has been taken to the hospital.

YASHA: [In a tone of offence.] I told Yegor this morning—why ask a dozen times?

EPIHODOV: Firs is advanced in years. It's my conclusive opinion no treatment would do him good; it's time he was gathered to his fathers. And I can only envy him. [Puts a trunk down on a cardboard hat-box and crushes it.] There, now, of course—I knew it would be so.

YASHA: [Jeeringly.] Two and twenty misfortunes!

VARYA: [Through the door.] Has Firs been taken to the hospital?

ANYA: Yes.

VARYA: Why wasn't the note for the doctor taken too?

ANYA: Oh, then, we must send it after them. [Goes out.]

VARYA: [From the adjoining room.] Where's Yasha? Tell him his mother's come to say good-bye to him.

YASHA: [Waves his hand.] They put me out of all patience! [DUNYASHA has all this time been busy about the luggage. Now, when YASHA is left alone, she goes up to him.]

DUNYASHA: You might just give me one look, Yasha. You're going away. You're leaving me. [Weeps and throws herself on his neck.]

YASHA: What are you crying for? [Drinks the champagne.] In six days I shall be in Paris again. To-morrow we shall get into the express train and roll away in a flash. I can scarcely believe it! Vive la France! It doesn't suit me here—it's not the life for me; there's no doing anything. I have seen enough of the ignorance here. I have had enough of it. [Drinks champagne.] What are you crying for? Behave yourself properly, and then you won't cry.

DUNYASHA: [Powders her face, looking in a pocket-mirror.] Do send me a letter from Paris. You know how I loved you, Yasha—how I loved you! I am a tender creature, Yasha.

YASHA: Here they are coming!

[Busies himself about the trunks, humming softly. Enter LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA, GAEV, ANYA and CHARLOTTA IVANOVNA.]

GAEV: We ought to be off. There's not much time now. [Looking at YASHA.] What a smell of herrings!

LYUBOV: In ten minutes we must get into the carriage. [Casts a look about the room.] Farewell, dear house, dear old home of our fathers! Winter will pass and spring will come, and then you will be no more; they will tear you down! How much those walls have seen! [Kisses her daughter passionately.] My treasure, how bright you look! Your eyes are sparkling like diamonds! Are you glad? Very glad?

ANYA: Very glad! A new life is beginning, mamma.

GAEV: Yes, really, everything is all right now. Before the cherry orchard was sold, we were all worried and wretched, but afterwards, when once the question was settled conclusively, irrevocably, we all felt calm and even cheerful. I am a bank clerk now—I am a financier—cannon off the red. And you, Lyuba, after all, you are looking better; there's no question of that.

LYUBOV: Yes. My nerves are better, that's true. [Her hat and coat are handed to her.] I'm sleeping well. Carry out my things, Yasha. It's time. [To ANYA.] My darling, we shall soon see each other again. I am going to Paris. I can live there on the money your Yaroslavl auntie sent us to buy the estate with—hurrah for auntie—but that money won't last long.

ANYA: You'll come back soon, mamma, won't you? I'll be working up for my examination in the high school, and when I have passed that, I shall set to work and be a help to you. We will read all sorts of things together, mamma, won't we? [Kisses her mother's hands.] We will read in the autumn evenings. We'll read lots of books, and a new wonderful world will open out before us. [Dreamily.] Mamma, come soon.

LYUBOV: I shall come, my precious treasure. [Embraces her.]

[Enter LOPAHIN. CHARLOTTA softly hums a song.]

GAEV: Charlotta's happy; she's singing!

CHARLOTTA: [Picks up a bundle like a swaddled baby.] Bye, bye, my baby. [A baby is heard crying: "Ooah! ooah!"] Hush, hush, my pretty boy! [Ooah! ooah!] Poor little thing! [Throws the bundle back.] You must please find me a situation. I can't go on like this.

LOPAHIN: We'll find you one, Charlotta Ivanovna. Don't you worry yourself.

GAEV: Everyone's leaving us. Varya's going away. We have become of no use all at once.

CHARLOTTA: There's nowhere for me to be in the town. I must go away. [Hums.] What care I . . .

[Enter PISHTCHIK.]

LOPAHIN: The freak of nature!

PISHTCHIK: [Gasping.] Oh! . . . let me get my breath. . . . I'm worn out . . . my most honored . . . Give me some water.

GAEV: Want some money, I suppose? Your humble servant! I'll go out of the way of temptation. [Goes out.]

PISHTCHIK: It's a long while since I have been to see you . . . dearest lady. [To LOPAHIN.] You are here . . . glad to see you . . . a man of immense intellect . . . take . . . here. [Gives LOPAHIN.] 400 roubles.⁷ That leaves me owing 840.

LOPAHIN: [Shrugging his shoulders in amazement.] It's like a dream. Where did you get it?

PISHTCHIK: Wait a bit . . . I'm hot . . . a most extraordinary occurrence! Some Englishmen came along and found in my land some sort of white clay. [To LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA.] And 400 for you . . . most lovely . . . wonderful. [Gives money.] The rest later. [Sips water.] A young man in the train was telling me just now that a great philosopher advises jumping off a house-top. "Jump!" says he; "the whole gist of the problem lies in that." [Wonderingly.] Fancy that, now! Water, please!

LOPAHIN: What Englishmen?

PISHTCHIK: I have made over to them the rights to dig the clay for twenty-four years . . . and now, excuse me . . . I can't stay . . . I must be trotting on. I'm going to Znoikovo . . . to Kardamanovo. . . I'm in debt all round. [Sips.] . . .

7. Over $8,500 in today's U.S. currency.

To your very good health! . . . I'll come in on Thursday.

LYUBOV: We are just off to the town, and to-morrow I start for abroad.

PISHTCHIK: What! [In agitation.] Why to the town? Oh, I see the furniture . . . the boxes. No matter . . . [Through his tears.] . . . no matter . . . men of enormous intellect . . . these Englishmen. . . Never mind . . . be happy. God will succor you . . . no matter . . . everything in this world must have an end. [Kisses LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA'S hand.] If the rumor reaches you that my end has come, think of this . . . old horse, and say: "There once was such a man in the world . . . Semyonov-Pishtchik . . . the Kingdom of Heaven be his!" . . . most extraordinary weather . . . yes. [Goes out in violent agitation, but at once returns and says in the doorway.] Dashenka wishes to be remembered to you. [Goes out.]

LYUBOV: Now we can start. I leave with two cares in my heart. The first is leaving Firs ill. [Looking at her watch.] We have still five minutes.

ANYA: Mamma, Firs has been taken to the hospital. Yasha sent him off this morning.

LYUBOV: My other anxiety is Varya. She is used to getting up early and working; and now, without work, she's like a fish out of water. She is thin and pale, and she's crying, poor dear! [A pause.] You are well aware, Yermolay Alexeyevitch, I dreamed of marrying her to you, and everything seemed to show that you would get married. [Whispers to ANYA and motions to CHARLOTTA and both go out.] She loves you—she suits you. And I don't know—I don't know why it is you seem, as it were, to avoid each other. I can't understand it!

LOPAHIN: I don't understand it myself, I confess. It's queer somehow, altogether. If there's still time, I'm ready now at once. Let's settle it straight off, and go ahead; but without you, I feel I shan't make her an offer.

LYUBOV: That's excellent. Why, a single moment's all that's necessary. I'll call her at once.

LOPAHIN: And there's champagne all ready too. [Looking into the glasses.] Empty! Someone's emptied them already. [YASHA coughs.] I call that greedy.

LYUBOV: [Eagerly.] Capital! We will go out. Yasha, *allez!*⁸ I'll call her in. [At the door.] Varya, leave all that; come here. Come along! [Goes out with YASHA.]

LOPAHIN: [Looking at his watch.] Yes.

[A pause. Behind the door, smothered laughter and whispering, and, at last, enter VARYA.]

VARYA: [Looking a long while over the things.] It is strange, I can't find it anywhere.

LOPAHIN: What are you looking for?

VARYA: I packed it myself, and I can't remember. [A pause.]

LOPAHIN: Where are you going now, Varvara Mihailova?

VARYA: I? To the Ragulins. I have arranged to go to them to look after the house—as a housekeeper.

LOPAHIN: That's in Yashnovo? It'll be seventy miles away. [A pause.] So this is the end of life in this house!

8. Go! (French).

VARYA: [Looking among the things.] Where is it? Perhaps I put it in the trunk.

Yes, life in this house is over—there will be no more of it.

LOPAHIN: And I'm just off to Harkov—by this next train. I've a lot of business there. I'm leaving Epihodov here, and I've taken him on.

VARYA: Really!

LOPAHIN: This time last year we had snow already, if you remember; but now it's so fine and sunny. Though it's cold, to be sure—three degrees of frost.

VARYA: I haven't looked. [A pause.] And besides, our thermometer's broken. [A pause.]

[Voice at the door from the yard: "Yermolay Alexeyevitch!"]

LOPAHIN: [As though he had long been expecting this summons.] This minute!

[LOPAHIN goes out quickly. VARYA sitting on the floor and laying her head on a bag full of clothes, sobs quietly. The door opens. LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA comes in cautiously.]

LYUBOV: Well? [A pause.] We must be going.

VARYA: [Has wiped her eyes and is no longer crying.] Yes, mamma, it's time to start. I shall have time to get to the Ragulins to-day, if only you're not late for the train.

LYUBOV: [In the doorway.] Anya, put your things on.

[Enter ANYA, then GAEV and CHARLOTTA IVANOVNA. GAEV has on a warm coat with a hood. Servants and cabmen come in. EPIHODOV bustles about the luggage.]

LYUBOV: Now we can start on our travels.

ANYA: [Joyfully.] On our travels!

GAEV: My friends—my dear, my precious friends! Leaving this house for ever, can I be silent? Can I refrain from giving utterance at leave-taking to those emotions which now flood all my being?

ANYA: [Supplicatingly.] Uncle!

VARYA: Uncle, you mustn't!

GAEV: [Dejectedly.] Cannon and into the pocket . . . I'll be quiet. . . .

[Enter TROFIMOV and afterwards LOPAHIN.]

TROFIMOV: Well, ladies and gentlemen, we must start.

LOPAHIN: Epihodov, my coat!

LYUBOV: I'll stay just one minute. It seems as though I have never seen before what the walls, what the ceilings in this house were like, and now I look at them with greediness, with such tender love.

GAEV: I remember when I was six years old sitting in that window on Trinity Day watching my father going to church.

LYUBOV: Have all the things been taken?

LOPAHIN: I think all. [Putting on overcoat, to EPIHODOV.] You, Epihodov, mind you see everything is right.

EPIHODOV: [In a husky voice.] Don't you trouble, Yermolay Alexeyevitch.

LOPAHIN: Why, what's wrong with your voice?

EPIHODOV: I've just had a drink of water, and I choked over something.

YASHA: [Contemptuously.] The ignorance!

LYUBOV: We are going—and not a soul will be left here.

LOPAHIN: Not till the spring.

VARYA: [Pulls a parasol out of a bundle, as though about to hit someone with it.

LOPAHIN makes a gesture as though alarmed.] What is it? I didn't mean anything.

TROFIMOV: Ladies and gentlemen, let us get into the carriage. It's time. The train will be in directly.

VARYA: Petya, here they are, your goloshes, by that box. [With tears.] And what dirty old things they are!

TROFIMOV: [Putting on his goloshes.] Let us go, friends!

GAEV: [Greatly agitated, afraid of weeping.] The train—the station! Double baulk, ah!

LYUBOV: Let us go!

LOPAHIN: Are we all here? [Locks the side-door on left.] The things are all here. We must lock up. Let us go!

ANYA: Good-bye, home! Good-bye to the old life!

TROFIMOV: Welcome to the new life!

[TROFIMOV goes out with ANYA. VARYA looks round the room and goes out slowly. YASHA and CHARLOTTA IVANOVNA, with her dog, go out.]

LOPAHIN: Till the spring, then! Come, friends, till we meet! [Goes out.]

[LYUBOV ANDREYEVNA and GAEV remain alone. As though they had been waiting for this, they throw themselves on each other's necks, and break into subdued smothered sobbing, afraid of being overheard.]

GAEV: [In despair.] Sister, my sister!

LYUBOV: Oh, my orchard!—my sweet, beautiful orchard! My life, my youth, my happiness, good-bye! good-bye!

VOICE OF ANYA: [Calling gaily.] Mamma!

VOICE OF TROFIMOV: [Gaily, excitedly.] Aa—oo!

LYUBOV: One last look at the walls, at the windows. My dear mother loved to walk about this room.

GAEV: Sister, sister!

VOICE OF ANYA: Mamma!

VOICE OF TROFIMOV: Aa—oo!

LYUBOV: We are coming. [They go out.]

[The stage is empty. There is the sound of the doors being locked up, then of the carriages driving away. There is silence. In the stillness there is the dull stroke of an ax in a tree, clanging with a mournful lonely sound. Footsteps are heard. FIRS appears in the doorway on the right. He is dressed as always—in a pea-jacket and white waistcoat, with slippers on his feet. He is ill.]

FIRS: [Goes up to the doors, and tries the handles.] Locked! They have gone . . . [Sits down on sofa.] They have forgotten me. . . . Never mind . . . I'll sit here a bit. . . . I'll be bound Leonid Andreyevitch hasn't put his fur coat on and has gone off in his thin overcoat. [Sighs anxiously.] I didn't see after him. . . . These young people . . . [Mutters something that can't be distinguished.] Life has slipped by as though I hadn't lived. [Lies down.] I'll lie down a bit. . . . There's no strength in you, nothing left you—all gone! Ech! I'm good for nothing. [Lies motionless.]

[A sound is heard that seems to come from the sky, like a breaking harp-string, dying away mournfully. All is still again, and there is heard nothing but the strokes of the ax far away in the orchard.]

HENRIK IBSEN

(1828–1906)

A Doll House¹

Born in Skien, Norway, Henrik Ibsen was apprenticed to an apothecary until 1850, when he left for Oslo and published his first play, Catilina, a verse tragedy. By 1857 Ibsen was director of Oslo's Norwegian Theater, but his early plays, such as Love's Comedy (1862), were poorly received. Disgusted with what he saw as Norway's backwardness, Ibsen left in 1864 for Rome, where he wrote two more verse plays, Brand (1866) and Peer Gynt (1867), before turning to the realistic style and harsh criticism of traditional social mores for which he is best known. The League of Youth (1869), Pillars of Society (1877), A Doll House (1879), Ghosts (1881), An Enemy of the People (1882), The Wild Duck (1884), and Hedda Gabler (1890) won him a reputation throughout Europe as a controversial and outspoken advocate of moral and social reform. Near the end of his life, Ibsen explored the human condition in the explicitly symbolic terms of The Master Builder (1892) and When We Dead Awaken (1899). Ibsen's works had enormous influence on twentieth-century drama.

A DELIVERY BOY

The action takes place in HELMER's residence.

1. Translated by Rolf Fjelde.

ACT I

A comfortable room, tastefully but not expensively furnished. A door to the right in the back wall leads to the entryway; another to the left leads to HELMER'S study. Between these doors, a piano. Midway in the left-hand wall a door, and further back a window. Near the window a round table with an armchair and a small sofa. In the right-hand wall, toward the rear, a door, and nearer the foreground a porcelain stove with two armchairs and a rocking chair beside it. Between the stove and the side door, a small table. Engravings on the walls. An etagère with china figures and other small art objects; a small bookcase with richly bound books; the floor carpeted; a fire burning in the stove. It is a winter day.

A bell rings in the entryway; shortly after we hear the door being unlocked. NORA comes into the room, humming happily to herself; she is wearing street clothes and carries an armload of packages, which she puts down on the table to the right. She has left the hall door open; and through it a DELIVERY BOY is seen, holding a Christmas tree and a basket, which he gives to the MAID who let them in.

NORA: Hide the tree well, Helene. The children mustn't get a glimpse of it till this evening, after it's trimmed. [To the DELIVERY BOY, taking out her purse.] How much?

DELIVERY BOY: Fifty, ma'am.

NORA: There's a crown. No, keep the change. [The BOY thanks her and leaves. NORA shuts the door. She laughs softly to herself while taking off her street things. Drawing a bag of macaroons from her pocket, she eats a couple, then steals over and listens at her husband's study door.] Yes, he's home. [Hums again as she moves to the table right.]

HELMER: [From the study.] Is that my little lark twittering out there?

NORA: [Busy opening some packages.] Yes, it is.

HELMER: Is that my squirrel rummaging around?

NORA: Yes!

HELMER: When did my squirrel get in?

NORA: Just now. [Putting the macaroon bag in her pocket and wiping her mouth.] Do come in, Torvald, and see what I've bought.

HELMER: Can't be disturbed. [After a moment he opens the door and peers in, pen in hand.] Bought, you say? All that there? Has the little spendthrift been out throwing money around again?

NORA: Oh, but Torvald, this year we really should let ourselves go a bit. It's the first Christmas we haven't had to economize.

HELMER: But you know we can't go squandering.

NORA: Oh yes, Torvald, we can squander a little now. Can't we? Just a tiny, wee bit.

Now that you've got a big salary and are going to make piles and piles of money.

HELMER: Yes—starting New Year's. But then it's a full three months till the raise comes through.

NORA: Pooh! We can borrow that long.

HELMER: Nora! [Goes over and playfully takes her by the ear.] Are your scatter-brains off again? What if today I borrowed a thousand crowns, and you squandered them over Christmas week, and then on New Year's Eve a roof tile fell on my head, and I lay there—

NORA: [Putting her hand on his mouth.] Oh! Don't say such things!

HELMER: Yes, but what if it happened—then what?

NORA: If anything so awful happened, then it just wouldn't matter if I had debts or not.

HELMER: Well, but the people I'd borrowed from?

NORA: Them? Who cares about them! They're strangers.

HELMER: Nora, Nora, how like a woman! No, but seriously, Nora, you know what I think about that. No debts! Never borrow! Something of freedom's lost—and something of beauty, too—from a home that's founded on borrowing and debt. We've made a brave stand up to now, the two of us; and we'll go right on like that the little while we have to.

NORA: [Going toward the stove.] Yes, whatever you say, Torvald.

HELMER: [Following her.] Now, now, the little lark's wings mustn't droop. Come on, don't be a sulky squirrel. [Taking out his wallet.] Nora, guess what I have here.

NORA: [Turning quickly.] Money!

HELMER: There, see. [Hands her some notes.] Good grief, I know how costs go up in a house at Christmastime.

NORA: Ten—twenty—thirty—forty. Oh, thank you, Torvald; I can manage no end on this.

HELMER: You really will have to.

NORA: Oh yes, I promise I will. But come here so I can show you everything I bought. And so cheap! Look, new clothes for Ivar here—and a sword. Here a horse and a trumpet for Bob. And a doll and a doll's bed here for Emmy; they're nothing much, but she'll tear them to bits in no time anyway. And here I have dress material and handkerchiefs for the maids. Old Anne-Marie really deserves something more.

HELMER: And what's in that package there?

NORA: [With a cry.] Torvald, no! You can't see that till tonight!

HELMER: I see. But tell me now, you little prodigal, what have you thought of for yourself?

NORA: For myself? Oh, I don't want anything at all.

HELMER: Of course you do. Tell me just what—within reason—you'd most like to have.

NORA: I honestly don't know. Oh, listen, Torvald—

HELMER: Well?

NORA: [Fumbling at his coat buttons, without looking at him.] If you want to give me something, then maybe you could—you could—

HELMER: Come, on, out with it.

NORA: [Hurriedly.] You could give me money, Torvald. No more than you think you can spare; then one of these days I'll buy something with it.

HELMER: But Nora—

NORA: Oh, please, Torvald darling, do that! I beg you, please. Then I could hang the bills in pretty gilt paper on the Christmas tree. Wouldn't that be fun?

HELMER: What are those little birds called that always fly through their fortunes?

NORA: Oh yes, spendthrifts; I know all that. But let's do as I say, Torvald; then I'll have time to decide what I really need most. That's very sensible, isn't it?

HELMER: [Smiling.] Yes, very—that is, if you actually hung onto the money I give you, and you actually used it to buy yourself something. But it goes for the house and for all sorts of foolish things, and then I only have to lay out some more.

NORA: Oh, but Torvald—

HELMER: Don't deny it, my dear little Nora. [Putting his arm around her waist.] Spendthrifts are sweet, but they use up a frightful amount of money. It's incredible what it costs a man to feed such birds.

NORA: Oh, how can you say that! Really, I save everything I can.

HELMER: [Laughing.] Yes, that's the truth. Everything you can. But that's nothing at all.

NORA: [Humming, with a smile of quiet satisfaction.] Hm, if you only knew what expenses we larks and squirrels have, Torvald.

HELMER: You're an odd little one. Exactly the way your father was. You're never at a loss for scaring up money; but the moment you have it, it runs right out through your fingers; you never know what you've done with it. Well, one takes you as you are. It's deep in your blood. Yes, these things are hereditary, Nora.

NORA: Ah, I could wish I'd inherited many of Papa's qualities.

HELMER: And I couldn't wish you anything but just what you are, my sweet little lark. But wait; it seems to me you have a very—what should I call it?—a very suspicious look today—

NORA: I do?

HELMER: You certainly do. Look me straight in the eye.

NORA: [Looking at him.] Well?

HELMER: [Shaking an admonitory finger.] Surely my sweet tooth hasn't been running riot in town today, has she?

NORA: No. Why do you imagine that?

HELMER: My sweet tooth really didn't make a little detour through the confectioner's?

NORA: No, I assure you, Torvald—

HELMER: Hasn't nibbled some pastry?

NORA: No, not at all.

HELMER: Not even munched a macaroon or two?

NORA: No, Torvald, I assure you, really—

HELMER: There, there now. Of course I'm only joking.

NORA: [Going to the table, right.] You know I could never think of going against you.

HELMER: No, I understand that; and you have given me your word. [Going over to her.] Well, you keep your little Christmas secrets to yourself, Nora darling. I expect they'll come to light this evening, when the tree is lit.

NORA: Did you remember to ask Dr. Rank?

HELMER: No. But there's no need for that; it's assumed he'll be dining with us. All the same, I'll ask him when he stops by here this morning. I've ordered some fine wine. Nora, you can't imagine how I'm looking forward to this evening.

NORA: So am I. And what fun for the children, Torvald!

HELMER: Ah, it's so gratifying to know that one's gotten a safe, secure job, and with a comfortable salary. It's a great satisfaction, isn't it?

NORA: Oh, it's wonderful!

HELMER: Remember last Christmas? Three whole weeks before, you shut yourself in every evening till long after midnight, making flowers for the Christmas tree, and all the other decorations to surprise us. Ugh, that was the dullest time I've ever lived through.

NORA: It wasn't at all dull for me.

HELMER: [Smiling.] But the outcome was pretty sorry, Nora.

NORA: Oh, don't tease me with that again. How could I help it that the cat came in and tore everything to shreds.

HELMER: No, poor thing, you certainly couldn't. You wanted so much to please us all, and that's what counts. But it's just as well that the hard times are past.

NORA: Yes, it's really wonderful.

HELMER: Now I don't have to sit here alone, boring myself, and you don't have to tire your precious eyes and your fair little delicate hands—

NORA: [Clapping her hands.] No, is it really true, Torvald, I don't have to? Oh, how wonderfully lovely to hear! [Taking his arm.] Now I'll tell you just how I've thought we should plan things. Right after Christmas—[The doorbell rings.] Oh, the bell. [Straightening the room up a bit.] Somebody would have to come. What a bore!

HELMER: I'm not at home to visitors, don't forget.

MAID: [From the hall doorway.] Ma'am, a lady to see you—

NORA: All right, let her come in.

MAID: [To HELMER.] And the doctor's just come too.

HELMER: Did he go right to my study?

MAID: Yes, he did.

[HELMER goes into his room. The MAID shows in MRS. LINDE, dressed in traveling clothes, and shuts the door after her.]

MRS. LINDE: [In a dispirited and somewhat hesitant voice.] Hello, Nora.

NORA: [Uncertain.] Hello—

MRS. LINDE: You don't recognize me.

NORA: No, I don't know—but wait, I think—[Exclaiming.] What! Kristine! Is it really you?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, it's me.

NORA: Kristine! To think I didn't recognize you. But then, how could I? [More quietly.] How you've changed, Kristine!

MRS. LINDE: Yes, no doubt I have. In nine—ten long years.

NORA: Is it so long since we met! Yes, it's all of that. Oh, these last eight years have been a happy time, believe me. And so now you've come in to town, too. Made the long trip in the winter. That took courage.

MRS. LINDE: I just got here by ship this morning.

NORA: To enjoy yourself over Christmas, of course. Oh, how lovely! Yes, enjoy ourselves, we'll do that. But take your coat off. You're not still cold? [Helping her.] There now, let's get cozy here by the stove. No, the easy chair there! I'll take the rocker here. [Seizing her hands.] Yes, now you have your old look again; it was only in that first moment. You're a bit more pale, Kristine—and maybe a bit thinner.

MRS. LINDE: And much, much older, Nora.

NORA: Yes, perhaps a bit older; a tiny, tiny bit; not much at all. [Stopping short; suddenly serious.] Oh, but thoughtless me, to sit here, chattering away. Sweet, good Kristine, can you forgive me?

MRS. LINDE: What do you mean, Nora?

NORA: [Softly.] Poor Kristine, you've become a widow.

MRS. LINDE: Yes, three years ago.

NORA: Oh, I knew it, of course; I read it in the papers. Oh, Kristine, you must believe me; I often thought of writing you then, but I kept postponing it, and something always interfered.

MRS. LINDE: Nora dear, I understand completely.

NORA: No, it was awful of me, Kristine. You poor thing, how much you must have gone through. And he left you nothing?

MRS. LINDE: No.

NORA: And no children?

MRS. LINDE: No.

NORA: Nothing at all, then?

MRS. LINDE: Not even a sense of loss to feed on.

NORA: [Looking incredulously at her.] But Kristine, how could that be?

MRS. LINDE: [Smiling wearily and smoothing her hair.] Oh, sometimes it happens, Nora.

NORA: So completely alone. How terribly hard that must be for you. I have three lovely children. You can't see them now; they're out with the maid. But now you must tell me everything—

MRS. LINDE: No, no, no, tell me about yourself.

NORA: No, you begin. Today I don't want to be selfish. I want to think only of you today. But there is something I must tell you. Did you hear of the wonderful luck we had recently?

MRS. LINDE: No, what's that?

NORA: My husband's been made manager in the bank, just think!

MRS. LINDE: Your husband? How marvelous!

NORA: Isn't it? Being a lawyer is such an uncertain living, you know, especially if one won't touch any cases that aren't clean and decent. And of course Torvald would never do that, and I'm with him completely there. Oh, we're simply delighted, believe me! He'll join the bank right after New Year's and start getting a huge salary and lots of commissions. From now on we can live quite differently—just as we want. Oh, Kristine, I feel so light and happy! Won't it be lovely to have stacks of money and not a care in the world?

MRS. LINDE: Well, anyway, it would be lovely to have enough for necessities.

NORA: No, not just for necessities, but stacks and stacks of money!

MRS. LINDE: [Smiling.] Nora, Nora, aren't you sensible yet? Back in school you were such a free spender.

NORA: [With a quiet laugh.] Yes, that's what Torvald still says. [Shaking her finger.] But "Nora, Nora" isn't as silly as you all think. Really, we've been in no position for me to go squandering. We've had to work, both of us.

MRS. LINDE: You too?

NORA: Yes, at odd jobs—needlework, crocheting, embroidery, and such—[Casually.] and other things too. You remember that Torvald left the department when we were married? There was no chance of promotion in his office, and of course he needed to earn more money. But that first year he drove himself terribly. He took on all kinds of extra work that kept him going morning and night. It wore him down, and then he fell deathly ill. The doctors said it was essential for him to travel south.

MRS. LINDE: Yes, didn't you spend a whole year in Italy?

NORA: That's right. It wasn't easy to get away, you know. Ivar had just been born. But of course we had to go. Oh, that was a beautiful trip, and it saved Torvald's life. But it cost a frightful sum, Kristine.

MRS. LINDE: I can well imagine.

NORA: Four thousand, eight hundred crowns it cost. That's really a lot of money.

MRS. LINDE: But it's lucky you had it when you needed it.

NORA: Well, as it was, we got it from Papa.

MRS. LINDE: I see. It was just about the time your father died.

NORA: Yes, just about then. And, you know, I couldn't make that trip out to nurse him. I had to stay here, expecting Ivar any moment, and with my poor sick Torvald to care for. Dearest Papa, I never saw him again, Kristine. Oh, that was the worst time I've known in all my marriage.

MRS. LINDE: I know how you loved him. And then you went off to Italy?

NORA: Yes. We had the means now, and the doctors urged us. So we left a month after.

MRS. LINDE: And your husband came back completely cured?

NORA: Sound as a drum!

MRS. LINDE: But—the doctor?

NORA: Who?

MRS. LINDE: I thought the maid said he was a doctor, the man who came in with me.

NORA: Yes, that was Dr. Rank—but he's not making a sick call. He's our closest friend, and he stops by at least once a day. No, Torvald hasn't had a sick moment since, and the children are fit and strong, and I am, too. [Jumping up and clapping her hands.] Oh, dear God, Kristine, what a lovely thing to live and be happy! But how disgusting of me—I'm talking of nothing but my own affairs. [Sits on a stool close by KRISTINE, arms resting across her knees.] Oh, don't be angry with me! Tell me, is it really true that you weren't in love with your husband? Why did you marry him, then?

MRS. LINDE: My mother was still alive, but bedridden and helpless—and I had my two younger brothers to look after. In all conscience, I didn't think I could turn him down.

NORA: No, you were right there. But was he rich at the time?

MRS. LINDE: He was very well off, I'd say. But the business was shaky, Nora. When he died, it all fell apart, and nothing was left.

NORA: And then—?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, so I had to scrape up a living with a little shop and a little teaching and whatever else I could find. The last three years have been like one endless workday without a rest for me. Now it's over, Nora. My poor mother doesn't need me, for she's passed on. Nor the boys, either; they're working now and can take care of themselves.

NORA: How free you must feel—

MRS. LINDE: No—only unspeakably empty. Nothing to live for now. [Standing up anxiously.] That's why I couldn't take it any longer out in that desolate hole. Maybe here it'll be easier to find something to do and keep my mind occupied. If I could only be lucky enough to get a steady job, some office work—

NORA: Oh, but Kristine, that's so dreadfully tiring, and you already look so tired. It would be much better for you if you could go off to a bathing resort.

MRS. LINDE: [Going toward the window.] I have no father to give me travel money, Nora.

NORA: [Rising.] Oh, don't be angry with me.

MRS. LINDE: [Going to her.] Nora dear, don't you be angry with me. The worst of my kind of situation is all the bitterness that's stored away. No one to work for, and yet you're always having to snap up your opportunities. You have to live; and so you grow selfish. When you told me the happy change in your lot, do you know I was delighted less for your sakes than for mine?

NORA: How so? Oh, I see. You think maybe Torvald could do something for you.

MRS. LINDE: Yes, that's what I thought.

NORA: And he will, Kristine! Just leave it to me; I'll bring it up so delicately—find something attractive to humor him with. Oh, I'm so eager to help you.

MRS. LINDE: How very kind of you, Nora, to be so concerned over me—doubly kind, considering you really know so little of life's burdens yourself.

NORA: I—? I know so little—?

MRS. LINDE: [Smiling.] Well, my heavens—a little needlework and such—Nora, you're just a child.

NORA: [Tossing her head and pacing the floor.] You don't have to act so superior.

MRS. LINDE: Oh?

NORA: You're just like the others. You all think I'm incapable of anything serious—

MRS. LINDE: Come now—

NORA: That I've never had to face the raw world.

MRS. LINDE: Nora dear, you've just been telling me all your troubles.

NORA: Hm! Trivia! [Quietly.] I haven't told you the big thing.

MRS. LINDE: Big thing? What do you mean?

NORA: You look down on me so, Kristine, but you shouldn't. You're proud that you worked so long and hard for your mother.

MRS. LINDE: I don't look down on a soul. But it is true: I'm proud—and happy, too—to think it was given to me to make my mother's last days almost free of care.

NORA: And you're also proud thinking of what you've done for your brothers.

MRS. LINDE: I feel I've a right to be.

NORA: I agree. But listen to this, Kristine—I've also got something to be proud and happy for.

MRS. LINDE: I don't doubt it. But whatever do you mean?

NORA: Not so loud. What if Torvald heard! He mustn't, not for anything in the world. Nobody must know, Kristine. No one but you.

MRS. LINDE: But what is it, then?

NORA: Come here. [Drawing her down beside her on the sofa.] It's true—I've also got something to be proud and happy for. I'm the one who saved Torvald's life.

MRS. LINDE: Saved—? Saved how?

NORA: I told you about the trip to Italy. Torvald never would have lived if he hadn't gone south—

MRS. LINDE: Of course; your father gave you the means—

NORA: [Smiling.] That's what Torvald and all the rest think, but—

MRS. LINDE: But—?

NORA: Papa didn't give us a pin. I was the one who raised the money.

MRS. LINDE: You? That whole amount?

NORA: Four thousand, eight hundred crowns. What do you say to that?

MRS. LINDE: But Nora, how was it possible? Did you win the lottery?

NORA: [Disdainfully.] The lottery? Pooh! No art to that.

MRS. LINDE: But where did you get it from then?

NORA: [Humming, with a mysterious smile.] Hmm, tra-la-la-la.

MRS. LINDE: Because you couldn't have borrowed it.

NORA: No? Why not?

MRS. LINDE: A wife can't borrow without her husband's consent.

NORA: [Tossing her head.] Oh, but a wife with a little business sense, a wife who knows how to manage—

MRS. LINDE: Nora, I simply don't understand—

NORA: You don't have to. Whoever said I borrowed the money? I could have gotten it other ways. [Throwing herself back on the sofa.] I could have gotten it from some admirer or other. After all, a girl with my ravishing appeal—

MRS. LINDE: You lunatic.

NORA: I'll bet you're eaten up with curiosity, Kristine.

MRS. LINDE: Now listen here, Nora—you haven't done something indiscreet?

NORA: [Sitting up again.] Is it indiscreet to save your husband's life?

MRS. LINDE: I think it's indiscreet that without his knowledge you—

NORA: But that's the point: he mustn't know! My Lord, can't you understand?

He mustn't ever know the close call he had. It was to me the doctors came to say his life was in danger—that nothing could save him but a stay in the south. Didn't I try strategy then! I began talking about how lovely it would be for me to travel abroad like other young wives; I begged and I cried; I told him please to remember my condition, to be kind and indulge me; and then I dropped a hint that he could easily take out a loan. But at that, Kristine, he nearly exploded. He said I was frivolous, and it was his duty as man of the house not to indulge me in whims and fancies—as I think he called them. Aha, I thought, now you'll just have to be saved—and that's when I saw my chance.

MRS. LINDE: And your father never told Torvald the money wasn't from him?

NORA: No, never. Papa died right about then. I'd considered bringing him into my secret and begging him never to tell. But he was too sick at the time—and then, sadly, it didn't matter.

MRS. LINDE: And you've never confided in your husband since?

NORA: For heaven's sake, no! Are you serious? He's so strict on that subject. Besides—Torvald, with all his masculine pride—how painfully humiliating for him if he ever found out he was in debt to me. That would just ruin our relationship. Our beautiful, happy home would never be the same.

MRS. LINDE: Won't you ever tell him?

NORA: [Thoughtfully.] Yes—maybe sometime years from now, when I'm no longer so attractive. Don't laugh! I only mean when Torvald loves me less than now, when he stops enjoying my dancing and dressing up and reciting for him. Then it might be wise to have something in reserve—[Breaking off.] How ridiculous! That'll never happen—Well, Kristine, what do you think of my big secret? I'm capable of something too, hm? You can imagine, of course, how this thing hangs over me. It really hasn't been easy meeting the payments on time. In the business world there's what they call quarterly interest and what they call amortization, and these are always so terribly hard to manage. I've had to skimp a little here and there, wherever I could, you know. I could hardly spare anything from my house allowance, because Torvald has to live well. I couldn't let the children go poorly dressed; whatever I got for them, I felt I had to use up completely—the darlings!

MRS. LINDE: Poor Nora, so it had to come out of your own budget, then?

NORA: Yes, of course. But I was the one most responsible, too. Every time Torvald gave me money for new clothes and such, I never used more than half; always bought the simplest, cheapest outfits. It was a godsend that everything looks so well on me that Torvald never noticed. But it did weigh me down at times, Kristine. It is such a joy to wear fine things. You understand.

MRS. LINDE: Oh, of course.

NORA: And then I found other ways of making money. Last winter I was lucky enough to get a lot of copying to do. I locked myself in and sat writing every evening till late in the night. Ah, I was tired so often, dead tired. But still it was wonderful fun, sitting and working like that, earning money. It was almost like being a man.

MRS. LINDE: But how much have you paid off this way so far?

NORA: That's hard to say, exactly. These accounts, you know, aren't easy to figure. I only know that I've paid out all I could scrape together. Time and again I haven't known where to turn. [Smiling.] Then I'd sit here dreaming of a rich old gentleman who had fallen in love with me—

MRS. LINDE: What! Who is he?

NORA: Oh, really! And that he'd died, and when his will was opened, there in big letters it said, "All my fortune shall be paid over in cash, immediately, to that enchanting Mrs. Nora Helmer."

MRS. LINDE: But Nora dear—who was this gentleman?

NORA: Good grief, can't you understand? The old man never existed; that was only something I'd dream up time and again whenever I was at my wits' end for money. But it makes no difference now; the old fossil can go where he pleases for all I care; I don't need him or his will—because now I'm free. [Jumping up.] Oh, how lovely to think of that, Kristine! Carefree! To know you're carefree, utterly carefree; to be able to romp and play with the children, and to keep up a beautiful, charming home—everything just the way Torvald likes it! And think, spring is coming, with big blue skies. Maybe we can travel a little then. Maybe I'll see the ocean again. Oh yes, it is so marvelous to live and be happy!

[The front doorbell rings.]

MRS. LINDE: [Rising.] There's the bell. It's probably best that I go.

NORA: No, stay. No one's expected. It must be for Torvald.

MAID: [From the hall doorway.] Excuse me, ma'am—there's a gentleman here to see Mr. Helmer, but I didn't know—since the doctor's with him—

NORA: Who is the gentleman?

KROGSTAD: [From the doorway.] It's me, Mrs. Helmer.

[MRS. LINDE starts and turns away toward the window.]

NORA: [Stepping toward him, tense, her voice a whisper.] You? What is it? Why do you want to speak to my husband?

KROGSTAD: Bank business—after a fashion. I have a small job in the investment bank, and I hear now your husband is going to be our chief—

NORA: In other words, it's—

KROGSTAD: Just dry business, Mrs. Helmer. Nothing but that.

NORA: Yes, then please be good enough to step into the study. [She nods indifferently as she sees him out by the hall door, then returns and begins stirring up the stove.]

MRS. LINDE: Nora—who was that man?

NORA: That was a Mr. Krogstad—a lawyer.

MRS. LINDE: Then it really was him.

NORA: Do you know that person?

MRS. LINDE: I did once—many years ago. For a time he was a law clerk in our town.

NORA: Yes, he's been that.

MRS. LINDE: How he's changed.

NORA: I understand he had a very unhappy marriage.

MRS. LINDE: He's a widower now.

NORA: With a number of children. There now, it's burning. [She closes the stove door and moves the rocker a bit to one side.]

MRS. LINDE: They say he has a hand in all kinds of business.

NORA: Oh? That may be true; I wouldn't know. But let's not think about business. It's so dull.

[DR. RANK enters from HELMER'S study.]

RANK: [Still in the doorway.] No, no, really—I don't want to intrude, I'd just as soon talk a little while with your wife. [Shuts the door, then notices MRS. LINDE.] Oh, beg pardon. I'm intruding here too.

NORA: No, not at all. [Introducing him.] Dr. Rank, Mrs. Linde.

RANK: Well now, that's a name much heard in this house. I believe I passed the lady on the stairs as I came.

MRS. LINDE: Yes, I take the stairs very slowly. They're rather hard on me.

RANK: Uh-hm, some touch of internal weakness?

MRS. LINDE: More overexertion, I'd say.

RANK: Nothing else? Then you're probably here in town to rest up in a round of parties?

MRS. LINDE: I'm here to look for work.

RANK: Is that the best cure for overexertion?

MRS. LINDE: One has to live, Doctor.

RANK: Yes, there's a common prejudice to that effect.

NORA: Oh, come on, Dr. Rank—you really do want to live yourself.

RANK: Yes, I really do. Wretched as I am, I'll gladly prolong my torment indefinitely. All my patients feel like that. And it's quite the same, too, with the morally sick. Right at this moment there's one of those moral invalids in there with Helmer—

MRS. LINDE: [Softly.] Ah!

NORA: Who do you mean?

RANK: Oh, it's a lawyer, Krogstad, a type you wouldn't know. His character is rotten to the root—but even he began chattering all-importantly about how he had to live.

NORA: Oh? What did he want to talk to Torvald about?

RANK: I really don't know. I only heard something about the bank.

NORA: I didn't know that Krog—that this man Krogstad had anything to do with the bank.

RANK: Yes, he's gotten some kind of berth down there. [To MRS. LINDE.] I don't know if you also have, in your neck of the woods, a type of person who scuttles about breathlessly, sniffing out hints of moral corruption, and then maneuvers his victim into some sort of key position where he can keep an eye on him. It's the healthy these days that are out in the cold.

MRS. LINDE: All the same, it's the sick who most need to be taken in.

RANK: [With a shrug.] Yes, there we have it. That's the concept that's turning society into a sanatorium.

[NORA, lost in her thoughts, breaks out into quiet laughter and claps her hands.]

RANK: Why do you laugh at that? Do you have any real idea of what society is?

NORA: What do I care about dreary old society? I was laughing at something quite different—something terribly funny. Tell me, Doctor—is everyone who works in the bank dependent now on Torvald?

RANK: Is that what you find so terribly funny?

NORA: [Smiling and humming.] Never mind, never mind [Pacing the floor.] Yes, that's really immensely amusing: that we—that Torvald has so much power now over all those people. [Taking the bag out of her pocket.] Dr. Rank, a little macaroon on that?

RANK: See here, macaroons! I thought they were contraband here.

NORA: Yes, but these are some that Kristine gave me.

MRS. LINDE: What? I—?

NORA: Now, now, don't be afraid. You couldn't possibly know that Torvald had forbidden them. You see, he's worried they'll ruin my teeth. But hmp! Just this once! Isn't that so, Dr. Rank? Help yourself! [Puts a macaroon in his mouth.]

And you too, Kristine. And I'll also have one, only a little one—or two, at the most. [Walking about again.] Now I'm really tremendously happy. Now there's just one last thing in the world that I have an enormous desire to do.

RANK: Well! And what's that?

NORA: It's something I have such a consuming desire to say so Torvald could hear.

RANK: And why can't you say it?

NORA: I don't dare. It's quite shocking.

MRS. LINDE: Shocking?

RANK: Well, then it isn't advisable. But in front of us you certainly can. What do you have such a desire to say so Torvald could hear?

NORA: I have such a huge desire to say—to hell and be damned!

RANK: Are you crazy?

MRS. LINDE: My goodness, Nora!

RANK: Go on, say it. Here he is.

NORA: [Hiding the macaroon bag.] Shh, shh, shh!

[HELMER comes in from his study, hat in hand, overcoat over his arm.]

NORA: [Going toward him.] Well, Torvald dear, are you through with him?

HELMER: Yes, he just left.

NORA: Let me introduce you—this is Kristine, who's arrived here in town.

HELMER: Kristine—? I'm sorry, but I don't know—

NORA: Mrs. Linde, Torvald dear. Mrs. Kristine Linde.

HELMER: Of course. A childhood friend of my wife's, no doubt?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, we knew each other in those days.

NORA: And just think, she made the long trip down here in order to talk with you.

HELMER: What's this?

MRS. LINDE: Well, not exactly—

NORA: You see, Kristine is remarkably clever in office work, and so she's terribly eager to come under a capable man's supervision and add more to what she already knows—

HELMER: Very wise, Mrs. Linde.

NORA: And then when she heard that you'd become a bank manager—the story was wired out to the papers—then she came in as fast as she could and— Really, Torvald, for my sake you can do a little something for Kristine, can't you?

HELMER: Yes, it's not at all impossible. Mrs. Linde, I suppose you're a widow?

MRS. LINDE: Yes.

HELMER: Any experience in office work?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, a good deal.

HELMER: Well, it's quite likely that I can make an opening for you—

NORA: [Clapping her hands.] You see, you see!

HELMER: You've come at a lucky moment, Mrs. Linde.

MRS. LINDE: Oh, how can I thank you?

HELMER: Not necessary. [Putting his overcoat on.] But today you'll have to excuse me—

RANK: Wait, I'll go with you. [He fetches his coat from the hall and warms it at the stove.]

NORA: Don't stay out long, dear.

HELMER: An hour; no more.

NORA: Are you going too, Kristine?

MRS. LINDE: [Putting on her winter garments.] Yes, I have to see about a room now.

HELMER: Then perhaps we can all walk together.

NORA: [Helping her.] What a shame we're so cramped here, but it's quite impossible for us to—

MRS. LINDE: Oh, don't even think of it! Good-bye, Nora dear, and thanks for everything.

NORA: Good-bye for now. Of course you'll be back this evening. And you too, Dr. Rank. What? If you're well enough? Oh, you've got to be! Wrap up tight now.

[In a ripple of small talk the company moves out into the hall; children's voices are heard outside on the steps.]

NORA: There they are! There they are! [She runs to open the door. The children come in with their nurse, ANNE-MARIE.] Come in, come in! [Bends down and kisses them.] Oh, you darlings—! Look at them, Kristine. Aren't they lovely!

RANK: No loitering in the draft here.

HELMER: Come, Mrs. Linde—this place is unbearable now for anyone but mothers.

[DR. RANK, HELMER, and MRS. LINDE go down the stairs. ANNE-MARIE goes into the living room with the children. NORA follows, after closing the hall door.]

NORA: How fresh and strong you look. Oh, such red cheeks you have! Like apples and roses. [The children interrupt her throughout the following.] And it was so much fun? That's wonderful. Really? You pulled both Emmy and Bob on the sled? Imagine, all together! Yes, you're a clever boy, Ivar. Oh, let me hold her a bit, Anne-Marie. My sweet little doll baby! [Takes the smallest from the nurse and dances with her.] Yes, yes, Mama will dance with Bob as well. What? Did you throw snowballs? Oh, if I'd only been there! No, don't bother, Anne-Marie—I'll undress them myself. Oh yes, let me. It's such fun. Go in and rest; you look half frozen. There's hot coffee waiting for you on the stove. [The nurse goes into the room to the left. NORA takes the children's winter things off, throwing them about, while the children talk to her all at once.] Is that so? A big dog chased you? But it didn't bite? No, dogs never bite little, lovely doll babies. Don't peek in the packages, Ivar! What is it? Yes, wouldn't you like to know. No, no, it's an ugly something. Well? Shall we play? What shall we play? Hide-and-seek? Yes, let's play hide-and-seek. Bob must hide first. I must? Yes, let me hide first. [Laughing and shouting, she and the children play in and out of the living room and the adjoining room to the right. At last NORA hides under the table. The children come storming in, search, but cannot find her, then hear her muffled laughter, dash over to the table, lift the cloth up and find her. Wild shouting. She creeps forward as if to scare them. More shouts. Meanwhile, a knock at the hall door; no one has noticed it. Now the door half opens, and KROGSTAD appears. He waits a moment; the game goes on.]

KROGSTAD: Beg pardon, Mrs. Helmer—

NORA: [With a strangled cry, turning and scrambling to her knees.] Oh! What do you want?

KROGSTAD: Excuse me. The outer door was ajar; it must be someone forgot to shut it—

NORA: [Rising.] My husband isn't home, Mr. Krogstad.

KROGSTAD: I know that.

NORA: Yes—then what do you want here?

KROGSTAD: A word with you.

NORA: With—? [To the children, quietly.] Go in to Anne-Marie. What? No, the strange man won't hurt Mama. When he's gone, we'll play some more. [She leads the children into the room to the left and shuts the door after them. Then, tense and nervous:] You want to speak to me?

KROGSTAD: Yes, I want to.

NORA: Today? But it's not yet the first of the month—

KROGSTAD: No, it's Christmas Eve. It's going to be up to you how merry a Christmas you have.

NORA: What is it you want? Today I absolutely can't—KROGSTAD: We won't talk about that till later. This is something else. You do have a moment to spare, I suppose?

NORA: Oh yes, of course—I do, except—

KROGSTAD: Good. I was sitting over at Olsen's Restaurant when I saw your husband go down the street—

NORA: Yes?

KROGSTAD: With a lady.

NORA: Yes. So?

KROGSTAD: If you'll pardon my asking: wasn't that lady a Mrs. Linde?

NORA: Yes.

KROGSTAD: Just now come into town?

NORA: Yes, today.

KROGSTAD: She's a good friend of yours?

NORA: Yes, she is. But I don't see—

KROGSTAD: I also knew her once.

NORA: I'm aware of that.

KROGSTAD: Oh? You know all about it. I thought so. Well, then let me ask you short and sweet: is Mrs. Linde getting a job in the bank?

NORA: What makes you think you can cross-examine me, Mr. Krogstad—you, one of my husband's employees? But since you ask, you might as well know—yes, Mrs. Linde's going to be taken on at the bank. And I'm the one who spoke for her, Mr. Krogstad. Now you know.

KROGSTAD: So I guessed right.

NORA: [Pacing up and down.] Oh, one does have a tiny bit of influence, I should hope. Just because I am a woman, don't think it means that—When one has a subordinate position, Mr. Krogstad, one really ought to be careful about pushing somebody who—hm—

KROGSTAD: Who has influence?

NORA: That's right.

KROGSTAD: [In a different tone.] Mrs. Helmer, would you be good enough to use your influence on my behalf?

NORA: What? What do you mean?

KROGSTAD: Would you please make sure that I keep my subordinate position in the bank?

NORA: What does that mean? Who's thinking of taking away your position?

KROGSTAD: Oh, don't play the innocent with me. I'm quite aware that your friend would hardly relish the chance of running into me again; and I'm also aware now whom I can thank for being turned out.

NORA: But I promise you—

KROGSTAD: Yes, yes, yes, to the point: there's still time, and I'm advising you to use your influence to prevent it.

NORA: But Mr. Krogstad, I have absolutely no influence.

KROGSTAD: You haven't? I thought you were just saying—

NORA: You shouldn't take me so literally. I! How can you believe that I have any such influence over my husband?

KROGSTAD: Oh, I've known your husband from our student days. I don't think the great bank manager's more steadfast than any other married man.

NORA: You speak insolently about my husband, and I'll show you the door.

KROGSTAD: The lady has spirit.

NORA: I'm not afraid of you any longer. After New Year's, I'll soon be done with the whole business.

KROGSTAD: [Restraining himself.] Now listen to me, Mrs. Helmer. If necessary, I'll fight for my little job in the bank as if it were life itself.

NORA: Yes, so it seems.

KROGSTAD: It's not just a matter of income; that's the least of it. It's something else—All right, out with it! Look, this is the thing. You know, just like all the others, of course, that once, a good many years ago, I did something rather rash.

NORA: I've heard rumors to that effect.

KROGSTAD: The case never got into court; but all the same, every door was closed in my face from then on. So I took up those various activities you know about. I had to grab hold somewhere; and I dare say I haven't been among the worst. But now I want to drop all that. My boys are growing up. For their sakes, I'll have to win back as much respect as possible here in town. That job in the bank was like the first rung in my ladder. And now your husband wants to kick me right back down in the mud again.

NORA: But for heaven's sake, Mr. Krogstad, it's simply not in my power to help you.

KROGSTAD: That's because you haven't the will to—but I have the means to make you.

NORA: You certainly won't tell my husband that I owe you money?

KROGSTAD: Hm—what if I told him that?

NORA: That would be shameful of you. [Nearly in tears.] This secret—my joy and my pride—that he should learn it in such a crude and disgusting way—learn it from you. You'd expose me to the most horrible unpleasantness—

KROGSTAD: Only unpleasantness?

NORA: [Vehemently.] But go on and try. It'll turn out the worse for you, because then my husband will really see what a crook you are, and then you'll never be able to hold your job.

KROGSTAD: I asked if it was just domestic unpleasantness you were afraid of?

NORA: If my husband finds out, then of course he'll pay what I owe at once, and then we'd be through with you for good.

KROGSTAD: [A step closer.] Listen, Mrs. Helmer—you've either got a very bad memory, or else no head at all for business. I'd better put you a little more in touch with the facts.

NORA: What do you mean?

KROGSTAD: When your husband was sick, you came to me for a loan of four thousand, eight hundred crowns.

NORA: Where else could I go?

KROGSTAD: I promised to get you that sum—

NORA: And you got it.

KROGSTAD: I promised to get you that sum, on certain conditions. You were so involved in your husband's illness, and so eager to finance your trip, that I guess you didn't think out all the details. It might just be a good idea to remind you. I promised you the money on the strength of a note I drew up.

NORA: Yes, and that I signed.

KROGSTAD: Right. But at the bottom I added some lines for your father to guarantee the loan. He was supposed to sign down there.

NORA: Supposed to? He did sign.

KROGSTAD: I left the date blank. In other words, your father would have dated his signature himself. Do you remember that?

NORA: Yes, I think—

KROGSTAD: Then I gave you the note for you to mail to your father. Isn't that so?

NORA: Yes.

KROGSTAD: And naturally you sent it at once—because only some five, six days later you brought me the note, properly signed. And with that, the money was yours.

NORA: Well, then; I've made my payments regularly, haven't I?

KROGSTAD: More or less. But—getting back to the point—those were hard times for you then, Mrs. Helmer.

NORA: Yes, they were.

KROGSTAD: Your father was very ill, I believe.

NORA: He was near the end.

KROGSTAD: He died soon after?

NORA: Yes.

KROGSTAD: Tell me, Mrs. Helmer, do you happen to recall the date of your father's death? The day of the month, I mean.

NORA: Papa died the twenty-ninth of September.

KROGSTAD: That's quite correct; I've already looked into that. And now we come to a curious thing—[Taking out a paper.] which I simply cannot comprehend.

NORA: Curious thing? I don't know—

KROGSTAD: This is the curious thing: that your father co-signed the note for your loan three days after his death.

NORA: How—? I don't understand.

KROGSTAD: Your father died the twenty-ninth of September. But look. Here your father dated his signature October second. Isn't that curious, Mrs. Helmer? [NORA is silent.] Can you explain it to me? [NORA remains silent.] It's also remarkable that the words "October second" and the year aren't written in your father's hand, but rather in one that I think I know. Well, it's easy to understand. Your father forgot perhaps to date his signature, and then someone or other added it, a bit sloppily, before anyone knew of his death. There's nothing wrong in that. It all comes down to the signature. And there's no question about that, Mrs. Helmer. It really was your father who signed his own name here, wasn't it?

NORA: [After a short silence, throwing her head back and looking squarely at him.]

No, it wasn't. I signed papa's name.

KROGSTAD: Wait, now—are you fully aware that this is a dangerous confession?

NORA: Why? You'll soon get your money.

KROGSTAD: Let me ask you a question—why didn't you send the paper to your father?

NORA: That was impossible. Papa was so sick. If I'd asked him for his signature, I also would have had to tell him what the money was for. But I couldn't tell him, sick as he was, that my husband's life was in danger. That was just impossible.

KROGSTAD: Then it would have been better if you'd given up the trip abroad.

NORA: I couldn't possibly. The trip was to save my husband's life. I couldn't give that up.

KROGSTAD: But didn't you ever consider that this was a fraud against me?

NORA: I couldn't let myself be bothered by that. You weren't any concern of mine. I couldn't stand you, with all those cold complications you made, even though you knew how badly off my husband was.

KROGSTAD: Mrs. Helmer, obviously you haven't the vaguest idea of what you've involved yourself in. But I can tell you this: it was nothing more and nothing worse than I once did—and it wrecked my whole reputation.

NORA: You? Do you expect me to believe that you ever acted bravely to save your wife's life?

KROGSTAD: Laws don't inquire into motives.

NORA: Then they must be very poor laws.

KROGSTAD: Poor or not—if I introduce this paper in court, you'll be judged according to law.

NORA: This I refuse to believe. A daughter hasn't a right to protect her dying father from anxiety and care? A wife hasn't a right to save her husband's life? I don't know much about laws, but I'm sure that somewhere in the books these things are allowed. And you don't know anything about it—you who practice the law? You must be an awful lawyer, Mr. Krogstad.

KROGSTAD: Could be. But business—the kind of business we two are mixed up in—don't you think I know about that? All right. Do what you want now. But I'm telling you this: if I get shoved down a second time, you're going to keep me company. [He bows and goes out through the hall.]

NORA: [Pensive for a moment, then tossing her head.] Oh, really! Trying to frighten me! I'm not so silly as all that. [Begins gathering up the children's clothes, but soon stops.] But—? No, but that's impossible! I did it out of love.

THE CHILDREN: [In the doorway, left.] Mama, that strange man's gone out the door.

NORA: Yes, yes, I know it. But don't tell anyone about the strange man. Do you hear? Not even Papa!

THE CHILDREN: No, Mama. But now will you play again?

NORA: No, not now.

THE CHILDREN: Oh, but Mama, you promised.

NORA: Yes, but I can't now. Go inside; I have too much to do. Go in, go in, my sweet darlings. [She herds them gently back in the room and shuts the door after them. Settling on the sofa, she takes up a piece of embroidery and makes some stitches, but soon stops abruptly.] No! [Throws the work aside, rises, goes to the hall door and calls out.] Helene! Let me have the tree in here. [Goes to the table, left, opens the table drawer, and stops again.] No, but that's utterly impossible!

MAID: [With the Christmas tree.] Where should I put it, ma'am?

NORA: There. The middle of the floor.

MAID: Should I bring anything else?

NORA: No, thanks. I have what I need.

[The MAID, who has set the tree down, goes out.]

NORA: [Absorbed in trimming the tree.] Candles here—and flowers here. That terrible creature! Talk, talk, talk! There's nothing to it at all. The tree's going to be lovely. I'll do anything to please you, Torvald. I'll sing for you, dance for you—

[HELMER comes in from the hall, with a sheaf of papers under his arm.]

NORA: Oh! You're back so soon?

HELMER: Yes. Has anyone been here?

NORA: Here? No.

HELMER: That's odd. I saw Krogstad leaving the front door.

NORA: So? Oh yes, that's true. Krogstad was here a moment.

HELMER: Nora, I can see by your face that he's been here, begging you to put in a good word for him.

NORA: Yes.

HELMER: And it was supposed to seem like your own idea? You were to hide it from me that he'd been here. He asked you that, too, didn't he?

NORA: Yes, Torvald, but—

HELMER: Nora, Nora, and you could fall for that? Talk with that sort of person and promise him anything? And then in the bargain, tell me an untruth.

NORA: An untruth—?

HELMER: Didn't you say that no one had been here? [Wagging his finger.] My little songbird must never do that again. A songbird needs a clean beak to warble with. No false notes. [Putting his arm about her waist.] That's the way it should be, isn't it? Yes, I'm sure of it. [Releasing her.] And so, enough of that. [Sitting by the stove.] Ah, how snug and cozy it is here. [Leafing among his papers.]

NORA: [Busy with the tree, after a short pause.] Torvald!

HELMER: Yes.

NORA: I'm so much looking forward to the Stenborgs' costume party, day after tomorrow.

HELMER: And I can't wait to see what you'll surprise me with.

NORA: Oh, that stupid business!

HELMER: What?

- NORA: I can't find anything that's right. Everything seems so ridiculous, so inane.
- HELMER: So my little Nora's come to that recognition?
- NORA: [Going behind his chair, her arms resting on its back.] Are you very busy, Torvald?
- HELMER: Oh—
- NORA: What papers are those?
- HELMER: Bank matters.
- NORA: Already?
- HELMER: I've gotten full authority from the retiring management to make all necessary changes in personnel and procedure. I'll need Christmas week for that. I want to have everything in order by New Year's.
- NORA: So that was the reason this poor Krogstad—
- HELMER: Hm.
- NORA: [Still leaning on the chair and slowly stroking the nape of his neck.] If you weren't so very busy, I would have asked you an enormous favor, Torvald.
- HELMER: Let's hear. What is it?
- NORA: You know, there isn't anyone who has your good taste—and I want so much to look well at the costume party. Torvald, couldn't you take over and decide what I should be and plan my costume?
- HELMER: Ah, is my stubborn little creature calling for a lifeguard?
- NORA: Yes, Torvald, I can't get anywhere without your help.
- HELMER: All right—I'll think it over. We'll hit on something.
- NORA: Oh, how sweet of you. [Goes to the tree again. Pause.] Aren't the red flowers pretty—? But tell me, was it really such a crime that this Krogstad committed?
- HELMER: Forgery. Do you have any idea what that means?
- NORA: Couldn't he have done it out of need?
- HELMER: Yes, or thoughtlessness, like so many others. I'm not so heartless that I'd condemn a man categorically for just one mistake.
- NORA: No, of course not, Torvald!
- HELMER: Plenty of men have redeemed themselves by openly confessing their crimes and taking their punishment.
- NORA: Punishment—?
- HELMER: But now Krogstad didn't go that way. He got himself out by sharp practices, and that's the real cause of his moral breakdown.
- NORA: Do you really think that would—?
- HELMER: Just imagine how a man with that sort of guilt in him has to lie and cheat and deceive on all sides, has to wear a mask even with the nearest and dearest he has, even with his own wife and children. And with the children, Nora—that's where it's most horrible.
- NORA: Why?
- HELMER: Because that kind of atmosphere of lies infects the whole life of a home. Every breath the children take in is filled with the germs of something degenerate.
- NORA: [Coming closer behind him.] Are you sure of that?
- HELMER: Oh, I've seen it often enough as a lawyer. Almost everyone who goes bad early in life has a mother who's a chronic liar.
- NORA: Why just—the mother?

HELMER: It's usually the mother's influence that's dominant, but the father's works in the same way, of course. Every lawyer is quite familiar with it. And still this Krogstad's been going home year in, year out, poisoning his own children with lies and pretense; that's why I call him morally lost. [Reaching his hands out toward her.] So my sweet little Nora must promise me never to plead his cause. Your hand on it. Come, come, what's this? Give me your hand. There, now. All settled. I can tell you it'd be impossible for me to work alongside of him. I literally feel physically revolted when I'm anywhere near such a person.

NORA: [Withdraws her hand and goes to the other side of the Christmas tree.] How hot it is here! And I've got so much to do.

HELMER: [Getting up and gathering his papers.] Yes, and I have to think about getting some of these read through before dinner. I'll think about your costume, too. And something to hang on the tree in gilt paper, I may even see about that. [Putting his hand on her head.] Oh you, my darling little songbird. [He goes into his study and closes the door after him.]

NORA: [Softly, after a silence.] Oh, really! it isn't so. It's impossible. It must be impossible.

ANNE-MARIE: [In the doorway, left.] The children are begging so hard to come in to Mama.

NORA: No, no, no, don't let them in to me! You stay with them, Anne-Marie.

ANNE-MARIE: Of course, ma'am. [Closes the door.]

NORA: [Pale with terror.] Hurt my children—! Poison my home? [A moment's pause; then she tosses her head.] That's not true. Never. Never in all the world.

ACT II

Same room. Beside the piano the Christmas tree now stands stripped of ornament, burned-down candle stubs on its ragged branches. nora's street clothes lie on the sofa. nora, alone in the room, moves restlessly about; at last she stops at the sofa and picks up her coat.

NORA: [Dropping the coat again.] Someone's coming! [Goes toward the door, listens.] No—there's no one. Of course—nobody's coming today, Christmas Day—or tomorrow, either. But maybe—[Opens the door and looks out.] No, nothing in the mailbox. Quite empty. [Coming forward.] What nonsense! He won't do anything serious. Nothing terrible could happen. It's impossible. Why, I have three small children.

[ANNE-MARIE, with a large carton, comes in from the room to the left.]

ANNE-MARIE: Well, at last I found the box with the masquerade clothes.

NORA: Thanks. Put it on the table.

ANNE-MARIE: [Does so.] But they're all pretty much of a mess.

NORA: Ahh! I'd love to rip them in a million pieces!

ANNE-MARIE: Oh, mercy, they can be fixed right up. Just a little patience.

NORA: Yes, I'll go get Mrs. Linde to help me.

ANNE-MARIE: Out again now? In this nasty weather? Miss Nora will catch cold—get sick.

NORA: Oh, worse things could happen—How are the children?

ANNE-MARIE: The poor mites are playing with their Christmas presents, but—

NORA: Do they ask for me much?

ANNE-MARIE: They're so used to having Mama around, you know.

NORA: Yes, but Anne-Marie, I can't be together with them as much as I was.

ANNE-MARIE: Well, small children get used to anything.

NORA: You think so? Do you think they'd forget their mother if she was gone for good?

ANNE-MARIE: Oh, mercy—gone for good!

NORA: Wait, tell me, Anne-Marie—I've wondered so often—how could you ever have the heart to give your child over to strangers?

ANNE-MARIE: But I had to, you know, to become little Nora's nurse.

NORA: Yes, but how could you do it?

ANNE-MARIE: When I could get such a good place? A girl who's poor and who's gotten in trouble is glad enough for that. Because that slippery fish, he didn't do a thing for me, you know.

NORA: But your daughter's surely forgotten you.

ANNE-MARIE: Oh, she certainly has not. She's written to me, both when she was confirmed and when she was married.

NORA: [Clasping her about the neck.] You old Anne-Marie, you were a good mother for me when I was little.

ANNE-MARIE: Poor little Nora, with no other mother but me.

NORA: And if the babies didn't have one, then I know that you'd—What silly talk! [Opening the carton.] Go in to them. Now I'll have to—Tomorrow you can see how lovely I'll look.

ANNE-MARIE: Oh, there won't be anyone at the party as lovely as Miss Nora. [She goes off into the room, left.]

NORA: [Begins unpacking the box, but soon throws it aside.] Oh, if I dared to go out. If only nobody would come. If only nothing would happen here while I'm out. What craziness—nobody's coming. Just don't think. This muff—needs a brushing. Beautiful gloves, beautiful gloves. Let it go. Let it go! One, two, three, four, five, six—[With a cry.] Oh, there they are! [Poises to move toward the door, but remains irresolutely standing. MRS. LINDE enters from the hall, where she has removed her street clothes.]

NORA: Oh, it's you, Kristine. There's no one else out there? How good that you've come.

MRS. LINDE: I hear you were up asking for me.

NORA: Yes, I just stopped by. There's something you really can help me with. Let's get settled on the sofa. Look, there's going to be a costume party tomorrow evening at the Stenborgs' right above us, and now Torvald wants me to go as a Neapolitan peasant girl and dance the tarantella² that I learned in Capri.

MRS. LINDE: Really, are you giving a whole performance?

NORA: Torvald says yes, I should. See, here's the dress. Torvald had it made for me down there; but now it's all so tattered that I just don't know—

2. Lively folk dance of southern Italy, thought to cure the bite of the tarantula.

MRS. LINDE: Oh, we'll fix that up in no time. It's nothing more than the trimmings—they're a bit loose here and there. Needle and thread? Good, now we have what we need.

NORA: Oh, how sweet of you!

MRS. LINDE: [Sewing.] So you'll be in disguise tomorrow, Nora. You know what? I'll stop by then for a moment and have a look at you all dressed up. But listen, I've absolutely forgotten to thank you for that pleasant evening yesterday.

NORA: [Getting up and walking about.] I don't think it was as pleasant as usual yesterday. You should have come to town a bit sooner, Kristine—Yes, Torvald really knows how to give a home elegance and charm.

MRS. LINDE: And you do, too, if you ask me. You're not your father's daughter for nothing. But tell me, is Dr. Rank always so down in the mouth as yesterday?

NORA: No, that was quite an exception. But he goes around critically ill all the time—tuberculosis of the spine, poor man. You know, his father was a disgusting thing who kept mistresses and so on—and that's why the son's been sickly from birth.

MRS. LINDE: [Lets her sewing fall to her lap.] But my dearest Nora, how do you know about such things?

NORA: [Walking more jauntily.] Hmp! When you've had three children, then you've had a few visits from—from women who know something of medicine, and they tell you this and that.

MRS. LINDE: [Resumes sewing; a short pause.] Does Dr. Rank come here every day?

NORA: Every blessed day. He's Torvald's best friend from childhood, and my good friend, too. Dr. Rank almost belongs to this house.

MRS. LINDE: But tell me—is he quite sincere? I mean, doesn't he rather enjoy flattering people?

NORA: Just the opposite. Why do you think that?

MRS. LINDE: When you introduced us yesterday, he was proclaiming that he'd often heard my name in this house; but later I noticed that your husband hadn't the slightest idea who I really was. So how could Dr. Rank—?

NORA: But it's all true, Kristine. You see, Torvald loves me beyond words, and, as he puts it, he'd like to keep me all to himself. For a long time he'd almost be jealous if I even mentioned any of my old friends back home. So of course I dropped that. But with Dr. Rank I talk a lot about such things, because he likes hearing about them.

MRS. LINDE: Now listen, Nora; in many ways you're still like a child. I'm a good deal older than you, with a little more experience. I'll tell you something: you ought to put an end to all this with Dr. Rank.

NORA: What should I put an end to?

MRS. LINDE: Both parts of it, I think. Yesterday you said something about a rich admirer who'd provide you with money—

NORA: Yes, one who doesn't exist—worse luck. So?

MRS. LINDE: Is Dr. Rank well off?

NORA: Yes, he is.

MRS. LINDE: With no dependents?

NORA: No, no one. But—

MRS. LINDE: And he's over here every day?

NORA: Yes, I told you that.

MRS. LINDE: How can a man of such refinement be so grasping?

NORA: I don't follow you at all.

MRS. LINDE: Now don't try to hide it, Nora. You think I can't guess who loaned you the forty-eight hundred crowns?

NORA: Are you out of your mind? How could you think such a thing! A friend of ours, who comes here every single day. What an intolerable situation that would have been!

MRS. LINDE: Then it really wasn't him.

NORA: No, absolutely not. It never even crossed my mind for a moment—And he had nothing to lend in those days; his inheritance came later.

MRS. LINDE: Well, I think that was a stroke of luck for you, Nora dear.

NORA: No, it never would have occurred to me to ask Dr. Rank—Still, I'm quite sure that if I had asked him—

MRS. LINDE: Which you won't, of course.

NORA: No, of course not. I can't see that I'd ever need to. But I'm quite positive that if I talked to Dr. Rank—

MRS. LINDE: Behind your husband's back?

NORA: I've got to clear up this other thing; that's also behind his back. I've got to clear it all up.

MRS. LINDE: Yes, I was saying that yesterday, but—

NORA: [Pacing up and down.] A man handles these problems so much better than a woman—

MRS. LINDE: One's husband does, yes.

NORA: Nonsense. [Stopping.] When you pay everything you owe, then you get your note back, right?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, naturally.

NORA: And can rip it into a million pieces and burn it up—that filthy scrap of paper!

MRS. LINDE: [Looking hard at her, laying her sewing aside, and rising slowly.] Nora, you're hiding something from me.

NORA: You can see it in my face?

MRS. LINDE: Something's happened to you since yesterday morning. Nora, what is it?

NORA: [Hurrying toward her.] Kristine! [Listening.] Shh! Torvald's home. Look, go in with the children a while. Torvald can't bear all this snipping and stitching. Let Anne-Marie help you.

MRS. LINDE: [Gathering up some of the things.] All right, but I'm not leaving here until we've talked this out. [She disappears into the room, left, as TORVALD enters from the hall.]

NORA: Oh, how I've been waiting for you, Torvald dear.

HELMER: Was that the dressmaker?

NORA: No, that was Kristine. She's helping me fix up my costume. You know, it's going to be quite attractive.

HELMER: Yes, wasn't that a bright idea I had?

NORA: Brilliant! But then wasn't I good as well to give in to you?

HELMER: Good—because you give in to your husband's judgment? All right, you little goose, I know you didn't mean it like that. But I won't disturb you. You'll want to have a fitting, I suppose.

NORA: And you'll be working?

HELMER: Yes. [Indicating a bundle of papers.] See. I've been down to the bank.
[Starts toward his study.]

NORA: Torvald.

HELMER: [Stops.] Yes.

NORA: If your little squirrel begged you, with all her heart and soul, for something—?

HELMER: What's that?

NORA: Then would you do it?

HELMER: First, naturally, I'd have to know what it was.

NORA: Your squirrel would scamper about and do tricks, if you'd only be sweet and give in.

HELMER: Out with it.

NORA: Your lark would be singing high and low in every room—

HELMER: Come on, she does that anyway.

NORA: I'd be a wood nymph and dance for you in the moonlight.

HELMER: Nora—don't tell me it's that same business from this morning?

NORA: [Coming closer.] Yes, Torvald, I beg you, please!

HELMER: And you actually have the nerve to drag that up again?

NORA: Yes, yes, you've got to give in to me; you have to let Krogstad keep his job in the bank.

HELMER: My dear Nora, I've slated his job for Mrs. Linde.

NORA: That's awfully kind of you. But you could just fire another clerk instead of Krogstad.

HELMER: This is the most incredible stubbornness! Because you go and give an impulsive promise to speak up for him, I'm expected to—

NORA: That's not the reason, Torvald. It's for your own sake. That man does writing for the worst papers; you said it yourself. He could do you any amount of harm. I'm scared to death of him—

HELMER: Ah, I understand. It's the old memories haunting you.

NORA: What do you mean by that?

HELMER: Of course, you're thinking about your father.

NORA: Yes, all right. Just remember how those nasty gossips wrote in the papers about Papa and slandered him so cruelly. I think they'd have had him dismissed if the department hadn't sent you up to investigate, and if you hadn't been so kind and open-minded toward him.

HELMER: My dear Nora, there's a notable difference between your father and me. Your father's official career was hardly above reproach. But mine is; and I hope it'll stay that way as long as I hold my position.

NORA: Oh, who can ever tell what vicious minds can invent? We could be so snug and happy now in our quiet, carefree home—you and I and the children, Torvald! That's why I'm pleading with you so—

HELMER: And just by pleading for him you make it impossible for me to keep him on. It's already known at the bank that I'm firing Krogstad. What if it's rumored around now that the new bank manager was vetoed by his wife—

NORA: Yes, what then—?

HELMER: Oh yes—as long as our little bundle of stubbornness gets her way—I should go and make myself ridiculous in front of the whole office—give people the idea I can be swayed by all kinds of outside pressure. Oh, you can bet I'd feel the effects of that soon enough! Besides—there's something that rules Krogstad right out at the bank as long as I'm the manager.

NORA: What's that?

HELMER: His moral failings I could maybe overlook if I had to—

NORA: Yes, Torvald, why not?

HELMER: And I hear he's quite efficient on the job. But he was a crony of mine back in my teens—one of those rash friendships that crop up again and again to embarrass you later in life. Well, I might as well say it straight out: we're on a first-name basis. And that tactless fool makes no effort at all to hide it in front of others. Quite the contrary—he thinks that entitles him to take a familiar air around me, and so every other second he comes booming out with his "Yes, Torvald!" and "Sure thing, Torvald!" I tell you, it's been excruciating for me. He's out to make my place in the bank unbearable.

NORA: Torvald, you can't be serious about all this.

HELMER: Oh no? Why not?

NORA: Because these are such petty considerations.

HELMER: What are you saying? Petty? You think I'm petty!

NORA: No, just the opposite, Torvald dear. That's exactly why—

HELMER: Never mind. You call my motives petty; then I might as well be just that. Petty! All right! We'll put a stop to this for good. [Goes to the hall door and calls.] Helene!

NORA: What do you want?

HELMER: [Searching among his papers.] A decision. [The MAID comes in.] Look here; take this letter; go out with it at once. Get hold of a messenger and have him deliver it. Quick now. It's already addressed. Wait, here's some money.

MAID: Yes, sir. [She leaves with the letter.]

HELMER: [Straightening his papers.] There, now, little Miss Willful.

NORA: [Breathlessly.] Torvald, what was that letter?

HELMER: Krogstad's notice.

NORA: Call it back, Torvald! There's still time. Oh, Torvald, call it back! Do it for my sake—for your sake, for the children's sake! Do you hear, Torvald; do it! You don't know how this can harm us.

HELMER: Too late.

NORA: Yes, too late.

HELMER: Nora dear, I can forgive you this panic, even though basically you're insulting me. Yes, you are! Or isn't it an insult to think that I should be afraid of a courtroom hack's revenge? But I forgive you anyway, because this shows so beautifully how much you love me. [Takes her in his arms.] This is the way it should be, my darling Nora. Whatever comes, you'll see: when it really counts, I have strength and courage enough as a man to take on the whole weight myself.

NORA: [Terrified.] What do you mean by that?

HELMER: The whole weight, I said.

NORA: [Resolutely.] No, never in all the world.

HELMER: Good. So we'll share it, Nora, as man and wife. That's as it should be. [Fondling her.] Are you happy now? There, there, there—not these frightened dove's eyes. It's nothing at all but empty fantasies—Now you should run through your tarantella and practice your tambourine. I'll go to the inner office and shut both doors, so I won't hear a thing; you can make all the noise you like. [Turning in the doorway.] And when Rank comes, just tell him where he can find me. [He nods to her and goes with his papers into the study, closing the door.]

NORA: [Standing as though rooted, dazed with fright, in a whisper.] He really could do it. He will do it. He'll do it in spite of everything. No, not that, never, never! Anything but that! Escape! A way out—[The doorbell rings.] Dr. Rank! Anything but that! Anything, whatever it is! [Her hands pass over her face, smoothing it; she pulls herself together, goes over and opens the hall door. DR. RANK stands outside, hanging his fur coat up. During the following scene, it begins getting dark.]

NORA: Hello, Dr. Rank. I recognized your ring. But you mustn't go in to Torvald yet; I believe he's working.

RANK: And you?

NORA: For you, I always have an hour to spare—you know that. [He has entered, and she shuts the door after him.]

RANK: Many thanks. I'll make use of these hours while I can.

NORA: What do you mean by that? While you can?

RANK: Does that disturb you?

NORA: Well, it's such an odd phrase. Is anything going to happen?

RANK: What's going to happen is what I've been expecting so long—but I honestly didn't think it would come so soon.

NORA: [Gripping his arm.] What is it you've found out? Dr. Rank, you have to tell me!

RANK: [Sitting by the stove.] It's all over with me. There's nothing to be done about it.

NORA: [Breathing easier.] Is it you—then—?

RANK: Who else? There's no point in lying to one's self. I'm the most miserable of all my patients, Mrs. Helmer. These past few days I've been auditing my internal accounts. Bankrupt! Within a month I'll probably be laid out and rotting in the churchyard.

NORA: Oh, what a horrible thing to say.

RANK: The thing itself is horrible. But the worst of it is all the other horror before it's over. There's only one final examination left; when I'm finished with that, I'll know about when my disintegration will begin. There's something I want to say. Helmer with his sensitivity has such a sharp distaste for anything ugly. I don't want him near my sickroom.

NORA: Oh, but Dr. Rank—

RANK: I won't have him in there. Under no condition. I'll lock my door to him—As soon as I'm completely sure of the worst, I'll send you my calling card marked with a black cross, and you'll know then the wreck has started to come apart.

NORA: No, today you're completely unreasonable. And I wanted you so much to be in a really good humor.

RANK: With death up my sleeve? And then to suffer this way for somebody else's sins. Is there any justice in that? And in every single family, in some way or another, this inevitable retribution of nature goes on—

- NORA: [Her hands pressed over her ears.] Oh, stuff! Cheer up! Please—be gay!
- RANK: Yes, I'd just as soon laugh at it all. My poor, innocent spine, serving time for my father's gay army days.
- NORA: [By the table, left.] He was so infatuated with asparagus tips and pâté de foie gras, wasn't that it?
- RANK: Yes—and with truffles.
- NORA: Truffles, yes. And then with oysters, I suppose?
- RANK: Yes, tons of oysters, naturally.
- NORA: And then the port and champagne to go with it. It's so sad that all these delectable things have to strike at our bones.
- RANK: Especially when they strike at the unhappy bones that never shared in the fun.
- NORA: Ah, that's the saddest of all.
- RANK: [Looks searchingly at her.] Hm.
- NORA: [After a moment.] Why did you smile?
- RANK: No, it was you who laughed.
- NORA: No, it was you who smiled, Dr. Rank!
- RANK: [Getting up.] You're even a bigger tease than I'd thought.
- NORA: I'm full of wild ideas today.
- RANK: That's obvious.
- NORA: [Putting both hands on his shoulders.] Dear, dear Dr. Rank, you'll never die for Torvald and me.
- RANK: Oh, that loss you'll easily get over. Those who go away are soon forgotten.
- NORA: [Looks fearfully at him.] You believe that?
- RANK: One makes new connections, and then—
- NORA: Who makes new connections?
- RANK: Both you and Torvald will when I'm gone. I'd say you're well under way already. What was that Mrs. Linde doing here last evening?
- NORA: Oh, come—you can't be jealous of poor Kristine?
- RANK: Oh yes, I am. She'll be my successor here in the house. When I'm down under, that woman will probably—
- NORA: Shh! Not so loud. She's right in there.
- RANK: Today as well. So you see.
- NORA: Only to sew on my dress. Good gracious, how unreasonable you are. [Sitting on the sofa.] Be nice now, Dr. Rank. Tomorrow you'll see how beautifully I'll dance; and you can imagine then that I'm dancing only for you—yes, and of course for Torvald, too—that's understood. [Takes various items out of the carton.] Dr. Rank, sit over here and I'll show you something.
- RANK: [Sitting.] What's that?
- NORA: Look here. Look.
- RANK: Silk stockings.
- NORA: Flesh-colored. Aren't they lovely? Now it's so dark here, but tomorrow—No, no, no, just look at the feet. Oh well, you might as well look at the rest.
- RANK: Hm—
- NORA: Why do you look so critical? Don't you believe they'll fit?
- RANK: I've never had any chance to form an opinion on that.
- NORA: [Glancing at him a moment.] Shame on you. [Hits him lightly on the ear with the stockings.] That's for you. [Puts them away again.]

RANK: And what other splendors am I going to see now?

NORA: Not the least bit more, because you've been naughty. [She hums a little and rummages among her things.]

RANK: [After a short silence.] When I sit here together with you like this, completely easy and open, then I don't know—I simply can't imagine—whatever would have become of me if I'd never come into this house.

NORA: [Smiling.] Yes, I really think you feel completely at ease with us.

RANK: [More quietly, staring straight ahead.] And then to have to go away from it all—

NORA: Nonsense, you're not going away.

RANK: [His voice unchanged.]—and not even be able to leave some poor show of gratitude behind, scarcely a fleeting regret—no more than a vacant place that anyone can fill.

NORA: And if I asked you now for—? No—

RANK: For what?

NORA: For a great proof of your friendship—

RANK: Yes, yes?

NORA: No, I mean—for an exceptionally big favor—

RANK: Would you really, for once, make me so happy?

NORA: Oh, you haven't the vaguest idea what it is.

RANK: All right, then tell me.

NORA: No, but I can't, Dr. Rank—it's all out of reason. It's advice and help, too—and a favor—

RANK: So much the better. I can't fathom what you're hinting at. Just speak out. Don't you trust me?

NORA: Of course. More than anyone else. You're my best and truest friend, I'm sure. That's why I want to talk to you. All right, then, Dr. Rank: there's something you can help me prevent. You know how deeply, how inexpressibly dearly Torvald loves me; he'd never hesitate a second to give up his life for me.

RANK: [Leaning close to her.] Nora—do you think he's the only one—

NORA: [With a slight start.] Who—?

RANK: Who'd gladly give up his life for you.

NORA: [Heavily.] I see.

RANK: I swore to myself you should know this before I'm gone. I'll never find a better chance. Yes, Nora, now you know. And also you know now that you can trust me beyond anyone else.

NORA: [Rising, natural and calm.] Let me by.

RANK: [Making room for her, but still sitting.] Nora—

NORA: [In the hall doorway.] Helene, bring the lamp in. [Goes over to the stove.] Ah, dear Dr. Rank, that was really mean of you.

RANK: [Getting up.] That I've loved you just as deeply as somebody else? Was that mean?

NORA: No, but that you came out and told me. That was quite unnecessary—

RANK: What do you mean? Have you known—?

[The MAID comes in with the lamp, sets it on the table, and goes out again.]

RANK: Nora—Mrs. Helmer—I'm asking you: have you known about it?

NORA: Oh, how can I tell what I know or don't know? Really, I don't know what to say—Why did you have to be so clumsy, Dr. Rank! Everything was so good.

RANK: Well, in any case, you now have the knowledge that my body and soul are at your command. So won't you speak out?

NORA: [Looking at him.] After that?

RANK: Please, just let me know what it is.

NORA: You can't know anything now.

RANK: I have to. You mustn't punish me like this. Give me the chance to do whatever is humanly possible for you.

NORA: Now there's nothing you can do for me. Besides, actually, I don't need any help. You'll see—it's only my fantasies. That's what it is. Of course! [Sits in the rocker, looks at him, and smiles.] What a nice one you are, Dr. Rank. Aren't you a little bit ashamed, now that the lamp is here?

RANK: No, not exactly. But perhaps I'd better go—for good?

NORA: No, you certainly can't do that. You must come here just as you always have. You know Torvald can't do without you.

RANK: Yes, but you?

NORA: You know how much I enjoy it when you're here.

RANK: That's precisely what threw me off. You're a mystery to me. So many times I've felt you'd almost rather be with me than with Helmer.

NORA: Yes—you see, there are some people that one loves most and other people that one would almost prefer being with.

RANK: Yes, there's something to that.

NORA: When I was back home, of course I loved Papa most. But I always thought it was so much fun when I could sneak down to the maids' quarters, because they never tried to improve me, and it was always so amusing, the way they talked to each other.

RANK: Aha, so it's their place that I've filled.

NORA: [Jumping up and going to him.] Oh, dear, sweet Dr. Rank, that's not what I meant at all. But you can understand that with Torvald it's just the same as with Papa—

[The MAID enters from the hall.]

MAID: Ma'am—please! [She whispers to NORA and hands her a calling card.]

NORA: [Glancing at the card.] Ah! [Slips it into her pocket.]

RANK: Anything wrong?

NORA: No, no, not at all. It's only some—it's my new dress—RANK: Really? But—there's your dress.

NORA: Oh, that. But this is another one—I ordered it—Torvald mustn't know—

RANK: Ah, now we have the big secret.

NORA: That's right. Just go in with him—he's back in the inner study. Keep him there as long as—

RANK: Don't worry. He won't get away. [Goes into the study.]

NORA: [To the MAID.] And he's standing waiting in the kitchen?

MAID: Yes, he came up by the back stairs.

NORA: But didn't you tell him somebody was here?

MAID: Yes, but that didn't do any good.

NORA: He won't leave?

MAID: No, he won't go till he's talked with you, ma'am.

NORA: Let him come in, then—but quietly. Helene, don't breathe a word about this. It's a surprise for my husband.

MAID: Yes, yes, I understand—[Goes out.]

NORA: This horror—it's going to happen. No, no, no, it can't happen, it mustn't.

[She goes and bolts HELMER's door. The MAID opens the hall door for KROGSTAD and shuts it behind him. He is dressed for travel in a fur coat, boots, and a fur cap.]

NORA: [Going toward him.] Talk softly. My husband's home.

KROGSTAD: Well, good for him.

NORA: What do you want?

KROGSTAD: Some information.

NORA: Hurry up, then. What is it?

KROGSTAD: You know, of course, that I got my notice.

NORA: I couldn't prevent it, Mr. Krogstad. I fought for you to the bitter end, but nothing worked.

KROGSTAD: Does your husband's love for you run so thin? He knows everything

I can expose you to, and all the same he dares to—

NORA: How can you imagine he knows anything about this?

KROGSTAD: Ah, no—I can't imagine it either, now. It's not at all like my fine Torvald Helmer to have so much guts—

NORA: Mr. Krogstad, I demand respect for my husband!

KROGSTAD: Why, of course—all due respect. But since the lady's keeping it so carefully hidden, may I presume to ask if you're also a bit better informed than yesterday about what you've actually done?

NORA: More than you ever could teach me.

KROGSTAD: Yes, I am such an awful lawyer.

NORA: What is it you want from me?

KROGSTAD: Just a glimpse of how you are, Mrs. Helmer. I've been thinking about you all day long. A cashier, a night-court scribbler, a—well, a type like me also has a little of what they call a heart, you know.

NORA: Then show it. Think of my children.

KROGSTAD: Did you or your husband ever think of mine? But never mind. I simply wanted to tell you that you don't need to take this thing too seriously. For the present, I'm not proceeding with any action.

NORA: Oh no, really! Well—I knew that.

KROGSTAD: Everything can be settled in a friendly spirit. It doesn't have to get around town at all; it can stay just among us three.

NORA: My husband must never know anything of this.

KROGSTAD: How can you manage that? Perhaps you can pay me the balance?

NORA: No, not right now.

KROGSTAD: Or you know some way of raising the money in a day or two?

NORA: No way that I'm willing to use.

KROGSTAD: Well, it wouldn't have done you any good, anyway. If you stood in front of me with a fistful of bills, you still couldn't buy your signature back.

NORA: Then tell me what you're going to do with it.

KROGSTAD: I'll just hold onto it—keep it on file. There's no outsider who'll even get wind of it. So if you've been thinking of taking some desperate step—

NORA: I have.

KROGSTAD: Been thinking of running away from home—

NORA: I have!

KROGSTAD: Or even of something worse—

NORA: How could you guess that?

KROGSTAD: You can drop those thoughts.

NORA: How could you guess I was thinking of that?

KROGSTAD: Most of us think about that at first. I thought about it too, but I discovered I hadn't the courage—

NORA: [Lifelessly.] I don't either.

KROGSTAD: [Relieved.] That's true, you haven't the courage? You too?

NORA: I don't have it—I don't have it.

KROGSTAD: It would be terribly stupid, anyway. After that first storm at home blows out, why, then—I have here in my pocket a letter for your husband—

NORA: Telling everything?

KROGSTAD: As charitably as possible.

NORA: [Quickly.] He mustn't ever get that letter. Tear it up. I'll find some way to get money.

KROGSTAD: Beg pardon, Mrs. Helmer, but I think I just told you—

NORA: Oh, I don't mean the money I owe you. Let me know how much you want from my husband, and I'll manage it.

KROGSTAD: I don't want any money from your husband.

NORA: What do you want, then?

KROGSTAD: I'll tell you what. I want to recoup, Mrs. Helmer; I want to get on in the world—and there's where your husband can help me. For a year and a half I've kept myself clean of anything disreputable—all that time struggling with the worst conditions; but I was satisfied, working my way up step by step. Now I've been written right off, and I'm just not in the mood to come crawling back. I tell you, I want to move on. I want to get back in the bank—in a better position. Your husband can set up a job for me—

NORA: He'll never do that!

KROGSTAD: He'll do it. I know him. He won't dare breathe a word of protest. And once I'm in there together with him, you just wait and see! Inside of a year, I'll be the manager's right-hand man. It'll be Nils Krogstad, not Torvald Helmer, who runs the bank.

NORA: You'll never see the day!

KROGSTAD: Maybe you think you can—

NORA: I have the courage now—for that.

KROGSTAD: Oh, you don't scare me. A smart, spoiled lady like you—

NORA: You'll see; you'll see!

KROGSTAD: Under the ice, maybe? Down in the freezing, coal-black water? There, till you float up in the spring, ugly, unrecognizable, with your hair falling out—

NORA: You don't frighten me.

KROGSTAD: Nor do you frighten me. One doesn't do these things, Mrs. Helmer. Besides, what good would it be? I'd still have him safe in my pocket.

NORA: Afterwards? When I'm no longer—?

KROGSTAD: Are you forgetting that I'll be in control then over your final reputation? [NORA stands speechless, staring at him.] Good; now I've warned you. Don't do anything stupid. When Helmer's read my letter, I'll be waiting for his reply. And bear in mind that it's your husband himself who's forced me back to my old ways. I'll never forgive him for that. Good-bye, Mrs. Helmer. [He goes out through the hall.]

NORA: [Goes to the hall door, opens it a crack, and listens.] He's gone. Didn't leave the letter. Oh no, no, that's impossible too! [Opening the door more and more.] What's that? He's standing outside—not going downstairs. He's thinking it over? Maybe he'll—? [A letter falls in the mailbox; then KROGSTAD's footsteps are heard, dying away down a flight of stairs. NORA gives a muffled cry and runs over toward the sofa table. A short pause.] In the mailbox. [Slips warily over to the hall door.] It's lying there. Torvald, Torvald—now we're lost!

MRS. LINDE: [Entering with the costume from the room, left.] There now, I can't see anything else to mend. Perhaps you'd like to try—NORA: [In a hoarse whisper.] Kristine, come here.

MRS. LINDE: [Tossing the dress on the sofa.] What's wrong? You look upset.

NORA: Come here. See that letter? There! Look—through the glass in the mailbox.

MRS. LINDE: Yes, yes, I see it.

NORA: That letter's from Krogstad—

MRS. LINDE: Nora—it's Krogstad who loaned you the money!

NORA: Yes, and now Torvald will find out everything.

MRS. LINDE: Believe me, Nora, it's best for both of you.

NORA: There's more you don't know. I forged a name.

MRS. LINDE: But for heaven's sake—?

NORA: I only want to tell you that, Kristine, so that you can be my witness.

MRS. LINDE: Witness? Why should I—?

NORA: If I should go out of my mind—it could easily happen—

MRS. LINDE: Nora!

NORA: Or anything else occurred—so I couldn't be present here—

MRS. LINDE: Nora, Nora, you aren't yourself at all!

NORA: And someone should try to take on the whole weight, all of the guilt, you follow me—

MRS. LINDE: Yes, of course, but why do you think—?

NORA: Then you're the witness that it isn't true, Kristine. I'm very much myself; my mind right now is perfectly clear; and I'm telling you: nobody else has known about this; I alone did everything. Remember that.

MRS. LINDE: I will. But I don't understand all this.

NORA: Oh, how could you ever understand it? It's the miracle now that's going to take place.

MRS. LINDE: The miracle?

NORA: Yes, the miracle. But it's so awful, Kristine. It mustn't take place, not for anything in the world.

MRS. LINDE: I'm going right over and talk with Krogstad.

NORA: Don't go near him; he'll do you some terrible harm!

MRS. LINDE: There was a time once when he'd gladly have done anything for me.

NORA: He?

MRS. LINDE: Where does he live?

NORA: Oh, how do I know? Yes. [Searches in her pocket.] Here's his card. But the letter, the letter—!

HELMER: [From the study, knocking on the door.] Nora!

NORA: [With a cry of fear.] Oh! What is it? What do you want?

HELMER: Now, now, don't be so frightened. We're not coming in. You locked the door—are you trying on the dress?

NORA: Yes, I'm trying it. I'll look just beautiful, Torvald.

MRS. LINDE: [Who has read the card.] He's living right around the corner.

NORA: Yes, but what's the use? We're lost. The letter's in the box.

MRS. LINDE: And your husband has the key?

NORA: Yes, always.

MRS. LINDE: Krogstad can ask for his letter back unread; he can find some excuse—

NORA: But it's just this time that Torvald usually—

MRS. LINDE: Stall him. Keep him in there. I'll be back as quick as I can. [She hurries out through the hall entrance.]

NORA: [Goes to HELMER's door, opens it, and peers in.] Torvald!

HELMER: [From the inner study.] Well—does one dare set foot in one's own living room at last? Come on, Rank, now we'll get a look—[In the doorway.] But what's this?

NORA: What, Torvald dear?

HELMER: Rank had me expecting some grand masquerade.

RANK: [In the doorway.] That was my impression, but I must have been wrong.

NORA: No one can admire me in my splendor—not till tomorrow.

HELMER: But Nora dear, you look so exhausted. Have you practiced too hard?

NORA: No, I haven't practiced at all yet.

HELMER: You know, it's necessary—

NORA: Oh, it's absolutely necessary, Torvald. But I can't get anywhere without your help. I've forgotten the whole thing completely.

HELMER: Ah, we'll soon take care of that.

NORA: Yes, take care of me, Torvald, please! Promise me that? Oh, I'm so nervous. That big party—You must give up everything this evening for me. No business—don't even touch your pen. Yes? Dear Torvald, promise?

HELMER: It's a promise. Tonight I'm totally at your service—you little helpless thing. Hm—but first there's one thing I want to—[Goes toward the hall door.]

NORA: What are you looking for?

HELMER: Just to see if there's any mail.

NORA: No, no, don't do that, Torvald!

HELMER: Now what?

NORA: Torvald, please. There isn't any.

HELMER: Let me look, though. [Starts out. NORA, at the piano, strikes the first notes of the tarantella. HELMER, at the door, stops.] Aha!

NORA: I can't dance tomorrow if I don't practice with you.

HELMER: [Going over to her.] Nora dear, are you really so frightened?

NORA: Yes, so terribly frightened. Let me practice right now; there's still time before dinner. Oh, sit down and play for me, Torvald. Direct me. Teach me, the way you always have.

HELMER: Gladly, if it's what you want. [Sits at the piano.]

NORA: [Snatches the tambourine up from the box, then a long, varicolored shawl, which she throws around herself, whereupon she springs forward and cries out:] Play for me now! Now I'll dance!

[HELMER plays and NORA dances. RANK stands behind HELMER at the piano and looks on.] HELMER: [As he plays.] Slower. Slow down.

NORA: Can't change it.

HELMER: Not so violent, Nora!

NORA: Has to be just like this.

HELMER: [Stopping.] No, no, that won't do at all.

NORA: [Laughing and swinging her tambourine.] Isn't that what I told you?

RANK: Let me play for her.

HELMER: [Getting up.] Yes, go on. I can teach her more easily then.

[RANK sits at the piano and plays; NORA dances more and more wildly. HELMER has stationed himself by the stove and repeatedly gives her directions; she seems not to hear them; her hair loosens and falls over her shoulders; she does not notice, but goes on dancing. MRS. LINDE enters.]

MRS. LINDE: [Standing dumbfounded at the door.] Ah—!

NORA: [Still dancing.] See what fun, Kristine!

HELMER: But Nora darling, you dance as if your life were at stake.

NORA: And it is.

HELMER: Rank, stop! This is pure madness. Stop it, I say!

[RANK breaks off playing, and NORA halts abruptly.]

HELMER: [Going over to her.] I never would have believed it. You've forgotten everything I taught you.

NORA: [Throwing away the tambourine.] You see for yourself.

HELMER: Well, there's certainly room for instruction here.

NORA: Yes, you see how important it is. You've got to teach me to the very last minute. Promise me that, Torvald?

HELMER: You can bet on it.

NORA: You mustn't, either today or tomorrow, think about anything else but me; you mustn't open any letters—or the mailbox—

HELMER: Ah, it's still the fear of that man—

NORA: Oh yes, that too.

HELMER: Nora, it's written all over you—there's already a letter from him out there.

NORA: I don't know. I guess so. But you mustn't read such things now; there mustn't be anything ugly between us before it's all over.

RANK: [Quietly to HELMER.] You shouldn't deny her.

HELMER: [Putting his arm around her.] The child can have her way. But tomorrow night, after you've danced—NORA: Then you'll be free.

MAID: [In the doorway, right.] Ma'am, dinner is served.

NORA: We'll be wanting champagne, Helene.

MAID: Very good, ma'am. [Goes out.]

HELMER: So—a regular banquet, hm?

NORA: Yes, a banquet—champagne till daybreak! [Calling out.] And some macaroons, Helene. Heaps of them—just this once.

HELMER: [Taking her hands.] Now, now, now—no hysterics. Be my own little lark again.

NORA: Oh, I will soon enough. But go on in—and you, Dr. Rank. Kristine, help me put up my hair.

RANK: [Whispering, as they go.] There's nothing wrong—really wrong, is there?

HELMER: Oh, of course not. It's nothing more than this childish anxiety I was telling you about. [They go out, right.]

NORA: Well?

MRS. LINDE: Left town.

NORA: I could see by your face.

MRS. LINDE: He'll be home tomorrow evening. I wrote him a note.

NORA: You shouldn't have. Don't try to stop anything now. After all, it's a wonderful joy, this waiting here for the miracle.

MRS. LINDE: What is it you're waiting for?

NORA: Oh, you can't understand that. Go in to them; I'll be along in a moment.

[MRS. LINDE goes into the dining room. NORA stands a short while as if composing herself; then she looks at her watch.]

NORA: Five. Seven hours to midnight. Twenty-four hours to the midnight after, and then the tarantella's done. Seven and twenty-four? Thirty-one hours to live.

HELMER: [In the doorway, right.] What's become of the little lark?

NORA: [Going toward him with open arms.] Here's your lark!

ACT III

Same scene. The table, with chairs around it, has been moved to the center of the room. A lamp on the table is lit. The hall door stands open. Dance music drifts down from the floor above. MRS. LINDE sits at the table, absently paging through a book, trying to read, but apparently unable to focus her thoughts. Once or twice she pauses, tensely listening for a sound at the outer entrance.

MRS. LINDE: [Glancing at her watch.] Not yet—and there's hardly any time left. If only he's not—[Listening again.] Ah, there he is. [She goes out in the hall and cautiously opens the outer door. Quiet footsteps are heard on the stairs. She whispers.] Come in. Nobody's here.

KROGSTAD: [In the doorway.] I found a note from you at home. What's back of all this?

MRS. LINDE: I just had to talk to you.

KROGSTAD: Oh? And it just had to be here in this house?

MRS. LINDE: At my place it was impossible; my room hasn't a private entrance. Come in; we're all alone. The maid's asleep, and the Helmers are at the dance upstairs.

KROGSTAD: [Entering the room.] Well, well, the Helmers are dancing tonight? Really?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, why not?

KROGSTAD: How true—why not?

MRS. LINDE: All right, Krogstad, let's talk.

KROGSTAD: Do we two have anything more to talk about?

MRS. LINDE: We have a great deal to talk about.

KROGSTAD: I wouldn't have thought so.

MRS. LINDE: No, because you've never understood me, really.

KROGSTAD: Was there anything more to understand—except what's all too common in life? A calculating woman throws over a man the moment a better catch comes by.

MRS. LINDE: You think I'm so thoroughly calculating? You think I broke it off lightly?

KROGSTAD: Didn't you?

MRS. LINDE: Nils—is that what you really thought?

KROGSTAD: If you cared, then why did you write me the way you did?

MRS. LINDE: What else could I do? If I had to break off with you, then it was my job as well to root out everything you felt for me.

KROGSTAD: [Wringing his hands.] So that was it. And this—all this, simply for money!

MRS. LINDE: Don't forget I had a helpless mother and two small brothers. We couldn't wait for you, Nils; you had such a long road ahead of you then.

KROGSTAD: That may be; but you still hadn't the right to abandon me for somebody else's sake.

MRS. LINDE: Yes—I don't know. So many, many times I've asked myself if I did have that right.

KROGSTAD: [More softly.] When I lost you, it was as if all the solid ground dissolved from under my feet. Look at me; I'm a half-drowned man now, hanging onto a wreck.

MRS. LINDE: Help may be near.

KROGSTAD: It was near—but then you came and blocked it off.

MRS. LINDE: Without my knowing it, Nils. Today for the first time I learned that it's you I'm replacing at the bank.

KROGSTAD: All right—I believe you. But now that you know, will you step aside?

MRS. LINDE: No, because that wouldn't benefit you in the slightest.

KROGSTAD: Not "benefit" me, hm! I'd step aside anyway.

MRS. LINDE: I've learned to be realistic. Life and hard, bitter necessity have taught me that.

KROGSTAD: And life's taught me never to trust fine phrases.

MRS. LINDE: Then life's taught you a very sound thing. But you do have to trust in actions, don't you?

KROGSTAD: What does that mean?

MRS. LINDE: You said you were hanging on like a half-drowned man to a wreck.

KROGSTAD: I've good reason to say that.

MRS. LINDE: I'm also like a half-drowned woman on a wreck. No one to suffer with; no one to care for.

KROGSTAD: You made your choice.

MRS. LINDE: There wasn't any choice then.

KROGSTAD: So—what of it?

MRS. LINDE: Nils, if only we two shipwrecked people could reach across to each other.

KROGSTAD: What are you saying?

MRS. LINDE: Two on one wreck are at least better off than each on his own.

KROGSTAD: Kristine!

MRS. LINDE: Why do you think I came into town?

KROGSTAD: Did you really have some thought of me?

MRS. LINDE: I have to work to go on living. All my born days, as long as I can remember, I've worked, and it's been my best and my only joy. But now I'm completely alone in the world; it frightens me to be so empty and lost. To work for yourself—there's no joy in that. Nils, give me something—someone to work for.

KROGSTAD: I don't believe all this. It's just some hysterical feminine urge to go out and make a noble sacrifice.

MRS. LINDE: Have you ever found me to be hysterical?

KROGSTAD: Can you honestly mean this? Tell me—do you know everything about my past?

MRS. LINDE: Yes.

KROGSTAD: And you know what they think I'm worth around here.

MRS. LINDE: From what you were saying before, it would seem that with me you could have been another person.

KROGSTAD: I'm positive of that.

MRS. LINDE: Couldn't it happen still?

KROGSTAD: Kristine—you're saying this in all seriousness? Yes, you are! I can see it in you. And do you really have the courage, then—?

MRS. LINDE: I need to have someone to care for; and your children need a mother. We both need each other. Nils, I have faith that you're good at heart—I'll risk everything together with you.

KROGSTAD: [Gripping her hands.] Kristine, thank you, thank you—Now I know I can win back a place in their eyes. Yes—but I forgot—

MRS. LINDE: [Listening.] Shh! The tarantella. Go now! Go now!

KROGSTAD: Why? What is it?

MRS. LINDE: Hear the dance up there? When that's over, they'll be coming down.

KROGSTAD: Oh, then I'll go. But—it's all pointless. Of course, you don't know the move I made against the Helmers.

MRS. LINDE: Yes, Nils, I know.

KROGSTAD: And all the same, you have the courage to—?

MRS. LINDE: I know how far despair can drive a man like you.

KROGSTAD: Oh, if I only could take it all back.

MRS. LINDE: You easily could—your letter's still lying in the mailbox.

KROGSTAD: Are you sure of that?

MRS. LINDE: Positive. But—

KROGSTAD: [Looks at her searchingly.] Is that the meaning of it, then? You'll save your friend at any price. Tell me straight out. Is that it?

MRS. LINDE: Nils—anyone who's sold herself for somebody else once isn't going to do it again.

KROGSTAD: I'll demand my letter back.

MRS. LINDE: No, no.

KROGSTAD: Yes, of course. I'll stay here till Helmer comes down; I'll tell him to give me my letter again—that it only involves my dismissal—that he shouldn't read it—

MRS. LINDE: No, Nils, don't call the letter back.

KROGSTAD: But wasn't that exactly why you wrote me to come here?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, in that first panic. But it's been a whole day and night since then, and in that time I've seen such incredible things in this house. Helmer's got to learn everything; this dreadful secret has to be aired; those two have to come to a full understanding; all these lies and evasions can't go on.

KROGSTAD: Well, then, if you want to chance it. But at least there's one thing I can do, and do right away—

MRS. LINDE: [Listening.] Go now, go, quick! The dance is over. We're not safe another second.

KROGSTAD: I'll wait for you downstairs.

MRS. LINDE: Yes, please do; take me home.

KROGSTAD: I can't believe it; I've never been so happy. [He leaves by way of the outer door; the door between the room and the hall stays open.]

MRS. LINDE: [Straightening up a bit and getting together her street clothes.] How different now! How different! Someone to work for, to live for—a home to build. Well, it is worth the try! Oh, if they'd only come! [Listening.] Ah, there they are. Bundle up. [She picks up her hat and coat. NORA'S and HELMER'S voices can be heard outside; a key turns in the lock, and HELMER brings NORA into the hall almost by force. She is wearing the Italian costume with a large black shawl about her; he has on evening dress, with a black domino³ open over it.]

NORA: [Struggling in the doorway.] No, no, no, not inside! I'm going up again. I don't want to leave so soon.

HELMER: But Nora dear—

NORA: Oh, I beg you, please, Torvald. From the bottom of my heart, please—only an hour more!

HELMER: Not a single minute, Nora darling. You know our agreement. Come on, in we go; you'll catch cold out here. [In spite of her resistance, he gently draws her into the room.]

MRS. LINDE: Good evening.

NORA: Kristine!

HELMER: Why, Mrs. Linde—are you here so late?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, I'm sorry, but I did want to see Nora in costume.

NORA: Have you been sitting here, waiting for me?

MRS. LINDE: Yes. I didn't come early enough; you were all upstairs; and then I thought I really couldn't leave without seeing you.

HELMER: [Removing NORA'S shawl.] Yes, take a good look. She's worth looking at, I can tell you that, Mrs. Linde. Isn't she lovely?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, I should say—

HELMER: A dream of loveliness, isn't she? That's what everyone thought at the party, too. But she's horribly stubborn—this sweet little thing. What's to be done with her? Can you imagine, I almost had to use force to pry her away.

3. Hood worn by members of some religious orders.

NORA: Oh, Torvald, you're going to regret you didn't indulge me, even for just a half hour more.

HELMER: There, you see. She danced her tarantella and got a tumultuous hand—which was well earned, although the performance may have been a bit too naturalistic—I mean it rather overstepped the proprieties of art. But never mind—what's important is, she made a success, an overwhelming success. You think I could let her stay on after that and spoil the effect? Oh no; I took my lovely little Capri girl—my capricious little Capri girl, I should say—took her under my arm; one quick tour of the ballroom, a curtsy to every side, and then—as they say in novels—the beautiful vision disappeared. An exit should always be effective, Mrs. Linde, but that's what I can't get Nora to grasp. Phew, it's hot in here. [Flings the domino on a chair and opens the door to his room.] Why's it dark in here? Oh yes, of course. Excuse me. [He goes in and lights a couple of candles.]

NORA: [In a sharp, breathless whisper.] So?

MRS. LINDE: [Quietly.] I talked with him.

NORA: And—?

MRS. LINDE: Nora—you must tell your husband everything.

NORA: [Dully.] I knew it.

MRS. LINDE: You've got nothing to fear from Krogstad, but you have to speak out.

NORA: I won't tell.

MRS. LINDE: Then the letter will.

NORA: Thanks, Kristine. I know now what's to be done. Shh!

HELMER: [Reentering.] Well, then, Mrs. Linde—have you admired her?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, and now I'll say good night.

HELMER: Oh, come, so soon? Is this yours, this knitting?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, thanks. I nearly forgot it.

HELMER: Do you knit, then?

MRS. LINDE: Oh yes.

HELMER: You know what? You should embroider instead.

MRS. LINDE: Really? Why?

HELMER: Yes, because it's a lot prettier. See here, one holds the embroidery so, in the left hand, and then one guides the needle with the right—so—in an easy, sweeping curve—right?

MRS. LINDE: Yes, I guess that's—

HELMER: But, on the other hand, knitting—it can never be anything but ugly. Look, see here, the arms tucked in, the knitting needles going up and down—there's something Chinese about it. Ah, that was really a glorious champagne they served.

MRS. LINDE: Yes, good night, Nora, and don't be stubborn anymore.

HELMER: Well put, Mrs. Linde!

MRS. LINDE: Good night, Mr. Helmer.

HELMER: [Accompanying her to the door.] Good night, good night. I hope you get home all right. I'd be very happy to—but you don't have far to go. Good night, good night. [She leaves. He shuts the door after her and returns.] There, now, at last we got her out the door. She's a deadly bore, that creature.

NORA: Aren't you pretty tired, Torvald?

HELMER: No, not a bit.

NORA: You're not sleepy?

HELMER: Not at all. On the contrary, I'm feeling quite exhilarated. But you? Yes, you really look tired and sleepy.

NORA: Yes, I'm very tired. Soon now I'll sleep.

HELMER: See! You see! I was right all along that we shouldn't stay longer.

NORA: Whatever you do is always right.

HELMER: [Kissing her brow.] Now my little lark talks sense. Say, did you notice what a time Rank was having tonight?

NORA: Oh, was he? I didn't get to speak with him.

HELMER: I scarcely did either, but it's a long time since I've seen him in such high spirits. [Gazes at her a moment, then comes nearer her.] Hm—it's marvelous, though, to be back home again—to be completely alone with you. Oh, you bewitchingly lovely young woman!

NORA: Torvald, don't look at me like that!

HELMER: Can't I look at my richest treasure? At all that beauty that's mine, mine alone—completely and utterly.

NORA: [Moving around to the other side of the table.] You mustn't talk to me that way tonight.

HELMER: [Following her.] The tarantella is still in your blood, I can see—and it makes you even more enticing. Listen. The guests are beginning to go. [Dropping his voice.] Nora—it'll soon be quiet through this whole house.

NORA: Yes, I hope so.

HELMER: You do, don't you, my love? Do you realize—when I'm out at a party like this with you—do you know why I talk to you so little, and keep such a distance away; just send you a stolen look now and then—you know why I do it? It's because I'm imagining then that you're my secret darling, my secret young bride-to-be, and that no one suspects there's anything between us.

NORA: Yes, yes; oh, yes, I know you're always thinking of me.

HELMER: And then when we leave and I place the shawl over those fine young rounded shoulders—over that wonderful curving neck—then I pretend that you're my young bride, that we're just coming from the wedding, that for the first time I'm bringing you into my house—that for the first time I'm alone with you—completely alone with you, your trembling young beauty! All this evening I've longed for nothing but you. When I saw you turn and sway in the tarantella—my blood was pounding till I couldn't stand it—that's why I brought you down here so early—

NORA: Go away, Torvald! Leave me alone. I don't want all this.

HELMER: What do you mean? Nora, you're teasing me. You will, won't you? Aren't I your husband—?

[A knock at the outside door.]

NORA: [Startled.] What's that?

HELMER: [Going toward the half.] Who is it?

RANK: [Outside.] It's me. May I come in a moment?

HELMER: [With quiet irritation.] Oh, what does he want now? [Aloud.] Hold on. [Goes and opens the door.] Oh, how nice that you didn't just pass us by!

RANK: I thought I heard your voice, and then I wanted so badly to have a look in.
 [Lightly glancing about.] Ah, me, these old familiar haunts. You have it snug and cozy in here, you two.

HELMER: You seemed to be having it pretty cozy upstairs, too.

RANK: Absolutely. Why shouldn't I? Why not take in everything in life? As much as you can, anyway, and as long as you can. The wine was superb—

HELMER: The champagne especially.

RANK: You noticed that too? It's amazing how much I could guzzle down.

NORA: Torvald also drank a lot of champagne this evening.

RANK: Oh?

NORA: Yes, and that always makes him so entertaining.

RANK: Well, why shouldn't one have a pleasant evening after a well-spent day?

HELMER: Well spent? I'm afraid I can't claim that.

RANK: [Slapping him on the back.] But I can, you see!

NORA: Dr. Rank, you must have done some scientific research today.

RANK: Quite so.

HELMER: Come now—little Nora talking about scientific research!

NORA: And can I congratulate you on the results?

RANK: Indeed you may.

NORA: Then they were good?

RANK: The best possible for both doctor and patient—certainty.

NORA: [Quickly and searchingly.] Certainty?

RANK: Complete certainty. So don't I owe myself a gay evening afterwards?

NORA: Yes, you're right, Dr. Rank.

HELMER: I'm with you—just so long as you don't have to suffer for it in the morning.

RANK: Well, one never gets something for nothing in life.

NORA: Dr. Rank—are you very fond of masquerade parties?

RANK: Yes, if there's a good array of odd disguises—

NORA: Tell me, what should we two go as at the next masquerade?

HELMER: You little featherhead—already thinking of the next!

RANK: We two? I'll tell you what: you must go as Charmed Life—

HELMER: Yes, but find a costume for that!

RANK: Your wife can appear just as she looks every day.

HELMER: That was nicely put. But don't you know what you're going to be?

RANK: Yes, Helmer, I've made up my mind.

HELMER: Well?

RANK: At the next masquerade I'm going to be invisible.

HELMER: That's a funny idea.

RANK: They say there's a hat—black, huge—have you never heard of the hat that makes you invisible? You put it on, and then no one on earth can see you.

HELMER: [Suppressing a smile.] Ah, of course.

RANK: But I'm quite forgetting what I came for. Helmer, give me a cigar, one of the dark Havanas.

HELMER: With the greatest pleasure. [Holds out his case.]

RANK: Thanks. [Takes one and cuts off the tip.]

NORA: [Striking a match] Let me give you a light.

RANK: Thank you. [She holds the match for him; he lights the cigar.] And now good-bye.

HELMER: Good-bye, good-bye, old friend.

NORA: Sleep well, Doctor.

RANK: Thanks for that wish.

NORA: Wish me the same.

RANK: You? All right, if you like—Sleep well. And thanks for the light. [He nods to them both and leaves.]

HELMER: [His voice subdued.] He's been drinking heavily.

NORA: [Absently.] Could be. [HELMER takes his keys from his pocket and goes out in the hall.] Torvald—what are you after?

HELMER: Got to empty the mailbox; it's nearly full. There won't be room for the morning papers.

NORA: Are you working tonight?

HELMER: You know I'm not. Why—what's this? Someone's been at the lock.

NORA: At the lock—?

HELMER: Yes, I'm positive. What do you suppose—? I can't imagine one of the maids—? Here's a broken hairpin. Nora, it's yours—

NORA: [Quickly.] Then it must be the children—

HELMER: You'd better break them of that. Hm, hm—well, opened it after all. [Takes the contents out and calls into the kitchen.] Helene! Helene, would you put out the lamp in the hall. [He returns to the room, shutting the hall door, then displays the handful of mail.] Look how it's piled up. [Sorting through them.] Now what's this?

NORA: [At the window.] The letter! Oh, Torvald, no!

HELMER: Two calling cards—from Rank.

NORA: From Dr. Rank?

HELMER: [Examining them.] “Dr. Rank, Consulting Physician.” They were on top. He must have dropped them in as he left.

NORA: Is there anything on them?

HELMER: There's a black cross over the name. See? That's a gruesome notion. He could almost be announcing his own death.

NORA: That's just what he's doing.

HELMER: What! You've heard something? Something he's told you?

NORA: Yes. That when those cards came, he'd be taking his leave of us. He'll shut himself in now and die.

HELMER: Ah, my poor friend! Of course I knew he wouldn't be here much longer. But so soon—And then to hide himself away like a wounded animal.

NORA: If it has to happen, then it's best it happens in silence—don't you think so, Torvald?

HELMER: [Pacing up and down.] He'd grown right into our lives. I simply can't imagine him gone. He with his suffering and loneliness—like a dark cloud setting off our sunlit happiness. Well, maybe it's best this way. For him, at least. [Standing still.] And maybe for us too, Nora. Now we're thrown back on each other, completely. [Embracing her.] Oh you, my darling wife, how can I hold you close enough? You know what, Nora—time and again I've wished you were in some terrible danger, just so I could stake my life and soul and everything, for your sake.

NORA: [Tearing herself away, her voice firm and decisive.] Now you must read your mail, Torvald.

HELMER: No, no, not tonight. I want to stay with you, dearest.

NORA: With a dying friend on your mind?

HELMER: You're right. We've both had a shock. There's ugliness between us—these thoughts of death and corruption. We'll have to get free of them first. Until then—we'll stay apart.

NORA: [Clinging about his neck.] Torvald—good night! Good night!

HELMER: [Kissing her on the cheek.] Good night, little songbird. Sleep well, Nora. I'll be reading my mail now. [He takes the letters into his room and shuts the door after him.]

NORA: [With bewildered glances, groping about, seizing HELMER'S domino, throwing it around her, and speaking in short, hoarse, broken whispers.] Never see him again. Never, never. [Putting her shawl over her head.] Never see the children either—they, too. Never, never. Oh, the freezing black water! The depths—down—Oh, I wish it were over—He has it now; he's reading it—now. Oh no, no, not yet. Torvald, good-bye, you and the children—[She starts for the hall; as she does, HELMER throws open his door and stands with an open letter in his hand.]

HELMER: Nora!

NORA: [Screams.] Oh—!

HELMER: What is this? You know what's in this letter?

NORA: Yes, I know. Let me go! Let me out!

HELMER: [Holding her back.] Where are you going?

NORA: [Struggling to break loose.] You can't save me, Torvald!

HELMER: [Slumping back.] True! Then it's true what he writes? How horrible! No, no, it's impossible—it can't be true.

NORA: It is true. I've loved you more than all this world.

HELMER: Ah, none of your slippery tricks.

NORA: [Taking one step toward him.] Torvald—!

HELMER: What is this you've blundered into!

NORA: Just let me loose. You're not going to suffer for my sake. You're not going to take on my guilt.

HELMER: No more playacting. [Locks the hall door.] You stay right here and give me a reckoning. You understand what you've done? Answer! You understand?

NORA: [Looking squarely at him, her face hardening.] Yes. I'm beginning to understand everything now.

HELMER: [Striding about.] Oh, what an awful awakening! In all these eight years—she who was my pride and joy—a hypocrite, a liar—worse, worse—a criminal! How infinitely disgusting it all is! The shame! [NORA says nothing and goes on looking straight at him. He stops in front of her.] I should have suspected something of the kind. I should have known. All your father's flimsy values—Be still! All your father's flimsy values have come out in you. No religion, no morals, no sense of duty—Oh, how I'm punished for letting him off! I did it for your sake, and you repay me like this.

NORA: Yes, like this.

HELMER: Now you've wrecked all my happiness—ruined my whole future. Oh, it's awful to think of. I'm in a cheap little grafter's hands; he can do anything he wants with me, ask for anything, play with me like a puppet—and I can't breathe a word. I'll be swept down miserably into the depths on account of a featherbrained woman.

NORA: When I'm gone from this world, you'll be free.

HELMER: Oh, quit posing. Your father had a mess of those speeches too. What good would that ever do me if you were gone from this world, as you say? Not the slightest. He can still make the whole thing known; and if he does, I could be falsely suspected as your accomplice. They might even think that I was behind it—that I put you up to it. And all that I can thank you for—you that I've coddled the whole of our marriage. Can you see now what you've done to me?

NORA: [Icily calm.] Yes.

HELMER: It's so incredible, I just can't grasp it. But we'll have to patch up whatever we can. Take off the shawl. I said, take it off! I've got to appease him somehow or other. The thing has to be hushed up at any cost. And as for you and me, it's got to seem like everything between us is just as it was—to the outside world, that is. You'll go right on living in this house, of course. But you can't be allowed to bring up the children; I don't dare trust you with them—Oh, to have to say this to someone I've loved so much, and that I still—! Well, that's done with. From now on happiness doesn't matter; all that matters is saving the bits and pieces, the appearance—[The doorbell rings. HELMER starts.] What's that? And so late. Maybe the worst—? You think he'd—? Hide, Nora! Say you're sick. [NORA remains standing motionless. HELMER goes and opens the door.]

MAID: [Half dressed, in the hall.] A letter for Mrs. Helmer.

HELMER: I'll take it. [Snatches the letter and shuts the door.] Yes, it's from him. You don't get it; I'm reading it myself.

NORA: Then read it.

HELMER: [By the lamp.] I hardly dare. We may be ruined, you and I. But—I've got to know. [Rips open the letter, skims through a few lines, glances at an enclosure, then cries out joyfully.] Nora! [NORA looks inquiringly at him.] Nora! Wait—better check it again—Yes, yes, it's true. I'm saved. Nora, I'm saved!

NORA: And I?

HELMER: You too, of course. We're both saved, both of us. Look. He's sent back your note. He says he's sorry and ashamed—that a happy development in his life—oh, who cares what he says! Nora, we're saved! No one can hurt you. Oh, Nora, Nora—but first, this ugliness all has to go. Let me see—[Takes a look at the note.] No, I don't want to see it; I want the whole thing to fade like a dream. [Tears the note and both letters to pieces, throws them into the stove and watches them burn.] There—now there's nothing left—He wrote that since Christmas Eve you—Oh, they must have been three terrible days for you, Nora.

NORA: I fought a hard fight.

HELMER: And suffered pain and saw no escape but—No, we're not going to dwell on anything unpleasant. We'll just be grateful and keep on repeating: it's over now, it's over! You hear me, Nora? You don't seem to realize—it's over. What's it mean—that frozen look? Oh, poor little Nora, I understand. You can't believe I've forgiven you. But I have, Nora; I swear I have. I know that what you did, you did out of love for me.

NORA: That's true.

HELMER: You loved me the way a wife ought to love her husband. It's simply the means that you couldn't judge. But you think I love you any the less for not knowing how to handle your affairs? No, no—just lean on me; I'll guide you and teach you. I wouldn't be a man if this feminine helplessness didn't make you twice as attractive to me. You mustn't mind those sharp words I said—that was all in the first confusion of thinking my world had collapsed. I've forgiven you, Nora; I swear I've forgiven you.

NORA: My thanks for your forgiveness. [She goes out through the door, right.]

HELMER: No, wait—[Peers in.] What are you doing in there?

NORA: [Inside.] Getting out of my costume.

HELMER: [By the open door.] Yes, do that. Try to calm yourself and collect your thoughts again, my frightened little songbird. You can rest easy now; I've got wide wings to shelter you with. [Walking about close by the door.] How snug and nice our home is, Nora. You're safe here; I'll keep you like a hunted dove I've rescued out of a hawk's claws. I'll bring peace to your poor, shuddering heart. Gradually it'll happen, Nora; you'll see. Tomorrow all this will look different to you; then everything will be as it was. I won't have to go on repeating I forgive you; you'll feel it for yourself. How can you imagine I'd ever conceivably want to disown you—or even blame you in any way? Ah, you don't know a man's heart, Nora. For a man there's something indescribably sweet and satisfying in knowing he's forgiven his wife—and forgiven her out of a full and open heart. It's as if she belongs to him in two ways now: in a sense he's given her fresh into the world again, and she's become his wife and his child as well. From now on that's what you'll be to me—you little, bewildered, helpless thing. Don't be afraid of anything, Nora; just open your heart to me, and I'll be conscience and will to you both—[NORA enters in her regular clothes.] What's this? Not in bed? You've changed your dress?

NORA: Yes, Torvald, I've changed my dress.

HELMER: But why now, so late?

NORA: Tonight I'm not sleeping.

HELMER: But Nora dear—

NORA: [Looking at her watch.] It's still not so very late. Sit down, Torvald; we have a lot to talk over. [She sits at one side of the table.]

HELMER: Nora—what is this? That hard expression—

NORA: Sit down. This'll take some time. I have a lot to say.

HELMER: [Sitting at the table directly opposite her.] You worry me, Nora. And I don't understand you.

NORA: No, that's exactly it. You don't understand me. And I've never understood you either—until tonight. No, don't interrupt. You can just listen to what I say. We're closing out accounts, Torvald.

HELMER: How do you mean that?

NORA: [After a short pause.] Doesn't anything strike you about our sitting here like this?

HELMER: What's that?

NORA: We've been married now eight years. Doesn't it occur to you that this is the first time we two, you and I, man and wife, have ever talked seriously together?

HELMER: What do you mean—seriously?

NORA: In eight whole years—longer even—right from our first acquaintance, we've never exchanged a serious word on any serious thing.

HELMER: You mean I should constantly go and involve you in problems you couldn't possibly help me with?

NORA: I'm not talking of problems. I'm saying that we've never sat down seriously together and tried to get to the bottom of anything.

HELMER: But dearest, what good would that ever do you?

NORA: That's the point right there: you've never understood me. I've been wronged greatly, Torvald—first by Papa, and then by you.

HELMER: What! By us—the two people who've loved you more than anyone else?

NORA: [Shaking her head.] You never loved me. You've thought it fun to be in love with me, that's all.

HELMER: Nora, what a thing to say!

NORA: Yes, it's true now, Torvald. When I lived at home with Papa, he told me all his opinions, so I had the same ones too; or if they were different I hid them, since he wouldn't have cared for that. He used to call me his doll-child, and he played with me the way I played with my dolls. Then I came into your house—

HELMER: How can you speak of our marriage like that?

NORA: [Unperturbed.] I mean, then I went from Papa's hands into yours. You arranged everything to your own taste, and so I got the same taste as you—or I pretended to; I can't remember. I guess a little of both, first one, then the other. Now when I look back, it seems as if I'd lived here like a beggar—just from hand to mouth. I've lived by doing tricks for you, Torvald. But that's the way you wanted it. It's a great sin what you and Papa did to me. You're to blame that nothing's become of me.

HELMER: Nora, how unfair and ungrateful you are! Haven't you been happy here?

NORA: No, never. I thought so—but I never have.

HELMER: Not—not happy!

NORA: No, only lighthearted. And you've always been so kind to me. But our home's been nothing but a playpen. I've been your doll-wife here, just as at home I was Papa's doll-child. And in turn the children have been my dolls. I thought it was fun when you played with me, just as they thought it fun when I played with them. That's been our marriage, Torvald.

HELMER: There's some truth in what you're saying—under all the raving exaggeration. But it'll all be different after this. Playtime's over; now for the schooling.

NORA: Whose schooling—mine or the children's?

HELMER: Both yours and the children's, dearest.

NORA: Oh, Torvald, you're not the man to teach me to be a good wife to you.

HELMER: And you can say that?

NORA: And I—how am I equipped to bring up children?

HELMER: Nora!

NORA: Didn't you say a moment ago that that was no job to trust me with?

HELMER: In a flare of temper! Why fasten on that?

NORA: Yes, but you were so very right. I'm not up to the job. There's another job I have to do first. I have to try to educate myself. You can't help me with that. I've got to do it alone. And that's why I'm leaving you now.

HELMER: [Jumping up.] What's that?

NORA: I have to stand completely alone, if I'm ever going to discover myself and the world out there. So I can't go on living with you.

HELMER: Nora, Nora!

NORA: I want to leave right away. Kristine should put me up for the night—

HELMER: You're insane! You've no right! I forbid you!

NORA: From here on, there's no use forbidding me anything. I'll take with me whatever is mine. I don't want a thing from you, either now or later.

HELMER: What kind of madness is this!

NORA: Tomorrow I'm going home—I mean, home where I came from. It'll be easier up there to find something to do.

HELMER: Oh, you blind, incompetent child!

NORA: I must learn to be competent, Torvald.

HELMER: Abandon your home, your husband, your children! And you're not even thinking what people will say.

NORA: I can't be concerned about that. I only know how essential this is.

HELMER: Oh, it's outrageous. So you'll run out like this on your most sacred vows.

NORA: What do you think are my most sacred vows?

HELMER: And I have to tell you that! Aren't they your duties to your husband and children?

NORA: I have other duties equally sacred.

HELMER: That isn't true. What duties are they?

NORA: Duties to myself.

HELMER: Before all else, you're a wife and a mother.

NORA: I don't believe in that anymore. I believe that, before all else, I'm a human being, no less than you—or anyway, I ought to try to become one. I know the majority thinks you're right, Torvald, and plenty of books agree with you, too. But I can't go on believing what the majority says, or what's written in books. I have to think over these things myself and try to understand them.

HELMER: Why can't you understand your place in your own home? On a point like that, isn't there one everlasting guide you can turn to? Where's your religion?

NORA: Oh, Torvald, I'm really not sure what religion is.

HELMER: What—?

NORA: I only know what the minister said when I was confirmed. He told me religion was this thing and that. When I get clear and away by myself, I'll go into that problem too. I'll see if what the minister said was right, or, in any case, if it's right for me.

HELMER: A young woman your age shouldn't talk like that. If religion can't move you, I can try to rouse your conscience. You do have some moral feeling? Or, tell me—has that gone too?

NORA: It's not easy to answer that, Torvald. I simply don't know. I'm all confused about these things. I just know I see them so differently from you. I find out, for one thing, that the law's not at all what I'd thought—but I can't get it through my head that the law is fair. A woman hasn't a right to protect her dying father or save her husband's life! I can't believe that.

HELMER: You talk like a child. You don't know anything of the world you live in.

NORA: No, I don't. But now I'll begin to learn for myself. I'll try to discover who's right, the world or I.

HELMER: Nora, you're sick; you've got a fever. I almost think you're out of your head.

NORA: I've never felt more clearheaded and sure in my life.

HELMER: And—clearheaded and sure—you're leaving your husband and children?

NORA: Yes.

HELMER: Then there's only one possible reason.

NORA: What?

HELMER: You no longer love me.

NORA: No. That's exactly it.

HELMER: Nora! You can't be serious!

NORA: Oh, this is so hard, Torvald—you've been so kind to me always. But I can't help it. I don't love you anymore.

HELMER: [Struggling for composure.] Are you also clearheaded and sure about that?

NORA: Yes, completely. That's why I can't go on staying here.

HELMER: Can you tell me what I did to lose your love?

NORA: Yes, I can tell you. It was this evening when the miraculous thing didn't come—then I knew you weren't the man I'd imagined.

HELMER: Be more explicit; I don't follow you.

NORA: I've waited now so patiently eight long years—for, my Lord, I know miracles don't come every day. Then this crisis broke over me, and such a certainty filled me: now the miraculous event would occur. While Krogstad's letter was lying out there, I never for an instant dreamed that you could give in to his terms. I was so utterly sure you'd say to him: go on, tell your tale to the whole wide world. And when he'd done that—HELMER: Yes, what then? When I'd delivered my own wife into shame and disgrace—!

NORA: When he'd done that, I was so utterly sure that you'd step forward, take the blame on yourself and say: I am the guilty one.

HELMER: Nora—!

NORA: You're thinking I'd never accept such a sacrifice from you? No, of course not. But what good would my protests be against you? That was the miracle I was waiting for, in terror and hope. And to stave that off, I would have taken my life.

HELMER: I'd gladly work for you day and night, Nora—and take on pain and deprivation. But there's no one who gives up honor for love.

NORA: Millions of women have done just that.

HELMER: Oh, you think and talk like a silly child.

NORA: Perhaps. But you neither think nor talk like the man I could join myself to. When your big fright was over—and it wasn't from any threat against me, only for what might damage you—when all the danger was past, for you it was just as if nothing had happened. I was exactly the same, your little lark, your doll, that you'd have to handle with double care now that I'd turned out so brittle and frail. [Gets up.] Torvald—in that instant it dawned on me that for eight years I've been living here with a stranger, and that I'd even conceived three children—oh, I can't stand the thought of it! I could tear myself to bits.

HELMER: [Heavily.] I see. There's a gulf that's opened between us—that's clear.

Oh, but Nora, can't we bridge it somehow?

NORA: The way I am now, I'm no wife for you.

HELMER: I have the strength to make myself over.

NORA: Maybe—if your doll gets taken away.

HELMER: But to part! To part from you! No, Nora, no—I can't imagine it.

NORA: [Going out, right.] All the more reason why it has to be. [She reenters with her coat and a small overnight bag, which she puts on a chair by the table.]

HELMER: Nora, Nora, not now! Wait till tomorrow.

NORA: I can't spend the night in a strange man's room.

HELMER: But couldn't we live here like brother and sister—

NORA: You know very well how long that would last. [Throws her shawl about her.] Good-bye, Torvald. I won't look in on the children. I know they're in better hands than mine. The way I am now, I'm no use to them.

HELMER: But someday, Nora—someday—?

NORA: How can I tell? I haven't the least idea what'll become of me.

HELMER: But you're my wife, now and wherever you go.

NORA: Listen, Torvald—I've heard that when a wife deserts her husband's house just as I'm doing, then the law frees him from all responsibility. In any case, I'm freeing you from being responsible. Don't feel yourself bound, any more than I will. There has to be absolute freedom for us both. Here, take your ring back. Give me mine.

HELMER: That too?

NORA: That too.

HELMER: There it is.

NORA: Good. Well, now it's all over. I'm putting the keys here. The maids know all about keeping up the house—better than I do. Tomorrow, after I've left town, Kristine will stop by to pack up everything that's mine from home. I'd like those things shipped up to me.

HELMER: Over! All over! Nora, won't you ever think about me?

NORA: I'm sure I'll think of you often, and about the children and the house here.

HELMER: May I write you?

NORA: No—never. You're not to do that.

HELMER: Oh, but let me send you—

NORA: Nothing. Nothing.

HELMER: Or help you if you need it.

NORA: No. I accept nothing from strangers.

HELMER: Nora—can I never be more than a stranger to you?

NORA: [Picking up the overnight bag.] Ah, Torvald—it would take the greatest miracle of all—

HELMER: Tell me the greatest miracle!

NORA: You and I both would have to transform ourselves to the point that—Oh, Torvald, I've stopped believing in miracles.

HELMER: But I'll believe. Tell me! Transform ourselves to the point that—?

NORA: That our living together could be a true marriage. [She goes out down the hall.]

HELMER: [Sinks down on a chair by the door, face buried in his hands.] Nora!
Nora! [Looking about and rising.] Empty. She's gone. [A sudden hope leaps in him.] The greatest miracle—?

[From below, the sound of a door slamming shut.]

JANE MARTIN

Two Monologues from Talking With . . .

The true identity of the award-winning playwright known as “Jane Martin” has been the subject of widespread speculation and debate since 1982, when her Talking With . . . debuted to great acclaim at the sixth annual Humana Festival in Louisville, Kentucky, and then went on to win the 1982 American Theatre Critics Association (ATCA) principal citation for most outstanding script of the season. Composed of eleven monologues by a diverse array of female characters, the play established Martin as a master of the monologue form and earned her comparisons to Flannery O'Connor, thanks not least to its bizarre, even grotesque, and usually obsessive characters, its deft rendering of their distinctive speech patterns, its often darkly religious undertones, and its fascination with physical and psychological violence. In the years since, Martin's work has included two other monologue-based plays, Vital Signs (1990) and Sez She (2006); comedies such as Cementville (1991) and Criminal Hearts (1992); the theater satire Anton in Show Business (2000), about three Texas actresses who mount a disastrous production of Anton Chekhov's The Three Sisters; the parody Flaming Guns of the Purple Sage (2001); and the highly topical plays Keely and Du (1993), about a working-class rape victim held captive by pro-life terrorists bent on preventing her from having an abortion; Mr. Bundy (1998), in which the parents of an eleven-year-old discover that a convicted child molester lives next door; and Flags (2005), which focuses on a father's extreme reaction to the death of his soldier-son in Iraq. Prior to 2001, almost all of Martin's plays debuted at the Humana Festival under the direction of its founder, Jon Jory (b. 1938). As a result, and despite the director's demurrals, many believe Jane Martin is in fact either Jory himself or a team of writers that includes him.

The play Talking With . . . consists of eleven monologues delivered by a diverse array of female characters. We here include two, “Handler” and “French Fries.”

Handler

A young woman in a simple, country-print dress. On the floor before her is a handmade wooden box about two feet long and eighteen inches high with a sliding wire screen top.

CARO: My Dada [Pronounced “Dád-aw.”] was gonna do this tonight but the Lord froze his face so he sent me. I learned this from my Dada and he learned it up from great Gran, who took it on from the Reverend Soloman Bracewood, who had him a mule ministry¹ ’round these parts way back when. Dada taught Miss Ellie, my ma, and my brother Jamie . . . he was in it too, ’fore he went for Detroit.

See, what I got in here is snakes. Lotta people don’t like snakes. Gives it its nature, I guess. This here is water mocs. Jamie, he said they got the dirtiest, nastiest bite of all . . . well, rattlers is yer biggest. Lotta venom. You milk you a rattler, you can half fill up a juice glass. Dada said Jamie should do rattlers, but he never. Did ’heads, copperheads. Now they’re slower and safer but it ain’t such a good show. You know those dang snakes smell like cucumbers? Well, they do. Miss Ellie, she favored moccasins. Dada too . . . well, Dada he did all kinds, all ways. Your moccasin now, he’s your good ol’ boy snake. Flat out mean an’ lots of get up n’ go. Heck, they’ll chase ya. They will. Ol’ Dada he didn’t like Miss Ellie doin’ ’em. “You lay off them mocs ’fore they lay you down.” Made Miss Ellie laugh. Lotta handlers think moccasins are slimy. Couldn’t get me to touch one. They’ll do rattlers . . . got him a nice dry feel. Little bit sandpapery. Rattler can find ya in the pitch dark though. They git on to yer body heat. Snake handlin.’ All my blood does it. Only Dada an’ me now though. Snake handlin’, with the Holiness Church. Down where I come from we take God pretty serious. If you got the spirit, snake don’t bite. If he bites you, you know you ain’t got the spirit. Makes the difference real clear, don’t it?

It’s right there in the scripture . . . Mark, Chapter 16, verses 17 and 18, “And these signs shall follow them that believe. In my name they shall cast out devils; they shall speak in new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they shall drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover.” Don’t figure it could be much clearer than that. There’s some churches don’t use snakes, use strychnine, powdered poison, same idea though. They mix it with Cherry kool-ade, sing ’em a hymn, drink it off, and then just stand around waitin’ to see if they fall over. Ain’t much of a show. Not like snakes. Dada does fire but I can’t do it. Pours some kerosene in a coke bottle, sticks a rag in the top and lights it up. Holds that fire under his chin, passes it down the arm, puts his hand in it, you know, that kind of stuff. He says there’s people do blow torches down to Tennessee. I don’t know. Jamie give it a try ’fore he went to Detroit. Just about burned his ass off. Sorry.

When I handle, I keep ’em in this box. Dada gimme this and some Heidi² doll on my ninth birthday. Sometimes I’ll just open up the lid and put my foot in or, uh, maybe stick it open side to my chest. There’s some lay it to their face. I don’t. Scares my eyes. Durin’ service we take ’em right out, pass ’em around. It’s more dangerous than a single handler. Snake gets to comparin’ who got the spirit a whole lot an’ who jes got it some. Somebody’s jes about bound to come in second. Don’t get me wrong now. Y’ don’t die everytime yer bit. I been bit seven times. Four times by the same serpent. Dada says he got the sweet tooth for me. Dada been bit thirty-two times an' never saw him a doctor. Used to let me kiss him on the marks. Last one got him here.

1. That is, he was a traveling preacher who traveled by mule.

(Points to eye.) Froze him right up. Dada says he'll thaw but I don't know.

Day after Jamie took off Miss Ellie did moccasins standin' in the back of the pickup over to Hard Burley. Shouldn't ought to 'cause her mind weren't there. Coal truck backfired and she got bit. Snake bit her three more times 'fore she hit the ground. Dada layed hands on her but she died anyway. There was ten of us handled right there at the funeral. Snake handlin'.

Snake knows what you feel. You can fool a person but you can't fool a snake. You got the spirit, God locks their jaws. Keeps you safe. Tell you what though . . . I don't believe in a God. Left me. Gone with Miss Ellie. I was handlin' when I knew it sure. Snake was jes comin' on down the line. Marita she yells out, "The Lord. Lord's in me and with me. In me and with me." Noah he was ululatin', talkin' in tongues. Couple of folks was rollin' and singing. Dada was doin' switch grips. Had Miss Ellie's weddin' ring on his little finger. And it came on me, heck, there ain't no God in here. There's just a bunch of shouters gettin' tranced. There ain't no God in here at all. 'Bout that time they layed that serpent to me. Felt fussy. Nasty. Just lookin' for an excuse y'know? An' I was an empty vessel, worse nor a pharasee,³ grist for the mill. My blood went so cold I coulda crapped ice-cubes. Snake knew. Started to get leverage. So I said, "Snake. You Satan's hand-maiden. You're right, there ain't no God in me. I'm just a woman, but I'm the only woman in my Dada's house and he needs me home. Outta his faith and his need, you lock yer jaws." I let that snake feel a child's pure love and it sponged it up offa my hands and then ol'wiggley went limp. I tranced it. It was a real good service. Didn't nobody handlin' get bit.

(Takes snake out of the box.) Yes, you got to believe. Holiness Church is dead right about that. Make me wonder, you know? I git to lookin' at people and wonderin' if they got anything in 'em could lock a serpent's jaws. Any power or spirit or love or whatever. I look at 'em and I wonder, could they handle? Tell you what though, you can see it in a face. You can read it. You look me full in the face it don't take me 30 seconds. It's like I was the snake, some ol' pit viper, an' I can read yer heart. Maybe you could handle and maybe you can't, but there's but one sure thing in this world . . . yer empty, yer gonna get bit.

[Fade out.]

French Fries

An old woman in a straight-back chair holding a McDonald's cup. She is surrounded by several bundles of newspapers. She wears thick glasses that distort her eyes to the viewer.

3. In Matthew 23, Jesus represents the Pharisees, a Jewish sect, as "hypocrites" who do not practice as they preach.

ANNA MAE: If I had one wish in my life, why I'd like to live in McDonald's. Right there in the restaurant. 'Stead of in this old place. I'll come up to the brow of the hill, bowed down with my troubles, hurtin' under my load and I'll see that yellow horseshoe, sort of like part of a rainbow, and it gives my old spirit a lift. Lord, I can sit in a McDonald's all day. I've done it too. Walked the seven miles with the sun just on its way, and then sat on the curb till five minutes of seven. First one there and the last to leave. Just like some ol' french fry they forgot.

I like the young people workin' there. Like a team of fine young horses when I was growin' up. All smilin'. Tell you what I really like though is the plastic. God gave us plastic so there wouldn't be no stains on his world. See, in the human world of the earth it all gets scratched, stained, tore up, faded down. Loses its shine. All of it does. In time. Well, God he gave us the idea of plastic so we'd know what the everlasting really was. See if there's plastic then there's surely eternity. It's God's hint.

You ever watch folks when they come on in the McDonald's? They always speed up, almost run the last few steps. You see if they don't. Old Dobbin¹ with the barn in sight. They know it's safe in there and it ain't safe outside. Now it ain't safe outside and you know it.

I've seen a man healed by a Big Mac. I have. I was just sittin' there. Last summer it was. Oh, they don't never move you on. It's a sacred law in McDonald's, you can sit for a hundred years. Only place in the world. Anyway, a fella, maybe thirty-five, maybe forty, come on in there dressed real nice, real bright tie, bran' new baseball cap, nice white socks and he had him that disease. You know the one I mean, Cerebral Walrus² they call it. Anyway, he had him a cock leg. His poor old body had it two speeds at the same time. Now he got him some coffee, with a lid on, and sat him down and Jimmy the tow-head³ cook knew him, see, and he brought over a Big Mac. Well, the sick fella ate maybe half of it and then he was just sittin', you know, suffering those tremors, when a couple of ants come right out of the burger. Now there ain't no ants in McDonald's no way. Lord sent those ants, and the sick fella he looked real sharp at the burger and a bunch more ants marched on out nice as you please and his head lolled right over and he pitched himself out of that chair and banged his head on the floor, loud. Thwack! Like a bowling ball dropping. Made you half sick to hear it. We jump up and run over but he was cold out. Well those servin' kids, so cute, they watered him, stuck a touch pepper up his nostril, slapped him right smart, and bang, up he got. Standin' an' blinkin'. "Well, how are you?," we say. An he looks us over, looks right in our eyes, and he say, "I'm fine." And he was. He was fine! Tipped his Cincinnati Reds baseball cap, big "us'-swallowed-the-canary" grin, paraded out of there clean, straight like a pole-bean poplar, walked him a plumb line without no trace of the "walrus." Got outside, jumped up, whooped, hollered, sang him the National Anthem, flagged down a Circle Line bus, an' rode off up Muhammad Ali Boulevard wavin' an' smilin' like the King of the Pharaohs. Healed by a Big Mac. I saw it.

Laura Saladino in a scene from Talking with . . . at Theatre TCU

McDonald's. You ever see anybody die in a McDonald's? No sir. No way. Nobody ever has died in one. Shoot, they die in Burger Kings all the time. Kentucky Fried Chicken's got their own damn ambulances. Nooooooooooooo, you can't die in a McDonald's no matter how hard you try. It's the spices. Seals you safe in this life like it seals in the flavor. Yesssssss, yes!

I asked Jarrell could I live there. See they close up around ten, and there ain't a thing goin' on in 'em till seven a.m. I'd just sit in those nice swiny chairs and lean forward. Rest my head on those cool, cool, smooth tables, sing me a hymn and sleep like a baby. Jarrell, he said he'd write him a letter up the chain of command and see would they let me. Oh, I got my bid in. Peaceful and clean.

Sometimes I see it like the last of a movie. You know how they start the picture up real close and then back it off steady and far? Well, that's how I dream it. I'm living in McDonald's and it's real late at night and you see me up close, smiling, and then you see the whole McDonald's from the outside, lit up and friendly. And I get smaller and smaller, like they do, and then it's just a light in the darkness, like a star, and I'm in it. I'm part of that light, part of the whole sky, and it's all McDonald's, but part of something even bigger, something fixed and shiny . . . like plastic.

I know. I know. It's just a dream. Just a beacon in the storm. But you got to have a dream. It's our dreams make us what we are.

ARTHUR MILLER

(1915–2005)

Death of a Salesman

Arthur Miller was born in New York City to a prosperous family whose fortunes were ruined by the Depression, a circumstance that would shape his political outlook and imbue him with a deep sense of social responsibility. Miller studied history, economics, and journalism at the University of Michigan, began writing plays, and joined the Federal Theater Project, a proving ground for some of the best playwrights of the period. He had his first Broadway success, All My Sons, in 1947, followed two years later by his Pulitzer Prize–winning masterpiece, Death of a Salesman. In 1953, against the backdrop of Senator Joseph McCarthy’s anti-Communist “witch-hunts,” Miller fashioned another modern parable, his Tony Award–winning The Crucible, based on the seventeenth-century Salem witch trials. Among his other works for the stage are the Pulitzer Prize–winner A View from the Bridge (1955), After the Fall (1964), Incident at Vichy (1965), The Price (1968), The Ride Down Mt. Morgan (1991), Broken Glass (1994), and Resurrection Blues (2004). In addition, Miller wrote a novel, Focus (1945); the screenplay for the film The Misfits (1961), which starred his second wife, Marilyn Monroe; The Theater Essays (1971), a collection of his writings about dramatic literature; and Timebends (1987), his autobiography.

CHARACTERS

WILLY LOMAN	THE WOMAN	STANLEY
LINDA	CHARLEY	MISS FORSYTHE
BIFF	UNCLE BEN	LETTA
HAPPY	HOWARD WAGNER
BERNARD	JENNY

The action takes place in WILLY LOMAN’s house and yard and in various places he visits in the New York and Boston of today.

ACT I

A melody is heard, playing upon a flute. It is small and fine, telling of grass and trees and the horizon. The curtain rises.

Before us is the Salesman’s house. We are aware of towering, angular shapes behind it, surrounding it on all sides. Only the blue light of the sky falls upon the house and forestage; the surrounding area shows an angry flow of orange. As more light appears, we see a solid vault of apartment houses around the small, fragile-seeming home. An air of the dream clings to the place, a dream rising out of reality. The kitchen at center seems actual enough, for there is a kitchen table with three chairs, and a refrigerator. But no other fixtures are seen. At the back of the kitchen there is a draped entrance, which leads to the living-room. To the right of the kitchen, on a level raised two feet, is a bedroom furnished only with a brass bedstead and a straight chair. On a shelf over the bed a silver athletic trophy stands. A window opens onto the apartment house at the side.

Behind the kitchen, on a level raised six and a half feet, is the boys' bedroom, at present barely visible. Two beds are dimly seen, and at the back of the room a dormer window. (This bedroom is above the unseen living-room.) At the left a stairway curves up to it from the kitchen.

The entire setting is wholly or, in some places, partially transparent. The roof-line of the house is one-dimensional; under and over it we see the apartment buildings. Before the house lies an apron, curving beyond the forestage into the orchestra. This forward area serves as the back yard as well as the locale of all WILLY'S imaginings and of his city scenes. Whenever the action is in the present the actors observe the imaginary wall-lines, entering the house only through its door at the left. But in the scenes of the past these boundaries are broken, and characters enter or leave a room by stepping "through" a wall onto the forestage.

From the right, WILLY LOMAN, the Salesman, enters, carrying two large sample cases. The flute plays on. He hears but is not aware of it. He is past sixty years of age, dressed quietly. Even as he crosses the stage to the doorway of the house, his exhaustion is apparent. He unlocks the door, comes into the kitchen, and thankfully lets his burden down, feeling the soreness of his palms. A word-sigh escapes his lips—it might be "Oh, boy, oh, boy." He closes the door, then carries his cases out into the living-room, through the draped kitchen doorway.

LINDA, his wife, has stirred in her bed at the right. She gets out and puts on a robe, listening. Most often jovial, she has developed an iron repression of her exceptions to WILLY'S behavior—she more than loves him, she admires him, as though his mercurial nature, his temper, his massive dreams and little cruelties, served her only as sharp reminders of the turbulent longings within him, longings which she shares but lacks the temperament to utter and follow to their end.

LINDA: [Hearing WILLY outside the bedroom, calls with some trepidation.] Willy!

WILLY: It's all right. I came back.

LINDA: Why? What happened? [Slight pause.] Did something happen, Willy?

WILLY: No, nothing happened.

LINDA: You didn't smash the car, did you?

WILLY: [With casual irritation.] I said nothing happened. Didn't you hear me?

LINDA: Don't you feel well?

WILLY: I'm tired to the death. [The flute has faded away. He sits on the bed beside her, a little numb.] I couldn't make it. I just couldn't make it, Linda.

LINDA: [Very carefully, delicately.] Where were you all day? You look terrible.

WILLY: I got as far as a little above Yonkers. I stopped for a cup of coffee. Maybe it was the coffee.

LINDA: What?

WILLY: [After a pause.] I suddenly couldn't drive any more. The car kept going off onto the shoulder, y'know?

LINDA: [Helpfully.] Oh. Maybe it was the steering again. I don't think Angelo knows the Studebaker.

WILLY: No, it's me, it's me. Suddenly I realize I'm goin' sixty miles an hour and I don't remember the last five minutes. I'm—I can't seem to—keep my mind to it.

LINDA: Maybe it's your glasses. You never went for your new glasses.

WILLY: No, I see everything. I came back ten miles an hour. It took me nearly four hours from Yonkers.

LINDA: [Resigned.] Well, you'll just have to take a rest, Willy, you can't continue this way.

WILLY: I just got back from Florida.

LINDA: But you didn't rest your mind. Your mind is overactive, and the mind is what counts, dear.

WILLY: I'll start out in the morning. Maybe I'll feel better in the morning. [She is taking off his shoes.] These goddam arch supports are killing me.

LINDA: Take an aspirin. Should I get you an aspirin? It'll soothe you.

WILLY: [With wonder.] I was driving along, you understand? And I was fine. I was even observing the scenery. You can imagine, me looking at scenery, on the road every week of my life. But it's so beautiful up there, Linda, the trees are so thick, and the sun is warm. I opened the windshield and just let the warm air bathe over me. And then all of a sudden I'm goin' off the road! I'm tellin' ya, I absolutely forgot I was driving. If I'd've gone the other way over the white line I might've killed somebody. So I went on again—and five minutes later I'm dreamin' again, and I nearly—[He presses two fingers against his eyes.] I have such thoughts, I have such strange thoughts.

LINDA: Willy, dear. Talk to them again. There's no reason why you can't work in New York.

WILLY: They don't need me in New York. I'm the New England man. I'm vital in New England.

LINDA: But you're sixty years old. They can't expect you to keep traveling every week.

WILLY: I'll have to send a wire¹ to Portland. I'm supposed to see Brown and Morrison tomorrow morning at ten o'clock to show the line. Goddammit, I could sell them! [He starts putting on his jacket.]

LINDA: [Taking the jacket from him.] Why don't you go down to the place tomorrow and tell Howard you've simply got to work in New York? You're too accommodating, dear.

WILLY: If old man Wagner was alive I'da been in charge of New York now! That man was a prince, he was a masterful man. But that boy of his, that Howard, he don't appreciate. When I went north the first time, the Wagner Company didn't know where New England was!

LINDA: Why don't you tell those things to Howard, dear?

WILLY: [Encouraged.] I will, I definitely will. Is there any cheese?

LINDA: I'll make you a sandwich.

WILLY: No, go to sleep. I'll take some milk. I'll be up right away. The boys in?

LINDA: They're sleeping. Happy took Biff on a date tonight.

WILLY: [Interested.] That so?

LINDA: It was so nice to see them shaving together, one behind the other, in the bathroom. And going out together. You notice? The whole house smells of shaving lotion.

1. Telegram.

WILLY: Figure it out. Work a lifetime to pay off a house. You finally own it, and there's nobody to live in it.

LINDA: Well, dear, life is a casting off. It's always that way.

WILLY: No, no, some people—some people accomplish something. Did Biff say anything after I went this morning?

LINDA: You shouldn't have criticized him, Willy, especially after he just got off the train. You mustn't lose your temper with him.

WILLY: When the hell did I lose my temper? I simply asked him if he was making any money. Is that a criticism?

LINDA: But, dear, how could he make any money?

WILLY: [Worried and angered.] There's such an undercurrent in him. He became a moody man. Did he apologize when I left this morning?

LINDA: He was crestfallen, Willy. You know how he admires you. I think if he finds himself, then you'll both be happier and not fight any more.

WILLY: How can he find himself on a farm? Is that a life? A farmhand? In the beginning, when he was young, I thought, well, a young man, it's good for him to tramp around, take a lot of different jobs. But it's more than ten years now and he has yet to make thirty-five dollars a week!

LINDA: He's finding himself, Willy.

WILLY: Not finding yourself at the age of thirty-four is a disgrace!

LINDA: Shh!

WILLY: The trouble is he's lazy, goddammit!

LINDA: Willy, please!

WILLY: Biff is a lazy bum!

LINDA: They're sleeping. Get something to eat. Go on down.

WILLY: Why did he come home? I would like to know what brought him home.

LINDA: I don't know. I think he's still lost, Willy. I think he's very lost.

WILLY: Biff Loman is lost. In the greatest country in the world a young man with such—personal attractiveness, gets lost. And such a hard worker. There's one thing about Biff—he's not lazy.

LINDA: Never.

WILLY: [With pity and resolve.] I'll see him in the morning; I'll have a nice talk with him. I'll get him a job selling. He could be big in no time. My God! Remember how they used to follow him around in high school? When he smiled at one of them their faces lit up. When he walked down the street . . . [He loses himself in reminiscences.]

LINDA: [Trying to bring him out of it.] Willy, dear, I got a new kind of American-type cheese today. It's whipped.

WILLY: Why do you get American when I like Swiss?

LINDA: I just thought you'd like a change—

WILLY: I don't want a change! I want Swiss cheese. Why am I always being contradicted?

LINDA: [With a covering laugh.] I thought it would be a surprise.

WILLY: Why don't you open a window in here, for God's sake?

LINDA: [With infinite patience.] They're all open, dear.

WILLY: The way they boxed us in here. Bricks and windows, windows and bricks.

LINDA: We should've bought the land next door.

WILLY: The street is lined with cars. There's not a breath of fresh air in the neighborhood. The grass don't grow any more, you can't raise a carrot in the back yard. They should've had a law against apartment houses. Remember those two beautiful elm trees out there? When I and Biff hung the swing between them?

LINDA: Yeah, like being a million miles from the city.

WILLY: They should've arrested the builder for cutting those down. They massacred the neighborhood. [Lost.] More and more I think of those days, Linda. This time of year it was lilac and wisteria. And then the peonies would come out, and the daffodils. What fragrance in this room!

LINDA: Well, after all, people had to move somewhere.

WILLY: No, there's more people now.

LINDA: I don't think there's more people. I think—

WILLY: There's more people! That's what ruining this country! Population is getting out of control. The competition is maddening! Smell the stink from that apartment house! And another one on the other side . . . How can they whip cheese?

[On WILLY's last line, BIFF and HAPPY raise themselves up in their beds, listening.]

LINDA: Go down, try it. And be quiet.

WILLY: [Turning to LINDA, guiltily.] You're not worried about me, are you, sweetheart?

BIFF: What's the matter?

HAPPY: Listen!

LINDA: You've got too much on the ball to worry about.

WILLY: You're my foundation and my support, Linda.

LINDA: Just try to relax, dear. You make mountains out of mole-hills.

WILLY: I won't fight with him anymore. If he wants to go back to Texas, let him go.

LINDA: He'll find his way.

WILLY: Sure. Certain men just don't get started till later in life. Like Thomas Edison, I think. Or B. F. Goodrich. One of them was deaf.² [He starts for the bedroom doorway.] I'll put my money on Biff.

LINDA: And Willy—if it's warm Sunday we'll drive in the country. And we'll open the windshield, and take lunch.

WILLY: No, the windshields don't open on the new cars.

LINDA: But you opened it today.

WILLY: Me? I didn't. [He stops.] Now isn't that peculiar! Isn't that a remarkable—[He breaks off in amazement and fright as the flute is heard distantly.]

LINDA: What, darling?

WILLY: That is the most remarkable thing.

LINDA: What, dear?

WILLY: I was thinking of the Chevvy. [Slight pause.] Nineteen twenty-eight . . . when I had that red Chevvy—[Breaks off.] That funny? I coulda sworn I was driving that Chevvy today.

LINDA: Well, that's nothing. Something must've reminded you.

2. Thomas Alva Edison (1847–1931), American inventor best known for the phonograph and the incandescent lightbulb; Edison's deafness was legendary. Benjamin Franklin Goodrich (1841–88), American industrialist known for the tire company that still bears his name.

WILLY: Remarkable. Ts. Remember those days? The way Biff used to simonize³ that car? The dealer refused to believe there was eighty thousand miles on it. [He shakes his head.] Heh! [To LINDA.] Close your eyes, I'll be right up. [He walks out of the bedroom.]

HAPPY: [To BIFF.] Jesus, maybe he smashed up the car again!

LINDA: [Calling after WILLY.] Be careful on the stairs, dear! The cheese is on the middle shelf! [She turns, goes over to the bed, takes his jacket, and goes out of the bedroom.]

[Light has risen on the boys' room. Unseen, WILLY is heard talking to himself, "Eighty thousand miles," and a little laugh. BIFF gets out of bed, comes downstage a bit, and stands attentively. BIFF is two years older than his brother, HAPPY, well built, but in these days bears a worn air and seems less self-assured. He has succeeded less, and his dreams are stronger and less acceptable than HAPPY'S. HAPPY is tall, powerfully made. Sexuality is like a visible color on him, or a scent that many women have discovered. He, like his brother, is lost, but in a different way, for he has never allowed himself to turn his face toward defeat and is thus more confused and hard-skinned, although seemingly more content.]

HAPPY: [Getting out of bed.] He's going to get his license taken away if he keeps that up. I'm getting nervous about him, y'know, Biff?

BIFF: His eyes are going.

HAPPY: No, I've driven with him. He sees all right. He just doesn't keep his mind on it. I drove into the city with him last week. He stops at a green light and then it turns red and he goes. [He laughs.]

BIFF: Maybe he's color-blind.

HAPPY: Pop? Why he's got the finest eye for color in the business. You know that.

BIFF: [Sitting down on his bed.] I'm going to sleep.

HAPPY: You're not still sour on Dad, are you Biff?

BIFF: He's all right, I guess.

WILLY: [Underneath them, in the living-room.] Yes, sir, eighty thousand miles—eighty-two thousand!

BIFF: You smoking?

HAPPY: [Holding out a pack of cigarettes.] Want one?

BIFF: [Taking a cigarette.] I can never sleep when I smell it.

WILLY: What a simonizing job, heh!

HAPPY: [With deep sentiment.] Funny, Biff, y'know? Us sleeping in here again? The old beds. [He pats his bed affectionately.] All the talk that went across those two beds, huh? Our whole lives.

BIFF: Yeah. Lotta dreams and plans.

HAPPY: [With a deep and masculine laugh.] About five hundred women would like to know what was said in this room.

[They share a soft laugh.]

BIFF: Remember that big Betsy something—what the hell was her name—over on Bushwick Avenue?⁴

3. Polish with car wax. Ts: Ford Model Ts, extraordinarily popular cars manufactured from 1908 to 1928.

4. Major thoroughfare in Brooklyn, New York.

HAPPY: [Combing his hair.] With the collie dog!

BIFF: That's the one. I got you in there, remember?

HAPPY: Yeah, that was my first time—I think. Boy, there was a pig! [They laugh, almost crudely.] You taught me everything I know about women. Don't forget that.

BIFF: I bet you forgot how bashful you used to be. Especially with girls.

HAPPY: Oh, I still am, Biff.

BIFF: Oh, go on.

HAPPY: I just control it, that's all. I think I got less bashful and you got more so. What happened, Biff? Where's the old humor, the old confidence? [He shakes BIFF's knee. BIFF gets up and moves restlessly about the room.] What's the matter?

BIFF: Why does Dad mock me all the time?

HAPPY: He's not mocking you, he—

BIFF: Everything I say there's a twist of mockery on his face. I can't get near him.

HAPPY: He just wants you to make good, that's all. I wanted to talk to you about Dad for a long time, Biff. Something's—happening to him. He—talks to himself.

BIFF: I noticed that this morning. But he always mumbled.

HAPPY: But not so noticeable. It got so embarrassing I sent him to Florida. And you know something? Most of the time he's talking to you.

BIFF: What's he say about me?

HAPPY: I can't make it out.

BIFF: What's he say about me?

HAPPY: I think the fact that you're not settled, that you're still kind of up in the air . . .

BIFF: There's one or two things depressing him, Happy.

HAPPY: What do you mean?

BIFF: Never mind. Just don't lay it all to me.

HAPPY: But I think if you just got started—I mean—is there any future for you out there?

BIFF: I tell ya, Hap, I don't know what the future is. I don't know—what I'm supposed to want.

HAPPY: What do you mean?

BIFF: Well, I spent six or seven years after high school trying to work myself up. Shipping clerk, salesman, business of one kind or another. And it's a measly manner of existence. To get on that subway on the hot mornings in summer. To devote your whole life to keeping stock, or making phone calls, or selling or buying. To suffer fifty weeks of the year for the sake of a two-week vacation, when all you really desire is to be outdoors, with your shirt off. And always to have to get ahead of the next fella. And still—that's how you build a future.

HAPPY: Well, you really enjoy it on a farm? Are you content out there?

BIFF: [With rising agitation.] Hap, I've had twenty or thirty different kinds of jobs since I left home before the war, and it always turns out the same. I just realized it lately. In Nebraska when I herded cattle, and the Dakotas, and Arizona, and now in Texas. It's why I came home now, I guess, because I realized it. This farm I work on, it's spring there now, see? And they've got about fifteen new colts. There's nothing more inspiring or—beautiful than the sight of a mare and a new colt. And it's cool there now, see? Texas is cool now, and it's spring. And whenever spring comes to where I am, I suddenly get the feeling, my God, I'm not gettin' anywhere! What the hell am I doing, playing around with horses, twenty-eight dollars a week! I'm thirty-four years old. I oughta be makin' my future. That's when I come running home. And now, I get there, and I don't know what to do with myself. [After a pause.] I've always made a point of not wasting my life, and everytime I come back here I know that all I've done is to waste my life.

HAPPY: You're a poet, you know that, Biff? You're a—you're an idealist!

BIFF: No, I'm mixed up very bad. Maybe I oughta get married. Maybe I oughta get stuck into something. Maybe that's my trouble. I'm like a boy. I'm not married. I'm not in business, I just—I'm like a boy. Are you content, Hap? You're a success, aren't you? Are you content?

HAPPY: Hell, no!

BIFF: Why? You're making money, aren't you?

HAPPY: [Moving about with energy, expressiveness.] All I can do now is wait for the merchandise manager to die. And suppose I get to be merchandise manager? He's a good friend of mine, and he just built a terrific estate on Long Island. And he lived there about two months and sold it, and now he's building another one. He can't enjoy it once it's finished. And I know that's just what I would do. I don't know what the hell I'm workin' for. Sometimes I sit in my apartment—all alone. And I think of the rent I'm paying. And it's crazy. But then, it's what I always wanted. My own apartment, a car, and plenty of women. And still, goddammit, I'm lonely.

BIFF: [With enthusiasm.] Listen, why don't you come out West with me?

HAPPY: You and I, heh?

BIFF: Sure, maybe we could buy a ranch. Raise cattle, use our muscles. Men built like we are should be working out in the open.

HAPPY: [Avidly.] The Loman Brothers, heh?

BIFF: [With vast affection.] Sure, we'd be known all over the counties!

HAPPY: [Enthralled.] That's what I dream about, Biff. Sometimes I want to just rip my clothes off in the middle of the store and outbox that goddam merchandise manager. I mean I can outbox, outrun, and outlift anybody in that store, and I have to take orders from those common, petty sons-of-bitches till I can't stand it anymore.

BIFF: I'm tellin' you, kid, if you were with me I'd be happy out there.

HAPPY: [Enthused.] See, Biff, everybody around me is so false that I'm constantly lowering my ideals . . .

BIFF: Baby, together we'd stand up for one another, we'd have someone to trust.

HAPPY: If I were around you—

BIFF: Hap, the trouble is we weren't brought up to grub for money. I don't know how to do it.

HAPPY: Neither can I!

BIFF: Then let's go!

HAPPY: The only thing is—what can you make out there?

BIFF: But look at your friend. Builds an estate and then hasn't the peace of mind to live in it.

- HAPPY: Yeah, but when he walks into the store the waves part in front of him. That's fifty-two thousand dollars a year coming through the revolving door, and I got more in my pinky finger than he's got in his head.
- BIFF: Yeah, but you just said—
- HAPPY: I gotta show some of those pompous, self-important executives over there that Hap Loman can make the grade. I want to walk into the store the way he walks in. Then I'll go with you, Biff. We'll be together yet, I swear. But take those two we had tonight. Now weren't they gorgeous creatures?
- BIFF: Yeah, yeah, most gorgeous I've had in years.
- HAPPY: I get that any time I want, Biff. Whenever I feel disgusted. The only trouble is, it gets like bowling or something. I just keep knockin' them over and it doesn't mean anything. You still run around a lot?
- BIFF: Naa. I'd like to find a girl—steady, somebody with substance.
- HAPPY: That's what I long for.
- BIFF: Go on! You'd never come home.
- HAPPY: I would! Somebody with character, with resistance! Like Mom, y'know? You're gonna call me a bastard when I tell you this. That girl Charlotte I was with tonight is engaged to be married in five weeks. [He tries on his new hat.]
- BIFF: No kiddin'!
- HAPPY: Sure, the guy's in line for the vice-presidency of the store. I don't know what gets into me, maybe I just have an overdeveloped sense of competition or something, but I went and ruined her, and furthermore I can't get rid of her. And he's the third executive I've done that to. Isn't that a crummy characteristic? And to top it all, I go to their weddings! [Indignantly, but laughing.] Like I'm not supposed to take bribes. Manufacturers offer me a hundred-dollar bill now and then to throw an order their way. You know how honest I am, but it's like this girl, see. I hate myself for it. Because I don't want the girl, and, still, I take it and—I love it!
- BIFF: Let's go to sleep.
- HAPPY: I guess we didn't settle anything, heh?
- BIFF: I just got one idea that I'm going to try.
- HAPPY: What's that?
- BIFF: Remember Bill Oliver?
- HAPPY: Sure, Oliver is very big now. You want to work for him again?
- BIFF: No, but when I quit he said something to me. He put his arm on my shoulder, and he said, "Biff, if you ever need anything, come to me."
- HAPPY: I remember that. That sounds good.
- BIFF: I think I'll go to see him. If I could get ten thousand or even seven or eight thousand dollars I could buy a beautiful ranch.
- HAPPY: I bet he'd back you. 'Cause he thought highly of you, Biff. I mean, they all do. You're well liked, Biff. That's why I say to come back here, and we both have the apartment. And I'm tellin' you, Biff, any babe you want . . .
- BIFF: No, with a ranch I could do the work I like and still be something. I just wonder though. I wonder if Oliver still thinks I stole that carton of basketballs.
- HAPPY: Oh, he probably forgot that long ago. It's almost ten years. You're too sensitive. Anyway, he didn't really fire you.

BIFF: Well, I think he was going to. I think that's why I quit. I was never sure whether he knew or not. I know he thought the world of me, though. I was the only one he'd let lock up the place.

WILLY: [Below.] You gonna wash the engine, Biff?

HAPPY: Shh! [BIFF looks at HAPPY, who is gazing down, listening. WILLY is mumbling in the parlor.] You hear that?

[They listen. WILLY laughs warmly.]

BIFF: [Growing angry.] Doesn't he know Mom can hear that?

WILLY: Don't get your sweater dirty, Biff!

[A look of pain crosses BIFF's face.]

HAPPY: Isn't that terrible? Don't leave again, will you? You'll find a job here. You gotta stick around. I don't know what to do about him, it's getting embarrassing.

WILLY: What a simonizing job!

BIFF: Mom's hearing that!

WILLY: No kiddin', Biff, you got a date? Wonderful!

HAPPY: Go on to sleep. But talk to him in the morning, will you?

BIFF: [Reluctantly getting into bed.] With her in the house. Brother!

HAPPY: [Getting into bed.] I wish you'd have a good talk with him.

[The light on their room begins to fade.]

BIFF: [To himself in bed.] That selfish, stupid . . .

HAPPY: Sh . . . Sleep, Biff.

[Their light is out. Well before they have finished speaking, WILLY's form is dimly seen below in the darkened kitchen. He opens the refrigerator, searches in there, and takes out a bottle of milk. The apartment houses are fading out, and the entire house and surroundings become covered with leaves. Music insinuates itself as the leaves appear.]

WILLY: Just wanna be careful with those girls, Biff, that's all. Don't make any promises. No promises of any kind. Because a girl, y'know, they always believe what you tell 'em, and you're very young, Biff, you're too young to be talking seriously to girls. [Light rises on the kitchen. WILLY, talking, shuts the refrigerator door and comes downstage to the kitchen table. He pours milk into a glass. He is totally immersed in himself, smiling faintly.] Too young entirely, Biff. You want to watch your schooling first. Then when you're all set, there'll be plenty of girls for a boy like you. [He smiles broadly at a kitchen chair.] That so? The girls pay for you? [He laughs.] Boy, you must really be makin' a hit. [WILLY is gradually addressing—physically—a point offstage, speaking through the wall of the kitchen, and his voice has been rising in volume to that of a normal conversation.] I been wondering why you polish the car so careful. Ha! Don't leave the hubcaps, boys. Get the chamois to the hubcaps. Happy, use newspaper on the windows, it's the easiest thing. Show him how to do it, Biff! You see, Happy? Pad it up, use it like a pad. That's it, that's it, good work. You're doin' all right, Hap. [He pauses, then nods in approbation for a few seconds, then looks upward.] Biff, first thing we gotta do when we get time is clip that big branch over the house. Afraid it's gonna fall in a storm and hit the roof. Tell you what. We get a rope and sling her around, and then we climb up there with a couple of saws and take her down. Soon as you finish the car, boys, I wanna see ya. I got a surprise for you, boys.

BIFF: [Offstage.] Whatta ya got, Dad?

WILLY: No, you finish first. Never leave a job till you're finished—remember that. [Looking toward the "big trees."] Biff, up in Albany I saw a beautiful hammock. I think I'll buy it next trip, and we'll hang it right between those two elms. Wouldn't that be something? Just swingin' there under those branches. Boy, that would be . . .

[YOUNG BIFF and YOUNG HAPPY appear from the direction WILLY was addressing. HAPPY carries rags and a pail of water. BIFF, wearing a sweater with a block "S," carries a football.]

BIFF: [Pointing in the direction of the car offstage.] How's that, Pop, professional?

WILLY: Terrific. Terrific job, boys. Good work, Biff.

HAPPY: Where's the surprise, Pop?

WILLY: In the back seat of the car.

HAPPY: Boy! [He runs off.]

BIFF: What is it, Dad? Tell me, what'd you buy?

WILLY: [Laughing, cuffs him.] Never mind, something I want you to have.

BIFF: [Turns and starts off.] What is it, Hap?

HAPPY: [Offstage.] It's a punching bag!

BIFF: Oh, Pop!

WILLY: It's got Gene Tunney's⁵ signature on it!

[HAPPY runs onstage with a punching bag.]

BIFF: Gee, how'd you know we wanted a punching bag?

WILLY: Well, it's the finest thing for the timing.

HAPPY: [Lies down on his back and pedals with his feet.] I'm losing weight, you notice, Pop?

WILLY: [To HAPPY.] Jumping rope is good too.

BIFF: Did you see the new football I got?

WILLY: [Examining the ball.] Where'd you get a new ball?

BIFF: The coach told me to practice my passing.

WILLY: That so? And he gave you the ball, heh?

BIFF: Well, I borrowed it from the locker room. [He laughs confidentially.]

WILLY: [Laughing with him at the theft.] I want you to return that.

HAPPY: I told you he wouldn't like it!

BIFF: [Angrily.] Well, I'm bringing it back!

WILLY: [Stopping the incipient argument, to HAPPY.] Sure, he's gotta practice with a regulation ball, doesn't he? [To BIFF.] Coach'll probably congratulate you on your initiative!

BIFF: Oh, he keeps congratulating my initiative all the time, Pop.

5. Tunney (1897–1978) was world heavyweight boxing champion from 1926 to 1928 and retired undefeated.

WILLY: That's because he likes you. If somebody else took that ball there'd be an uproar. So what's the report, boys, what's the report?

BIFF: Where'd you go this time, Dad? Gee we were lonesome for you.

WILLY: [Pleased, puts an arm around each boy and they come down to the apron.] Lonesome, heh?

BIFF: Missed you every minute.

WILLY: Don't say? Tell you a secret, boys. Don't breathe it to a soul. Someday I'll have my own business, and I'll never have to leave home anymore.

HAPPY: Like Uncle Charley, heh?

WILLY: Bigger than Uncle Charley! Because Charley is not—liked. He's liked, but he's not—well liked.

BIFF: Where'd you go this time, Dad?

WILLY: Well, I got on the road, and I went north to Providence. Met the mayor.

BIFF: The mayor of Providence!

WILLY: He was sitting in the hotel lobby.

BIFF: What'd he say?

WILLY: He said, "Morning!" And I said, "You got a fine city here, Mayor." And then he had coffee with me. And then I went to Waterbury. Waterbury is a fine city. Big clock city, the famous Waterbury clock. Sold a nice bill there. And then Boston—Boston is the cradle of the Revolution. A fine city. And a couple of other towns in Mass., and on to Portland and Bangor and straight home!

BIFF: Gee, I'd love to go with you sometime, Dad.

WILLY: Soon as summer comes.

HAPPY: Promise?

WILLY: You and Hap and I, and I'll show you all the towns. America is full of beautiful towns and fine, upstanding people. And they know me, boys, they know me up and down New England. The finest people. And when I bring you fellas up, there'll be open sesame for all of us, 'cause one thing, boys: I have friends. I can park my car in any street in New England, and the cops protect it like their own. This summer, heh?

BIFF and HAPPY: [Together.] Yeah! You bet!

WILLY: We'll take our bathing suits.

HAPPY: We'll carry your bags, Pop!

WILLY: Oh, won't that be something! Me comin' into the Boston stores with you boys carryin' my bags. What a sensation! [BIFF is prancing around, practicing passing the ball.] You nervous, Biff, about the game?

BIFF: Not if you're gonna be there.

WILLY: What do they say about you in school, now that they made you captain?

HAPPY: There's a crowd of girls behind him every time the classes change.

BIFF: [Taking WILLY's hand.] This Saturday, Pop, this Saturday—just for you, I'm going to break through for a touchdown.

HAPPY: You're supposed to pass.

BIFF: I'm takin' one play for Pop. You watch me, Pop, and when I take off my helmet, that means I'm breakin' out. Then you watch me crash through that line!

WILLY: [Kisses BIFF.] Oh, wait'll I tell this in Boston!

[BERNARD enters in knickers. He is younger than BIFF, earnest and loyal, a worried boy.]

BERNARD: Biff, where are you? You're supposed to study with me today.

WILLY: Hey, looka Bernard. What're you lookin' so anemic about, Bernard?

BERNARD: He's gotta study, Uncle Willy. He's got Regents⁶ next week.

HAPPY: [Tauntingly, spinning BERNARD around.] Let's box, Bernard!

BERNARD: Biff! [He gets away from HAPPY.] Listen, Biff, I heard Mr. Birnbaum say that if you don't start studyin' math he's gonna flunk you, and you won't graduate. I heard him!

WILLY: You better study with him, Biff. Go ahead now.

BERNARD: I heard him!

BIFF: Oh, Pop, you didn't see my sneakers! [He holds up a foot for WILLY to look at.]

WILLY: Hey, that's a beautiful job of printing!

BERNARD: [Wiping his glasses.] Just because he printed University of Virginia on his sneakers doesn't mean they've got to graduate him, Uncle Willy!

WILLY: [Angrily.] What're you talking about? With scholarships to three universities they're gonna flunk him?

BERNARD: But I heard Mr. Birnbaum say—

WILLY: Don't be a pest, Bernard! [To his boys.] What an anemic!

BERNARD: Okay, I'm waiting for you in my house, Biff.

[BERNARD goes off. The LOMANS laugh.]

WILLY: Bernard is not well liked, is he?

BIFF: He's liked, but he's not well liked.

HAPPY: That's right, Pop.

WILLY: That's just what I mean. Bernard can get the best marks in school, y'understand, but when he gets out in the business world, y'understand, you are going to be five times ahead of him. That's why I thank Almighty God you're both built like Adonises.⁷ Because the man who makes an appearance in the business world, the man who creates personal interest, is the man who gets ahead. Be liked and you will never want. You take me, for instance. I never have to wait in line to see a buyer. "Willy Loman is here!" That's all they have to know, and I go right through.

BIFF: Did you knock them dead, Pop?

WILLY: Knocked 'em cold in Providence, slaughtered 'em in Boston.

HAPPY: [On his back, pedaling again.] I'm losing weight, you notice, Pop?

[LINDA enters, as of old, a ribbon in her hair, carrying a basket of washing.]

LINDA: [With youthful energy.] Hello, dear!

WILLY: Sweetheart!

LINDA: How'd the Chevy run?

WILLY: Chevrolet, Linda, is the greatest car ever built. [To the boys.] Since when do you let your mother carry wash up the stairs?

BIFF: Grab hold there, boy!

HAPPY: Where to, Mom?

LINDA: Hang them up on the line. And you better go down to your friends, Biff. The cellar is full of boys. They don't know what to do with themselves.

6. Examinations administered to New York State high-school students.

7. In Greek myth Adonis was a beautiful youth.

BIFF: Ah, when Pop comes home they can wait!

WILLY: [Laughs appreciatively.] You better go down and tell them what to do, Biff.

BIFF: I think I'll have them sweep out the furnace room.

WILLY: Good work, Biff.

BIFF: [Goes through wall-line of kitchen to doorway at back and calls down.] Fel-las! Everybody sweep out the furnace room! I'll be right down!

VOICES: All right! Okay, Biff.

BIFF: George and Sam and Frank, come out back! We're hangin' up the wash! Come on, Hap, on the double!

[He and HAPPY carry out the basket.]

LINDA: The way they obey him!

WILLY: Well, that training, the training. I'm tellin' you, I was sellin' thousands and thousands, but I had to come home.

LINDA: Oh, the whole block'll be at that game. Did you sell anything?

WILLY: I did five hundred gross in Providence and seven hundred gross in Boston.

LINDA: No! Wait a minute, I've got a pencil. [She pulls pencil and paper out of her apron pocket.] That makes your commission . . . Two hundred—my God! Two hundred and twelve dollars!

WILLY: Well, I didn't figure it yet, but . . .

LINDA: How much did you do?

WILLY: Well, I—I did—about a hundred and eighty gross in Providence. Well, no—it came to—roughly two hundred gross on the whole trip.

LINDA: [Without hesitation.] Two hundred gross. That's . . . [She figures.]

WILLY: The trouble was that three of the stores were half closed for inventory in Boston. Otherwise I woulda broke records.

LINDA: Well, it makes seventy dollars and some pennies. That's very good.

WILLY: What do we owe?

LINDA: Well, on the first there's sixteen dollars on the refrigerator—

WILLY: Why sixteen?

LINDA: Well, the fan belt broke, so it was a dollar eighty.

WILLY: But it's brand new.

LINDA: Well, the man said that's the way it is. Till they work themselves in, y'know.

[They move through the wall-line into the kitchen.]

WILLY: I hope we didn't get stuck on that machine.

LINDA: They got the biggest ads of any of them!

WILLY: I know, it's a fine machine. What else?

LINDA: Well, there's nine-sixty for the washing machine. And for the vacuum cleaner there's three and a half due on the fifteenth. Then the roof, you got twenty-one dollars remaining.

WILLY: It don't leak, does it?

LINDA: No, they did a wonderful job. Then you owe Frank for the carburetor.

WILLY: I'm not going to pay that man! That goddam Chevrolet, they ought to prohibit the manufacture of that car!

LINDA: Well, you owe him three and a half. And odds and ends, comes to around a hundred and twenty dollars by the fifteenth.

WILLY: A hundred and twenty dollars! My God, if business don't pick up I don't know what I'm gonna do!

LINDA: Well, next week you'll do better.

WILLY: Oh, I'll knock 'em dead next week. I'll go to Hartford. I'm very well liked in Hartford. You know, the trouble is, Linda, people don't seem to take to me.

[They move onto the forestage.]

LINDA: Oh, don't be foolish.

WILLY: I know it when I walk in. They seem to laugh at me.

LINDA: Why? Why would they laugh at you? Don't talk that way, Willy.

[WILLY moves to the edge of the stage. LINDA goes into the kitchen and starts to darn stockings.]

WILLY: I don't know the reason for it, but they just pass me by. I'm not noticed.

LINDA: But you're doing wonderful, dear. You're making seventy to a hundred dollars a week.

WILLY: But I gotta be at it ten, twelve hours a day. Other men—I don't know—they do it easier. I don't know why—I can't stop myself—I talk too much. A man oughta come in with a few words. One thing about Charley. He's a man of few words, and they respect him.

LINDA: You don't talk too much, you're just lively.

WILLY: [Smiling.] Well, I figure, what the hell, life is short, a couple of jokes. [To himself.] I joke too much! [The smile goes.]

LINDA: Why? You're—

WILLY: I'm fat. I'm very—foolish to look at, Linda. I didn't tell you, but Christmas time I happened to be calling on F. H. Stewarts, and a salesman I know, as I was going in to see the buyer I heard him say something about—walrus. And I—I cracked him right across the face. I won't take that. I simply will not take that. But they do laugh at me. I know that.

LINDA: Darling . . .

WILLY: I gotta overcome it. I know I gotta overcome it. I'm not dressing to advantage, maybe.

LINDA: Willy, darling, you're the handsomest man in the world—

WILLY: Oh, no, Linda.

LINDA: To me you are. [Slight pause.] The handsomest. [From the darkness is heard the laughter of a woman. WILLY doesn't turn to it, but it continues through LINDA's lines.] And the boys, Willy. Few men are idolized by their children the way you are.

[Music is heard as behind a scrim, to the left of the house, THE WOMAN, dimly seen, is dressing.]

WILLY: [With great feeling.] You're the best there is, Linda, you're a pal, you know that? On the road—on the road I want to grab you sometimes and just kiss the life outa you. [The laughter is loud now, and he moves into a brightening area at the left, where THE WOMAN has come from behind the scrim and is standing, putting on her hat, looking into a "mirror" and laughing.] 'Cause I get so lonely—especially when business is bad and there's nobody to talk to. I get the feeling that I'll never sell anything again, that I won't make a living for you, or a business, a business for the boys. [He talks through THE WOMAN'S subsiding laughter. THE WOMAN primps at the "mirror."] There's so much I want to make for—

THE WOMAN: Me? You didn't make me, Willy. I picked you.

WILLY: [Pleased.] You picked me?

THE WOMAN: [Who is quite proper-looking, WILLY'S age.] I did. I've been sitting at that desk watching all the salesmen go by, day in, day out. But you've got such a sense of humor, and we do have such a good time together, don't we?

WILLY: Sure, sure. [He takes her in his arms.] Why do you have to go now?

THE WOMAN: It's two o'clock . . .

WILLY: No, come on in! [He pulls her.]

THE WOMAN: . . . my sisters'll be scandalized. When'll you be back?

WILLY: Oh, two weeks about. Will you come up again?

THE WOMAN: Sure thing. You do make me laugh. It's good for me. [She squeezes his arm, kisses him.] And I think you're a wonderful man.

WILLY: You picked me, heh?

THE WOMAN: Sure. Because you're so sweet. And such a kidder.

WILLY: Well, I'll see you next time I'm in Boston.

THE WOMAN: I'll put you right through to the buyers.

WILLY: [Slapping her bottom.] Right. Well, bottoms up!

THE WOMAN: [Slaps him gently and laughs.] You just kill me, Willy. [He suddenly grabs her and kisses her roughly.] You kill me. And thanks for the stockings. I love a lot of stockings. Well, good night.

WILLY: Good night. And keep your pores open!

THE WOMAN: Oh, Willy!

[THE WOMAN bursts out laughing, and LINDA'S laughter blends in. THE WOMAN disappears into the dark. Now the area at the kitchen table brightens. LINDA is sitting where she was at the kitchen table, but now is mending a pair of her silk stockings.]

LINDA: You are, Willy. The handsomest man. You've got no reason to feel that—

WILLY: [Coming out of THE WOMAN'S dimming area and going over to LINDA.] I'll make it all up to you, Linda. I'll—

LINDA: There's nothing to make up, dear. You're doing fine, better than—

WILLY: [Noticing her mending.] What's that?

LINDA: Just mending my stockings. They're so expensive—

WILLY: [Angrily, taking them from her.] I won't have you mending stockings in this house! Now throw them out!

[LINDA puts the stockings in her pocket.]

BERNARD: [Entering on the run.] Where is he? If he doesn't study!

WILLY: [Moving to the forestage, with great agitation.] You'll give him the answers!

BERNARD: I do, but I can't on a Regents! That's a state exam! They're liable to arrest me!

WILLY: Where is he? I'll whip him, I'll whip him!

LINDA: And he'd better give back that football, Willy, it's not nice.

WILLY: Biff! Where is he? Why is he taking everything?

LINDA: He's too rough with the girls, Willy. All the mothers are afraid of him!

WILLY: I'll whip him!

BERNARD: He's driving the car without a license!

[THE WOMAN'S laugh is heard.]

WILLY: Shut up!

LINDA: All the mothers—

WILLY: Shut up!

BERNARD: [Backing quietly away and out.] Mr. Birnbaum says he's stuck up.

WILLY: Get outa here!

BERNARD: If he doesn't buckle down he'll flunk math! [He goes off.]

LINDA: He's right, Willy, you've gotta—

WILLY: [Exploding at her.] There's nothing the matter with him! You want him to be a worm like Bernard? He's got spirit, personality . . . [As he speaks, LINDA, almost in tears, exits into the living room. WILLY is alone in the kitchen, wilting and staring. The leaves are gone. It is night again, and the apartment houses look down from behind.] Loaded with it. Loaded! What is he stealing? He's giving it back, isn't he? Why is he stealing? What did I tell him? I never in my life told him anything but decent things.

[HAPPY in pajamas has come down the stairs; WILLY suddenly becomes aware of HAPPY'S presence.]

HAPPY: Let's go now, come on.

WILLY: [Sitting down at the kitchen table.] Huh! Why did she have to wax the floors herself? Everytime she waxes the floors she keels over. She knows that!

HAPPY: Shh! Take it easy. What brought you back tonight?

WILLY: I got an awful scare. Nearly hit a kid in Yonkers. God! Why didn't I go to Alaska with my brother Ben that time! Ben! That man was a genius, that man was success incarnate! What a mistake! He begged me to go.

HAPPY: Well, there's no use in—WILLY: You guys! There was a man started with the clothes on his back and ended up with diamond mines!

HAPPY: Boy, someday I'd like to know how he did it.

WILLY: What's the mystery? The man knew what he wanted and went out and got it! Walked into a jungle, and comes out, the age of twenty-one, and he's rich! The world is an oyster, but you don't crack it open on a mattress!

HAPPY: Pop, I told you I'm gonna retire you for life.

WILLY: You'll retire me for life on seventy goddam dollars a week? And your women and your car and your apartment, and you'll retire me for life! Christ's sake, I couldn't get past Yonkers today! Where are you guys, where are you? The woods are burning! I can't drive a car!

[CHARLEY has appeared in the doorway. He is a large man, slow of speech, laconic, immovable. In all he says, despite what he says, there is pity, and now, trepidation. He has a robe over pajamas, slippers on his feet. He enters the kitchen.]

CHARLEY: Everything all right?

HAPPY: Yeah, Charley, everything's . . .

WILLY: What's the matter?

CHARLEY: I heard some noise. I thought something happened. Can't we do something about the walls? You sneeze in here, and in my house hats blow off.

HAPPY: Let's go to bed, Dad. Come on.

[CHARLEY signals to HAPPY to go.]

WILLY: You go ahead, I'm not tired at the moment.

HAPPY: [To WILLY.] Take it easy, huh? [He exits.]

WILLY: What're you doin' up?

CHARLEY: [Sitting down at the kitchen table opposite WILLY.] Couldn't sleep good. I had a heartburn.

WILLY: Well, you don't know how to eat.

CHARLEY: I eat with my mouth.

WILLY: No, you're ignorant. You gotta know about vitamins and things like that.

CHARLEY: Come on, let's shoot. Tire you out a little.

WILLY: [Hesitantly.] All right. You got cards?

CHARLEY: [Taking a deck from his pocket.] Yeah, I got them. Someplace. What is it with those vitamins?

WILLY: [Dealing.] They build up your bones. Chemistry.

CHARLEY: Yeah, but there's no bones in a heartburn.

WILLY: What are you talkin' about? Do you know the first thing about it?

CHARLEY: Don't get insulted.

WILLY: Don't talk about something you don't know anything about.

[They are playing. Pause.]

CHARLEY: What're you doin' home?

WILLY: A little trouble with the car.

CHARLEY: Oh. [Pause.] I'd like to take a trip to California.

WILLY: Don't say.

CHARLEY: You want a job?

WILLY: I got a job, I told you that. [After a slight pause.] What the hell are you offering me a job for?

CHARLEY: Don't get insulted.

WILLY: Don't insult me.

CHARLEY: I don't see no sense in it. You don't have to go on this way.

WILLY: I got a good job. [Slight pause.] What do you keep comin' in here for?

CHARLEY: You want me to go?

WILLY: [After a pause, withering.] I can't understand it. He's going back to Texas again. What the hell is that?

CHARLEY: Let him go.

WILLY: I got nothin' to give him, Charley, I'm clean, I'm clean.

CHARLEY: He won't starve. None a them starve. Forget about him.

WILLY: Then what have I got to remember?

CHARLEY: You take it too hard. To hell with it. When a deposit bottle is broken you don't get your nickel back.

WILLY: That's easy enough for you to say.

CHARLEY: That ain't easy for me to say.

WILLY: Did you see the ceiling I put up in the living-room?

CHARLEY: Yeah, that's a piece of work. To put up a ceiling is a mystery to me. How do you do it?

WILLY: What's the difference?

CHARLEY: Well, talk about it.

WILLY: You gonna put up a ceiling?

CHARLEY: How could I put up a ceiling?

WILLY: Then what the hell are you bothering me for?

CHARLEY: You're insulted again.

WILLY: A man who can't handle tools is not a man. You're disgusting.

CHARLEY: Don't call me disgusting, Willy.

[UNCLE BEN, carrying a valise and an umbrella, enters the forestage from around the right corner of the house. He is a stolid man, in his sixties, with a mustache and an authoritative air. He is utterly certain of his destiny, and there is an aura of far places about him. He enters exactly as WILLY speaks.]

WILLY: I'm getting awfully tired, Ben.

[BEN's music is heard. BEN looks around at everything.]

CHARLEY: Good, keep playing; you'll sleep better. Did you call me Ben?

[BEN looks at his watch.]

WILLY: That's funny. For a second there you reminded me of my brother Ben.

BEN: I only have a few minutes. [He strolls, inspecting the place. WILLY and CHARLEY continue playing.]

CHARLEY: You never heard from him again, heh? Since that time?

WILLY: Didn't Linda tell you? Couple of weeks ago we got a letter from his wife in Africa. He died.

CHARLEY: That so.

BEN: [Chuckling.] So this is Brooklyn, eh?

CHARLEY: Maybe you're in for some of his money.

WILLY: Naa, he had seven sons. There's just one opportunity I had with that man . . .

BEN: I must make a train, William. There are several properties I'm looking at in Alaska.

WILLY: Sure, sure! If I'd gone with him to Alaska that time, everything would've been totally different.

CHARLEY: Go on, you'da froze to death up there.

WILLY: What're you talking about?

BEN: Opportunity is tremendous in Alaska, William. Surprised you're not up there.

WILLY: Sure, tremendous.

CHARLEY: Heh?

WILLY: There was the only man I ever met who knew the answers.

CHARLEY: Who?

BEN: How are you all?

WILLY: [Taking a pot, smiling.] Fine, fine.

CHARLEY: Pretty sharp tonight.

BEN: Is Mother living with you?

WILLY: No, she died a long time ago.

CHARLEY: Who?

BEN: That's too bad. Fine specimen of a lady, Mother.

WILLY: [To CHARLEY.] Heh?

BEN: I'd hoped to see the old girl.

CHARLEY: Who died?

BEN: Heard anything from Father, have you?

WILLY: [Unnerved.] What do you mean, who died?

CHARLEY: [Taking a pot.] What're you talkin' about?

BEN: [Looking at his watch.] William, it's half-past eight!

WILLY: [As though to dispel his confusion he angrily stops CHARLEY's hand.] That's my build!

CHARLEY: I put the ace—

WILLY: If you don't know how to play the game I'm not gonna throw my money away on you!

CHARLEY: [Rising.] It was my ace, for God's sake!

WILLY: I'm through, I'm through!

BEN: When did Mother die?

WILLY: Long ago. Since the beginning you never knew how to play cards.

CHARLEY: [Picks up the cards and goes to the door.] All right! Next time I'll bring a deck with five aces.

WILLY: I don't play that kind of game!

CHARLEY: [Turning to him.] You ought to be ashamed of yourself!

WILLY: Yeah?

CHARLEY: Yeah! [He goes out.]

WILLY: [Slamming the door after him.] Ignoramus!

BEN: [As WILLY comes toward him through the wall-line of the kitchen.] So you're William.

WILLY: [Shaking BEN's hand.] Ben! I've been waiting for you so long! What's the answer? How did you do it?

BEN: Oh, there's a story in that.

[LINDA enters the forestage, as of old, carrying the wash basket.]

LINDA: Is this Ben?

BEN: [Gallantly.] How do you do, my dear.

LINDA: Where've you been all these years? Willy's always wondered why you—

WILLY: [Pulling BEN away from her impatiently.] Where is Dad? Didn't you follow him? How did you get started?

BEN: Well, I don't know how much you remember.

WILLY: Well, I was just a baby, of course, only three or four years old—

BEN: Three years and eleven months.

WILLY: What a memory, Ben!

BEN: I have many enterprises, William, and I have never kept books.

WILLY: I remember I was sitting under the wagon in—was it Nebraska?

BEN: It was South Dakota, and I gave you a bunch of wild flowers.

WILLY: I remember you walking away down some open road.

BEN: [Laughing.] I was going to find Father in Alaska.

WILLY: Where is he?

BEN: At that age I had a very faulty view of geography, William. I discovered after a few days that I was heading due south, so instead of Alaska, I ended up in Africa.

LINDA: Africa!

WILLY: The Gold Coast!

BEN: Principally diamond mines.

LINDA: Diamond mines!

BEN: Yes, my dear. But I've only a few minutes—

WILLY: No! Boys! Boys! [Young BIFF and HAPPY appear.] Listen to this. This is your Uncle Ben, a great man! Tell my boys, Ben!

BEN: Why, boys, when I was seventeen I walked into the jungle, and when I was twenty-one I walked out. [He laughs.] And by God I was rich.

WILLY: [To the boys.] You see what I been talking about? The greatest things can happen!

BEN: [Glancing at his watch.] I have an appointment in Ketchikan Tuesday week.⁸

WILLY: No, Ben! Please tell about Dad. I want my boys to hear. I want them to know the kind of stock they spring from. All I remember is a man with a big beard, and I was in Mamma's lap, sitting around a fire, and some kind of high music.

BEN: His flute. He played the flute.

WILLY: Sure, the flute, that's right!

[New music is heard, a high, rollicking tune.]

BEN: Father was a very great and a very wild-hearted man. We would start in Boston, and he'd toss the whole family into the wagon, and then he'd drive the team right across the country; through Ohio, and Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and all the Western states. And we'd stop in the towns and sell the flutes that he'd made on the way. Great inventor, Father. With one gadget he made more in a week than a man like you could make in a lifetime.

WILLY: That's just the way I'm bringing them up, Ben—rugged, well liked, all-around.

BEN: Yeah? [To BIFF.] Hit that, boy—hard as you can. [He pounds his stomach.]

BIFF: Oh, no, sir!

BEN: [Taking boxing stance.] Come on, get to me! [He laughs.]

WILLY: Go to it, Biff! Go ahead, show him!

BIFF: Okay! [He cocks his fist and starts in.]

LINDA: [To WILLY.] Why must he fight, dear?

BEN: [Sparring with BIFF.] Good boy! Good boy!

WILLY: How's that, Ben, heh?

HAPPY: Give him the left, Biff!

LINDA: Why are you fighting?

BEN: Good boy! [Suddenly comes in, trips BIFF, and stands over him, the point of his umbrella poised over BIFF's eye.]

LINDA: Look out, Biff!

BIFF: Gee!

BEN: [Patting BIFF's knee.] Never fight fair with a stranger, boy. You'll never get out of the jungle that way. [Taking LINDA's hand and bowing.] It was an honor and a pleasure to meet you, Linda.

LINDA: [Withdrawing her hand coldly, frightened.] Have a nice—trip.

BEN: [To WILLY.] And good luck with your—what do you do?

WILLY: Selling.

BEN: Yes. Well . . . [He raises his hand in farewell to all.]

8. That is, in Ketchikan, Alaska, one week from Tuesday.

WILLY: No, Ben, I don't want you to think . . . [He takes BEN's arm to show him.]

It's Brooklyn, I know, but we hunt too.

BEN: Really, now.

WILLY: Oh, sure, there's snakes and rabbits and—that's why I moved out here.

Why, Biff can fell any one of these trees in no time! Boys! Go right over to where they're building the apartment house and get some sand. We're gonna rebuild the entire front stoop right now! Watch this, Ben!

BIFF: Yes, sir! On the double, Hap!

HAPPY: [As he and BIFF run off.] I lost weight, Pop, you notice?

[CHARLEY enters in knickers, even before the boys are gone.]

CHARLEY: Listen, if they steal any more from that building the watchman'll put the cops on them!

LINDA: [To WILLY.] Don't let Biff . . .

[BEN laughs lustily.]

WILLY: You shoulda seen the lumber they brought home last week. At least a dozen six-by-tens worth all kinds a money.

CHARLEY: Listen, if that watchman—

WILLY: I gave them hell, understand. But I got a couple of fearless characters there.

CHARLEY: Willy, the jails are full of fearless characters.

BEN: [Clapping WILLY on the back, with a laugh at CHARLEY.] And the stock exchange, friend!

WILLY: [Joining in BEN's laughter.] Where are the rest of your pants?

CHARLEY: My wife bought them.

WILLY: Now all you need is a golf club and you can go upstairs and go to sleep.

[To BEN.] Great athlete! Between him and his son Bernard they can't hammer a nail!

BERNARD: [Rushing in.] The watchman's chasing Biff!

WILLY: [Angrily.] Shut up! He's not stealing anything!

LINDA: [Alarmed, hurrying off left.] Where is he? Biff, dear! [She exits.]

WILLY: [Moving toward the left, away from BEN.] There's nothing wrong. What's the matter with you?

BEN: Nervy boy. Good!

WILLY: [Laughing.] Oh, nerves of iron, that Biff!

CHARLEY: Don't know what it is. My New England man comes back and he's bleedin', they murdered him up there.

WILLY: It's contacts, Charley, I got important contacts!

CHARLEY: [Sarcastically.] Glad to hear it, Willy. Come in later, we'll shoot a little casino. I'll take some of your Portland money. [He laughs at WILLY and exits.]

WILLY: [Turning to BEN.] Business is bad, it's murderous. But not for me, of course.

BEN: I'll stop by on my way back to Africa.

WILLY: [Longingly.] Can't you stay a few days? You're just what I need, Ben, because I—I have a fine position here, but I—well, Dad left when I was such a baby and I never had a chance to talk to him and I still feel—kind of temporary about myself.

BEN: I'll be late for my train.

[They are at opposite ends of the stage.]

WILLY: Ben, my boys—can't we talk? They'd go into the jaws of hell for me, see, but I—

BEN: William, you're being first-rate with your boys. Outstanding, manly chaps!

WILLY: [Hanging on to his words.] Oh, Ben, that's good to hear! Because sometimes I'm afraid that I'm not teaching them the right kind of—Ben, how should I teach them?

BEN: [Giving great weight to each word, and with a certain vicious audacity.] William, when I walked into the jungle, I was seventeen. When I walked out I was twenty-one. And, by God, I was rich! [He goes off into darkness around the right corner of the house.]

WILLY: . . . was rich! That's just the spirit I want to imbue them with! To walk into a jungle! I was right! I was right! I was right!

[BEN is gone, but WILLY is still speaking to him as LINDA, in nightgown and robe, enters the kitchen, glances around for WILLY, then goes to the door of the house, looks out and sees him. Comes down to his left. He looks at her.]

LINDA: Willy, dear? Willy?

WILLY: I was right!

LINDA: Did you have some cheese? [He can't answer.] It's very late, darling. Come to bed, heh?

WILLY: [Looking straight up.] Gotta break your neck to see a star in this yard.

LINDA: You coming in?

WILLY: Whatever happened to that diamond watch fob? Remember? When Ben came from Africa that time? Didn't he give me a watch fob with a diamond in it?

LINDA: You pawned it, dear. Twelve, thirteen years ago. For Biff's radio correspondence course.

WILLY: Gee, that was a beautiful thing. I'll take a walk.

LINDA: But you're in your slippers.

WILLY: [Starting to go around the house at the left.] I was right! I was! [Half to LINDA, as he goes, shaking his head.] What a man! There was a man worth talking to. I was right!

LINDA: [Calling after WILLY.] But in your slippers, Willy!

[WILLY is almost gone when BIFF, in his pajamas, comes down the stairs and enters the kitchen.]

BIFF: What is he doing out there?

LINDA: Sh!

BIFF: God Almighty, Mom, how long has he been doing this?

LINDA: Don't, he'll hear you.

BIFF: What the hell is the matter with him?

LINDA: It'll pass by morning.

BIFF: Shouldn't we do anything?

LINDA: Oh, my dear, you should do a lot of things, but there's nothing to do, so go to sleep.

[HAPPY comes down the stairs and sits on the steps.]

HAPPY: I never heard him so loud, Mom.

LINDA: Well, come around more often; you'll hear him. [She sits down at the table and mends the lining of WILLY's jacket.]

BIFF: Why didn't you ever write me about this, Mom?

LINDA: How would I write to you? For over three months you had no address.

BIFF: I was on the move. But you know I thought of you all the time. You know that, don't you, pal?

LINDA: I know, dear, I know. But he likes to have a letter. Just to know that there's still a possibility for better things.

BIFF: He's not like this all the time, is he?

LINDA: It's when you come home he's always the worst.

BIFF: When I come home?

LINDA: When you write you're coming, he's all smiles, and talks about the future, and—he's just wonderful. And then the closer you seem to come, the more shaky he gets, and then, by the time you get here, he's arguing, and he seems angry at you. I think it's just that maybe he can't bring himself to—to open up to you. Why are you so hateful to each other? Why is that?

BIFF: [Evasively.] I'm not hateful, Mom.

LINDA: But you no sooner come in the door than you're fighting!

BIFF: I don't know why. I mean to change. I'm tryin', Mom, you understand?

LINDA: Are you home to stay now?

BIFF: I don't know. I want to look around, see what's doin'.

LINDA: Biff, you can't look around all your life, can you?

BIFF: I just can't take hold, Mom. I can't take hold of some kind of a life.

LINDA: Biff, a man is not a bird, to come and go with the springtime.

BIFF: Your hair . . . [He touches her hair.] Your hair got so gray.

LINDA: Oh, it's been gray since you were in high school. I just stopped dyeing it, that's all.

BIFF: Dye it again, will ya? I don't want my pal looking old. [He smiles.]

LINDA: You're such a boy! You think you can go away for a year and . . . You've got to get it into your head now that one day you'll knock on this door and there'll be strange people here—

BIFF: What are you talking about? You're not even sixty, Mom.

LINDA: But what about your father?

BIFF: [Lamely.] Well, I meant him too.

HAPPY: He admires Pop.

LINDA: Biff, dear, if you don't have any feeling for him, then you can't have any feeling for me.

BIFF: Sure I can, Mom.

LINDA: No. You can't just come to see me, because I love him. [With a threat, but only a threat, of tears.] He's the dearest man in the world to me, and I won't have anyone making him feel unwanted and low and blue. You've got to make up your mind now, darling, there's no leeway anymore. Either he's your father and you pay him that respect, or else you're not to come here. I know he's not easy to get along with—nobody knows that better than me—but . . .

WILLY: [From the left, with a laugh.] Hey, hey, Biff!

BIFF: [Starting to go out after WILLY.] What the hell is the matter with him?
[HAPPY stops him.]

LINDA: Don't—don't go near him!

BIFF: Stop making excuses for him! He always, always wiped the floor with you. Never had an ounce of respect for you.

HAPPY: He's always had respect for—

BIFF: What the hell do you know about it?

HAPPY: [Surlily.] Just don't call him crazy!

BIFF: He's got no character—Charley wouldn't do this. Not in his own house—spewing out that vomit from his mind.

HAPPY: Charley never had to cope with what he's got to.

BIFF: People are worse off than Willy Loman. Believe me, I've seen them!

LINDA: Then make Charley your father, Biff. You can't do that, can you? I don't say he's a great man. Willy Loman never made a lot of money. His name was never in the paper. He's not the finest character that ever lived. But he's a human being, and a terrible thing is happening to him. So attention must be paid. He's not to be allowed to fall into his grave like an old dog. Attention, attention must be finally paid to such a person. You called him crazy—

BIFF: I didn't mean—

LINDA: No, a lot of people think he's lost his—balance. But you don't have to be very smart to know what his trouble is. The man is exhausted.

HAPPY: Sure!

LINDA: A small man can be just as exhausted as a great man. He works for a company thirty-six years this March, opens up unheard-of territories to their trademark, and now in his old age they take his salary away.

HAPPY: [Indignantly.] I didn't know that, Mom.

LINDA: You never asked, my dear! Now that you get your spending money someplace else you don't trouble your mind with him.

HAPPY: But I gave you money last—

LINDA: Christmas time, fifty dollars! To fix the hot water it cost ninety-seven fifty! For five weeks he's been on straight commission, like a beginner, an unknown!

BIFF: Those ungrateful bastards!

LINDA: Are they any worse than his sons? When he brought them business, when he was young, they were glad to see him. But now his old friends, the old buyers that loved him so and always found some order to hand him in a pinch—they're all dead, retired. He used to be able to make six, seven calls a day in Boston. Now he takes his valises out of the car and puts them back and takes them out again and he's exhausted. Instead of walking he talks now. He drives seven hundred miles, and when he gets there no one knows him anymore, no one welcomes him. And what goes through a man's mind, driving seven hundred miles home without having earned a cent? Why shouldn't he talk to himself? Why? When he has to go to Charley and borrow fifty dollars a week and pretend to me that it's his pay? How long can that go on? How long? You see what I'm sitting here and waiting for? And you tell me he has no character? The man who never worked a day but for your benefit? When does he get the medal for that? Is this his reward—to turn around at the age of sixty-three and find his sons, who he loved better than his life, one a philandering bum—

HAPPY: Mom!

LINDA: That's all you are, my baby! [To BIFF.] And you! What happened to the love you had for him? You were such pals! How you used to talk to him on the phone every night! How lonely he was till he could come home to you!

BIFF: All right, Mom. I'll live here in my room, and I'll get a job. I'll keep away from him, that's all.

LINDA: No, Biff. You can't stay here and fight all the time.

BIFF: He threw me out of this house, remember that.

LINDA: Why did he do that? I never knew why.

BIFF: Because I know he's a fake and he doesn't like anybody around who knows!

LINDA: Why a fake? In what way? What do you mean?

BIFF: Just don't lay it all at my feet. It's between me and him—that's all I have to say. I'll chip in from now on. He'll settle for half my paycheck. He'll be all right. I'm going to bed. [He starts for the stairs.]

LINDA: He won't be all right.

BIFF: [Turning on the stairs, furiously.] I hate this city and I'll stay here. Now what do you want?

LINDA: He's dying, Biff.

[HAPPY turns quickly to her, shocked.]

BIFF: [After a pause.] Why is he dying?

LINDA: He's been trying to kill himself.

BIFF: [With great horror.] How?

LINDA: I live from day to day.

BIFF: What're you talking about?

LINDA: Remember I wrote you that he smashed up the car again? In February?

BIFF: Well?

LINDA: The insurance inspector came. He said that they have evidence. That all these accidents in the last year—weren't—weren't—accidents.

HAPPY: How can they tell that? That's a lie.

LINDA: It seems there's a woman . . . [She takes a breath as. . .] {BIFF: [Sharply but contained.] What woman?

{LINDA: [Simultaneously.] . . . and this woman . . .

LINDA: What?

BIFF: Nothing. Go ahead.

LINDA: What did you say?

BIFF: Nothing. I just said what woman?

HAPPY: What about her?

LINDA: Well, it seems she was walking down the road and saw his car. She says that he wasn't driving fast at all, and that he didn't skid. She says he came to that little bridge, and then deliberately smashed into the railing, and it was only the shallowness of the water that saved him.

BIFF: Oh, no, he probably just fell asleep again.

LINDA: I don't think he fell asleep.

BIFF: Why not?

LINDA: Last month . . . [With great difficulty.] Oh, boys, it's so hard to say a thing like this! He's just a big stupid man to you, but I tell you there's more good in him than in many other people. [She chokes, wipes her eyes.] I was looking for a fuse. The lights blew out, and I went down the cellar. And behind the fuse box—it happened to fall out—was a length of rubber pipe—just short.

HAPPY: No kidding?

LINDA: There's a little attachment on the end of it. I knew right away. And sure enough, on the bottom of the water heater there's a new little nipple on the gas pipe.

HAPPY: [Angrily.] That—jerk.

BIFF: Did you have it taken off?

LINDA: I'm—I'm ashamed to. How can I mention it to him? Every day I go down and take away that little rubber pipe. But, when he comes home, I put it back where it was. How can I insult him that way? I don't know what to do. I live from day to day, boys. I tell you, I know every thought in his mind. It sounds so old-fashioned and silly, but I tell you he put his whole life into you and you've turned your backs on him. [She is bent over in the chair, weeping, her face in her hands.] Biff, I swear to God! Biff, his life is in your hands!

HAPPY: [To BIFF.] How do you like that damned fool!

BIFF: [Kissing her.] All right, pal, all right. It's all settled now. I've been remiss. I know that, Mom. But now I'll stay, and I swear to you, I'll apply myself. [Kneeling in front of her, in a fever of self-reproach.] It's just—you see, Mom, I don't fit in business. Not that I won't try. I'll try, and I'll make good.

HAPPY: Sure you will. The trouble with you in business was you never tried to please people.

BIFF: I know, I—

HAPPY: Like when you worked for Harrison's. Bob Harrison said you were tops, and then you go and do some damn fool thing like whistling whole songs in the elevator like a comedian.

BIFF: [Against HAPPY.] So what? I like to whistle sometimes.

HAPPY: You don't raise a guy to a responsible job who whistles in the elevator!

LINDA: Well, don't argue about it now.

HAPPY: Like when you'd go off and swim in the middle of the day instead of taking the line around.

BIFF: [His resentment rising.] Well, don't you run off? You take off sometimes, don't you? On a nice summer day?

HAPPY: Yeah, but I cover myself!

LINDA: Boys!

HAPPY: If I'm going to take a fade the boss can call any number where I'm supposed to be and they'll swear to him that I just left. I'll tell you something that I hate to say, Biff, but in the business world some of them think you're crazy.

BIFF: [Angered.] Screw the business world!

HAPPY: All right, screw it! Great, but cover yourself!

LINDA: Hap, Hap!

BIFF: I don't care what they think! They've laughed at Dad for years, and you know why? Because we don't belong in this nuthouse of a city! We should be mixing cement on some open plain, or—or carpenters. A carpenter is allowed to whistle!

[WILLY walks in from the entrance of the house, at left.]

WILLY: Even your grandfather was better than a carpenter. [Pause. They watch him.] You never grew up. Bernard does not whistle in the elevator, I assure you.

BIFF: [As though to laugh WILLY out of it.] Yeah, but you do, Pop.

WILLY: I never in my life whistled in an elevator! And who in the business world thinks I'm crazy?

BIFF: I didn't mean it like that, Pop. Now don't make a whole thing out of it, will ya?

WILLY: Go back to the West! Be a carpenter, a cowboy, enjoy yourself!

LINDA: Willy, he was just saying—

WILLY: I heard what he said!

HAPPY: [Trying to quiet WILLY.] Hey, Pop, come on now . . .

WILLY: [Continuing over HAPPY's line.] They laugh at me, heh? Go to Filene's, go to the Hub, go to Slattery's Boston. Call out the name Willy Loman and see what happens! Big shot!

BIFF: All right, Pop.

WILLY: Big!

BIFF: All right!

WILLY: Why do you always insult me?

BIFF: I didn't say a word. [To LINDA.] Did I say a word?

LINDA: He didn't say anything, Willy.

WILLY: [Going to the doorway of the living-room.] All right, good night, good night.

LINDA: Willy, dear, he just decided . . .

WILLY: [To BIFF.] If you get tired hanging around tomorrow, paint the ceiling I put up in the living-room.

BIFF: I'm leaving early tomorrow.

HAPPY: He's going to see Bill Oliver, Pop.

WILLY: [Interestedly.] Oliver? For what?

BIFF: [With reserve, but trying, trying.] He always said he'd stake me. I'd like to go into business, so maybe I can take him up on it.

LINDA: Isn't that wonderful?

WILLY: Don't interrupt. What's wonderful about it? There's fifty men in the City of New York who'd stake him. [To BIFF.] Sporting goods?

BIFF: I guess so. I know something about it and—

WILLY: He knows something about it! You know sporting goods better than Spalding,⁹ for God's sake! How much is he giving you?

BIFF: I don't know, I didn't even see him yet, but—

WILLY: Then what're you talkin' about?

BIFF: [Getting angry.] Well, all I said was I'm gonna see him, that's all!

WILLY: [Turning away.] Ah, you're counting your chickens again.

BIFF: [Starting left for the stairs.] Oh, Jesus, I'm going to sleep!

WILLY: [Calling after him.] Don't curse in this house!

BIFF: [Turning.] Since when did you get so clean?

HAPPY: [Trying to stop them.] Wait a . . .

WILLY: Don't use that language to me! I won't have it!

HAPPY: [Grabbing BIFF, shouts.] Wait a minute! I got an idea. I got a feasible idea. Come here, Biff, let's talk this over now, let's talk some sense here. When I was down in Florida last time, I thought of a great idea to sell sporting goods. It just came back to me. You and I, Biff—we have a line, the Loman Line. We train a couple of weeks, and put on a couple of exhibitions, see?

9. Albert G. Spalding (1850–1915), American baseball player and sporting-goods manufacturer.

WILLY: That's an idea!

HAPPY: Wait! We form two basketball teams, see? Two water-polo teams. We play each other. It's a million dollars' worth of publicity. Two brothers, see? The Loman Brothers. Displays in the Royal Palms—all the hotels. And banners over the ring and the basketball court: "Loman Brothers." Baby, we could sell sporting goods!

WILLY: That is a one-million-dollar idea!

LINDA: Marvelous!

BIFF: I'm in great shape as far as that's concerned.

HAPPY: And the beauty of it is, Biff, it wouldn't be like a business. We'd be out playin' ball again . . .

BIFF: [Enthused.] Yeah, that's . . .

WILLY: Million-dollar . . .

HAPPY: And you wouldn't get fed up with it, Biff. It'd be the family again. There'd be the old honor, and comradeship, and if you wanted to go off for a swim or somethin'—well, you'd do it! Without some smart cooky gettin' up ahead of you!

WILLY: Lick the world! You guys together could absolutely lick the civilized world.

BIFF: I'll see Oliver tomorrow. Hap, if we could work that out . . .

LINDA: Maybe things are beginning to—

WILLY: [Wildly enthused, to LINDA.] Stop interrupting! [To BIFF.] But don't wear sport jacket and slacks when you see Oliver.

BIFF: No, I'll—

WILLY: A business suit, and talk as little as possible, and don't crack any jokes.

BIFF: He did like me. Always liked me.

LINDA: He loved you!

WILLY: [To LINDA.] Will you stop! [To BIFF.] Walk in very serious. You are not applying for a boy's job. Money is to pass. Be quiet, fine, and serious. Everybody likes a kidder, but nobody lends him money.

HAPPY: I'll try to get some myself, Biff. I'm sure I can.

WILLY: I see great things for you kids, I think your troubles are over. But remember, start big and you'll end big. Ask for fifteen. How much you gonna ask for?

BIFF: Gee, I don't know—

WILLY: And don't say "Gee." "Gee" is a boy's word. A man walking in for fifteen thousand dollars does not say "Gee!"

BIFF: Ten, I think, would be top though.

WILLY: Don't be so modest. You always started too low. Walk in with a big laugh. Don't look worried. Start off with a couple of your good stories to lighten things up. It's not what you say, it's how you say it—because personality always wins the day.

LINDA: Oliver always thought the highest of him—

WILLY: Will you let me talk?

BIFF: Don't yell at her, Pop, will ya?

WILLY: [Angrily.] I was talking, wasn't I?

BIFF: I don't like you yelling at her all the time, and I'm tellin' you, that's all.

WILLY: What're you, takin' over this house?

LINDA: Willy—

WILLY: [Turning on her.] Don't take his side all the time, goddammit!

BIFF: [Furiously.] Stop yelling at her!

WILLY: [Suddenly pulling on his cheek, beaten down, guilt ridden.] Give my best to Bill Oliver—he may remember me. [He exits through the living-room doorway.]

LINDA: [Her voice subdued.] What'd you have to start that for? [BIFF turns away.]

You see how sweet he was as soon as you talked hopefully? [She goes over to BIFF.] Come up and say good night to him. Don't let him go to bed that way.

HAPPY: Come on, Biff, let's buck him up.

LINDA: Please, dear. Just say good night. It takes so little to make him happy. Come. [She goes through the living-room doorway, calling upstairs from within the living-room.] Your pajamas are hanging in the bathroom, Willy!

HAPPY: [Looking toward where LINDA went out.] What a woman! They broke the mold when they made her. You know that, Biff?

BIFF: He's off salary. My God, working on commission!

HAPPY: Well, let's face it: he's no hot-shot selling man. Except that sometimes, you have to admit, he's a sweet personality.

BIFF: [Deciding.] Lend me ten bucks, will ya? I want to buy some new ties.

HAPPY: I'll take you to a place I know. Beautiful stuff. Wear one of my striped shirts tomorrow.

BIFF: She got gray. Mom got awful old. Gee, I'm gonna go in to Oliver tomorrow and knock him for a—HAPPY: Come on up. Tell that to Dad. Let's give him a whirl. Come on.

BIFF: [Steamed up.] You know, with ten thousand bucks, boy!

HAPPY: [As they go into the living-room.] That's the talk, Biff, that's the first time I've heard the old confidence out of you! [From within the living-room, fading off.] You're gonna live with me, kid, and any babe you want just say the word . . .

[The last lines are hardly heard. They are mounting the stairs to their parents' bedroom.]

LINDA: [Entering her bedroom and addressing WILLY, who is in the bathroom. She is straightening the bed for him.] Can you do anything about the shower? It drips.

WILLY: [From the bathroom.] All of a sudden everything falls to pieces! Goddam plumbing, oughta be sued, those people. I hardly finished putting it in and the thing . . . [His words rumble off.]

LINDA: I'm just wondering if Oliver will remember him. You think he might?

WILLY: [Coming out of the bathroom in his pajamas.] Remember him? What's the matter with you, you crazy? If he'd've stayed with Oliver he'd be on top by now! Wait'll Oliver gets a look at him. You don't know the average caliber anymore. The average young man today—[He is getting into bed.—]is got a caliber of zero. Greatest thing in the world for him was to bum around. [BIFF and HAPPY enter the bedroom. Slight pause. WILLY stops short, looking at BIFF.] Glad to hear it, boy.

HAPPY: He wanted to say good night to you, sport.

WILLY: [To BIFF.] Yeah. Knock him dead, boy. What'd you want to tell me?

BIFF: Just take it easy, Pop. Good night. [He turns to go.]

WILLY: [Unable to resist.] And if anything falls off the desk while you're talking to him—like a package or something—don't you pick it up. They have office boys for that.

LINDA: I'll make a big breakfast—

WILLY: Will you let me finish? [To BIFF.] Tell him you were in the business in the West. Not farm work.

BIFF: All right, Dad.

LINDA: I think everything—

WILLY: [Going right through her speech.] And don't undersell yourself. No less than fifteen thousand dollars.

BIFF: [Unable to bear him.] Okay. Good night, Mom. [He starts moving.]

WILLY: Because you got a greatness in you, Biff, remember that. You got all kinds of greatness . . . [He lies back, exhausted. BIFF walks out.]

LINDA: [Calling after BIFF.] Sleep well, darling!

HAPPY: I'm gonna get married, Mom. I wanted to tell you.

LINDA: Go to sleep, dear.

HAPPY: [Going.] I just wanted to tell you.

WILLY: Keep up the good work. [HAPPY exits.] God . . . remember that Ebbets Field¹ game? The championship of the city?

LINDA: Just rest. Should I sing to you?

WILLY: Yeah. Sing to me. [LINDA hums a soft lullaby.] When that team came out—he was the tallest, remember?

LINDA: Oh, yes. And in gold.

[BIFF enters the darkened kitchen, takes a cigarette, and leaves the house. He comes downstage into a golden pool of light. He smokes, staring at the night.]

WILLY: Like a young god. Hercules—something like that. And the sun, the sun all around him. Remember how he waved to me? Right up from the field, with the representatives of three colleges standing by? And the buyers I brought, and the cheers when he came out—Loman, Loman, Loman! God Almighty, he'll be great yet. A star like that, magnificent, can never really fade away!

[The light on WILLY is fading. The gas heater begins to glow through the kitchen wall, near the stairs, a blue flame beneath red coils.]

LINDA: [Timidly.] Willy dear, what has he got against you?

WILLY: I'm so tired. Don't talk anymore.

[BIFF slowly returns to the kitchen. He stops, stares toward the heater.]

LINDA: Will you ask Howard to let you work in New York?

WILLY: First thing in the morning. Everything'll be all right.

[BIFF reaches behind the heater and draws out a length of rubber tubing. He is horrified and turns his head toward WILLY'S room, still dimly lit, from which the strains of LINDA'S desperate but monotonous humming rise.]

WILLY: [Staring through the window into the moonlight.] Gee, look at the moon moving between the buildings!

[BIFF wraps the tubing around his hand and quickly goes up the stairs.]

CURTAIN

1. Stadium where the Dodgers, Brooklyn's major-league baseball team, played from 1913 to 1957.

ACT II

Music is heard, gay and bright. The curtain rises as the music fades away. WILLY, in shirt sleeves, is sitting at the kitchen table, sipping coffee, his hat in his lap. LINDA is filling his cup when she can.

WILLY: Wonderful coffee. Meal in itself.

LINDA: Can I make you some eggs?

WILLY: No. Take a breath.

LINDA: You look so rested, dear.

WILLY: I slept like a dead one. First time in months. Imagine, sleeping till ten on a Tuesday morning. Boys left nice and early, heh?

LINDA: They were out of here by eight o'clock.

WILLY: Good work!

LINDA: It was so thrilling to see them leaving together. I can't get over the shaving lotion in this house!

WILLY: [Smiling.] Mmm—

LINDA: Biff was very changed this morning. His whole attitude seemed to be hopeful. He couldn't wait to get downtown to see Oliver.

WILLY: He's heading for a change. There's no question, there simply are certain men that take longer to get—solidified. How did he dress?

LINDA: His blue suit. He's so handsome in that suit. He could be a—anything in that suit!

[WILLY gets up from the table. LINDA holds his jacket for him.]

WILLY: There's no question, no question at all. Gee, on the way home tonight I'd like to buy some seeds.

LINDA: [Laughing.] That'd be wonderful. But not enough sun gets back there. Nothing'll grow any more.

WILLY: You wait, kid, before it's all over we're gonna get a little place out in the country, and I'll raise some vegetables, a couple of chickens . . .

LINDA: You'll do it yet, dear.

[WILLY walks out of his jacket. LINDA follows him.]

WILLY: And they'll get married, and come for a weekend. I'd build a little guest house. 'Cause I got so many fine tools, all I'd need would be a little lumber and some peace of mind.

LINDA: [Joyfully.] I sewed the lining . . .

WILLY: I could build two guest houses, so they'd both come. Did he decide how much he's going to ask Oliver for?

LINDA: [Getting him into the jacket.] He didn't mention it, but I imagine ten or fifteen thousand. You going to talk to Howard today?

WILLY: Yeah. I'll put it to him straight and simple. He'll just have to take me off the road.

LINDA: And Willy, don't forget to ask for a little advance, because we've got the insurance premium. It's the grace period now.

WILLY: That's a hundred . . . ?

LINDA: A hundred and eight, sixty-eight. Because we're a little short again.

WILLY: Why are we short?

LINDA: Well, you had the motor job on the car . . .

WILLY: That goddam Studebaker!

LINDA: And you got one more payment on the refrigerator . . .

WILLY: But it just broke again!

LINDA: Well, it's old, dear.

WILLY: I told you we should've bought a well-advertised machine. Charley bought a General Electric and it's twenty years old and it's still good, that son-of-a-bitch.

LINDA: But, Willy—

WILLY: Whoever heard of a Hastings refrigerator? Once in my life I would like to own something outright before it's broken! I'm always in a race with the junkyard! I just finished paying for the car and it's on its last legs. The refrigerator consumes belts like a goddam maniac. They time those things. They time them so when you finally paid for them, they're used up.

LINDA: [Buttoning up his jacket as he unbuttons it.] All told, about two hundred dollars would carry us, dear. But that includes the last payment on the mortgage. After this payment, Willy, the house belongs to us.

WILLY: It's twenty-five years!

LINDA: Biff was nine years old when we bought it.

WILLY: Well, that's a great thing. To weather a twenty-five year mortgage is—

LINDA: It's an accomplishment.

WILLY: All the cement, the lumber, the reconstruction I put in this house! There ain't a crack to be found in it anymore.

LINDA: Well, it served its purpose.

WILLY: What purpose? Some stranger'll come along, move in, and that's that. If only Biff would take this house, and raise a family . . . [He starts to go.] Good-bye, I'm late.

LINDA: [Suddenly remembering.] Oh, I forgot! You're supposed to meet them for dinner.

WILLY: Me?

LINDA: At Frank's Chop House on Forty-eighth near Sixth Avenue.

WILLY: Is that so! How about you?

LINDA: No, just the three of you. They're gonna blow you to a big meal!

WILLY: Don't say! Who thought of that?

LINDA: Biff came to me this morning, Willy, and he said, "Tell Dad, we want to blow him to a big meal." Be there six o'clock. You and your two boys are going to have dinner.

WILLY: Gee whiz! That's really somethin'. I'm gonna knock Howard for a loop, kid. I'll get an advance, and I'll come home with a New York job. Goddammit, now I'm gonna do it!

LINDA: Oh, that's the spirit, Willy!

WILLY: I will never get behind a wheel the rest of my life!

LINDA: It's changing, Willy, I can feel it changing!

WILLY: Beyond a question. G'bye, I'm late. [He starts to go again.]

LINDA: [Calling after him as she runs to the kitchen table for a handkerchief.] You got your glasses?

WILLY: [Feels for them, then comes back in.] Yeah, yeah, got my glasses.

LINDA: [Giving him the handkerchief.] And a handkerchief.

WILLY: Yeah, handkerchief.

LINDA: And your saccharine?²

WILLY: Yeah, my saccharine.

LINDA: Be careful on the subway stairs.

[She kisses him, and a silk stocking is seen hanging from her hand. WILLY notices it.]

WILLY: Will you stop mending stockings? At least while I'm in the house. It gets me nervous. I can't tell you. Please.

[LINDA hides the stocking in her hand as she follows WILLY across the fore-stage in front of the house.]

LINDA: Remember, Frank's Chop House.

WILLY: [Passing the apron.³] Maybe beets would grow out there.

LINDA: [Laughing.] But you tried so many times.

WILLY: Yeah. Well, don't work hard today. [He disappears around the right corner of the house.]

LINDA: Be careful! [As WILLY vanishes, LINDA waves to him. Suddenly the phone rings. She runs across the stage and into the kitchen and lifts it.] Hello? Oh, Biff! I'm so glad you called, I just . . . Yes, sure, I just told him. Yes, he'll be there for dinner at six o'clock, I didn't forget. Listen, I was just dying to tell you. You know that little rubber pipe I told you about? That he connected to the gas heater? I finally decided to go down the cellar this morning and take it away and destroy it. But it's gone! Imagine? He took it away himself, it isn't there! [She listens.] When? Oh, then you took it. Oh—nothing, it's just that I'd hoped he'd taken it away himself. Oh, I'm not worried, darling, because this morning he left in such high spirits, it was like the old days! I'm not afraid anymore. Did Mr. Oliver see you? . . . Well, you wait there then. And make a nice impression on him, darling. Just don't perspire too much before you see him. And have a nice time with Dad. He may have big news too! . . . That's right, a New York job. And be sweet to him tonight, dear. Be loving to him. Because he's only a little boat looking for a harbor. [She is trembling with sorrow and joy.] Oh, that's wonderful, Biff, you'll save his life. Thanks, darling. Just put your arm around him when he comes into the restaurant. Give him a smile. That's the boy . . . Good-bye, dear . . . You got your comb? . . . That's fine. Good-bye, Biff dear.

[In the middle of her speech, HOWARD WAGNER, thirty-six, wheels on a small typewriter table on which is a wire-recording machine⁴ and proceeds to plug it in. This is on the left forestage. Light slowly fades on LINDA as it rises on HOWARD. HOWARD is intent on threading the machine and only glances over his shoulder as WILLY appears.]

WILLY: Pst! Pst!

HOWARD: Hello, Willy, come in.

WILLY: Like to have a little talk with you, Howard.

2. Artificial sweetener once recommended as a healthy alternative to sugar.

3. Foremost part of the stage, in front of the proscenium arch.

4. Precursor to the tape recorder.

HOWARD: Sorry to keep you waiting. I'll be with you in a minute.

WILLY: What's that, Howard?

HOWARD: Didn't you ever see one of these? Wire recorder.

WILLY: Oh. Can we talk a minute?

HOWARD: Records things. Just got delivery yesterday. Been driving me crazy, the most terrific machine I ever saw in my life. I was up all night with it.

WILLY: What do you do with it?

HOWARD: I bought it for dictation, but you can do anything with it. Listen to this. I had it home last night. Listen to what I picked up. The first one is my daughter. Get this. [He flicks the switch and "Roll out the Barrel" is heard being whistled.] Listen to that kid whistle.

WILLY: That is lifelike, isn't it?

HOWARD: Seven years old. Get that tone.

WILLY: Ts, ts. Like to ask a little favor if you . . .

[The whistling breaks off, and the voice of HOWARD'S daughter is heard.]

HIS DAUGHTER: "Now you, Daddy."

HOWARD: She's crazy for me! [Again the same song is whistled.] That's me! Ha! [He winks.]

WILLY: You're very good!

[The whistling breaks off again. The machine runs silent for a moment.]

HOWARD: Sh! Get this now, this is my son.

HIS SON: "The capital of Alabama is Montgomery; the capital of Arizona is Phoenix; the capital of Arkansas is Little Rock; the capital of California is Sacramento . . ." [And on, and on.]

HOWARD: [Holding up five fingers.] Five years old, Willy!

WILLY: He'll make an announcer some day!

HIS SON: [Continuing.] "The capital . . ."

HOWARD: Get that—alphabetical order! [The machine breaks off suddenly.] Wait a minute. The maid kicked the plug out.

WILLY: It certainly is a—

HOWARD: Sh, for God's sake!

HIS SON: "It's nine o'clock, Bulova watch time.⁵ So I have to go to sleep."

WILLY: That really is—

HOWARD: Wait a minute! The next is my wife.

[They wait.]

HOWARD'S VOICE: "Go on, say something." [Pause.] "Well, you gonna talk?"

HIS WIFE: "I can't think of anything."

HOWARD'S VOICE: "Well, talk—it's turning."

HIS WIFE: [Shyly, beaten.] "Hello." [Silence.] "Oh, Howard, I can't talk into this . . ."

HOWARD: [Snapping the machine off.] That was my wife.

WILLY: That is a wonderful machine. Can we—

HOWARD: I tell you, Willy, I'm gonna take my camera, and my bandsaw, and all my hobbies, and out they go. This is the most fascinating relaxation I ever found.

5. Phrase commonly heard on radio programs sponsored by the Bulova Watch Company.

WILLY: I think I'll get one myself.

HOWARD: Sure, they're only a hundred and a half. You can't do without it. Supposing you wanna hear Jack Benny,⁶ see? But you can't be at home at that hour. So you tell the maid to turn the radio on when Jack Benny comes on, and this automatically goes on with the radio . . .

WILLY: And when you come home you . . .

HOWARD: You can come home twelve o'clock, one o'clock, any time you like, and you get yourself a Coke and sit yourself down, throw the switch, and there's Jack Benny's program in the middle of the night!

WILLY: I'm definitely going to get one. Because lots of time I'm on the road, and I think to myself, what I must be missing on the radio!

HOWARD: Don't you have a radio in the car?

WILLY: Well, yeah, but who ever thinks of turning it on?

HOWARD: Say, aren't you supposed to be in Boston?

WILLY: That's what I want to talk to you about, Howard. You got a minute? [He draws a chair in from the wing.]

HOWARD: What happened? What're you doing here?

WILLY: Well . . .

HOWARD: You didn't crack up again, did you?

WILLY: Oh, no. No . . .

HOWARD: Geez, you had me worried there for a minute. What's the trouble?

WILLY: Well, tell you the truth, Howard. I've come to the decision that I'd rather not travel anymore.

HOWARD: Not travel! Well, what'll you do?

WILLY: Remember, Christmas time, when you had the party here? You said you'd try to think of some spot for me here in town.

HOWARD: With us?

WILLY: Well, sure.

HOWARD: Oh, yeah, yeah. I remember. Well, I couldn't think of anything for you, Willy.

WILLY: I tell ya, Howard. The kids are all grown up, y'know. I don't need much anymore. If I could take home—well, sixty-five dollars a week, I could swing it.

HOWARD: Yeah, but Willy, see I—

WILLY: I tell ya why, Howard. Speaking frankly and between the two of us, y'know—I'm just a little tired.

HOWARD: Oh, I could understand that, Willy. But you're a road man, Willy, and we do a road business. We've only got a half-dozen salesmen on the floor here.

WILLY: God knows, Howard, I never asked a favor of any man. But I was with the firm when your father used to carry you in here in his arms.

HOWARD: I know that, Willy, but—

WILLY: Your father came to me the day you were born and asked me what I thought of the name of Howard, may he rest in peace.

HOWARD: I appreciate that, Willy, but there just is no spot here for you. If I had a spot I'd slam you right in, but I just don't have a single solitary spot.

[He looks for his lighter. WILLY has picked it up and gives it to him. Pause.]

6. Vaudeville, radio, television, and movie star (1894–1974); he hosted America's most popular radio show from 1932 to 1955.

WILLY: [With increasing anger.] Howard, all I need to set my table is fifty dollars a week.

HOWARD: But where am I going to put you, kid?

WILLY: Look, it isn't a question of whether I can sell merchandise, is it?

HOWARD: No, but it's a business, kid, and everybody's gotta pull his own weight.

WILLY: [Desperately.] Just let me tell you a story, Howard—

HOWARD: 'Cause you gotta admit, business is business.

WILLY: [Angrily.] Business is definitely business, but just listen for a minute. You don't understand this. When I was a boy—eighteen, nineteen—I was already on the road. And there was a question in my mind as to whether selling had a future for me. Because in those days I had a yearning to go to Alaska. See, there were three gold strikes in one month in Alaska, and I felt like going out. Just for the ride, you might say.

HOWARD: [Barely interested.] Don't say.

WILLY: Oh, yeah, my father lived many years in Alaska. He was an adventurous man. We've got quite a little streak of self-reliance in our family. I thought I'd go out with my older brother and try to locate him, and maybe settle in the North with the old man. And I was almost decided to go, when I met a salesman in the Parker House. His name was Dave Singleman. And he was eighty-four years old, and he'd drummed merchandise in thirty-one states. And old Dave, he'd go up to his room, y'understand, put on his green velvet slippers—I'll never forget—and pick up his phone and call the buyers, and without ever leaving his room, at the age of eighty-four, he made a living. And when I saw that, I realized that selling was the greatest career a man could want. 'Cause what could be more satisfying than to be able to go, at the age of eighty-four, into twenty or thirty different cities, and pick up his phone and be remembered and loved and helped by so many different people? Do you know? when he died—and by the way he died the death of a salesman, in his green velvet slippers in the smoker⁷ of the New York, New Haven and Hartford, going into Boston—when he died, hundreds of salesmen and buyers were at his funeral. Things were sad on a lotta trains for months after that. [He stands up. HOWARD has not looked at him.] In those days there was personality in it, Howard. There was respect, and comradeship, and gratitude in it. Today, it's all cut and dried, and there's no chance for bringing friendship to bear—or personality. You see what I mean? They don't know me anymore.

HOWARD: [Moving away, toward the right.] That's just the thing, Willy.

WILLY: If I had forty dollars a week—that's all I'd need. Forty dollars, Howard.

HOWARD: Kid, I can't take blood from a stone, I—

WILLY: [Desperation is on him now.] Howard, the year Al Smith⁸ was nominated, your father came to me and—

HOWARD: [Starting to go off.] I've got to see some people, kid.

WILLY: [Stopping him.] I'm talking about your father! There were promises made across this desk! You mustn't tell me you've got people to see—I put thirty-four years into this firm, Howard, and now I can't pay my insurance! You can't eat the orange and throw the peel away—a man is not a piece of fruit!

 [After a pause.] Now pay attention. Your father—in 1928 I had a big year. I averaged a hundred and seventy dollars a week in commissions.

HOWARD: [Impatiently.] Now, Willy, you never averaged—WILLY: [Banging his hand on the desk.] I averaged a hundred and seventy dollars a week in the year of 1928! And your father came to me—or rather, I was in the office here—it was right over this desk—and he put his hand on my shoulder—

HOWARD: [Getting up.] You'll have to excuse me, Willy, I gotta see some people. Pull yourself together. [Going out.] I'll be back in a little while.

[On HOWARD'S exit, the light on his chair grows very bright and strange.]

WILLY: Pull myself together! What the hell did I say to him? My God, I was yelling at him! How could I! [WILLY breaks off, staring at the light, which occupies the chair, animating it. He approaches this chair, standing across the desk from it.] Frank, Frank, don't you remember what you told me that time? How you put your hand on my shoulder, and Frank . . . [He leans on the desk and as he speaks the dead man's name he accidentally switches on the recorder, and instantly.]

HOWARD'S SON: “. . . of New York is Albany. The capital of Ohio is Cincinnati, the capital of Rhode Island is . . .” [The recitation continues.]

WILLY: [Leaping away with fright, shouting.] Ha! Howard! Howard! Howard!

HOWARD: [Rushing in.] What happened?

WILLY: [Pointing at the machine, which continues nasally, childishly, with the capital cities.] Shut it off! Shut it off!

HOWARD: [Pulling the plug out.] Look, Willy . . .

WILLY: [Pressing his hands to his eyes.] I gotta get myself some coffee. I'll get some coffee . . .

[WILLY starts to walk out. HOWARD stops him.]

HOWARD: [Rolling up the cord.] Willy, look . . .

WILLY: I'll go to Boston.

HOWARD: Willy, you can't go to Boston for us.

WILLY: Why can't I go?

HOWARD: I don't want you to represent us. I've been meaning to tell you for a long time now.

WILLY: Howard, are you firing me?

HOWARD: I think you need a good long rest, Willy.

WILLY: Howard—

HOWARD: And when you feel better, come back, and we'll see if we can work something out.

WILLY: But I gotta earn money, Howard. I'm in no position to—

HOWARD: Where are your sons? Why don't your sons give you a hand?

WILLY: They're working on a very big deal.

HOWARD: This is no time for false pride, Willy. You go to your sons and you tell them that you're tired. You've got two great boys, haven't you?

WILLY: Oh, no question, no question, but in the meantime . . .

HOWARD: Then that's that, heh?

WILLY: All right, I'll go to Boston tomorrow.

HOWARD: No, no.

WILLY: I can't throw myself on my sons. I'm not a cripple!

HOWARD: Look, kid, I'm busy, I'm busy this morning.

WILLY: [Grasping HOWARD's arm.] Howard, you've got to let me go to Boston!

HOWARD: [Hard, keeping himself under control.] I've got a line of people to see this morning. Sit down, take five minutes, and pull yourself together, and then go home, will ya? I need the office, Willy. [He starts to go, turns, remembering the recorder, starts to push off the table holding the recorder.] Oh, yeah. Whenever you can this week, stop by and drop off the samples. You'll feel better, Willy, and then come back and we'll talk. Pull yourself together, kid, there's people outside.

[HOWARD exits, pushing the table off left. WILLY stares into space, exhausted. Now the music is heard—BEN's music—first distantly, then closer, closer. As WILLY speaks, BEN enters from the right. He carries valise and umbrella.]

WILLY: Oh, Ben, how did you do it? What is the answer? Did you wind up the Alaska deal already?

BEN: Doesn't take much time if you know what you're doing. Just a short business trip. Boarding ship in an hour. Wanted to say good-by.

WILLY: Ben, I've got to talk to you.

BEN: [Glancing at his watch.] Haven't the time, William.

WILLY: [Crossing the apron to BEN.] Ben, nothing's working out. I don't know what to do.

BEN: Now, look here, William. I've bought timberland in Alaska and I need a man to look after things for me.

WILLY: God, timberland! Me and my boys in those grand outdoors!

BEN: You've a new continent at your doorstep, William. Get out of these cities, they're full of talk and time payments and courts of law. Screw on your fists and you can fight for a fortune up there.

WILLY: Yes, yes! Linda, Linda!

[LINDA enters as of old, with the wash.]

LINDA: Oh, you're back?

BEN: I haven't much time.

WILLY: No, wait! Linda, he's got a proposition for me in Alaska.

LINDA: But you've got—[To BEN.] He's got a beautiful job here.

WILLY: But in Alaska, kid, I could—

LINDA: You're doing well enough, Willy!

BEN: [To LINDA.] Enough for what, my dear?

LINDA: [Frightened of BEN and angry at him.] Don't say those things to him! Enough to be happy right here, right now. [To WILLY, while BEN laughs.] Why must everybody conquer the world? You're well liked, and the boys love you, and someday—[To BEN.]—why, old man Wagner told him just the other day that if he keeps it up he'll be a member of the firm, didn't he, Willy?

WILLY: Sure, sure. I am building something with this firm, Ben, and if a man is building something he must be on the right track, mustn't he?

BEN: What are you building? Lay your hand on it. Where is it?

WILLY: [Hesitantly.] That's true, Linda, there's nothing.

LINDA: Why? [To BEN.] There's a man eighty-four years old—

WILLY: That's right, Ben, that's right. When I look at that man I say, what is there to worry about?

BEN: Bah!

WILLY: It's true, Ben. All he has to do is go into any city, pick up the phone, and he's making his living and you know why?

BEN: [Picking up his valise.] I've got to go.

WILLY: [Holding BEN back.] Look at this boy! [BIFF, in his high school sweater, enters carrying suitcase. HAPPY carries BIFF's shoulder guards, gold helmet, and football pants.] Without a penny to his name, three great universities are begging for him, and from there the sky's the limit, because it's not what you do, Ben. It's who you know and the smile on your face! It's contacts, Ben, contacts! The whole wealth of Alaska passes over the lunch table at the Commodore Hotel, and that's the wonder, the wonder of this country, that a man can end with diamonds here on the basis of being liked! [He turns to BIFF.] And that's why when you get out on that field today it's important. Because thousands of people will be rooting for you and loving you. [To BEN, who has again begun to leave.] And Ben! when he walks into a business office his name will sound out like a bell and all the doors will open to him! I've seen it, Ben, I've seen it a thousand times! You can't feel it with your hand like timber, but it's there!

BEN: Good-by, William.

WILLY: Ben, am I right? Don't you think I'm right? I value your advice.

BEN: There's a new continent at your doorstep, William. You could walk out rich. Rich! [He is gone.]

WILLY: We'll do it here, Ben! You hear me? We're gonna do it here!

[Young BERNARD rushes in. The gay music of the Boys is heard.]

BERNARD: Oh, gee, I was afraid you left already!

WILLY: Why? What time is it?

BERNARD: It's half-past one!

WILLY: Well, come on, everybody! Ebbets Field next stop! Where's the pennants?
[He rushes through the wall-line of the kitchen and out into the living room.]

LINDA: [To BIFF.] Did you pack fresh underwear?

BIFF: [Who has been limbering up.] I want to go!

BERNARD: Biff, I'm carrying your helmet, ain't I?

HAPPY: No, I'm carrying the helmet.

BERNARD: Oh, Biff, you promised me.

HAPPY: I'm carrying the helmet.

BERNARD: How am I going to get in the locker room?

LINDA: Let him carry the shoulder guards. [She puts her coat and hat on in the kitchen.]

BERNARD: Can I, Biff? 'Cause I told everybody I'm going to be in the locker room.

HAPPY: In Ebbets Field it's the clubhouse.

BERNARD: I meant the clubhouse, Biff!

HAPPY: Biff!

BIFF: [Grandly, after a slight pause.] Let him carry the shoulder guards.

HAPPY: [As he gives BERNARD the shoulder guards.] Stay close to us now.

[WILLY rushes in with the pennants.]

WILLY: [Handing them out.] Everybody wave when Biff comes out on the field.
[HAPPY and BERNARD run off.] You set now, boy?

[The music has died away.]

BIFF: Ready to go, Pop. Every muscle is ready.

WILLY: [At the edge of the apron.] You realize what this means?

BIFF: That's right, Pop.

WILLY: [Feeling BIFF's muscles.] You're comin' home this afternoon captain of the All-Scholastic Championship Team of the City of New York.

BIFF: I got it, Pop. And remember, pal, when I take off my helmet, that touch-down is for you.

WILLY: Let's go! [He is starting out, with his arm around BIFF, when CHARLEY enters, as of old, in knickers.] I got no room for you, Charley.

CHARLEY: Room? For what?

WILLY: In the car.

CHARLEY: You goin' for a ride? I wanted to shoot some casino.

WILLY: [Furiously.] Casino! [Incredulously.] Don't you realize what today is?

LINDA: Oh, he knows, Willy. He's just kidding you.

WILLY: That's nothing to kid about!

CHARLEY: No, Linda, what's goin' on?

LINDA: He's playing in Ebbets Field.

CHARLEY: Baseball in this weather?

WILLY: Don't talk to him. Come on, come on! [He is pushing them out.]

CHARLEY: Wait a minute, didn't you hear the news?

WILLY: What?

CHARLEY: Don't you listen to the radio? Ebbets Field just blew up.

WILLY: You go to hell! [CHARLEY laughs. Pushing them out.] Come on, come on! We're late.

CHARLEY: [As they go.] Knock a homer, Biff, knock a homer!

WILLY: [The last to leave, turning to CHARLEY.] I don't think that was funny, Charley. This is the greatest day of my life.

CHARLEY: Willy, when are you going to grow up?

WILLY: Yeah, heh? When this game is over, Charley, you'll be laughing out of the other side of your face. They'll be calling him another Red Grange.⁹ Twenty-five thousand a year.

CHARLEY: [Kidding.] Is that so?

WILLY: Yeah, that's so.

CHARLEY: Well, then, I'm sorry, Willy. But tell me something.

WILLY: What?

CHARLEY: Who is Red Grange?

WILLY: Put up your hands. Goddam you, put up your hands! [CHARLEY, chuckling, shakes his head and walks away, around the left corner of the stage. WILLY follows him. The music rises to a mocking frenzy.] Who the hell do you think you are, better than everybody else? You don't know everything, you big, ignorant, stupid . . . Put up your hands!

9. Harold Edward Grange (1903–91), All-American halfback at the University of Illinois from 1923 to 1925; he played professionally for the Chicago Bears.

[Light rises, on the right side of the forestage, on a small table in the reception room of CHARLEY's office. Traffic sounds are heard. BERNARD, now mature, sits whistling to himself. A pair of tennis rackets and an overnight bag are on the floor beside him.]

WILLY: [Offstage.] What are you walking away for? Don't walk away! If you're going to say something say it to my face! I know you laugh at me behind my back. You'll laugh out of the other side of your goddam face after this game. Touch-down! Touchdown! Eighty thousand people! Touchdown! Right between the goal posts.

[BERNARD is a quiet, earnest, but self-assured young man. WILLY's voice is coming from right upstage now. BERNARD lowers his feet off the table and listens. JENNY, his father's secretary, enters.]

JENNY: [Distressed.] Say, Bernard, will you go out in the hall?

BERNARD: What is that noise? Who is it?

JENNY: Mr. Loman. He just got off the elevator.

BERNARD: [Getting up.] Who's he arguing with?

JENNY: Nobody. There's nobody with him. I can't deal with him anymore, and your father gets all upset everytime he comes. I've got a lot of typing to do, and your father's waiting to sign it. Will you see him?

WILLY: [Entering.] Touchdown! Touch—[He sees JENNY.] Jenny, Jenny, good to see you. How're ya? Workin'? Or still honest?

JENNY: Fine. How've you been feeling?

WILLY: Not much anymore, Jenny. Ha, ha! [He is surprised to see the rackets.]

BERNARD: Hello, Uncle Willy.

WILLY: [Almost shocked.] Bernard! Well, look who's here! [He comes quickly, guiltily to BERNARD and warmly shakes his hand.]

BERNARD: How are you? Good to see you.

WILLY: What are you doing here?

BERNARD: Oh, just stopped by to see Pop. Get off my feet till my train leaves. I'm going to Washington in a few minutes.

WILLY: Is he in?

BERNARD: Yes, he's in his office with the accountant. Sit down.

WILLY: [Sitting down.] What're you going to do in Washington?

BERNARD: Oh, just a case I've got there, Willy.

WILLY: That so? [Indicating the rackets.] You going to play tennis there?

BERNARD: I'm staying with a friend who's got a court.

WILLY: Don't say. His own tennis court. Must be fine people, I bet.

BERNARD: They are, very nice. Dad tells me Biff's in town.

WILLY: [With a big smile.] Yeah, Biff's in. Working on a very big deal, Bernard.

BERNARD: What's Biff doing?

WILLY: Well, he's been doing very big things in the West. But he decided to establish himself here. Very big. We're having dinner. Did I hear your wife had a boy?

BERNARD: That's right. Our second.

WILLY: Two boys! What do you know!

BERNARD: What kind of a deal has Biff got?

WILLY: Well, Bill Oliver—very big sporting-goods man—he wants Biff very badly. Called him in from the West. Long distance, carte blanche, special deliveries. Your friends have their own private tennis court?

BERNARD: You still with the old firm, Willy?

WILLY: [After a pause.] I'm—I'm overjoyed to see how you made the grade, Bernard, overjoyed. It's an encouraging thing to see a young man really—really—Looks very good for Biff—very—[He breaks off, then.] Bernard—[He is so full of emotion, he breaks off again.]

BERNARD: What is it, Willy?

WILLY: [Small and alone.] What—what's the secret?

BERNARD: What secret?

WILLY: How—how did you? Why didn't he ever catch on?

BERNARD: I wouldn't know that, Willy.

WILLY: [Confidentially, desperately.] You were his friend, his boyhood friend. There's something I don't understand about it. His life ended after that Ebbets Field game. From the age of seventeen nothing good ever happened to him.

BERNARD: He never trained himself for anything.

WILLY: But he did, he did. After high school he took so many correspondence courses. Radio mechanics; television; God knows what, and never made the slightest mark.

BERNARD: [Taking off his glasses.] Willy, do you want to talk candidly?

WILLY: [Rising, faces BERNARD.] I regard you as a very brilliant man, Bernard. I value your advice.

BERNARD: Oh, the hell with the advice, Willy. I couldn't advise you. There's just one thing I've always wanted to ask you. When he was supposed to graduate, and the math teacher flunked him—

WILLY: Oh, that son-of-a-bitch ruined his life.

BERNARD: Yeah, but, Willy, all he had to do was go to summer school and make up that subject.

WILLY: That's right, that's right.

BERNARD: Did you tell him not to go to summer school?

WILLY: Me? I begged him to go. I ordered him to go!

BERNARD: Then why wouldn't he go?

WILLY: Why? Why! Bernard, that question has been trailing me like a ghost for the last fifteen years. He flunked the subject, and laid down and died like a hammer hit him!

BERNARD: Take it easy, kid.

WILLY: Let me talk to you—I got nobody to talk to. Bernard, Bernard, was it my fault? Y'see? It keeps going around in my mind, maybe I did something to him. I got nothing to give him.

BERNARD: Don't take it so hard.

WILLY: Why did he lay down? What is the story there? You were his friend!

BERNARD: Willy, I remember, it was June, and our grades came out. And he'd flunked math.

WILLY: That son-of-a-bitch!

BERNARD: No, it wasn't right then. Biff just got very angry, I remember, and he was ready to enroll in summer school.

WILLY: [Surprised.] He was?

BERNARD: He wasn't beaten by it at all. But then, Willy, he disappeared from the block for almost a month. And I got the idea that he'd gone up to New England to see you. Did he have a talk with you then? [WILLY stares in silence.] Willy?

WILLY: [With a strong edge of resentment in his voice.] Yeah, he came to Boston. What about it?

BERNARD: Well, just that when he came back—I'll never forget this, it always mystifies me. Because I'd thought so well of Biff, even though he'd always taken advantage of me. I loved him, Willy, y'know? And he came back after that month and took his sneakers—remember those sneakers with "University of Virginia" printed on them? He was so proud of those, wore them every day. And he took them down in the cellar, and burned them up in the furnace. We had a fist fight. It lasted at least half an hour. Just the two of us, punching each other down the cellar, and crying right through it. I've often thought of how strange it was that I knew he'd given up his life. What happened in Boston, Willy? [WILLY looks at him as at an intruder.] I just bring it up because you asked me.

WILLY: [Angrily.] Nothing. What do you mean, "What happened?" What's that got to do with anything?

BERNARD: Well, don't get sore.

WILLY: What are you trying to do, blame it on me? If a boy lays down is that my fault?

BERNARD: Now, Willy, don't get—

WILLY: Well, don't—don't talk to me that way! What does that mean, "What happened?"

[CHARLEY enters. He is in his vest, and he carries a bottle of bourbon.]

CHARLEY: Hey, you're going to miss that train. [He waves the bottle.]

BERNARD: Yeah, I'm going. [He takes the bottle.] Thanks, Pop. [He picks up his rackets and bag.] Good-bye, Willy, and don't worry about it. You know, "If at first you don't succeed . . ."

WILLY: Yes, I believe in that.

BERNARD: But sometimes, Willy, it's better for a man just to walk away.

WILLY: Walk away?

BERNARD: That's right.

WILLY: But if you can't walk away?

BERNARD: [After a slight pause.] I guess that's when it's tough. [Extending his hand.] Good-bye, Willy.

WILLY: [Shaking BERNARD's hand.] Good-bye, boy.

CHARLEY: [An arm on BERNARD's shoulder.] How do you like this kid? Gonna argue a case in front of the Supreme Court.

BERNARD: [Protesting.] Pop!

WILLY: [Genuinely shocked, pained, and happy.] No! The Supreme Court!

BERNARD: I gotta run. 'Bye, Dad!

CHARLEY: Knock 'em dead, Bernard!

[BERNARD goes off.]

WILLY: [As CHARLEY takes out his wallet.] The Supreme Court! And he didn't even mention it!

CHARLEY: [Counting out money on the desk.] He don't have to—he's gonna do it.

WILLY: And you never told him what to do, did you? You never took any interest in him.

CHARLEY: My salvation is that I never took any interest in anything. There's some money—fifty dollars. I got an accountant inside.

WILLY: Charley, look . . . [With difficulty.] I got my insurance to pay. If you can manage it—I need a hundred and ten dollars. [CHARLEY doesn't reply for a moment; merely stops moving.] I'd draw it from my bank but Linda would know, and I . . .

CHARLEY: Sit down, Willy.

WILLY: [Moving toward the chair.] I'm keeping an account of everything, remember. I'll pay every penny back. [He sits.] CHARLEY: Now listen to me, Willy.

WILLY: I want you to know I appreciate . . .

CHARLEY: [Sitting down on the table.] Willy, what're you doin'? What the hell is goin' on in your head?

WILLY: Why? I'm simply . . .

CHARLEY: I offered you a job. You can make fifty dollars a week. And I won't send you on the road.

WILLY: I've got a job.

CHARLEY: Without pay? What kind of job is a job without pay? [He rises.] Now, look kid, enough is enough. I'm no genius but I know when I'm being insulted.

WILLY: Insulted!

CHARLEY: Why don't you want to work for me?

WILLY: What's the matter with you? I've got a job.

CHARLEY: Then what're you walkin' in here every week for?

WILLY: [Getting up.] Well, if you don't want me to walk in here—

CHARLEY: I am offering you a job!

WILLY: I don't want your goddam job!

CHARLEY: When the hell are you going to grow up?

WILLY: [Furiously.] You big ignoramus, if you say that to me again I'll rap you one! I don't care how big you are! [He's ready to fight. Pause.]

CHARLEY: [Kindly, going to him.] How much do you need, Willy?

WILLY: Charley, I'm strapped, I'm strapped. I don't know what to do. I was just fired.

CHARLEY: Howard fired you?

WILLY: That snotnose. Imagine that? I named him. I named him Howard.

CHARLEY: Willy, when're you gonna realize that them things don't mean anything? You named him Howard, but you can't sell that. The only thing you got in this world is what you can sell. And the funny thing is that you're a salesman, and you don't know that.

WILLY: I've always tried to think otherwise, I guess. I always felt that if a man was impressive, and well liked, that nothing—

CHARLEY: Why must everybody like you? Who liked J. P. Morgan?¹ Was he impressive? In a Turkish bath he'd look like a butcher. But with his pockets on he was very well liked. Now listen, Willy, I know you don't like me, and nobody can say I'm in love with you, but I'll give you a job because—just for the hell of it, put it that way. Now what do you say?

WILLY: I—I just can't work for you, Charley.

CHARLEY: What're you, jealous of me?

WILLY: I can't work for you, that's all, don't ask me why.

CHARLEY: [Angered, takes out more bills.] You been jealous of me all your life, you damned fool! Here, pay your insurance. [He puts the money in WILLY's hand.]

WILLY: I'm keeping strict accounts.

CHARLEY: I've got some work to do. Take care of yourself. And pay your insurance.

WILLY: [Moving to the right.] Funny, y'know? After all the highways and the trains, and the appointments, and the years, you end up worth more dead than alive.

CHARLEY: Willy, nobody's worth nothin' dead. [After a slight pause.] Did you hear what I said? [WILLY stands still, dreaming.] Willy!

WILLY: Apologize to Bernard for me when you see him. I didn't mean to argue with him. He's a fine boy. They're all fine boys, and they'll end up big—all of them. Someday they'll all play tennis together. Wish me luck, Charley. He saw Bill Oliver today.

CHARLEY: Good luck.

WILLY: [On the verge of tears.] Charley, you're the only friend I got. Isn't that a remarkable thing? [He goes out.]

CHARLEY: Jesus!

[CHARLEY stares after him a moment and follows. All light blacks out. Suddenly raucous music is heard, and a red glow rises behind the screen at right. STANLEY, a young waiter, appears, carrying a table, followed by HAPPY, who is carrying two chairs.]

STANLEY: [Putting the table down.] That's all right, Mr. Loman, I can handle it myself. [He turns and takes the chairs from HAPPY and places them at the table.]

HAPPY: [Glancing around.] Oh, this is better.

STANLEY: Sure, in the front there you're in the middle of all kinds a noise. Whenever you got a party, Mr. Loman, you just tell me and I'll put you back here. Y'know, there's a lotta people they don't like it private, because when they go out they like to see a lotta action around them because they're sick and tired to stay in the house by theirself. But I know you, you ain't from Hackensack.² You know what I mean?

HAPPY: [Sitting down.] So how's it coming, Stanley?

STANLEY: Ah, it's a dog life. I only wish during the war they'd a took me in the Army. I couda been dead by now.

HAPPY: My brother's back, Stanley.

STANLEY: Oh, he come back, heh? From the Far West.

HAPPY: Yeah, big cattle man, my brother, so treat him right. And my father's coming too.

2. Mainly working-class city in northern New Jersey.

STANLEY: Oh, your father too!

HAPPY: You got a couple of nice lobsters?

STANLEY: Hundred per cent, big.

HAPPY: I want them with the claws.

STANLEY: Don't worry, I don't give you no mice. [HAPPY laughs.] How about some wine? It'll put a head on the meal.

HAPPY: No. You remember, Stanley, that recipe I brought you from overseas? With the champagne in it?

STANLEY: Oh, yeah, sure. I still got it tacked up yet in the kitchen. But that'll have to cost a buck apiece anyways.

HAPPY: That's all right.

STANLEY: What'd you, hit a number or somethin'?

HAPPY: No, it's a little celebration. My brother is—I think he pulled off a big deal today. I think we're going into business together.

STANLEY: Great! That's the best for you. Because a family business, you know what I mean?—that's the best.

HAPPY: That's what I think.

STANLEY: 'Cause what's the difference? Somebody steals? It's in the family. Know what I mean? [Sotto voce.³] Like this bartender here. The boss is goin' crazy what kinda leak he's got in the cash register. You put it in but it don't come out.

HAPPY: [Raising his head.] Sh!

STANLEY: What?

HAPPY: You notice I wasn't lookin' right or left, was I?

STANLEY: No.

HAPPY: And my eyes are closed.

STANLEY: So what's the—?

HAPPY: Strudel's comin'.

STANLEY: [Catching on, looks around.] Ah, no, there's no—[He breaks off as a furred, lavishly dressed GIRL enters and sits at the next table. Both follow her with their eyes.] Geez, how'd ya know?

HAPPY: I got radar or something. [Staring directly at her profile.] Ooooooooo . . . Stanley.

STANLEY: I think, that's for you, Mr. Loman.

HAPPY: Look at that mouth. Oh, God. And the binoculars.

STANLEY: Geez, you got a life, Mr. Loman.

HAPPY: Wait on her.

STANLEY: [Going to the GIRL's table.] Would you like a menu, ma'am?

GIRL: I'm expecting someone, but I'd like a—

HAPPY: Why don't you bring her—excuse me, miss, do you mind? I sell champagne, and I'd like you to try my brand. Bring her a champagne, Stanley.

GIRL: That's awfully nice of you.

HAPPY: Don't mention it. It's all company money. [He laughs.]

GIRL: That's a charming product to be selling, isn't it?

HAPPY: Oh, gets to be like everything else. Selling is selling, y'know.

GIRL: I suppose.

HAPPY: You don't happen to sell, do you?

3. In an undertone (Italian).

GIRL: No, I don't sell.

HAPPY: Would you object to a compliment from a stranger? You ought to be on a magazine cover.

GIRL: [Looking at him a little archly.] I have been.

[STANLEY comes in with a glass of champagne.]

HAPPY: What'd I say before, Stanley? You see? She's a cover girl.

STANLEY: Oh, I could see, I could see.

HAPPY: [To the GIRL.] What magazine?

GIRL: Oh, a lot of them. [She takes the drink.] Thank you.

HAPPY: You know what they say in France, don't you? "Champagne is the drink of the complexion"—Hya, Biff!

[BIFF has entered and sits with HAPPY.]

BIFF: Hello, kid. Sorry I'm late.

HAPPY: I just got here. Uh, Miss—?

GIRL: Forsythe.

HAPPY: Miss Forsythe, this is my brother.

BIFF: Is Dad here?

HAPPY: His name is Biff. You might've heard of him. Great football player.

GIRL: Really? What team?

HAPPY: Are you familiar with football?

GIRL: No, I'm afraid I'm not.

HAPPY: Biff is quarterback with the New York Giants.

GIRL: Well, that's nice, isn't it? [She drinks.]

HAPPY: Good health.

GIRL: I'm happy to meet you.

HAPPY: That's my name, Hap. It's really Harold, but at West Point they called me Happy.

GIRL: [Now really impressed.] Oh, I see. How do you do? [She turns her profile.]

BIFF: Isn't Dad coming?

HAPPY: You want her?

BIFF: Oh, I could never make that.

HAPPY: I remember the time that idea would never come into your head. Where's the old confidence, Biff?

BIFF: I just saw Oliver—

HAPPY: Wait a minute. I've got to see that old confidence again. Do you want her? She's on call.

BIFF: Oh, no. [He turns to look at the GIRL.]

HAPPY: I'm telling you. Watch this. [Turning to see the GIRL.] Honey? [She turns to him.] Are you busy?

GIRL: Well, I am . . . but I could make a phone call.

HAPPY: Do that, will you, honey? And see if you can get a friend. We'll be here for a while. Biff is one of the greatest football players in the country.

GIRL: [Standing up.] Well, I'm certainly happy to meet you.

HAPPY: Come back soon.

GIRL: I'll try.

HAPPY: Don't try, honey, try hard. [The GIRL exits. STANLEY follows, shaking his head in bewildered admiration.] Isn't that a shame now? A beautiful girl like that? That's why I can't get married. There's not a good woman in a thousand. New York is loaded with them, kid!

BIFF: Hap, look—

HAPPY: I told you she was on call!⁴

BIFF: [Strangely unnerved.] Cut it out, will ya? I want to say something to you.

HAPPY: Did you see Oliver?

BIFF: I saw him all right. Now look, I want to tell Dad a couple of things and I want you to help me.

HAPPY: What? Is he going to back you?

BIFF: Are you crazy? You're out of your goddam head, you know that?

HAPPY: Why? What happened?

BIFF: [Breathlessly.] I did a terrible thing today, Hap. It's been the strangest day I ever went through. I'm all numb, I swear.

HAPPY: You mean he wouldn't see you?

BIFF: Well, I waited six hours for him, see? All day. Kept sending my name in. Even tried to date his secretary so she'd get me to him, but no soap.

HAPPY: Because you're not showin' the old confidence, Biff. He remembered you, didn't he?

BIFF: [Stopping HAPPY with a gesture.] Finally, about five o'clock, he comes out. Didn't remember who I was or anything. I felt like such an idiot, Hap.

HAPPY: Did you tell him my Florida idea?

BIFF: He walked away. I saw him for one minute. I got so mad I could've torn the walls down! How the hell did I ever get the idea I was a salesman there? I even believed myself that I'd been a salesman for him! And then he gave me one look and—I realized what a ridiculous lie my whole life has been! We've been talking in a dream for fifteen years. I was a shipping clerk.

HAPPY: What'd you do?

BIFF: [With great tension and wonder.] Well, he left, see. And the secretary went out. I was all alone in the waiting-room. I don't know what came over me, Hap. The next thing I know I'm in his office—paneled walls, everything. I can't explain it. I—Hap, I took his fountain pen.

HAPPY: Geez, did he catch you?

BIFF: I ran out. I ran down all eleven flights. I ran and ran and ran.

HAPPY: That was an awful dumb—what'd you do that for?

BIFF: [Agonized.] I don't know, I just—wanted to take something, I don't know. You gotta help me, Hap, I'm gonna tell Pop.

HAPPY: You crazy? What for?

BIFF: Hap, he's got to understand that I'm not the man somebody lends that kind of money to. He thinks I've been spiting him all these years and it's eating him up.

HAPPY: That's just it. You tell him something nice.

BIFF: I can't.

HAPPY: Say you got a lunch date with Oliver tomorrow.

BIFF: So what do I do tomorrow?

HAPPY: You leave the house tomorrow and come back at night and say Oliver is thinking it over. And he thinks it over for a couple of weeks, and gradually it fades away and nobody's the worse.

4. That is, a call girl, a prostitute.

BIFF: But it'll go on forever!

HAPPY: Dad is never so happy as when he's looking forward to something! [WILLY enters.] Hello, scout!

WILLY: Gee, I haven't been here in years!

[STANLEY has followed WILLY in and sets a chair for him. STANLEY starts off but HAPPY stops him.]

HAPPY: Stanley!

[STANLEY stands by, waiting for an order.]

BIFF: [Going to WILLY with guilt, as to an invalid.] Sit down, Pop. You want a drink?

WILLY: Sure, I don't mind.

BIFF: Let's get a load on.

WILLY: You look worried.

BIFF: N-no. [To STANLEY.] Scotch all around. Make it doubles.

STANLEY: Doubles, right. [He goes.]

WILLY: You had a couple already, didn't you?

BIFF: Just a couple, yeah.

WILLY: Well, what happened, boy? [Nodding affirmatively, with a smile.] Everything go all right?

BIFF: [Takes a breath, then reaches out and grasps WILLY's hand.] Pal . . . [He is smiling bravely, and WILLY is smiling too.] I had an experience today.

HAPPY: Terrific, Pop.

WILLY: That so? What happened?

BIFF: [High, slightly alcoholic, above the earth.] I'm going to tell you everything from first to last. It's been a strange day. [Silence. He looks around, composes himself as best he can, but his breath keeps breaking the rhythm of his voice.] I had to wait quite a while for him, and—

WILLY: Oliver?

BIFF: Yeah, Oliver. All day, as a matter of cold fact. And a lot of—instances—facts, Pop, facts about my life came back to me. Who was it, Pop? Who ever said I was a salesman with Oliver?

WILLY: Well, you were.

BIFF: No, Dad, I was shipping clerk.

WILLY: But you were practically—

BIFF: [With determination.] Dad, I don't know who said it first, but I was never a salesman for Bill Oliver.

WILLY: What're you talking about?

BIFF: Let's hold on to the facts tonight, Pop. We're not going to get anywhere bullin' around. I was a shipping clerk.

WILLY: [Angrily.] All right, now listen to me—

BIFF: Why don't you let me finish?

WILLY: I'm not interested in stories about the past or any crap of that kind because the woods are burning, boys, you understand? There's a big blaze going on all around. I was fired today.

BIFF: [Shocked.] How could you be?

WILLY: I was fired, and I'm looking for a little good news to tell your mother, because the woman has waited and the woman has suffered. The gist of it is that I haven't got a story left in my head, Biff. So don't give me a lecture about facts and aspects. I am not interested. Now what've you got to say to me? [STANLEY enters with three drinks. They wait until he leaves.] Did you see Oliver?

BIFF: Jesus, Dad!

WILLY: You mean you didn't go up there?

HAPPY: Sure he went up there.

BIFF: I did. I—saw him. How could they fire you?

WILLY: [On the edge of his chair.] What kind of a welcome did he give you?

BIFF: He won't even let you work on commission?

WILLY: I'm out. [Driving.] So tell me, he gave you a warm welcome?

HAPPY: Sure, Pop, sure!

BIFF: [Driven.] Well, it was kind of—

WILLY: I was wondering if he'd remember you. [To HAPPY.] Imagine, man doesn't see him for ten, twelve years and gives him that kind of a welcome!

HAPPY: Damn right!

BIFF: [Trying to return to the offensive.] Pop, look—

WILLY: You know why he remembered you, don't you? Because you impressed him in those days.

BIFF: Let's talk quietly and get this down to the facts, huh?

WILLY: [As though BIFF had been interrupting.] Well, what happened? It's great news, Biff. Did he take you into his office or'd you talk in the waiting-room?

BIFF: Well, he came in, see and—WILLY: [With a big smile.] What'd he say? Betcha he threw his arm around you.

BIFF: Well, he kinda—

WILLY: He's a fine man. [To HAPPY.] Very hard man to see, y'know.

HAPPY: [Agreeing.] Oh, I know.

WILLY: [To BIFF.] Is that where you had the drinks?

BIFF: Yeah, he gave me a couple of—no, no!

HAPPY: [Cutting in.] He told him my Florida idea.

WILLY: Don't interrupt. [To BIFF.] How'd he react to the Florida idea?

BIFF: Dad, will you give me a minute to explain?

WILLY: I've been waiting for you to explain since I sat down here! What happened? He took you into his office and what?

BIFF: Well—I talked. And—he listened, see.

WILLY: Famous for the way he listens, y'know. What was his answer?

BIFF: His answer was—[He breaks off, suddenly angry.] Dad, you're not letting me tell you what I want to tell you!

WILLY: [Accusing, angered.] You didn't see him, did you?

BIFF: I did see him!

WILLY: What'd you insult him or something? You insulted him, didn't you?

BIFF: Listen, will you let me out of it, will you just let me out of it!

HAPPY: What the hell!

WILLY: Tell me what happened!

BIFF: [To HAPPY.] I can't talk to him!

[A single trumpet note jars the ear. The light of green leaves stains the house, which holds the air of night and a dream. YOUNG BERNARD enters and knocks on the door of the house.]

YOUNG BERNARD: [Frantically.] Mrs. Loman, Mrs. Loman!

HAPPY: Tell him what happened!

BIFF: [To HAPPY.] Shut up and leave me alone!

WILLY: No, no. You had to go and flunk math!

BIFF: What math? What're you talking about?

YOUNG BERNARD: Mrs. Loman, Mrs. Loman!

[LINDA appears in the house, as of old.]

WILLY: [Wildly.] Math, math, math!

BIFF: Take it easy, Pop!

YOUNG BERNARD: Mrs. Loman!

WILLY: [Furiously.] If you hadn't flunked you'd've been set by now!

BIFF: Now, look, I'm gonna tell you what happened, and you're going to listen to me.

YOUNG BERNARD: Mrs. Loman!

BIFF: I waited six hours—

HAPPY: What the hell are you saying?

BIFF: I kept sending in my name but he wouldn't see me. So finally he . . . [He continues unheard as light fades low on the restaurant.]

YOUNG BERNARD: Biff flunked math!

LINDA: No!

YOUNG BERNARD: Birnbaum flunked him! They won't graduate him!

LINDA: But they have to. He's gotta go to the university. Where is he? Biff! Biff!

YOUNG BERNARD: No, he left. He went to Grand Central.⁵

LINDA: Grand—You mean he went to Boston!

YOUNG BERNARD: Is Uncle Willy in Boston?

LINDA: Oh, maybe Willy can talk to the teacher. Oh, the poor, poor boy!

[Light on house area snaps out.]

BIFF: [At the table, now audible, holding up a gold fountain pen.] . . . so I'm washed up with Oliver, you understand? Are you listening to me?

WILLY: [At a loss.] Yeah, sure. If you hadn't flunked—

BIFF: Flunked what? What're you talking about?

WILLY: Don't blame everything on me! I didn't flunk math—you did! What pen?

HAPPY: That was awful dumb, Biff, a pen like that is worth—

WILLY: [Seeing the pen for the first time.] You took Oliver's pen?

BIFF: [Weakening.] Dad, I just explained it to you.

WILLY: You stole Bill Oliver's fountain pen!

BIFF: I didn't exactly steal it! That's just what I've been explaining to you!

HAPPY: He had it in his hand and just then Oliver walked in, so he got nervous and stuck it in his pocket!

WILLY: My God, Biff!

BIFF: I never intended to do it, Dad!

OPERATOR'S VOICE: Standish Arms, good evening!

WILLY: [Shouting.] I'm not in my room!

BIFF: [Frightened.] Dad, what's the matter? [He and HAPPY stand up.]

5. Grand Central Terminal, New York City's principal railway and subway station.

OPERATOR: Ringing Mr. Loman for you!

BIFF: [Horrified, gets down on one knee before WILLY.] Dad, I'll make good, I'll make good. [WILLY tries to get to his feet. BIFF holds him down.] Sit down now.

WILLY: No, you're no good, you're no good for anything.

BIFF: I am, Dad, I'll find something else, you understand? Now don't worry about anything. [He holds up WILLY's face.] Talk to me, Dad.

OPERATOR: Mr. Loman does not answer. Shall I page him?

WILLY: [Attempting to stand, as though to rush and silence the OPERATOR.] No, no, no!

HAPPY: He'll strike something, Pop.

WILLY: No, no . . .

BIFF: [Desperately, standing over WILLY.] Pop, listen! Listen to me! I'm telling you something good. Oliver talked to his partner about the Florida idea. You listening? He—he talked to his partner, and he came to me . . . I'm going to be all right, you hear? Dad, listen to me, he said it was just a question of the amount!

WILLY: Then you . . . got it?

HAPPY: He's gonna be terrific, Pop!

WILLY: [Trying to stand.] Then you got it, haven't you? You got it! You got it!

BIFF: [Agonized, holds WILLY down.] No, no. Look, Pop. I'm supposed to have lunch with them tomorrow. I'm just telling you this so you'll know that I can still make an impression, Pop. And I'll make good somewhere, but I can't go tomorrow, see?

WILLY: Why not? You simply—

BIFF: But the pen, Pop!

WILLY: You give it to him and tell him it was an oversight!

HAPPY: Sure, have lunch tomorrow!

BIFF: I can't say that—

WILLY: You were doing a crossword puzzle and accidentally used his pen!

BIFF: Listen, kid, I took those balls years ago, now I walk in with his fountain pen? That clinches it, don't you see? I can't face him like that! I'll try elsewhere.

PAGE'S VOICE: Paging Mr. Loman!

WILLY: Don't you want to be anything?

BIFF: Pop, how can I go back?

WILLY: You don't want to be anything, is that what's behind it?

BIFF: [Now angry at WILLY for not crediting his sympathy.] Don't take it that way! You think it was easy walking into that office after what I'd done to him? A team of horses couldn't have dragged me back to Bill Oliver!

WILLY: Then why'd you go?

BIFF: Why did I go? Why did I go! Look at you! Look at what's become of you!

[Off left, THE WOMAN laughs.]

WILLY: Biff, you're going to go to that lunch tomorrow, or—

BIFF: I can't go. I've got an appointment!

HAPPY: Biff, for . . . !

WILLY: Are you spiting me?

BIFF: Don't take it that way! Goddammit!

WILLY: [Strikes BIFF and falters away from the table.] You rotten little louse! Are you spiting me?

THE WOMAN: Someone's at the door, Willy!

BIFF: I'm no good, can't you see what I am?

HAPPY: [Separating them.] Hey, you're in a restaurant! Now cut it out, both of you! [The GIRLS enter.] Hello, girls, sit down.

[THE WOMAN laughs, off left.]

MISS FORSYTHE: I guess we might as well. This is Letta.

THE WOMAN: Willy, are you going to wake up?

BIFF: [Ignoring WILLY.] How're ya, miss, sit down. What do you drink?

MISS FORSYTHE: Letta might not be able to stay long.

LETTA: I gotta get up early tomorrow. I got jury duty. I'm so excited! Were you fellows ever on a jury?

BIFF: No, but I been in front of them! [The GIRLS laugh.] This is my father.

LETTA: Isn't he cute? Sit down with us, Pop.

HAPPY: Sit him down, Biff!

BIFF: [Going to him.] Come on, slugger, drink us under the table. To hell with it! Come on, sit down, pal.

[On BIFF's last insistence, WILLY is about to sit.]

THE WOMAN: [Now urgently.] Willy, are you going to answer the door!

[THE WOMAN's call pulls WILLY back. He starts right, befuddled.]

BIFF: Hey, where are you going?

WILLY: Open the door.

BIFF: The door?

WILLY: The washroom . . . the door . . . where's the door?

BIFF: [Leading WILLY to the left.] Just go straight down.

[WILLY moves left.]

THE WOMAN: Willy, Willy, are you going to get up, get up, get up, get up?

[WILLY exits left.]

LETTA: I think it's sweet you bring your daddy along.

MISS FORSYTHE: Oh, he isn't really your father!

BIFF: [At left, turning to her resentfully.] Miss Forsythe, you've just seen a prince walk by. A fine, troubled prince. A hardworking, unappreciated prince. A pal, you understand? A good companion. Always for his boys.

LETTA: That's so sweet.

HAPPY: Well, girls, what's the program? We're wasting time. Come on, Biff. Gather round. Where would you like to go?

BIFF: Why don't you do something for him?

HAPPY: Me!

BIFF: Don't you give a damn for him, Hap?

HAPPY: What're you talking about? I'm the one who—

BIFF: I sense it, you don't give a good goddam about him. [He takes the rolled-up hose from his pocket and puts it on the table in front of HAPPY.] Look what I found in the cellar, for Christ's sake. How can you bear to let it go on?

HAPPY: Me? Who goes away? Who runs off and—BIFF: Yeah, but he doesn't mean anything to you. You could help him—I can't! Don't you understand what I'm talking about? He's going to kill himself, don't you know that?

HAPPY: Don't I know it! Me!

BIFF: Hap, help him! Jesus . . . help him . . . Help me, help me, I can't bear to look at his face! [Ready to weep, he hurries out, up right.]

HAPPY: [Starting after him.] Where are you going?

MISS FORSYTHE: What's he so mad about?

HAPPY: Come on, girls, we'll catch up with him.

MISS FORSYTHE: [As HAPPY pushes her out.] Say, I don't like that temper of his!

HAPPY: He's just a little overstrung, he'll be all right!

WILLY: [Off left, as THE WOMAN laughs.] Don't answer! Don't answer!

LETTA: Don't you want to tell your father—

HAPPY: No, that's not my father. He's just a guy. Come on, we'll catch Biff, and, honey, we're going to paint this town! Stanley, where's the check! Hey, Stanley!

[They exit. STANLEY looks toward left.]

STANLEY: [Calling to HAPPY indignantly.] Mr. Loman! Mr. Loman!

[STANLEY picks up a chair and follows them off. Knocking is heard off left. THE WOMAN enters, laughing. WILLY follows her. She is in a black slip; he is buttoning his shirt. Raw, sensuous music accompanies their speech.]

WILLY: Will you stop laughing? Will you stop?

THE WOMAN: Aren't you going to answer the door? He'll wake the whole hotel.

WILLY: I'm not expecting anybody.

THE WOMAN: Why'n't you have another drink, honey, and stop being so damn self-centered?

WILLY: I'm so lonely.

THE WOMAN: You know you ruined me, Willy? From now on, whenever you come to the office, I'll see that you go right through to the buyers. No waiting at my desk anymore, Willy. You ruined me.

WILLY: That's nice of you to say that.

THE WOMAN: Gee, you are self-centered! Why so sad? You are the saddest, self-centeredest soul I ever did see-saw. [She laughs. He kisses her.] Come on inside, drummer boy. It's silly to be dressing in the middle of the night. [As knocking is heard.] Aren't you going to answer the door?

WILLY: They're knocking on the wrong door.

THE WOMAN: But I felt the knocking. And he heard us talking in here. Maybe the hotel's on fire!

WILLY: [His terror rising.] It's a mistake.

THE WOMAN: Then tell them to go away!

WILLY: There's nobody there.

THE WOMAN: It's getting on my nerves, Willy. There's somebody standing out there and it's getting on my nerves!

WILLY: [Pushing her away from him.] All right, stay in the bathroom here, and don't come out. I think there's a law in Massachusetts about it, so don't come out. It may be that new room clerk. He looked very mean. So don't come out. It's a mistake, there's no fire.

[The knocking is heard again. He takes a few steps away from her, and she vanishes into the wing. The light follows him, and now he is facing YOUNG BIFF, who carries a suitcase. BIFF steps toward him. The music is gone.]

BIFF: Why didn't you answer?

WILLY: Biff! What are you doing in Boston?

BIFF: Why didn't you answer? I've been knocking for five minutes, I called you on the phone—WILLY: I just heard you. I was in the bathroom and had the door shut. Did anything happen home?

BIFF: Dad—I let you down.

WILLY: What do you mean?

BIFF: Dad . . .

WILLY: Biffo, what's this about? [Putting his arm around BIFF.] Come on, let's go downstairs and get you a malted.

BIFF: Dad, I flunked math.

WILLY: Not for the term?

BIFF: The term. I haven't got enough credits to graduate.

WILLY: You mean to say Bernard wouldn't give you the answers?

BIFF: He did, he tried, but I only got a sixty-one.

WILLY: And they wouldn't give you four points?

BIFF: Birnbaum refused absolutely. I begged him, Pop, but he won't give me those points. You gotta talk to him before they close the school. Because if he saw the kind of man you are, and you just talked to him in your way, I'm sure he'd come through for me. The class came right before practice, see, and I didn't go enough. Would you talk to him? He'd like you, Pop. You know the way you could talk.

WILLY: You're on. We'll drive right back.

BIFF: Oh, Dad, good work! I'm sure he'll change for you!

WILLY: Go downstairs and tell the clerk I'm checkin' out. Go right down.

BIFF: Yes, sir! See, the reason he hates me, Pop—one day he was late for class so I got up at the blackboard and imitated him. I crossed my eyes and talked with a lithp.

WILLY: [Laughing.] You did? The kids like it?

BIFF: They nearly died laughing!

WILLY: Yeah? What'd you do?

BIFF: The thquare root of thixthy twee is . . . [WILLY bursts out laughing; BIFF joins him.] And in the middle of it he walked in!

[WILLY laughs and THE WOMAN joins in offstage.]

WILLY: [Without hesitation.] Hurry downstairs and—

BIFF: Somebody in there?

WILLY: No, that was next door.

[THE WOMAN laughs offstage.]

BIFF: Somebody got in your bathroom!

WILLY: No, it's the next room, there's a party—

THE WOMAN: [Enters laughing. She lisps this.] Can I come in? There's something in the bathtub, Willy, and it's moving!

[WILLY looks at BIFF, who is staring open-mouthed and horrified at THE WOMAN.]

WILLY: Ah—you better go back to your room. They must be finished painting by now. They're painting her room so I let her take a shower here. Go back, go back . . . [He pushes her.]

THE WOMAN: [Resisting.] But I've got to get dressed, Willy, I can't—

WILLY: Get out of here! Go back, go back . . . [Suddenly striving for the ordinary.]

This is Miss Francis, Biff, she's a buyer. They're painting her room. Go back, Miss Francis, go back . . .

THE WOMAN: But my clothes, I can't go out naked in the hall!

WILLY: [Pushing her offstage.] Get outa here! Go back, go back!

[BIFF slowly sits down on his suitcase as the argument continues offstage.]

THE WOMAN: Where's my stockings? You promised me stockings, Willy!

WILLY: I have no stockings here!

THE WOMAN: You had two boxes of size nine sheers for me, and I want them!

WILLY: Here, for God's sake, will you get outa here!

THE WOMAN: [Enters holding a box of stockings.] I just hope there's nobody in the hall. That's all I hope. [To BIFF.] Are you football or baseball?

BIFF: Football.

THE WOMAN: [Angry, humiliated.] That's me too. G'night. [She snatches her clothes from WILLY, and walks out.]

WILLY: [After a pause.] Well, better get going. I want to get to the school first thing in the morning. Get my suits out of the closet. I'll get my valise. [BIFF doesn't move.] What's the matter? [BIFF remains motionless, tears falling.] She's a buyer. Buys for J. H. Simmons. She lives down the hall—they're painting. You don't imagine—[He breaks off. After a pause.] Now listen, pal, she's just a buyer. She sees merchandise in her room and they have to keep it looking just so . . . [Pause. Assuming command.] All right, get my suits. [BIFF doesn't move.] Now stop crying and do as I say. I gave you an order. Biff, I gave you an order! Is that what you do when I give you an order? How dare you cry! [Putting his arm around BIFF.] Now look, Biff, when you grow up you'll understand about these things. You mustn't—you mustn't overemphasize a thing like this. I'll see Birnbaum first thing in the morning.

BIFF: Never mind.

WILLY: [Getting down beside BIFF.] Never mind! He's going to give you those points. I'll see to it.

BIFF: He wouldn't listen to you.

WILLY: He certainly will listen to me. You need those points for the U. of Virginia.

BIFF: I'm not going there.

WILLY: Heh? If I can't get him to change that mark you'll make it up in summer school. You've got all summer to—BIFF: [His weeping breaking from him.] Dad . . .

WILLY: [Infected by it.] Oh, my boy . . .

BIFF: Dad . . .

WILLY: She's nothing to me, Biff. I was lonely, I was terribly lonely.

BIFF: You—you gave her Mama's stockings! [His tears break through and he rises to go.]

WILLY: [Grabbing for BIFF.] I gave you an order!

BIFF: Don't touch me, you—liar!

WILLY: Apologize for that!

BIFF: You fake! You phony little fake! You fake!

[Overcome, he turns quickly and weeping fully goes out with his suitcase. WILLY is left on the floor on his knees.]

WILLY: I gave you an order! Biff, come back here or I'll beat you! Come back here! I'll whip you! [STANLEY comes quickly in from the right and stands in front of WILLY. WILLY shouts at STANLEY.] I gave you an order . . .

STANLEY: Hey, let's pick it up, pick it up, Mr. Loman. [He helps WILLY to his feet.] Your boys left with the chippies.⁶ They said they'll see you home.

[A SECOND WAITER watches some distance away.]

WILLY: But we were supposed to have dinner together.

[Music is heard, WILLY's theme.]

STANLEY: Can you make it?

WILLY: I'll—sure, I can make it. [Suddenly concerned about his clothes.] Do I—I look all right?

STANLEY: Sure, you look all right. [He flicks a speck off WILLY's lapel.]

WILLY: Here—here's a dollar.

STANLEY: Oh, your son paid me. It's all right.

WILLY: [Putting it in STANLEY's hand.] No, take it. You're a good boy.

STANLEY: Oh, no, you don't have to . . .

WILLY: Here—here's some more, I don't need it anymore. [After a slight pause.]

Tell me—is there a seed store in the neighborhood?

STANLEY: Seeds? You mean like to plant?

[As WILLY turns, STANLEY slips the money back into his jacket pocket.]

WILLY: Yes. Carrots, peas . . .

STANLEY: Well, there's hardware stores on Sixth Avenue, but it may be too late now.

WILLY: [Anxiously.] Oh, I'd better hurry. I've got to get some seeds. [He starts off to the right.] I've got to get some seeds, right away. Nothing's planted. I don't have a thing in the ground.

[WILLY hurries out as the light goes down. STANLEY moves over to the right after him, watches him off. The other WAITER has been staring at WILLY.]

STANLEY: [To the WAITER.] Well, whatta you looking at?

[The WAITER picks up the chairs and moves off right. STANLEY takes the table and follows him. The light fades on this area. There is a long pause, the sound of the flute coming over. The light gradually rises on the kitchen, which is empty. HAPPY appears at the door of the house, followed by BIFF. HAPPY is carrying a large bunch of long-stemmed roses. He enters the kitchen, looks around for LINDA. Not seeing her, he turns to BIFF, who is just outside the house door, and makes a gesture with his hands, indicating "Not here, I guess." He looks into the living-room and freezes. Inside, LINDA, unseen, is seated, WILLY's coat on her lap. She rises ominously and quietly and moves toward HAPPY, who backs up into the kitchen, afraid.]

HAPPY: Hey, what're you doing up? [LINDA says nothing but moves toward him implacably.] Where's Pop? [He keeps backing to the right, and now LINDA is in full view in the doorway to the living-room.] Is he sleeping?

LINDA: Where were you?

HAPPY: [Trying to laugh it off.] We met two girls, Mom, very fine types. Here, we brought you some flowers. [Offering them to her.] Put them in your room, Ma. [She knocks them to the floor at BIFF's feet. He has now come inside and closed the door behind him. She stares at BIFF, silent.] Now what'd you do that for? Mom, I want you to have some flowers—

LINDA: [Cutting HAPPY off, violently to BIFF.] Don't you care whether he lives or dies?

HAPPY: [Going to the stairs.] Come upstairs, Biff.

BIFF: [With a flare of disgust, to HAPPY.] Go away from me! [To LINDA.] What do you mean, lives or dies? Nobody's dying around here, pal.

LINDA: Get out of my sight! Get out of here!

BIFF: I wanna see the boss.

LINDA: You're not going near him!

BIFF: Where is he? [He moves into the living-room and LINDA follows.]

LINDA: [Shouting after BIFF.] You invite him for dinner. He looks forward to it all day—[BIFF appears in his parents' bedroom, looks around and exits.]—and then you desert him there. There's no stranger you'd do that to!

HAPPY: Why? He had a swell time with us. Listen, when I—[LINDA comes back into the kitchen.]—desert him I hope I don't outlive the day!

LINDA: Get out of here!

HAPPY: Now look, Mom . . .

LINDA: Did you have to go to women tonight? You and your lousy rotten whores!

[BIFF re-enters the kitchen.]

HAPPY: Mom, all we did was follow Biff around trying to cheer him up! [To BIFF.] Boy, what a night you gave me!

LINDA: Get out of here, both of you, and don't come back! I don't want you tormenting him anymore. Go on now, get your things together! [To BIFF.] You can sleep in his apartment. [She starts to pick up the flowers and stops herself.] Pick up this stuff, I'm not your maid anymore. Pick it up, you bum, you! [HAPPY turns his back to her in refusal. BIFF slowly moves over and gets down on his knees, picking up the flowers.] You're a pair of animals! Not one, not another living soul would have had the cruelty to walk out on that man in a restaurant!

BIFF: [Not looking at her.] Is that what he said?

LINDA: He didn't have to say anything. He was so humiliated he nearly limped when he came in.

HAPPY: But, Mom, he had a great time with us—

BIFF: [Cutting him off violently.] Shut up!

[Without another word, HAPPY goes upstairs.]

LINDA: You! You didn't even go in to see if he was all right!

BIFF: [Still on the floor in front of LINDA, the flowers in his hand; with self-loathing.]

No. Didn't. Didn't do a damned thing. How do you like that, heh? Left him babbling in a toilet.

LINDA: You louse. You . . .

BIFF: Now you hit it on the nose! [He gets up, throws the flowers in the wastebasket.] The scum of the earth, and you're looking at him!

LINDA: Get out of here!

BIFF: I gotta talk to the boss, Mom. Where is he?

LINDA: You're not going near him. Get out of this house!

BIFF: [With absolute assurance, determination.] No. We're gonna have an abrupt conversation, him and me.

LINDA: You're not talking to him! [Hammering is heard from outside the house, off right. BIFF turns toward the noise. Suddenly pleading.] Will you please leave him alone?

BIFF: What's he doing out there?

LINDA: He's planting the garden!

BIFF: [Quietly.] Now? Oh, my God!

[BIFF moves outside, LINDA following. The light dies down on them and comes up on the center of the apron as WILLY walks into it. He is carrying a flashlight, a hoe, and a handful of seed packets. He raps the top of the hoe sharply to fix it firmly, and then moves to the left, measuring off the distance with his foot. He holds the flashlight to look at the seed packets, reading off the instructions. He is in the blue of night.]

WILLY: Carrots . . . quarter-inch apart. Rows . . . one-foot rows. [He measures it off.] One foot. [He puts down a package and measures off.] Beets. [He puts down another package and measures again.] Lettuce. [He reads the package, puts it down.] One foot—[He breaks off as BEN appears at the right and moves slowly down to him.] What a proposition, ts, ts. Terrific, terrific. 'Cause she's suffered, Ben, the woman has suffered. You understand me? A man can't go out the way he came in, Ben, a man has got to add up to something. You can't, you can't—[BEN moves toward him as though to interrupt.] You gotta consider, now. Don't answer so quick. Remember, it's a guaranteed twenty-thousand-dollar proposition. Now look, Ben, I want you to go through the ins and outs of this thing with me. I've got nobody to talk to, Ben, and the woman has suffered, you hear me?

BEN: [Standing still, considering.] What's the proposition?

WILLY: It's twenty thousand dollars on the barrelhead. Guaranteed, gilt-edged, you understand?

BEN: You don't want to make a fool of yourself. They might not honor the policy.

WILLY: How can they dare refuse? Didn't I work like a coolie to meet every premium on the nose? And now they don't pay off! Impossible!

BEN: It's called a cowardly thing, William.

WILLY: Why? Does it take more guts to stand here the rest of my life ringing up a zero?

BEN: [Yielding.] That's a point, William. [He moves, thinking, turns.] And twenty thousand—that is something one can feel with the hand, it is there.

WILLY: [Now assured, with rising power.] Oh, Ben, that's the whole beauty of it! I see it like a diamond, shining in the dark, hard and rough, that I can pick up and touch in my hand. Not like—like an appointment! This would not be another damned-fool appointment, Ben, and it changes all the aspects. Because he thinks I'm nothing, see, and so he spites me. But the funeral— [Straightening up.] Ben, that funeral will be massive! They'll come from Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire! All the old-timers with the strange license plates—that boy will be thunder-struck, Ben, because he never realized—I am known! Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey—I am known, Ben, and he'll see it with his eyes once and for all. He'll see what I am, Ben! He's in for a shock, that boy!

BEN: [Coming down to the edge of the garden.] He'll call you a coward.

WILLY: [Suddenly fearful.] No, that would be terrible.

BEN: Yes. And a damned fool.

WILLY: No, no, he mustn't, I won't have that! [He is broken and desperate.]

BEN: He'll hate you, William.

[The gay music of the Boys is heard.]

WILLY: Oh, Ben, how do we get back to all the great times? Used to be so full of light, and comradeship, the sleigh-riding in winter, and the ruddiness on his cheeks. And always some kind of good news coming up, always something nice coming up ahead. And never even let me carry the valises in the house, and simonizing, simonizing that little red car! Why, why can't I give him something and not have him hate me?

BEN: Let me think about it. [He glances at his watch.] I still have a little time. Remarkable proposition, but you've got to be sure you're not making a fool of yourself.

[BEN drifts off upstage and goes out of sight. BIFF comes down from the left.]

WILLY: [Suddenly conscious of BIFF, turns and looks up at him, then begins picking up the packages of seeds in confusion.] Where the hell is that seed? [Indignantly.] You can't see nothing out here! They boxed in the whole goddam neighborhood!

BIFF: There are people all around here. Don't you realize that?

WILLY: I'm busy. Don't bother me.

BIFF: [Taking the hoe from WILLY.] I'm saying good-bye to you, Pop. [WILLY looks at him, silent, unable to move.] I'm not coming back anymore.

WILLY: You're not going to see Oliver tomorrow?

BIFF: I've got no appointment, Dad.

WILLY: He put his arm around you, and you've got no appointment?

BIFF: Pop, get this now, will you? Everytime I've left it's been a fight that sent me out of here. Today I realized something about myself and I tried to explain it to you and I—I think I'm just not smart enough to make any sense out of it for you. To hell with whose fault it is or anything like that. [He takes WILLY'S arm.] Let's just wrap it up, heh? Come on in, we'll tell Mom. [He gently tries to pull WILLY to left.] WILLY: [Frozen, immobile, with guilt in his voice.] No, I don't want to see her.

BIFF: Come on! [He pulls again, and WILLY tries to pull away.]

WILLY: [Highly nervous.] No, no, I don't want to see her.

BIFF: [Tries to look into WILLY's face, as if to find the answer there.] Why don't you want to see her?

WILLY: [More harshly now.] Don't bother me, will you?

BIFF: What do you mean, you don't want to see her? You don't want them calling you yellow, do you? This isn't your fault; it's me, I'm a bum. Now come inside! [WILLY strains to get away.] Did you hear what I said to you?

[WILLY pulls away and quickly goes by himself into the house. BIFF follows.]

LINDA: [To WILLY.] Did you plant, dear?

BIFF: [At the door, to LINDA.] All right, we had it out. I'm going and I'm not writing anymore.

LINDA: [Going to WILLY in the kitchen.] I think that's the best way, dear. 'Cause there's no use drawing it out, you'll just never get along.

[WILLY doesn't respond.]

BIFF: People ask where I am and what I'm doing, you don't know, and you don't care. That way it'll be off your mind and you can start brightening up again.

All right? That clears it, doesn't it? [WILLY is silent, and BIFF goes to him.] You gonna wish me luck, scout? [He extends his hand.] What do you say?

LINDA: Shake his hand, Willy.

WILLY: [Turning to her, seething with hurt.] There's no necessity to mention the pen at all, y'know.

BIFF: [Gently.] I've got no appointment, Dad.

WILLY: [Erupting fiercely.] He put his arm around . . . ?

BIFF: Dad, you're never going to see what I am, so what's the use of arguing? If I strike oil I'll send you a check. Meantime forget I'm alive.

WILLY: [To LINDA.] Spite, see?

BIFF: Shake hands, Dad.

WILLY: Not my hand.

BIFF: I was hoping not to go this way.

WILLY: Well, this is the way you're going. Good-bye. [BIFF looks at him a moment, then turns sharply and goes to the stairs. WILLY stops him with.] May you rot in hell if you leave this house!

BIFF: [Turning.] Exactly what is it that you want from me?

WILLY: I want you to know, on the train, in the mountains, in the valleys, wherever you go, that you cut down your life for spite!

BIFF: No, no.

WILLY: Spite, spite, is the word of your undoing! And when you're down and out, remember what did it. When you're rotting somewhere beside the railroad tracks, remember, and don't you dare blame it on me!

BIFF: I'm not blaming it on you!

WILLY: I won't take the rap for this, you hear?

[HAPPY comes down the stairs and stands on the bottom step, watching.]

BIFF: That's just what I'm telling you!

WILLY: [Sinking into a chair at the table, with full accusation.] You're trying to put a knife in me—don't think I don't know what you're doing!

BIFF: All right, phony! Then let's lay it on the line. [He whips the rubber tube out of his pocket and puts it on the table.]

HAPPY: You crazy—

LINDA: Biff!

[She moves to grab the hose, but BIFF holds it down with his hand.]

BIFF: Leave it there! Don't move it!

WILLY: [Not looking at it.] What is that?

BIFF: You know goddam well what that is.

WILLY: [Caged, wanting to escape.] I never saw that.

BIFF: You saw it. The mice didn't bring it into the cellar! What is this supposed to do, make a hero out of you? This supposed to make me sorry for you?

WILLY: Never heard of it.

BIFF: There'll be no pity for you, you hear it? No pity!

WILLY: [To LINDA.] You hear the spite!

BIFF: No, you're going to hear the truth—what you are and what I am!

LINDA: Stop it!

WILLY: Spite!

HAPPY: [Coming down toward BIFF.] You cut it now!

BIFF: [To HAPPY.] The man don't know who we are! The man is gonna know! [To WILLY.] We never told the truth for ten minutes in this house!

HAPPY: We always told the truth!

BIFF: [Turning on him.] You big blow, are you the assistant buyer? You're one of the two assistants to the assistant, aren't you?

HAPPY: Well, I'm practically—

BIFF: You're practically full of it! We all are! And I'm through with it. [To WILLY.] Now hear this, Willy, this is me.

WILLY: I know you!

BIFF: You know why I had no address for three months? I stole a suit in Kansas City and I was in jail. [To LINDA, who is sobbing.] Stop crying. I'm through with it.

[LINDA turns away from them, her hands covering her face.]

WILLY: I suppose that's my fault!

BIFF: I stole myself out of every good job since high school!

WILLY: And whose fault is that?

BIFF: And I never got anywhere because you blew me so full of hot air I could never stand taking orders from anybody! That's whose fault it is!

WILLY: I hear that!

LINDA: Don't, Biff!

BIFF: It's goddam time you heard that! I had to be boss big shot in two weeks, and I'm through with it!

WILLY: Then hang yourself! For spite, hang yourself!

BIFF: No! Nobody's hanging himself, Willy! I ran down eleven flights with a pen in my hand today. And suddenly I stopped, you hear me? And in the middle of that office building, do you hear this? I stopped in the middle of that building and I saw—the sky. I saw the things that I love in this world. The work and the food and time to sit and smoke. And I looked at the pen and said to myself, what the hell am I grabbing this for? Why am I trying to become what I don't want to be? What am I doing in an office, making a contemptuous, begging fool of myself, when all I want is out there, waiting for me the minute I say I know who I am! Why can't I say that, Willy? [He tries to make WILLY face him, but WILLY pulls away and moves to the left.]

WILLY: [With hatred, threateningly.] The door of your life is wide open!

BIFF: Pop! I'm a dime a dozen, and so are you!

WILLY: [Turning on him now in an uncontrolled outburst.] I am not a dime a dozen! I am Willy Loman, and you are Biff Loman!

[BIFF starts for WILLY, but is blocked by HAPPY. In his fury, BIFF seems on the verge of attacking his father.]

BIFF: I am not a leader of men, Willy, and neither are you. You were never anything but a hard-working drummer who landed in the ash can like all the rest of them! I'm one dollar an hour, Willy! I tried seven states and couldn't raise it. A buck an hour! Do you gather my meaning? I'm not bringing home any prizes anymore, and you're going to stop waiting for me to bring them home!

WILLY: [Directly to BIFF.] You vengeful, spiteful mut!

[BIFF breaks from HAPPY. WILLY, in fright, starts up the stairs. BIFF grabs him.]

BIFF: [At the peak of his fury.] Pop, I'm nothing! I'm nothing, Pop. Can't you understand that? There's no spite in it anymore. I'm just what I am, that's all.

[BIFF's fury has spent itself, and he breaks down, sobbing, holding on to WILLY, who dumbly fumbles for BIFF's face.]

WILLY: [Astonished.] What're you doing? What're you doing? [To LINDA.] Why is he crying?

BIFF: [Crying, broken.] Will you let me go, for Christ's sake? Will you take that phony dream and burn it before something happens? [Struggling to contain himself, he pulls away and moves to the stairs.] I'll go in the morning. Put him—put him to bed. [Exhausted, BIFF moves up the stairs to his room.]

WILLY: [After a long pause, astonished, elevated.] Isn't that—isn't that remarkable? Biff—he likes me!

LINDA: He loves you, Willy!

HAPPY: [Deeply moved.] Always did, Pop.

WILLY: Oh, Biff! [Staring wildly.] He cried! Cried to me. [He is choking with his love, and now cries out his promise.] That boy—that boy is going to be magnificent!

[BEN appears in the light just outside the kitchen.]

BEN: Yes, outstanding, with twenty thousand behind him.

LINDA: [Sensing the racing of his mind, fearfully, carefully.] Now come to bed, Willy. It's all settled now.

WILLY: [Finding it difficult not to rush out of the house.] Yes, we'll sleep. Come on. Go to sleep, Hap.

BEN: And it does take a great kind of man to crack the jungle.

[In accents of dread, BEN's idyllic music starts up.]

HAPPY: [His arm around LINDA.] I'm getting married, Pop, don't forget it. I'm changing everything. I'm gonna run that department before the year is up. You'll see, Mom. [He kisses her.] BEN: The jungle is dark but full of diamonds, Willy.

[WILLY turns, moves, listening to BEN.]

LINDA: Be good. You're both good boys, just act that way, that's all.

HAPPY: 'Night, Pop. [He goes upstairs.]

LINDA: [To WILLY.] Come, dear.

BEN: [With greater force.] One must go in to fetch a diamond out.

WILLY: [To LINDA, as he moves slowly along the edge of the kitchen, toward the door.] I just want to get settled down, Linda. Let me sit alone for a little.

LINDA: [Almost uttering her fear.] I want you upstairs.

WILLY: [Taking her in his arms.] In a few minutes, Linda. I couldn't sleep right now. Go on, you look awful tired. [He kisses her.] BEN: Not like an appointment at all. A diamond is rough and hard to the touch.

WILLY: Go on now. I'll be right up.

LINDA: I think this is the only way, Willy.

WILLY: Sure, it's the best thing.

BEN: Best thing!

WILLY: The only way. Everything is gonna be—go on, kid, get to bed. You look so tired.

LINDA: Come right up.

WILLY: Two minutes. [LINDA goes into the living-room, then reappears in her bedroom. WILLY moves just outside the kitchen door.] Loves me. [Wonderingly.]

Always loved me. Isn't that a remarkable thing? Ben, he'll worship me for it!

BEN: [With promise.] It's dark there, but full of diamonds.

WILLY: Can you imagine that magnificence with twenty thousand dollars in his pocket?

LINDA: [Calling from her room.] Willy! Come up!

WILLY: [Calling into the kitchen.] Yes! Yes. Coming! It's very smart, you realize that, don't you, sweetheart? Even Ben sees it. I gotta go, baby. 'Bye! 'Bye! [Going over to BEN, almost dancing.] Imagine? When the mail comes he'll be ahead of Bernard again!

BEN: A perfect proposition all around.

WILLY: Did you see how he cried to me? Oh, if I could kiss him, Ben!

BEN: Time, William, time!

WILLY: Oh, Ben, I always knew one way or another we were gonna make it, Biff and I!

BEN: [Looking at his watch.] The boat. We'll be late. [He moves slowly off into the darkness.]

WILLY: [Elegiacally, turning to the house.] Now when you kick off, boy, I want a seventy-yard boot, and get right down the field under the ball, and when you hit, hit low and hit hard, because it's important, boy. [He swings around and faces the audience.] There's all kinds of important people in the stands, and the first thing you know . . . [Suddenly realizing he is alone.] Ben! Ben, where do I . . . ? [He makes a sudden movement of search.] Ben, how do I . . . ?

LINDA: [Calling.] Willy, you coming up?

WILLY: [Uttering a gasp of fear, whirling about as if to quiet her.] Sh! [He turns around as if to find his way; sounds, faces, voices, seem to be swarming in upon him and he flicks at them, crying.] Sh! Sh! [Suddenly music, faint and high, stops him. It rises in intensity, almost to an unbearable scream. He goes up and down on his toes, and rushes off around the house.] Shhh!

LINDA: Willy? [There is no answer. LINDA waits. BIFF gets up off his bed. He is still in his clothes. HAPPY sits up. BIFF stands listening.] [With real fear.] Willy, answer me! Willy! [There is the sound of a car starting and moving away at full speed.] No!

BIFF: [Rushing down the stairs.] Pop!

[As the car speeds off, the music crashes down in a frenzy of sound, which becomes the soft pulsation of a single cello string. BIFF slowly returns to his bedroom. He and HAPPY gravely don their jackets. LINDA slowly walks out of her room. The music has developed into a dead march. The leaves of day are appearing over everything. CHARLEY and BERNARD, somberly dressed, appear and knock on the kitchen door. BIFF and HAPPY slowly descend the stairs to the kitchen as CHARLEY and BERNARD enter. All stop a moment when LINDA, in clothes of mourning, bearing a little bunch of roses, comes through the draped doorway into the kitchen. She goes to CHARLEY and takes his arm. Now all move toward the audience, through the wall-line of the kitchen. At the limit of the apron, LINDA lays down the flowers, kneels, and sits back on her heels. All stare down at the grave.]

REQUIEM⁷

CHARLEY: It's getting dark, Linda.

[LINDA doesn't react. She stares at the grave.]

BIFF: How about it, Mom? Better get some rest, heh? They'll be closing the gate soon.

[LINDA makes no move. Pause.]

HAPPY: [Deeply angered.] He had no right to do that. There was no necessity for it. We would've helped him.

CHARLEY: [Grunting.] Hmmmm.

BIFF: Come along, Mom.

LINDA: Why didn't anybody come?

CHARLEY: It was a very nice funeral.

LINDA: But where are all the people he knew? Maybe they blame him.

CHARLEY: Naa. It's a rough world, Linda. They wouldn't blame him.

LINDA: I can't understand it. At this time especially. First time in thirty-five years we were just about free and clear. He only needed a little salary. He was even finished with the dentist.

CHARLEY: No man only needs a little salary.

LINDA: I can't understand it.

7. Mass for the repose of departed souls; also a musical setting for such a mass.

BIFF: There were a lot of nice days. When he'd come home from a trip; or on Sundays, making the stoop; finishing the cellar; putting on the new porch; when he built the extra bathroom; and put up the garage. You know something, Charley, there's more of him in that front stoop than in all the sales he ever made.

CHARLEY: Yeah. He was a happy man with a batch of cement.

LINDA: He was so wonderful with his hands.

BIFF: He had the wrong dreams. All, all, wrong.

HAPPY: [Almost ready to fight BIFF.] Don't say that!

BIFF: He never knew who he was.

CHARLEY: [Stopping HAPPY's movement and reply. To BIFF.] Nobody dast blame this man. You don't understand: Willy was a salesman. And for a salesman, there is no rock bottom to the life. He don't put a bolt to a nut, he don't tell you the law or give you medicine. He's a man way out there in the blue, riding on a smile and a shoeshine. And when they start not smiling back—that's an earthquake. And then you get yourself a couple of spots on your hat, and you're finished. Nobody dast blame this man. A salesman is got to dream, boy. It comes with the territory.

BIFF: Charley, the man didn't know who he was.

HAPPY: [Infuriated.] Don't say that!

BIFF: Why don't you come with me, Happy?

HAPPY: I'm not licked that easily. I'm staying right in this city, and I'm gonna beat this racket! [He looks at BIFF, his chin set.] The Loman Brothers!

BIFF: I know who I am, kid.

HAPPY: All right, boy. I'm gonna show you and everybody else that Willy Loman did not die in vain. He had a good dream. It's the only dream you can have—to come out number-one-man. He fought it out here, and this is where I'm gonna win it for him.

BIFF: [With a hopeless glance at HAPPY, bends toward his mother.] Let's go, Mom.

LINDA: I'll be with you in a minute. Go on, Charley. [He hesitates.] I want to, just for a minute. I never had a chance to say good-bye. [CHARLEY moves away, followed by HAPPY. BIFF remains a slight distance up and left of LINDA. She sits there, summoning herself. The flute begins, not far away, playing behind her speech.] Forgive me, dear. I can't cry. I don't know what it is, but I can't cry. I don't understand it. Why did you ever do that? Help me, Willy, I can't cry. It seems to me that you're just on another trip. I keep expecting you. Willy, dear, I can't cry. Why did you do it? I search and search and I search, and I can't understand it, Willy. I made the last payment on the house today. Today, dear. And there'll be nobody home. [A sob rises in her throat.] We're free and clear. [Sobbing more fully, released.] We're free. [BIFF comes slowly toward her.] We're free . . . We're free . . .

CURTAIN

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

ARTHUR MILLER (1915–2005)

From “Arthur Miller Interview” (2001)*

MILLER: [. . .] a lot of people give a lot of their lives to a company or even the government, and when they are no longer needed, when they are used up, they're tossed aside. [. . .] Willie Loman's situation is even more common now than it was then [1949]. A lot of people are eliminated earlier from the productive life in this society than they used to be.

MILLER: That play [Death of a Salesman] is several inventions which have been pilfered over the years by other writers. It is new in the sense that, first of all, there is very little or no waste. The play begins with its action, and there are no transitions. It is a kind of frontal attack on the conditions of this man's life, without any piddling around with techniques. The basic technique is very straightforward. It is told like a dream. In a dream, we are simply confronted with various loaded symbols, and where one is exhausted, it gives way to another. In Salesman, there is the use of a past in the present. It has been mistakenly called flashbacks, but there are no flashbacks in that play. It is a concurrence of a past with the present, and that's a bit different.

[INTERVIEWER]: [. . .] I heard that after you saw Streetcar [Named Desire], you rewrote the play you were working on at the time, Inside of His Head, and that turned into Death of a Salesman. What did you see in Streetcar that changed your vision of your own play?

MILLER: [. . .] What it did was to validate the use of language the way Salesman used language. [. . .] Willie Loman isn't talking street talk; Willie Loman's talk is very formed and formal, very often. [. . .] That was the decision I made: to lift him into the area where one could deal with his ideas and his feelings and make them applicable to the whole human race. I'm using slang in the play and different kinds of speech, but it is basically a formed, very aware use of the English language. Of course, Tennessee [Williams] was similarly a fundamentally formal writer, and he was not trying to write the way people speak on the street.

SOPHOCLES

(496?–406 BCE)

Oedipus the King¹

Sophocles lived at a time when Athens and Greek civilization were at the peak of their power and influence. He served as a general under Pericles, played a prominent role in the city's affairs, and was arguably the greatest of the Greek tragic playwrights, winning the annual dramatic competition about twenty times, a feat unmatched by even his great contemporaries, Aeschylus and Euripides. An innovator, Sophocles fundamentally changed the nature of dramatic performance by adding a third actor, enlarging the chorus, and introducing the use of painted scenery. Aristotle held that Sophocles's Oedipus the King (c. 429 BCE) was the perfect tragedy and used it as his model when he discussed the nature of tragedy in his Poetics. Today only seven of Sophocles's tragedies survive—the Oedipus trilogy (Oedipus the King, Oedipus at Colonus, and Antigone), Philoctetes, Ajax, Trachiniae, and Electra—though he is believed to have written as many as 123 plays.

CHARACTERS

OEDIPUS, King of Thebes
 JOCASTA, His Wife
 CREON, His Brother-in-Law
 TEIRESIAS, an Old Blind Prophet
 A PRIEST

FIRST MESSENGER
 SECOND MESSENGER
 A HERDSMAN
 A CHORUS of Old Men of Thebes

SCENE: In front of the palace of OEDIPUS at Thebes. To the right of the stage near the altar stands the PRIEST with a crowd of children. OEDIPUS emerges from the central door.

OEDIPUS: Children, young sons and daughters of old Cadmus,² why do you sit here with your suppliant crowns?
 The town is heavy with a mingled burden of sounds and smells, of groans and hymns and incense;
 I did not think it fit that I should hear of this from messengers but came myself,—
 I Oedipus whom all men call the Great.

[He turns to the PRIEST.]

You're old and they are young; come, speak for them.
 What do you fear or want, that you sit here

1. Translated by David Grene. 2. Founder of Thebes.

10 suppliant? Indeed I'm willing to give all that you may need; I would be very hard should I not pity suppliants like these.

PRIEST: O ruler of my country, Oedipus, you see our company around the altar;
15 you see our ages; some of us, like these, who cannot yet fly far, and some of us heavy with age; these children are the chosen among the young, and I the priest of Zeus.
Within the market place sit others crowned 20 with suppliant garlands, at the double shrine of Pallas³ and the temple where Ismenus gives oracles by fire. King, you yourself have seen our city reeling like a wreck already; it can scarcely lift its prow
25 out of the depths, out of the bloody surf.
A blight is on the fruitful plants of the earth,
a blight is on the cattle in the fields,
a blight is on our women that no children are born to them; a God that carries fire, 30 a deadly pestilence, is on our town, strikes us and spares not, and the house of Cadmus is emptied of its people while black Death grows rich in groaning and in lamentation.
We have not come as suppliants to this altar 35 because we thought of you as of a God, but rather judging you the first of men in all the chances of this life and when we mortals have to do with more than man.
You came and by your coming saved our city, 40 freed us from tribute which we paid of old to the Sphinx, cruel singer.⁴ This you did in virtue of no knowledge we could give you, in virtue of no teaching; it was God that aided you, men say, and you are held 45 with God's assistance to have saved our lives.
Now Oedipus, Greatest in all men's eyes, here falling at your feet we all entreat you, find us some strength for rescue.
Perhaps you'll hear a wise word from some God,
50 perhaps you will learn something from a man
(for I have seen that for the skilled of practice the outcome of their counsels live the most).
Noblest of men, go, and raise up our city,

3. Athena, the goddess of wisdom. Zeus: principal god and father of Athena.

4. Thebes was in the thrall of the monstrous Sphinx—part human, part lion, part eagle, part serpent—until Oedipus was able to answer a riddle; freed at last from the monster's cruelty, the grateful citizens of Thebes made Oedipus their king.

go,—and give heed. For now this land of ours calls you its savior since you saved it once. 55
 So, let us never speak about your reign as of a time when first our feet were set secure on high, but later fell to ruin.
 Raise up our city, save it and raise it up.
 Once you have brought us luck with happy omen; 60 be no less now in fortune.
 If you will rule this land, as now you rule it, better to rule it full of men than empty.
 For neither tower nor ship is anything when empty, and none live in it together. 65 OEDIPUS: I pity you, children. You have come full of longing, but I have known the story before you told it only too well. I know you are all sick, yet there is not one of you, sick though you are,
 that is as sick as I myself. 70
 Your several sorrows each have single scope and touch but one of you. My spirit groans for city and myself and you at once.
 You have not roused me like a man from sleep;
 know that I have given many tears to this, 75 gone many ways wandering in thought, but as I thought I found only one remedy and that I took. I sent Menoeceus' son Creon, Jocasta's brother, to Apollo,⁵ to his Pythian temple, 80 that he might learn there by what act or word
 I could save this city. As I count the days, it vexes me what ails him; he is gone far longer than he needed for the journey.
 But when he comes, then, may I prove a villain, 85
 if I shall not do all the God commands.
 PRIEST: Thanks for your gracious words. Your servants here signal that Creon is this moment coming.
 OEDIPUS: His face is bright. O holy Lord Apollo, grant that his news too may be bright for us 90
 and bring us safety.
 PRIEST: It is happy news,
 I think, for else his head would not be crowned with sprigs of fruitful laurel.
 OEDIPUS: We will know soon, he's within hail. Lord Creon, my good brother, 95 what is the word you bring us from the God?
 [CREON enters.]

5. God of truth and of light, worshipped at many shrines, most famously that at Pytho (an ancient name for Delphi), where an oracle was believed to speak for the god.

CREON: A good word,—for things hard to bear themselves if in the final issue all is well
I count complete good fortune.

OEDIPUS: What do you mean?

100 What you have said so far leaves me uncertain whether to trust or fear.

CREON: If you will hear my news before these others
I am ready to speak, or else to go within.

OEDIPUS: Speak it to all;

105 the grief I bear, I bear it more for these than for my own heart.

CREON: I will tell you, then,
what I heard from the God.

King Phoebus⁶ in plain words commanded us to drive out a pollution from our land, 110 pollution grown ingrained within the land;
drive it out, said the God, not cherish it, till it's past cure.

OEDIPUS: What is the rite of purification? How shall it be done?

CREON: By banishing a man, or expiation 115 of blood by blood, since it is murder guilt which holds our city in this destroying storm.

OEDIPUS: Who is this man whose fate the God pronounces?

CREON: My Lord, before you piloted the state
we had a king called Laius.

120 OEDIPUS: I know of him by hearsay. I have not seen him.

CREON: The God commanded clearly: let someone punish with force this dead man's murderers.

OEDIPUS: Where are they in the world? Where would a trace of this old crime be found? It would be hard to guess where.

125 CREON: The clue is in this land; that which is sought is found;
the unheeded thing escapes:
so said the God.

OEDIPUS: Was it at home,
or in the country that death came upon him,
130 or in another country travelling?

CREON: He went, he said himself, upon an embassy, but never returned when he set out from home.

OEDIPUS: Was there no messenger, no fellow traveller who knew what happened? Such a one might tell 135 something of use.

CREON: They were all killed save one. He fled in terror and he could tell us nothing in clear terms of what he knew, nothing, but one thing only.

6. Another name for Apollo.

- OEDIPUS: What was it?
 If we could even find a slim beginning 140
 in which to hope, we might discover much.
- CREON: This man said that the robbers they encountered were many and the hands that did the murder were many; it was no man's single power.
- OEDIPUS: How could a robber dare a deed like this 145 were he not helped with money from the city, money and treachery?
- CREON: That indeed was thought.
 But Laius was dead and in our trouble
 there was none to help.
- OEDIPUS: What trouble was so great to hinder you 150 inquiring out the murder of your king?
- CREON: The riddling Sphinx induced us to neglect mysterious crimes and rather seek solution of troubles at our feet.
- OEDIPUS: I will bring this to light again. King Phoebus 155 fittingly took this care about the dead, and you too fittingly.
 And justly you will see in me an ally,
 a champion of my country and the God.
 For when I drive pollution from the land 160
 I will not serve a distant friend's advantage, but act in my own interest. Whoever he was that killed the king may readily wish to dispatch me with his murderous hand;
 so helping the dead king I help myself. 165
- Come, children, take your suppliant boughs and go; up from the altars now. Call the assembly and let it meet upon the understanding that I'll do everything. God will decide whether we prosper or remain in sorrow. 170
- PRIEST: Rise, children—it was this we came to seek, which of himself the king now offers us.
 May Phoebus who gave us the oracle come to our rescue and stay the plague.
- [*Exeunt*⁷ all but the CHORUS.]
- CHORUS: [Strophe.]⁸ What is the sweet spoken word of God from the shrine of 175
 Pytho, rich in gold that has come to glorious Thebes?
 I am stretched on the rack of doubt, and terror and trembling hold my heart, O Delian Healer,⁹ and I worship full of fears

7. Exit the stage (Latin for "they go out"). 8. In Greek stagecraft, choral song and corresponding dance of the chorus to one side.

9. Apollo was also god of healing; one of his principal shrines was located on the island of Delos.

for what doom you will bring to pass, new or renewed in the revolving years.

180 Speak to me, immortal voice, child of golden Hope.

[Antistrophe.]¹

First I call on you, Athene,² deathless daughter of Zeus, and Artemis,³ Earth Upholder, who sits in the midst of the marketplace in the throne which men call Fame,

185 and Phoebus, the Far Shooter, three averters of Fate, come to us now, if ever before, when ruin rushed upon the state, you drove destruction's flame away out of our land.

[Strophe.]

Our sorrows defy number;
190 all the ship's timbers are rotten;
taking of thought is no spear for the driving away of the plague.
There are no growing children in this famous land;
there are no women bearing the pangs of childbirth.
You may see them one with another, like birds swift on the wing, 195 quicker than fire unmastered, speeding away to the coast of the Western God.

[Antistrophe.]

In the unnumbered deaths of its people the city dies;
those children that are born lie dead on the naked earth 200 unpitied, spreading contagion of death; and grey haired mothers and wives everywhere stand at the altar's edge, suppliant, moaning; the hymn to the healing God rings out but with it the wailing voices are blended.

From these our sufferings grant us, O golden Daughter of Zeus, glad-faced deliverance.

[Strophe.]

205 There is no clash of brazen shields but our fight is with the War God, a War God ringed with the cries of men, a savage God who burns us; grant that he turn in racing course backwards out of our country's bounds to the great palace of Amphitrite⁴ or where the waves of the Thracian sea deny the stranger safe anchorage.

210 Whatsoever escapes the night at last the light of day revisits;

1. After the strophe, the chorus's answering song and returning dance.

2. Goddess of both war and peace, as well as wisdom.

3. Goddess of the earth and the hunt, twin sister of Apollo.

4. Queen of the sea and wife of Poseidon, sometimes said to dwell in the Atlantic Ocean.

so smite the War God,⁵ Father Zeus, beneath your thunderbolt,
 for you are the Lord of the lightning, the lightning that carries fire.

[Antistrophe.]

And your unconquered arrow shafts, winged by the golden corded bow, 215
 Lycean King, I beg to be at our side for help;⁶ and the gleaming torches of Artemis with which she scours the Lycean hills, and I call on the God with the turban of gold, who gave his name to this country of ours,
 the Bacchic God with the wind flushed face, Evian One, who travel 220
 with the Maenad⁷ company, combat the God that burns us with your torch of pine;
 for the God that is our enemy is a God unhonoured among the Gods.

[OEDIPUS returns.]

OEDIPUS: For what you ask me—if you will hear my words, 225 and hearing welcome them and fight the plague, you will find strength and lightening of your load Hark to me; what I say to you, I say as one that is a stranger to the story as stranger to the deed. For I would not 230 be far upon the track if I alone were tracing it without a clue. But now, since after all was finished, I became a citizen among you, citizens—now I proclaim to all the men of Thebes: 235 who so among you knows the murderer by whose hand Laius, son of Labdacus, died—I command him to tell everything to me,—yes, though he fears himself to take the blame on his own head; for bitter punishment 240 he shall have none, but leave this land unharmed.
 Or if he knows the murderer, another,
 a foreigner, still let him speak the truth.
 For I will pay him and be grateful, too.
 But if you shall keep silence, if perhaps 245
 some one of you, to shield a guilty friend, or for his own sake shall reject my words—hear what I shall do then:
 I forbid that man, whoever he be, my land,

5. Ares, son of Zeus and half brother to Athena.

6. That is, Apollo, a major shrine to whom was located at Lycia in Anatolia, modern-day Turkey.

7. Female worshippers of Dionysus (Bacchus to the Romans; see line 219), god of fertility and wine.
Evian One: Dionysus (also known as Evius).

250 my land where I hold sovereignty and throne;
 and I forbid any to welcome him or cry him greeting or make him a sharer in sacrifice or offering to the gods, or give him water for his hands to wash.
 255 I command all to drive him from their homes, since he is our pollution, as the oracle of Pytho's god proclaimed him now to me.
 So I stand forth a champion of the god and of the man who died.
 260 Upon the murderer I invoke this curse—whether he is one man and all unknown, or one of many—may he wear out his life in misery to miserable doom!
 If with my knowledge he lives at my hearth
 265 I pray that I myself may feel my curse.
 On you I lay my charge to fulfill all this for me, for the god, and for this land of ours destroyed and blighted, by the god forsaken.

 Even were this no matter of God's ordinance 270 it would not fit you so to leave it lie, unpurified, since a good man is dead and one that was a king. Search it out.
 Since I am now the holder of his office, and have his bed and wife that once was his, 275 and had his line not been unfortunate we would have common children—(fortune leaped upon his head)—because of all these things,
 I fight in his defence as for my father, and I shall try all means to take the murderer 280 of Laius the son of Labdacus the son of Polydorus and before him of Cadmus and before him of Agenor.
 Those who do not obey me, may the Gods grant no crops springing from the ground they plough nor children to their women! May a fate 285 like this, or one still worse than this consume them!
 For you whom these words please, the other Thebans, may Justice as your ally and all the Gods live with you, blessing you now and for ever!
 290 CHORUS: As you have held me to my oath, I speak:
 I neither killed the king nor can declare the killer; but since Phoebus set the quest it is his part to tell who the man is.
 OEDIPUS: Right; but to put compulsion on the Gods 295 against their will—no man can do that.

CHORUS: May I then say what I think second best?

OEDIPUS: If there's a third best, too, spare not to tell it.

CHORUS: I know that what the Lord Teiresias sees, is most often what the Lord Apollo sees. If you should inquire of this from him you might find out most clearly. 300

OEDIPUS: Even in this my actions have not been sluggard.
On Creon's word I have sent two messengers and why the prophet is not here already
I have been wondering.

CHORUS: His skill apart 305
there is besides only an old faint story.

OEDIPUS: What is it?
I look at every story.

CHORUS: It was said that he was killed by certain wayfarers.

OEDIPUS: I heard that, too, but no one saw the killer. 310

CHORUS: Yet if he has a share of fear at all, his courage will not stand firm, hearing your curse.

OEDIPUS: The man who in the doing did not shrink will fear no word.

CHORUS: Here comes his prosecutor: led by your men the godly prophet comes 315
in whom alone of mankind truth is native.

[Enter TEIRESIAS, led by a LITTLE BOY.]

OEDIPUS: Teiresias, you are versed in everything, things teachable and things not to be spoken, things of the heaven and earth-creeping things.
You have no eyes but in your mind you know 320 with what a plague our city is afflicted.

My lord, in you alone we find a champion, in you alone one that can rescue us.
Perhaps you have not heard the messengers, but Phoebus sent in answer to our sending 325 an oracle declaring that our freedom from this disease would only come when we should learn the names of those who killed King Laius, and kill them or expel from our country.

Do not begrudge us oracles from birds, 330 or any other way of prophecy within your skill; save yourself and the city, save me; redeem the debt of our pollution that lies on us because of this dead man.

We are in your hands; pains are most nobly taken 335 to help another when you have means and power.

TEIRESIAS: Alas, how terrible is wisdom when it brings no profit to the man that's wise!

This I knew well, but had forgotten it, else I would not have come here.

340 OEDIPUS: What is this?
How sad you are now you have come!

TEIRESIAS: Let me go home. It will be easiest for us both to bear our several destinies to the end if you will follow my advice.

OEDIPUS: You'd rob us
345 of this your gift of prophecy? You talk as one who had no care for law nor love for Thebes who reared you.

TEIRESIAS: Yes, but I see that even your own words miss the mark; therefore I must fear for mine.

350 OEDIPUS: For God's sake if you know of anything, do not turn from us; all of us kneel to you,
all of us here, your suppliants.

TEIRESIAS: All of you here know nothing. I will not bring to the light of day my troubles, mine—rather than call them yours.

355 OEDIPUS: What do you mean?
You know of something but refuse to speak.
Would you betray us and destroy the city?

TEIRESIAS: I will not bring this pain upon us both, neither on you nor on myself. Why is it 360 you question me and waste your labour? I will tell you nothing.

OEDIPUS: You would provoke a stone! Tell us, you villain, tell us, and do not stand there quietly unmoved and balking at the issue.

365 TEIRESIAS: You blame my temper but you do not see your own that lives within you; it is me you chide.

OEDIPUS: Who would not feel his temper rise at words like these with which you shame our city?

370 TEIRESIAS: Of themselves things will come, although I hide them and breathe no word of them.

OEDIPUS: Since they will come tell them to me.

TEIRESIAS: I will say nothing further.
Against this answer let your temper rage as wildly as you will.

OEDIPUS: Indeed I am
375 so angry I shall not hold back a jot of what I think. For I would have you know
I think you were complotter of the deed

- and doer of the deed save in so far as for the actual killing. Had you had eyes
 I would have said alone you murdered him. 380
- TEIRESIAS: Yes? Then I warn you faithfully to keep the letter of your proclamation and from this day forth to speak no word of greeting to these nor me; you are the land's pollution.
- OEDIPUS: How shamelessly you started up this taunt! 385
 How do you think you will escape?
- TEIRESIAS: I have.
 I have escaped; the truth is what I cherish and that's my strength.
- OEDIPUS: And who has taught you truth?
 Not your profession surely!
- TEIRESIAS: You have taught me, for you have made me speak against my will. 390
- OEDIPUS: Speak what? Tell me again that I may learn it better.
- TEIRESIAS: Did you not understand before or would you provoke me into speaking?
- OEDIPUS: I did not grasp it, not so to call it known. Say it again.
- TEIRESIAS: I say you are the murderer of the king 395 whose murderer you seek.
- OEDIPUS: Not twice you shall say calumnies like this and stay unpunished.
- TEIRESIAS: Shall I say more to tempt your anger more?
- OEDIPUS: As much as you desire; it will be said in vain.
- TEIRESIAS: I say that with those you love best 400 you live in foulest shame unconsciously and do not see where you are in calamity.
- OEDIPUS: Do you imagine you can always talk like this, and live to laugh at it hereafter?
- TEIRESIAS: Yes, if the truth has anything of strength. 405
- OEDIPUS: It has, but not for you; it has no strength for you because you are blind in mind and ears as well as in your eyes.
- TEIRESIAS: You are a poor wretch to taunt me with the very insults which everyone soon will heap upon yourself. 410
- OEDIPUS: Your life is one long night so that you cannot hurt me or any other who sees the light.
- TEIRESIAS: It is not fate that I should be your ruin, Apollo is enough; it is his care to work this out.
- OEDIPUS: Was this your own design 415 or Creon's?

TEIRESIAS: Creon is no hurt to you,
but you are to yourself.

OEDIPUS: Wealth, sovereignty and skill outmatching skill for the contrivance of an envied life!

420 Great store of jealousy fill your treasury chests, if my friend Creon, friend from the first and loyal,
thus secretly attacks me, secretly desires to drive me out and secretly suborns this juggling, trick devising quack, 425 this wily beggar who has only eyes for his own gains, but blindness in his skill.

For, tell me, where have you seen clear, Teiresias, with your prophetic eyes? When the dark singer, the Sphinx, was in your country, did you speak 430 word of deliverance to its citizens?

And yet the riddle's answer was not the province of a chance comer. It was a prophet's task and plainly you had no such gift of prophecy from birds nor otherwise from any God

435 to glean a word of knowledge. But I came,
Oedipus, who knew nothing, and I stopped her.
I solved the riddle by my wit alone.

Mine was no knowledge got from birds.⁸ And now you would expel me,

440 because you think that you will find a place by Creon's throne. I think you will be sorry, both you and your accomplice, for your plot to drive me out. And did I not regard you as an old man, some suffering would have taught you 445 that what was in your heart was treason.

CHORUS: We look at this man's words and yours, my king, and we find both have spoken them in anger.
We need no angry words but only thought how we may best hit the God's meaning for us.

450 TEIRESIAS: If you are king, at least I have the right no less to speak in my defence against you.
Of that much I am master. I am no slave of yours, but Loxias,⁹ and so I shall not enroll myself with Creon for my patron.

455 Since you have taunted me with being blind, here is my word for you.

You have your eyes but see not where you are in sin, nor where you live, nor whom you live with.

8. Prophetic knowledge derived from observing the flight of birds or sometimes from inspecting bird entrails.

9. Yet another name for Apollo.

Do you know who your parents are? Unknowing you are an enemy to kith and kin 460 in death, beneath the earth, and in this life.
 A deadly footed, double striking curse, from father and mother both, shall drive you forth out of this land, with darkness on your eyes, that now have such straight vision. Shall there be 465
 a place will not be harbour to your cries, a corner of Cithaeron¹ will not ring in echo to your cries, soon, soon,— when you shall learn the secret of your marriage, which steered you to a haven in this house,— 470 haven no haven, after lucky voyage?
 And of the multitude of other evils establishing a grim equality between you and your children, you know nothing.
 So, muddy with contempt my words and Creon's! 475
 Misery shall grind no man as it will you.

OEDIPUS: Is it endurable that I should hear such words from him? Go and a curse go with you!
 Quick, home with you! Out of my house at once!

TEIRESIAS: I would not have come either had you not called me. 480

OEDIPUS: I did not know then you would talk like a fool—or it would have been long before I called you.

TEIRESIAS: I am a fool then, as it seems to you—but to the parents who have bred you, wise.

OEDIPUS: What parents? Stop! Who are they of all the world? 485

TEIRESIAS: This day will show your birth and will destroy you.

OEDIPUS: How needlessly your riddles darken everything.

TEIRESIAS: But it's in riddle answering you are strongest.

OEDIPUS: Yes. Taunt me where you will find me great.

TEIRESIAS: It is this very luck that has destroyed you. 490

OEDIPUS: I do not care, if it has saved this city.

TEIRESIAS: Well, I will go. Come, boy, lead me away.

OEDIPUS: Yes, lead him off. So long as you are here, you'll be a stumbling block and a vexation;
 once gone, you will not trouble me again.

TEIRESIAS: I have said 495 what I came here to say not fearing your countenance: there is no way you can hurt me.
 I tell you, king, this man, this murderer (whom you have long declared you are in search of, indicting him in threatening proclamation as murderer of Laius)—he is here. 500
 In name he is a stranger among citizens

1. Mountain where Oedipus was abandoned as a child.

but soon he will be shown to be a citizen true native Theban, and he'll have no joy 505 of the discovery: blindness for sight and beggary for riches his exchange, he shall go journeying to a foreign country tapping his way before him with a stick.
 He shall be proved father and brother both 510 to his own children in his house; to her that gave him birth, a son and husband both;
 a fellow sower in his father's bed with that same father that he murdered.
 Go within, reckon that out, and if you find me
 515 mistaken, say I have no skill in prophecy.

[Exeunt separately TEIRESIAS and OEDIPUS.]

CHORUS: [Strophe.] Who is the man proclaimed by Delphi's² prophetic rock as the bloody handed murderer, the doer of deeds that none dare name?
 520 Now is the time for him to run with a stronger foot than Pegasus³
 for the child of Zeus leaps in arms upon him with fire and the lightning bolt, 525 and terribly close on his heels are the Fates⁴ that never miss.

[Antistrophe.]

Lately from snowy Parnassus⁵ clearly the voice flashed forth, bidding each Theban track him down,
 530 the unknown murderer.
 In the savage forests he lurks and in the caverns like the mountain bull.
 He is sad and lonely, and lonely his feet 535 that carry him far from the navel of earth; but its prophecies, ever living,
 flutter around his head.

[Strophe.]

The augur has spread confusion,
 terrible confusion;
 540 I do not approve what was said

2. Location of Greece's most important shrine to Apollo, renowned for its oracle.

3. Winged horse. 4. Goddesses who decide the course of human life.

5. Mountain sacred to Apollo.

nor can I deny it.
 I do not know what to say;
 I am in a flutter of foreboding;
 I never heard in the present nor past of a quarrel between 545 the sons of Labdacus and Polybus,⁶ that I might bring as proof in attacking the popular fame of Oedipus, seeking to take vengeance for undiscovered 550 death in the line of Labdacus.

[Antistrophe.]

Truly Zeus and Apollo are wise and in human things all knowing;
 but amongst men there is no distinct judgment, between the prophet 555 and me—which of us is right.
 One man may pass another in wisdom
 but I would never agree with those that find fault with the king till I should see the word 560 proved right beyond doubt. For once in visible form the Sphinx came on him and all of us saw his wisdom and in that test he saved the city. So he will not be condemned by my mind. 565

[Enter CREON.]

CREON: Citizens, I have come because I heard deadly words spread about me, that the king accuses me. I cannot take that from him.
 If he believes that in these present troubles
 he has been wronged by me in word or deed 570
 I do not want to live on with the burden of such a scandal on me. The report injures me doubly and most vitally—for I'll be called a traitor to my city and traitor also to my friends and you. 575

CHORUS: Perhaps it was a sudden gust of anger that forced that insult from him, and no judgment.

CREON: But did he say that it was in compliance with schemes of mine that the seer told him lies?

CHORUS: Yes, he said that, but why, I do not know. 580

CREON: Were his eyes straight in his head? Was his mind right when he accused me in this fashion?

6. King who adopted Oedipus.

CHORUS: I do not know; I have no eyes to see what princes do. Here comes the king himself.

[Enter OEDIPUS.]

585 OEDIPUS: You, sir, how is it you come here? Have you so much brazen-faced daring that you venture in my house although you are proved manifestly the murderer of that man, and though you tried, openly, highway robbery of my crown?

590 For God's sake, tell me what you saw in me, what cowardice or what stupidity, that made you lay a plot like this against me?
Did you imagine I should not observe the crafty scheme that stole upon me or 595 seeing it, take no means to counter it?

Was it not stupid of you to make the attempt, to try to hunt down royal power without the people at your back or friends? For only with the people at your back or money can 600 the hunt end in the capture of a crown.

CREON: Do you know what you're doing? Will you listen to words to answer yours, and then pass judgment?

OEDIPUS: You're quick to speak, but I am slow to grasp you, for I have found you dangerous,—and my foe.

605 CREON: First of all hear what I shall say to that.

OEDIPUS: At least don't tell me that you are not guilty.

CREON: If you think obstinacy without wisdom a valuable possession, you are wrong.

OEDIPUS: And you are wrong if you believe that one, 610 a criminal, will not be punished only because he is my kinsman.

CREON: This is but just—but tell me, then, of what offense I'm guilty?

OEDIPUS: Did you or did you not urge me to send to this prophetic mumbler?

615 CREON: I did indeed, and I shall stand by what I told you.

OEDIPUS: How long ago is it since Laius . . .

CREON: What about Laius? I don't understand.

OEDIPUS: Vanished—died—was murdered?

CREON: It is long,
a long, long time to reckon.

OEDIPUS: Was this prophet in the profession then?

620 CREON: He was, and honoured as highly as he is today.

OEDIPUS: At that time did he say a word about me?

CREON: Never, at least when I was near him.

OEDIPUS: You never made a search for the dead man?

CREON: We searched, indeed, but never learned of anything. 625

OEDIPUS: Why did our wise old friend not say this then?

CREON: I don't know; and when I know nothing, I usually hold my tongue.

OEDIPUS: You know this much,
and can declare this much if you are loyal.

CREON: What is it? If I know, I'll not deny it. 630

OEDIPUS: That he would not have said that I killed Laius had he not met you first.

CREON: You know yourself whether he said this, but I demand that I should hear as much from you as you from me.

OEDIPUS: Then hear,—I'll not be proved a murderer. 635

CREON: Well, then. You're married to my sister.

OEDIPUS: Yes,
that I am not disposed to deny.

CREON: You rule
this country giving her an equal share in the government?

OEDIPUS: Yes, everything she wants she has from me.

CREON: And I, as thirdsman to you, 640 am rated as the equal of you two?

OEDIPUS: Yes, and it's there you've proved yourself false friend.

CREON: Not if you will reflect on it as I do.

Consider, first, if you think anyone would choose to rule and fear rather than rule 645 and sleep untroubled by a fear if power were equal in both cases. I, at least,
I was not born with such a frantic yearning to be a king—but to do what kings do.

And so it is with everyone who has learned 650 wisdom and self-control. As it stands now, the prizes are all mine—and without fear.

But if I were the king myself, I must do much that went against the grain. 655
How should despotic rule seem sweeter to me than painless power and an assured authority?

I am not so besotted yet that I want other honours than those that come with profit.

Now every man's my pleasure; every man greets me;
now those who are your suitors fawn on me,— 660 success for them depends upon my favour.

Why should I let all this go to win that?
My mind would not be traitor if it's wise;

665 I am no treason lover, of my nature, nor would I ever dare to join a plot.
 Prove what I say. Go to the oracle at Pytho and inquire about the answers, if they are as I told you. For the rest, if you discover I laid any plot 670 together with the seer, kill me, I say, not only by your vote but by my own.
 But do not charge me on obscure opinion without some proof to back it. It's not just lightly to count your knaves as honest men, 675 nor honest men as knaves. To throw away an honest friend is, as it were, to throw your life away, which a man loves the best.
 In time you will know all with certainty;
 time is the only test of honest men,
 680 one day is space enough to know a rogue.

CHORUS: His words are wise, king, if one fears to fall.

Those who are quick of temper are not safe.

OEDIPUS: When he that plots against me secretly moves quickly, I must quickly counterplot.

685 If I wait taking no decisive measure his business will be done, and mine be spoiled.

CREON: What do you want to do then? Banish me?

OEDIPUS: No, certainly; kill you, not banish you.⁷

CREON: I do not think that you've your wits about you.

OEDIPUS: For my own interests, yes.

690 CREON: But for mine, too, you should think equally.

OEDIPUS: You are a rogue.

CREON: Suppose you do not understand?

OEDIPUS: But yet

I must be ruler.

CREON: Not if you rule badly.

OEDIPUS: O, city, city!

695 CREON: I too have some share in the city; it is not yours alone.

CHORUS: Stop, my lords! Here—and in the nick of time

I see Jocasta coming from the house; with her help lay the quarrel that now stirs you.

[Enter JOCASTA.]

700 JOCASTA: For shame! Why have you raised this foolish squabbling brawl? Are you not ashamed to air your private

7. Translator's note: Two lines omitted here owing to the confusion in the dialogue consequent on the loss of a third line. The lines as they stand in Jebb's edition (1902) are: OED: That you may show what manner of thing is envy. / CREON: You speak as one that will not yield or trust. / [OED: lost line.] griefs when the country's sick? Go in, you, Oedipus, and you, too, Creon, into the house. Don't magnify your nothing troubles.

- CREON: Sister, Oedipus, your husband, thinks he has the right to do terrible wrongs—he has but to choose between two terrors: banishing or killing me. 705
- OEDIPUS: He's right, Jocasta; for I find him plotting with knavish tricks against my person.
- CREON: That God may never bless me! May I die accursed, if I have been guilty of 710 one tittle of the charge you bring against me!
- JOCASTA: I beg you, Oedipus, trust him in this, spare him for the sake of this his oath to God, for my sake, and the sake of those who stand here.
- CHORUS: Be gracious, be merciful, 715
we beg of you.
- OEDIPUS: In what would you have me yield?
- CHORUS: He has been no silly child in the past.
He is strong in his oath now.
Spare him. 720
- OEDIPUS: Do you know what you ask?
- CHORUS: Yes.
- OEDIPUS: Tell me then.
- CHORUS: He has been your friend before all men's eyes; do not cast him away dishonoured on an obscure conjecture. 725
- OEDIPUS: I would have you know that this request of yours really requests my death or banishment.
- CHORUS: May the Sun God,⁸ king of Gods, forbid! May I die without God's blessing, without friends' help, if I had any such thought. But my spirit is broken by my unhappiness for my wasting country; and this would but add 730 troubles amongst ourselves to the other troubles.
- OEDIPUS: Well, let him go then—if I must die ten times for it, or be sent out dishonoured into exile.
It is your lips that prayed for him I pitied, not his; wherever he is, I shall hate him. 735
- CREON: I see you sulk in yielding and you're dangerous when you are out of temper; natures like yours are justly heaviest for themselves to bear.
- OEDIPUS: Leave me alone! Take yourself off, I tell you.
- CREON: I'll go, you have not known me, but they have, 740 and they have known my innocence.

[Exit.]

8. Helios, closely associated with Apollo, the god of light.

CHORUS: Won't you take him inside, lady?

JOCASTA: Yes, when I've found out what was the matter.

CHORUS: There was some misconceived suspicion of a story, and on the other 745 side the sting of injustice.

JOCASTA: So, on both sides?

CHORUS: Yes.

JOCASTA: What was the story?

CHORUS: I think it best, in the interests of the country, to leave it where it ended.

750 OEDIPUS: You see where you have ended, straight of judgment although you are, by softening my anger.

CHORUS: Sir, I have said before and I say again—be sure that I would have been proved a madman, bankrupt in sane council, if I should put you away, you who steered the country I love safely when she was crazed with troubles.

755 God grant that now, too, you may prove a fortunate guide for us.

JOCASTA: Tell me, my lord, I beg of you, what was it that roused your anger so?

OEDIPUS: Yes, I will tell you.
I honour you more than I honour them.

It was Creon and the plots he laid against me.

760 JOCASTA: Tell me—if you can clearly tell the quarrel—

OEDIPUS: Creon says that I'm the murderer of Laius.

JOCASTA: Of his own knowledge or on information?

OEDIPUS: He sent this rascal prophet to me, since he keeps his own mouth clean of any guilt.

765 JOCASTA: Do not concern yourself about this matter; listen to me and learn that human beings have no part in the craft of prophecy.

Of that I'll show you a short proof.

There was an oracle once that came to Laius,—

770 I will not say that it was Phoebus' own, but it was from his servants—and it told him that it was fate that he should die a victim at the hands of his own son, a son to be born of Laius and me. But, see now, he,

775 the king, was killed by foreign highway robbers at a place where three roads meet—so goes the story; and for the son—before three days were out after his birth King Laius pierced his ankles and by the hands of others cast him forth

780 upon a pathless hillside. So Apollo failed to fulfill his oracle to the son, that he should kill his father, and to Laius also proved false in that the thing he feared, death at his son's hands, never came to pass.

785 So clear in this case were the oracles, so clear and false. Give them no heed, I say;

what God discovers need of, easily he shows to us himself.

OEDIPUS: O dear Jocasta,
as I hear this from you, there comes upon me a wandering of the soul—I could run mad. 790

JOCASTA: What trouble is it, that you turn again and speak like this?

OEDIPUS: I thought I heard you say that Laius was killed at a crossroads.

JOCASTA: Yes, that was how the story went and still that word goes round.

OEDIPUS: Where is this place, Jocasta, where he was murdered? 795

JOCASTA: Phocis is the country and the road splits there, one of two roads from Delphi, another comes from Daulia.

OEDIPUS: How long ago is this?

JOCASTA: The news came to the city just before you became king and all men's eyes looked to you. 800
What is it, Oedipus, that's in your mind?

OEDIPUS: What have you designed, O Zeus, to do with me?

JOCASTA: What is the thought that troubles your heart?

OEDIPUS: Don't ask me yet—tell me of Laius—
How did he look? How old or young was he? 805

JOCASTA: He was a tall man and his hair was grizzled already—nearly white—and in his form not unlike you.

OEDIPUS: O God, I think I have called curses on myself in ignorance.

JOCASTA: What do you mean? I am terrified when I look at you. 810

OEDIPUS: I have a deadly fear that the old seer had eyes. You'll show me more if you can tell me one more thing.

JOCASTA: I will.
I'm frightened,—but if I can understand,
I'll tell you all you ask.

OEDIPUS: How was his company?
Had he few with him when he went this journey, or many servants, as would suit a prince? 815

JOCASTA: In all there were but five, and among them a herald; and one carriage for the king.

OEDIPUS: It's plain—it's plain—who was it told you this? 820

JOCASTA: The only servant that escaped safe home.

OEDIPUS: Is he at home now?

JOCASTA: No, when he came home again and saw you king and Laius was dead, he came to me and touched my hand and begged

825 that I should send him to the fields to be my shepherd and so he might see the city as far off as he might. So I sent him away. He was an honest man, as slaves go, and was worthy of far more 830 than what he asked of me.

OEDIPUS: O, how I wish that he could come back quickly!

JOCASTA: He can. Why is your heart so set on this?

OEDIPUS: O dear Jocasta, I am full of fears that I have spoken far too much; and therefore I wish to see this shepherd.

835 JOCASTA: He will come;
 but, Oedipus, I think I'm worthy too to know what it is that disquiets you.

OEDIPUS: It shall not be kept from you, since my mind has gone so far with its forebodings. Whom 840 should I confide in rather than you, who is there of more importance to me who have passed through such a fortune?

Polybus was my father, king of Corinth, and Merope, the Dorian, my mother.
 845 I was held greatest of the citizens in Corinth till a curious chance befell me as I shall tell you—curious, indeed, but hardly worth the store I set upon it.

There was a dinner and at it a man,
 850 a drunken man, accused me in his drink of being bastard. I was furious but held my temper under for that day.
 Next day I went and taxed my parents with it;
 they took the insult very ill from him,
 855 the drunken fellow who had uttered it.

So I was comforted for their part, but still this thing rankled always, for the story crept about widely. And I went at last to Pytho, though my parents did not know.
 860 But Phoebus sent me home again unhonoured in what I came to learn, but he foretold other and desperate horrors to befall me, that I was fated to lie with my mother, and show to daylight an accursed breed 865 which men would not endure, and I was doomed to be murderer of the father that begot me.
 When I heard this I fled, and in the days that followed I would measure from the stars the whereabouts of Corinth—yes, I fled 870 to somewhere where I should not see fulfilled the infamies told in that dreadful oracle.

And as I journeyed I came to the place where, as you say, this king met with his death.

Jocasta, I will tell you the whole truth.

When I was near the branching of the crossroads, going on foot, I was encountered by 875

a herald and a carriage with a man in it, just as you tell me. He that led the way and the old man himself wanted to thrust me out of the road by force. I became angry and struck the coachman who was pushing me.

880

When the old man saw this he watched his moment, and as I passed he struck me from his carriage, full on the head with his two pointed goad.

But he was paid in full and presently my stick had struck him backwards from the car and he rolled out of it. And then I killed them all. If it happened there was any tie of kinship twixt this man and Laius, who is then now more miserable than I,

885

890

what man on earth so hated by the Gods, since neither citizen nor foreigner may welcome me at home or even greet me, but drive me out of doors? And it is I,

I and no other have so cursed myself.

895

And I pollute the bed of him I killed by the hands that killed him. Was I not born evil?

Am I not utterly unclean? I had to fly and in my banishment not even see my kindred nor set foot in my own country,

900 or otherwise my fate was to be yoked

in marriage with my mother and kill my father,

Polybus who begot me and had reared me.

Would not one rightly judge and say that on me these things were sent by some malignant God?

905

O no, no, no—O holy majesty of God on high, may I not see that day!

May I be gone out of men's sight before

I see the deadly taint of this disaster come upon me.

910

CHORUS: Sir, we too fear these things. But until you see this man face to face and hear his story, hope.

OEDIPUS: Yes, I have just this much of hope—to wait until the herdsman comes.

JOCASTA: And when he comes, what do you want with him?

OEDIPUS: I'll tell you; if I find that his story is the same as yours, I at least will be clear of this guilt.

JOCASTA: Why what so particularly did you learn from my story?

OEDIPUS: You said that he spoke of highway robbers who killed Laius. Now if he 920 uses the same number, it was not I who killed him. One man cannot be the same as many. But if he speaks of a man travelling alone, then clearly the burden of the guilt inclines towards me.

JOCASTA: Be sure, at least, that this was how he told the story. He cannot unsay it now, for everyone in the city heard it—not I alone. But, Oedipus, even if he 925 diverges from what he said then, he shall never prove that the murder of Laius squares rightly with the prophecy—for Loxias declared that the king should be killed by his own son. And that poor creature did not kill him surely,—for he died himself first. So as far as prophecy goes, henceforward
 I shall not look to the right hand or the left.

OEDIPUS: Right. But yet, send someone for the peasant to bring him here; do not 930 neglect it.

JOCASTA: I will send quickly. Now let me go indoors. I will do nothing except what pleases you.

[Exeunt.]

CHORUS: [Strophe.] May destiny ever find me pious in word and deed 935 prescribed by the laws that live on high:
 laws begotten in the clear air of heaven,
 whose only father is Olympus;
 no mortal nature brought them to birth,
 no forgetfulness shall lull them to sleep;
 940 for God is great in them and grows not old.

[Antistrophe.]

Insolence breeds the tyrant, insolence if it is glutted with a surfeit, unseasonable, unprofitable, climbs to the roof-top and plunges sheer down to the ruin that must be, 945 and there its feet are no service.
 But I pray that the God may never abolish the eager ambition that profits the state.
 For I shall never cease to hold the God as our protector.

[Strophe.]

If a man walks with haughtiness
 950 of hand or word and gives no heed to Justice and the shrines of Gods despises—may an evil doom smite him for his ill-starred pride of heart!—
 if he reaps gains without justice 955 and will not hold from impiety and his fingers itch for untouchable things.
 When such things are done, what man shall contrive to shield his soul from the shafts of the God?

When such deeds are held in honour, why should I honour the Gods in the dance? 960

[Antistrophe.]

No longer to the holy place, to the navel of earth I'll go to worship, nor to Abae nor to Olympia,⁹ unless the oracles are proved to fit, 965 for all men's hands to point at.
O Zeus, if you are rightly called the sovereign lord, all-mastering, let this not escape you nor your ever-living power!
The oracles concerning Laius 970 are old and dim and men regard them not.
Apollo is nowhere clear in honour; God's service perishes.

[Enter JOCASTA, carrying garlands.]

JOCASTA: Princes of the land, I have had the thought to go to the Gods' temples, bringing in my hand garlands and gifts of incense, as you see. 975
For Oedipus excites himself too much at every sort of trouble, not conjecturing, like a man of sense, what will be from what was,
but he is always at the speaker's mercy, when he speaks terrors. I can do no good 980 by my advice, and so I came as suppliant to you, Lycaean Apollo, who are nearest.
These are the symbols of my prayer and this my prayer: grant us escape free of the curse.
Now when we look to him we are all afraid; 985
he's pilot of our ship and he is frightened.

[Enter MESSENGER.]

MESSENGER: Might I learn from you, sirs, where is the house of Oedipus? Or best of all, if you know, where is the king himself?

CHORUS: This is his house and he is within doors. This lady is his wife and mother of his children. 990

MESSENGER: God bless you, lady, and God bless your household! God bless Oedipus' noble wife!

JOCASTA: God bless you, sir, for your kind greeting! What do you want of us that you have come here? What have you to tell us?

MESSENGER: Good news, lady. Good for your house and for your husband. 995

9. Mountain in Greece said to be the home of Zeus and the other principal gods. Abae: Site of one of Apollo's oracles.

JOCASTA: What is your news? Who sent you to us?

MESSENGER: I come from Corinth and the news I bring will give you pleasure.
Perhaps a little pain too.

JOCASTA: What is this news of double meaning?

1000 MESSENGER: The people of the Isthmus¹ will choose Oedipus to be their king.
That is the rumour there.

JOCASTA: But isn't their king still old Polybus?

MESSENGER: No. He is in his grave. Death has got him.

JOCASTA: Is that the truth? Is Oedipus' father dead?

1005 MESSENGER: May I die myself if it be otherwise!

JOCASTA: [To a SERVANT.] Be quick and run to the King with the news! O oracles of the Gods, where are you now? It was from this man Oedipus fled, lest he should be his murderer! And now he is dead, in the course of nature, and not killed by Oedipus.

[Enter OEDIPUS.]

1010 OEDIPUS: Dearest Jocasta, why have you sent for me?

JOCASTA: Listen to this man and when you hear reflect what is the outcome of the holy oracles of the Gods.

OEDIPUS: Who is he? What is his message for me?

JOCASTA: He is from Corinth and he tells us that your father Polybus is dead and 1015 gone.

OEDIPUS: What's this you say, sir? Tell me yourself.

MESSENGER: Since this is the first matter you want clearly told: Polybus has gone down to death. You may be sure of it.

OEDIPUS: By treachery or sickness?

1020 MESSENGER: A small thing will put old bodies asleep.

OEDIPUS: So he died of sickness, it seems,—poor old man!

MESSENGER: Yes, and of age—the long years he had measured.

OEDIPUS: Ha! Ha! O dear Jocasta, why should one 1025 look to the Pythian hearth?² Why should one look to the birds screaming overhead? They prophesied that I should kill my father! But he's dead, and hidden deep in earth, and I stand here who never laid a hand on spear against him,— unless perhaps he died of longing for me, 1030 and thus I am his murderer. But they, the oracles, as they stand—he's taken them away with him, they're dead as he himself is, and worthless.

JOCASTA: That I told you before now.

OEDIPUS: You did, but I was misled by my fear.

1035 JOCASTA: Then lay no more of them to heart, not one.

OEDIPUS: But surely I must fear my mother's bed?

JOCASTA: Why should man fear since chance is all in all

1. That is, Corinth, the city-state located on the isthmus connecting the Peloponnesian peninsula with mainland Greece. 2. Delphi.

for him, and he can clearly foreknow nothing?
 Best to live lightly, as one can, unthinkingly.
 As to your mother's marriage bed,—don't fear it. 1040
 Before this, in dreams too, as well as oracles, many a man has lain with his own mother.
 But he to whom such things are nothing bears his life most easily.

OEDIPUS: All that you say would be said perfectly 1045 if she were dead; but since she lives I must still fear, although you talk so well, Jocasta.

JOCASTA: Still in your father's death there's light of comfort?

OEDIPUS: Great light of comfort; but I fear the living.

MESSENGER: Who is the woman that makes you afraid? 1050

OEDIPUS: Merope, old man, Polybus' wife.

MESSENGER: What about her frightens the queen and you?

OEDIPUS: A terrible oracle, stranger, from the Gods.

MESSENGER: Can it be told? Or does the sacred law 1055 forbid another to have knowledge of it?

OEDIPUS: O no! Once on a time Loxias said that I should lie with my own mother and take on my hands the blood of my own father.
 And so for these long years I've lived away from Corinth; it has been to my great happiness; 1060 but yet it's sweet to see the face of parents.

MESSENGER: This was the fear which drove you out of Corinth?

OEDIPUS: Old man, I did not wish to kill my father.

MESSENGER: Why should I not free you from this fear, sir, since I have come to you in all goodwill? 1065

OEDIPUS: You would not find me thankless if you did.

MESSENGER: Why, it was just for this I brought the news,— to earn your thanks when you had come safe home.

OEDIPUS: No, I will never come near my parents.

MESSENGER: Son,
 it's very plain you don't know what you're doing. 1070

OEDIPUS: What do you mean, old man? For God's sake, tell me.

MESSENGER: If your homecoming is checked by fears like these.

OEDIPUS: Yes, I'm afraid that Phoebus may prove right.

MESSENGER: The murder and the incest?

OEDIPUS: Yes, old man;
 that is my constant terror.

MESSENGER: Do you know 1075 that all your fears are empty?

OEDIPUS: How is that, if they are father and mother and I their son?

MESSENGER: Because Polybus was no kin to you in blood.

OEDIPUS: What, was not Polybus my father?

MESSENGER: No more than I but just so much.

OEDIPUS: How can 1080

my father be my father as much as one that's nothing to me?

MESSENGER: Neither he nor I begat you.

OEDIPUS: Why then did he call me son?

MESSENGER: A gift he took you from these hands of mine.

1085 OEDIPUS: Did he love so much what he took from another's hand?

MESSENGER: His childlessness before persuaded him.

OEDIPUS: Was I a child you bought or found when I was given to him?

MESSENGER: On Cithaeron's slopes in the twisting thickets you were found.

OEDIPUS: And why were you a traveller in those parts?

1090 MESSENGER: I was in charge of mountain flocks.

OEDIPUS: You were a shepherd?
A hireling vagrant?

MESSENGER: Yes, but at least at that time the man that saved your life, son.

OEDIPUS: What ailed me when you took me in your arms?

1095 MESSENGER: In that your ankles should be witnesses.

OEDIPUS: Why do you speak of that old pain?

MESSENGER: I loosed you;
the tendons of your feet were pierced and fettered,—

OEDIPUS: My swaddling clothes brought me a rare disgrace.

MESSENGER: So that from this you're called your present name.³

1100 OEDIPUS: Was this my father's doing or my mother's?
For God's sake, tell me.

MESSENGER: I don't know, but he who gave you to me has more knowledge than I.

OEDIPUS: You yourself did not find me then? You took me from someone else?

MESSENGER: Yes, from another shepherd.

1105 OEDIPUS: Who was he? Do you know him well enough to tell?

MESSENGER: He was called Laius' man.

OEDIPUS: You mean the king who reigned here in the old days?

MESSENGER: Yes, he was that man's shepherd.

OEDIPUS: Is he alive still, so that I could see him?

MESSENGER: You who live here would know that best.

1110 OEDIPUS: Do any of you here know of this shepherd whom he speaks about

3. Oedipus means, literally, "swollen foot" (cf. lines 777–80).

in town or in the fields? Tell me. It's time that this was found out once for all.

CHORUS: I think he is none other than the peasant whom you have sought to see already; but Jocasta here can tell us best of that. 1115

OEDIPUS: Jocasta, do you know about this man whom we have sent for? Is he the man he mentions?

JOCASTA: Why ask of whom he spoke? Don't give it heed; nor try to keep in mind what has been said. 1120
It will be wasted labour.

OEDIPUS: With such clues
I could not fail to bring my birth to light.

JOCASTA: I beg you—do not hunt this out—I beg you, if you have any care for your own life.
What I am suffering is enough.

OEDIPUS: Keep up 1125 your heart, Jocasta. Though I'm proved a slave, thrice slave, and though my mother is thrice slave, you'll not be shown to be of lowly lineage.

JOCASTA: O be persuaded by me, I entreat you;
do not do this. 1130

OEDIPUS: I will not be persuaded to let be the chance of finding out the whole thing clearly.

JOCASTA: It is because I wish you well that I give you this counsel—and it's the best counsel.

OEDIPUS: Then the best counsel vexes me, and has for some while since. 1135

JOCASTA: O Oedipus, God help you!
God keep you from the knowledge of who you are!

OEDIPUS: Here, someone, go and fetch the shepherd for me;
and let her find her joy in her rich family!

JOCASTA: O Oedipus, unhappy Oedipus! 1140 that is all I can call you, and the last thing that I shall ever call you.

[Exit.]

CHORUS: Why has the queen gone, Oedipus, in wild grief rushing from us? I am afraid that trouble will break out of this silence. 1145

OEDIPUS: Break out what will! I at least shall be willing to see my ancestry, though humble.
Perhaps she is ashamed of my low birth,
for she has all a woman's high-flown pride.
But I account myself a child of Fortune, 1150 beneficent Fortune, and I shall not be dishonoured. She's the mother from whom I spring;
the months, my brothers, marked me, now as small,
and now again as mighty. Such is my breeding,

1155 and I shall never prove so false to it, as not to find the secret of my birth.
CHORUS: [Strophe.] If I am a prophet and wise of heart you shall not fail, Cithaeron, by the limitless sky, you shall not!— 1160 to know at tomorrow's full moon that Oedipus honours you,
as native to him and mother and nurse at once;
and that you are honoured in dancing by us, as finding favour in sight of our king.
Apollo, to whom we cry, find these things pleasing!

[Antistrophe.]

1165 Who was it bore you, child? One of the long-lived nymphs who lay with Pan⁴—the father who treads the hills?
Or was she a bride of Loxias, your mother? The grassy slopes are all of them dear to him. Or perhaps Cyllene's⁵ king 1170 or the Bacchants' God⁶ that lives on the tops of the hills received you a gift from some one of the Helicon Nymphs,⁷ with whom he mostly plays?

[Enter an OLD MAN, led by OEDIPUS' servants.]

OEDIPUS: If someone like myself who never met him may make a guess,—I think this is the herdsman, 1175 whom we were seeking. His old age is consonant with the other. And besides, the men who bring him
I recognize as my own servants. You perhaps may better me in knowledge since you've seen the man before.

CHORUS: You can be sure 1180 I recognize him. For if Laius had ever an honest shepherd, this was he.

OEDIPUS: You, sir, from Corinth, I must ask you first, is this the man you spoke of?

MESSENGER: This is he before your eyes.

OEDIPUS: Old man, look here at me
1185 and tell me what I ask you. Were you ever a servant of King Laius?

HERDSMAN: I was,— no slave he bought but reared in his own house.

OEDIPUS: What did you do as work? How did you live?

HERDSMAN: Most of my life was spent among the flocks.

4. God of nature; half man, half goat.

5. Mountain reputed to be the birthplace of Hermes, the messenger god. 6. Dionysus.

7. The Muses, nine sister goddesses who presided over poetry, music, and the arts.

- OEDIPUS: In what part of the country did you live? 1190 HERDSMAN: Cithaeron and the places near to it.
 OEDIPUS: And somewhere there perhaps you knew this man?
 HERDSMAN: What was his occupation? Who?
 OEDIPUS: This man here, have you had any dealings with him?
 HERDSMAN: No—
 not such that I can quickly call to mind. 1195 MESSENGER: That is no wonder, master. But I'll make him remember what he does not know. For I know, that he well knows the country of Cithaeron, how he with two flocks, I with one kept company for three years—each year half a year—from spring till autumn time and then when winter came I drove my flocks to our fold home again and he to Laius' steadings. Well—am I right or 1200 not in what I said we did?
 HERDSMAN: You're right—although it's a long time ago.
 MESSENGER: Do you remember giving me a child to bring up as my foster child?
 HERDSMAN: What's this?
 Why do you ask this question?
 MESSENGER: Look old man, 1205
 here he is—here's the man who was that child!
 HERDSMAN: Death take you! Won't you hold your tongue?
 OEDIPUS: No, no,
 do not find fault with him, old man. Your words are more at fault than his.
 HERDSMAN: O best of masters,
 how do I give offense?
 OEDIPUS: When you refuse 1210
 to speak about the child of whom he asks you.
 HERDSMAN: He speaks out of his ignorance, without meaning.
 OEDIPUS: If you'll not talk to gratify me, you will talk with pain to urge you.
 HERDSMAN: O please, sir,
 don't hurt an old man, sir.
 OEDIPUS: [To the SERVANTS.] Here, one of you, 1215 twist his hands behind him.
 HERDSMAN: Why, God help me, why?
 What do you want to know?
 OEDIPUS: You gave a child to him,—the child he asked you of?
 HERDSMAN: I did.
 I wish I'd died the day I did.
 OEDIPUS: You will unless you tell me truly.
 HERDSMAN: And I'll die 1220 far worse if I should tell you.
 OEDIPUS: This fellow is bent on more delays, as it would seem.

HERDSMAN: O no, no! I have told you that I gave it.

OEDIPUS: Where did you get this child from? Was it your own or did you get it from another?

1225 HERDSMAN: Not my own at all; I had it from someone.

OEDIPUS: One of these citizens? or from what house?

HERDSMAN: O master, please—I beg you, master, please don't ask me more.

OEDIPUS: You're a dead man if I ask you again.

1230 HERDSMAN: It was one of the children of Laius.

OEDIPUS: A slave? Or born in wedlock?

HERDSMAN: O God, I am on the brink of frightful speech.

OEDIPUS: And I of frightful hearing. But I must hear.

HERDSMAN: The child was called his child; but she within,
1235 your wife would tell you best how all this was.

OEDIPUS: She gave it to you?

HERDSMAN: Yes, she did, my lord.

OEDIPUS: To do what with it?

HERDSMAN: Make away with it.

OEDIPUS: She was so hard—its mother?

HERDSMAN: Aye, through fear of evil oracles.

OEDIPUS: Which?

HERDSMAN: They said that he should kill his parents.

1240 OEDIPUS: How was it that you gave it away to this old man?

HERDSMAN: O master,
I pitied it, and thought that I could send it off to another country and this man was from another country. But he saved it 1245 for the most terrible troubles. If you are the man he says you are, you're bred to misery.

OEDIPUS: O, O, O, they will all come, all come out clearly! Light of the sun, let me look upon you no more after today!

1250 I who first saw the light bred of a match accursed, and accursed in my living with them I lived with, cursed in my killing.

[Exeunt all but the CHORUS.]

CHORUS: [Strophe.] O generations of men, how I count you as equal with those who live 1255 not at all!

What man, what man on earth wins more of happiness than a seeming and after that turning away?
Oedipus, you are my pattern of this,

Oedipus, you and your fate! 1260
 Luckless Oedipus, whom of all men
 I envy not at all.

[Antistrophe.]

In as much as he shot his bolt beyond the others and won the prize of happiness complete— 1265
 O Zeus—and killed and reduced to nought the hooked taloned maid of the riddling speech,⁸ standing a tower against death for my land:
 hence he was called my king and hence was honoured the highest of all 1270 honours; and hence he ruled in the great city of Thebes.

[Strophe.]

But now whose tale is more miserable?
 Who is there lives with a savager fate?
 Whose troubles so reverse his life as his? 1275

O Oedipus, the famous prince for whom a great haven
 the same both as father and son sufficed for generation, how, O how, have the furrows ploughed 1280
 by your father endured to bear you, poor wretch, and hold their peace so long?

[Antistrophe.]

Time who sees all has found you out against your will; judges your marriage accursed, begetter and begot at one in it. 1285

O child of Laius, would I had never seen you.
 I weep for you and cry
 a dirge of lamentation.

To speak directly, I drew my breath 1290 from you at the first and so now I lull my mouth to sleep with your name.

[Enter a SECOND MESSENGER.]

SECOND MESSENGER: O Princes always honoured by our country, what deeds you'll hear of and what horrors see, what grief you'll feel, if you as true born Thebans 1295

8. The Sphinx, who killed herself when Oedipus was the first to give a correct answer to her riddle: "What walks on four feet in the morning, on two at noon, and on three in the evening?" (cf. line 41n.).

care for the house of Labdacus' sons.⁹
 Phasis nor Ister¹ cannot purge this house,
 I think, with all their streams, such things it hides, such evils shortly will bring forth 1300 into the light, whether they will or not;
 and troubles hurt the most when they prove self-inflicted.

CHORUS: What we had known before did not fall short of bitter groaning's worth; what's more to tell?

1305 SECOND MESSENGER: Shortest to hear and tell—our glorious queen Jocasta's dead.

CHORUS: Unhappy woman! How?

SECOND MESSENGER: By her own hand. The worst of what was done you cannot know. You did not see the sight.

Yet in so far as I remember it 1310 you'll hear the end of our unlucky queen.
 When she came raging into the house she went straight to her marriage bed, tearing her hair with both her hands, and crying upon Laius long dead—Do you remember, Laius, 1315 that night long past which bred a child for us to send you to your death and leave a mother making children with her son?
 And then she groaned and cursed the bed in which she brought forth husband by her husband, children 1320 by her own child, an infamous double bond.
 How after that she died I do not know,— for Oedipus distracted us from seeing.
 He burst upon us shouting and we looked to him as he paced frantically around, 1325 begging us always: Give me a sword, I say, to find this wife no wife, this mother's womb, this field of double sowing whence I sprang and where I sowed my children! As he raved some god showed him the way—none of us there.
 1330 Bellowing terribly and led by some invisible guide he rushed on the two doors,— wrenching the hollow bolts out of their sockets, he charged inside. There, there, we saw his wife hanging, the twisted rope around her neck.
 1335 When he saw her, he cried out fearfully and cut the dangling noose. Then, as she lay, poor woman, on the ground, what happened after, was terrible to see. He tore the brooches—the gold chased² brooches fastening her robe—

9. Labdacus, king of Thebes, was father of Laius and grandfather of Oedipus. 1. Phasis and Ister are rivers near Thebes. 2. Decorated with ornamental indentations.

away from her and lifting them up high 1340 dashed them on his own eyeballs, shrieking out such things as: they will never see the crime
 I have committed or had done upon me!
 Dark eyes, now in the days to come look on forbidden faces, do not recognize 1345 those whom you long for—with such imprecations he struck his eyes again and yet again with the brooches. And the bleeding eyeballs gushed and stained his beard—no sluggish oozing drops but a black rain and bloody hail poured down. 1350
 So it has broken—and not on one head but troubles mixed for husband and for wife.
 The fortune of the days gone by was true good fortune—but today groans and destruction and death and shame—of all ills can be named 1355 not one is missing.

CHORUS: Is he now in any ease from pain?

SECOND MESSENGER: He shouts for someone to unbar the doors and show him to all the men of Thebes, his father's killer, his mother's—no I cannot say the word, 1360
 it is unholy—for he'll cast himself, out of the land, he says, and not remain to bring a curse upon his house, the curse he called upon it in his proclamation. But he wants for strength, aye, and someone to guide him; 1365 his sickness is too great to bear. You, too, will be shown that. The bolts are opening.
 Soon you will see a sight to waken pity even in the horror of it.

[Enter the blinded OEDIPUS.]

CHORUS: This is a terrible sight for men to see! 1370
 I never found a worse!
 Poor wretch, what madness came upon you!
 What evil spirit leaped upon your life to your ill-luck—a leap beyond man's strength!
 Indeed I pity you, but I cannot 1375 look at you, though there's much I want to ask and much to learn and much to see.
 I shudder at the sight of you.

OEDIPUS: O, O,
 where am I going? Where is my voice 1380
 borne on the wind to and fro?
 Spirit, how far have you sprung?

CHORUS: To a terrible place whereof men's ears may not hear, nor their eyes behold it.

1385 OEDIPUS: Darkness!

Horror of darkness enfolding, resistless, unspeakable visitant sped by an ill wind in haste!

Madness and stabbing pain and memory of evil deeds I have done!

1390 CHORUS: In such misfortunes it's no wonder if double weighs the burden of your grief.

OEDIPUS: My friend,

you are the only one steadfast, the only one that attends on me;
you still stay nursing the blind man.

1395 Your care is not unnoticed. I can know your voice, although this darkness is my world.

CHORUS: Doer of dreadful deeds, how did you dare so far to do despite to your own eyes?
what spirit urged you to it?

1400 OEDIPUS: It was Apollo, friends, Apollo, that brought this bitter bitterness, my sorrows to completion.
But the hand that struck me was none but my own.

Why should I see whose vision showed me nothing sweet to see?

1405 CHORUS: These things are as you say.

OEDIPUS: What can I see to love?

What greeting can touch my ears with joy?
Take me away, and haste—to a place out of the way!
Take me away, my friends, the greatly miserable, 1410 the most accursed, whom God too hates above all men on earth!

CHORUS: Unhappy in your mind and your misfortune, would I had never known you!

1415 OEDIPUS: Curse on the man who took the cruel bonds from off my legs, as I lay in the field.
He stole me from death and saved me,
no kindly service.

Had I died then
I would not be so burdensome to friends.

1420 CHORUS: I, too, could have wished it had been so.

OEDIPUS: Then I would not have come to kill my father and marry my mother infamously.
Now I am godless and child of impurity, begetter in the same seed that created my wretched self.
1425 If there is any ill worse than ill, that is the lot of Oedipus.

CHORUS: I cannot say your remedy was good;
you would be better dead than blind and living.

1430 OEDIPUS: What I have done here was best done—don't tell me otherwise, do not give me further counsel.
I do not know with what eyes I could look upon my father when I die and go under the earth, nor yet my wretched mother—those two to whom I have done things deserving worse punishment than hanging. Would the sight of children, bred as mine are, gladden me? 1435

No, not these eyes, never. And my city, its towers and sacred places of the Gods, of these I robbed my miserable self when I commanded all to drive him out, 1440 the criminal since proved by God impure and of the race of Laius.

To this guilt I bore witness against myself—with what eyes shall I look upon my people?
 No. If there were a means to choke the fountain of hearing I would not have stayed my hand 1445 from locking up my miserable carcase, seeing and hearing nothing; it is sweet to keep our thoughts out of the range of hurt.

Cithaeron, why did you receive me? why having received me did you not kill me straight?
 And so I had not shown to men my birth. 1450

O Polybus and Corinth and the house, the old house that I used to call my father's—what fairness you were nurse to, and what foulness 1455 festered beneath! Now I am found to be a sinner and a son of sinners. Crossroads, and hidden glade, oak and the narrow way at the crossroads, that drank my father's blood offered you by my hands, do you remember 1460 still what I did as you looked on, and what I did when I came here? O marriage, marriage!
 you bred me and again when you had bred bred children of your child and showed to men brides, wives and mothers and the foulest deeds 1465 that can be in this world of ours.

Come—it's unfit to say what is unfit to do.—I beg of you in God's name hide me somewhere outside your country, yes, or kill me, or throw me into the sea, to be forever 1470 out of your sight. Approach and deign to touch me for all my wretchedness, and do not fear.
 No man but I can bear my evil doom.

CHORUS: Here Creon comes in fit time to perform or give advice in what you ask of us. 1475

Creon is left sole ruler in your stead.

OEDIPUS: Creon! Creon! What shall I say to him?

How can I justly hope that he will trust me?
 In what is past I have been proved towards him an utter liar.

[Enter CREON.]

1480 CREON: Oedipus, I've come not so that I might laugh at you nor taunt you with evil of the past. But if you still are without shame before the face of men reverence at least the flame that gives all life, 1485 our Lord the Sun, and do not show unveiled to him pollution such that neither land nor holy rain nor light of day can welcome.

[To a SERVANT.]

Be quick and take him in. It is most decent that only kin should see and hear the troubles of kin.

1490 OEDIPUS: I beg you, since you've torn me from my dreadful expectations and have come in a most noble spirit to a man that has used you vilely—do a thing for me.
 I shall speak for your own good, not for my own.

1495 CREON: What do you need that you would ask of me?

OEDIPUS: Drive me from here with all the speed you can to where I may not hear a human voice.

CREON: Be sure, I would have done this had not I wished first of all to learn from the God the course of action I should follow.

1500 OEDIPUS: But his word has been quite clear to let the parricide, the sinner, die.

CREON: Yes, that indeed was said.
 But in the present need we had best discover what we should do.

OEDIPUS: And will you ask about a man so wretched?

1505 CREON: Now even you will trust
 the God.

OEDIPUS: So. I command you—and will beseech you—to her that lies inside that house give burial as you would have it; she is yours and rightly you will perform the rites for her. For me—1510 never let this my father's city have me living a dweller in it. Leave me live in the mountains where Cithaeron is, that's called my mountain, which my mother and my father while they were living would have made my tomb.

So I may die by their decree who sought indeed to kill me. Yet I know this much: 1515 no sickness and no other thing will kill me.
I would not have been saved from death if not for some strange evil fate. Well, let my fate go where it will.

Creon, you need not care 1520 about my sons; they're men and so wherever they are, they will not lack a livelihood.
But my two girls—so sad and pitiful—whose table never stood apart from mine, and everything I touched they always shared— 1525
O Creon, have a thought for them! And most I wish that you might suffer me to touch them and sorrow with them.

[Enter ANTIGONE and ISMENE, OEDIPUS' two daughters.]

O my lord! O true noble Creon! Can I really be touching them, as when I saw? 1530
What shall I say?

Yes, I can hear them sobbing—my two darlings!
and Creon has had pity and has sent me what I loved most?

Am I right? 1535

CREON: You're right: it was I gave you this because I knew from old days how you loved them as I see now.

OEDIPUS: God bless you for it, Creon, and may God guard you better on your road than he did me!

O children, 1540
where are you? Come here, come to my hands, a brother's hands which turned your father's eyes, those bright eyes you knew once, to what you see,
a father seeing nothing, knowing nothing, begetting you from his own source of life. 1545

I weep for you—I cannot see your faces—
I weep when I think of the bitterness there will be in your lives, how you must live before the world. At what assemblages of citizens will you make one? to what 1550 gay company will you go and not come home in tears instead of sharing in the holiday?

And when you're ripe for marriage, who will he be,
the man who'll risk to take such infamy as shall cling to my children, to bring hurt 1555 on them and those that marry with them? What curse is not there? "Your father killed his father and sowed the seed where he had sprung himself and begot you out of the womb that held him.”

1560 These insults you will hear. Then who will marry you?

No one, my children; clearly you are doomed to waste away in barrenness unmarried.

1565 Son of Menoeceus,³ since you are all the father left these two girls, and we, their parents, both are dead to them—do not allow them wander like beggars, poor and husbandless.

They are of your own blood.

1570 And do not make them equal with myself in wretchedness; for you can see them now so young, so utterly alone, save for you only.
Touch my hand, noble Creon, and say yes.

1575 If you were older, children, and were wiser, there's much advice I'd give you. But as it is, let this be what you pray: give me a life wherever there is opportunity to live, and better life than was my father's.

CREON: Your tears have had enough of scope; now go within the house.

OEDIPUS: I must obey, though bitter of heart.

CREON: In season, all is good.

OEDIPUS: Do you know on what conditions I obey?

1580 CREON: You tell me them, and I shall know them when I hear.

OEDIPUS: That you shall send me out to live away from Thebes.

CREON: That gift you must ask of the Gods.

OEDIPUS: But I'm now hated by the Gods.

CREON: So quickly you'll obtain your prayer.

OEDIPUS: You consent then?

CREON: What I do not mean, I do not use to say.

OEDIPUS: Now lead me away from here.

1585 CREON: Let go the children, then, and come.

OEDIPUS: Do not take them from me.

CREON: Do not seek to be master in everything, for the things you mastered did not follow you throughout your life.

[As CREON and OEDIPUS go out.]

1590 CHORUS: You that live in my ancestral Thebes, behold this Oedipus,— him who knew the famous riddles and was a man most masterful; not a citizen who did not look with envy on his lot—see him now and see the breakers of misfortune swallow him!
Look upon that last day always. Count no mortal happy till he has passed the final limit of his life secure from pain.

TENNESSEE WILLIAMS

(1911–83)

A Streetcar Named Desire

Born in Columbus, Mississippi, Thomas Lanier Williams moved to St. Louis with his family at the age of seven. Williams's father was a violent alcoholic; his mother was ill; and his sister, Rose, suffered from a variety of mental illnesses: Each family member became a model for the domineering men and sensitive women of his plays. He attended the University of Missouri and Washington University in St. Louis, but earned his BA from the University of Iowa. While there, Williams won prizes for his fiction and began to write plays. His extensive body of work, with its explosive dramatic tension and dazzling dialogue, confronts issues of adultery, homosexuality, incest, and mental illness. In 1944, The Glass Menagerie won the New York Drama Critics' Circle Award. In 1948, Williams earned his first Pulitzer Prize, for A Streetcar Named Desire; in 1955, he won a second Pulitzer for Cat on a Hot Tin Roof. His other dramas include Suddenly Last Summer (1958) and The Night of the Iguana (1961). Williams also published short fiction, poetry, and a film script.

*And so it was I entered the broken world
To trace the visionary company of love, its voice
An instant in the wind (I know not whither hurled)
But not for long to hold each desperate choice.*

CHARACTERS

BLANCHE	EUNICE	A DOCTOR
STELLA	STEVE	A NURSE (MATRON)
STANLEY	PABLO	A YOUNG COLLECTOR
MITCH	A NEGRO WOMAN	A MEXICAN WOMAN

Scene 1

The exterior of a two-story corner building on a street in New Orleans which is named Elysian Fields and runs between the L & N tracks and the river.² The section is poor but, unlike corresponding sections in other American cities, it has a raffish charm. The houses are mostly white frame, weathered grey, with rickety outside stairs and galleries and quaintly ornamented gables. This building contains two flats, upstairs and down. Faded white stairs ascend to the entrances of both.

1. American poet (1899–1932).

2. Elysian Fields is in fact a New Orleans street at the northern tip of the French Quarter, between the Louisville & Nashville railroad tracks and the Mississippi River. In Greek mythology, the Elysian Fields are the abode of the blessed in the afterlife; in Paris, the Champs-Élysées (“Elysian Fields”) is a grand boulevard.

It is first dark of an evening early in May. The sky that shows around the dim white building is a peculiarly tender blue, almost a turquoise, which invests the scene with a kind of lyricism and gracefully attenuates the atmosphere of decay. You can almost feel the warm breath of the brown river beyond the river warehouses with their faint redolences of bananas and coffee. A corresponding air is evoked by the music of Negro entertainers at a barroom around the corner. In this part of New Orleans you are practically always just around the corner, or a few doors down the street, from a tinny piano being played with the infatuated fluency of brown fingers. This "Blue Piano" expresses the spirit of the life which goes on here.

Two women, one white and one colored, are taking the air on the steps of the building. The white woman is EUNICE, who occupies the upstairs flat; the NEGRO WOMAN, a neighbor, for New Orleans is a cosmopolitan city where there is a relatively warm and easy intermingling of races in the old part of town.

Above the music of the "Blue Piano" the voices of people on the street can be heard overlapping.

[Two men come around the corner, STANLEY KOWALSKI and MITCH. They are about twenty-eight, or thirty years old, roughly dressed in blue denim work clothes. STANLEY carries his bowling jacket and a red-stained package from a butcher's. They stop at the foot of the steps.]

STANLEY: [Bellowing.] Hey there! Stella, baby!

[STELLA comes out on the first floor landing, a gentle young woman, about twenty-five, and of a background obviously quite different from her husband's.]

STELLA: [Mildly.] Don't holler at me like that. Hi, Mitch.

STANLEY: Catch!

STELLA: What?

STANLEY: Meat!

[He heaves the package at her. She cries out in protest but manages to catch it: then she laughs breathlessly. Her husband and his companion have already started back around the corner.]

STELLA: [Calling after him.] Stanley! Where are you going?

STANLEY: Bowling!

STELLA: Can I come watch?

STANLEY: Come on. [He goes out.]

STELLA: Be over soon. [To the WHITE WOMAN.] Hello, Eunice. How are you?

EUNICE: I'm all right. Tell Steve to get him a poor boy's sandwich³ 'cause nothing's left here.

[They all laugh; the NEGRO WOMAN does not stop. STELLA goes out.]

NEGRO WOMAN: What was that package he th'ew at 'er? [She rises from steps, laughing louder.]

EUNICE: You hush, now!

NEGRO WOMAN: Catch what!

[She continues to laugh. BLANCHE comes around the corner, carrying a valise. She looks at a slip of paper, then at the building, then again at the slip and again at the building. Her expression is one of shocked disbelief. Her appearance is incongruous to this setting. She is daintily dressed in a white suit with a fluffy bodice, necklace and earrings of pearl, white gloves and hat, looking as if she were arriving at a summer tea or cocktail party in the garden district.⁴ She is about five years older than STELLA. Her delicate beauty must avoid a strong light. There is something about her uncertain manner, as well as her white clothes, that suggests a moth.]

EUNICE: [Finally.] What's the matter, honey? Are you lost?

BLANCHE: [With faintly hysterical humor.] They told me to take a street-car named Desire, and then transfer to one called Cemeteries⁵ and ride six blocks and get off at—Elysian Fields!

EUNICE: That's where you are now.

BLANCHE: At Elysian Fields?

EUNICE: This here is Elysian Fields.

BLANCHE: They mustn't have—understood—what number I wanted. . . .

EUNICE: What number you lookin' for?

[BLANCHE wearily refers to the slip of paper.]

BLANCHE: Six thirty-two.

EUNICE: You don't have to look no further.

BLANCHE: [Uncomprehendingly.] I'm looking for my sister, Stella DuBois, I mean—Mrs. Stanley Kowalski.

EUNICE: That's the party.—You just did miss her, though.

BLANCHE: This—can this be—her home?

EUNICE: She's got the downstairs here and I got the up.

BLANCHE: Oh. She's—out?

EUNICE: You noticed that bowling alley around the corner?

BLANCHE: I'm—not sure I did.

EUNICE: Well, that's where she's at, watchin' her husband bowl. [There is a pause.]

You want to leave your suitcase here an' go find her?

3. Usually called just "poor boy" or "po' boy"; similar to a hero or submarine sandwich.

4. Wealthy, fashionable section of New Orleans.

5. End of a streetcar line that stopped at a cemetery. Desire: street in New Orleans.

BLANCHE: No.

NEGRO WOMAN: I'll go tell her you come.

BLANCHE: Thanks.

NEGRO WOMAN: You welcome. [She goes out.]

EUNICE: She wasn't expecting you?

BLANCHE: No. No, not tonight.

EUNICE: Well, why don't you just go in and make yourself at home till they get back.

BLANCHE: How could I—do that?

EUNICE: We own this place so I can let you in.

[She gets up and opens the downstairs door. A light goes on behind the blind, turning it light blue. BLANCHE slowly follows her into the downstairs flat. The surrounding areas dim out as the interior is lighted. Two rooms can be seen, not too clearly defined. The one first entered is primarily a kitchen but contains a folding bed to be used by BLANCHE. The room beyond this is a bedroom. Off this room is a narrow door to a bathroom.]

EUNICE: [Defensively, noticing BLANCHE's look.] It's sort of messed up right now but when it's clean it's real sweet.

BLANCHE: Is it?

EUNICE: Uh-huh, I think so. So you're Stella's sister?

BLANCHE: Yes. [Wanting to get rid of her.] Thanks for letting me in.

EUNICE: Por nada, as the Mexicans say, *por nada!*⁶ Stella spoke of you.

BLANCHE: Yes?

EUNICE: I think she said you taught school.

BLANCHE: Yes.

EUNICE: And you're from Mississippi, huh?

BLANCHE: Yes.

EUNICE: She showed me a picture of your home-place, the plantation.

BLANCHE: Belle Reve?⁷

EUNICE: A great big place with white columns.

BLANCHE: Yes . . .

EUNICE: A place like that must be awful hard to keep up.

BLANCHE: If you will excuse me, I'm just about to drop.

EUNICE: Sure, honey. Why don't you set down?

BLANCHE: What I meant was I'd like to be left alone.

EUNICE: [Offended.] Aw. I'll make myself scarce, in that case.

BLANCHE: I didn't mean to be rude, but—

EUNICE: I'll drop by the bowling alley an' hustle her up. [She goes out the door.]

[BLANCHE sits in a chair very stiffly with her shoulders slightly hunched and her legs pressed close together and her hands tightly clutching her purse as if she were quite cold. After a while the blind look goes out of her eyes and she begins to look slowly around. A cat screeches. She catches her breath with a startled gesture. Suddenly she notices something in a half opened closet. She springs up and crosses to it, and removes a whiskey bottle. She pours a half tumbler of whiskey and tosses it down. She carefully replaces the bottle and washes out the tumbler at the sink. Then she resumes her seat in front of the table.]

BLANCHE: [Faintly to herself.] I've got to keep hold of myself!

[STELLA comes quickly around the corner of the building and runs to the door of the downstairs flat.]

STELLA: [Calling out joyfully.] Blanche!

[For a moment they stare at each other. Then BLANCHE springs up and runs to her with a wild cry.]

BLANCHE: Stella, oh, Stella, Stella! Stella for Star!⁸ [She begins to speak with feverish vivacity as if she feared for either of them to stop and think. They catch each other in a spasmodic embrace.] Now, then, let me look at you. But don't you look at me, Stella, no, no, no, not till later, not till I've bathed and rested! And turn that over-light off! Turn that off! I won't be looked at in this merciless glare! [STELLA laughs and complies.] Come back here now! Oh, my baby! Stella! Stella for Star! [She embraces her again.] I thought you would never come back to this horrible place! What am I saying? I didn't mean to say that. I meant to be nice about it and say—Oh, what a convenient location and such—Ha-a-ha! Precious lamb! You haven't said a word to me.

STELLA: You haven't given me a chance to, honey! [She laughs, but her glance at BLANCHE is a little anxious.]

BLANCHE: Well, now you talk. Open your pretty mouth and talk while I look around for some liquor! I know you must have some liquor on the place! Where could it be, I wonder? Oh, I spy, I spy! [She rushes to the closet and removes the bottle; she is shaking all over and panting for breath as she tries to laugh. The bottle nearly slips from her grasp.]

STELLA: [Noticing.] Blanche, you sit down and let me pour the drinks. I don't know what we've got to mix with. Maybe a Coke in the icebox. Look'n see, honey, while I'm—

BLANCHE: No Coke, honey, not with my nerves tonight! Where—where—where is—?

STELLA: Stanley? Bowling! He loves it. They're having a—found some soda!—tournament. . . .

BLANCHE: Just water, baby, to chase it! Now don't get worried, your sister hasn't turned into a drunkard, she's just all shaken up and hot and tired and dirty! You sit down, now, and explain this place to me! What are you doing in a place like this?

STELLA: Now, Blanche—

BLANCHE: Oh, I'm not going to be hypocritical, I'm going to be honestly critical about it! Never, never, never in my worst dreams could I picture—Only Poe! Only Mr. Edgar Allan Poe!—could do it justice! Out there I suppose is the ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir!⁹ [She laughs.]

STELLA: No, honey, those are the L & N tracks.

8. Stella is "star" in Latin.

9. From the refrain of Poe's Gothic ballad "Ulalume" (1847).

BLANCHE: No, now seriously, putting joking aside. Why didn't you tell me, why didn't you write me, honey, why didn't you let me know?

STELLA: [Carefully, pouring herself a drink.] Tell you what, Blanche?

BLANCHE: Why, that you had to live in these conditions!

STELLA: Aren't you being a little intense about it? It's not that bad at all! New Orleans isn't like other cities.

BLANCHE: This has got nothing to do with New Orleans. You might as well say—forgive me, blessed baby! [She suddenly stops short.] The subject is closed!

STELLA: [A little drily.] Thanks.

[During the pause, BLANCHE stares at her. She smiles at BLANCHE.] BLANCHE: [Looking down at her glass, which shakes in her hand.] You're all I've got in the world, and you're not glad to see me!

STELLA: [Sincerely.] Why, Blanche, you know that's not true.

BLANCHE: No?—I'd forgotten how quiet you were.

STELLA: You never did give me a chance to say much, Blanche. So I just got in the habit of being quiet around you.

BLANCHE: [Vaguely.] A good habit to get into . . . [Then, abruptly.] You haven't asked me how I happened to get away from the school before the spring term ended.

STELLA: Well, I thought you'd volunteer that information—if you wanted to tell me.

BLANCHE: You thought I'd been fired?

STELLA: No, I—thought you might have—resigned. . . .

BLANCHE: I was so exhausted by all I'd been through my—nerves broke. [Nervously tamping cigarette.] I was on the verge of—lunacy, almost! So Mr. Graves—Mr. Graves is the high school superintendent—he suggested I take a leave of absence. I couldn't put all of those details into the wire.¹ . . . [She drinks quickly.] Oh, this buzzes right through me and feels so good!

STELLA: Won't you have another?

BLANCHE: No, one's my limit.

STELLA: Sure?

BLANCHE: You haven't said a word about my appearance.

STELLA: You look just fine.

BLANCHE: God love you for a liar! Daylight never exposed so total a ruin! But you—you've put on some weight, yes, you're just as plump as a little partridge! And it's so becoming to you!

STELLA: Now, Blanche—

BLANCHE: Yes, it is, it is or I wouldn't say it! You just have to watch around the hips a little. Stand up.

STELLA: Not now.

BLANCHE: You hear me? I said stand up! [STELLA complies reluctantly.] You messy child, you, you've spilt something on that pretty white lace collar! About your hair—you ought to have it cut in a feather bob with your dainty features. Stella, you have a maid, don't you?

1. Telegram.

STELLA: No. With only two rooms it's—

BLANCHE: What? Two rooms, did you say?

STELLA: This one and— [She is embarrassed.]

BLANCHE: The other one? [She laughs sharply. There is an embarrassed silence.] I am going to take just one little tiny nip more, sort of to put the stopper on, so to speak. . . . Then put the bottle away so I won't be tempted. [She rises.] I want you to look at my figure! [She turns around.] You know I haven't put on one ounce in ten years, Stella? I weigh what I weighed the summer you left Belle Reve. The summer Dad died and you left us. . . .

STELLA: [A little wearily.] It's just incredible, Blanche, how well you're looking.

BLANCHE: [They both laugh uncomfortably.] But, Stella, there's only two rooms, I don't see where you're going to put me!

STELLA: We're going to put you in here.

BLANCHE: What kind of bed's this—one of those collapsible things? [She sits on it.]

STELLA: Does it feel all right?

BLANCHE: [Dubiously.] Wonderful, honey. I don't like a bed that gives much. But there's no door between the two rooms, and Stanley—will it be decent?

STELLA: Stanley is Polish, you know.

BLANCHE: Oh, yes. They're something like Irish, aren't they?

STELLA: Well—

BLANCHE: Only not so—highbrow? [They both laugh again in the same way.] I brought some nice clothes to meet all your lovely friends in.

STELLA: I'm afraid you won't think they are lovely.

BLANCHE: What are they like?

STELLA: They're Stanley's friends.

BLANCHE: Polacks?

STELLA: They're a mixed lot, Blanche.

BLANCHE: Heterogeneous—types?

STELLA: Oh, yes. Yes, types is right!

BLANCHE: Well—anyhow—I brought nice clothes and I'll wear them. I guess you're hoping I'll say I'll put up at a hotel, but I'm not going to put up at a hotel. I want to be near you, got to be with somebody, I can't be alone! Because—as you must have noticed—I'm—not very well. . . . [Her voice drops and her look is frightened.]

STELLA: You seem a little bit nervous or overwrought or something.

BLANCHE: Will Stanley like me, or will I be just a visiting in-law, Stella? I couldn't stand that.

STELLA: You'll get along fine together, if you'll just try not to—well—compare him with men that we went out with at home.

BLANCHE: Is he so—different?

STELLA: Yes. A different species.

BLANCHE: In what way; what's he like?

STELLA: Oh, you can't describe someone you're in love with! Here's a picture of him! [She hands a photograph to BLANCHE.] BLANCHE: An officer?

STELLA: A Master Sergeant in the Engineers' Corps. Those are decorations!

BLANCHE: He had those on when you met him?

STELLA: I assure you I wasn't just blinded by all the brass.

BLANCHE: That's not what I—

STELLA: But of course there were things to adjust myself to later on.

BLANCHE: Such as his civilian background! [STELLA laughs uncertainly.] How did he take it when you said I was coming?

STELLA: Oh, Stanley doesn't know yet.

BLANCHE: [Frightened.] You—haven't told him?

STELLA: He's on the road a good deal.

BLANCHE: Oh. Travels?

STELLA: Yes.

BLANCHE: Good. I mean—isn't it?

STELLA: [Half to herself.] I can hardly stand it when he is away for a night . . .

BLANCHE: Why, Stella!

STELLA: When he's away for a week I nearly go wild!

BLANCHE: Gracious!

STELLA: And when he comes back I cry on his lap like a baby. . . . [She smiles to herself.]

BLANCHE: I guess that is what is meant by being in love. . . . [STELLA looks up with a radiant smile.] Stella—

STELLA: What?

BLANCHE: [In an uneasy rush.] I haven't asked you the things you probably thought I was going to ask. And so I'll expect you to be understanding about what I have to tell you.

STELLA: What, Blanche? [Her face turns anxious.]

BLANCHE: Well, Stella—you're going to reproach me, I know that you're bound to reproach me—but before you do—take into consideration—you left! I stayed and struggled! You came to New Orleans and looked out for yourself! I stayed at Belle Reve and tried to hold it together! I'm not meaning this in any reproachful way, but all the burden descended on my shoulders.

STELLA: The best I could do was make my own living, Blanche.

[BLANCHE begins to shake again with intensity.]

BLANCHE: I know, I know. But you are the one that abandoned Belle Reve, not I! I stayed and fought for it, bled for it, almost died for it!

STELLA: Stop this hysterical outburst and tell me what's happened? What do you mean fought and bled? What kind of—BLANCHE: I knew you would, Stella. I knew you would take this attitude about it!

STELLA: About—what?—please!

BLANCHE: [Slowly.] The loss—the loss . . .

STELLA: Belle Reve? Lost, is it? No!

BLANCHE: Yes, Stella.

[They stare at each other across the yellow-checked linoleum of the table. BLANCHE slowly nods her head and STELLA looks slowly down at her hands folded on the table. The music of the "Blue Piano" grows louder. BLANCHE touches her handkerchief to her forehead.]

STELLA: But how did it go? What happened?

BLANCHE: [Springing up.] You're a fine one to ask me how it went!

STELLA: Blanche!

BLANCHE: You're a fine one to sit there accusing me of it!

STELLA: Blanche!

BLANCHE: I, I, I took the blows in my face and my body! All of those deaths! The long parade to the graveyard! Father, Mother! Margaret, that dreadful way! So big with it, it couldn't be put in a coffin! But had to be burned like rubbish! You just came home in time for the funerals, Stella. And funerals are pretty compared to deaths. Funerals are quiet, but deaths—not always. Sometimes their breathing is hoarse, and sometimes it rattles, and sometimes they even cry out to you, "Don't let me go!" Even the old, sometimes, say, "Don't let me go." As if you were able to stop them! But funerals are quiet, with pretty flowers. And, oh, what gorgeous boxes they pack them away in! Unless you were there at the bed when they cried out, "Hold me!" you'd never suspect there was the struggle for breath and bleeding. You didn't dream, but I saw! Saw! Saw! And now you sit there telling me with your eyes that I let the place go! How in hell do you think all that sickness and dying was paid for? Death is expensive, Miss Stella! And old Cousin Jessie's right after Margaret's, hers! Why, the Grim Reaper² had put up his tent on our doorstep! . . . Stella. Belle Reve was his headquarters! Honey—that's how it slipped through my fingers! Which of them left us a fortune? Which of them left a cent of insurance even? Only poor Jessie—one hundred to pay for her coffin. That was all, Stella! And I with my pitiful salary at the school. Yes, accuse me! Sit there and stare at me, thinking I let the place go! I let the place go? Where were you! In bed with your—Polack!

STELLA: [Springing.] Blanche! You be still! That's enough! [She starts out.]

BLANCHE: Where are you going?

STELLA: I'm going into the bathroom to wash my face.

BLANCHE: Oh, Stella, Stella, you're crying!

STELLA: Does that surprise you?

BLANCHE: Forgive me—I didn't mean to—

[The sound of men's voices is heard. STELLA goes into the bathroom, closing the door behind her. When the men appear, and BLANCHE realizes it must be STANLEY returning, she moves uncertainly from the bathroom door to the dressing table, looking apprehensively toward the front door. STANLEY enters, followed by STEVE and MITCH. STANLEY pauses near his door, STEVE by the foot of the spiral stair, and MITCH is slightly above and to the right of them, about to go out. As the men enter, we hear some of the following dialogue.]

STANLEY: Is that how he got it?

STEVE: Sure that's how he got it. He hit the old weather-bird for 300 bucks on a six-number-ticket.³

2. Death.

3. That is, he won $300 in a lottery. Hit the old weather-bird: in target shooting, to shoot at a barn and hit the ornamental rooster on the weathervane—an extraordinarily lucky shot.

MITCH: Don't tell him those things; he'll believe it. [MITCH starts out.]

STANLEY: [Restraining MITCH.] Hey, Mitch—come back here.

[BLANCHE, at the sound of voices, retires in the bedroom. She picks up STANLEY's photo from dressing table, looks at it, puts it down. When STANLEY enters the apartment, she darts and hides behind the screen at the head of bed.]

STEVE: [To STANLEY and MITCH.] Hey, are we playin' poker tomorrow?

STANLEY: Sure—at Mitch's.

MITCH: [Hearing this, returns quickly to the stair rail.] No—not at my place. My mother's still sick!

STANLEY: Okay, at my place . . . [MITCH starts out again.] But you bring the beer!

[MITCH pretends not to hear—calls out "Good night, all," and goes out, singing. EUNICE's voice is heard, above.]

EUNICE: Break it up down there! I made the spaghetti dish and ate it myself.

STEVE: [Going upstairs.] I told you and phoned you we was playing. [To the men.] Jax⁴ beer!

EUNICE: You never phoned me once.

STEVE: I told you at breakfast—and phoned you at lunch. . . .

EUNICE: Well, never mind about that. You just get yourself home here once in a while.

STEVE: You want it in the papers?

[More laughter and shouts of parting come from the men. STANLEY throws the screen door of the kitchen open and comes in. He is of medium height, about five feet eight or nine, and strongly, compactly built. Animal joy in his being is implicit in all his movements and attitudes. Since earliest manhood the center of his life has been pleasure with women, the giving and taking of it, not with weak indulgence, dependently, but with the power and pride of a richly feathered male bird among hens. Branching out from this complete and satisfying center are all the auxiliary channels of his life, such as his heartiness with men, his appreciation of rough humor, his love of good drink and food and games, his car, his radio, everything that is his, that bears his emblem of the gaudy seed-bearer. He sizes women up at a glance, with sexual classifications, crude images flashing into his mind and determining the way he smiles at them.]

BLANCHE: [Drawing involuntarily back from his stare.] You must be Stanley. I'm Blanche.

STANLEY: Stella's sister?

BLANCHE: Yes.

STANLEY: H'lo. Where's the little woman?

BLANCHE: In the bathroom.

STANLEY: Oh. Didn't know you were coming in town.

BLANCHE: I—uh—

4. A local brand.

STANLEY: Where you from, Blanche?

BLANCHE: Why, I—live in Laurel.

[He has crossed to the closet and removed the whiskey bottle.]

STANLEY: In Laurel, huh? Oh, yeah. Yeah, in Laurel, that's right. Not in my territory. Liquor goes fast in hot weather. [He holds the bottle to the light to observe its depletion.] Have a shot?

BLANCHE: No, I—rarely touch it.

STANLEY: Some people rarely touch it, but it touches them often.

BLANCHE: [Faintly.] Ha-ha.

STANLEY: My clothes're stickin' to me. Do you mind if I make myself comfortable?

[He starts to remove his shirt.]

BLANCHE: Please, please do.

STANLEY: Be comfortable is my motto.

BLANCHE: It's mine, too. It's hard to stay looking fresh. I haven't washed or even powdered my face and—here you are!

STANLEY: You know you can catch cold sitting around in damp things, especially when you been exercising hard like bowling is. You're a teacher, aren't you?

BLANCHE: Yes.

STANLEY: What do you teach, Blanche?

BLANCHE: English.

STANLEY: I never was a very good English student. How long you here for, Blanche?

BLANCHE: I—don't know yet.

STANLEY: You going to shack up here?

BLANCHE: I thought I would if it's not inconvenient for you all.

STANLEY: Good.

BLANCHE: Traveling wears me out.

STANLEY: Well, take it easy.

[A cat screeches near the window. BLANCHE springs up.]

BLANCHE: What's that?

STANLEY: Cats, . . . Hey, Stella!

STELLA: [Faintly, from the bathroom.] Yes, Stanley.

STANLEY: Haven't fallen in, have you? [He grins at BLANCHE. She tries unsuccessfully to smile back. There is a silence.] I'm afraid I'll strike you as being the unrefined type. Stella's spoke of you a good deal. You were married once, weren't you?

[The music of the polka rises up, faint in the distance.]

BLANCHE: Yes. When I was quite young.

STANLEY: What happened?

BLANCHE: The boy—the boy died. [She sinks back down.] I'm afraid I'm—going to be sick! [Her head falls on her arms.]

Scene 2

It is six o'clock the following evening. BLANCHE is bathing. STELLA is completing her toilette. BLANCHE's dress, a flowered print, is laid out on STELLA's bed.

STANLEY enters the kitchen from outside, leaving the door open on the perpetual "Blue Piano" around the corner.

STANLEY: What's all this monkey doings?

STELLA: Oh, Stan! [She jumps up and kisses him, which he accepts with lordly composure.] I'm taking Blanche to Galatoire's⁵ for supper and then to a show, because it's your poker night.

STANLEY: How about my supper, huh? I'm not going to no Galatoire's for supper!

STELLA: I put you a cold plate on ice.

STANLEY: Well, isn't that just dandy!

STELLA: I'm going to try to keep Blanche out till the party breaks up because I don't know how she would take it. So we'll go to one of the little places in the Quarter afterward and you'd better give me some money.

STANLEY: Where is she?

STELLA: She's soaking in a hot tub to quiet her nerves. She's terribly upset.

STANLEY: Over what?

STELLA: She's been through such an ordeal.

STANLEY: Yeah?

STELLA: Stan, we've—lost Belle Reve!

STANLEY: The place in the country?

STELLA: Yes.

STANLEY: How?

STELLA: [Vaguely.] Oh, it had to be—sacrificed or something. [There is a pause while STANLEY considers. STELLA is changing into her dress.] When she comes in be sure to say something nice about her appearance. And, oh! Don't mention the baby. I haven't said anything yet, I'm waiting until she gets in a quieter condition.

STANLEY: [Ominously.] So?

STELLA: And try to understand her and be nice to her, Stan.

BLANCHE: [Singing in the bathroom.] "From the land of the sky blue water, They brought a captive maid!"⁶

STELLA: She wasn't expecting to find us in such a small place. You see I'd tried to gloss things over a little in my letters.

STANLEY: So?

STELLA: And admire her dress and tell her she's looking wonderful. That's important with Blanche. Her little weakness!

STANLEY: Yeah. I get the idea. Now let's skip back a little to where you said the country place was disposed of.

STELLA: Oh!—yes . . .

5. Famous old restaurant on Bourbon Street, the principal street in the French Quarter.

6. From the song "From the Land of Sky-Blue Water" (1908), by Nelle Richmond Eberhart (1871–1944) and Charles Wakefield Cadman (1881–1946), popularized by the Andrews Sisters in the late 1930s.

STANLEY: How about that? Let's have a few more details on that subject.

STELLA: It's best not to talk much about it until she's calmed down.

STANLEY: So that's the deal, huh? Sister Blanche cannot be annoyed with business details right now!

STELLA: You saw how she was last night.

STANLEY: Uh-hum, I saw how she was. Now let's have a gander at the bill of sale.

STELLA: I haven't seen any.

STANLEY: She didn't show you no papers, no deed of sale or nothing like that, huh?

STELLA: It seems like it wasn't sold.

STANLEY: Well, what in hell was it then, give away? To charity?

STELLA: Shhh! She'll hear you.

STANLEY: I don't care if she hears me. Let's see the papers!

STELLA: There weren't any papers, she didn't show any papers, I don't care about papers.

STANLEY: Have you ever heard of the Napoleonic code?⁷

STELLA: No, Stanley, I haven't heard of the Napoleonic code and if I have, I don't see what it—

STANLEY: Let me enlighten you on a point or two, baby.

STELLA: Yes?

STANLEY: In the state of Louisiana we have the Napoleonic code according to which what belongs to the wife belongs to the husband and vice versa. For instance if I had a piece of property, or you had a piece of property—

STELLA: My head is swimming!

STANLEY: All right. I'll wait till she gets through soaking in a hot tub and then I'll inquire if she is acquainted with the Napoleonic code. It looks to me like you have been swindled, baby, and when you're swindled under the Napoleonic code I'm swindled too. And I don't like to be swindled.

STELLA: There's plenty of time to ask her questions later but if you do now she'll go to pieces again. I don't understand what happened to Belle Reve but you don't know how ridiculous you are being when you suggest that my sister or I or anyone of our family could have perpetrated a swindle on anyone else.

STANLEY: Then where's the money if the place was sold?

STELLA: Not sold—lost, lost! [He stalks into bedroom, and she follows him.] Stanley!

[He pulls open the wardrobe trunk standing in middle of room and jerks out an armful of dresses.]

STANLEY: Open your eyes to this stuff! You think she got them out of a teacher's pay?

STELLA: Hush!

STANLEY: Look at these feathers and furs that she come here to preen herself in! What's this here? A solid-gold dress, I believe! And this one! What is these here? Fox-pieces! [He blows on them.] Genuine fox fur-pieces, a half a mile

7. This codification of French law (1802), made by Napoleon as emperor, is the basis for Louisiana's civil law.

long! Where are your fox-pieces, Stella? Bushy snowwhite ones, no less! Where are your white fox-pieces?

STELLA: Those are inexpensive summer furs that Blanche has had a long time.

STANLEY: I got an acquaintance who deals in this sort of merchandise. I'll have him in here to appraise it. I'm willing to bet you there's thousands of dollars invested in this stuff here!

STELLA: Don't be such an idiot, Stanley!

[He hurls the furs to the day bed. Then he jerks open a small drawer in the trunk and pulls up a fistful of costume jewelry.]

STANLEY: And what have we here? The treasure chest of a pirate!

STELLA: Oh, Stanley!

STANLEY: Pearls! Ropes of them! What is this sister of yours, a deep-sea diver?

Bracelets of solid gold, too! Where are your pearls and gold bracelets?

STELLA: Shhh! Be still, Stanley!

STANLEY: And diamonds! A crown for an empress!

STELLA: A rhinestone tiara she wore to a costume ball.

STANLEY: What's rhinestone?

STELLA: Next door to glass.

STANLEY: Are you kidding? I have an acquaintance that works in a jewelry store.

I'll have him in here to make an appraisal of this. Here's your plantation, or what was left of it, here!

STELLA: You have no idea how stupid and horrid you're being! Now close that trunk before she comes out of the bathroom!

[He kicks the trunk partly closed and sits on the kitchen table.]

STANLEY: The Kowalskis and the DuBoises have different notions.

STELLA: [Angrily.] Indeed they have, thank heavens!—I'm going outside. [She snatches up her white hat and gloves and crosses to the outside door.] You come out with me while Blanche is getting dressed.

STANLEY: Since when do you give me orders?

STELLA: Are you going to stay here and insult her?

STANLEY: You're damn tootin' I'm going to stay here.

[STELLA goes out to the porch. BLANCHE comes out of the bathroom in a red satin robe.]

BLANCHE: [Airily.] Hello, Stanley! Here I am, all freshly bathed and scented, and feeling like a brand new human being!

[He lights a cigarette.]

STANLEY: That's good.

BLANCHE: [Drawing the curtains at the windows.] Excuse me while I slip on my pretty new dress!

STANLEY: Go right ahead, Blanche.

[She closes the drapes between the rooms.]

BLANCHE: I understand there's to be a little card party to which we ladies are cordially not invited!

STANLEY: [Ominously.] Yeah?

[BLANCHE throws off her robe and slips into a flowered print dress.]

BLANCHE: Where's Stella?

STANLEY: Out on the porch.

BLANCHE: I'm going to ask a favor of you in a moment.

STANLEY: What could that be, I wonder?

BLANCHE: Some buttons in back! You may enter! [He crosses through the drapes with a smoldering look.] How do I look?

STANLEY: You look all right.

BLANCHE: Many thanks! Now the buttons!

STANLEY: I can't do nothing with them.

BLANCHE: You men with your big clumsy fingers. May I have a drag on your cig?

STANLEY: Have one for yourself.

BLANCHE: Why, thanks! . . . It looks like my trunk has exploded.

STANLEY: Me an' Stella were helping you unpack.

BLANCHE: Well, you certainly did a fast and thorough job of it!

STANLEY: It looks like you raided some stylish shops in Paris.

BLANCHE: Ha-ha! Yes—clothes are my passion!

STANLEY: What does it cost for a string of fur-pieces like that?

BLANCHE: Why, those were a tribute from an admirer of mine!

STANLEY: He must have had a lot of—admiration!

BLANCHE: Oh, in my youth I excited some admiration. But look at me now! [She smiles at him radiantly.] Would you think it possible that I was once considered to be—attractive?

STANLEY: Your looks are okay.

BLANCHE: I was fishing for a compliment, Stanley.

STANLEY: I don't go in for that stuff.

BLANCHE: What—stuff?

STANLEY: Compliments to women about their looks. I never met a woman that didn't know if she was good-looking or not without being told, and some of them give themselves credit for more than they've got. I once went out with a doll who said to me, "I am the glamorous type, I am the glamorous type!" I said, "So what?"

BLANCHE: And what did she say then?

STANLEY: She didn't say nothing. That shut her up like a clam.

BLANCHE: Did it end the romance?

STANLEY: It ended the conversation—that was all. Some men are took in by this Hollywood glamor stuff and some men are not.

BLANCHE: I'm sure you belong in the second category.

STANLEY: That's right.

BLANCHE: I cannot imagine any witch of a woman casting a spell over you.

STANLEY: That's—right.

BLANCHE: You're simple, straightforward and honest, a little bit on the primitive side I should think. To interest you a woman would have to— [She pauses with an indefinite gesture.]

STANLEY: [Slowly.] Lay . . . her cards on the table.

BLANCHE: [Smiling.] Well, I never cared for wishy-washy people. That was why, when you walked in here last night, I said to myself—"My sister has married a man!"—Of course that was all that I could tell about you.

STANLEY: [Booming.] Now let's cut the re-bop!⁸

BLANCHE: [Pressing hands to her ears.] Ouuuuu!

STELLA: [Calling from the steps.] Stanley! You come out here and let Blanche finish dressing!

BLANCHE: I'm through dressing, honey.

STELLA: Well, you come out, then.

STANLEY: Your sister and I are having a little talk.

BLANCHE: [Lightly.] Honey, do me a favor. Run to the drugstore and get me a lemon Coke with plenty of chipped ice in it!—Will you do that for me, sweetie?

STELLA: [Uncertainly.] Yes. [She goes around the corner of the building.]

BLANCHE: The poor little thing was out there listening to us, and I have an idea she doesn't understand you as well as I do. . . . All right; now, Mr. Kowalski, let us proceed without any more double-talk. I'm ready to answer all questions. I've nothing to hide. What is it?

STANLEY: There is such a thing in this state of Louisiana as the Napoleonic code, according to which whatever belongs to my wife is also mine—and vice versa.

BLANCHE: My, but you have an impressive judicial air!

[She sprays herself with her atomizer; then playfully sprays him with it. He seizes the atomizer and slams it down on the dresser. She throws back her head and laughs.]

STANLEY: If I didn't know that you was my wife's sister I'd get ideas about you!

BLANCHE: Such as what!

STANLEY: Don't play so dumb. You know what!

BLANCHE: [She puts the atomizer on the table.] All right. Cards on the table. That suits me. [She turns to STANLEY.] I know I fib a good deal. After all, a woman's charm is fifty per cent illusion, but when a thing is important I tell the truth, and this is the truth: I haven't cheated my sister or you or anyone else as long as I have lived.

STANLEY: Where's the papers? In the trunk?

BLANCHE: Everything that I own is in that trunk. [STANLEY crosses to the trunk, shoves it roughly open and begins to open compartments.] What in the name of heaven are you thinking of! What's in the back of that little boy's mind of yours? That I am absconding with something, attempting some kind of treachery on my sister?—Let me do that! It will be faster and simpler. . . . [She crosses to the trunk and takes out a box.] I keep my papers mostly in this tin box. [She opens it.]

STANLEY: What's them underneath? [He indicates another sheaf of paper.]

BLANCHE: These are love-letters, yellowing with antiquity, all from one boy. [He snatches them up. She speaks fiercely.] Give those back to me!

STANLEY: I'll have a look at them first!

BLANCHE: The touch of your hands insults them!

8. Nonsense (from "bop," a form of jazz).

STANLEY: Don't pull that stuff!

[He rips off the ribbon and starts to examine them. BLANCHE snatches them from him, and they cascade to the floor.]

BLANCHE: Now that you've touched them I'll burn them!

STANLEY: [Staring, baffled.] What in hell are they?

BLANCHE: [On the floor gathering them up.] Poems a dead boy wrote. I hurt him the way that you would like to hurt me, but you can't! I'm not young and vulnerable any more. But my young husband was and I—never mind about that! Just give them back to me!

STANLEY: What do you mean by saying you'll have to burn them?

BLANCHE: I'm sorry, I must have lost my head for a moment. Everyone has something he won't let others touch because of their—intimate nature. . . . [She now seems faint with exhaustion and she sits down with the strong box and puts on a pair of glasses and goes methodically through a large stack of papers.] Ambler & Ambler. Hm. . . . Crabtree. . . . More Ambler & Ambler.

STANLEY: What is Ambler & Ambler?

BLANCHE: A firm that made loans on the place.

STANLEY: Then it was lost on a mortgage?

BLANCHE: [Touching her forehead.] That must've been what happened.

STANLEY: I don't want no ifs, ands or buts! What's all the rest of them papers?

[She hands him the entire box. He carries it to the table and starts to examine the papers.]

BLANCHE: [Picking up a large envelope containing more papers.] There are thousands of papers, stretching back over hundreds of years, affecting Belle Reve as, piece by piece, our improvident grandfathers and father and uncles and brothers exchanged the land for their epic fornications—to put it plainly! [She removes her glasses with an exhausted laugh.] The four-letter word deprived us of our plantation, till finally all that was left—and Stella can verify that!—was the house itself and about twenty acres of ground, including a graveyard, to which now all but Stella and I have retreated. [She pours the contents of the envelope on the table.] Here all of them are, all papers! I hereby endow you with them! Take them, peruse them—commit them to memory, even! I think it's wonderfully fitting that Belle Reve should finally be this bunch of old papers in your big, capable hands! . . . I wonder if Stella's come back with my lemon Coke. . . . [She leans back and closes her eyes.]

STANLEY: I have a lawyer acquaintance who will study these out.

BLANCHE: Present them to him with a box of aspirin tablets.

STANLEY: [Becoming somewhat sheepish.] You see, under the Napoleonic code—a man has to take an interest in his wife's affairs—especially now that she's going to have a baby.

[BLANCHE opens her eyes. The "Blue Piano" sounds louder.]

BLANCHE: Stella? Stella going to have a baby? [Dreamily.] I didn't know she was going to have a baby! [She gets up and crosses to the outside door. STELLA appears around the corner with a carton from the drugstore. STANLEY goes into the bedroom with the envelope and the box. The inner rooms fade to darkness] and the outside wall of the house is visible. BLANCHE meets STELLA at the foot of the steps to the sidewalk.] Stella, Stella for star! How lovely to have a baby! It's all right. Everything's all right.

STELLA: I'm sorry he did that to you.

BLANCHE: Oh, I guess he's just not the type that goes for jasmine perfume, but maybe he's what we need to mix with our blood now that we've lost Belle Reve. We thrashed it out. I feel a bit shaky, but I think I handled it nicely, I laughed and treated it all as a joke. [STEVE and PABLO appear, carrying a case of beer.] I called him a little boy and laughed and flirted. Yes, I was flirting with your husband! [As the men approach.] The guests are gathering for the poker party. [The two men pass between them, and enter the house.] Which way do we go now, Stella—this way?

STELLA: No, this way. [She leads BLANCHE away.]

BLANCHE: [Laughing.] The blind are leading the blind!

[A tamale VENDOR is heard calling.]

VENDOR'S VOICE: Red-hot!⁹

Scene 3. The Poker Night

There is a picture of Van Gogh's of a billiard-parlor at night.¹ The kitchen now suggests that sort of lurid nocturnal brilliance, the raw colors of childhood's spectrum. Over the yellow linoleum of the kitchen table hangs an electric bulb with a vivid green glass shade. The poker players—STANLEY, STEVE, MITCH and PABLO—wear colored shirts, solid blues, a purple, a red-and-white check, a light green, and they are men at the peak of their physical manhood, as coarse and direct and powerful as the primary colors. There are vivid slices of watermelon on the table, whiskey bottles and glasses. The bedroom is relatively dim with only the light that spills between the portieres and through the wide window on the street.

For a moment, there is absorbed silence as a hand is dealt.

STEVE: Anything wild this deal?

PABLO: One-eyed jacks are wild.

STEVE: Give me two cards.

PABLO: You, Mitch?

MITCH: I'm out.

PABLO: One.

MITCH: Anyone want a shot?

STANLEY: Yeah. Me.

PABLO: Why don't somebody go to the Chinaman's and bring back a load of chop suey?

STANLEY: When I'm losing you want to eat! Ante up! Openers? Openers! Get y'r ass off the table, Mitch. Nothing belongs on a poker table but cards, chips and whiskey. [He lurches up and tosses some watermelon rinds to the floor.]

MITCH: Kind of on your high horse, ain't you?

9. Hot dog! Blind!: See Matthew 15.14—"If a blind person leads a blind person, both will fall into a pit."

1. The Night Café, by Vincent van Gogh (1853–90), Dutch postimpressionist painter. The Poker Night was Williams's first working title for A Streetcar Named Desire.

STANLEY: How many?

STEVE: Give me three.

STANLEY: One.

MITCH: I'm out again. I oughta go home pretty soon.

STANLEY: Shut up.

MITCH: I gotta sick mother. She don't go to sleep until I come in at night.

STANLEY: Then why don't you stay home with her?

MITCH: She says to go out, so I go, but I don't enjoy it. All the while I keep wondering how she is.

STANLEY: Aw, for the sake of Jesus, go home, then!

PABLO: What've you got?

STEVE: Spade flush.

MITCH: You all are married. But I'll be alone when she goes.—I'm going to the bathroom.

STANLEY: Hurry back and we'll fix you a sugar-tit.²

MITCH: Aw, go rut. [He crosses through the bedroom into the bathroom.]

STEVE: [Dealing a hand.] Seven card stud. [Telling his joke as he deals.] This ole farmer is out in back of his house sittin' down th'owing corn to the chickens when all at once he hears a loud cackle and this young hen comes lickety split around the side of the house with the rooster right behind her and gaining on her fast.

STANLEY: [Impatient with the story.] Deal!

STEVE: But when the rooster catches sight of the farmer th'owing the corn he puts on the brakes and lets the hen get away and starts pecking corn. And the old farmer says, "Lord God, I hopes I never gits that hongry!"

[STEVE and PABLO laugh. The sisters appear around the corner of the building.]

STELLA: The game is still going on.

BLANCHE: How do I look?

STELLA: Lovely, Blanche.

BLANCHE: I feel so hot and frazzled. Wait till I powder before you open the door. Do I look done in?

STELLA: Why no. You are as fresh as a daisy.

BLANCHE: One that's been picked a few days.

[STELLA opens the door and they enter.]

STELLA: Well, well, well. I see you boys are still at it?

STANLEY: Where you been?

STELLA: Blanche and I took in a show. Blanche, this is Mr. Gonzales and Mr. Hubbell.

BLANCHE: Please don't get up.

STANLEY: Nobody's going to get up, so don't be worried.

STELLA: How much longer is this game going to continue?

STANLEY: Till we get ready to quit.

2. Baby's pacifier dipped in sugar.

BLANCHE: Poker is so fascinating. Could I kibitz?³

STANLEY: You could not. Why don't you women go up and sit with Eunice?

STELLA: Because it is nearly two-thirty. [BLANCHE crosses into the bedroom and partially closes the portieres.] Couldn't you call it quits after one more hand?

[A chair scrapes. STANLEY gives a loud whack of his hand on her thigh.]

STELLA: [Sharply.] That's not fun, Stanley. [The men laugh. STELLA goes into the bedroom.] It makes me so mad when he does that in front of people.

BLANCHE: I think I will bathe.

STELLA: Again?

BLANCHE: My nerves are in knots. Is the bathroom occupied?

STELLA: I don't know.

[BLANCHE knocks. MITCH opens the door and comes out, still wiping his hands on a towel.]

BLANCHE: Oh!—good evening.

MITCH: Hello. [He stares at her.]

STELLA: Blanche, this is Harold Mitchell. My sister, Blanche DuBois.

MITCH: [With awkward courtesy.] How do you do, Miss DuBois.

STELLA: How is your mother now, Mitch?

MITCH: About the same, thanks. She appreciated your sending over that custard.—Excuse me, please.

[He crosses slowly back into the kitchen, glancing back at BLANCHE and coughing a little shyly. He realizes he still has the towel in his hands and with an embarrassed laugh hands it to STELLA. BLANCHE looks after him with a certain interest.]

BLANCHE: That one seems—superior to the others.

STELLA: Yes, he is.

BLANCHE: I thought he had a sort of sensitive look.

STELLA: His mother is sick.

BLANCHE: Is he married?

STELLA: No.

BLANCHE: Is he a wolf?

STELLA: Why, Blanche! [BLANCHE laughs.] I don't think he would be.

BLANCHE: What does—what does he do? [She is unbuttoning her blouse.]

STELLA: He's on the precision bench in the spare parts department. At the plant Stanley travels for.

BLANCHE: Is that something much?

STELLA: No. Stanley's the only one of his crowd that's likely to get anywhere.

BLANCHE: What makes you think Stanley will?

STELLA: Look at him.

BLANCHE: I've looked at him.

STELLA: Then you should know.

BLANCHE: I'm sorry, but I haven't noticed the stamp of genius even on Stanley's forehead.

3. That is, watch a card player from behind and offer advice.

[She takes off the blouse and stands in her pink silk brassiere and white skirt in the light through the portieres. The game has continued in undertones.]

STELLA: It isn't on his forehead and it isn't genius.

BLANCHE: Oh. Well, what is it, and where? I would like to know.

STELLA: It's a drive that he has. You're standing in the light, Blanche!

BLANCHE: Oh, am I!

[She moves out of the yellow streak of light. STELLA has removed her dress and put on a light blue satin kimono.]⁴

STELLA: [With girlish laughter.] You ought to see their wives.

BLANCHE: [Laughingly.] I can imagine. Big, beefy things, I suppose.

STELLA: You know that one upstairs? [More laughter.] One time [Laughing.] the plaster— [Laughing.] cracked—

STANLEY: You hens cut out that conversation in there!

STELLA: You can't hear us.

STANLEY: Well, you can hear me and I said to hush up!

STELLA: This is my house and I'll talk as much as I want to!

BLANCHE: Stella, don't start a row.

STELLA: He's half drunk!—I'll be out in a minute.

[She goes into the bathroom. BLANCHE rises and crosses leisurely to a small white radio and turns it on.]

STANLEY: Awright, Mitch, you in?

MITCH: What? Oh!—No, I'm out!

[BLANCHE moves back into the streak of light. She raises her arms and stretches, as she moves indolently back to the chair. Rhumba music comes over the radio. MITCH rises at the table.]

STANLEY: Who turned that on in there?

BLANCHE: I did. Do you mind?

STANLEY: Turn it off!

STEVE: Aw, let the girls have their music.

PABLO: Sure, that's good, leave it on!

STEVE: Sounds like Xavier Cugat!⁵ [STANLEY jumps up and, crossing to the radio, turns it off. He stops short at the sight of BLANCHE in the chair. She returns his look without flinching. Then he sits again at the poker table. Two of the men have started arguing hotly.] I didn't hear you name it.

PABLO: Didn't I name it, Mitch?

MITCH: I wasn't listenin'.

PABLO: What were you doing, then?

STANLEY: He was looking through them drapes. [He jumps up and jerks roughly at curtains to close them.] Now deal the hand over again and let's play cards or quit. Some people get ants when they win.

[MITCH rises as STANLEY returns to his seat.]

4. Kimono.

5. Spanish-born Cuban bandleader (1900–90), well known for composing and playing rumbas.

STANLEY: [Yelling.] Sit down!

MITCH: I'm going to the "head." Deal me out.

PABLO: Sure he's got ants now. Seven five-dollar bills in his pants pocket folded up tight as spitballs.

STEVE: Tomorrow you'll see him at the cashier's window getting them changed into quarters.

STANLEY: And when he goes home he'll deposit them one by one in a piggy bank his mother give him for Christmas. [Dealing.] This game is Spit in the Ocean.

[MITCH laughs uncomfortably and continues through the portieres. He stops just inside.]

BLANCHE: [Softly.] Hello! The Little Boys' Room is busy right now.

MITCH: We've—been drinking beer.

BLANCHE: I hate beer.

MITCH: It's—a hot weather drink.

BLANCHE: Oh, I don't think so; it always makes me warmer. Have you got any cigs?

[She has slipped on the dark red satin wrapper.]

MITCH: Sure.

BLANCHE: What kind are they?

MITCH: Luckies.

BLANCHE: Oh, good. What a pretty case. Silver?

MITCH: Yes. Yes; read the inscription.

BLANCHE: Oh, is there an inscription? I can't make it out. [He strikes a match and moves closer.] Oh! [Reading with feigned difficulty.] "And if God choose,/I shall but love thee better—after—death!" Why, that's from my favorite sonnet by Mrs. Browning!⁶

MITCH: You know it?

BLANCHE: Certainly I do!

MITCH: There's a story connected with that inscription.

BLANCHE: It sounds like a romance.

MITCH: A pretty sad one.

BLANCHE: Oh?

MITCH: The girl's dead now.

BLANCHE: [In a tone of deep sympathy.] Oh!

MITCH: She knew she was dying when she give me this. A very strange girl, very sweet—very!

BLANCHE: She must have been fond of you. Sick people have such deep, sincere attachments.

MITCH: That's right, they certainly do.

BLANCHE: Sorrow makes for sincerity, I think.

MITCH: It sure brings it out in people.

BLANCHE: The little there is belongs to people who have experienced some sorrow.

MITCH: I believe you are right about that.

6. Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806–61), British poet, famous for her sequence of love poems, Sonnets from the Portuguese, which includes the poem quoted here, "How Do I Love Thee?"

BLANCHE: I'm positive that I am. Show me a person who hasn't known any sorrow and I'll show you a shuperficial—Listen to me! My tongue is a little—thick! You boys are responsible for it. The show let out at eleven and we couldn't come home on account of the poker game so we had to go somewhere and drink. I'm not accustomed to having more than one drink. Two is the limit—and three! [She laughs.] Tonight I had three.

STANLEY: Mitch!

MITCH: Deal me out. I'm talking to Miss—

BLANCHE: DuBois.

MITCH: Miss DuBois?

BLANCHE: It's a French name. It means woods and Blanche means white, so the two together mean white woods. Like an orchard in spring! You can remember it by that.

MITCH: You're French?

BLANCHE: We are French by extraction. Our first American ancestors were French Huguenots.⁷

MITCH: You are Stella's sister, are you not?

BLANCHE: Yes, Stella is my precious little sister. I call her little in spite of the fact she's somewhat older than I. Just slightly. Less than a year. Will you do something for me?

MITCH: Sure. What?

BLANCHE: I bought this adorable little colored paper lantern at a Chinese shop on Bourbon. Put it over the light bulb! Will you, please?

MITCH: Be glad to.

BLANCHE: I can't stand a naked light bulb, any more than I can a rude remark or a vulgar action.

MITCH: [Adjusting the lantern.] I guess we strike you as being a pretty rough bunch.

BLANCHE: I'm very adaptable—to circumstances.

MITCH: Well, that's a good thing to be. You are visiting Stanley and Stella?

BLANCHE: Stella hasn't been so well lately, and I came down to help her for a while. She's very run down.

MITCH: You're not—?

BLANCHE: Married? No, no. I'm an old maid schoolteacher!

MITCH: You may teach school but you're certainly not an old maid.

BLANCHE: Thank you, sir! I appreciate your gallantry!

MITCH: So you are in the teaching profession?

BLANCHE: Yes. Ah, yes . . .

MITCH: Grade school or high school or—

STANLEY: [Bellowing.] Mitch!

MITCH: Coming!

BLANCHE: Gracious, what lung-power! . . . I teach high school. In Laurel.

MITCH: What do you teach? What subject?

BLANCHE: Guess!

MITCH: I bet you teach art or music? [BLANCHE laughs delicately.] Of course I could be wrong. You might teach arithmetic.

7. Protestants who fled persecution in Catholic France after the Edict of Nantes (1685); many settled in the American South.

BLANCHE: Never arithmetic, sir; never arithmetic! [With a laugh.] I don't even know my multiplication tables! No, I have the misfortune of being an English instructor. I attempt to instill a bunch of bobby-soxers and drugstore Romeos with reverence for Hawthorne and Whitman and Poe!

MITCH: I guess that some of them are more interested in other things.

BLANCHE: How very right you are! Their literary heritage is not what most of them treasure above all else! But they're sweet things! And in the spring, it's touching to notice them making their first discovery of love! As if nobody had ever known it before! [The bathroom door opens and STELLA comes out. BLANCHE continues talking to MITCH.] Oh! Have you finished? Wait—I'll turn on the radio.

[*She turns the knobs on the radio and it begins to play "Wien, Wien, nur du allein."*⁸ BLANCHE waltzes to the music with romantic gestures. MITCH is delighted and moves in awkward imitation like a dancing bear. STANLEY stalks fiercely through the portieres into the bedroom. He crosses to the small white radio and snatches it off the table. With a shouted oath, he tosses the instrument out the window.]

STELLA: Drunk—drunk—animal thing, you! [She rushes through to the poker table.]

All of you—please go home! If any of you have one spark of decency in you—

BLANCHE: [Wildly.] Stella, watch out, he's—

[STANLEY charges after STELLA.]

MEN: [Feebly.] Take it easy, Stanley. Easy, fellow.—Let's all—

STELLA: You lay your hands on me and I'll—

[She backs out of sight. He advances and disappears. There is the sound of a blow, STELLA cries out. BLANCHE screams and runs into the kitchen. The men rush forward and there is grappling and cursing. Something is overturned with a crash.]

BLANCHE: [Shrilly.] My sister is going to have a baby!

MITCH: This is terrible.

BLANCHE: Lunacy, absolute lunacy!

MITCH: Get him in here, men.

[STANLEY is forced, pinioned by the two men, into the bedroom. He nearly throws them off. Then all at once he subsides and is limp in their grasp. They speak quietly and lovingly to him and he leans his face on one of their shoulders.]

STELLA: [In a high, unnatural voice, out of sight.] I want to go away, I want to go away!

MITCH: Poker shouldn't be played in a house with women.

[BLANCHE rushes into the bedroom.]

BLANCHE: I want my sister's clothes! We'll go to that woman's upstairs!

MITCH: Where is the clothes?

8. "Vienna, Vienna, you are my only" (German), a waltz from an operetta by Franz Lehár (1870–1948).

BLANCHE: [Opening the closet.] I've got them! [She rushes through to STELLA.] Stella, Stella, precious! Dear, dear little sister, don't be afraid!

[With her arm around STELLA, BLANCHE guides her to the outside door and upstairs.]

STANLEY: [Dully.] What's the matter; what's happened?

MITCH: You just blew your top, Stan.

PABLO: He's okay, now.

STEVE: Sure, my boy's okay!

MITCH: Put him on the bed and get a wet towel.

PABLO: I think coffee would do him a world of good, now.

STANLEY: [Thickly.] I want water.

MITCH: Put him under the shower!

[The men talk quietly as they lead him to the bathroom.]

STANLEY: Let the rut go of me, you sons of bitches!

[Sounds of blows are heard. The water goes on full tilt.]

STEVE: Let's get quick out of here!

[They rush to the poker table and sweep up their winnings on their way out.]

MITCH: [Sadly but firmly.] Poker should not be played in a house with women.

[The door closes on them and the place is still. The Negro entertainers in the bar around the corner play "Paper Doll"⁹ slow and blue. After a moment STANLEY comes out of the bathroom dripping water and still in his clinging wet polka dot drawers.]

STANLEY: Stella! [There is a pause.] My baby doll's left me! [He breaks into sobs. Then he goes to the phone and dials, still shuddering with sobs.] Eunice? I want my baby! [He waits a moment; then he hangs up and dials again.] Eunice! I'll keep on ringin' until I talk with my baby! [An indistinguishable shrill voice is heard. He hurls phone to floor. Dissonant brass and piano sounds as the rooms dim out to darkness and the outer walls appear in the night light. The "Blue Piano" plays for a brief interval. Finally, STANLEY stumbles half-dressed out to the porch and down the wooden steps to the pavement before the building. There he throws back his head like a baying hound and bellows his wife's name: "STELLA! STELLA, sweetheart! STELLA!"]

EUNICE: [Calling down from the door of her upper apartment.] Quit that howling out there an' go back to bed!

STANLEY: I want my baby down here. Stella, Stella!

EUNICE: She ain't comin' down so you quit! Or you'll git th' law on you!

STANLEY: Stella!

EUNICE: You can't beat on a woman an' then call 'er back! She won't come! And her goin' t' have a baby! . . . You stinker! You whelp of a Polack, you! I hope they do haul you in and turn the fire hose on you, same as the last time!

STANLEY: [Humbly.] Eunice, I want my girl to come down with me!

9. Song by Johnny S. Black (1915), popularized by the Mills Brothers in the early 1940s.

EUNICE: Hah! [She slams her door.]

STANLEY: [With heaven-splitting violence.] STELL-LAHHHHH!

[The low-tone clarinet moans. The door upstairs opens again. STELLA slips down the rickety stairs in her robe. Her eyes are glistening with tears and her hair loose about her throat and shoulders. They stare at each other. Then they come together with low, animal moans. He falls to his knees on the steps and presses his face to her belly, curving a little with maternity. Her eyes go blind with tenderness as she catches his head and raises him level with her. He snatches the screen door open and lifts her off her feet and bears her into the dark flat. BLANCHE comes out the upper landing in her robe and slips fearfully down the steps.]

BLANCHE: Where is my little sister? Stella? Stella?

[She stops before the dark entrance of her sister's flat. Then catches her breath as if struck. She rushes down to the walk before the house. She looks right and left as if for a sanctuary. The music fades away. MITCH appears from around the corner.]

MITCH: Miss DuBois?

BLANCHE: Oh!

MITCH: All quiet on the Potomac now?¹

BLANCHE: She ran downstairs and went back in there with him.

MITCH: Sure she did.

BLANCHE: I'm terrified!

MITCH: Ho-ho! There's nothing to be scared of. They're crazy about each other.

BLANCHE: I'm not used to such—

MITCH: Naw, it's a shame this had to happen when you just got here. But don't take it serious.

BLANCHE: Violence! Is so—

MITCH: Set down on the steps and have a cigarette with me.

BLANCHE: I'm not properly dressed.

MITCH: That don't make no difference in the Quarter.

BLANCHE: Such a pretty silver case.

MITCH: I showed you the inscription, didn't I?

BLANCHE: Yes. [During the pause, she looks up at the sky.] There's so much—so much confusion in the world. . . . [He coughs diffidently.] Thank you for being so kind! I need kindness now.

Scene 4

It is early the following morning. There is a confusion of street cries like a choral chant.

STELLA is lying down in the bedroom. Her face is serene in the early morning sunlight. One hand rests on her belly, rounding slightly with new maternity. From the other dangles a book of colored comics. Her eyes and lips have that almost narcotized tranquility that is in the faces of Eastern idols.

1. "All Quiet on the Potomac" was a Civil War catchphrase, attributed to Union general George McClellan, who pushed the Confederate army back over the Potomac River in 1862.

The table is sloppy with remains of breakfast and the debris of the preceding night, and STANLEY's gaudy pyjamas lie across the threshold of the bathroom. The outside door is slightly ajar on a sky of summer brilliance.

BLANCHE appears at this door. She has spent a sleepless night and her appearance entirely contrasts with STELLA's. She presses her knuckles nervously to her lips as she looks through the door, before entering.

BLANCHE: Stella?

STELLA: [Stirring lazily.] Hmmh?

[BLANCHE utters a moaning cry and runs into the bedroom, throwing herself down beside STELLA in a rush of hysterical tenderness.]

BLANCHE: Baby, my baby sister!

STELLA: [Drawing away from her.] Blanche, what is the matter with you?

[BLANCHE straightens up slowly and stands beside the bed looking down at her sister with knuckles pressed to her lips.]

BLANCHE: He's left?

STELLA: Stan? Yes.

BLANCHE: Will he be back?

STELLA: He's gone to get the car greased. Why?

BLANCHE: Why! I've been half crazy, Stella! When I found out you'd been insane enough to come back in here after what happened—I started to rush in after you!

STELLA: I'm glad you didn't.

BLANCHE: What were you thinking of? [STELLA makes an indefinite gesture.] Answer me! What? What?

STELLA: Please, Blanche! Sit down and stop yelling.

BLANCHE: All right, Stella. I will repeat the question quietly now. How could you come back in this place last night? Why, you must have slept with him!

[STELLA gets up in a calm and leisurely way.]

STELLA: Blanche, I'd forgotten how excitable you are. You're making much too much fuss about this.

BLANCHE: Am I?

STELLA: Yes, you are, Blanche. I know how it must have seemed to you and I'm awful sorry it had to happen, but it wasn't anything as serious as you seem to take it. In the first place, when men are drinking and playing poker anything can happen. It's always a powder-keg. He didn't know what he was doing. . . . He was as good as a lamb when I came back and he's really very, very ashamed of himself.

BLANCHE: And that—that makes it all right?

STELLA: No, it isn't all right for anybody to make such a terrible row, but—people do sometimes. Stanley's always smashed things. Why, on our wedding night—soon as we came in here—he snatched off one of my slippers and rushed about the place smashing light bulbs with it.

BLANCHE: He did—what?

STELLA: He smashed all the lightbulbs with the heel of my slipper! [She laughs.]

BLANCHE: And you—you let him? Didn't run, didn't scream?

STELLA: I was—sort of—thrilled by it. [She waits for a moment.] Eunice and you had breakfast?

BLANCHE: Do you suppose I wanted any breakfast?

STELLA: There's some coffee left on the stove.

BLANCHE: You're so—matter-of-fact about it, Stella.

STELLA: What other can I be? He's taken the radio to get it fixed. It didn't land on the pavement so only one tube was smashed.

BLANCHE: And you are standing there smiling!

STELLA: What do you want me to do?

BLANCHE: Pull yourself together and face the facts.

STELLA: What are they, in your opinion?

BLANCHE: In my opinion? You're married to a madman!

STELLA: No!

BLANCHE: Yes, you are, your fix is worse than mine is! Only you're not being sensible about it. I'm going to do something. Get hold of myself and make myself a new life!

STELLA: Yes?

BLANCHE: But you've given in. And that isn't right, you're not old! You can get out.

STELLA: [Slowly and emphatically.] I'm not in anything I want to get out of.

BLANCHE: [Incredulously.] What—Stella?

STELLA: I said I am not in anything that I have a desire to get out of. Look at the mess in this room! And those empty bottles! They went through two cases last night! He promised this morning that he was going to quit having these poker parties, but you know how long such a promise is going to keep. Oh, well, it's his pleasure, like mine is movies and bridge. People have got to tolerate each other's habits, I guess.

BLANCHE: I don't understand you. [STELLA turns toward her.] I don't understand your indifference. Is this a Chinese philosophy you've—cultivated?

STELLA: Is what—what?

BLANCHE: This—shuffling about and mumbling—"One tube smashed—beer bottles—mess in the kitchen!"—as if nothing out of the ordinary has happened! [STELLA laughs uncertainly and picking up the broom, twirls it in her hands.] Are you deliberately shaking that thing in my face?

STELLA: No.

BLANCHE: Stop it. Let go of that broom. I won't have you cleaning up for him!

STELLA: Then who's going to do it? Are you?

BLANCHE: I? I!

STELLA: No, I didn't think so.

BLANCHE: Oh, let me think, if only my mind would function! We've got to get hold of some money, that's the way out!

STELLA: I guess that money is always nice to get hold of.

BLANCHE: Listen to me. I have an idea of some kind. [Shakily she twists a cigarette into her holder.] Do you remember Shep Huntleigh? [STELLA shakes her head.] Of course you remember Shep Huntleigh. I went out with him at college and wore his pin for a while. Well—

STELLA: Well?

BLANCHE: I ran into him last winter. You know I went to Miami during the Christmas holidays?

STELLA: No.

BLANCHE: Well, I did. I took the trip as an investment, thinking I'd meet someone with a million dollars.

STELLA: Did you?

BLANCHE: Yes. I ran into Shep Huntleigh—I ran into him on Biscayne Boulevard, on Christmas Eve, about dusk . . . getting into his car—Cadillac convertible; must have been a block long!

STELLA: I should think it would have been—inconvenient in traffic!

BLANCHE: You've heard of oil wells?

STELLA: Yes—remotely.

BLANCHE: He has them, all over Texas. Texas is literally spouting gold in his pockets.

STELLA: My, my.

BLANCHE: Y'know how indifferent I am to money. I think of money in terms of what it does for you. But he could do it, he could certainly do it!

STELLA: Do what, Blanche?

BLANCHE: Why—set us up in a—shop!

STELLA: What kind of shop?

BLANCHE: Oh, a—shop of some kind! He could do it with half what his wife throws away at the races.

STELLA: He's married?

BLANCHE: Honey, would I be here if the man weren't married? [STELLA laughs a little. BLANCHE suddenly springs up and crosses to phone. She speaks shrilly.]

How do I get Western Union?²—Operator! Western Union!

STELLA: That's a dial phone, honey.

BLANCHE: I can't dial, I'm too—

STELLA: Just dial O.

BLANCHE: O?

STELLA: Yes, "O" for Operator!

[BLANCHE considers a moment; then she puts the phone down.]

BLANCHE: Give me a pencil. Where is a slip of paper? I've got to write it down first—the message, I mean. . . . [She goes to the dressing table, and grabs up a sheet of Kleenex and an eyebrow pencil for writing equipment.] Let me see now. . . . [She bites the pencil.] "Darling Shep. Sister and I in desperate situation."

STELLA: I beg your pardon!

BLANCHE: "Sister and I in desperate situation. Will explain details later. Would you be interested in—?" [She bites the pencil again.] "Would you be—interested—in . . ." [She smashes the pencil on the table and springs up.] You never get anywhere with direct appeals!

STELLA: [With a laugh.] Don't be so ridiculous, darling!

BLANCHE: But I'll think of something, I've got to think of—something! Don't laugh at me, Stella! Please, please don't—I—I want you to look at the contents of my purse! Here's what's in it! [She snatches her purse open.] Sixty-five measly cents in coin of the realm!

2. America's largest telegraph company throughout most of the twentieth century.

STELLA: [Crossing to bureau.] Stanley doesn't give me a regular allowance, he likes to pay bills himself, but—this morning he gave me ten dollars to smooth things over. You take five of it, Blanche, and I'll keep the rest.

BLANCHE: Oh, no. No, Stella.

STELLA: [Insisting.] I know how it helps your morale just having a little pocket-money on you.

BLANCHE: No, thank you—I'll take to the streets!

STELLA: Talk sense! How did you happen to get so low on funds?

BLANCHE: Money just goes—it goes places. [She rubs her forehead.] Sometime today I've got to get hold of a Bromo³

STELLA: I'll fix you one now.

BLANCHE: Not yet—I've got to keep thinking!

STELLA: I wish you'd just let things go, at least for a—while.

BLANCHE: Stella, I can't live with him! You can, he's your husband. But how could I stay here with him, after last night, with just those curtains between us?

STELLA: Blanche, you saw him at his worst last night.

BLANCHE: On the contrary, I saw him at his best! What such a man has to offer is animal force and he gave a wonderful exhibition of that! But the only way to live with such a man is to—go to bed with him! And that's your job—not mine!

STELLA: After you've rested a little, you'll see it's going to work out. You don't have to worry about anything while you're here. I mean—expenses . . .

BLANCHE: I have to plan for us both, to get us both—out!

STELLA: You take it for granted that I am in something that I want to get out of.

BLANCHE: I take it for granted that you still have sufficient memory of Belle Reve to find this place and these poker players impossible to live with.

STELLA: Well, you're taking entirely too much for granted.

BLANCHE: I can't believe you're in earnest.

STELLA: No?

BLANCHE: I understand how it happened—a little. You saw him in uniform, an officer, not here but—

STELLA: I'm not sure it would have made any difference where I saw him.

BLANCHE: Now don't say it was one of those mysterious electric things between people! If you do I'll laugh in your face.

STELLA: I am not going to say anything more at all about it!

BLANCHE: All right, then, don't!

STELLA: But there are things that happen between a man and a woman in the dark—that sort of make everything else seem—unimportant. [Pause.]

BLANCHE: What you are talking about is brutal desire—just—Desire!—the name of that rattle-trap streetcar that bangs through the Quarter, up one old narrow street and down another. . . .

STELLA: Haven't you ever ridden on that streetcar?

BLANCHE: It brought me here.—Where I'm not wanted and where I'm ashamed to be. . . .

STELLA: Then don't you think your superior attitude is a bit out of place?

3. Short for "Bromo Seltzer," a headache remedy.

BLANCHE: I am not being or feeling at all superior, Stella. Believe me I'm not! It's just this. This is how I look at it. A man like that is someone to go out with—once—twice—three times when the devil is in you. But live with? Have a child by?

STELLA: I have told you I love him.

BLANCHE: Then I tremble for you! I just—tremble for you. . . .

STELLA: I can't help your trembling if you insist on trembling!

[There is a pause.]

BLANCHE: May I—speak—plainly?

STELLA: Yes, do. Go ahead. As plainly as you want to.

[Outside, a train approaches. They are silent till the noise subsides. They are both in the bedroom. Under cover of the train's noise STANLEY enters from outside. He stands unseen by the women, holding some packages in his arms, and overhears their following conversation. He wears an undershirt and grease-stained seersucker pants.]

BLANCHE: Well—if you'll forgive me—he's common!

STELLA: Why, yes, I suppose he is.

BLANCHE: Suppose! You can't have forgotten that much of our bringing up, Stella, that you just suppose that any part of a gentleman's in his nature! Not one particle, no! Oh, if he was just—ordinary! Just plain—but good and wholesome, but—no. There's something downright—bestial—about him! You're hating me saying this, aren't you?

STELLA: [Coldly.] Go on and say it all, Blanche.

BLANCHE: He acts like an animal, has an animal's habits! Eats like one, moves like one, talks like one! There's even something—sub-human—something not quite to the stage of humanity yet! Yes, something—ape-like about him, like one of those pictures I've seen in—anthropological studies! Thousands and thousands of years have passed him right by, and there he is—Stanley Kowalski—survivor of the Stone Age! Bearing the raw meat home from the kill in the jungle! And you—you here—waiting for him! Maybe he'll strike you or maybe grunt and kiss you! That is, if kisses have been discovered yet! Night falls and the other apes gather! There in the front of the cave, all grunting like him, and swilling and gnawing and hulking! His poker night! you call it—this party of apes! Somebody growls—some creature snatches at something—the fight is on! God! Maybe we are a long way from being made in God's image, but Stella—my sister—there has been some progress since then! Such things as art—as poetry and music—such kinds of new light have come into the world since then! In some kinds of people some tenderer feelings have had some little beginning! That we have got to make grow! And cling to, and hold as our flag! In this dark march toward whatever it is we're approaching. . . . Don't—don't hang back with the brutes!

[Another train passes outside. STANLEY hesitates, licking his lips. Then suddenly he turns stealthily about and withdraws through front door. The women are still unaware of his presence. When the train has passed he calls through the closed front door.]

STANLEY: Hey! Hey, Stella!

STELLA: [Who has listened gravely to BLANCHE.] Stanley!

BLANCHE: Stell, I—

[But STELLA has gone to the front door. STANLEY enters casually with his packages.]

STANLEY: Hiyuh, Stella. Blanche back?

STELLA: Yes, she's back.

STANLEY: Hiyuh, Blanche. [He grins at her.]

STELLA: You must've got under the car.

STANLEY: Them darn mechanics at Fritz's don't know their ass fr'm—Hey!

[STELLA has embraced him with both arms, fiercely, and full in the view of BLANCHE. He laughs and clasps her head to him. Over her head he grins through the curtains at BLANCHE. As the lights fade away, with a lingering brightness on their embrace, the music of the "Blue Piano" and trumpet and drums is heard.]

Scene 5

BLANCHE is seated in the bedroom fanning herself with a palm leaf as she reads over a just-completed letter. Suddenly she bursts into a peal of laughter. STELLA is dressing in the bedroom.

STELLA: What are you laughing at, honey?

BLANCHE: Myself, myself, for being such a liar! I'm writing a letter to Shep.

[She picks up the letter.] "Darling Shep. I am spending the summer on the wing, making flying visits here and there. And who knows, perhaps I shall take a sudden notion to swoop down on Dallas! How would you feel about that? Ha-ha! [She laughs nervously and brightly, touching her throat as if actually talking to Shep.] Forewarned is forearmed, as they say!"—How does that sound?

STELLA: Uh-huh . . .

BLANCHE: [Going on nervously.] "Most of my sister's friends go north in the summer but some have homes on the Gulf and there has been a continued round of entertainments, teas, cocktails, and luncheons—"

[A disturbance is heard upstairs at the Hubbells' apartment.]

STELLA: Eunice seems to be having some trouble with Steve. [EUNICE'S voice shouts in terrible wrath.]

EUNICE: I heard about you and that blonde!

STEVE: That's a damn lie!

EUNICE: You ain't pulling the wool over my eyes! I wouldn't mind if you'd stay down at the Four Deuces, but you always going up.

STEVE: Who ever seen me up?

EUNICE: I seen you chasing her 'round the balcony—I'm gonna call the vice squad!

STEVE: Don't you throw that at me!

EUNICE: [Shrieking.] You hit me! I'm gonna call the police!

[A clatter of aluminum striking a wall is heard, followed by a man's angry roar, shouts, and overturned furniture. There is a crash; then a relative hush.]

BLANCHE: [Brightly.] Did he kill her?

[EUNICE appears on the steps in daemonic disorder.]

STELLA: No! She's coming downstairs.

EUNICE: Call the police, I'm going to call the police! [She rushes around the corner.]

[They laugh lightly. STANLEY comes around the corner in his green and scarlet silk bowling shirt. He trots up the steps and bangs into the kitchen. BLANCHE registers his entrance with nervous gestures.]

STANLEY: What's a matter with Eun-uss?

STELLA: She and Steve had a row. Has she got the police?

STANLEY: Naw. She's gettin' a drink.

STELLA: That's much more practical!

[STEVE comes down nursing a bruise on his forehead and looks in the door.]

STEVE: She here?

STANLEY: Naw, naw. At the Four Deuces.

STEVE: That rutting hunk! [He looks around the corner a bit timidly, then turns with affected boldness and runs after her.]

BLANCHE: I must jot that down in my notebook. Ha-ha! I'm compiling a notebook of quaint little words and phrases I've picked up here.

STANLEY: You won't pick up nothing here you ain't heard before.

BLANCHE: Can I count on that?

STANLEY: You can count on it up to five hundred.

BLANCHE: That's a mighty high number. [He jerks open the bureau drawer, slams it shut and throws shoes in a corner. At each noise BLANCHE winces slightly. Finally she speaks.] What sign were you born under?

STANLEY: [While he is dressing.] Sign?

BLANCHE: Astrological sign. I bet you were born under Aries. Aries people are forceful and dynamic. They dote on noise! They love to bang things around! You must have had lots of banging around in the army and now that you're out, you make up for it by treating inanimate objects with such a fury!

[STELLA has been going in and out of closet during this scene. Now she pops her head out of the closet.]

STELLA: Stanley was born just five minutes after Christmas.

BLANCHE: Capricorn—the Goat!

STANLEY: What sign were you born under?

BLANCHE: Oh, my birthday's next month, the fifteenth of September; that's under Virgo.

STANLEY: What's Virgo?

BLANCHE: Virgo is the Virgin.

STANLEY: [Contemptuously.] Hah! [He advances a little as he knots his tie.] Say, do you happen to know somebody named Shaw?

[Her face expresses a faint shock. She reaches for the cologne bottle and dampens her handkerchief as she answers carefully.]

BLANCHE: Why, everybody knows somebody named Shaw!

STANLEY: Well, this somebody named Shaw is under the impression he met you in Laurel, but I figure he must have got you mixed up with some other party because this other party is someone he met at a hotel called the Flamingo.

[BLANCHE laughs breathlessly as she touches the cologne-dampened handkerchief to her temples.]

BLANCHE: I'm afraid he does have me mixed up with this "other party." The Hotel Flamingo is not the sort of establishment I would dare to be seen in!

STANLEY: You know of it?

BLANCHE: Yes, I've seen it and smelled it.

STANLEY: You must've got pretty close if you could smell it.

BLANCHE: The odor of cheap perfume is penetrating.

STANLEY: That stuff you use is expensive?

BLANCHE: Twenty-five dollars an ounce! I'm nearly out. That's just a hint if you want to remember my birthday! [She speaks lightly but her voice has a note of fear.]

STANLEY: Shaw must've got you mixed up. He goes in and out of Laurel all the time so he can check on it and clear up any mistake.

[He turns away and crosses to the portieres. BLANCHE closes her eyes as if faint. Her hand trembles as she lifts the handkerchief again to her forehead. STEVE and EUNICE come around corner. STEVE's arm is around EUNICE's shoulder and she is sobbing luxuriously and he is cooing love-words. There is a murmur of thunder as they go slowly upstairs in a tight embrace.]

STANLEY: [To STELLA.] I'll wait for you at the Four Deuces!

STELLA: Hey! Don't I rate one kiss?

STANLEY: Not in front of your sister.

[He goes out. BLANCHE rises from her chair. She seems faint; looks about her with an expression of almost panic.]

BLANCHE: Stella! What have you heard about me?

STELLA: Huh?

BLANCHE: What have people been telling you about me?

STELLA: Telling?

BLANCHE: You haven't heard any—unkind—gossip about me?

STELLA: Why, no, Blanche, of course not!

BLANCHE: Honey, there was—a good deal of talk in Laurel.

STELLA: About you, Blanche?

BLANCHE: I wasn't so good the last two years or so, after Belle Reve had started to slip through my fingers.

STELLA: All of us do things we—

BLANCHE: I never was hard or self-sufficient enough. When people are soft—soft people have got to shimmer and glow—they've got to put on soft colors, the colors of butterfly wings, and put a—paper lantern over the light. . . . It isn't enough to be soft and attractive. And I—I'm fading now! I don't know how much longer I can turn the trick. [The afternoon has faded to dusk. STELLA goes into the bedroom and turns on the light under the paper lantern. She holds a bottled soft drink in her hand.] Have you been listening to me?

STELLA: I don't listen to you when you are being morbid! [She advances with the bottled Coke.]

BLANCHE: [With abrupt change to gaiety.] Is that Coke for me?

STELLA: Not for anyone else!

BLANCHE: Why, you precious thing, you! Is it just Coke?

STELLA: [Turning.] You mean you want a shot in it!

BLANCHE: Well, honey, a shot never does a Coke any harm! Let me! You mustn't wait on me!

STELLA: I like to wait on you, Blanche. It makes it seem more like home. [She goes into the kitchen, finds a glass and pours a shot of whiskey into it.]

BLANCHE: I have to admit I love to be waited on . . . [She rushes into the bedroom. STELLA goes to her with the glass. BLANCHE suddenly clutches STELLA's free hand with a moaning sound and presses the hand to her lips. STELLA is embarrassed by her show of emotion. BLANCHE speaks in a choked voice.] You're—you're—so good to me! And I—

STELLA: Blanche.

BLANCHE: I know, I won't! You hate me to talk sentimental! But honey, believe I feel things more than I tell you! I won't stay long! I won't, I promise I—

STELLA: Blanche!

BLANCHE: [Hysterically.] I won't, I promise, I'll go! Go soon! I will really! I won't hang around until he—throws me out. . . .

STELLA: Now will you stop talking foolish?

BLANCHE: Yes, honey. Watch how you pour—that fizzy stuff foams over!

[BLANCHE laughs shrilly and grabs the glass, but her hand shakes so it almost slips from her grasp. STELLA pours the Coke into the glass. It foams over and spills. BLANCHE gives a piercing cry.]

STELLA: [Shocked by the cry.] Heavens!

BLANCHE: Right on my pretty white skirt!

STELLA: Oh . . . Use my hanky. Blot gently.

BLANCHE: [Slowly recovering.] I know—gently—gently . . .

STELLA: Did it stain?

BLANCHE: Not a bit. Ha-ha! Isn't that lucky? [She sits down shakily, taking a grateful drink. She holds the glass in both hands and continues to laugh a little.]

STELLA: Why did you scream like that?

BLANCHE: I don't know why I screamed! [Continuing nervously.] Mitch—Mitch is coming at seven. I guess I am just feeling nervous about our relations. [She begins to talk rapidly and breathlessly.] He hasn't gotten a thing but a good-night kiss, that's all I have given him, Stella. I want his respect. And men don't want anything they get too easy. But on the other hand men lose interest quickly. Especially when the girl is over—thirty. They think a girl over thirty ought to—the vulgar term is—“put out.” . . . And I—I’m not “putting out.” Of course he—he doesn’t know—I mean I haven’t informed him—of my real age!

STELLA: Why are you sensitive about your age?

BLANCHE: Because of hard knocks my vanity’s been given. What I mean is—he thinks I’m sort of—prim and proper, you know! [She laughs out sharply.] I want to deceive him enough to make him—want me . . .

STELLA: Blanche, do you want him?

BLANCHE: I want to rest! I want to breathe quietly again! Yes—I want Mitch . . . very badly! Just think! If it happens! I can leave here and not be anyone’s problem. . . .

[STANLEY comes around the corner with a drink under his belt.]

STANLEY: [Bawling.] Hey, Steve! Hey, Eunice! Hey, Stella!

[There are joyous calls from above. Trumpet and drums are heard from around the corner.]

STELLA: [Kissing BLANCHE impulsively.] It will happen!

BLANCHE: [Doubtfully.] It will?

STELLA: It will! [She goes across into the kitchen, looking back at BLANCHE.] It will, honey, it will. . . . But don’t take another drink! [Her voice catches as she goes out the door to meet her husband.]

[BLANCHE sinks faintly back in her chair with her drink. EUNICE shrieks with laughter and runs down the steps. STEVE bounds after her with goat-like screeches and chases her around corner. STANLEY and STELLA twine arms as they follow, laughing. Dusk settles deeper. The music from the Four Deuces is slow and blue.]

BLANCHE: Ah, me, ah, me, ah, me . . . [Her eyes fall shut and the palm leaf fan drops from her fingers. She slaps her hand on the chair arm a couple of times. There is a little glimmer of lightning about the building. A YOUNG MAN comes along the street and rings the bell.] Come in. [The YOUNG MAN appears through the portieres. She regards him with interest.] Well, well! What can I do for you?

YOUNG MAN: I’m collecting for The Evening Star.

BLANCHE: I didn’t know that stars took up collections.

YOUNG MAN: It’s the paper.

BLANCHE: I know, I was joking—feebly! Will you—have a drink?

YOUNG MAN: No, ma’am. No, thank you. I can’t drink on the job.

BLANCHE: Oh, well, now, let’s see. . . . No, I don’t have a dime! I’m not the lady of the house. I’m her sister from Mississippi. I’m one of those poor relations you’ve heard about.

YOUNG MAN: That’s all right. I’ll drop by later. [He starts to go out. She approaches a little.]

BLANCHE: Hey! [He turns back shyly. She puts a cigarette in a long holder.] Could you give me a light? [She crosses toward him. They meet at the door between the two rooms.]

YOUNG MAN: Sure. [He takes out a lighter.] This doesn’t always work.

BLANCHE: It's temperamental? [It flares.] Ah!—thank you. [He starts away again.] Hey! [He turns again, still more uncertainly. She goes close to him.] Uh—what time is it?

YOUNG MAN: Fifteen of seven, ma'am.

BLANCHE: So late? Don't you just love these long rainy afternoons in New Orleans when an hour isn't just an hour—but a little piece of eternity dropped into your hands—and who knows what to do with it? [She touches his shoulders.] You—uh—didn't get wet in the rain?

YOUNG MAN: No, ma'am. I stepped inside.

BLANCHE: In a drugstore? And had a soda?

YOUNG MAN: Uh-huh.

BLANCHE: Chocolate?

YOUNG MAN: No, ma'am. Cherry.

BLANCHE: [Laughing.] Cherry!

YOUNG MAN: A cherry soda.

BLANCHE: You make my mouth water. [She touches his cheek lightly, and smiles. Then she goes to the trunk.]

YOUNG MAN: Well, I'd better be going—

BLANCHE: [Stopping him.] Young man! [He turns. She takes a large, gossamer scarf from the trunk and drapes it about her shoulders. In the ensuing pause, the "Blue Piano" is heard. It continues through the rest of this scene and the opening of the next. The YOUNG MAN clears his throat and looks yearningly at the door.] Young man! Young, young, young man! Has anyone ever told you that you look like a young Prince out of the Arabian Nights?⁴ [The YOUNG MAN laughs uncomfortably and stands like a bashful kid. BLANCHE speaks softly to him.] Well, you do, honey lamb! Come here. I want to kiss you, just once, softly and sweetly on your mouth! [Without waiting for him to accept, she crosses quickly to him and presses her lips to his.] Now run along, now, quickly! It would be nice to keep you, but I've got to be good—and keep my hands off children.

[He stares at her a moment. She opens the door for him and blows a kiss at him as he goes down the steps with a dazed look. She stands there a little dreamily after he has disappeared. Then MITCH appears around the corner with a bunch of roses.]

BLANCHE: [Gaily.] Look who's coming! My Rosenkavalier! Bow to me first . . . now present them! Ahhhh—Merciiii!⁵ [She looks at him over them, coquettishly pressing them to her lips. He beams at her self-consciously.]

Scene 6

It is about two a.m. on the same evening. The outer wall of the building is visible. BLANCHE and MITCH come in. The utter exhaustion which only a neurasthenic personality⁶ can know is evident in BLANCHE's voice and manner. MITCH is stolid

4. The Arabian Nights is a collection of Persian, Indian, and Arabic folktales.

5. Merci: thank you (French). Rosenkavalier: Knight of the Rose (German), title of a romantic opera (1911) by Richard Strauss (1864–1949).

6. Nineteenth-century diagnostic term for a psychological disorder characterized by nervous exhaustion and other physical symptoms.

but depressed. They have probably been out to the amusement park on Lake Pontchartrain, for MITCH is bearing, upside down, a plaster statuette of Mae West,⁷ the sort of prize won at shooting galleries and carnival games of chance.

BLANCHE: [Stopping lifelessly at the steps.] Well—[MITCH laughs uneasily.] Well . . .

MITCH: I guess it must be pretty late—and you're tired.

BLANCHE: Even the hot tamale man has deserted the street, and he hangs on till the end. [MITCH laughs uneasily again.] How will you get home?

MITCH: I'll walk over to Bourbon and catch an owl-car.⁸

BLANCHE: [Laughing grimly.] Is that street-car named Desire still grinding along the tracks at this hour?

MITCH: [Heavily.] I'm afraid you haven't gotten much fun out of this evening, Blanche.

BLANCHE: I spoiled it for you.

MITCH: No, you didn't, but I felt all the time that I wasn't giving you much—entertainment.

BLANCHE: I simply couldn't rise to the occasion. That was all. I don't think I've ever tried so hard to be gay and made such a dismal mess of it. I get ten points for trying!—I did try.

MITCH: Why did you try if you didn't feel like it, Blanche?

BLANCHE: I was just obeying the law of nature.

MITCH: Which law is that?

BLANCHE: The one that says the lady must entertain the gentleman—or no dice! See if you can locate my door key in this purse. When I'm so tired my fingers are all thumbs!

MITCH: [Rooting in her purse.] This it?

BLANCHE: No, honey, that's the key to my trunk which I must soon be packing.

MITCH: You mean you are leaving here soon?

BLANCHE: I've overstayed my welcome.

MITCH: This it?

[The music fades away.]

BLANCHE: Eureka! Honey, you open the door while I take a last look at the sky. [She leans on the porch rail. He opens the door and stands awkwardly behind her.] I'm looking for the Pleiades,⁹ the Seven Sisters, but these girls are not out tonight. Oh, yes they are, there they are! God bless them! All in a bunch going home from their little bridge party. . . . Y' get the door open? Good boy! I guess you—want to go now. . . .

[He shuffles and coughs a little.]

MITCH: Can I—uh—kiss you—good night?

BLANCHE: Why do you always ask me if you may?

MITCH: I don't know whether you want me to or not.

7. American star of stage and film (1892–1980). Lake Pontchartrain: large coastal inlet in southern Louisiana; New Orleans is located on its south shore. 8. All-night streetcar.

9. Constellation named for the seven daughters of Atlas who were changed into stars.

BLANCHE: Why should you be so doubtful?

MITCH: That night when we parked by the lake and I kissed you, you—

BLANCHE: Honey, it wasn't the kiss I objected to. I liked the kiss very much. It was the other little—familiarity—that I—felt obliged to—discourage. . . . I didn't resent it! Not a bit in the world! In fact, I was somewhat flattered that you—desired me! But, honey, you know as well as I do that a single girl, a girl alone in the world, has got to keep a firm hold on her emotions or she'll be lost!

MITCH: [Solemnly.] Lost?

BLANCHE: I guess you are used to girls that like to be lost. The kind that get lost immediately, on the first date!

MITCH: I like you to be exactly the way that you are, because in all my—experience—I have never known anyone like you. [BLANCHE looks at him gravely; then she bursts into laughter and then claps a hand to her mouth.] Are you laughing at me?

BLANCHE: No, honey. The lord and lady of the house have not yet returned, so come in. We'll have a nightcap. Let's leave the lights off. Shall we?

MITCH: You just—do what you want to.

[BLANCHE precedes him into the kitchen. The outer wall of the building disappears and the interiors of the two rooms can be dimly seen.]

BLANCHE: [Remaining in the first room.] The other room's more comfortable—go on in. This crashing around in the dark is my search for some liquor.

MITCH: You want a drink?

BLANCHE: I want you to have a drink! You have been so anxious and solemn all evening, and so have I; we have both been anxious and solemn and now for these few last remaining moments of our lives together—I want to create—*joie de vivre!*¹ I'm lighting a candle.

MITCH: That's good.

BLANCHE: We are going to be very Bohemian. We are going to pretend that we are sitting in a little artists' cafe on the Left Bank in Paris! [She lights a candle stub and puts it in a bottle.] *Je suis la Dame aux Camélias! Vous êtes—Armand!*² Understand French?

MITCH: [Heavily.] Naw. Naw, I—

BLANCHE: *Voulez-vous couchez avec moi ce soir? Vous ne comprenez pas? Ah, quelle dommage!*³—I mean it's a damned good thing. . . . I've found some liquor! Just enough for two shots without any dividends, honey. . . .

MITCH: [Heavily.] That's—good.

[She enters the bedroom with the drinks and the candle.]

BLANCHE: Sit down! Why don't you take off your coat and loosen your collar?

MITCH: I better leave it on.

BLANCHE: No. I want you to be comfortable.

1. Joy of life (French).

2. I am the Lady of the Camélias! You are—Armand! (French). Both are characters in the popular romantic play La Dame aux Camélias (1852) by the French author Alexandre Dumas (1824–95); she is a courtesan who gives up her true love, Armand. Left Bank: section of Paris on the westward (“left”) bank of the river Seine, long associated with students and artists.

3. Would you like to sleep with me this evening? You don't understand? Ah, what a pity! (French).

MITCH: I am ashamed of the way I perspire. My shirt is sticking to me.

BLANCHE: Perspiration is healthy. If people didn't perspire they would die in five minutes. [She takes his coat from him.] This is a nice coat. What kind of material is it?

MITCH: They call that stuff alpaca.

BLANCHE: Oh. Alpaca.

MITCH: It's very light-weight alpaca.

BLANCHE: Oh. Light-weight alpaca.

MITCH: I don't like to wear a wash-coat⁴ even in summer because I sweat through it.

BLANCHE: Oh.

MITCH: And it don't look neat on me. A man with a heavy build has got to be careful of what he puts on him so he don't look too clumsy.

BLANCHE: You are not too heavy.

MITCH: You don't think I am?

BLANCHE: You are not the delicate type. You have a massive bone-structure and a very imposing physique.

MITCH: Thank you. Last Christmas I was given a membership to the New Orleans Athletic Club.

BLANCHE: Oh, good.

MITCH: It was the finest present I ever was given. I work out there with the weights and I swim and I keep myself fit. When I started there, I was getting soft in the belly but now my belly is hard. It is so hard now that a man can punch me in the belly and it don't hurt me. Punch me! Go on! See? [She pokes lightly at him.]

BLANCHE: Gracious. [Her hand touches her chest.]

MITCH: Guess how much I weigh, Blanche?

BLANCHE: Oh, I'd say in the vicinity of—one hundred and eighty?

MITCH: Guess again.

BLANCHE: Not that much?

MITCH: No. More.

BLANCHE: Well, you're a tall man and you can carry a good deal of weight without looking awkward.

MITCH: I weigh two hundred and seven pounds and I'm six feet one and one half inches tall in my bare feet—without shoes on. And that is what I weigh stripped.

BLANCHE: Oh, my goodness, me! It's awe-inspiring.

MITCH: [Embarrassed.] My weight is not a very interesting subject to talk about. [He hesitates for a moment.] What's yours?

BLANCHE: My weight?

MITCH: Yes.

BLANCHE: Guess!

MITCH: Let me lift you.

BLANCHE: Samson!⁵ Go on, lift me. [He comes behind her and puts his hands on her waist and raises her lightly off the ground.] Well?

MITCH: You are light as a feather.

4. Light washable jacket. 5. Legendary strong man, an Israelite in the Old Testament.

BLANCHE: Ha-ha! [He lowers her but keeps his hands on her waist. BLANCHE speaks with an affectation of demureness.] You may release me now.

MITCH: Huh?

BLANCHE: [Gaily.] I said unhand me, sir. [He fumblingly embraces her. Her voice sounds gently reproving.] Now, Mitch. Just because Stanley and Stella aren't at home is no reason why you shouldn't behave like a gentleman.

MITCH: Just give me a slap whenever I step out of bounds.

BLANCHE: That won't be necessary. You're a natural gentleman, one of the very few that are left in the world. I don't want you to think that I am severe and old maid school-teacherish or anything like that. It's just—well—

MITCH: Huh?

BLANCHE: I guess it is just that I have—old-fashioned ideals! [She rolls her eyes, knowing he cannot see her face. MITCH goes to the front door. There is a considerable silence between them. BLANCHE sighs and MITCH coughs self-consciously.]

MITCH: [Finally.] Where's Stanley and Stella tonight?

BLANCHE: They have gone out. With Mr. and Mrs. Hubbell upstairs.

MITCH: Where did they go?

BLANCHE: I think they were planning to go to a midnight prevue at Loew's State.

MITCH: We should all go out together some night.

BLANCHE: No. That wouldn't be a good plan.

MITCH: Why not?

BLANCHE: You are an old friend of Stanley's?

MITCH: We was together in the Two-forty-first.⁶

BLANCHE: I guess he talks to you frankly?

MITCH: Sure.

BLANCHE: Has he talked to you about me?

MITCH: Oh—not very much.

BLANCHE: The way you say that, I suspect that he has.

MITCH: No, he hasn't said much.

BLANCHE: But what he has said. What would you say his attitude toward me was?

MITCH: Why do you want to ask that?

BLANCHE: Well—

MITCH: Don't you get along with him?

BLANCHE: What do you think?

MITCH: I don't think he understands you.

BLANCHE: That is putting it mildly. If it weren't for Stella about to have a baby, I wouldn't be able to endure things here.

MITCH: He isn't—nice to you?

BLANCHE: He is insufferably rude. Goes out of his way to offend me.

MITCH: In what way, Blanche?

BLANCHE: Why, in every conceivable way.

MITCH: I'm surprised to hear that.

6. Battalion of engineers in World War II.

BLANCHE: Are you?

MITCH: Well, I—don't see how anybody could be rude to you.

BLANCHE: It's really a pretty frightful situation. You see, there's no privacy here.

There's just these portieres between the two rooms at night. He stalks through the rooms in his underwear at night. And I have to ask him to close the bathroom door. That sort of commonness isn't necessary. You probably wonder why I don't move out. Well, I'll tell you frankly. A teacher's salary is barely sufficient for her living expenses. I didn't save a penny last year and so I had to come here for the summer. That's why I have to put up with my sister's husband. And he has to put up with me, apparently so much against his wishes. . . . Surely he must have told you how much he hates he!

MITCH: I don't think he hates you.

BLANCHE: He hates me. Or why would he insult me? The first time I laid eyes on him I thought to myself, that man is my executioner! That man will destroy me, unless—

MITCH: Blanche—

BLANCHE: Yes, honey?

MITCH: Can I ask you a question?

BLANCHE: Yes. What?

MITCH: How old are you?

[She makes a nervous gesture.]

BLANCHE: Why do you want to know?

MITCH: I talked to my mother about you and she said, "How old is Blanche?"

And I wasn't able to tell her. [There is another pause.]

BLANCHE: You talked to your mother about me?

MITCH: Yes.

BLANCHE: Why?

MITCH: I told my mother how nice you were, and I liked you.

BLANCHE: Were you sincere about that?

MITCH: You know I was.

BLANCHE: Why did your mother want to know my age?

MITCH: Mother is sick.

BLANCHE: I'm sorry to hear it. Badly?

MITCH: She won't live long. Maybe just a few months.

BLANCHE: Oh.

MITCH: She worries because I'm not settled.

BLANCHE: Oh.

MITCH: She wants me to be settled down before she— [His voice is hoarse and he clears his throat twice, shuffling nervously around with his hands in and out of his pockets.]

BLANCHE: You love her very much, don't you?

MITCH: Yes.

BLANCHE: I think you have a great capacity for devotion. You will be lonely when she passes on, won't you? [MITCH clears his throat and nods.] I understand what that is.

MITCH: To be lonely?

BLANCHE: I loved someone, too, and the person I loved I lost.

MITCH: Dead? [She crosses to the window and sits on the sill, looking out. She pours herself another drink.] A man?

BLANCHE: He was a boy, just a boy, when I was a very young girl. When I was sixteen, I made the discovery—love. All at once and much, much too completely. It was like you suddenly turned a blinding light on something that had always been half in shadow, that's how it struck the world for me. But I was unlucky. Deluded. There was something different about the boy, a nervousness, a softness and tenderness which wasn't like a man's, although he wasn't the least bit effeminate looking—still—that thing was there. . . . He came to me for help. I didn't know that. I didn't find out anything till after our marriage when we'd run away and come back and all I knew was I'd failed him in some mysterious way and wasn't able to give the help he needed but couldn't speak of! He was in the quicksands and clutching at me—but I wasn't holding him out, I was slipping in with him! I didn't know that. I didn't know anything except I loved him unendurably but without being able to help him or help myself. Then I found out. In the worst of all possible ways. By coming suddenly into a room that I thought was empty—which wasn't empty, but had two people in it . . . the boy I had married and an older man who had been his friend for years. . . . [A locomotive is heard approaching outside. She claps her hands to her ears and crouches over. The headlight of the locomotive glares into the room as it thunders past. As the noise recedes she straightens slowly and continues speaking.] Afterward we pretended that nothing had been discovered. Yes, the three of us drove out to Moon Lake Casino,⁷ very drunk and laughing all the way. [Polka music sounds, in a minor key faint with distance.] We danced the "Varsouviana!"⁸ Suddenly in the middle of the dance the boy I had married broke away from me and ran out of the casino. A few moments later—a shot! [The polka stops abruptly. BLANCHE rises stiffly. Then, the polka resumes in a major key.] I ran out—all did!—all ran and gathered about the terrible thing at the edge of the lake! I couldn't get near for the crowding. Then somebody caught my arm. "Don't go any closer! Come back! You don't want to see!" See? See what! Then I heard voices say—Allan! Allan! The Grey boy! He'd stuck the revolver into his mouth, and fired—so that the back of his head had been—blown away! [She sways and covers her face.] It was because—on the dance floor—unable to stop myself—I'd suddenly said—"I saw! I know! You disgust me. . . ." And then the searchlight which had been turned on the world was turned off again and never for one moment since has there been any light that's stronger than this—kitchen—candle. . . .

[MITCH gets up awkwardly and moves toward her a little. The polka music increases. MITCH stands beside her.]

MITCH: [Drawing her slowly into his arms.] You need somebody. And I need somebody, too. Could it be—you and me, Blanche?

[She stares at him vacantly for a moment. Then with a soft cry huddles in his embrace. She makes a sobbing effort to speak but the words won't come. He kisses her forehead and her eyes and finally her lips. The polka tune fades out. Her breath is drawn and released in long, grateful sobs.]

BLANCHE: Sometimes—there's God—so quickly!

Scene 7

It is late afternoon in mid-September.

The portieres are open and a table is set for a birthday supper, with cake and flowers.

STELLA is completing the decorations as STANLEY comes in.

STANLEY: What's all this stuff for?

STELLA: Honey, it's Blanche's birthday.

STANLEY: She here?

STELLA: In the bathroom.

STANLEY: [Mimicking.] "Washing out some things"?

STELLA: I reckon so.

STANLEY: How long she been in there?

STELLA: All afternoon.

STANLEY: [Mimicking.] "Soaking in a hot tub"?

STELLA: Yes.

STANLEY: Temperature 100 on the nose, and she soaks herself in a hot tub.

STELLA: She says it cools her off for the evening.

STANLEY: And you run out an' get her cokes, I suppose? And serve 'em to Her Majesty in the tub? [STELLA shrugs.] Set down here a minute.

STELLA: Stanley, I've got things to do.

STANLEY: Set down! I've got th' dope on your big sister, Stella.

STELLA: Stanley, stop picking on Blanche.

STANLEY: That girl calls me common!

STELLA: Lately you been doing all you can think of to rub her the wrong way, Stanley, and Blanche is sensitive and you've got to realize that Blanche and I grew up under very different circumstances than you did.

STANLEY: So I been told. And told and told and told! You know she's been feeding us a pack of lies here?

STELLA: No, I don't and—

STANLEY: Well, she has, however. But now the cat's out of the bag! I found out some things!

STELLA: What—things?

STANLEY: Things I already suspected. But now I got proof from the most reliable sources—which I have checked on!

[BLANCHE is singing in the bathroom a saccharine popular ballad which is used contrapuntally⁹ with STANLEY'S speech.]

STELLA: [To STANLEY.] Lower your voice!

STANLEY: Some canary bird, huh!

9. Musical term meaning "in an alternating or contrasting manner." Saccharine: cloyingly sweet; overly sentimental.

STELLA: Now please tell me quietly what you think you've found out about my sister.

STANLEY: Lie Number One: All this squeamishness she puts on! You should just know the line she's been feeding to Mitch. He thought she had never been more than kissed by a fellow! But Sister Blanche is no lily! Ha-ha! Some lily she is!

STELLA: What have you heard and who from?

STANLEY: Our supply-man down at the plant has been going through Laurel for years and he knows all about her and everybody else in the town of Laurel knows all about her. She is as famous in Laurel as if she was the President of the United States, only she is not respected by any party! This supply-man stops at a hotel called the Flamingo.

BLANCHE: [Singing blithely.] "Say, it's only a paper moon, Sailing over a cardboard sea /—But it wouldn't be make-believe If you believed in me!"¹

STELLA: What about the—Flamingo?

STANLEY: She stayed there, too.

STELLA: My sister lived at Belle Reve.

STANLEY: This is after the home-place had slipped through her lily-white fingers! She moved to the Flamingo! A second-class hotel which has the advantage of not interfering in the private social life of the personalities there! The Flamingo is used to all kinds of goings-on. But even the management of the Flamingo was impressed by Dame Blanche! In fact they was so impressed by Dame Blanche that they requested her to turn in her room key—for permanently! This happened a couple of weeks before she showed here.

BLANCHE: [Singing.] "It's a Barnum and Bailey² world, Just as phony as it can be—/ But it wouldn't be make-believe If you believed in me!"

STELLA: What—contemptible—lies!

STANLEY: Sure, I can see how you would be upset by this. She pulled the wool over your eyes as much as Mitch's!

STELLA: It's pure invention! There's not a word of truth in it and if I were a man and this creature had dared to invent such things in my presence—

BLANCHE: [Singing.] "Without your love, / it's a honky-tonk parade! / Without your love, / It's a melody played / In a penny arcade . . ."

STANLEY: Honey, I told you I thoroughly checked on these stories! Now wait till I finish. The trouble with Dame Blanche was that she couldn't put on her act anymore in Laurel! They got wised up after two or three dates with her and then they quit, and she goes on to another, the same old line, same old act, same old hooey! But the town was too small for this to go on forever! And as time went by she became a town character. Regarded as not just different but downright loco—nuts. [STELLA draws back.] And for the last year or two she has been washed up like poison. That's why she's here this summer, visiting royalty, putting on all this act—because she's practically told by the mayor to get out of town! Yes, did you know there was an army camp near Laurel and your sister's was one of the places called "Out-of-Bounds"?

1. From "It's Only a Paper Moon" (1933), a popular song by Harold Arlen (1905–86).

2. P. T. Barnum (1810–91) and James Bailey (1847–1906), circus promoters of "The Greatest Show on Earth."

BLANCHE: "It's only a paper moon, / Just as phony as it can be— / But it wouldn't be make-believe / If you believed in me!"

STANLEY: Well, so much for her being such a refined and particular type of girl. Which brings us to Lie Number Two.

STELLA: I don't want to hear any more!

STANLEY: She's not going back to teach school! In fact I am willing to bet you that she never had no idea of returning to Laurel! She didn't resign temporarily from the high school because of her nerves! No, siree, Bob! She didn't. They kicked her out of that high school before the spring term ended—and I hate to tell you the reason that step was taken! A seventeen-year-old boy—she'd gotten mixed up with!

BLANCHE: "It's a Barnum and Bailey world, / Just as phony as it can be—"

[In the bathroom the water goes on loud; little breathless cries and peals of laughter are heard as if a child were frolicking in the tub.]

STELLA: This is making me—sick!

STANLEY: The boy's dad learned about it and got in touch with the high school superintendent. Boy, oh, boy, I'd like to have been in that office when Dame Blanche was called on the carpet! I'd like to have seen her trying to squirm out of that one! But they had her on the hook good and proper that time and she knew that the jig was all up! They told her she better move on to some fresh territory. Yep, it was practically a town ordinance passed against her!

[The bathroom door is opened and BLANCHE thrusts her head out, holding a towel about her hair.]

BLANCHE: Stella!

STELLA: [Faintly.] Yes, Blanche?

BLANCHE: Give me another bath-towel to dry my hair with. I've just washed it.

STELLA: Yes, Blanche. [She crosses in a dazed way from the kitchen to the bathroom door with a towel.]

BLANCHE: What's the matter, honey?

STELLA: Matter? Why?

BLANCHE: You have such a strange expression on your face!

STELLA: Oh—[She tries to laugh.] I guess I'm a little tired!

BLANCHE: Why don't you bathe, too, soon as I get out?

STANLEY: [Calling from the kitchen.] How soon is that going to be?

BLANCHE: Not so terribly long! Possess your soul in patience!³

STANLEY: It's not my soul, it's my kidneys I'm worried about! [BLANCHE slams the door. STANLEY laughs harshly. STELLA comes slowly back into the kitchen.] Well, what do you think of it?

STELLA: I don't believe all of those stories and I think your supply-man was mean and rotten to tell them. It's possible that some of the things he said are partly true. There are things about my sister I don't approve of—things that caused sorrow at home. She was always—flighty!

STANLEY: Flighty!

STELLA: But when she was young, very young, she married a boy who wrote poetry. . . . He was extremely good-looking. I think Blanche didn't just love

3. "In your patience you will possess your souls" (Luke 21.19).

him but worshipped the ground he walked on! Adored him and thought him almost too fine to be human! But then she found out—

STANLEY: What?

STELLA: This beautiful and talented young man was a degenerate. Didn't your supply-man give you that information?

STANLEY: All we discussed was recent history. That must have been a pretty long time ago.

STELLA: Yes, it was—a pretty long time ago. . . .

[STANLEY comes up and takes her by the shoulders rather gently. She gently withdraws from him. Automatically she starts sticking little pink candles in the birthday cake.]

STANLEY: How many candles you putting in that cake?

STELLA: I'll stop at twenty-five.

STANLEY: Is company expected?

STELLA: We asked Mitch to come over for cake and ice-cream.

[STANLEY looks a little uncomfortable. He lights a cigarette from the one he has just finished.]

STANLEY: I wouldn't be expecting Mitch over tonight.

[STELLA pauses in her occupation with candles and looks slowly around at STANLEY.]

STELLA: Why?

STANLEY: Mitch is a buddy of mine. We were in the same outfit together—Two-forty-first Engineers. We work in the same plant and now on the same bowling team. You think I could face him if—

STELLA: Stanley Kowalski, did you—did you repeat what that—?

STANLEY: You're goddam right I told him! I'd have that on my conscience the rest of my life if I knew all that stuff and let my best friend get caught!

STELLA: Is Mitch through with her?

STANLEY: Wouldn't you be if—?

STELLA: I said, Is Mitch through with her?

[BLANCHE'S voice is lifted again, serenely as a bell. She sings "But it wouldn't be make-believe / If you believed in me."]

STANLEY: No, I don't think he's necessarily through with her—just wised up!

STELLA: Stanley, she thought Mitch was—going to—going to marry her. I was hoping so, too.

STANLEY: Well, he's not going to marry her. Maybe he was, but he's not going to jump in a tank with a school of sharks—now! [He rises.] Blanche! Oh, Blanche! Can I please get in my bathroom? [There is a pause.]

BLANCHE: Yes, indeed, sir! Can you wait one second while I dry?

STANLEY: Having waited one hour I guess one second ought to pass in a hurry.

STELLA: And she hasn't got her job? Well, what will she do!

STANLEY: She's not stayin' here after Tuesday. You know that, don't you? Just to make sure I bought her ticket myself. A bus ticket.

STELLA: In the first place, Blanche wouldn't go on a bus.

STANLEY: She'll go on a bus and like it.

STELLA: No, she won't, no, she won't, Stanley!

STANLEY: She'll go! Period. P.S. She'll go Tuesday!

STELLA: [Slowly.] What'll—she—do? What on earth will she—do!

STANLEY: Her future is mapped out for her.

STELLA: What do you mean?

[BLANCHE sings.]

STANLEY: Hey, canary bird! Toots! Get OUT of the BATHROOM!

[The bathroom door flies open and BLANCHE emerges with a gay peal of laughter, but as STANLEY crosses past her, a frightened look appears in her face, almost a look of panic. He doesn't look at her but slams the bathroom door shut as he goes in.]

BLANCHE: [Snatching up a hairbrush.] Oh, I feel so good after my long, hot bath, I feel so good and cool and—rested!

STELLA: [Sadly and doubtfully from the kitchen.] Do you, Blanche?

BLANCHE: [Snatching up a hairbrush.] Yes, I do, so refreshed! [She tinkles her highball glass.] A hot bath and a long, cold drink always give me a brand new outlook on life! [She looks through the portieres at STELLA, standing between them, and slowly stops brushing.] Something has happened!—What is it?

STELLA: [Turning away quickly.] Why, nothing has happened, Blanche.

BLANCHE: You're lying! Something has! [She stares fearfully at STELLA, who pretends to be busy at the table. The distant piano goes into a hectic breakdown.]

Scene 8

Three quarters of an hour later.

The view through the big windows is fading gradually into a still-golden dusk. A torch of sunlight blazes on the side of a big water-tank or oil-drum across the empty lot toward the business district which is now pierced by pinpoints of lighted windows or windows reflecting the sunset.

The three people are completing a dismal birthday supper. STANLEY looks sullen. STELLA is embarrassed and sad.

BLANCHE has a tight, artificial smile on her drawn face. There is a fourth place at the table which is left vacant.

BLANCHE: [Suddenly.] Stanley, tell us a joke, tell us a funny story to make us all laugh. I don't know what's the matter, we're all so solemn. Is it because I've been stood up by my beau? [STELLA laughs feebly.] It's the first time in my entire experience with men, and I've had a good deal of all sorts, that I've actually been stood up by anybody! Ha-ha! I don't know how to take it. . . .

Tell us a funny little story, Stanley! Something to help us out.

STANLEY: I didn't think you liked my stories, Blanche.

BLANCHE: I like them when they're amusing but not indecent.

STANLEY: I don't know any refined enough for your taste.

BLANCHE: Then let me tell one.

STELLA: Yes, you tell one, Blanche. You used to know lots of good stories.

[The music fades.]

BLANCHE: Let me see, now. . . . I must run through my repertoire! Oh, yes—I love parrot stories! Do you all like parrot stories? Well, this one's about the old maid and the parrot. This old maid, she had a parrot that cursed a blue streak and knew more vulgar expressions than Mr. Kowalski!

STANLEY: Huh.

BLANCHE: And the only way to hush the parrot up was to put the cover back on its cage so it would think it was night and go back to sleep. Well, one morning the old maid had just uncovered the parrot for the day—when who should she see coming up the front walk but the preacher! Well, she rushed back to the parrot and slipped the cover back on the cage and then she let in the preacher. And the parrot was perfectly still, just as quiet as a mouse, but just as she was asking the preacher how much sugar he wanted in his coffee—the parrot broke the silence with a loud— [She whistles.] —and said—“God damn, but that was a short day!” [She throws back her head and laughs. STELLA also makes an ineffectual effort to seem amused. STANLEY pays no attention to the story but reaches way over the table to spear his fork into the remaining chop which he eats with his fingers.] Apparently Mr. Kowalski was not amused.

STELLA: Mr. Kowalski is too busy making a pig of himself to think of anything else!

STANLEY: That's right, baby.

STELLA: Your face and your fingers are disgustingly greasy. Go and wash up and then help me clear the table.

[He hurls a plate to the floor.]

STANLEY: That's how I'll clear the table! [He seizes her arm.] Don't ever talk that way to me! “Pig—Polack—disgusting—vulgar—greasy!”—them kind of words have been on your tongue and your sister's too much around here! What do you two think you are? A pair of queens? Remember what Huey Long⁴ said—“Every Man is a King!” And I am the king around here, so don't forget it! [He hurls a cup and saucer to the floor.] My place is cleared! You want me to clear your places?

[STELLA begins to cry weakly. STANLEY stalks out on the porch and lights a cigarette. The Negro entertainers around the corner are heard.]

BLANCHE: What happened while I was bathing? What did he tell you, Stella?

STELLA: Nothing, nothing, nothing!

BLANCHE: I think he told you something about Mitch and me! You know why Mitch didn't come but you won't tell me! [STELLA shakes her head helplessly.] I'm going to call him!

STELLA: I wouldn't call him, Blanche.

BLANCHE: I am, I'm going to call him on the phone.

STELLA: [Miserably.] I wish you wouldn't.

BLANCHE: I intend to be given some explanation from someone!

[She rushes to the phone in the bedroom. STELLA goes out on the porch and stares reproachfully at her husband. He grunts and turns away from her.]

4. Louisiana political leader, governor, and senator (1893–1935); a fiery and flamboyant populist known as “the Kingfish.”

STELLA: I hope you're pleased with your doings. I never had so much trouble swallowing food in my life, looking at that girl's face and the empty chair!
[She cries quietly.]

BLANCHE: [At the phone.] Hello. Mr. Mitchell, please. . . . Oh. . . . I would like to leave a number if I may. Magnolia 9047. And say it's important to call. . . . Yes, very important. . . . Thank you. [She remains by the phone with a lost, frightened look.]

[STANLEY turns slowly back toward his wife and takes her clumsily in his arms.]

STANLEY: Stell, it's gonna be all right after she goes and after you've had the baby. It's gonna be all right again between you and me the way that it was. You remember the way that it was? Them nights we had together? God, honey, it's gonna be sweet when we can make noise in the night the way that we used to and get the colored lights going with nobody's sister behind the curtains to hear us! [Their upstairs neighbors are heard in bellowing laughter at something. STANLEY chuckles.] Steve an' Eunice . . .

STELLA: Come on back in. [She returns to the kitchen and starts lighting the candles on the white cake.] Blanche?

BLANCHE: Yes. [She returns from the bedroom to the table in the kitchen.] Oh, those pretty, pretty little candles! Oh, don't burn them, Stella.

STELLA: I certainly will.

[STANLEY comes back in.]

BLANCHE: You ought to save them for baby's birthdays. Oh, I hope candles are going to glow in his life and I hope that his eyes are going to be like candles, like two blue candles lighted in a white cake!

STANLEY: [Sitting down.] What poetry!

BLANCHE: [She pauses reflectively for a moment.] I shouldn't have called him.

STELLA: There's lots of things could have happened.

BLANCHE: There's no excuse for it, Stella. I don't have to put up with insults. I won't be taken for granted.

STANLEY: Goddamn, it's hot in here with the steam from the bathroom.

BLANCHE: I've said I was sorry three times. [The piano fades out.] I take hot baths for my nerves. Hydrotherapy, they call it. You healthy Polack, without a nerve in your body, of course you don't know what anxiety feels like!

STANLEY: I am not a Polack. People from Poland are Poles, not Polacks. But what I am is a one-hundred-per-cent American, born and raised in the greatest country on earth and proud as hell of it, so don't ever call me a Polack.

[The phone rings. BLANCHE rises expectantly.]

BLANCHE: Oh, that's for me, I'm sure.

STANLEY: I'm not sure. Keep your seat. [He crosses leisurely to phone.] H'lo. Aw, yeh, hello, Mac.

[He leans against wall, staring insultingly in at BLANCHE. She sinks back in her chair with a frightened look. STELLA leans over and touches her shoulder.]

BLANCHE: Oh, keep your hands off me, Stella. What is the matter with you?

Why do you look at me with that pitying look?

STANLEY: [Bawling.] QUIET IN THERE!—We've got a noisy woman on the place.—Go on, Mac. At Riley's? No, I don't want a bowl at Riley's. I had a little trouble with Riley last week. I'm the team captain, ain't I? All right, then, we're not gonna bowl at Riley's, we're gonna bowl at the West Side or the Gala! All right, Mac. See you! [He hangs up and returns to the table. BLANCHE fiercely controls herself, drinking quickly from her tumbler of water. He doesn't look at her but reaches in a pocket. Then he speaks slowly and with false amiability.] Sister Blanche, I've got a little birthday remembrance for you.

BLANCHE: Oh, have you, Stanley? I wasn't expecting any, I—I don't know why Stella wants to observe my birthday! I'd much rather forget it—when you—reach twenty-seven! Well—age is a subject that you'd prefer to—ignore!

STANLEY: Twenty-seven?

BLANCHE: [Quickly.] What is it? Is it for me?

[He is holding a little envelope toward her.]

STANLEY: Yes, I hope you like it!

BLANCHE: Why, why—Why, it's a—

STANLEY: Ticket! Back to Laurel! On the Greyhound!⁵ Tuesday! [The "Varsouviana" music steals in softly and continues playing. STELLA rises abruptly and turns her back. BLANCHE tries to smile. Then she tries to laugh. Then she gives both up and springs from the table and runs into the next room. She clutches her throat and then runs into the bathroom. Coughing, gagging sounds are heard.] Well!

STELLA: You didn't need to do that.

STANLEY: Don't forget all that I took off her.

STELLA: You needn't have been so cruel to someone alone as she is.

STANLEY: Delicate piece she is.

STELLA: She is. She was. You didn't know Blanche as a girl. Nobody, nobody, was tender and trusting as she was. But people like you abused her, and forced her to change. [He crosses into the bedroom, ripping off his shirt, and changes into a brilliant silk bowling shirt. She follows him.] Do you think you're going bowling now?

STANLEY: Sure.

STELLA: You're not going bowling. [She catches hold of his shirt.] Why did you do this to her?

STANLEY: I done nothing to no one. Let go of my shirt. You've torn it.

STELLA: I want to know why. Tell me why.

STANLEY: When we first met, me and you, you thought I was common. How right you was, baby. I was common as dirt. You showed me the snapshot of the place with the columns. I pulled you down off them columns and how you loved it, having them colored lights going! And wasn't we happy together, wasn't it all okay till she showed here? [STELLA makes a slight movement. Her look goes suddenly inward as if some interior voice had called her name. She begins a slow, shuffling progress from the bedroom to the kitchen, leaning and resting on the back of the chair and then on the edge of a table with a blind look and listening expression. STANLEY, finishing with his shirt, is unaware of her reaction.] And wasn't we happy together? Wasn't it all okay? Till she showed here. Hoity-Toity, describing me as an ape. [He suddenly notices the change in STELLA.] Hey, what is it, Stell? [He crosses to her.]

STELLA: [Quietly.] Take me to the hospital.

[He is with her now, supporting her with his arm, murmuring indistinguishably as they go outside.]

Scene 9

A while later that evening. BLANCHE is seated in a tense hunched position in a bedroom chair that she has recovered with diagonal green and white stripes. She has on her scarlet satin robe. On the table beside chair is a bottle of liquor and a glass. The rapid, feverish polka tune, the "Varsouviana," is heard. The music is in her mind; she is drinking to escape it and the sense of disaster closing in on her, and she seems to whisper the words of the song. An electric fan is turning back and forth across her.

MITCH comes around the corner in work clothes: blue denim shirt and pants. He is unshaven. He climbs the steps to the door and rings. BLANCHE is startled.

BLANCHE: Who is it, please?

MITCH: [Hoarsely.] Me. Mitch.

[The polka tune stops.]

BLANCHE: Mitch!—Just a minute. [She rushes about frantically, hiding the bottle in a closet, crouching at the mirror and dabbing her face with cologne and powder. She is so excited that her breath is audible as she dashes about. At last she rushes to the door in the kitchen and lets him in.] Mitch!—Y'know, I really shouldn't let you in after the treatment I have received from you this evening! So utterly uncavalier! But hello, beautiful! [She offers him her lips. He ignores it and pushes past her into the flat. She looks fearfully after him as he stalks into the bedroom.] My, my, what a cold shoulder! And such uncouth apparel! Why, you haven't even shaved! The unforgivable insult to a lady! But I forgive you. I forgive you because it's such a relief to see you. You've stopped that polka tune that I had caught in my head. Have you ever had anything caught in your head? No, of course you haven't, you dumb angel-puss, you'd never get anything awful caught in your head!

[He stares at her while she follows him while she talks. It is obvious that he has had a few drinks on the way over.]

MITCH: Do we have to have that fan on?

BLANCHE: No!

MITCH: I don't like fans.

BLANCHE: Then let's turn it off, honey. I'm not partial to them! [She presses the switch and the fan nods slowly off. She clears her throat uneasily as MITCH plumps himself down on the bed in the bedroom and lights a cigarette.] I don't know what there is to drink. I—haven't investigated.

MITCH: I don't want Stan's liquor.

BLANCHE: It isn't Stan's. Everything here isn't Stan's. Some things on the premises are actually mine! How is your mother? Isn't your mother well?

MITCH: Why?

BLANCHE: Something's the matter tonight, but never mind. I won't cross-examine the witness. I'll just— [She touches her forehead vaguely. The polka tune starts up again.—pretend I don't notice anything different about you! That—music again . . .

MITCH: What music?

BLANCHE: The "Varsouviana"! The polka tune they were playing when Allan— Wait! [A distant revolver shot is heard. BLANCHE seems relieved.] There now, the shot! It always stops after that. [The polka music dies out again.] Yes, now it's stopped.

MITCH: Are you boxed out of your mind?

BLANCHE: I'll go and see what I can find in the way of— [She crosses into the closet, pretending to search for the bottle.] Oh, by the way, excuse me for not being dressed. But I'd practically given you up! Had you forgotten your invitation to supper?

MITCH: I wasn't going to see you anymore.

BLANCHE: Wait a minute. I can't hear what you're saying and you talk so little that when you do say something, I don't want to miss a single syllable of it. . . . What am I looking around here for? Oh, yes—liquor! We've had so much excitement around here this evening that I am boxed out of my mind! [She pretends suddenly to find the bottle. He draws his foot up on the bed and stares at her contemptuously.] Here's something. Southern Comfort!⁶ What is that, I wonder?

MITCH: If you don't know, it must belong to Stan.

BLANCHE: Take your foot off the bed. It has a light cover on it. Of course you boys don't notice things like that. I've done so much with this place since I've been here.

MITCH: I bet you have.

BLANCHE: You saw it before I came. Well, look at it now! This room is almost—dainty! I want to keep it that way. I wonder if this stuff ought to be mixed with something? Ummm, it's sweet! It's terribly, terribly sweet! Why, it's a liqueur, I believe! Yes, that's what it is, a liqueur! [MITCH grunts.] I'm afraid you won't like it, but try it, and maybe you will.

MITCH: I told you already I don't want none of his liquor and I mean it. You ought to lay off his liquor. He says you been lapping it up all summer like a wild cat!

BLANCHE: What a fantastic statement! Fantastic of him to say it, fantastic of you to repeat it! I won't descend to the level of such cheap accusations to answer them, even!

MITCH: Huh.

BLANCHE: What's in your mind? I see something in your eyes!

MITCH: [Getting up.] It's dark in here.

BLANCHE: I like it dark. The dark is comforting to me.

6. Peach-flavored bourbon liqueur.

MITCH: I don't think I ever seen you in the light. [BLANCHE laughs breathlessly.]

That's a fact!

BLANCHE: Is it?

MITCH: I've never seen you in the afternoon.

BLANCHE: Whose fault is that?

MITCH: You never want to go out in the afternoon.

BLANCHE: Why, Mitch, you're at the plant in the afternoon!

MITCH: Not Sunday afternoon. I've asked you to go out with me sometimes on Sundays but you always make an excuse. You never want to go out till after six and then it's always some place that's not lighted much.

BLANCHE: There is some obscure meaning in this but I fail to catch it.

MITCH: What it means is I've never had a real good look at you, Blanche. Let's turn the light on here.

BLANCHE: [Fearfully.] Light? Which light? What for?

MITCH: This one with the paper thing on it.

[He tears the paper lantern off the light bulb. She utters a frightened gasp.]

BLANCHE: What did you do that for?

MITCH: So I can take a look at you good and plain!

BLANCHE: Of course you don't really mean to be insulting!

MITCH: No, just realistic.

BLANCHE: I don't want realism. I want magic! [MITCH laughs.] Yes, yes, magic! I try to give that to people. I misrepresent things to them. I don't tell truth, I tell what ought to be truth. And if that is sinful, then let me be damned for it!—Don't turn the light on!

[MITCH crosses to the switch. He turns the light on and stares at her. She cries out and covers her face. He turns the lights off again.]

MITCH: [Slowly and bitterly.] I don't mind you being older than what I thought. But all the rest of it—Christ! That pitch about your ideals being so old-fashioned and all the malarkey that you've dished out all summer. Oh, I knew you weren't sixteen anymore. But I was a fool enough to believe you was straight.

BLANCHE: Who told you I wasn't—"straight"? My loving brother-in-law. And you believed him.

MITCH: I called him a liar at first. And then I checked on the story. First I asked our supply-man who travels through Laurel. And then I talked directly over long-distance to this merchant.

BLANCHE: Who is this merchant?

MITCH: Kiefaber.

BLANCHE: The merchant Kiefaber of Laurel! I know the man. He whistled at me. I put him in his place. So now for revenge he makes up stories about me.

MITCH: Three people, Kiefaber, Stanley, and Shaw, swore to them!

BLANCHE: Rub-a-dub-dub, three men in a tub! And such a filthy tub!

MITCH: Didn't you stay at a hotel called The Flamingo?

BLANCHE: Flamingo? No! Tarantula was the name of it! I stayed at a hotel called The Tarantula Arms!

MITCH: [Stupidly.] Tarantula?

BLANCHE: Yes, a big spider! That's where I brought my victims. [She pours herself another drink.] Yes, I had many intimacies with strangers. After the death of Allan—intimacies with strangers was all I seemed able to fill my empty heart with. . . . I think it was panic, just panic, that drove me from one to another, hunting for some protection—here and there, in the most—unlikely places—even, at last, in a seventeen-year-old boy but—somebody wrote the superintendent about it—“This woman is morally unfit for her position!” [She throws back her head with convulsive, sobbing laughter. Then she repeats the statement, gasps, and drinks.] True? Yes, I suppose—unfit somehow—anyway. . . . So I came here. There was nowhere else I could go. I was played out. You know what played out is? My youth was suddenly gone up the water-spout, and—I met you. You said you needed somebody. Well, I needed somebody, too. I thanked God for you, because you seemed to be gentle—a cleft in the rock of the world that I could hide in! But I guess I was asking, hoping—too much! Kiefaber, Stanley, and Shaw have tied an old tin can to the tail of the kite.

[There is a pause. MITCH stares at her dumbly.]

MITCH: You lied to me, Blanche.

BLANCHE: Don't say I lied to you.

MITCH: Lies, lies, inside and out, all lies.

BLANCHE: Never inside, I didn't lie in my heart. . . .

[A vendor comes around the corner. She is a blind MEXICAN WOMAN in a dark shawl, carrying bunches of those gaudy tin flowers that lower-class Mexicans display at funerals and other festive occasions. She is calling barely audibly. Her figure is only faintly visible outside the building.]

MEXICAN WOMAN: *Flores. Flores, Flores para los muertos.*⁷ Flores. Flores.

BLANCHE: What? Oh! Somebody outside. . . . [She goes to the door, opens it and stares at the MEXICAN WOMAN.]

MEXICAN WOMAN: [She is at the door and offers BLANCHE some of her flowers.] Flores? Flores para los muertos?

BLANCHE: [Frightened.] No, no! Not now! Not now! [She darts back into the apartment, slamming the door.]

MEXICAN WOMAN: [She turns away and starts to move down the street.] Flores para los muertos.

[The polka tune fades in.]

BLANCHE: [As if to herself.] Crumble and fade and—regrets—recriminations. . . . “If you'd done this, it wouldn't've cost me that!”

MEXICAN WOMAN: *Corones*⁸ para los muertos. Corones . . .

BLANCHE: Legacies! Huh. . . . And other things such as bloodstained pillowslips—“Her linen needs changing”—“Yes, Mother. But couldn't we get a colored girl to do it?” No, we couldn't of course. Everything gone but the—

MEXICAN WOMAN: Flores.

7. Flowers for the dead (Spanish). 8. Wreaths (Spanish).

BLANCHE: Death—I used to sit here and she used to sit over there and death was as close as you are. . . . We didn't dare even admit we had ever heard of it!

MEXICAN WOMAN: Flores para los muertos, flores—flores . . .

BLANCHE: The opposite is desire. So do you wonder? How could you possibly wonder! Not far from Belle Reve, before we had lost Belle Reve, was a camp where they trained young soldiers. On Sunday nights they would go in town to get drunk—

MEXICAN WOMAN: [Softly.] Corones . . .

BLANCHE: —and on the way back they would stagger onto my lawn and call—“Blanche! Blanche!”—the deaf old lady remaining suspected nothing. But sometimes I slipped outside to answer their calls. . . . Later the paddy-wagon⁹ would gather them up like daisies . . . the long way home. . . . [The MEXICAN WOMAN turns slowly and drifts back off with her soft mournful cries. BLANCHE goes to the dresser and leans forward on it. After a moment, MITCH rises and follows her purposefully. The polka music fades away. He places his hands on her waist and tries to turn her about.] What do you want?

MITCH: [Fumbling to embrace her.] What I been missing all summer.

BLANCHE: Then marry me, Mitch!

MITCH: I don't think I want to marry you anymore.

BLANCHE: No?

MITCH: [Dropping his hands from her waist.] You're not clean enough to bring in the house with my mother.

BLANCHE: Go away, then. [He stares at her.] Get out of here quick before I start screaming fire! [Her throat is tightening with hysteria.] Get out of here quick before I start screaming fire. [He still remains staring. She suddenly rushes to the big window with its pale blue square of the soft summer light and cries wildly.] Fire! Fire! Fire!

[With a startled gasp, MITCH turns and goes out the outer door, clatters awkwardly down the steps and around the corner of the building. BLANCHE staggers back from the window and falls to her knees. The distant piano is slow and blue.]

Scene 10

It is a few hours later that night.

BLANCHE has been drinking fairly steadily since MITCH left. She has dragged her wardrobe trunk into the center of the bedroom. It hangs open with flowery dresses thrown across it. As the drinking and packing went on, a mood of hysterical exhilaration came into her and she has decked herself out in a somewhat soiled and crumpled white satin evening gown and a pair of scuffed silver slippers with brilliants¹ set in their heels.

Now she is placing the rhinestone tiara on her head before the mirror of the dressing-table and murmuring excitedly as if to a group of spectral admirers.

BLANCHE: How about taking a swim, a moonlight swim at the old rock-quarry?

If anyone's sober enough to drive a car! Ha-ha! Best way in the world to stop your head buzzing! Only you've got to be careful to dive where the deep pool is—if you hit a rock you don't come up till tomorrow . . . [Tremblingly she lifts the hand mirror for a closer inspection. She catches her breath and slams the mirror face down with such violence that the glass cracks. She moans a little and attempts to rise. STANLEY appears around the corner of the building. He still has on the vivid green silk bowling shirt. As he rounds the corner the honky-tonk music is heard. It continues softly throughout the scene. He enters the kitchen, slamming the door. As he peers in at BLANCHE, he gives a low whistle. He has had a few drinks on the way and has brought some quart beer bottles home with him.] How is my sister?

STANLEY: She is doing okay.

BLANCHE: And how is the baby?

STANLEY: [Grinning amiably.] The baby won't come before morning so they told me to go home and get a little shut-eye.

BLANCHE: Does that mean we are to be alone in here?

STANLEY: Yep. Just me and you, Blanche. Unless you got somebody hid under the bed. What've you got on those fine feathers for?

BLANCHE: Oh, that's right. You left before my wire came.

STANLEY: You got a wire?

BLANCHE: I received a telegram from an old admirer of mine.

STANLEY: Anything good?

BLANCHE: I think so. An invitation.

STANLEY: What to? A fireman's ball?

BLANCHE: [Throwing back her head.] A cruise of the Caribbean on a yacht!

STANLEY: Well, well. What do you know?

BLANCHE: I have never been so surprised in my life.

STANLEY: I guess not.

BLANCHE: It came like a bolt from the blue!

STANLEY: Who did you say it was from?

BLANCHE: An old beau of mine.

STANLEY: The one that give you the white fox-pieces?

BLANCHE: Mr. Shep Huntleigh. I wore his ATO² pin my last year at college. I hadn't seen him again until last Christmas. I ran in to him on Biscayne Boulevard. Then—just now—this wire—inviting me on a cruise of the Caribbean! The problem is clothes. I tore into my trunk to see what I have that's suitable for the tropics!

STANLEY: And come up with that—gorgeous—diamond—tiara?

BLANCHE: This old relic? Ha-ha! It's only rhinestones.

STANLEY: Gosh. I thought it was Tiffany diamonds. [He unbuttons his shirt.]

BLANCHE: Well, anyhow, I shall be entertained in style.

STANLEY: Uh-huh. It goes to show, you never know what is coming.

BLANCHE: Just when I thought my luck had begun to fail me—

STANLEY: Into the picture pops this Miami millionaire.

BLANCHE: This man is not from Miami. This man is from Dallas.

STANLEY: This man is from Dallas?

BLANCHE: Yes, this man is from Dallas where gold spouts out of the ground!

2. Probably Alpha Tau Omega, a college fraternity.

STANLEY: Well, just so he's from somewhere! [He starts removing his shirt.]

BLANCHE: Close the curtains before you undress any further.

STANLEY: [Amiably.] This is all I'm going to undress right now. [He rips the sack off a quart beer bottle.] Seen a bottle-opener? [She moves slowly toward the dresser, where she stands with her hands knotted together.] I used to have a cousin who could open a beer bottle with his teeth. [Pounding the bottle cap on the corner of table.] That was his only accomplishment, all he could do—he was just a human bottle-opener. And then one time, at a wedding party, he broke his front teeth off! After that he was so ashamed of himself he used t' sneak out of the house when company came . . . [The bottle cap pops off and a geyser of foam shoots up. STANLEY laughs happily, holding up the bottle over his head.] Ha-ha! Rain from heaven! [He extends the bottle toward her.] Shall we bury the hatchet and make it a loving-cup? Huh?

BLANCHE: No, thank you.

STANLEY: Well, it's a red-letter night for us both. You having an oil millionaire and me having a baby. [He goes to the bureau in the bedroom and crouches to remove something from the bottom drawer.]

BLANCHE: [Drawing back.] What are you doing in here?

STANLEY: Here's something I always break out on special occasions like this. The silk pyjamas I wore on my wedding night!

BLANCHE: Oh.

STANLEY: When the telephone rings and they say, "You've got a son!" I'll tear this off and wave it like a flag! [He shakes out a brilliant pyjama coat.] I guess we are both entitled to put on the dog. [He goes back to the kitchen with the coat over his arm.]

BLANCHE: When I think of how divine it is going to be to have such a thing as privacy once more—I could weep with joy!

STANLEY: This millionaire from Dallas is not going to interfere with your privacy any?

BLANCHE: It won't be the sort of thing you have in mind. This man is a gentleman and he respects me. [Improvising feverishly.] What he wants is my companionship. Having great wealth sometimes makes people lonely! A cultivated woman, a woman of intelligence and breeding, can enrich a man's life—immeasurably! I have those things to offer, and this doesn't take them away. Physical beauty is passing. A transitory possession. But beauty of the mind and richness of the spirit and tenderness of the heart—and I have all of those things—aren't taken away, but grow! Increase with the years! How strange that I should be called a destitute woman! When I have all of these treasures locked in my heart. [A choked sob comes from her.] I think of myself as a very, very rich woman! But I have been foolish—casting my pearls before swine!³

STANLEY: Swine, huh?

BLANCHE: Yes, swine! Swine! And I'm thinking not only of you but of your friend, Mr. Mitchell. He came to see me tonight. He dared to come here in his work clothes! And to repeat slander to me, vicious stories that he had gotten from you! I gave him his walking papers . . .

3. See Matthew 7.6: "Do not give what is holy to dogs, or throw your pearls before swine, lest they trample them underfoot, and turn and tear you to pieces."

STANLEY: You did, huh?

BLANCHE: But then he came back. He returned with a box of roses to beg my forgiveness! He implored my forgiveness. But some things are not forgivable. Deliberate cruelty is not forgivable. It is the one unforgivable thing in my opinion and it is the one thing of which I have never, ever been guilty. And so I told him, I said to him, "Thank you," but it was foolish of me to think that we could ever adapt ourselves to each other. Our ways of life are too different. Our attitudes and our backgrounds are incompatible. We have to be realistic about such things. So farewell, my friend! And let there be no hard feelings. . . .

STANLEY: Was this before or after the telegram came from the Texas oil millionaire?

BLANCHE: What telegram? No! No, after! As a matter of fact, the wire came just as—

STANLEY: As a matter of fact there wasn't no wire at all!

BLANCHE: Oh, oh!

STANLEY: There isn't no millionaire! And Mitch didn't come back with roses 'cause I know where he is—

BLANCHE: Oh!

STANLEY: There isn't a goddam thing but imagination!

BLANCHE: Oh!

STANLEY: And lies and conceit and tricks!

BLANCHE: Oh!

STANLEY: And look at yourself! Take a look at yourself in that worn-out Mardi Gras⁴ outfit, rented for fifty cents from some ragpicker! And with the crazy crown on! What queen do you think you are?

BLANCHE: Oh—God . . .

STANLEY: I've been on to you from the start! Not once did you pull any wool over this boy's eyes! You come in here and sprinkle the place with powder and spray perfume and cover the light-bulb with a paper lantern, and lo and behold the place has turned into Egypt and you are the Queen of the Nile!⁵ Sitting on your throne and swilling down my liquor! I say—Ha!—Ha! Do you hear me? Ha—ha—ha! [He walks into the bedroom.]

BLANCHE: Don't come in here! [Lurid reflections appear on the walls around BLANCHE. The shadows are of a grotesque and menacing form. She catches her breath, crosses to the phone and jiggles the hook. STANLEY goes into the bathroom and closes the door.] Operator, operator! Give me long-distance, please. . . . I want to get in touch with Mr. Shep Huntleigh of Dallas. He's so well known he doesn't require any address. Just ask anybody who—Wait!!—No, I couldn't find it right now. . . . Please understand, I—No! No, wait! . . . One moment! Someone is—Nothing! Hold on, please! [She sets the phone down and crosses warily into the kitchen. The night is filled with inhuman voices like cries in a jungle. The shadows and lurid reflections move sinuously as flames along the wall spaces. Through the back wall of the rooms, which have become transparent, can be seen the sidewalk. A prostitute has rolled⁶ a drunkard. He pursues her along the walk, overtakes her and there is a struggle. A policeman's whistle breaks it up. The figures disappear. Some moments later the NEGRO WOMAN appears around the corner with a sequined bag which the prostitute had dropped on the walk. She is rooting excitedly through it. BLANCHE presses her knuckles to her lips and returns slowly to the phone. She speaks in a hoarse whisper.] Operator! Operator! Never mind long-distance. Get Western Union. There isn't time to be—Western—Western Union! [She waits anxiously.] Western Union? Yes! I—want to—Take down this message! "In desperate, desperate circumstances! Help me! Caught in a trap. Caught in—" Oh!

[The bathroom door is thrown open and STANLEY comes out in the brilliant silk pyjamas. He grins at her as he knots the tassled sash about his waist. She gasps and backs away from the phone. He stares at her for a count of ten. Then a clicking becomes audible from the telephone, steady and rasping.]

STANLEY: You left th' phone off th' hook.

[He crosses to it deliberately and sets it back on the hook. After he has replaced it, he stares at her again, his mouth slowly curving into a grin, as he weaves between BLANCHE and the outer door. The barely audible "Blue Piano" begins to drum up louder. The sound of it turns into the roar of an approaching locomotive. BLANCHE crouches, pressing her fists to her ears until it has gone by.]

BLANCHE: [Finally straightening.] Let me—let me get by you!

STANLEY: Get by me? Sure. Go ahead. [He moves back a pace in the doorway.]

BLANCHE: You—you stand over there! [She indicates a further position.]

STANLEY: You got plenty of room to walk by me now.

BLANCHE: Not with you there! But I've got to get out somehow!

STANLEY: You think I'll interfere with you? Ha-ha! [The "Blue Piano" goes softy. She turns confusedly and makes a faint gesture. The inhuman jungle voices rise up. He takes a step toward her, biting his tongue, which protrudes between his lips. Softly.] Come to think of it—maybe you wouldn't be bad to—interfere with. . . .

[BLANCHE moves backward through the door into the bedroom.]

BLANCHE: Stay back! Don't you come toward me another step or I'll—

STANLEY: What?

BLANCHE: Some awful thing will happen! It will!

STANLEY: What are you putting on now?

[They are now both inside the bedroom.]

BLANCHE: I warn you, don't, I'm in danger!

[He takes another step. She smashes a bottle on the table and faces him, clutching the broken top.]

STANLEY: What did you do that for?

BLANCHE: So I could twist the broken end in your face!

STANLEY: I bet you would do that!

BLANCHE: I would! I will if you—

STANLEY: Oh! So you want some roughhouse! All right, let's have some roughhouse! [He springs toward her, overturning the table. She cries out and strikes at him with the bottle top but he catches her wrist.] Tiger—tiger! Drop the bottle-top! Drop it! We've had this date with each other from the beginning!

[She moans. The bottle-top falls. She sinks to her knees: He picks up her inert figure and carries her to the bed. The hot trumpet and drums from the Four Deuces sound loudly.]

Scene 11

It is some weeks later. STELLA is packing BLANCHE's things. Sounds of water can be heard running in the bathroom.

The portieres are partly open on the poker players—STANLEY, STEVE, MITCH and PABLO—who sit around the table in the kitchen. The atmosphere of the kitchen is now the same raw, lurid one of the disastrous poker night.

The building is framed by the sky of turquoise. STELLA has been crying as she arranges the flowery dresses in the open trunk.

EUNICE comes down the steps from her flat above and enters the kitchen. There is an outburst from the poker table.

STANLEY: Drew to an inside straight and made it, by God.

PABLO: Maldita sea tu suerto!

STANLEY: Put it in English, greaseball.

PABLO: I am cursing your rutting luck.

STANLEY: [Prodigiously elated.] You know what luck is? Luck is believing you're lucky. Take at Salerno.⁷ I believed I was lucky. I figured that 4 out of 5 would not come through but I would . . . and I did. I put that down as a rule. To hold front position in this rat-race you've got to believe you are lucky.

MITCH: You . . . you . . . you . . . Brag . . . brag . . . bull . . . bull.

[STELLA goes into the bedroom and starts folding a dress.]

STANLEY: What's the matter with him?

EUNICE: [Walking past the table.] I always did say that men are callous things with no feelings but this does beat anything. Making pigs of yourselves. [She comes through the portieres into the bedroom.]

STANLEY: What's the matter with her?

STELLA: How is my baby?

EUNICE: Sleeping like a little angel. Brought you some grapes. [She puts them on a stool and lowers her voice.] Blanche?

STELLA: Bathing.

EUNICE: How is she?

STELLA: She wouldn't eat anything but asked for a drink.

EUNICE: What did you tell her?

STELLA: I—just told her that—we'd made arrangements for her to rest in the country. She's got it mixed in her mind with Shep Huntleigh.

[BLANCHE opens the bathroom door slightly.]

7. Important beachhead in the Allied invasion of Italy in World War II (1939–45).

BLANCHE: Stella.

STELLA: Yes.

BLANCHE: That cool yellow silk—the bouclé.⁸ See if it's crushed. If it's not too crushed I'll wear it and on the lapel that silver and turquoise pin in the shape of a seahorse. You will find them in the heart-shaped box I keep my accessories in. And Stella . . . Try and locate a bunch of artificial violets in that box, too, to pin with the seahorse on the lapel of the jacket.

[She closes the door. STELLA turns to EUNICE.]

STELLA: I don't know if I did the right thing.

EUNICE: What else could you do?

STELLA: I couldn't believe her story and go on living with Stanley.

EUNICE: Don't ever believe it. Life has got to go on. No matter what happens, you've got to keep on going.

[The bathroom door opens a little.]

BLANCHE: [Looking out.] Is the coast clear?

STELLA: Yes, Blanche. [To EUNICE.] Tell her how well she's looking.

BLANCHE: Please close the curtains before I come out.

STELLA: They're closed.

STANLEY: —How many for you?

PABLO: Two.

STEVE: Three.

[BLANCHE appears in the amber light of the door. She has a tragic radiance in her red satin robe following the sculptural lines of her body. The "Varsouviana" rises audibly as BLANCHE enters the bedroom.]

BLANCHE: [With faintly hysterical vivacity.] I have just washed my hair.

STELLA: Did you?

BLANCHE: I'm not sure I got the soap out.

EUNICE: Such fine hair!

BLANCHE: [Accepting the compliment.] It's a problem. Didn't I get a call?

STELLA: Who from, Blanche?

BLANCHE: Shep Huntleigh . . .

STELLA: Why, not yet, honey!

BLANCHE: How strange! I—

[At the sound of BLANCHE's voice MITCH's arm supporting his cards has sagged and his gaze is dissolved into space. STANLEY slaps him on the shoulder.]

STANLEY: Hey, Mitch, come to!

[The sound of this new voice shocks BLANCHE. She makes a shocked gesture, forming his name with her lips. STELLA nods and looks quickly away. BLANCHE stands quite still for some moments—the silver-backed mirror in her hand and a look of sorrowful perplexity as though all human experience shows on her face. BLANCHE finally speaks but with sudden hysteria.]

8. Textile woven with uneven yarn to produce a rough, uneven surface.

BLANCHE: What's going on here? [She turns from STELLA to EUNICE and back to STELLA. Her rising voice penetrates the concentration of the game. MITCH ducks his head lower but STANLEY shoves back his chair as if about to rise. STEVE places a restraining hand on his arm. Continuing.] What's happened here? I want an explanation of what's happened here.

STELLA: [Agonizingly.] Hush! Hush!

EUNICE: Hush! Hush! Honey.

STELLA: Please, Blanche.

BLANCHE: Why are you looking at me like that? Is something wrong with me?

EUNICE: You look wonderful, Blanche. Don't she look wonderful?

STELLA: Yes.

EUNICE: I understand you are going on a trip.

STELLA: Yes, Blanche is. She's going on a vacation.

EUNICE: I'm green with envy.

BLANCHE: Help me, help me get dressed!

STELLA: [Handing her dress.] Is this what you—

BLANCHE: Yes, it will do! I'm anxious to get out of here—this place is a trap!

EUNICE: What a pretty blue jacket.

STELLA: It's lilac colored.

BLANCHE: You're both mistaken. It's Della Robbia blue.⁹ The blue of the robe in the old Madonna pictures. Are these grapes washed? [She fingers the bunch of grapes which EUNICE had brought in.]

EUNICE: Huh?

BLANCHE: Washed, I said. Are they washed?

EUNICE: They're from the French Market.

BLANCHE: That doesn't mean they've been washed. [The cathedral bells chime.]

Those cathedral bells—they're the only clean thing in the Quarter. Well, I'm going now. I'm ready to go.

EUNICE: [Whispering.] She's going to walk out before they get here.

STELLA: Wait, Blanche.

BLANCHE: I don't want to pass in front of those men.

EUNICE: Then wait'll the game breaks up.

STELLA: Sit down and . . .

[BLANCHE turns weakly, hesitantly about. She lets them push her into a chair.]

BLANCHE: I can smell the sea air. The rest of my time I'm going to spend on the sea. And when I die, I'm going to die on the sea. You know what I shall die of? [She plucks a grape.] I shall die of eating an unwashed grape one day out on the ocean. I will die—with my hand in the hand of some nice-looking ship's doctor, a very young one with a small blond mustache and a big silver watch. "Poor lady," they'll say, "the quinine¹ did her no good. That unwashed grape has transported her soul to heaven." [The cathedral chimes are heard.] And I'll be buried at sea sewn up in a clean white sack and dropped overboard—at noon—in the blaze of summer—and into an ocean as blue as [Chimes again.] my first lover's eyes!

9. Light blue seen in terra-cottas made by the Della Robbia family during the Italian Renaissance.

1. Medicinal salt used to treat malaria.

[A DOCTOR and a MATRON² have appeared around the corner of the building and climbed the steps to the porch. The gravity of their profession is exaggerated—the unmistakable aura of the state institution with its cynical detachment. The DOCTOR rings the doorbell. The murmur of the game is interrupted.]

EUNICE: [Whispering to STELLA.] That must be them.

[STELLA presses her fists to her lips.]

BLANCHE: [Rising slowly.] What is it?

EUNICE: [Affectedly casual.] Excuse me while I see who's at the door.

STELLA: Yes.

[EUNICE goes into the kitchen.]

BLANCHE: [Tensely.] I wonder if it's for me.

[A whispered colloquy takes place at the door.]

EUNICE: [Returning, brightly.] Someone is calling for Blanche.

BLANCHE: It is for me, then! [She looks fearfully from one to the other and then to the portieres. The "Varsouviana" faintly plays.] Is it the gentleman I was expecting from Dallas?

EUNICE: I think it is, Blanche.

BLANCHE: I'm not quite ready.

STELLA: Ask him to wait outside.

BLANCHE: I . . .

[EUNICE goes back to the portieres. Drums sound very softly.]

STELLA: Everything packed?

BLANCHE: My silver toilet articles are still out.

STELLA: Ah!

EUNICE: [Returning.] They're waiting in front of the house.

BLANCHE: They! Who's "they"?

EUNICE: There's a lady with him.

BLANCHE: I cannot imagine who this "lady" could be! How is she dressed?

EUNICE: Just—just a sort of a—plain-tailored outfit.

BLANCHE: Possibly she's—[Her voice dies out nervously.]

STELLA: Shall we go, Blanche?

BLANCHE: Must we go through that room?

STELLA: I will go with you.

BLANCHE: How do I look?

STELLA: Lovely.

EUNICE: [Echoing.] Lovely.

[BLANCHE moves fearfully to the portieres. EUNICE draws them open for her. BLANCHE goes into the kitchen.]

BLANCHE: [To the men.] Please don't get up. I'm only passing through.

2. Female supervisor at a hospital or other institution.

[She crosses quickly to outside door. STELLA and EUNICE follow. The poker players stand awkwardly at the table—all except MITCH, who remains seated, looking down at the table. BLANCHE steps out on a small porch at the side of the door. She stops short and catches her breath.]

DOCTOR: How do you do?

BLANCHE: You are not the gentleman I was expecting. [She suddenly gasps and starts back up the steps. She stops by STELLA, who stands just outside the door, and speaks in a frightening whisper.] That man isn't Shep Huntleigh.

[The "Varsouviana" is playing distantly. STELLA stares back at BLANCHE. EUNICE is holding STELLA's arm. There is a moment of silence—no sound but that of STANLEY steadily shuffling the cards. BLANCHE catches her breath again and slips back into the flat. She enters the flat with a peculiar smile, her eyes wide and brilliant. As soon as her sister goes past her, STELLA closes her eyes and clenches her hands. EUNICE throws her arms comfortingly about her. Then she starts up to her flat. BLANCHE stops just inside the door. MITCH keeps staring down at his hands on the table, but the other men look at her curiously. At last she starts around the table toward the bedroom. As she does, STANLEY suddenly pushes back his chair and rises as if to block her way. The MATRON follows her into the flat.]

STANLEY: Did you forget something?

BLANCHE: [Shrilly.] Yes! Yes, I forgot something!

[She rushes past him into the bedroom. Lurid reflections appear on the walls in odd, sinuous shapes. The "Varsouviana" is filtered into a weird distortion, accompanied by the cries and noises of the jungle. BLANCHE seizes the back of a chair as if to defend herself.]

STANLEY: [*Sotto voce.*³] Doc, you better go in.

DOCTOR: [Sotto voce, motioning to the MATRON.] Nurse, bring her out.

[The MATRON advances on one side, STANLEY on the other. Divested of all the softer properties of womanhood, the MATRON is a peculiarly sinister figure in her severe dress. Her voice is bold and toneless as a firebell.]

MATRON: Hello, Blanche.

[The greeting is echoed and re-echoed by other mysterious voices behind the walls, as if reverberated through a canyon of rock.]

STANLEY: She says that she forgot something.

[The echo sounds in threatening whispers.]

MATRON: That's all right.

STANLEY: What did you forget, Blanche?

BLANCHE: I—I—

MATRON: It don't matter. We can pick it up later.

STANLEY: Sure. We can send it along with the trunk.

3. In an undertone (Italian).

BLANCHE: [Retreating in panic.] I don't know you—I don't know you. I want to be—left alone—please!

MATRON: Now, Blanche!

ECHOES: [Rising and falling.] Now, Blanche—now, Blanche—now, Blanche!

STANLEY: You left nothing here but spilt talcum and old empty perfume bottles—unless it's the paper lantern you want to take with you. You want the lantern?

[He crosses to dressing table and seizes the paper lantern, tearing it off the light bulb, and extends it toward her. She cries out as if the lantern was herself. The MATRON steps boldly toward her. She screams and tries to break past the MATRON. All the men spring to their feet. STELLA runs out to the porch, with EUNICE following to comfort her, simultaneously with the confused voices of the men in the kitchen. STELLA rushes into EUNICE's embrace on the porch.]

STELLA: Oh, my God, Eunice help me! Don't let them do that to her, don't let them hurt her! Oh, God, oh, please God, don't hurt her! What are they doing to her? What are they doing? [She tries to break from EUNICE's arms.]

EUNICE: No, honey, no, no, honey. Stay here. Don't go back in there. Stay with me and don't look.

STELLA: What have I done to my sister? Oh, God, what have I done to my sister?

EUNICE: You done the right thing, the only thing you could do. She couldn't stay here; there wasn't no other place for her to go.

[While STELLA and EUNICE are speaking on the porch the voices of the men in the kitchen overlap them. MITCH has started toward the bedroom. STANLEY crosses to block him. STANLEY pushes him aside. MITCH lunges and strikes at STANLEY. STANLEY pushes MITCH back. MITCH collapses at the table, sobbing. During the preceding scenes, the MATRON catches hold of BLANCHE's arm and prevents her flight. BLANCHE turns wildly and scratches at the MATRON. The heavy woman pinions her arms. BLANCHE cries out hoarsely and slips to her knees.]

MATRON: These fingernails have to be trimmed. [The DOCTOR comes into the room and she looks at him.] Jacket,⁴ Doctor?

DOCTOR: Not unless necessary. [He takes off his hat and now he becomes personalized. The unhuman quality goes. His voice is gentle and reassuring as he crosses to BLANCHE and crouches in front of her. As he speaks her name, her terror subsides a little. The lurid reflections fade from the walls, the inhuman cries and noises die out and her own hoarse crying is calmed.] Miss DuBois. [She turns her face to him and stares at him with desperate pleading. He smiles; then he speaks to the MATRON.] It won't be necessary.

BLANCHE: [Faintly.] Ask her to let go of me.

DOCTOR: [To the MATRON.] Let go.

[The MATRON releases her. BLANCHE extends her hands toward the DOCTOR. He draws her up gently and supports her with his arm and leads her through the portieres.]

4. That is, straitjacket, used to restrain the mentally ill.

BLANCHE: [Holding tight to his arm.] Whoever you are—I have always depended on the kindness of strangers.

[The poker players stand back as BLANCHE and the DOCTOR cross the kitchen to the front door. She allows him to lead her as if she were blind. As they go out on the porch, STELLA cries out her sister's name from where she is crouched a few steps up on the stairs.]

STELLA: Blanche! Blanche, Blanche!

[BLANCHE walks on without turning, followed by the DOCTOR and the MATRON. They go around the corner of the building. EUNICE descends to STELLA and places the child in her arms. It is wrapped in a pale blue blanket. STELLA accepts the child, sobbingly. EUNICE continues downstairs and enters the kitchen where the men, except for STANLEY, are returning silently to their places about the table. STANLEY has gone out on the porch and stands at the foot of the steps looking at STELLA.]

STANLEY: [A bit uncertainly.] Stella? [She sobs with inhuman abandon. There is something luxurious in her complete surrender to crying now that her sister is gone. Voluptuously, soothingly.] Now, honey. Now, love. Now, now, love. [He kneels beside her and his fingers find the opening of her blouse.] Now, now, love. Now, love. . . .

[The luxurious sobbing, the sensual murmur fade away under the swelling music of the "Blue Piano" and the muted trumpet.]

STEVE: This game is seven-card stud.

Writing about Literature

When it comes to the study of literature, reading and writing are closely interrelated—even mutually dependent—activities. The quality of whatever we write about literature depends entirely on the quality of our work as readers. Conversely, our reading isn't truly complete until we've tried to capture our sense of the literature in writing so as to make it intelligible, persuasive, and meaningful to other people. We read literature much more actively and attentively when we both integrate informal writing into the reading process—pausing periodically to mark important or confusing passages, to jot down significant facts, to describe the impressions and responses the text provokes—and when we envision our reading of literature as preparation for writing about it in a more sustained and formal way. The actual process of writing, conversely, requires re-reading and rethinking, testing our first impressions and initial hypotheses.

As we've suggested from the beginning of this book, literature itself is a vast conversation in which we participate most fully only when we engage with other readers. Writing allows us the opportunity—and even imposes on us the obligation—to do just that: In writing we respond not only to what other readers have actually said or written about the work but also to how we imagine other readers might realistically see it. By considering other readers' points of view and working to persuade them to accept alternative ways of interpreting a literary work, we ourselves learn new ways of seeing.

Writing about literature can take any number of forms, ranging from the very informal and personal to the very formal and public. Your instructor may well ask you to try your hand at more than one form. However, the essay is by far the most common and complex form that writing about literature—or literary criticism—takes. As a result, the following chapters will focus primarily on the essay.

Whether they require an essay, a response paper, or something else, however, assignments in literature courses often come equipped with a warning that goes something like this: “DO NOT SIMPLY RESTATE THE FACTS, PARAPHRASE, OR SUMMARIZE.” We thus start here with a brief chapter (ch. 27) explaining what paraphrase, summary, and description are and how you can use them to move from response to essay.

Chapter 28, “The Literature Essay,” reviews the five basic elements of all literature essays before turning, briefly, to two specific types—the comparative essay and the in-class exam essay. The chapter's goal is to give you a vivid sense of what you want to end up with at the end of the essay-writing process.

Chapter 29, “The Writing Process,” focuses on how you get there, providing tips on every stage of essay development, from interpreting an assignment and generating a thesis to editing, proofreading, and manuscript formatting.

Chapter 30, “The Literature Research Essay,” introduces the most common types of literature research and the key steps and strategies involved in writing research essays, from identifying and evaluating sources to responsibly and effectively integrating source material into your essay.

Whether they involve research or not, all essays about literature require responsible and effective quotation and citation; these are discussed in a separate chapter, “Quotation, Citation, and Documentation” (ch. 31).

Finally, this section concludes with a sample research essay (ch. 32) annotated to point out some of the features and strategies discussed in earlier chapters.

BASIC MOVES: PARAPHRASE, SUMMARY, AND DESCRIPTION

In literature courses, writing assignments often come equipped with a warning that goes something like this: “DO NOT SIMPLY RESTATE THE FACTS, PARAPHRASE, OR SUMMARIZE.” It’s a warning you ignore at your peril: paraphrase, summary, and description are each specific ways of “simply restating the facts,” and a paper for a literature course will rarely pass muster if it does only that. Such papers must make arguments about facts and their significance, using statements of fact like those that make up paraphrases, summaries, and descriptions in order to substantiate and develop debatable claims about the literary text. (For more on factual statements versus debatable claims, see 28.1.2.)

As this suggests, however, any literature paper will need to include some paraphrase, description, and/or summary, since effective arguments must be based on, supported by, and developed with statements of fact. As important, paraphrase, summary, and description can be effective ways to start the writing process, helping you to discover potential paper topics and even debatable claims of the sort that drive literature essays.

In later chapters, we’ll discuss and demonstrate ways to use paraphrase, summary, and description within literature essays of various types. The rest of this chapter simply defines and models these three basic, nonargumentative forms of writing about literature and discusses how you can use them to move from initial response to more formal, argumentative writing.

27.1 PARAPHRASE

27.1.1 What It Is

To paraphrase a statement is to restate it in your own words. Since the goal of paraphrase is to represent a statement fully and faithfully, a paraphrase tends to be at least as long as the original.

Below are paraphrases of sentences from a work of fiction (Jane Austen’s Pride and Prejudice), a poem (W. B. Yeats’s ALL THINGS CAN TEMPT ME), and a literature essay of the sort that could also be a secondary source in a literature research essay (George L. Dillon’s “Styles of Reading”).

Three Examples of Paraphrase

ORIGINAL SENTENCE	PARAPHRASE
It is a truth universally acknowledged that a single man in possession of a good fortune must be in want of a wife.	Everyone knows that a wealthy bachelor wants to get married.
All things can tempt me from this craft of verse: One time it was a woman's face, or worse— The seeming needs of my fool-driven land;	Anything can distract me from writing poetry, from a pretty girl to a foolish political cause.
[. . .] making order out of Emily's life is a complicated matter, since the narrator recalls the details through a nonlinear filter.	It's difficult to figure out when things happen to Emily because the narrator doesn't relate events in chronological order.

27.1.2 How to Use It

- Paraphrasing ensures and demonstrates that you understand what you've read. It can be especially helpful when authors' diction and syntax or their logic seems especially difficult, complex, or “foreign” to you. This is why paraphrase can be especially useful when reading and responding to a poem (see “Poetry: Reading, Responding, Writing”) and when taking notes on secondary sources (see 30.3.2).
- Paraphrasing can direct your attention to nuances of tone or potentially significant details in any literary text, especially when you pay attention to anything you have difficulty paraphrasing. For example, paraphrasing Austen's sentence (above) might call your attention to the multiple—and thus difficult to paraphrase—meanings of phrases such as a good fortune and in want of.
- By drawing your attention to such details, paraphrasing can help you begin to generate the kind of interpretive questions an essay might explore. For example, the Austen paraphrase might lead you to ask, What does Pride and Prejudice define as “a good fortune”? Does the novel illustrate different definitions? Does it endorse one definition over another?

On the use of paraphrase in literature essays, see 28.1.4 (on evidence), 28.2.2 (on in-class exam essays), and 30.4.2 (on incorporating secondary source material into the literature research essay).

27.2 SUMMARY

27.2.1 What It Is

A summary is a fairly succinct restatement or overview—in your own words—of the content of an entire literary text or other source or a significant portion thereof. A summary of a literary work is generally called a plot summary because it focuses on the action or plot. Though a summary should be significantly shorter than the original, it can be any length you need it to be. (For more on plot summary, see ch. 1.)

Different readers—or even the same reader on different occasions and with different purposes in mind—will almost certainly summarize the same text or source in dramatically different ways. Summarizing entails selection and emphasis. As a result, any summary reflects a particular point of view and may even begin to imply a possible interpretation or argument. When writing a summary, you should try to be as objective as possible. Nevertheless, your summary will reflect a particular understanding and attitude, which is actually why it’s useful.

Here are three quite different one-sentence summaries of HAMLET.

1. In the process of avenging his uncle’s murder of his father, a young prince kills his uncle, himself, and many others.
2. A young Danish prince avenges the murder of his father, the king, by his uncle, who has usurped the throne, but the prince himself is killed, as are others, and a well-led foreign army has no trouble successfully invading the troubled state.
3. When a young prince hears, from the ghost of his murdered father, that his uncle, who has married the prince’s mother, is the father’s murderer, the prince devotes himself to learning the truth and avenging the wrong, feigning madness, acting erratically, causing the suicide of his beloved and the deaths of numerous others including, ultimately, himself.

27.2.2 How to Use It

Because even the most objective summary implies a point of view, summarizing a literary work may help you begin to figure out just what your particular point of view is or at least what aspects of the work strike you as most important and potentially worthy of analysis, especially if you compare your summary to that of another reader (as in the exercise in ch. 1) or try out different ways of summarizing the same work yourself. The second Hamlet summary above, for example, suggests a more political interpretation of the play than either of the other two summaries, by emphasizing the political roles of the various characters, the fact that the crime in the play involves two distinctly political crimes (usurpation and regicide), and the fact that the play ends with a foreign invasion.

On the use of summary in literature essays, see 28.1.4 (on evidence), 28.1.5 (on introductions), 28.2.2 (on in-class exam essays), and 30.4.2 (on incorporating secondary source material into the literature research essay).

27.3 DESCRIPTION

27.3.1 What It Is

Whereas both summary and paraphrase focus on content, a description of a literary text focuses more on its form, style, or structure, or any particular aspect thereof.

Below are two such descriptions, one of the rhyme scheme of Thomas Hardy’s THE RUINED MAID, the other of Susan Glaspell’s TRIFLES.

“The Ruined Maid”

A dialogue between “the ruined maid,” Melia, and another woman from her hometown, Hardy’s 24-line poem consists of six four-line stanzas. Each stanza consists of two rhyming couplets and ends with the same two words (“said she”) and thus with the same (long e) rhyme sound. In stanzas 2 through 5, the first couplets each feature different rhymes (“socks/docks,” “thou/now,” “bleak/cheek,” “dream/seem”). But in the first and last stanza they have the same rhyme and even the same final word (“crown/Town,” “gown/Town”). As these examples illustrate, most of the end rhymes involve one-syllable words. But in four out of six stanzas, line 3 instead ends with a polysyllabic word (rhyming with “she”) in which the rhyming syllable is set off from the first syllables by a dash: “prosperi-ty” (line 3), “compa-ny” (11), “la-dy” (15), “melancho-ly” (19).

Trifles

Trifles is a one-act play featuring only five characters, two women (Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters) and three men (the Sheriff, the County Attorney, and Mr. Hale). The play begins with all the characters entering the stage together, and a man (the County Attorney) is the first to speak. The play strictly observes the three classical or dramatic unities—of time, of place, and of action: it all unfolds in one setting (the kitchen of a remote midwestern farmhouse) and over the course of about one hour (on a very cold winter morning), exactly the same amount of time it takes to watch the play. Though the play isn’t formally divided into scenes, and its action is continuous, it is broken up into about eight informal segments by the exits and re-entrances of the male characters, who usually (but not always) come and go as a group. The two female characters remain on the stage the entire time. The play ends with all the characters except one (Mr. Hale) onstage and with a woman (Mrs. Hale) speaking the last word.

27.3.2 How to Use It

Responding actively to a text and preparing to write about it require paying close attention to form, style, and structure, as well as content. Describing a text or some aspect of it (its imagery, rhyme scheme, or meter; plotting or point of view; divisions into stanzas, acts and scenes, or chapters; and so on) is a useful way to make sure that you are paying that kind of attention, identifying the sort of details whose significance you might explore in an essay. To move from description to argument begins with asking, “How do these details relate to each other?” “How do they individually and collectively contribute to the text’s effect and meaning?”

On the use of description in literature essays, see 28.1.4 (on evidence) and 28.1.5 (on introductions).

THE LITERATURE ESSAY

The literature essay is a distinct subgenre of writing with unique elements and conventions. Just as you come to a poem, play, or short story with a specific set of expectations, so will readers approach your essay about a poem, play or story. They will be looking for particular elements, anticipating that the work will unfold in a certain way. This chapter explains and explores those elements so as to give you a clear sense of what an effective essay about literature looks like and how it works, along with concrete advice about how to craft your own.

A literature essay has particular elements and a particular form because it serves a specific purpose. Like any essay, it is a relatively short written composition that articulates, supports, and develops one major idea or claim. Like any work of expository prose, it aims to explain something complex—in this case at least one literary work—so that a reader may gain a new and deeper understanding. Explaining in this case entails both analysis (breaking the work down into its constituent parts and showing how they work together to form a meaningful whole) and argument (working to convince someone that the analysis is valid). Your essay needs to show your readers a particular way to understand the work, to interpret or read it. That interpretation or reading starts with your own personal response. But your essay also needs to persuade its readers that your interpretation is reasonable and enlightening—that though it is distinctive and new, it is more than merely idiosyncratic or subjective.

28.1 ELEMENTS OF THE LITERATURE ESSAY

To achieve its purpose, a literature essay must incorporate five elements: an effective tone; a compelling thesis and motive; ample, appropriate evidence; and a coherent structure. Though these five elements are essential to essays of any kind, each needs to take a specific shape in literature essays. The goal of this section is to give you a clear sense of that shape.

28.1.1 Tone (and Audience)

Although your reader or audience isn't an element in your essay, tone is. And tone and audience are closely interrelated. In everyday life, the tone we adopt has everything to do with whom we're talking to and what situation we're in. We talk very differently to our parents than to our best friends. And in different situations we talk to the same person in different ways, depending in part on what response we want to elicit. What tone do you adopt with your best friend when you need a favor? when you want advice? when you want him to take your advice? In each situation, you act on your knowledge of who your audience is, what information they already have, and what their response is likely to be. But you also try to adopt a tone that will encourage your listener to respond in a specific way. In writing, as in life, your sense of audience shapes your tone, even as you use tone to shape your audience's response.

So who is your audience? When you write an essay for class, the obvious answer is your instructor. But in an important sense, that's the wrong answer. Although your instructor could literally be the only person besides you who will ever read your essay, you write about literature to learn how to write for a general audience of peers—people a lot like you who are sensible and educated and who will appreciate having a literary work explained so that they can understand it more fully. Picture your readers as people with at least the same educational background. Assume they have some experience in reading literature and some familiarity with the basic literary terminology outlined in this book. (You should not feel the need to explain what a stanza is or to define the term in medias res.) But assume, too, that your readers have read the specific literary work(s) only once, have not yet closely analyzed the work(s), and have not been privy to class discussions.

Above all, don't think of yourself as writing for only one reader and especially one reader who already sees the text as you do. Remember that the purpose of your essay is to persuade multiple readers with differing outlooks and opinions to see the text your way. That process begins with persuading those readers that you deserve their time, their attention, and their respect. The tone of your paper should be serious and straightforward, respectful toward your readers and the literary work. But its approach and vocabulary, while formal enough for academic writing, should be lively enough to capture and hold the interest of busy, distracted readers. Demonstrate in your essay the stance you want readers to take toward your essay: Earn careful attention and respect by demonstrating care, attentiveness, and respect; encourage your readers to keep an open mind by doing the same; engage your readers by demonstrating genuine engagement with the text, the topic, and the very enterprise of writing.

WAYS OF SETTING THE RIGHT TONE

- Write about literature in the present tense.

Convincing your readers that you are a knowledgeable student of literature whose ideas they should respect requires not only correctly using—without feeling the need to explain—basic literary terms such as stanza and in medias res but also following other long-established conventions. Writing in present tense is one such convention, and it has two very practical advantages. One, it helps you avoid confusing tense shifts. Simply put, you can more clearly indicate when in a text something happens by simply specifying, “When X first visits Y” or “In the first stanza,” and so on than you can by switching tenses. Two, present tense actually makes logical sense if you think about it: Though each time you pick up a story, poem, or play, your interpretation of the work might be different, the work itself isn't. Similarly, though in reading we experience a text as unfolding in time, it actually doesn't: Everything in the text simply, always is. Thus, yesterday, today, and tomorrow, Shakespeare's Ophelia goes mad, “A & P” asks what it means to grow up, John Donne (the implied author) depicts our relationship with God as a lifelong struggle, and so on.

That said, things do get a bit tricky when you write about contexts as well as texts or about actual versus implied authors. Notice, for example, how the following sentence moves from past to present tense as it moves from a statement about the actual author to one about the text: “In perhaps the same year, Dickinson wrote ‘The Bible is an antique Volume,’ which shows a mix of skepticism and optimism.” Again, this switch (from past to present tense) makes logical sense: The actual author Emily Dickinson wrote this poem in the historical past, even as the poem shows now what it always has and always will (if we accept this writer’s interpretation of it). By the same logic, the same tenses would be appropriate if we revised the sentence so as to make Emily Dickinson, the implied author, rather than her poem the subject of its second half: “In perhaps the same year, Dickinson wrote ‘The Bible is an antique Volume,’ a poem in which she expresses a mix of skepticism and optimism.” (On implied versus actual authors, see ch. 2.)

- Use the word “I” carefully.

On the one hand, many instructors have no problem with your using “I” when context makes that appropriate and effective; and used well, the first person can create a real sense of engagement and of “presence,” of a distinctive mind at work. On the other hand, however, you should be aware that many instructors strongly object to any use of the word “I” simply because inexperienced writers so often use it inappropriately and ineffectively. Since the job of a literature essay is to use evidence to persuade readers to accept an interpretation of the work that is generally and objectively, not just personally or subjectively, valid and meaningful, resorting to “I feel” or “I think” can defeat that purpose. Sometimes such phrases can even be a sign that you’ve gotten way off track, perhaps substituting expressions of feeling for actual argument or dwelling more on your thoughts about an issue the text explores than on your thoughts about the text and the thoughts it communicates about that issue (as in the last example in 28.1.2 below). Generally speaking, if everything that follows a phrase like “I feel” or “I think” makes sense and has merit and relevance on its own, cut to the chase by cutting the phrase.

28.1.2 Thesis

A thesis is to an essay what a theme is to a short story, play, or poem: the governing idea or claim. Yet where a literary work implies at least one theme and often more, any essay about a literary work needs to have only one thesis that is explicitly stated in about one to three sentences somewhere in the introduction, usually at or near its end. Like a theme, as we have defined that term in earlier chapters, your thesis must be debatable—a claim that all readers won’t automatically accept. It’s a proposition you can prove with evidence from the literary text, yet it’s one you have to prove, that isn’t obviously true or merely factual.

Though it’s unlikely that any of that is news to you, even experienced writers sometimes find themselves flummoxed when it comes to figuring out just what makes for a debatable claim or thesis about literature. To clarify, we juxtapose below two sets of sentences. On the left are inarguable statements—ones that are merely factual or descriptive and thus might easily find a home in a paraphrase, summary, or description (see ch. 27). On the right are debatable claims about the same topic or fact of the type that might work very well as the thesis of a literature essay.

FACTUAL STATEMENT	THESIS
"The Story of an Hour" explores the topic of marriage.	"The Story of an Hour" poses a troubling question: Does marriage inevitably encourage people to "impose [their] private will upon a fellow-creature" (par. 14)?
"Cathedral" features a character with a physical handicap.	By depicting an able-bodied protagonist who discovers his own emotional and spiritual shortcomings through an encounter with a physically handicapped person, "Cathedral" invites us to question traditional definitions of "disability."
"London" has three discrete stanzas that each end with a period; two-thirds of the lines are end-stopped.	In "London," William Blake uses various formal devices to suggest the unnatural rigidity of modern urban life.
Creon and Antigone are both similar and different.	Antigone and Creon share the same fatal flaw: Each recognizes only one set of obligations. In the end, however, the play presents Antigone as more admirable.

All of the thesis statements above are arguable because each implicitly answers a compelling interpretive question to which multiple, equally reasonable answers seem possible—for instance, What is the key similarity between Antigone and Creon? Which character's actions and values does the play as a whole ultimately champion? or, What exactly does Blake demonstrate about modern urban life? But they share other traits as well. All are clear and emphatic. All use active verbs to capture what the text and/or its implied author does (poses, invites, uses, presents versus has, is, tries to). And each entices us to read further by implying further interpretive questions—What "set of obligations" do Antigone and Creon each "recognize"? Given how alike they are, what makes Antigone more admirable than Creon? or, According to Blake, what specifically is "unnatural" and "rigid" about modern urban life? (Note, by the way, that the arguable claim in the Blake example isn't that he "uses various formal devices to suggest" something: All authors do that. Instead, the arguable claim has to do with what he suggests through formal devices.)

An effective thesis enables the reader to enter the essay with a clear sense that its writer has something to prove and what that is, and it inspires readers with the desire to see the writer prove it. We want to understand how the writer arrived at this view, to test whether it's valid, and to see how the writer will answer the other questions the thesis has generated in our minds. A good thesis captures readers' interest and shapes their expectations. In so doing, it also makes specific promises to readers that the rest of the essay must fulfill.

At the same time, an arguable claim about literature is not one-sided or narrow-minded. A thesis needs to stake out a position, but a position can and should admit complexity. Literature, after all, tends to focus more on exploring problems, conflicts, and questions than on offering easy solutions, resolutions, and answers. Its goal is to complicate and enrich, not to simplify, our way of looking at the world. The best essays about literature and the theses that drive them often do the same. As some of the sample thesis statements above demonstrate, for example, a good thesis can be a claim about just what the key question or conflict explored in a text is rather than about how that question is answered or that conflict resolved. Though an essay with this sort of thesis wouldn't be complete unless it ultimately considered possible answers and resolutions, it doesn't have to start there.

INTERPRETATION VERSUS EVALUATION (OR WHY IS A LITERATURE ESSAY NOT A REVIEW)

All the sample theses above involve interpretive claims—claims about how a literary text works, what it says, how one should understand it. Unless your instructor suggests otherwise, this is the kind of claim you need for a thesis in a literature essay.

Yet it's useful to remember that in reading and writing about literature we often make (and debate) a different type of claim—the evaluative. Evaluation entails assessment, and evaluative claims about literature tend to be of two kinds. The first involves aesthetic assessment and/or personal preference—whether a text (or a part or element thereof) succeeds, or seems to you “good,” in artistic terms or whether you personally “like” it. This kind of claim features prominently in movie and book reviews, but literature essays are not reviews. Where the thesis of a review of Raymond Carver's CATHEDRAL, for example, might be that “Carver's story fails as a story because of its lack of action and unlikeable narrator” or that “‘Cathedral’ does a great job of characterizing its narrator-protagonist,” a better thesis for a literature essay might be something like that of Bethany Qualls's “A Narrator's Blindness in Raymond Carver's ‘Cathedral’” (see “Fiction: Reading, Responding, Writing”): “Through his words even more than his actions the narrator unwittingly shows us why nothing much happens to him by continually demonstrating his utter inability to connect with others or to understand himself.” In other words, where reviewers are mainly concerned with answering the question of whether a text “works,” literary critics focus primarily on showing how it does so and with what effects. Likewise, though personal preferences may well influence your choice of which texts to write about, such preferences shouldn't be the primary focus of your essay—who, after all, can really argue with your personal preferences?

The second kind of evaluative claim involves moral, philosophical, social, or political judgment—whether an idea or action is wise or good, valid or admirable, something you “agree with.” Both interpretive and evaluative claims involve informed opinion (which is why they are debatable). But whereas interpretive claims of the kind literary critics tend to privilege aim to elucidate the opinions and values expressed or enacted in and by a text or its characters, evaluative claims of this second type instead assess the validity of those opinions and values, often by comparison with one's own. Our sample thesis statement about ANTIGONE, for example, is a claim about which character the play presents as more admirable, not about which character the essay writer herself admires more.

The latter kind of claim is far from irrelevant or unimportant. One major reason why we read and write about literature is because it encourages us to grapple with real moral, social, and political issues of the kind we should develop informed opinions about. The question is simply one of emphasis: In a literature essay, the literature itself must be your primary focus, not your personal experience with or opinions about the issues it raises or the situations it explores.

Your main job in a literature essay is to thoughtfully explore what the work communicates and how it does so. Making an interpretive claim your thesis ensures that you keep your priorities straight. Once you have done that job thoroughly and well in the body of your essay, then you can consider evaluative questions in your conclusion (see “End: The Conclusion,” in 28.1.5).

The poem “Ulysses” demonstrates that traveling and meeting new people are important parts of life. The speaker argues that staying in one place for too long is equivalent to substituting the simple act of breathing for truly living. I very much agree with the speaker’s argument because I also believe that travel is one of life’s most valuable experiences. Traveling allows you to experience different cultures, different political systems, and different points of view. It may change your way of thinking or make you realize that people all over the world are more similar than they are different.

This paragraph might be the kernel of a good conclusion to an essay that develops the thesis that “‘Ulysses’ demonstrates that traveling and meeting new people are important parts of life.” Unfortunately, however, this paragraph actually appeared at the beginning of a student paper so full of similar paragraphs that it simply never managed to be about ULYSSES at all. Unfortunately, too, then, this paragraph demonstrates one of the reasons why some instructors forbid you to use the word “I” at all in literature essays (see 28.1.1).

28.1.3 Motive (“Although . . . I Think . . .”)

One reason inexperienced writers might be tempted to emphasize evaluation over interpretation is that evaluative claims sometimes seem more debatable. It isn’t always apparent, in other words, why there is anything useful or revelatory, even arguable or debatable, about a claim like “Antigone presents Antigone’s form of oversimplification as more admirable than Creon’s” or “Emily Dickinson questions traditional Christian doctrines.” If you read the critical excerpts scattered throughout this book, however, you may notice something important: In the work of professional literary critics, such claims seem compelling because they are never presented in a vacuum but rather as what they truly are—a response to other actual or potential claims about the text. Such a presentation provides a motive for the reader of such an essay just as it does its writer.

Boil any good literature essay down to its essence, in other words, and you’ll end up with a sentence that goes something like this (even though such a sentence never appears in the essay):

Although they say / I used to think / someone might reasonably think _____ about this text, I say / now think _____ because _____.

An effective essay doesn’t just state a thesis (“I say/now think . . .”) and prove it by providing reasons and evidence (“because . . .”); it also interests us in that thesis by framing it as a response to some other actual or potential thesis—something that “they” actually “say” about a text; that you “used to think” about it, perhaps on a first, casual reading; or that some reader might reasonably think or say.¹ In a literature research essay, “they” may well be published literary critics. But you don’t have to read any published work on a literary text to discover alternative readings to which to respond: If you have discussed a text in class, you have heard plenty of statements made and questions raised about it, all of which are fodder for response. If you've read and re-read a work carefully, your view of it has almost certainly evolved, ensuring that you yourself have a "naive reading" to compare to your more enlightened one. Finally, to write effectively about a text you inevitably have to imagine other possible interpretations, and, again, those potential readings are also ones you can "take on" in your essay.

Below, an introduction to one student writer's essay on Emily Dickinson appears first; below that are two different ways of paraphrasing the "Although . . . , I think" statement that introduction implies.

When cataloguing Christian poets, it might be tempting to place Emily Dickinson between Dante and John Donne. She built many poems around biblical quotations, locations, and characters. She meditated often on the afterlife, prayer, and trust in God. Yet Dickinson was also intensely doubtful of the strand of Christianity that she inherited. In fact, she never became a Christian by the standards of her community in nineteenth-century Amherst, Massachusetts. Rather, like many of her contemporaries in Boston, Dickinson recognized the tension between traditional religious teaching and modern ideas. And these tensions between hope and doubt, between tradition and modernity animate her poetry. In "Some keep the Sabbath going to church—," "The Brain—is wider than the Sky—," "Because I could not stop for Death—," and "The Bible is an antique Volume," the poet uses traditional religious terms and biblical allusions. But she does so in order both to criticize traditional doctrines and practices and to articulate her own unorthodox beliefs.

1. Although someone might reasonably think of Emily Dickinson as a conventionally religious poet, I think she only uses traditional religious terms and biblical allusions to criticize traditional doctrines and practices and to articulate her own unorthodox beliefs.
2. Although someone might reasonably think of Emily Dickinson as either a conventionally religious poet or as an intensely doubtful one, I think she is both: Her poetry enacts a tension between traditional religious teaching and the hope it inspires and modern doubt.

The introduction above is an especially useful example because it demonstrates three things you need to keep in mind in articulating motive:

1. Crafting a strong motive requires giving real substance to the argument you respond to, taking it seriously enough that your readers do, too. Notice how the introduction above does that by actually listing a few good reasons why it might be entirely reasonable for a reader to think of Emily Dickinson either as a religious poet or as a skeptical one before making the claim that she is both. Simply put, you lose credibility from the get-go rather than generating interest in your thesis if you seem to be building a "straw man" just so you can knock him down.
2. "Responding" to another point of view doesn't have to mean disagreeing with it. Instead, you might
 - agree with, but complicate or qualify, the original claim

Although my classmates might be right to suggest that Miss Emily is heroic, I think she needs to be seen specifically as a tragic heroine.

- present your thesis as a middle way between two extreme alternatives (as in the sample introduction above); or
- as in any conversation, change the subject by turning attention to something previously or easily ignored

Though our class discussion about “A Rose for Emily” focused exclusively on Miss Emily, we shouldn’t ignore her father, since he makes Miss Emily what she is.

3. “Although . . . I think . . . because . . .” is a useful sentence to use as you plan or summarize an argument, not a sentence that should actually appear in an essay, in part because it creates problems with tone (see 28.1.1).

28.1.4 Evidence

Showing readers that your interpretation and argument are valid requires ample, appropriate evidence. And the appropriateness and quality of your evidence will depend on how you prepare and present it. Simply speaking, the term evidence refers to facts. But a fact by itself isn’t really evidence for anything, or rather—as lawyers well know—any one fact can be evidence for many things. Like lawyers, literary critics turn a fact into evidence by interpreting it, drawing an inference from it, giving the reader a vivid sense of why and how the fact demonstrates a specific claim. You need, then, both to present concrete facts and to actively interpret them. Show readers why and how each fact matters.

KINDS OF LITERARY EVIDENCE: QUOTATION, PARAPHRASE, SUMMARY, DESCRIPTION

Quotations are an especially important form of evidence in literature essays. Any essay about literature that contains no quotations is likely to be weak. Readers of such an essay may doubt whether its writer has a thorough knowledge of the literary work or has paid adequate attention to details. And certain kinds of claims—about a character’s motivations, a speaker’s tone, a narrator’s attitude toward a character, and so on—just can’t be truly substantiated or developed without recourse to quotations.

At the same time, inexperienced writers sometimes make the mistake of thinking quotations are the only form of evidence in literature essays. They aren’t. In fact, because a quotation will lead your reader to expect commentary on, and interpretation of, its language, you should quote directly from the text only when the actual wording is significant. Otherwise, keep attention on the facts that really matter by simply paraphrasing, describing, or summarizing. (For a discussion and examples of paraphrase, summary, and description, see ch. 27.)

In this paragraph, note how the student writer simply summarizes and paraphrases (in bold) when the key facts are what happens (who does what

At this point in the novel, Tess is so conflicted about what to do that she can’t decide or do anything at all. Only after asking her to marry him several times and repeatedly wondering aloud why Tess is hesitating does Angel finally get her to say yes or no. Even after agreeing to be his bride, Tess refuses to set a date, and it is Angel who finally, weeks later, suggests December 31. Once Tess agrees, the narrator describes this more as a matter of totally letting go than of finally taking charge: “carried along upon the wings of the hours, without the sense of a will,” she simply “drifted into . . . passive responsiveness to all things her lover suggested” (221; ch. 32). Tess has given up agency and responsibility, letting events take whatever course they will rather than exerting her will, even though—or maybe because—she is so terrified about the direction they will take.

Through its form, the poem demonstrates that division can increase instead of lessen meaning, as well as love. On the one hand, just as the poem’s content stresses the power of the love among three people, so the poem’s form also stresses “threeness” as well as “twoness.” It is after all divided into three distinctly numbered stanzas, and each stanza consists of three sentences. On the other hand, every sentence is “divided equally twixt two” lines, just as the speaker’s “passion” is divided equally between two men. Formally, then, the poem mirrors the kinds of division it describes. Sound and especially rhyme reinforce this pattern since the two lines that make up one sentence usually rhyme with each other to form a couplet. The only lines that don’t conform to this pattern come at the beginning of the second stanza where we instead have alternating rhyme—is (line 7) rhymes with miss (9), mourn (8) rhymes with scorn (10). But here, again, form reinforces content since these lines describe how the speaker “miss[es] one man when the other is “by,” a sensation she arguably reproduces in us as we read by ensuring we twice “miss” the rhyme that the rest of the poem leads us to expect.

to whom when) and what the “gist” of a character’s remarks are, but she quotes when the specific wording is the key evidence. Notice, too, how the writer turns quotations into evidence by both introducing and following each with interpretive commentary (in italics) to create what some writing experts call a “quotation sandwich.” (For more on effective quotation, see ch. 31.)

Description (in bold) provides the evidence in this paragraph from the essay on Aphra Behn’s ON HER LOVING TWO EQUALLY that appears earlier in this book (“Poetry: Reading, Responding, Writing”).

28.1.5 Structure

Like an effective short story, poem, or play, your essay needs to have a beginning (or introduction), a middle (or body), and an ending (or conclusion). Each of these parts plays its own unique and vital role in creating a coherent, persuasive, and satisfying whole.

BEGINNING: THE INTRODUCTION

Your essay’s beginning, or introduction, needs to draw readers in and prepare them for what’s to come by not only articulating your thesis and your motive but also providing any basic information—about the author, the topic, the text, or its contexts—readers will need to understand and appreciate your argument. At the very least, you need to specify the title of the work you’re writing about and the author's full name. Very short (one-sentence) plot summaries or descriptions of the text can also be useful, but they should be “slanted” so as to emphasize the aspects of the text you'll be most concerned with. (On summary and description, see ch. 27.)

Below are the first few sentences of two different essays on HAMLET. Notice how each uses plot summary to establish motive and build up to a thesis. Though we don't yet know exactly what each thesis will be, each summary is slanted to give readers a pretty clear sense of the essay's general topic and of the kind of thesis it's heading toward.

1. It would be easy to read William Shakespeare's Hamlet as a play dealing with exclusively personal issues and questions—“to be or not to be,” am I really crazy?, did Mommy really love Daddy?, do I love Mommy too much? What such a reading ignores is the play's political dimension: Hamlet isn't just any person; he's the Prince of Denmark. The crime he investigates isn't just any old murder or even simple fratricide: by killing his brother, who is also Hamlet's father and Denmark's rightful king, Claudius commits regicide only in order to usurp the throne—a throne Hamlet is supposed to inherit. Thanks to their actions, the tragedy ends not only with the decimation of Denmark's entire royal family, including the prince himself, but also with a successful foreign invasion that we—and all of the characters—have been warned about from the beginning.
2. As everyone knows, William Shakespeare's Hamlet depicts a young man's efforts to figure out both whether his uncle murdered his father and what to do about it. What everyone may not have thought about is this: does it matter that the young man is a prince? that his uncle is now king? or even that the action takes place in ancient Denmark rather than in modern America? Ultimately, it does not. Though the play's setting and its characters' political roles and responsibilities might add an extra layer of interest, they shouldn't distract us from the universal and deeply personal questions the play explores.

Like the sentences in these partial introductions, each and every sentence in your introduction should directly contribute to your effort to spark readers' interest, articulate your thesis and motive, or provide necessary background information. Avoid sentences that are only “filler,” especially vapid (hence boring and uninformative) generalizations or “truisms” about literature or life such as “Throughout human history, people have struggled with the question . . .”; “Literature often portrays conflicts”; “This story deals with many relevant issues”; or “In life, joy and sorrow often go together.” To offer up one more truism worth keeping in mind in crafting introductions, “you only get one chance to make a first impression,” and generalizations, truisms, and clichés seldom make a good one.

MIDDLE: THE BODY

As in any essay, the middle, or body, of your literature essay is where you do the essential work of supporting and developing your thesis by presenting and analyzing evidence. Each body paragraph needs to articulate, support, and develop one specific claim—a debatable idea directly related to the thesis, but smaller and more specific. This claim should be stated fairly early in the paragraph in a topic sentence. (If your paragraphs open with factual statements, you may have a problem.) And every sentence in the paragraph should help prove and elaborate on that claim. Indeed, each paragraph ideally should build from an initial, general statement of the claim to the more complex form of it that you develop by presenting and analyzing evidence. In this way, each paragraph functions a bit like a miniature essay with its own thesis, body, and conclusion.

Your essay as a whole should develop logically, just as each paragraph does. To ensure that happens, you need to do the following:

- Order your paragraphs so that each builds on the last, with one idea following another in a logical sequence. The goal is to lay out a clear path for the reader. Like any path, it should go somewhere. Don't just prove your point; develop it.
- Present each idea/paragraph so that the logic behind the order is clear. Try to start each paragraph with a sentence that functions as a bridge, transporting the reader from one claim to the next. The reader shouldn't have to leap.

The specific sorts of topic and transition sentences you need will depend in part on the kind of literature essay you're writing. Later in this and other chapters, we'll demonstrate what they tend to look like in comparative essays, for example. But your thesis should always be your main guide.

Below are the thesis and topic sentences from the student essay on Raymond Carver's "Cathedral" that appears earlier in this book ("Fiction: Reading, Responding, Writing"). Notice that just as the thesis is a claim about the narrator, so, too, are all the topic sentences and that the writer begins with what she acknowledges to be the most "evident" or obvious claim.

Thesis: Through his words even more than his actions the narrator unwittingly demonstrates his utter inability to connect with others or to understand himself.

Topic Sentences:

1. The narrator's isolation is most evident in the distanced way he introduces his own story and the people in it.
2. At least three times the narrator himself notices that this habit of not naming or really acknowledging people is significant.
3. Also reinforcing the narrator's isolation and dissatisfaction with it are the awkward euphemisms and clichés he uses, which emphasize how disconnected he is from his own feelings and how uncomfortable he is with other people's.
4. Once the visit actually begins, the narrator's interactions and conversations with the other characters are even more awkward.
5. Despite Robert's best attempt to make a connection with the narrator, the narrator resorts to labels again.
6. There is hope for the narrator at the end as he gains some empathy and forges a bond with Robert over the drawing of a cathedral.
7. However, even at the very end it isn't clear just whether or how the narrator has really changed.

END: THE CONCLUSION

In terms of their purpose (not their content), conclusions are introductions in reverse. Whereas introductions draw readers away from their world and into your essay, conclusions send them back. Introductions work to convince readers that they should read the essay; conclusions work to show them why and how the experience was worthwhile. You should approach conclusions, then, by thinking about what specific sort of lasting impression you want to create. What can you give readers to take with them as they journey back into the “real world”?

In literature essays, effective conclusions often consider at least one of the following three things:

1. Implications—What picture of your author’s work or worldview does your argument imply? Alternatively, what might your argument suggest about some real-world issue or situation? Implications don’t have to be earth-shattering. It’s unlikely that your reading of August Wilson’s FENCES will rock your readers’ world. But your argument about this play should in some small but worthwhile way change how readers see Wilson’s work or provide some new insight into some topic that work explores—how racism works, or how difficult it is for people to adjust to changes in the world around us, or how a parent or spouse might go wrong, and so on. If your essay has not, to this point, dealt with theme, now is a good time to do so. If you have not mentioned the author’s name since the introduction, do so now; often, making the implied or actual author the subject of at least some of your sentences is one way to ensure that you are moving from argument to implications.
2. Evaluation—Though, as we’ve stressed, literature essays need to focus primarily on interpretation, conclusions are a good place to move from interpretation to evaluation. In a sense, careful interpretation earns you the right to do some thoughtful evaluation. What might your specific interpretation of the text reveal about its literary quality or effectiveness? Alternatively, to what extent and how exactly do you agree or disagree with the author’s conclusions about a particular issue? How, for example, might your own view of how racism works compare to the view implied in Fences? (For more on evaluative and/versus interpretive claims, see 28.1.2.)
3. Areas of ambiguity or unresolved questions—Are there any remaining puzzles or questions that your argument or the text itself doesn’t resolve or answer? Or might your argument suggest a new question or puzzle worth investigating?

Above all, don’t merely repeat what you’ve already said. If your essay has done its job to this point, and especially if your essay is relatively short, your readers may well feel bored or even insulted if they get a mere summary. You should certainly clarify anything that needs clarifying, but you should also go further. The best essays are rounded wholes in which conclusions do, in a sense, circle back to the place where they started. But the best essays remind readers of where they began only in order to give them a more palpable sense of how far they’ve come and why it matters. Your conclusion is your chance to ensure that readers don’t leave your essay wondering, “Okay. So what?”

It's possible that not feeling "inside anything" (par. 135) could be a feeling of freedom from his own habits of guardedness and insensitivity, his emotional "blindness." But even with this final hope for connection, for the majority of the story the narrator is a closed, judgmental man who isolates himself and cannot connect with others. The narrator's view of the world is one filled with misconceptions that the visit from Robert starts to slowly change, yet it is not clear what those changes are, how far they will go, or whether they will last. Living with such a narrator for the length even of a short story and the one night it describes can be a frustrating experience. But in the end that might be Raymond Carver's goal: by making us temporarily see the world through the eyes of its judgmental narrator, "Cathedral" forces us to do what the narrator himself has a hard time doing. The question is, will that change us?

In its original state, this conclusion to Bethany Qualls's essay on Raymond Carver's "Cathedral" might beg the "So what?" question. Yet notice what happens when we add just three more sentences that try to answer that question. (Qualls's essay appears at the end of "Fiction: Reading, Responding, Writing.")

28.2 COMMON ESSAY TYPES

All literature essays have the same basic purpose and the same five elements. Yet they come in almost infinite varieties, each of which handles those elements somewhat differently and thus also poses somewhat different writing challenges. In the next chapter, for example, we discuss a few literature essay topics so common that they virtually define distinct types or subgenres of the literature essay (29.1.3). The rest of this chapter, however, concentrates exclusively on two especially common and in some ways especially challenging essay types—the comparative essay and the in-class exam essay.

28.2.1 The Comparative Essay

As we have emphasized throughout this book, comparison is a fundamental part of all reading: We develop our expectations about how a poem, play, or story will unfold in part by consciously or unconsciously comparing it to other poems, plays, and stories we've read; we get a sense of just who a character is by comparing her to other characters in the same story or play; and so on. Not surprisingly, then, one of the most common types of essays assigned in literature classes is one that considers similarities and differences within a work, between two works, or among several. One might, for example, write an essay comparing different characters' interpretations of Georgianna's birthmark in Nathaniel Hawthorne's THE BIRTH-MARK or one comparing the use of symbolism in this Hawthorne story to that in Edwidge Danticat's A WALL OF FIRE RISING.

The key challenges involved in writing effective comparison essays are achieving the right balance between comparison and contrast, crafting an appropriate thesis, and effectively structuring the body of the essay.

COMPARISON AND/VERSUS CONTRAST

“Comparison-contrast” is a label commonly applied to comparison essays, but it’s a somewhat misleading one: Though some comparative essays give greater stress to similarities, others to differences (or contrast), all comparison has to pay at least some attention to both. Contrast is thus always part of comparison.

Where the emphasis falls in your essay will depend partly on your assignment, so be sure that you scrutinize it carefully and understand what it requires of you. An assignment that asks you to “explain how and why children feature prominently in Romantic literature” by “analyzing the work of at least two Romantic poets,” for example, encourages you to pay more attention to similarities so as to demonstrate understanding of a single “Romantic” outlook. Conversely, an assignment asking you to “contrast Wordsworth and Coleridge” and describe “the major differences in their poetry” obviously emphasizes contrast. Again, however, even an assignment that stresses differences requires you first to establish some similarities as a ground for contrast, even as an assignment that stresses similarities requires you to acknowledge the differences that make the similarities meaningful.

If the assignment gives you leeway, your particular topic and thesis will determine the relative emphasis you give to similarities and differences. In “Out-Sonneting Shakespeare: An Examination of Edna St. Vincent Millay’s Use of the Sonnet Form” (ch. 19), for example, student writer Melissa Makolin makes her case for the distinctiveness and even radicalism of Millay’s sonnets both by contrasting them to those of Shakespeare and by demonstrating the similarities between two sonnets by Shakespeare, on the one hand, and by Millay, on the other. But one could easily imagine an essay that instead demonstrated Millay’s range by emphasizing the differences between her two sonnets, perhaps by building a thesis out of Makolin’s claim that one poem is about “impermanent lust,” the other “eternal love.”

THE COMPARATIVE ESSAY THESIS

Like any essay, a comparative essay needs a thesis—one argumentative idea that embraces all the things (texts, characters, etc.) being compared. If you’re like most of us, you may well be tempted to fall back on a statement along the lines of “These things are similar but different.” Sadly, that won’t cut it as a thesis. It isn’t arguable (what two or more things aren’t both similar and different?), nor is it specific enough to give your comparison direction and purpose: What such a thesis promises is less a coherent argument than a series of seemingly random, only loosely related observations about similarities and differences, desperately in search of a point.

At the end of the introduction to his comparative essay, student writer Charles Collins first articulates his main claim about each of the two short stories he will compare and then offers one overarching thesis statement.

In “The Birth-Mark,” the main character, Aylmer, views his wife’s birthmark as a flaw in her beauty, as well as a symbol of human imperfection, and tries to remove it. In “the Thing in the Forest,” the protagonists, Penny and Primrose, react to the Thing both as a real thing and as a symbol. The characters’ interpretation of these things is what creates conflict, and the stories are both shaped by the symbolic meanings that the characters ascribe to those things.

(You can find the entire essay at the end of ch. 5.)

COMPARATIVE ESSAY STRUCTURES

In structuring the body of a comparative essay, you have two basic options, though it's also possible to combine these two approaches. Make sure to choose the option that best suits your particular texts, topics, and thesis rather than simply fall back on whichever structure feels most familiar or easy to you. Your structure and your thesis should work together to create a coherent essay that illuminates something about the works that can only be seen through comparison.

The Block Method

The first option tends to work best both for shorter essays and for essays, of any length, in which you want to stress differences at least as much as similarities. As its common label, “the block method,” implies, this approach entails dividing your essay into “blocks” or sections that each lay out your entire argument about one of the things you’re comparing. Charles Collins’s essay comparing two stories, for example, is divided roughly in half: His first three body paragraphs analyze one story (THE BIRTH-MARK), the last four body paragraphs another story (THE THING IN THE FOREST). To knit the two halves of the essay together into one whole, however, Collins begins the second “block” with a paragraph that discusses both stories. Such transitions are crucial to making the “block” method work.

This paragraph (par. 6) of Collins’s essay serves as a transition between the two halves or “blocks” of his essay, the first on “The Birth-Mark,” the second on “The Thing in the Forest.”

The symbolism in “The Birth-Mark” is fairly straightforward. The characters openly acknowledge the power of the symbol, and the narrator of the story clearly states what meaning Aylmer finds in it. In “The Thing in the Forest” what the thing represents is not as clear. Penny and Primrose, the story’s main characters, do not view the Thing as symbolic, as Aylmer does the birthmark. Neither the narrator nor the characters directly say why the Thing is important to Penny and Primrose or even whether the Thing they see in the forest is the monster, the Loathly Worm, that they later read about in the book at the mansion. . . .

In addition to strong, meaty transition paragraphs, effective use of the block method also requires that you

- make each block or section of your essay match the others in terms of the issues it takes up or the questions it answers, so as to maintain clear points of comparison. In Collins’s symbolism essay (ch. 5), for example, each “block” answers the same questions with regard to each of the two stories and main characters being compared: whether or not the characters in a story see something as a symbol, what it ultimately comes to symbolize to them or to the reader, and how the characters’ response to the symbol shapes their behavior.
- order and present the blocks so that each builds on the last: Though your blocks should match, their order shouldn’t be random; rather, each block should build on the one that came before, just as should paragraphs/topic sentences in any essay. In Collins’s essay, for example, the discussion of “The Birth-Mark” comes first because his argument is that symbolism here is more “straightforward” or simple than it is in “The Thing in the Forest,” and the transition homes in on that difference. As in many essays, then, the movement here is from the most to the least obvious and simple points.

The Point-by-Point or Side-by-Side Method

The second method of structuring a comparative essay requires you to integrate your discussions of the things—texts or characters, for example—that you are comparing. Each section of your essay (which might be one paragraph or two) should begin with a topic sentence that refers to all the things you’re comparing rather than exclusively to one.

Below is a paragraph from a student essay comparing Samuel Taylor Coleridge’s FROST AT MIDNIGHT and Matthew Arnold’s DOVER BEACH using the “point-by-point method.” Like every other body paragraph in this essay, this one discusses both poems and their speakers.

Differently but equally disturbed by the thoughts and emotions stirred by the natural scene before them, both speakers turn to the past, without finding much consolation in it. In Coleridge’s poem, that past is specific and personal: What the speaker remembers are his schooldays, a time when he was just as bored and lonely and just as trapped inside his own head as he is now. Then, as now, he “gazed upon the” fire and “watch[ed] that fluttering” ash (lines 25–26), feeling no more connection then to his “stern precepto[r]” than he does now to his sleeping baby (37). In Arnold’s poem, the past the speaker thinks of is more distant and historical. What he remembers are lines by Sophocles written thousands of years ago and thousands of miles away. But in his case, too, the past just seems to offer more of the same rather than any sort of comfort or relief. Just as he now—standing by a “distant northern sea” (20)—hears in the waves “[t]he eternal note of sadness” (14), so “Sophocles long ago”—“on the Aegean”—“[h]eard” in them “the turbid ebb and flow / Of human misery” (15–16, 18).

Below are the thesis and outline for another point-by-point comparison essay, this one analyzing two short stories—Franz Kafka’s A HUNGER ARTIST and Flannery O’Connor’s “Everything That Rises Must Converge.” In the essay itself, each numbered section consists of two paragraphs, the first (a) discussing O’Connor’s protagonist, the second (b) Kafka’s.

Thesis: “A Hunger Artist” and “Everything That Rises Must Converge” depict changing worlds in which the refusal to adapt amounts to a death sentence.

Outline:

1. Both Julian’s mother and the hunger artist live in rapidly changing worlds in which they don’t enjoy the status they once did.
 - a) Julian’s mother’s world: the civil rights movement and economic change > loss of status
 - b) hunger artist’s world: declining “interest in professional fasting” > loss of status
2. Rather than embracing such changes, both the artist and the mother resist them.

- a) Julian's mother: verbally expressed nostalgia, refusal to even see that things are changing
 - b) the hunger artist: nostalgia expressed through behavior, does see that things are changing
3. Both characters take pride in forms of self-sacrifice that they see as essential to upholding "old-world" standards.
- a) Julian's mother: sacrifices for him, upholding family position and honor
 - b) hunger artist: sacrifices for himself, upholding traditions of his art
4. Both characters nonetheless die as a result of their unwillingness to adapt.
- a) Julian's mother
 - b) hunger artist
5. The endings of both stories create uncertainty about how we are to judge these characters and their attitudes.
- a) Julian's mother: Julian's last words and the story's create more sympathy for the mother
 - b) hunger artist: his last words and description of the panther that replaces him make him less sympathetic

28.2.2 The Essay Test

Essays you are required to write for in-class exams do not fundamentally differ from those you write outside of class. Obviously, however, having to generate an essay on the spot presents peculiar challenges. Below, we offer some general tips before discussing the two basic types of in-class essay exams.

GENERAL TIPS

- Carefully review instructions.

Though instructors rarely provide actual exam questions in advance, they usually do give you some indication of how many questions you'll have to answer, what kind of questions they will be, and how much they will each count. Whether you get such instructions before or during the exam, take the time to consider them carefully before you start writing. Make sure you understand exactly what is expected of you, and ask your instructor about anything that seems the least confusing or ambiguous. You don't want to produce a great essay on a Shakespeare sonnet only to discover that your essay was supposed to compare two Shakespeare sonnets. Nor do you want to spend 75 percent of your time on the question worth 25 points and 25 percent on the question worth 75 points.

- Glean all the information you can from sample questions.

In lieu of or in addition to instructions, instructors will sometimes provide sample questions in advance of an exam. Read rightly, such questions can give you a lot of information about what you need to be able to do on the exam. If presented with the sample question "What are three characteristic features of short stories by Flannery O'Connor, and what is their combined effect?," for example, you should come to the exam prepared not only to write an essay addressing this specific question but also or alternatively an essay addressing either a different question about the assigned O'Connor stories (i.e., same texts, different topic) or a similar question about other authors that you read multiple works by (i.e., same topic, different texts).

- Anticipate questions or topics and strategize about how to use what you know.
Whether or not an instructor actually gives you sample questions, exam questions rarely, if ever, come entirely out of the blue. Instead they typically emerge directly out of class lectures and discussions. As important, even questions that do ask you to approach a text in what seems like a new way can still be answered effectively by drawing upon the facts and ideas discussed in class. Keeping good notes and reviewing them as you prepare for the exam should thus help you both to anticipate the sorts of topics you'll be asked to address and to master the information and ideas well enough so that you can use what you know in responding even to unanticipated questions.
- Review and brainstorm with classmates.
Just as discussing a work in class can broaden and deepen your understanding of it, so reviewing with classmates can help you see different ways of understanding and organizing the material and the information and ideas discussed in class. Compare notes, certainly, but also discuss and brainstorm. What sorts of questions might your classmates anticipate?
- Read questions carefully and make sure you answer them.
Once you have the actual exam questions, read them carefully before you start writing. Make sure you understand exactly what the question asks you to do, and—again—ask your instructor to clarify anything confusing or ambiguous.
Don't ignore any part of a question, but do put your emphasis where the question itself does. Let's suppose your question is, "What does Dickinson seem to mean by 'Telling all the truth but telling it slant'? How might she do just that in her poetry? How might Dickinson's personal experience or historical milieu have encouraged her to approach things this way?" An essay in answer to this question that didn't say anything at all about biographical or historical context or speculate at all about how one or the other shaped Dickinson's notion of truth telling would be less than complete. Yet the question allows you to consider only one of these two contexts rather than both. More important, it asks you to devote most of your essay to analyzing at least two poems ("poetry") rather than discussing context. A good strategy might thus be to consider context only in your introduction and/or conclusion.
- Be specific.
One key difference between good exam essays and so-so or poor ones is the level and kind of detail they provide: One thing an exam is testing is whether you have actually read and really know the material; another is how well you can draw on facts to make an argument rather than simply regurgitating general ideas expressed in class. In response to the question above, for example, noodling on in a general way about Dickinson's use of dashes or metaphor will only take you so far—and not nearly far enough to score well. In answering this question, you should mention the titles of at least two specific poems and carefully explain precisely how each of them tells the truth slantwise or helps us understand what Dickinson means by slantwise truth. For example: "In the poem that actually begins 'Tell all the truth but tell it slant,' Dickinson suggests that to successfully convey the truth, you have to do it in a roundabout way. People need to be eased into the truth; if it comes all at once, it's too much. She even compares that kind of direct truth-telling to being struck by lightning." (See below for further discussion of specificity and how to achieve it in closed- versus open-book exams.)

- Allow time to review and reconsider your essays.

Though you're obviously pressed for time in an exam, leave yourself at least a few minutes to read over your essay before you have to hand it in. In addition to correcting actual mistakes, look for places where you could use more concrete evidence or make tighter, clearer connections between one point or claim and another.

CLOSED- VERSUS OPEN-BOOK EXAMS

How you prepare for exam essays and how those essays will be judged will depend, in part, on whether your exam is "open-book" or "closed-book"—whether, in other words, you are allowed to consult the literary texts and perhaps even your notes about them during the exam itself.

At first glance, open-book exams seem much easier, and in some ways they are. Having the literary text(s) in front of you ensures that you don't have to rely entirely on memory to conjure up factual evidence: You can double-check characters' names, see what a poem's rhyme scheme is, actually quote the text, and so on. The fact that you can do all that also means, however, that you need to: Instructors rightly expect more concrete and specific evidence, including quotations, in open-book exam essays. The bar, in short, is higher.

At the same time, there's a danger of spending so much time during the exam looking back through the text that you don't have adequate time to craft your argument about it. Here, good preparation can help. If you know which texts you're likely to be asked about on the exam, make sure that you mark them up in advance, highlighting especially telling passages (including those discussed in class), making notations about rhyme scheme and meter, and so on, so that you can marshal your evidence faster during the exam. Just make sure that you consult with your instructor in advance about what, if any, notes you are allowed to write in the book you bring with you to the exam.

If the exam is closed-book, your instructor won't be looking for quite the same level of detail when it comes to evidence, but that doesn't mean you don't need any. To prepare for a closed-book exam, you will need to do some memorizing: Knowing a text word-for-word is rarely required or helpful, but it is essential that you master the basic facts about it such as genre, title, author, characters' names; have a general sense of its plot, structure, and form; and can recall any facts about context that were stressed in class. In your essay, you will need to make good use of paraphrase, summary, and description (see ch. 27).

Below are two versions of a paragraph from an essay written for a closed-book exam. Without consulting the texts, the essayist cannot actually quote them. What the essayist can do is paraphrase an important piece of dialogue and summarize key episodes. What makes the second version better than the first is its much greater specificity about action, timing, characters, and dialogue—who says and does what to whom, when, and in what story.

1. O'Connor's stories often involve moments of extreme violence, like what happens to the old ladies in "Everything That Rises Must Converge" and "A Good Man Is Hard to Find.” A character even says it would be a good thing if we were threatened with violence all the time.

2. O'Connor's stories often end with moments of extreme violence. At the end of "Everything That Rises Must Converge," after Julian's mother's gives a little boy a penny, his mother reacts to what she sees as condescension by whacking Julian's mother in the head with her purse. "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" ends with the Misfit shooting the grandmother point-blank after she has had to watch and listen as each of her family members is dragged off into the woods and shot. Afterward, the Misfit even suggests that the grandmother would have been a better person if she'd been threatened with that kind of violence all the time.

THE WRITING PROCESS

Doing anything well requires both knowing what you're trying to achieve and having some strategies for how to go about it. Where “The Literature Essay” chapter (ch. 28) focuses mainly on the what, this chapter focuses more on the how. In practice, of course, the writing process will vary from writer to writer and from assignment to assignment. No one can give you a recipe. What we instead do here is present you with a menu of strategies to try out and adapt to your particular tendencies as a writer and to the requirements of specific writing occasions and assignments.

As you do so, keep in mind that writing needn't be a solitary enterprise. Ultimately, your essay must be your own work. That is absolutely essential; anything else is plagiarism. But most writers—working in every genre and discipline, at every level—get inspiration, guidance, and feedback from others throughout the writing process, and so can you. Use class discussions to generate and test out topics and theses. Ask your instructor to clarify assignments or to discuss your ideas. Have classmates, friends, or roommates critique your drafts. In writing about literature, as in reading it, we get a much better sense of what our own ideas are and how best to convey them by considering others' impressions.

29.1 GETTING STARTED

29.1.1 Scrutinizing the Assignment

For student essayists, as for most professional ones, the writing process usually begins with an assignment. Though assignments vary, all impose restrictions. These are designed not to hinder your creativity but to direct it into productive channels, ensuring you hone particular skills, try out different approaches, and avoid common pitfalls.

Your first task as a writer is thus to scrutinize your assignment. Make sure that you fully understand what you are being asked to do (and not do), and ask questions about anything unclear or puzzling.

Almost all assignments restrict the length of an essay by imposing word or page limits. Keep those limits in mind as you consider potential topics, making sure to choose a topic you can handle in the space allowed. In three pages, you cannot thoroughly analyze all the characters in August Wilson's FENCES. But you might within that limit say something significant about some specific aspect of a character or of characterization—perhaps how Troy Maxson's approach to parenting relates to the way he was parented or how Wilson's inclusion of the final scene, set after Troy's death, affects our interpretation of his character.

Many assignments impose further restrictions, often indicating the texts and/or topics your essay should explore. As a result, any assignment will shape whether and how you tackle later steps such as “Choosing a Text” or “Identifying Topics.”

Below are several representative essay assignments, each of which imposes a particular set of restrictions.

Choose any story in this anthology and write an essay analyzing how and why its protagonist changes.

This assignment dictates your topic and main question. It also provides you with the kernel of a thesis: In [story title], [protagonist's name] goes from being a _____ to a _____. OR By the end of [story title], [protagonist's name] has learned that _____. Though the assignment lets you choose your story, it limits you to those in which the protagonist changes or learns a lesson of some kind.

Write an essay analyzing one of the following sonnets: “Nuns Fret Not,” “In an Artist’s Studio,” or “In the Park.” Be sure to consider how the poem’s form contributes to its meaning.

This assignment limits your choice of texts to three. It also requires that your essay address the effects of the poet’s choice to use the sonnet form. Notice, though, that the assignment doesn’t require that this be the main topic of your essay, but instead leaves you free to pursue any topic related to the poem’s meaning.

Write an essay exploring the significance of references to eyes and vision in A Midsummer Night’s Dream. What, through them, does the play suggest about the power and the limitations of human vision?

This assignment is more restrictive, indicating both text and topic. At the same time, it requires you to narrow the topic and formulate a specific thesis.

Write an essay comparing at least two poems by any one author in your anthology.

This assignment specifies the type of essay you must write (a comparison essay) and limits your choice of texts. Yet it leaves you the choice of which author to focus on, how many and which poems to analyze, what topic to explore, and what relative weight to give to similarities and differences.

Explain how and why children feature prominently in Romantic literature by analyzing the work of at least two Romantic poets.

This assignment is more restrictive, specifying the type of essay (comparison), the topic (depictions of children), and the kinds of texts (Romantic poems), while also encouraging you to focus mainly on similarities so as to define a single Romantic outlook on children and childhood.

29.1.2 Choosing a Text

If your assignment allows you to choose which text to write about, try letting your initial impressions or “gut reactions” guide you. Do that, and your first impulse may be to choose a text that you immediately like or “get.” Perhaps its language resembles your own; it depicts speakers, characters, or situations you easily relate to; or it explores issues you care deeply about. Following that first impulse can be a good strategy. Writing an engaging essay requires being engaged, and we all find it easier to engage with texts, authors, characters, and so on that we “like” immediately.

Paradoxically, however, writers often discover that they have little interesting or new to say about such a text. Perhaps they’re too emotionally invested to analyze it closely or to imagine alternative ways to read it, or maybe its meaning seems so obvious that there’s no puzzle or problem to drive an argument. Often, then, it can actually be more productive to choose a work that provokes the opposite reaction—that initially puzzles or even frustrates or angers you, one whose characters seem alien or whom you don’t “like,” one that investigates an issue you haven’t thought much about, or one that articulates a theme you don’t agree with. Sometimes such negative first reactions can have surprisingly positive results when it comes to writing. When you have to dig deeper, you sometimes discover more. And your own initial response might also provide you with the kernel of a good motive (see 28.1.3).

So, too, might the responses of your classmates. If you are writing about a text you’ve discussed in class, in other words, you might also or instead start with your “gut responses” to that discussion. Were you surprised by anything your classmates claimed about the text? Or did you strongly agree or disagree with any of your classmate’s interpretations? Especially in hindsight, was anything not said or discussed in class that you think should have been?

29.1.3 Generating Topics

When an assignment allows you to create your own topic, you are more likely to build a lively and engaging essay from a particular insight or question that captures your attention and makes you want to say something, solve a problem, or stake out a position. The best essays originate in an individual response to a text and focus on a genuine question about it. Even when an instructor assigns you a topic, your essay’s effectiveness will largely depend on whether you have made the topic your own, turning it into a real question to which you discover your own answer.

Often we refer to “finding” a topic, as if there are a bevy of topics “out there” just waiting to be plucked like ripe fruit off the topic tree. In at least two ways, that’s true. For one thing, as we read a literary work, certain topics often do jump out and say, “Hey, look at me! I’m a topic!” A title alone may have that effect: What “lesson” seems to be learned in “The Lesson”? Why is Keats so fixated on that darn nightingale; what does it symbolize for him? Or what the heck is an “ode” anyway, and how might it matter that Keats’s poem is an “Ode to a Nightingale”?

For another thing, certain general topics can be adapted to fit many different literary works. In fact, that’s just another way of saying that there are certain common types (even subgenres) of literary essays, just as there are of short stories, plays, and poems. Here are a few especially common topics:

- the significance of a seemingly insignificant aspect or element of a work—a word or group of related words, an image or image-cluster, a minor character, a seemingly small incident or action, and so on. (This topic is appealing in part because it practically comes with a built-in motive: “Although a casual reader would likely ignore X . . .”)

- the outlook or worldview of a single character or speaker (or of a group of characters) and its consequences
- the changes a major character or speaker undergoes over the course of a literary work (What is the change? When, how, and why does it occur?)
- the precise nature and wider significance of an internal or external conflict and its ultimate resolution

Especially when you're utterly befuddled about where to begin, it can be very useful to keep in mind such generic topics or essay types and to use them as starting points. But remember that they are just starting points. You always have to adapt and narrow a generic topic such as "imagery" or "character change" in order to produce an effective essay. In practice, then, no writer simply "finds" a topic; she makes one.

Here are some other techniques that might help you generate topics. (And generating topics, giving yourself a choice, is often a good idea.)

- Analyze your initial response.

If you've chosen a text you feel strongly about, start with those responses. Try to describe your feelings and trace them to their source. Be as specific as possible. What moments, aspects, or elements of the text most affected you? How and why exactly? Try to articulate the question behind your feelings. Often, strong responses result when a work either challenges or affirms an expectation, assumption, or conviction that you bring to it. Think about whether and how that's true in your case. Define the specific expectation, assumption, or conviction. How, where, and why does the text challenge it? fulfill or affirm it? Which of your responses and expectations are objectively valid, likely to be shared by other readers?

- Think through the elements.

Start with a list of elements and work your way through them, identifying anything that might be especially unique, interesting, or puzzling about the text in terms of each element. What stands out about the tone, the speaker, the situation, and so on? Come up with a statement about each. Look for patterns among your statements. Also, think about the questions your statements imply or ignore.

- Pose motive questions.

In articulating a motive in your essay's introduction, your concern is primarily with your readers, your goal to give them a substantive reason to find your thesis new and interesting and your essay thus worth reading. But you can also work your way toward a topic and even, eventually, a thesis, by considering motive-related questions. Keep in mind the basic "Although they say/I used to think/someone might reasonably think . . . , I say/now think . . ." statement and turn it into questions:

- What element(s) or aspect(s) of this work might a casual reader misinterpret? Or which might you have misinterpreted on a first reading? Or which did your classmates seem to misinterpret?
- What potentially significant element(s) or aspect(s) of this work were ignored entirely in class discussion? Or which might you have ignored on a first reading? Or which might any reasonable person ignore?
- What aspect(s) or element(s) of this work have your classmates disagreed among themselves about or maybe even taken extreme positions on? Or which have you seen in very different ways as you've read and thought about the work?

—What interesting paradox(es), contradiction(s), or tension(s) do you see in the work?

29.1.4 Formulating a Question and a Thesis

Before you begin writing an essay on any topic, you need to come up with a thesis or hypothesis—an arguable statement about the topic. Quite often, topic and thesis occur to you simultaneously: You might well decide to write about a topic precisely because you've got something specific to say about it. At other times, that's not the case: The topic comes much more easily than the thesis. In this event, it helps to formulate a specific question about the topic and to develop a specific answer. That answer will be your thesis.

Again, remember that your question and thesis should focus on something specific, yet they need to be generally valid, involving more than your personal feelings. One way to move from an initial, subjective response to an arguable thesis is to freewrite, as in the example below. Don't worry what form your writing takes or how good it is: Just write.

I really admire Bartleby. But why? What in the story encourages me to admire him? Well, he sticks to his guns and insists on doing only what he "prefers" to do. He doesn't just follow orders. That makes him really different from all the other characters in the story, especially the narrator. And also from a lot of people I know, even me. He's a nonconformist. Do I think other readers should feel the same way? Maybe, but maybe not. After all, his refusal to conform does cause problems for everyone around him. And it doesn't do him a lot of good either. Plus, he would be really annoying in real life. I wouldn't want to work in the same office. And even if you admire him, you can't really care about him because he doesn't seem to care much about anybody else. Or even about himself? Maybe that's the point. Through Bartleby, Melville explores both how rare and important and how dangerous nonconformity can be.

However you arrive at your thesis or however strongly you believe in it, you should still think of it for now as a working hypothesis—a claim that's provisional, still open to rethinking and revision.

29.2 PLANNING

Once you've formulated a tentative thesis and, ideally, a motive ("Although . . . , I think . . ."), you need to work on the ". . . because" part of the equation, which means both (1) figuring out how to structure your argument, articulating and ordering your claims or sub-ideas; and (2) identifying the evidence you need to prove and develop each of those claims.

Start by looking closely at your thesis. As in almost every phase of writing, it helps to temporarily fill your readers' shoes: Try to see your thesis and the promises it makes from their point of view. What will they need to be shown, and in what order? If a good thesis shapes readers' expectations, it can also guide you, as a writer.

A good thesis usually implies not only what the essay's claims should be but also how they should be ordered. For instance, a thesis that focuses on the development of a character implies that the first body paragraphs will explain what that character is initially like and that later paragraphs will explore when, how, and why that character changes.

Working wholly from the thesis and this rough sense of structure, generate an outline, either listing each claim (to create a sentence outline) or each topic to be covered (to create a topic outline). Though a sentence outline is far more helpful, you may find that at this stage you can only identify topics.

Take, for example, the Bartleby thesis developed in the last section (29.1.4)—Through Bartleby, Melville explores both how rare and important, and how dangerous, nonconformity can be. From it, we can generate the following outline, which begins with two clear claims/sentences and then simply describes two other topics that will need to be covered:

1. Claim: Bartleby is a nonconformist.
2. Claim: Bartleby's nonconformity makes him very different from every other character in the story, especially the narrator.
3. Topic: positive aspects or consequences of Bartleby's nonconformity.
4. Topic: negative aspects or consequences of Bartleby's nonconformity—how it's dangerous.

At this stage, in other words, it's clear that our Bartleby essay needs first to show that and how Bartleby refuses to conform (1) and then to show that and how such nonconformity differentiates him from other characters (2). Not only are these the most obvious and least debatable claims, but they also lay the essential groundwork for the rest: Questions about why or how Bartleby's nonconformity might be negative or positive (3–4) only make sense once you establish that there is nonconformity and show what it looks like. To further refine the first half of the outline or to draft the first half of the essay, all its hypothetical writer needs to do is review the story and her notes about it to identify appropriate evidence. Her discoveries will also determine whether she can fully develop each of these claims in just one paragraph or whether she might need two.

The shape of the second half of the essay is less clear and will demand more work. In reviewing the story and her notes, the writer would need to come up with claims about what the positive and negative aspects or consequences of Bartleby's nonconformity are. Ultimately she might even need to rethink the order in which she discusses these topics. Since whatever comes last in an essay should usually be not only the most complicated and debatable point but also the one that gets most emphasis as we build toward a conclusion, this writer would need to figure out where she thinks the story puts the most emphasis—the value of nonconformity (3) or its dangers (4).

As this example demonstrates, just as your thesis can guide you to an outline, so an outline can show you exactly what you need to figure out and what evidence you need to look for as you move toward a draft. The more detailed your outline, the easier drafting tends to be. But the truth is that sometimes we can only figure out what our actual claims or ideas are by trying to write them out, which might mean moving straight from a rough outline to a draft rather than further refining the outline before drafting.

As you begin to gather evidence, however, it is important that you let the evidence guide you, as well as your outline. As you look back at the text, you may well discover facts that are relevant to the thesis but that don't seem to relate directly to any of the claims or topics you've articulated. In that case, you may need to insert a new topic into the outline. Additionally, you may find (and should in fact actively look for) facts that challenge your argument. Test and reassess your claims against those facts and adjust them accordingly. Don't ignore inconvenient truths.

29.3 DRAFTING

If you've put time and care into getting started and planning, you may already be quite close to a first draft. If you've instead jumped straight into writing, you may have to move back and forth between composing and some of the steps described in earlier sections of this chapter.

Either way, remember that first drafts are called rough drafts for a reason. Think of yourself as a painter "roughing out" a sketch in preparation for the more detailed painting to come. At this stage, try not to worry about grammar, punctuation, and mechanics. Concentrate on the argument—articulating your ideas and proving them.

Sometimes the best way to start is simply to copy your thesis and outline into a new document. Forget about introducing your thesis, and just go right to work on your first body paragraph. Sometimes, however, you'll find that starting with the introduction helps: Having to draw readers in and set up your thesis and motive can give you a clearer sense of where you're going and why.

However you start, you will almost certainly feel frustrated at times. Stick to it. If you become truly stuck, try explaining your point to another person or getting out an actual piece of paper and a pen and writing for a few minutes before returning to your computer and your draft. If all else fails, make a note about what needs to go in the spot you can't get through. Then move on and come back to that spot once you've written the next paragraph. Whatever it takes, stay with your draft until you've at least got a middle, or body, that you're relatively satisfied with. Then take a break.

Later or—better yet, tomorrow—come back, look at the draft with a fresh eye, and take another shot, attaching a conclusion and (if necessary) an introduction, filling in any gaps, crafting smooth(er) transitions within and between paragraphs, deleting anything that now seems irrelevant (or, better yet, copying it into a separate "outtakes" document just in case you figure out later how to make it relevant). Do your utmost to create a relatively satisfying whole. Now pat yourself on the back and take another break.

29.4 REVISING

Revision is one of the most important and difficult tasks for any writer. It's a crucial stage in the writing process, yet one that is all too easy to ignore or mismanage. The difference between a so-so essay and a good one, between a good essay and a great one, often depends entirely on effective revision. Give yourself time to revise more than once. As you do so, develop revision strategies that work for you. The investment in time and effort will pay rich dividends on this essay and on future ones.

The essential thing is not to confuse revising with editing and proofreading. We've devoted separate sections of this chapter to each of these steps because they are entirely different processes. Where editing and proofreading focus mainly on sentence-level matters (grammar, punctuation, spelling, and so on), revision is about the whole essay, “the big picture.” Revision entails assessing and improving both (1) the essay’s working parts or elements and (2) your overall argument. Doing these two things well requires not getting distracted by small grammatical errors, spelling mistakes, and so on.

Before considering in depth what it means to assess the elements and enrich the argument, here are a few general tips about how to approach revision:

- Think like readers. Effective revision requires you to temporarily play the role of reader, as well as writer, of your essay. Take a step back from your draft, doing your utmost to see it from a more objective, even skeptical standpoint. Revision demands re-vision—looking again, seeing anew.
- Get input from real readers. This is an especially good time to involve other people in your writing process. Copy the “Assessing the Elements” checklist below and have a friend or classmate use it to critique your draft.
- Think strengths and weaknesses, not right and wrong. In critiquing your own draft or someone else’s, it helps to think less in absolute terms (right and wrong, good and bad) than in terms of strengths and weaknesses—specific elements and aspects that work well and those that need some work.
- Work with a hard copy. Computers are a godsend when it comes to making revisions. But because they only allow us to look at one or two pages of an essay at a time, they actually make it harder to see the essay as a whole and to assess the effects of the changes they make it so easy for us to make. During the revision process, then, move away from the computer sometimes. Print out hard copies so that you can see your essay as a whole and mark it up, identifying problems that you can return to the computer to fix.

29.4.1 Assessing the Elements

The first step in revision is to make sure that all the working parts of your essay are, indeed, working. To help with that process, run through the following checklist to identify the strengths and weaknesses of your draft—or ask someone else to do so. Try to answer each question with ruthless honesty.

Whenever you can’t justify a check, remember that you and/or your readers need to identify the specific problems in order to solve them—If information is missing from the introduction, what information? If every sentence in the introduction isn’t serving a clear purpose, which sentence is the problem? And so on.

Thesis and Motive

- Is there one claim that effectively controls the essay?
- Is the claim debatable?
- Does the claim demonstrate real thought? Does it truly illuminate the text and topic?
- Does the writer show us that (and why) the thesis is new and worthwhile by suggesting an actual or potential alternative view?

Structure

BEGINNING/INTRODUCTION

- Does the introduction provide readers all—and only—the information they need about the author, text, context, and topic?

- Does the introduction imply a clear, substantive, debatable but plausible thesis? Is it clear which claim is the thesis?
- Does every sentence either help to articulate the thesis and motive or to provide essential information?

MIDDLE/BODY

- Does each paragraph clearly state one debatable claim? Does everything in the paragraph directly relate to, and help support and develop, that claim?
- Is each of those claims clearly related to (but different from) the thesis?
- Are the claims logically ordered?
- Is that logic clear? Is each claim clearly linked to those that come before and after? Are there any logical “leaps” that readers might have trouble following?
- Does each claim/paragraph clearly build on the last one? Does the argument move forward, or does it seem more like a list or a tour through a museum of interesting but unrelated observations?
- Do any key claims or logical steps in the argument seem to be missing?

ENDING/CONCLUSION

- Does the conclusion give readers the sense that they’ve gotten somewhere and that the journey has been worthwhile?
- Does it indicate the implications of the argument, consider relevant evaluative questions, or discuss questions that remain unanswered?

Evidence

- Is there ample, appropriate evidence for each claim?
- Are the appropriateness and significance of each fact—its relevance to the claim—perfectly clear?
- Are there any weak examples or inferences that aren’t reasonable? Are there moments when readers might reasonably ask, “But couldn’t that fact instead mean this?”
- Are all the relevant facts considered? What about facts that might complicate or contradict any of the claims? Are there moments when readers might reasonably think, “But what about X?”
- Is each piece of evidence clearly presented? Do readers have all the contextual information they need to understand a quotation, for example?
- Is each piece of evidence gracefully presented? Are quotations varied by length and presentation? Are they ever too long? Are there any unnecessary block quotations, or block quotations that require additional analysis? (On responsible and effective quotation, see 31.1–2.)
- Are there any unnecessary quotations—instances when the writer should instead simply paraphrase, summarize, or describe?

Tone

- Does the writer establish and maintain an effective tone—do any moments in, or aspects of, the essay make its writer seem anything other than serious, credible, engaged, and engaging? respectful toward the text(s) and a range of readers?
- Does the writer correctly and consistently use literary terminology?
- Does the writer ever assume too much or too little readerly knowledge or interest?

COMMON PROBLEMS AND TIPS

Though you want to pay attention to everything on this “assessing the elements” checklist, certain types of problems are common in early drafts. Here are three:

- mismatch between thesis or argument or between introduction and body
Sometimes an early draft ends up being a way to discover what you really want to say. As a result, you may find that the thesis of your draft—or even your entire introduction—no longer truly fits or introduces the argument you’ve ended up making. If so, you will need to rework the thesis and introduction. Then work your way back through the essay, making sure that each claim or topic sentence fits the new thesis.
- the list or “museum tour” structure
In a draft, writers sometimes present each claim as if it were just an item on a list (First, second, and so on) or as a stop on a tour of potentially interesting but unrelated topics (And this is also important . . .). But presenting your material in this way fails to help you and your readers make logical connections between ideas. It may also prevent your argument from developing. Sometimes it can even be a sign that you’ve ceased arguing entirely, falling into mere plot summary or description rather than articulating real ideas at all. Check to see if number-like words or phrases appear prominently at the beginning of your paragraphs or if your paragraphs could be put into a different order without fundamentally changing what you’re saying. Sometimes solving this problem will require wholesale rethinking and reorganizing—a process that should probably start with crafting a meatier, more specific thesis. But sometimes all that’s required is adding or reworking topic sentences. Again, make sure that there is a clearly stated, debatable claim at the beginning of each paragraph; that each claim relates to the thesis but does not simply restate it; and that each claim builds logically on the one before.
- missing sub-ideas
When you take a step back from your draft, you may discover that you’ve skipped a logical step in your argument—that the claim you make in, say, body paragraph 3 actually depends on, or makes sense only in light of, a more basic claim that you took for granted. In the second half of an essay about how a character changes, for example, you might suggest that there is something significant about the character being decisive, but decisiveness only counts as change—and thus your point about decisiveness relates to your thesis—if the first part of your essay has demonstrated that the character is initially indecisive. Whatever the missing idea is, you’ll need to create and insert a new paragraph that articulates, supports, and develops it.

29.4.2 Enriching the Argument

The first step of the revision process is all about ensuring that your essay does the best possible job of making your argument. But revision is also an opportunity to go further—to think about ways in which your overall argument might be made more thorough and complex. In drafting an essay our attention is often and rightly focused on emphatically staking out a particular position and proving its validity. This is the fundamental task of any essay, and you certainly don’t want to do anything at this stage to compromise that. At the same time, you do want to make sure that you haven't purchased clarity at the cost of oversimplification by, for example, ignoring facts that might undermine or complicate your claims, alternative interpretations of the evidence you do present, or alternative claims or points of view. Remember, you have a better chance of persuading readers to accept your argument if you show them that it's based on a thorough, open-minded exploration of the text and topic. Don't invent unreasonable or irrelevant complications or counterarguments. Do try to assess your argument objectively and honestly, perhaps testing it against the text one more time. Think like a skeptical reader rather than a writer: Are there moments where such a reader might reasonably disagree with your argument? Are there places where two interpretations might be equally plausible? Have you ignored or glossed over any questions that a reasonable reader might expect an essay on this topic to address?

Such questions are ones you should always ask in revision. But they are especially crucial if you finish your draft only to discover that it is significantly shorter than the assignment requires. Inexperienced writers of literature essays often run out of things to say too quickly because they simply don't keep asking relevant questions (How? Why?) or make enough allowance for alternative answers.

29.5 EDITING AND PROOFREADING

Once you've gotten the overall argument in good shape, then it's time focus on the small but crucial stuff—words and sentences. Your prose should not only convey your ideas to your readers but also demonstrate how much you care about your essay. Flawless prose can't disguise or make up for a vapid or illogical argument. But faulty, flabby, boring prose can destroy a potentially persuasive and thoughtful one. Don't sabotage all your hard work by failing to correct misspelled words, grammatical problems, misquotations, incorrect citations, and typographical errors. Little oversights make all the difference when it comes to clarity and credibility. Readers care more about careful work. Especially when you are writing about literature, the art of language, your language matters.

When it comes to words and sentences, each writer has particular strengths and weaknesses. Likewise every writer tends to be overly fond of certain phrases and sentence structures, which become monotonous and ineffective if overused. With practice, you will learn to watch out for the kinds of mistakes and repetitions to which you are most prone. Then you can develop your own personalized editing checklist. But below is one to start with.

Sentences

- Does each one read clearly and crisply?
- Are they varied in length, structure, and syntax?
- Is the phrasing direct rather than roundabout?
- Are tenses appropriate and consistent?

Tips

- Try using the Find function to search for every preposition (especially of and in) and every to be verb. Since these can lead to confusing or roundabout phrasing, weed out as many as you can.
- Try reading your paper aloud or having a friend read it aloud to you. Mark places where you or your friend stumble, and listen for sentences that are hard to get through or understand.

Words

- Have you used any words whose meaning you're not sure of?
- Is terminology correct and consistent?
- Is a “fancy” word or phrase ever used where a simpler one might do?
- Are there unnecessary words or phrases?
- Do metaphors and other figures of speech make literal sense?
- Are verbs active and precise?
- Are pronoun references always clear and correct?
- Do subjects and verbs always agree?

Punctuation and Mechanics

- Are all words spelled correctly? (Double-check your auto-correct and spell-check: these can create new errors in the process of correcting others.)
- Are all titles formatted correctly? (See the section following this checklist.)
- Is every quotation accurate and punctuated correctly (See ch. 31.)?

Citation and Documentation (See ch. 31.)

- Is the source of each quotation, as well as any fact or idea drawn from sources, clearly indicated through parenthetical citation?
- Do parenthetical citations correctly coordinate with the list of works cited?
- Are both all parenthetical citations and all entries in the list of works cited formatted correctly?

Titles

Formatting titles correctly in both the body of your essay and your list of works cited is essential to your clarity, as well as to your self-presentation as a knowledgeable and careful writer: Bartleby the Scrivener is a character; “Bartleby, the Scrivener” is a short story. “Interpreter of Maladies” is also a short story, but Interpreter of Maladies is a book. To make sure you get this right, here is a quick review:

- Italicize the titles of all books and other “stand-alone” works, including
 - novels and novellas (To Kill a Mockingbird, Heart of Darkness)
 - collections and anthologies of short stories, essays, or poems (Interpreter of Maladies, The Norton Introduction to Literature)
 - long poems that could be or have been published as books (The Odyssey, Paradise Lost, Goblin Market)
 - plays (Hamlet, A Raisin in the Sun)
 - periodicals, including newspapers, magazines, and scholarly journals (USA Today, People, College English)
 - Web sites, blogs, and databases (Google Books, Gawker, JSTOR)
 - movies and television programs or series (The Fault in Our Stars, Orange Is the New Black)
- Put quotation marks around the titles of works that are part of such “stand-alone” works, including
 - short stories (“Interpreter of Maladies,” “A Rose for Emily”)
 - poems (“Daddy,” “Ode to a Nightingale”)
 - essays and articles in periodicals (“A Narrator’s Blindness in Raymond Carver’s ‘Cathedral’”; “When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision”; “Chicago Fiddles While Trumbull Park Burns”)

- parts of Web sites (e.g., Web pages, blog posts)
- episodes of a television series

29.6 FINISHING UP

29.6.1 Crafting a Title

Your essay isn't truly complete until you give it a title. A good title both informs and interests. Inform readers by telling them both the work(s) you will analyze ("The Road Not Taken" or "two poems by Robert Frost") and something about your topic ("Symbolism," "Nonconformity"). To interest them, try using one of the following:

- an especially vivid and relevant word or a short phrase from the literary work ("‘They Have Eaten Me Alive’: Motherhood in ‘In the Park’ and ‘Daystar’")
- a bit of wordplay ("Wordsworth and the Art of Artlessness")
- a bit of both ("‘Untrodden Ways’: Wordsworth and the Art of Artlessness").

Do not put your own title in quotation marks, but do correctly format any titles that appear in your title.

29.6.2 Formatting Your Essay

Unless your instructor provides specific instructions on how to format your essay, follow these guidelines, adapted from The MLA Style Center: Writing Resources from the Modern Language Association (style.mla.org/formatting-papers) and demonstrated in the sample research essay in chapter 32.

- Choose a readable 11- or 12-point font; set your page margins at 1 inch; and double-space throughout. Do not add extra lines between paragraphs or before or after block quotations. Indent the first line of each paragraph ½ inch. An entire block quotation should be indented ½ inch. (For more on formatting quotations, see 31.1.)
- Do not include a title page. Instead, in the top left corner of the first page, type your name, your instructor's name, the course number, and the date, each on a separate line. Then center your title on the next line. (Do not put your own title in quotation marks.)
- Number every page consecutively, and put your last name and the page number in the upper right corner ½ inch below the top of the page and aligned with the right margin. (Do not put any punctuation between your name and the page number.)
- Begin your list of works cited on a new page, after the last page of your essay. Center the words Works Cited at the top of the page. (Do not put quotation marks around or italicize these words.) Indent the second and subsequent lines of each works cited entry ½ inch. (For more on formatting the list of works cited, see 31.3.2.)

THE LITERATURE RESEARCH ESSAY

Whenever we read, discuss, and write about literature, our primary concern is always the text. But literature speaks to and about the real world even when it depicts an entirely unreal one. Both texts and our readings of them are inevitably shaped by, and intervene in, particular contexts. Literary research is simply a way to learn more about those contexts. In a literature research essay we bring what we learn to bear to illuminate the work in a new way.

On the one hand, writing a research essay may at first seem like a daunting task. Research adds a few more steps to the writing process, so you will need to give yourself more time. And those steps require you to draw on and develop skills somewhat different from those involved in crafting essays that focus exclusively on the literary text. Were this not the case, no one would ask you to write a research essay.

On the other hand, however, a literature research essay is still a literature essay. Its core elements are the same, as is its basic purpose—to articulate and develop a debatable, interpretive claim about at least one literary work. As a result, this kind of essay requires many of the same skills and strategies you've already begun to develop. And though you will need to add a few new steps, the process of writing a literature research essay still involves getting started, planning, drafting, revising, editing, and finishing up—exactly the same dance whose rhythms you've already begun to master.

The only distinctive thing about a research essay is that it requires you to draw on sources in addition to the literary text itself. Though that adds to your burden in some ways, it can actually lighten it in others. Think of such sources not as another ball you have to juggle but as another tool you get to add to your tool belt: You're still being asked to build a cabinet, but now you get to use a hammer and an electric drill. This chapter will help you make the best use of these powerful tools.

One thing to keep in mind from the beginning is that this anthology includes excerpts from numerous scholarly articles about literature—each one is a published literature research essay. Some of these excerpts may be appropriate sources for your essay. But even if they aren't, they can still be very helpful to you as examples of how professional literary critics go about doing precisely the same things you need to do in your research essay. What do their theses look like? their motives? What kinds of sources do they use, and how do they go about using them? How do they nonetheless manage to stay focused on their arguments about the literary text? In this chapter, we'll draw on examples from these and other published essays to show you what we mean.

30.1 TYPES OF ESSAYS AND SOURCES

The three most common types of literature research essay are those suggested by the “Contexts” chapters in this anthology. But though we treat these types separately here for clarity’s sake, many literature research essays are in fact hybrids of one sort or another. An essay on Emily Dickinson by student writer Richard Gibson is a case in point: It analyzes three poems by Emily Dickinson by drawing on literary criticism, biographical materials, and studies of Dickinson’s historical and cultural context. Should your assignment allow, your essay, too, could combine two or more of these approaches. Either way, it’s useful to remember that your secondary sources probably will.

30.1.1 Critical Contexts

Whenever we write a literature essay, we engage in conversation with other readers about the meaning and significance of a literary work. Effective argumentation always depends on anticipating how other readers are likely to respond to, and interpret, that work. As the “Critical Contexts” chapters in this anthology demonstrate, almost all texts and authors are also the subject of actual public conversations, often extending over many years and involving all the numerous scholarly readers who have published their readings of the work. A “critical contexts” research essay is an opportunity both to investigate this conversation and to contribute to it.

For this kind of essay, your secondary sources will be work by literary scholars on the specific text you’re writing about; on an author’s body of work; or on a relevant genre or body of literature (e.g., The Development of the Sonnet: An Introduction or “Reading the Wind”: The Literature of the Vietnam War). The latter, more general sorts of sources may be especially crucial if you are researching a relatively recent work about which little literary criticism has yet been published. In that case, too, you may want to consult book reviews; just remember that it’s reviewers’ interpretive claims you’re most interested in, not their evaluation of the work. (On interpretation versus evaluation, see 28.1.2. For examples of critical context essays by student writers, see ch. 1 and 26. For examples by professional critics, see the excerpts in ch. 9, 22, and 26.)

30.1.2 Biographical Contexts

If literature only reflected, and gave us insight into, its author’s psyche, it ultimately wouldn’t be that interesting: Good poets, fiction writers, and playwrights write about and for others, not just themselves. Nonetheless, authors are real people whose unique experience and outlook shape both what they write and how. A “biographical contexts” research essay is a chance to learn more about an author’s life, work, and ideas and to explore how these might have shaped or be reflected in the text. Sources for this sort of project will likely include biographies (secondary sources) and essays, letters, and other nonfiction prose by the author (primary sources). (For examples of biographical context essays, see the excerpts from Eileen Pollack’s FLANNERY O’CONNOR AND THE NEW CRITICISM [ch. 7] and from Steven Gould Axelrod’s SYLVIA PLATH: THE WOUND AND THE CURE OF WORDS [ch. 22].)

30.1.3 Historical and Cultural Contexts

Every literary work is both shaped by and speaks to the circumstances, events, and debates peculiar to its historical and cultural context, though some literary works speak of their times by depicting other times. The purpose of a “cultural and historical contexts” essay is to explore the interconnections between a text and the context it was either written in or depicts. Sources useful for this sort of essay might include studies of a relevant historical period or literary movement (secondary sources) or documents dating from that period or written by others involved in that movement (primary sources). (For an example of an historical and cultural context essay by a student writer, see ch. 21. For examples by professional critics, see the excerpts from Steven Kaplan’s THE UNDYING UNCERTAINTY OF THE NARRATOR IN TIM O’BRIEN’S THE THINGS THEY CARRIED [ch. 9], Steven Gould Axelrod’s SYLVIA PLATH: THE WOUND AND THE CURE OF WORDS [ch. 22], and Philip Holt’s POLIS AND TRAGEDY IN THE ANTIGONE [ch. 26].)

30.2 WHAT SOURCES DO

Unless your instructor indicates otherwise, your argument about the literary text should be the focus of your essay, and sources should function simply as tools that you use to deepen and enrich your argument about the literary text. They shouldn’t substitute for it. Your essay should never simply repeat or report on what other people have already said.

Sources, in other words, are not the source of your ideas. Instead, to paraphrase writing expert Gordon Harvey’s Writing with Sources (Hackett, 1998), they are the source of

- argument or debatable claim—other readers’ views and interpretations of a text, author, topic, literary movement, period, and so on, which “you support, criticize, or develop”;
- information—facts about an author’s life; about the work’s composition, publication, or reception; about the era during, or about which, the author wrote; about movements in which the author participated; and so on.
- concept—general terms or theoretical frameworks that you borrow and apply to your author or text. (In an essay excerpted in ch. 22, for example, Stephen Gould Axelrod uses concepts drawn from Sigmund Freud’s theories of psychological development to interpret Sylvia Plath’s poem DADDY; in an essay on Tim O’Brien’s The Things They Carried excerpted in ch. 9, Steven Kaplan applies those of literary theorist Wolfgang Iser.)

Any one source will in fact likely offer you more than one of these things. In the Axelrod excerpt mentioned above, for example, you will find argument about the poem DADDY, as well as potentially useful information about its author’s life and about the status of the domestic poem in the 1950s. Nonetheless, the distinction between argument or debatable claim, on the one hand, and information or factual statement, on the other, is crucial. As you read a source, you must discriminate between the two.

When drawing on sources in your essay, remember, too, that an argument about the text, no matter how well informed, isn’t the same as evidence. Only facts can serve that function. Suppose, for example, you are writing an essay on “Daddy.” You claim that the speaker adopts two voices, that of her child self and that of her adult self—a claim Axelrod also makes in his essay. You cannot prove this claim to be true merely by saying that Axelrod makes the same claim. Like any debatable claim, this one must be backed up with evidence from the primary text.

In this situation, however, you must indicate that a source has made the same claim that you do in order to accomplish three things:

- give the source credit for having this idea before you did (to avoid even the appearance of plagiarism; see 30.4.1);
- encourage readers to see you as a knowledgeable, trustworthy writer who has done your research and taken the time to explore, digest, and fairly represent others' views;
- demonstrate that your opinion isn't merely idiosyncratic because another informed, even "expert," reader agrees with you.

Were you to disagree with the source's claim, it would be just as important and helpful to your argument to acknowledge that disagreement in order to demonstrate the originality of your own interpretation, while also, again, encouraging readers to see you as a knowledgeable, careful writer.

You will need to cite sources throughout your essay whenever you make a claim that resembles, complements, or contradicts the claim of another source; rely on information or concepts from a source; or paraphrase, quote, or summarize anything in a source. Especially in a critical contexts essay, you should also at least consider using sources to establish motive (see below).

30.2.1 Source-Related Motives

Not all research essays use sources to articulate motive. However, doing so is one way both to ensure and to demonstrate that your own ideas are the focus of your essay and that your essay contributes to a literary critical conversation rather than just reporting on it or repeating what others have already said. In these essays, in other words, your "Although . . ." statement (as outlined in 28.1.3) may refer to sources—actual "theys" and what they "say." Indeed, whether you ultimately use sources to articulate a motive or not, keeping motive-related questions in mind as you read sources is nonetheless a very good idea, for reasons we'll detail in the next section of this chapter. Here are the three most common source-related motives:

1. Sources offer different opinions about a particular issue in the text, thus suggesting that there is still a problem or puzzle worth investigating. (Your argument might agree with one side or the other or offer a "third way.")

Almost all interpreters of [Antigone] have agreed that the play shows Creon to be morally defective [. . .]. The situation of Antigone is more controversial. Hegel assimilated her defect to Creon's; some more recent

In these sentences from THE FRAGILITY OF GOODNESS (ch. 26), Martha C. Nussbaum summarizes an ongoing debate about Antigone and then positions her argument as contributing to that debate by writers uncritically hold her up as a blameless heroine. Without entering into an exhaustive study of her role in the tragedy, I should like to claim (with the support of an increasing number of recent critics) that there is at least some justification for the Hegelian assimilation—though the criticism needs to be focused more clearly and specifically than it is in Hegel's brief remarks.

supporting and developing one of the two usual positions.

2. A source or sources make(s) a faulty claim that needs to be wholly or partly challenged or clarified.

Modern critics who do not share Sophocles' conviction about the paramount duty of burying the dead and who attach more importance than he did to the claims of political authority have tended to underestimate the way in which he justifies Antigone against Creon.

In this sentence from the introduction to SOPHOCLEAN TRAGEDY (ch. 26), Maurice Bowra makes a generalization about the stance taken by "[m]odern critics" that his essay will challenge. (Subsequent sentences provide more details about that stance.)

While I find Smith's article thoughtful and intriguing, and while I agree with much feminist criticism of Vietnam War literature, this essay proposes that the work of Tim O'Brien, particularly The Things They Carried, stands apart from the genre as a whole. O'Brien is much more self-consciously aware of gender issues and critical of traditional gender dichotomies than are the bulk of U.S. writers about the Vietnam War.

In TIM O'BRIEN AND GENDER: A DEFENSE OF THE THINGS THEY CARRIED (ch. 9), Susan Farrell does the opposite of what Bowra does. Having first summarized the arguments of one specific critic (Smith), she now (in this sentence) articulates her contrary view.

3. Sources neglect a significant aspect or element of the text, or a source or sources make(s) a claim that needs to be further developed or applied in a new way (perhaps to a text other than the one the sources actually discuss).

Tim O'Brien's 1990 book of interlocked stories, The Things They Carried, garnered one rave review after another, reinforcing O'Brien's already established position as one of the most important veteran writers of the Vietnam War. The Penguin paperback edition serves up six pages of superlative blurbs like "consummate artistry," "classic," "the best American writer of his generation," "unique," and "master work." [. . .] Yet, O'Brien—and his reviewers—seem curiously unself-conscious about this book's obsession with an ambivalence about representations of masculinity and femininity, particularly in the five stories originally published during the 1980s in Esquire.

Here, in THE THINGS MEN DO: THE GENDERED SUBTEXT IN TIM O'BRIEN'S ESQUIRE STORIES (ch. 9), Lorrie Smith suggests not that others' claims are wrong but that they simply miss something that her essay will investigate.

(In ch. 22, you'll find a research essay on Alice Munro's BOYS AND GIRLS that combines versions of the first and third kinds of source-related motives described above.)

30.3 THE RESEARCH PROCESS

30.3.1 Finding Authoritative Secondary Sources

Regardless of your author, text, or topic, you will almost certainly find a wealth of sources to consult. The conversation about literature and its contexts occurs online and in print, in periodicals and in books. Your instructor may well give you specific guidance about which sorts of sources you need to use. If not, it's usually best to consult at least some print sources or sources that appear in both print and digital form (e.g., the scholarly journals housed in databases such as JSTOR or Academic Search Premier). Citing only one kind of source—books but not articles, online but not print—may cast doubt on the thoroughness of your research; you want your reader to know that you sought out the best sources, not just the most easily available ones.

Whatever their form, it is crucial that your secondary sources be authoritative ones, since the credibility and persuasiveness of your research essay will depend on that of your sources: At the very least, you do not want to look like someone who doesn't know the difference or care enough to figure it out. Learning how to identify authoritative sources is one of the rationales for research essay assignments. "Evaluating sources" thus initially means evaluating their credibility and importance. At this stage, concentrate on whether the opinions expressed and information provided in a source are worthy of serious consideration, not on whether you agree with them. Save that question for later.

As a general rule and with the exception of a general dictionary, you should not rely on or cite any source that is not attributed to a named author. This includes (but is not limited to) Wikipedia and Web sites such as Schmoop and SparkNotes. Because these will likely be the first things a general Google search turns up and because they are almost certainly familiar to you, it's tempting to rely on them. Avoid the temptation. Though much of the information on such sites is correct and useful, much of it isn't. As important, the very virtue of such sites—the fact that they are designed for, and mainly written by, nonexperts—makes them inappropriate as sources for a research essay, since the goal of such an essay is to familiarize yourself with and to enter a conversation among acknowledged experts.

In these terms, the most valuable sources tend to be books published by academic and university presses and articles published in scholarly or professional journals (rather than magazines or newspapers). This isn't mere snobbishness or narcissism: Such work appears in print or online only after a rigorous peer-review process. As a result, you and your readers can trust that these publications have been judged worthwhile by more than one acknowledged expert.

Rather than heading straight to Google and searching the entire web, then, try starting instead with your library's Web site. In addition to the catalog, you will here find a wealth of specialized reference works, bibliographies, and databases. Which of these are available to you will depend on your library. But here are two especially common and helpful resources to start with:

- Oxford Encyclopedia of American Literature and Oxford Encyclopedia of British Literature: Both include signed entries by recognized experts on major authors, texts, and topics. Each entry ends with a short annotated bibliography. In addition to being a source, such an entry will thus lead you to other sources that one expert regards as the most important on the subject. In a sense, this person has already done some of your research for you.
- MLA International Bibliography, the “go-to” source for identifying all scholarly work—books, articles, and book chapters—on any author, work, or topic. The virtue and (for your purposes) potential limitation of this bibliography is its inclusiveness: You can generally trust that sources included in the bibliography are, indeed, scholarly, published mainly by academic presses or in scholarly journals. MLA does not, however, discriminate among those sources in terms of quality, importance, and so on.

Once you have identified potentially useful articles and books, you may be able to access some of them online. Many full-text scholarly articles are accessible via subscription databases such as JSTOR, Project Muse, and Academic Search Premier. Your library may have “e-book” versions of some of the books you are interested in, while other, especially older books can be found on the Web: In addition to Google Books, try Hathi Trust and Internet Archive. Again, however, do not neglect any important source simply because you actually have to go to the library to look at it; this includes books only partly viewable on Google.

Look for the most up-to-date sources but don't automatically discount older ones. You should consult recent sources in order to get the most up-to-date information on your topic and a sense of what scholars today consider the most significant, debatable interpretive questions and claims. But be aware that in literary studies (and the humanities generally), newer work doesn't always entirely supersede older work, as it tends to do in the sciences. As the literary criticism excerpted in chapter 26 demonstrates, twenty-first-century scholars, for example, still cite and debate the arguments about ANTIGONE made well over a hundred years ago by German philosopher Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831).

Once you find an especially good source, its bibliography will lead you to others. Test sources against one another: If multiple reliable sources agree about a given fact, you can probably assume it's accurate; if they all cite a particular article or book, you know it's a key contribution to the conversation.

30.3.2 Reading and Taking Notes

Once you've acquired or accessed your sources, it's a good idea to skim each one. (In the case of a book, concentrate on the introduction and on the chapter that seems most relevant.) Focus at this point on assessing the relevance of each source to your topic. Or, if you're working your way toward a topic, look for things that spark your interest. Either way, try to get a rough sense of the overall conversation—of the issues and topics that come up again and again across the various sources.

Once you've identified the most pertinent sources, it's time to begin reading more carefully and taking notes. For each source, make sure that you note down all the bibliographical information that you will ultimately need to cite the source correctly. (For details, see the guide to citation in ch. 31.) Your notes for each source will likely include four things: summary, paraphrase, quotation, and your own comments and thoughts. To avoid confusion (even plagiarism), it's crucial that you develop your own system for clearly differentiating each of these from the other. Whenever you write down, type out, or paste in two or more consecutive words from a source, you should place these words in quotation marks so that you will later recognize them as direct quotations; make sure to quote with absolute accuracy; and record the page where the quotation is found (if the source is paginated). Keep such quotations to a minimum. In lieu of extensive quotations, try to summarize and paraphrase as much as possible. You can't decide how to use the source or whether you agree with its argument unless you've first understood it, and you can usually best understand and test your understanding through summary and paraphrase. You might, for example, either start or conclude your notes with a one- or two-sentence summary of the author's overall argument, perhaps using the "Although . . . I think . . . because" rubric. Paraphrase especially important points, making sure to note the page on which each appears. (For more on paraphrase, summary, and description, see ch. 27 and 30.4.2 below.)

30.3.3 Synthesizing

It can be very useful to complete the note-taking process by writing a summary that synthesizes all of your secondary sources. Your goal is to show how all the arguments fit together to form one coherent conversation. (Like any conversation, however, a scholarly one usually considers multiple topics.) Doing so will require that you both define the main questions at issue in the conversation and indicate what stance each source takes on each question—where and how their opinions coincide and differ. If you tend to be a visual learner, you might also try diagramming the conversation somehow.

One might say, for example, that the main questions about ANTIGONE that preoccupy all the various scholars represented in chapter 26 are (1) What is the exact nature of the conflict between Antigone and Creon, or what two conflicting worldviews do they represent? and (2) How is that conflict resolved? Which, if either, of the two characters and worldviews does the play ultimately endorse? A synthetic summary of these sources (i.e., one that combines or "synthesizes" them) would explain how each critic answers each of these questions.

This kind of summary can be especially helpful when you haven't yet identified a specific essay topic or crafted a thesis because it may help you to see gaps in the conversation, places where you can enter and contribute. If you have identified a topic or thesis, a synthetic summary is still useful to identifying points of agreement and disagreement and to articulating motive (30.2). Indeed, students required to write synthetic summaries by their instructors often end up using it as the kernel of their introduction.

30.4 WRITING WITH SOURCES

30.4.1 Using Sources Responsibly and Avoiding Plagiarism

Both the clarity and the credibility of any research essay depend on responsible use of sources. And using sources responsibly entails accurately representing them, clearly discriminating between their ideas and words and your own, giving credit where credit is due. Since ideas, words, information, and concepts not directly and clearly attributed to a source will be taken as your own, any lack of clarity on that score amounts to plagiarism. Representing anyone else’s ideas or data as your own, even if you state them in your own words, is plagiarism—whether you do so intentionally or unintentionally; whether the ideas or data comes from a published book or article, another student’s paper, the Internet, or any other source. Plagiarism is among the most serious of offenses within academe because it amounts both to taking credit for someone else’s hard labor and to stealing ideas—the resource most precious to this community and its members. That’s why the punishments for plagiarism are severe—including failure, suspension, and expulsion, for students; the loss of a job, for teachers who are also researchers.

To avoid both the offense and its consequences, you must always

- put quotation marks around any quotation from a source (a quotation being any two or more consecutive words or any one especially distinctive word, label, or concept) or indent it to create a “block quotation”;
- credit a source whenever you take from it any of the following:
 - a quotation* (as described above);
 - a nonfactual or debatable claim* (an idea, opinion, interpretation, evaluation, or conclusion) stated in your own words;
 - a distinctive concept or term*;
 - a fact or piece of data that isn’t common knowledge*; or
 - a distinctive way of organizing factual information*.

To clarify, a fact counts as “common knowledge”—and therefore doesn’t need to be credited to a source—whenever you can find it in multiple reputable sources, none of which seriously question its validity. It is common knowledge, for instance, that Sherman Alexie is Native American, that he was born in 1966, and that he published a collection of short stories titled Ten Little Indians. No source can “own” or get credit for these facts. However, a source can still “own” a particular way of arranging or presenting such facts. If you begin your essay by stating—in your own words—a series of facts about Alexie’s life in exactly the same order they appear in a specific source, then you would need to acknowledge that source. When in doubt, cite. (For guidance about how to do so, see both 30.4.2 below and ch. 31.)

30.4.2 Integrating Secondary Source Material into Your Essay

The responsible use of sources depends as much on how you integrate ideas, facts, and words from sources into your essay as on how effectively you use a citation and documentation system like that outlined in chapter 31. Indeed, in this (the MLA) system, where a citation belongs and what it looks like depend entirely on what information you provide about the source in your text.

Research essays can refer to secondary sources in a number of ways. You may

- briefly allude to them:

Many critics, including Maurice Bowra and Bernard Knox, see Creon as morally inferior to Antigone.

- summarize or paraphrase their contents:

According to Maurice Bowra, Creon's arrogance is his downfall. However prideful Antigone may occasionally seem, Bowra insists that Creon is genuinely, deeply, and consistently so (1586).

- quote them directly:

Maurice Bowra reads Creon as the prototypical "proud man"; where Antigone's arrogance is only "apparent," says Bowra, Creon's is all too "real" (1586).

Choose whichever strategy suits your purpose in a particular context. But keep the number and length of quotations from secondary sources to a minimum. This is your essay. Your ideas about the text are its primary focus. And you should use your own words whenever possible, even when you are describing or articulating what you must clearly acknowledge to be someone else's ideas or facts.

USING SIGNAL PHRASES

Whether you are quoting, summarizing, or paraphrasing a source, always introduce source material with a "signal phrase." Usually, this should include the author's name. You might also include the author's title or any information about the author or source that affects its credibility or clarifies the relationship between the source's argument and your own. Titles can be especially helpful when you cite more than one source by the same author.

Oyin Ogunba, himself a scholar of Yoruban descent, suggests that many of Wole Soyinka's plays attempt to capture the mood and rhythm of traditional Yoruban festivals (8).

Since most of the authors cited in a literature research essay should be scholars, calling them that is usually redundant and unhelpful. Here, however, the phrase "scholar of Yoruban descent" implies that the author is doubly authoritative, since he writes about a culture he knows through experience and study.

As historian R. K. Webb observes, "Britain is a country in miniature" (1).

In a literature research essay, most scholars you cite will be literary critics. If they aren't and it matters, identify their discipline.

In his study of the Frankenstein myth, Chris Baldick claims that "[m]ost myths, in literate societies at least, prolong their lives not by being retold at great length, but by being alluded to" (3)—a claim that definitely applies to the Hamlet myth.

Notice how crucial this signal phrase is to making clear that its author is applying a source's claim about one thing (myths in general and the Frankenstein myth in particular) to another, entirely different thing (the Hamlet myth). Such clarity is key both to accurately representing the source and to establishing the author's own originality.

If your summary goes on for more than a sentence or two, keep using signal phrases to remind readers that you're still summarizing others' ideas rather than stating your own.

The ways of interpreting Emily's decision to murder Homer are numerous. [. . .] For simple clarification, they can be summarized along two lines. One group finds the murder growing out of Emily's demented attempt to forestall the inevitable passage of time—toward her abandonment by Homer, toward her own death, and toward the steady encroachment of the North and the New South on something loosely defined as the "tradition" of the Old South. Another view sees the murder in more psychological terms. It grows out of Emily's complex relationship to her father, who, by elevating her above all of the eligible men of Jefferson, insured that to yield what one commentator called the "normal emotions" associated with desire, his daughter had to "retreat into a marginal world, into fantasy" (O'Connor 416).

In this paragraph from his essay "'We All Said, 'She Will Kill Herself'": The Narrator/Detective in William Faulkner's 'A Rose for Emily,'" Lawrence R. Rodgers heads into a general summary of other critics' arguments by announcing that it's coming ("For simple clarification, they can be summarized . . ."). Then, as he begins summarizing each view, he reminds us that it is a "view," that he's still articulating others' ideas, not his own. Notice that he only quotes "one commentator" among the many to whom he refers; the others are indicated in a footnote.

For the sake of interest and clarity, vary the content and placement of signal phrases, and always choose the most accurate verb. (Says, for example, implies that words are spoken, not written.) Here is a list of verbs you might find useful to describe what sources do.

acknowledges	considers	explains	investigates	sees

QUOTATION, CITATION, AND DOCUMENTATION

The bulk of any literature essay you write should consist of your own ideas expressed in your own words. Yet you can develop your ideas and persuade readers to accept them only if you present and analyze evidence. In literature essays of every kind, quotations are an especially privileged kind of evidence, though paraphrase, summary, and description play key roles (see ch. 27 and 28.1.4). Likewise, a literature research essay, which must make use of other primary and secondary sources, typically quotes selectively from these as well (see 30.4.2). In all literature essays, then, your clarity, credibility, and persuasiveness greatly depend on two things: (1) how responsibly, effectively, and gracefully you present, differentiate, and move between others' words and ideas and your own; and (2) how careful you are to let readers know exactly where they can find each quotation and each fact or idea that you paraphrase from a source. This chapter addresses the question of how to quote, cite, and document sources of all kinds. (For a discussion of when to do so, see 28.1.4 and 30.4.1.)

Rules for quoting, citing, and documenting sources can seem daunting and even, at times, arcane or trivial. Why the heck should it matter whether you put a word in brackets or parentheses, or where in a sentence your parentheses appears? By demonstrating mastery of such conventions, you assert your credibility as a member of the scholarly community. But such conventions also serve an eminently practical purpose: They provide you a system for conveying a wealth of important information clearly, concisely, and unobtrusively, with the least distraction to you and your reader.

As you probably know, there are many such systems. And different disciplines, publications, and even individual instructors prefer or require different ones. In English and other humanities disciplines, however, the preferred system is that developed by the Modern Language Association (MLA) and laid out in the MLA Handbook (8th ed., 2016) and The MLA Style Center: Writing Resources from the Modern Language Association (style.mla.org). All the rules presented in this chapter accord with, and draw heavily upon, these sources, which we encourage you to consult for more extensive and detailed guidance than we can provide here.

31.1 THE RULES OF RESPONSIBLE QUOTING

When it comes to quoting, there are certain rules that you must follow in order to be responsible both to your sources and to the integrity of your own prose. Additionally, there are certain strategies that, though not required, will do much to make your argument more clear, engaging, and persuasive. The next section of this chapter (31.2) discusses strategies; this one concentrates on the rules, starting with the cardinal principles of responsible quotation before turning first to those rules specific to the genres of prose, poetry, and drama and then to those rules that aren't genre-specific.

31.1.1 Cardinal Principles

Three requirements so crucial to your credibility that you should regard them as cardinal principles rather than simple rules are these:

1. A quotation means any two or more consecutive words or any one especially distinctive word or label that appears in a source.

Representation as O'Brien practices it in this book is not a mimetic act but a "game," as Iser also calls it in a more recent essay, "The Play of the Text," a process of acting things out. . . .

In this sentence from THE UNDYING UNCERTAINTY OF THE NARRATOR IN TIM O'BRIEN'S THE THINGS THEY CARRIED (ch. 9) Steven Kaplan puts the word game in quotation marks because it is a key concept defined in distinctive ways in his source.

2. Except in the very few cases and specific ways outlined in the rest of this section, you must reproduce each quotation exactly as it appears in a source, including every word and preserving original spelling, punctuation, capitalization, italics, spacing, and so on.

ORIGINAL SOURCE	INCORRECT VS. CORRECT QUOTATION
[MRS. PETERS sits down. The two women sit there not looking at one another, but as if peering into something and at the same time holding back. When they talk now it is in the manner of feeling their way over strange ground, as if afraid of what they are saying, but as if they cannot help saying it.]	Incorrect: After they discover the dead bird and the men leave the room, Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Hale simply "sit there not looking at each other," compelled to speak but also "afraid of what they are saying." Correct: After they discover the dead bird and the men leave the room, Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Hale simply "sit there not looking at one another," compelled to speak but also "afraid of what they are saying."

3. No change to a quotation, however much it accords with the rules outlined below, is acceptable if it in any way distorts the original meaning of the quoted passage.

31.1.2 Genre-Specific Rules

Because prose, poetry, and drama each work somewhat differently, there are special rules governing how to quote texts in each of these genres. This section spells out the rules specific to prose (both fiction and nonfiction), poetry, and drama; the next section covers rules applicable to all genres.

PROSE (FICTION OR NONFICTION)

- When a quotation from a single paragraph of a prose source takes up no more than four lines of your essay, put it in quotation marks.

Georgiana's birthmark becomes "a frightful object" only because "Aylmer's somber imagination" turns it into one, "selecting it as the symbol of his wife's liability to sin, sorrow, decay, and death."

- When a prose quotation takes up more than four lines of your essay or includes a paragraph break, indent it ½ inch from the left margin to create a block quotation. Do not enclose the quotation in quotation marks, since these are implied by the formatting. On the rare occasions you quote more than one paragraph reproduce any paragraph break that occurs within the quotation by indenting the first line an additional ¼ inch.

Georgiana's birthmark becomes "a frightful object" only because "Aylmer's somber imagination" turns it into a "symbol" of the fatal flaw of humanity which Nature, in one shape or another, stamps ineffaceably on all her productions, either to imply that they are temporary and finite, or that their perfection must be wrought by toil and pain. The crimson hand expressed the ineludible gripe in which mortality clutches the highest and purest of earthly mould, degrading them into kindred with the lowest, and even with the very brutes, like whom their visible frames return to dust.

POETRY

- When quoting three or fewer lines of poetry, put the quotation in quotation marks, and use a slash mark (/) with a space on either side to indicate any line break that occurs in the quotation, and a double slash mark (//) to indicate a stanza break.

Before Milton's speaker can question his "Maker" for allowing him to go blind, "Patience" intervenes "to prevent / That murmur."

- When quoting more than three lines, indent the quotation ½ inch from the left margin to create a block quotation. Do not enclose the quotation in quotation marks, since these are implied by the formatting, but do reproduce original line and stanza breaks and the spatial arrangement of the original lines, including indentation.

Midway through the poem, the speaker suddenly shifts to second-person, for the first time addressing the drowned girl directly and almost affectionately as he also begins to imagine her as a living person rather than a dead corpse:

Little adulteress, before they punished you

you were flaxen-haired, undernourished, and your tar-black face was beautiful.

- When a block quotation begins in the middle of a line of verse, indent the partial line as much as you need to in order to approximate its original positioning.

The speaker first demonstrates both his knowledge of persimmons and his understanding of precision by telling us exactly what ripe fruits look and smell like and then, step by careful step,

How to eat:

put the knife away, lay down newspaper.
Peel the skin tenderly, not to tear the meat.
Chew the skin, suck it, and swallow. Now, eat
the meat of the fruit

- If you omit one or more lines in the middle of a block quotation, indicate the omission with a line of spaced periods approximately the same length as a complete line of the quoted poem.

About another image on the urn, the speaker has more questions than answers:

Who are these coming to the sacrifice?
To what green altar, O mysterious priest,
Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
And all her silken flanks with garlands dressed?
What little town by river or sea shore,
.....
Is emptied of its folk, this pious morn?

DRAMA

- With one exception (covered in the next rule), a quotation from a play is governed by the same rules as outlined above under “Prose,” if the quotation is in prose; under “Poetry,” if in verse.
- Regardless of its length, if a quotation from a play includes dialogue between two or more characters, indent it ½ inch from the left margin to create a block quotation. Begin each character’s speech with the character’s name in capital letters followed by a period; indent the second and subsequent lines an additional ¼ inch. If a speech is in verse, you must also follow the applicable rules outlined in the “Poetry” section above, by, for example, reproducing original line breaks (as in the second example below).

1. As soon as the men exit, the women start talking about the men and undoing what the men just did:

MRS. HALE. I'd hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing. [She arranges the pans under the sink which the LAWYER had shoved out of place.]

MRS. PETERS. Of course it's no more than their duty.
2. Antigone and Ismene's initial exchange climaxes with Antigone declaring her sister an “enemy,” even as Ismene declares herself one of Antigone's loving “friends”:

ANTIGONE. If you will talk like this I will loathe you,
and you will be adjudged an enemy—
justly—by the dead's decision. Let me alone
and my folly with me, to endure this terror.
No suffering of mine will be enough
to make me die ignobly.

ISMENE. Well, if you will, go on.
Know this; that though you are wrong to go, your friends are right to love you.

31.1.3 General Rules and Strategies

Unlike the rules covered in the last section, the ones laid out here apply regardless of whether you are quoting prose, poetry, or drama.

GRAMMAR, SYNTAX, TENSE, AND THE USE OF BRACKETS

- Quotations need not be complete sentences and may go anywhere in your sentence.

1. The narrator says of Mr. Kapasi, “In his youth he’d been a devoted scholar of foreign languages” who “dreamed of being an interpreter for diplomats and dignitaries.”
2. “In his youth a devoted scholar of foreign languages,” says the narrator, Mr. Kapasi once “dreamed of being an interpreter for diplomats and dignitaries.”

- Every sentence that includes a quotation and every quotation you present as if it is a sentence must—like every other sentence in your essay—observe all the usual rules of grammar, syntax, and consistency of tense. (In terms of these rules, words inside quotation marks don’t operate any differently than do words outside of quotation marks.)

1. The woman in all the portraits is idealized. “Not as she is, but as she fills his dream.”
2. The woman in all the portraits is idealized: “Not as she is, but as she fills his dream.”
3. The woman in all the paintings is idealized, portrayed by the artist “[n]ot as she is, but as she fills his dream.”

Sentence 1 includes a quotation that is treated as a sentence but isn’t one. Sentence 2 corrects that problem by using a colon to make the quoted fragment part of the preceding sentence. Yet the fragment still contains a pronoun (his) that lacks any clear referent in the sentence, making sentence 3 a better fix.

4. As Joy waits for Manley’s arrival, “She looked up and down the empty highway and had the furious feeling that she had been tricked, that he had only meant to make her walk to the gate after the idea of him” rather than the reality.
5. As Joy waits for Manley’s arrival, she becomes “furious,” convinced that he has “tricked” her and only “meant to make her walk to the gate after the idea of him” rather than the reality.

The fact that fiction typically uses past tense, while we write about it in present tense, often creates confusing tense shifts like that in sentence 4. Usually, partial paraphrase is a good solution: As in sentence 5, quote only the most essential words from the passage, remembering that what those words are will depend on the point you want to make.

- When necessary to the grammar of your sentence or the intelligibility of your quotation, you may add words to the latter or make minor changes to words within it, but you must enclose your alterations in brackets ([]) to let readers know that they are alterations. (In example 3 above, for example, the first letter of the word “not” appears in brackets because a capital “N” has been changed to a lower-case “n.”)

As Joy waits for Manley's arrival, "She look[s] up and down the empty highway and ha[s] the furious feeling that she ha[s] been tricked, that he had only meant to make her walk to the gate after the idea of him."

This sentence demonstrates how changing verb endings and putting the new ones in brackets can be an easy way to solve tense shift problems of the kind found in example 4 above.

The woman in all the portraits is idealized, represented "[n]ot as she is, but as she fills his [the painter's] dream."

If a pronoun reference in a quotation is unclear, one fix is to put the noun to which the pronoun refers in brackets after the pronoun, as in this sentence. For an alternative fix, see example 3 above.

As Mays explains, a writer "can assume that their reader will recognize the traditional meanings of these ["traditional"] symbols," but "invented symbols" work differently.

In this sentence, the phrase "these symbols" refers to something outside the quoted sentence. The added and thus bracketed word traditional appears in quotation marks because it, too, comes directly from the same source.

Tip: Though such alterations are permissible, they are often so much less effective than other techniques that some of them (including changes to verb endings) are not actually mentioned in the MLA Handbook. Used too often, this technique can become very distracting and put you at risk of appearing as if you're "fiddling" with sources. As a result, look for other fixes whenever possible.

OMISSIONS AND ELLIPSES

- A quotation that is obviously a sentence fragment need not be preceded or followed by an ellipsis (. . .). But you must use an ellipsis whenever—your quotation appears to be a complete sentence but actually isn't one in the source (as in the first and last sentences in the example below),—you omit words from the middle of a quoted sentence (as in the second sentence in the example below), or—you omit one or more sentences between quoted sentences (as between the second and third sentences in the example below).

When the ellipsis coincides with the end of your sentence, add a period followed by an ellipsis with a space before and between each ellipsis dot. A space follows the final ellipsis dot only if a new sentence follows (as in the first sentence below).

The narrator says of Mr. Kapasi,

In his youth he'd been a devoted scholar of foreign languages. . . . He had dreamed of being an interpreter for diplomats and dignitaries, . . . settling disputes of which he alone could understand both sides. . . . Now only a handful of European phrases remained in his memory, scattered words for things like saucers and chairs. . . . Sometimes he feared that his children knew better English than he did, just from watching television.

NOTE: If you omit the end of a sentence and one or more of the sentences that immediately follow it, the four dots are sufficient; you do not need two ellipses.

- If the quoted source uses an ellipsis, put your ellipsis in brackets to distinguish between the two. [NOTE: Throughout this book, we have instead put every added ellipsis in brackets.]

As an excited Ruth explains, the prospect of receiving a check is “a whole lot different from having it come and being able to hold it in your hands . . . a piece of paper worth ten thousand dollars.” “[. . .] I wish Walter Lee was here!” she exclaims.

The first (unbracketed) ellipsis here occurs in the original source; the second (bracketed) ellipsis doesn’t.

OTHER ACCEPTABLE CHANGES TO QUOTATIONS:

SIC AND EMPHASIS ADDED

- If a quotation includes what is or might seem to your reader an error of fact or of grammar, spelling, and so on, you may signal to the reader that you haven’t introduced the error yourself through misquotation by putting the word sic (Latin for “thus” or “so”) next to the error. Put parentheses around sic if it comes after the quotation (as in the first example below), brackets if it appears within the quotation (as in the second example). Do not use sic if context makes it obvious that the error isn’t yours or isn’t truly an error, as in the case of texts featuring archaic spelling, dialect, and so on.

1. Shaw admitted, “Nothing can extinguish my interest in Shakespeare” (sic).

In sentence 1 (from the MLA Handbook) parentheses work because nothing has been added into the quotation; the second, slightly modified version requires brackets. Either way, the word sic appears next to the misspelled word and is not italicized.

2. In the preface to Shakes Versus Shav: A Puppet Play (1949), Shaw avows, “Nothing can extinguish my interest in Shakespear [sic]. It began when I was a small boy. . . .”

3. Charley gets to the heart of the matter when he asks Willy, “when’re you gonna realize that them things don’t mean anything?”

Sic would be inappropriate here, since it’s clear this quotation accurately reproduces the character’s speech patterns.

4. The Misfit firmly rejects the idea that he should pray, insisting, “I don’t want no hep” (sic), “I’m doing all right by myself.”

In this case, though use of the word hep (for help) is entirely characteristic of the character’s speech, it could so easily look like a typo, that the word sic seems helpful.

- On the relatively rare occasions when you need to emphasize a specific word or phrase within a quotation, you may put it in italics and indicate this change by putting the words emphasis added in parentheses after the quotation, ideally at the end of the clause or sentence.

Avowing that men “must help them [women] to stay in that beautiful world of their own, lest ours get worse” (emphasis added), Marlow acknowledges that men have a selfish interest in preserving women’s innocence and idealism.

PUNCTUATING QUOTATIONS

- Though you must always reproduce original punctuation within a quotation, you may end it with whatever punctuation your sentence requires, and this is the one change you do not need to indicate with brackets.

Whether portrayed as “queen,” “saint,” or “angel,” the same “nameless girl” appears in “all his canvases.”

In the poem quoted here, no commas appear after the words queen and angel, but the syntax of the sentence requires they be added. Similarly, the comma that appears after the word canvases in the poem is here replaced by a period.

The narrator tells us that Mr. Kapasi’s “job was a sign of his failings,” for “[i]n his youth he’d been a devoted scholar of foreign languages” who “dreamed of being an interpreter for diplomats and dignitaries.”

Here, a comma replaces the original period after failings, and a period replaces the original comma after dignitaries.

- Commas and periods belong inside the closing quotation mark (as in the above examples). All other punctuation marks belongs outside the closing quotation mark if they are your additions, inside if they are not.

1. Wordsworth calls nature a “homely Nurse”; she has “something of a Mother’s Mind.”
2. What exactly does Lili mean when she tells Guy, “You are here to protect me if anything happens”?
3. Bobby Lee speaks volumes about the grandmother when he says, “She was a talker, wasn’t she?”

- When your indented, block quotation includes a quotation, put the latter in double quotation marks (“”).

Written just four years after A Raisin in the Sun’s debut, Martin Luther King, Jr.’s “Letter from Birmingham Jail” stresses the urgency of the situation of African Americans like himself and the Youngers by comparing it to those of Africans like Joseph Asagai and white Americans like Karl Lindner:

We have waited for more than 340 years for our constitutional and God-given rights. The nations of . . . Africa are moving with jetlike speed toward gaining political independence, but we still creep at horse-and-buggy pace toward gaining a cup of coffee at a lunch counter. Perhaps it is easy for those who have never felt the stinging darts of segregation to say, “Wait.”

- When a shorter (non-block) quotation includes a quotation, put the latter in single quotation marks (‘’).

1. As Martin Luther King, Jr., insisted in 1963, “it is easy for those who have never felt the stinging darts of segregation” or the “degenerating sense of ‘nobodiness’” it instills, “to say, ‘Wait,’” be patient, your time will come.
2. In a poem less about Hard Rock himself than about the way he is perceived by his fellow inmates, it makes sense that many words and lines take the form of unattributed quotations, as in the unforgettable opening, “Hard Rock was ‘known not to take no shit / From nobody.’”

- When your quotation consists entirely of words that appear within quotation marks in the source, use double quotation marks, while making sure that you introduce the quotation in a way that makes the special status of these words and their provenance clear.
 1. “[K]nown not to take no shit / From nobody,” as his fellow inmates put it, Hard Rock initially appears almost superhuman.
 2. The Misfit’s response is as shocking as it is simple: “I don’t want no hep,” “I’m doing all right by myself.”
 3. In an introductory note quoted by Alvarez, Plath describes the poem’s speaker as “a girl with an Electra complex” whose “father died while she thought he was God.”

31.2 STRATEGIES FOR EFFECTIVE QUOTING

- Though it is not a rule that all of your quotations must appear inside one of your sentences, your clarity will be enormously enhanced if you treat it like one, making the connection between quotation and inference as seamless as possible.
 1. Smith is highly critical of O’Brien’s portrayal of Martha. “Like other women in the book, she represents all those back home who will never understand the warrior’s trauma.”
 2. Smith is highly critical of O’Brien’s portrayal of Martha: “Like other women in the book, she represents all those back home who will never understand the warrior’s trauma.”
 3. Smith is highly critical of O’Brien’s portrayal of Martha, claiming that, “[l]ike other women in the book,” Martha “represents all those back home who will never understand the warrior’s trauma.”

Example 1 includes a quotation that isn’t part of any sentence. Example 2 corrects that problem with a colon, but the reader still has to pause to figure out that it’s Smith who’s being quoted here and that the quotation refers to Martha. Sentence 3 thus offers a better solution.
- Avoid drawing attention to your evidence as evidence with “filler” phrases such as This statement is proof that . . . ; This phrase is significant because . . . ; This idea is illustrated by . . . ; There is good evidence for this. . . Show why facts are meaningful or interesting rather than first or only saying that they are.

INEFFECTIVE QUOTATION

Wordsworth calls nature a “homely Nurse” and says that she has “something of a Mother’s mind” (lines 81, 79). This diction supports the idea that he sees nature as a healing, maternal force. He is saying that nature heals and cares for us.

EFFECTIVE QUOTATION

Personifying nature as a “homely Nurse” with “something of a Mother’s Mind,” Wordsworth depicts nature as healing and nurturing the humans it also resembles.

OR

A “homely Nurse” with “something of a Mother’s Mind,” nature, implies Wordsworth, both heals and nurtures the humans it also resembles.

Tennyson advocates decisive action, even as he highlights the forces that often prohibited his contemporaries from taking it. This is suggested by the lines “Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will, / To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield” (lines 69–70).

Tennyson advocates forceful action, encouraging his contemporaries “To strive, to seek to find, and not to yield” (line 70). Yet he recognizes that his generation is more tempted to “yield” than earlier ones because they have been “Made weak by time and fate” (69).

- On the one hand, make sure that you provide readers the information they need to understand the quotation and to appreciate its relevance to your argument. Quite often, contextual information—for instance, about who’s speaking to whom and in what situation—is crucial to a quotation’s meaning. On the other hand, keep such contextual information to a minimum and put the emphasis on the words that really matter and on your inferences about why and how they matter.

1. Strong as Mama is, she and Walter share a similar, traditional vision of gender roles: “I’m telling you to be the head of this family . . . like you supposed to be”; “the colored woman” should be “building their men up and making ‘em feel like they somebody.”

2. Strong as Mama is, she shares Walter’s traditional vision of gender roles. When she urges him “to be the head of this family from now on like you supposed to be,” she affirms that her son is the family’s rightful leader—not her daughter, not her daughter-in-law, not even herself, despite her seniority in terms of age. Implicitly, she’s also doing what Walter elsewhere says “the colored woman” should do—“building their men up and making ‘em feel like they somebody.”

Example 2 is more effective because it offers crucial information about who is speaking to whom (“When Lena tells Walter,” “Walter elsewhere says”) and includes inferences (“she affirms that her son is the family’s rightful leader . . .”; “Implicitly, she’s also doing”). Purely contextual information is, however, stated briefly and early, in subordinate clauses.

3. Julian expresses disgust for the class distinctions so precious to his mother: “Rolling his eyes upward, he put his tie back on. ‘Restored to my class,’ he muttered.”

4. Julian professes disgust for the class distinctions so precious to his mother. At her request, he puts back on his tie, but he can’t do so without “[r]olling his eyes” and making fun (at least under his breath) of the idea that he is thereby “[r]estored to [his] class.”

Again, example 4 improves on example 3 by providing missing information (“At her request”) and yet paraphrasing and subordinating what is only information (“he puts back on his tie”).

- Lead your readers into long, especially block, quotations with a clear sense of just what in the quotation they should be paying attention to and why. Follow it up with at least a sentence or more of analysis/inferences, perhaps repeating especially key words and phrases from the long quotation.

Whereas the second stanza individualizes the dead martyrs, the third considers the characteristics they shared with each other and with all those who dedicate themselves utterly to any one cause:

Hearts with one purpose alone
Through summer and winter seem Enchanted to a stone
To trouble the living stream. (lines 41–44)

Whereas all other “living” people and things are caught up in the “stream” of change represented by the shift of seasons, those who fill their “hearts with one purpose alone” become as hard, unchanging, and immovable as stone.

- Be aware that even though long, especially block quotations can be effective, they should be used sparingly and strategically. All too easily, they can create information overload or confusion for readers, making it hard to see what is most significant and why. When you quote only individual words or short phrases, weaving them into your sentences in the ways demonstrated earlier in this section, you and your readers can more easily stay focused on what’s significant and on why and how it is.
- Vary the length of quotations and the way you present them, using a variety of strategies. It can be very tempting to fall into a pattern—always, for example, choosing quotations that are at least a sentence long and attaching them to your sentence with a colon. But overusing any one technique can easily render your essay monotonous and might even prompt readers to focus more on the (repetitive) way you present evidence than on the evidence and argument themselves. To demonstrate, here are two sets of sentences that present the very same material in varying ways.

1. According to Wordsworth, nature is a “homely Nurse” with “something of a Mother’s Mind”; it heals and nurtures the humans it also resembles.
2. A “homely Nurse” with “something of a Mother’s Mind,” nature, suggests Wordsworth, both heals and nurtures the humans it also resembles.
3. Personifying nature as a “homely Nurse” with “something of a Mother’s Mind,” Wordsworth depicts nature as healing and nurturing the humans it also resembles.

4. Healing and nurturing the humans it also resembles, Wordsworth's nature is a "homely Nurse" with "something of a Mother's Mind."
1. Howe insists that the poem's "personal-confessional element . . . is simply too obtrusive," "strident and undisciplined," to allow a reader to interpret "Daddy" "as a dramatic presentation, a monologue spoken by a disturbed girl not necessarily to be identified with Sylvia Plath," especially given the resemblances between "events" described in the poem and those that actually occurred in Plath's life.
 2. "Daddy," argues Howe, cannot be read "as a dramatic presentation, a monologue spoken by a disturbed girl not necessarily to be identified with Sylvia Plath"; its "personal-confessional element . . . is simply too obtrusive," too "strident and undisciplined," he reasons, while the "events of the poem" too closely correspond to "the events of her life."

31.3 CITATION AND DOCUMENTATION

In addition to indicating which words, facts, and ideas in your essay derive from someone else's work, you need to let your readers know where each can be found. You want to enable readers not only to "check up" on you but also to follow in your footsteps and build on your work. After all, you hope that your analysis of a text will entice readers to re-read certain passages from the text in a different way or to consult sources that you've made sound interesting. This is another way your essay contributes to keeping the conversation about literature going. And this is where citation and documentation come into play.

In the MLA system, parenthetical citations embedded in your essay are keyed to an alphabetized list of works cited that follows your essay. By virtue of both their content and placement, parenthetical citations help you to quickly and unobtrusively indicate what you have derived from which source and where in that source your readers can find that material. The list of works cited communicates the information about the source that your readers need both to find it themselves and, in the meantime, to begin evaluating for themselves its relevance, credibility, currency, and so on without having to find it.

To demonstrate how this works, here is a typical sentence with parenthetical citation, followed by the coordinating works-cited entry:

In-Text Citation

In one critic's view, "Ode on a Grecian Urn" explores "what great art means" not to the ordinary person, but "to those who create it" (Bowra 148).

Placed at the end of the sentence and beginning with the word Bowra (sans quotation marks or italics) and the number 148, this parenthetical citation tells us that the last name of the "critic" the sentence mentions and quotes is Bowra, that the source of the quotations is something he authored, and that the quotations come from page 148 of that source. To find out more, we have to turn to the list of works cited and look for an entry, like the following, that begins with the name Bowra.

Works Cited Entry

Bowra, C. M. The Romantic Imagination. Oxford UP, 1950.

This coordinating works-cited entry gives us Bowra's complete name as it appears in the source and indicates its title, publisher, and date of publication.

That our explanations of this sample parenthetical citation and works-cited entry take up much more space than the citation and entry themselves demonstrates the value of the MLA system. What it also demonstrates is the importance of both the placement and content of each citation and entry: Where the parenthetical citation falls in a sentence is key to clearly indicating what is being "sourced"; what the parenthetical citation and works cited include and in what order are all key to ensuring that the citation leads us seamlessly to one source in the works cited and tells us where precisely to look in that source.

The exact content and placement of each parenthetical citation and works-cited entry will thus depend on a host of factors. The next sections explain how this works.

31.3.1 Parenthetical Citation

THE STANDARD PARENTHETICAL CITATION: CONTENT AND PLACEMENT

Because lists of works cited are organized primarily by author, the standard MLA parenthetical citation looks just like, and appears in the same place as, the ones in the sample sentences above and below. It includes an author's name and a page number or numbers with nothing but a space in between. (Do not write page or p., for example, or insert a comma.) The citation comes at the end of a sentence—inside the period (because it is part of the sentence in which you borrow from a source) and outside any quotation marks within the sentence (since it is not part of an actual quotation; it is not in the source but provides information about the source). In keeping with the rules for punctuating quotations laid out earlier in this chapter (31.1.3), you omit any final punctuation mark within your quotation, as in the second example below.

1. Most domestic poems of the 1950s foreground the parent-child relationship (Axelrod 1093).
2. As a character in one of the most famous works of Southern fiction memorably declares of the South, "I dont hate it" (Faulkner 378).

When citing a work from an anthology, refer to the author of the work, not the anthology editor, and make sure to create a corresponding entry in your list of works cited. Below is an example of this kind of citation, as well as the corresponding works-cited entry.

In-Text Citation

By the end of an initiation story, its protagonist may well have to confront "how hard the world" usually is (Updike 167).

Works Cited Entry

Updike, John. "A & P." The Norton Introduction to Literature, edited by Kelly J. Mays, shorter 12th ed., W. W. Norton, 2017, pp. 163-67.

The next two sections detail the variations on the standard MLA parenthetical citation format, starting with variations in where the citation goes before turning to variations in what it includes.

VARIATIONS IN PLACEMENT

- In the case of a block quotation, the parenthetical citation should immediately follow (not precede) the punctuation mark that ends the quotation.

According to the narrator,

The job was a sign of his failings. In his youth he'd been a devoted scholar of foreign languages, the owner of an impressive collection of dictionaries. He had dreamed of being an interpreter for diplomats and dignitaries, resolving conflicts between people and nations, settling disputes of which he alone could understand both sides. (Lahiri 451)

- If a sentence either incorporates material from multiple sources (as in the first example below) or refers both to something from a source and to your own idea (as in the second example), put the appropriate parenthetical citation in midsentence next to the material to which it refers. Ideally, you should insert the citation before a comma or semi-colon, since it will be less obtrusive that way. But your first priority should be clarity about which material comes from which source (see the third example below).

1. Critics describe Caliban as a creature with an essentially “unalterable natur[e]” (Garner 458), “incapable of comprehending the good or of learning from the past” (Peterson 442), “impervious to genuine moral improvement” (Wright 451).
2. If Caliban is truly “incapable of . . . learning from the past” (Peterson 442), then how do we explain the changed attitude he seems to demonstrate at the play's end?
3. Tanner (7) and Smith (viii) have looked at works from a cultural perspective.

- If, in a single paragraph, you make several uninterrupted references to the same source and especially to the same passage in a source, you may save the parenthetical citation until after the last such reference, as in the following example from Susan Farrell's TIM O'BRIEN AND GENDER: A DEFENSE OF THE THINGS THEY CARRIED (ch. 9).

Smith connects a 1980s backlash against the feminist movement to the misogyny she reads in Vietnam War literature, a misogyny which she describes as “very visible,” as seemingly “natural and expected.” In popular presentations, Smith argues, the “Vietnam War is being reconstructed as a site where white American manhood—figuratively as well as literally wounded during the war and assaulted by the women's movement for twenty years—can reassert its dominance in the social hierarchy” (“Back” 115).

VARIATIONS IN CONTENT: IDENTIFYING THE SOURCE

The standard MLA parenthetical citation may contain the author's name and the relevant page number(s). But variations are the rule when it comes to content. In this section, we deal with variations in how a citation indicates which source you refer to; the next section instead covers variations in how you indicate where in the source borrowed material can be found.

Your parenthetical citation should include something besides or in addition to one author's name whenever you do the following:

- Name the author(s) in your text.

Parenthetical citations should include only information that isn't crucial to the intelligibility and credibility of your argument. Yet in nine cases out of ten, information about whose ideas, data, or words you are referring to is crucial. As a result, you should try whenever possible to indicate this in your text, usually via a signal phrase (as described in 30.4.2). When you do so, your parenthetical citation usually need only include location information such as page number(s).

1. In Maurice Bowra's view, "Ode on a Grecian Urn" explores "what great art means" not to the ordinary person, but "to those who create it" (148).
2. As Faulkner's Quentin Compson memorably declares of the South, "I dont hate it" (378).

In literature essays, parenthetical citations containing the name of the author whose work you are analyzing should be relatively rare. (Notice that there are none, for example, in any of the critical excerpts on Tim O'Brien's The Things They Carried found in chapter 9.)

- Cite a source with multiple authors.

If the source has two authors, and they are not named in your text, the parenthetical citation should include both last names (as in the example below). If the source has three or more authors, include the first author's name followed by the words et al. (abbreviated Latin for "and others").

Surprisingly, "it seems not to have been primarily the coarseness and sexuality of Jane Eyre which shocked Victorian reviewers" so much as its "rebellious feminism" (Gilbert and Gubar 338).

- Cite multiple works by the same author or an anonymous work.

In either of these cases, you will need to indicate the title of your source. If possible, do so in your text, putting only location information in the parenthetical citation (as in the first example below). Otherwise, your parenthetical citation must include a shortened version of the title (as in the second example below). If your parenthetical citation also needs to include the author's name(s), this comes first, followed by a comma, the shortened title, and the location information (as in the third example below).

1. Like Joy, in O'Connor's "Good Country People," the protagonist of her story "Everything that Rises Must Converge" takes enormous pride in his intellect, even believing himself "too intelligent to be a success" (500).
2. Many of O'Connor's most faulty characters put enormous stock in their intellects, one even secretly believing himself "too intelligent to be a success" ("Everything" 500).
3. Intellectuals fare poorly in much Southern fiction. When we learn that the protagonist of one short story secretly believes himself "too intelligent to be a success," we can be pretty sure that he's in for a fall (O'Connor, "Everything" 500).

Be sure to format shortened titles just as you do full titles, either putting them in quotation marks or italicizing them as appropriate (see 29.5).

- Cite multiple authors with the same last name.

In this case, you should ideally indicate the author's full name in the text so that your parenthetical citation need only include location information. Otherwise, the parenthetical citation should begin with the author's first initial followed by a period, followed by his or her last name and the location information (as in the first example below). If your authors share the same first initial, however, you will need to include a first name instead of initial (as in the second example).

1. As one of Joyce's fellow writers points out, "To be absolutely faithful to what one sees and hears and not to speculate on what may lie behind it . . . is a creed that produces obvious limitations" (F. O'Connor 188).
2. As one of Flannery O'Connor's fellow short story writers points out, "To be absolutely faithful to what one sees and hears and not to speculate on what may lie behind it . . . is a creed that produces obvious limitations" (Frank O'Connor 188).

- Cite multiple authors simultaneously.

In this case, include all the citations within a single set of parentheses, separating them with semicolons.

Many scholars attribute Caliban's bestiality to a seemingly innate inability to learn or change (Garner 438; Peterson 442; Wright 451).

- Quote a source quoted in another source.

You should quote from an original source whenever possible. But on the rare occasions when you quote something quoted in another source, indicate the original source in your text. Then start your parenthetical citation with the abbreviation qtd. in followed by the name of the secondhand source's author and the location information.

In an introductory note to "Daddy" that Plath wrote for a radio program that never aired, she describes the poem's speaker as "a girl with an Electra complex" whose "father died while she thought he was God" and whose "case is complicated by the fact that her father was also a Nazi and her mother very possibly part Jewish" (qtd. in Alvarez 1080).

VARIATIONS IN CONTENT: INDICATING A LOCATION WITHIN THE SOURCE

Though page numbers are usually the only means we use to identify where in a source a reader can find the ideas, information, or words we cite, there are exceptions. Indeed, exceptions are unusually frequent in literature essays. The most important reason for this is that literary texts tend to be available in different editions, so it's helpful to give readers the information they need to locate material in the text regardless of the edition they use.

When it comes to the question of how to do so, there is frankly a good deal of ambiguity and "wiggle room" in the MLA guidelines. Thus, as we explain below, different instructors may interpret some of these guidelines differently or simply prefer that you use one method rather than another.

Your parenthetical citation will generally need to include location information other than, or in addition to, a page number whenever you cite any of the following:

◦ Poetry

When citing poetry, it is customary to refer to line (not page) number(s) and to indicate that you are doing so by including the word line or lines, as appropriate, in your first such parenthetical citation. Though MLA guidelines stipulate that later parenthetical citations include only the line number (as in the example below), some instructors prefer that the word line or lines appear in every poem-related parenthetical citation.

In a poem less about Hard Rock himself than about the way he is perceived by his fellow inmates, it makes sense that many words and lines take the form of unattributed quotations, as in the unforgettable opening, “Hard Rock was ‘known not to take no shit / From nobody’” (lines 1-2), or “Yeah, remember when he / Smacked the captain with his dinner tray?” (17-18).

◦ Play with more than one act or scene

At least when it comes to canonical plays, MLA guidelines call for omitting page numbers entirely and referring only to act, scene, and/or line numbers as appropriate, always using arabic numerals (1, 2, etc.) and separating each with a period (as in the first example below). Some instructors, however, prefer that you use roman numerals (I, II, i, ii, etc.) for acts and scenes (as in the second example below).

1. “I know not ‘seems;’” Hamlet famously declares (1.2.76).
2. “I know not ‘seems;’” Hamlet famously declares (I.ii.76).

◦ Commonly studied work of fiction or nonfiction prose

Parenthetical citations of this kind should always include page numbers unless your instructor indicates otherwise. But you may also need or want to include additional location information. In this case, the page number comes first, followed by a semicolon and the other information. Use common abbreviations to indicate what this information is (e.g., vol. for volume, bk. for book, sec. for section), and give it in arabic numerals (1, 2, etc.), even if the text uses roman numerals (I, II, etc.). (The second example below is quoted directly from the MLA Handbook.)

1. “I learned,” explains Frankenstein’s creature, “that the possessions most esteemed by your fellow-creatures were, high and unsullied descent united with riches” (96; vol. 2, ch. 5).
2. In A Vindication of the Rights of Woman, Mary Wollstonecraft recollects many “women who, not led by degrees to proper studies, and not permitted to choose for themselves, have indeed been overgrown children” (185; ch. 13, sec. 2).

When you cite prose works from an anthology like this one, in which paragraphs are numbered, your instructor may allow or even require you to cite paragraph numbers, using the appropriate abbreviation (par.). If you include both page and paragraph number, insert a semicolon after the page number (as in the first example below). If your parenthetical citations don’t include page, as well as paragraph, numbers, your instructor may also allow you to omit the abbreviation par. from the second and subsequent such citations (as in the second example).

1. When they meet years later in the supermarket, Roberta’s “lovely and summery and rich” appearance leaves the narrator not only “dying to know” how

- this transformation came about but also resentful of Roberta and people like her: “Everything is so easy for them,” she thinks (245; par. 68).
2. Though “dying to know” just how Roberta came to be so “lovely and summery and rich” since they last met (par. 68), all the narrator initially asks is, “How long you been here?” (69).

◦ Sacred text

When citing sacred texts such as the Bible or the Qur’an, indicate either in your text or in your parenthetical citation the title, editor, or translator of the edition you’re using on the first occasion you cite it. Then include in your parenthetical citation(s) the book, chapter, and verse (or their equivalent), separated by periods, unless you have indicated these in your text. (Either way, do not include page numbers.) Abbreviate the names of the books of the Bible, but don’t put these abbreviations in quotation marks or italicize them. (The second example below is quoted directly from the MLA Handbook.)

1. The New English Bible version of the verse reads, “In the beginning of creation, when God made heaven and earth, the earth was without form and void, with darkness over the face of the abyss, and a mighty wind that swept over the surface of the waters” (Gen. 1.1-2).
2. In one of the most vivid prophetic visions in the Bible, Ezekiel saw “what seemed to be four living creatures,” each with the faces of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle (New Jerusalem Bible, Ezek. 1.5-10). John of Patmos echoes this passage when describing his vision (Rev. 4.6-8).

◦ An entire source, a source without page numbers, a source that is only one page long, or an entry in a dictionary or other source organized alphabetically

When you refer in a blanket way to an entire source rather than to something particular in it, to a source that has no pages or page numbers, to a source that is only one page long or has unnumbered pages, or to an entry in a dictionary or other work organized alphabetically, your parenthetical citation will include no page numbers. If you refer to something specific in a source lacking pages or page numbers but having other numbered divisions such as sections or paragraphs, do include these, using appropriate abbreviations (e.g., sec., par.), and make sure to add a comma after the author’s name or, if the author is unknown, after the title of the work. Otherwise, if you clearly identify such a source (by author and/or title) in your text, you won’t need a parenthetical citation at all (as in the first and second examples below). If you don’t clearly identify the source in your text, your citation will include only author’s name(s) and/or a shortened title (as in the third and fourth examples).

1. Many critics, including Maurice Bowra, see Creon as morally inferior to Antigone.
2. The entry for Lord Weary’s Castle in The Oxford Companion to American Literature, for example, takes the “[m]ajor works” it includes to be the elegy “The Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket,” the Jonathan Edwards-inspired “Mr. Edwards and the Spider,” and the war poem “Christmas Eve Under Hooker’s Statue.”
3. Where some critics see the play as siding unequivocally with Antigone (Bowra), others see it as more ambivalent and/or ambiguous on this score (Nussbaum).
4. According to The Oxford Companion to American Literature, the elegy “The Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket” is among the three “[m]ajor works” in Lowell’s Lord Weary’s Castle (“Lord Weary’s Castle”).

OTHER VARIATIONS IN CONTENT: SIC AND EMPHASIS ADDED

When a parenthetical citation intervenes between the end of a quotation that you need to follow up with the words sic or emphasis added (for the reasons outlined in 31.1.3), it's usually advisable to put sic in brackets within the quotation, next to the error to which it applies (as in the second example below), but to put emphasis added at the end of the parenthetical citation, preceding it with a semicolon (as in the second example).

1. Shaw admitted, "Nothing can extinguish my interest in Shakespear [sic]" (1).
2. Avowing that men "must help them [women] to stay in that beautiful world of their own, lest ours get worse" (196; emphasis added), Marlow acknowledges that men have a selfish interest in preserving women's innocence and idealism.

31.3.2 The List of Works Cited

Your list of works cited must include all, and only, the sources that you cite in your essay, providing full publication information about each. This section explains both how to format and organize the list and how to put together each entry in it.

FORMATTING THE LIST

Your list of works cited should begin on a separate page after the conclusion of your essay. Center the heading Works Cited (without quotation marks or italics) at the top of the first page, and double space throughout.

The first line of each entry should begin at the left margin; the second and subsequent lines should be indented ½ inch.

Your list should be alphabetized, ignoring articles (such as A, An, The) in entries that begin with a title.

If your list includes multiple works by the same author, begin the first entry with the author's name, and each subsequent entry with three hyphens followed by a period. Alphabetize these entries by title, again ignoring articles (A, An, The).

FORMATTING INDIVIDUAL ENTRIES—GENERAL GUIDELINES

All information in a works-cited entry should come from the source itself and appear as it does in the source. Many if not most sources cited today are produced or experienced as part of larger wholes—or what MLA calls containers. If you cite a poem from this or any other anthology, for example, the poem is your source, the anthology its container. Works-cited entries may consist of as many as nine "core elements," each of which should be included when it is relevant and available. In general, they must appear in the following order: author, title of source, title of container, other contributors, version, number, publisher, publication date, and location. Some other elements are recommended, but not required: in this book, for instance, dates of access for online sources have been omitted. For further details on required and optional elements, please consult the MLA Handbook (8th ed., 2016) and The MLA Style Center (style.mla.org).

Below we offer only a few formatting guidelines applicable to all works-cited entries, along with model entries for especially common types of sources.

- Names

Reproduce the names of authors, editors, and so on as they appear in the source—on a book’s title page; at the beginning or end of a journal, magazine, or newspaper article; and so on. If initials are used, use them. If there are multiple authors or editors, list them in the order the source does, using the following format when they appear at the beginning of your entry:

2 names	Lastname, Firstname, and Firstname Lastname.
3+ names	Lastname, Firstname, et al.

If the author is unknown, begin your entry with the title.

- Publishers

Shorten publishers’ names by doing the following:

- Omit business words and abbreviations (Company or Co., Inc.): instead of W. W. Norton & Co., type W. W. Norton.
- With university presses, abbreviate University to U and Press to P: shorten University of Chicago Press to U of Chicago P, Harvard University Press to Harvard UP.

- Dates

For a book’s publication date, use the most recent year on the title or copyright page; for a Web source, use copyright date or the date of the most recent update. Abbreviate the names of all months except May, June, and July.

- Page numbers

If you cite an article from a magazine or newspaper that isn’t printed on consecutive pages, include only the first page number and a plus sign (+).

FORMATTING INDIVIDUAL ENTRIES FOR DIFFERENT TYPES OF SOURCES

This section explains how to format works-cited entries for the types of sources most frequently cited in literature essays. For other types of sources, consult the MLA Handbook.

1. Book with an author or authors

2. Anthology or other book with editor(s) rather than author(s)

Format your entry as indicated for a book (1), but after the (last) author's name or the abbreviation et al., insert a comma and the word editor or editors.

3. Book with author(s) and editor(s) or translator(s)

If what you cite or emphasize in your essay is the book itself, format your entry as indicated for a book (1), but insert between the book title and publication information the words edited by or translated by; the first and last names of the editor(s) and/or translator(s); and a period.

Kafka, Franz. The Metamorphosis. Translated by Joyce Crick, edited by Ritchie Robertson, E-book, Oxford UP, 2009.

If what you cite or emphasize in your essay is the work of the editor or translator, your entry should instead start with that person's name, followed by a comma and the word editor or translator (no capitalization), followed by the title of the book and the author.

Colvin, Sidney, editor. Letters of John Keats to His Family and Friends. By John Keats, Macmillan, 1891. Google Books, books.google.com/books/about/Letters_of_John_Keats_to_his_family_and.html?id=ULIZnOEACAAJ.

4. Graphic narrative or book with author(s) and illustrator(s)

If the book is written and illustrated by the same person or people, format the entry as you would for any other book (1). Otherwise, your entry will take one of the two forms below, depending upon whether your essay most emphasizes the work of the author(s) or the illustrator(s).

Crumb, R., illustrator. American Splendor: Bob and Harv's Comics. By Harvey Pekar, Four Walls Eight Windows, 1996.

Pekar, Harvey. American Splendor: Bob and Harv's Comics. Illustrated by R. Crumb, Four Walls Eight Windows, 1996.

Text Title. Editor's Firstname Lastname, editor [if any]. Publisher, Year of publication.

The New English Bible with the Apocrypha. Oxford UP, 1971.

6. Book in an edition other than the first

Format your entry as indicated for a book (1) or anthology (2), but insert the edition information, followed by a comma, just before the publication information. Identify the edition in whatever way the book's title page does, but abbreviate (e.g., 3rd ed. for Third edition, Rev. ed. for Revised edition).

Drabble, Margaret, editor. The Oxford Companion to English Literature. Rev. ed., Oxford UP, 1998.

7. Book in a series

Format your entry as indicated for a book (1) or anthology (2). Then, at the end, add the series title, followed by a period.

Joyce, James. A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man. Oxford UP, 2001. Oxford World's Classics.

Stein, Karen F. Margaret Atwood Revisited. Twayne Publishers, 1999. Twayne's World Authors.

8. Introduction, preface, foreword, or afterword to a book

Start your entry with the name of the author of the introduction, preface, and so on. If that author is not the same as the author of the book itself, your entry should look like this:

SAMPLE RESEARCH ESSAY

The following research essay analyzes Alice Munro's short story BOYS AND GIRLS. As you will see, the essay gives some consideration to the story's biographical and historical contexts, drawing on interviews with Munro and a sociological study of Canadian farm families. Yet the essay is primarily a critical contexts essay, as we define that term in chapter 30. In addition to considering the critical conversation about this specific short story, however, this essay examines another critical conversation, one about the initiation-story genre in general. The essay's literary critical secondary sources thus include three scholarly articles that focus exclusively on "Boys and Girls," as well as two articles that make arguments about the initiation story by instead analyzing a range of other stories. Diverse as are the sources and contexts this essay considers, however, notice that its thesis is an original, debatable interpretive claim about the literary text (Munro's story) and that the body of the essay supports and develops that claim by presenting and analyzing evidence from the text.

"Only a Girl"? Gendered Initiation in Alice Munro's
"Boys and Girls"

In 1960, an article in the Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism asked a question still worth asking over fifty years later, "What is an initiation story?" That article, by Mordecai Marcus, points out that literary critics frequently "used the term 'initiation' to describe a theme and a type of story" but that they didn't all use or define it exactly the same way. Marcus defines it as a story that "show[s] its young protagonist experiencing a significant change of knowledge about the world or himself, or a change of character, or of both," which "must point or lead him towards an adult world" (222). For him, the only significant difference between initiation stories has to do with their endings. He divides them into three types, depending on how far and "decisively" into that "adult world" their protagonists travel by the end (223). Published fifteen years after Marcus's essay,

Roberts establishes a motive for her essay by first presenting two competing scholarly arguments about the initiation story genre, then indicating that she will be both “siding” with the second of these and expanding on it by considering a story the source does not. (Only because her essay will apply and test that source’s claims does Roberts need to spell them out in such detail at the end of her opening paragraph.)

Roberts here prepares readers for the consideration of biographical and historical context later in the essay but makes the story and its critical contexts her main focus.

Here, Roberts briefly alludes to the three contributions to the second critical conversation her essay engages with—that about “Boys and Girls” specifically (rather than the initiation story generally).

however, Elaine Ginsberg’s “The Female Initiation Theme in American Fiction” (1975) suggests that it matters more what gender the story’s protagonist is, at least in American fiction. According to her, “the female initiation story is rare in American literature,” the first really “legitimat[e]” ones appearing only in the twentieth century (27, 31). Further, she argues those twentieth-century stories follow a pattern that is distinct in at least five ways: (1) “young girls are always introduced to a heterosexual world, in which relationships between men and women . . . are the most important,” “a world in which men are always present, always important, and always more free and independent” (31, 37); (2) they “seem to see their future roles as women almost always in relation to men” (31, 36); (3) their “initiation process” involves both “sexual experience” and (4) “dropping” the attributes like boyish “clothing” or “names” that make them “androgynous creatures” at the beginning of the story; and (5) they never seem “to be aided or guided by an older” person of the same sex, as boys in initiation stories are (31). As a result, according to Ginsberg, the “sense of disillusionment, disappointment, and regret is perhaps the most significant characteristic of the female initiate in American literature” (35).

Whether Ginsberg is right about all of American literature, her argument does offer a way to think about a story she doesn’t consider, Canadian Nobel Prize-winner Alice Munro’s “Boys and Girls.” Published in 1968, “Boys and Girls” appeared in Dance of the Happy Shades, Munro’s first book and the event that basically initiated her career as an author. On the one hand, “Boys and Girls” is clearly a female initiation story. Its narrator is a woman remembering events that happened around the time she was eleven, and it ends with her admitting that “[m]aybe” she truly is “only a girl” (par. 65, 64). Her initiation mostly does follow the pattern Ginsberg outlines in a way that draws on Munro’s personal experience and reflects that of other Canadian farm families. On the other hand, however, Munro’s story does all that even better because it also depicts, as Reingard M. Nischik, Marlene Goldman, and Heliane Ventura show, another character and another initiation—that of the protagonist’s younger brother, Laird. As Goldman puts it, the story “highlights the almost invisible societal forces which shape children, in this case, the narrator and her brother Laird, into gendered adults” (emphasis added). Rather than being either a male or female initiation story, “Boys and Girls” is both.

Roberts 3

Like the heroines in the female initiation stories that Ginsberg discusses, Munro's protagonist starts out as an "androgynous creatur[e]" (31). But in Munro's story, that androgyny doesn't have anything to do with the protagonist's clothes or her name. In "Boys and Girls," clothes and names aren't very important. On the Ontario fox farm where it is set, horses and "foxes all ha[ve] names" (par. 8), but only two human characters in the story do, Laird and "the hired man," Henry Bailey (par. 2). The only pieces of clothing described are a school dress the protagonist wants and her mother makes for her (par. 17), some dresses her mother once wore and describes to her (par. 10), and the aprons both her mother and her father wear when she sees them talking together outside the barn one night (par. 12–13).

Instead of clothes or names, what really makes adult men and women different in the story is, as all the story's critics notice, the kind of work they do, where they do it, and whom they do it with. What makes the outdoor meeting between the parents so "odd" is that the mother does "not often come out of the house" or get much exercise, as the "bumpy" shape and pale color of her legs show. Her workplace is the house and especially the "hot dark kitchen," where she cans and cooks the family's food. The father instead works "out of doors" (par. 13), even if outdoors includes the barn and the fox pens he builds outside it and even if, to the mother's disgust, he has to do the "pelting . . . in the house" in winter (par. 2). Also, the mother performs her work alone and isn't paid for it, but the father gets paid enough for the furs he sells "to the Hudson's Bay Company or the Montreal Fur Traders" to hire Henry Bailey to help him (par. 1).

The narrator's androgyny, then, has to do with two things. One is the way she moves across these male and female places and activities, as Ventura observes, too (83). In the kitchen, she is "given jobs to do" like "peeling peaches . . . or cutting up onions" with her mother (par. 13). Outdoors, her "job" includes getting the foxes water and raking up the grass between their pens after her father cuts it (par. 7, 10). But in terms of her androgyny, the second and just as important thing is how close she is to her brother. The narrator and Laird are so much a unit early on in the story that the narrator slips practically automatically from "I" to "we." After she introduces Laird, Henry Bailey, and her mother in the story's second paragraph, when she says in the next one, "We admired him [Henry] for this performance" and "It was . . . always possible that" he "might be [laughing] at us," it's not exactly clear who "we" or "us" means until she starts the next paragraph by saying, "After we had been sent to bed"

Since Roberts's thesis is a claim about Munro's story, so, too, is the topic sentence of each body paragraph, starting with this one. At the same time, she clearly indicates how that claim relates to that of her source (Ginsberg).

Because Roberts's claim here has to do only with which "pieces of clothing" are "described" and whom they belong to, not how they are described, she simply summarizes rather than quotes. Yet parenthetical citations ensure that her readers can find the specific moments in the text to which she refers.

Roberts can simply refer to "the story's critics" here because her introduction has already indicated who they are.

Roberts is careful to spell out the inference that makes the fact (the mother's legs are "bumpy" and "pale") evidence for the claim (she "does not 'often come out of the house' or get much exercise").

Here, Roberts is careful to state her claim in her own words, while indicating that it is one also already made by one of her sources (Ventura).

Roberts doesn't need to include a parenthetical citation here only because the source is unpaginated and its author's name is mentioned in a signal phrase ("As Goldman argues").

Roberts's signal phrase indicates that two sources make the same observation, even though she only quotes one source. To specify which of the two sources she quotes, Roberts repeats its author's name in her parenthetical citation.

Roberts here specifies the basis for the source's claims (a "study of ten," Saskatchewan "farm families") and the author's key credential ("sociologist").

Rather than letting her source get the last word in her paragraph, Roberts summarizes the key point in her own words.

Roberts transitions from one paragraph/claim to another by restating the main idea of the last paragraph in the first part of this sentence and then, in the second part, stating the claim developed in this paragraph.

(emphasis added). And this paragraph is all about the bedroom that she and her brother share, their shared fears about it, and the "rules" they both follow to make themselves feel safe (par. 4). As Goldman argues, this room is the only place in the story that isn't either clearly "male" or "female," its "unfinished state" symbolizing "the undifferentiated consciousness of the children" at this point in the story.

What's strange about this, however, is that even though they share so much, Laird is actually treated differently. He helps out when it comes to outdoor work like watering the foxes, but there's never any hint that he helps out in the house. There is a difference between boy and girl in terms of the work they do from the very beginning, even if it's not a difference the narrator or the story's critics point out. What two critics (Ventura and Nischik) do point out is another difference, that unlike the narrator, Laird gets a name, and his name is Scottish for "landowner": ". . . Laird is a potential laird, the male heir to the family" (Ventura 82).

In these ways, the story seems to accurately reflect the reality of life on Canadian family farms through the 1950s and 1960s. As Munro, who grew up on one, insists in one interview, because "what's going on" on those farms, "chiefly, is [or was] making enough to live on," "everybody has to work and be useful to the family" ("Interview" 183). Based on her study of ten farm families (in Saskatchewan instead of Ontario), sociologist June Corman describes that work as "distinctly gendered." While men had legal "title to the land" and "retained control of the agricultural income-producing work" in which "women . . . were not extensively involved," women "laboured . . . to make home made essentials instead of buying consumer goods so farm income could be used to pay down . . . debt" (70). Furthermore, she argues, "This structured gendered division of labour had implications for their . . . children": "From childhood onward girls learned" both "the skills required of farm wives" and "at least a minimal amount of skills related to grain and livestock production." But boys worked exclusively with their fathers and learned "agricultural skills but . . . not . . . domestic knowledge" (71). Farm families required equal work from all members of the family but not the same work.

At the same time that she reflects this reality about Canadian farm life, Munro's choice to focus specifically on a fox farm like the one she grew up on takes on importance in terms of how female and male worlds are characterized in the story. It's not entirely clear in the story that men are truly any more "free and independent" than women are, as Ginsberg suggests is true in a lot of female initiation stories (37), since both the mother and the father are "enslaved by the farm, harassed by [their] work" (Ventura 85). But Goldman does seem right to say that men's work in this story is all about controlling other wild and even dangerous creatures. "Alive, the foxes inhabited a world my father made for them," the narrator explains (par. 7). Here, they "prow[l] up and down" inside "sturdy pens" that are "surrounded by a high guard fence" with a "padlocked" gate that no one but the narrator's father is ever brave enough to go into (par. 9, 7). And, as Goldman points out, the fox pen does sort of resemble "[t]he dark, hot, stifling kitchen [that] imprisons the narrator's mother and threatens to imprison the narrator."

Maybe as a result of his power and bravery, the protagonist—as Nischik, Ventura, and Goldman all notice—clearly sees her father's work and world as superior to her mother's. She "hate[s]" the kitchen, whose "bumpy linoleum" resembles her mother's "lumpy legs," and sees housework as so "endless, dreary and peculiarly depressing" that she runs away as soon as she can (par. 13). But her father's "world," especially the pens he creates, seems to her "tidy and ingenious" (par. 7). And his work seems to her so "tirelessly inventive" (par. 7) and "ritualistically important" (par. 13) that she always helps him "willingly . . . and with a feeling of pride" (par. 10).

The adults around her reinforce that feeling. The only time her father praises her, he does it by calling her a "man" (par. 10), even specifically his "new hired man." In saying that, he compares her to Henry Bailey, which is interesting, but more important, he communicates the same message about the jobs of men and women and their unequal worth that the salesman does when he responds to the father by saying, "I thought it was only a girl." Paired with the word only, the word girl, as the narrator thinks later, becomes a label "always touched . . . with reproach and disappointment" or even "a joke on [her]" that the real hired man, Henry, especially, finds funny (par. 21). The label also gets associated with prohibitions as much as confinement. When the narrator's grandmother (the last of only three female characters total) arrives on the scene, the only thing we hear from her are commands about the things girls shouldn't do—"slam doors," sit with their knees apart, ask questions (par. 22).

The narrator is thus, in a way, "aided or guided by an older" person of the same sex, as boys in initiation stories are, according to Ginsberg (31). But that aid isn't positive. In fact, the girl actually sees her mother as her "enemy" because she thinks her mother is the one "plotting" to imprison her in the house and the lesser adult role it implies (par. 17). She sees that her mother is "kinder than [her] father" and "love[s] her" enough to stay up all night making the "difficult" dress she wants for school. But she still sides with her father and even likes his dismissive attitude toward her mother when they talk about her in the yard: "I was pleased by the way he stood listening [to her],

Roberts needs quotations in this paragraph because her claim is about how the narrator "sees" things, something she can only prove by showing us how the narrator describes them. Notice, though, how only the most relevant language is quoted.

Because Roberts found the quotation from one source (Hallvard Dahlie's biography of Munro) in another (Nischik's article), she puts the essential information about the original source in a signal phrase ("Munro biographer Hallvard Dahlie claims . . ."), then uses the parenthetical citation to tell us which of her sources it was quoted in ("qtd. in Nischik").

Because Roberts doesn't mention the titles of these sources in a signal phrase, she needs parenthetical citations. The latter don't include page numbers only because these sources are unpaginated.

Roberts doesn't cite a source for the fact that Munro's mother had Parkinson's, two daughters, and a son because this is common knowledge.

politely as he would to a salesman or a stranger, but with an air of wanting to get on with his real work" (par. 15), she says, "I did not expect my father to pay any attention to what she said" (par. 18).

Goldman identifies a parallel between the protagonist's attitudes to her mother and the foxes. As Goldman puts it, just as she earlier in the story "does not comprehend that the hostility she sees in the foxes' 'malevolent faces' . . . is a response to their enforced captivity," so she now interprets "her mother's behaviour . . . not as an expression of frustration and disappointment, or loneliness, but as a manifestation of innate wickedness and petty tyranny. . . ." What Goldman doesn't say is that we learn about these other possible interpretations, however, because the adult narrator does see them. When the narrator says, "It did not occur to me that she could be lonely, or jealous" (par. 17; emphasis added), it's obvious that it does occur to her now, as an adult.

In this way, too, the story actually seems to reflect and bend reality, but in this case the reality of Munro's personal life instead of Canadian farm families'. Munro biographer Hallvard Dahlie claims that many Munro stories include "unfulfilled and despairing mothers" like Munro's real mother, a former teacher who "expended her energies during the formative years of the three Laidlaw children in the nurturing of a family under conditions of deprivation and hardship" (qtd. in Nischik). In interviews, Munro often mentions her mother in a way that implies her attitude toward her mother changed in the same way her narrator-protagonist's does. She told The New Yorker that her "mother . . . is still a main figure in my life because her life was so sad and unfair and she so brave, but also because she was determined to make me into the Sunday-school-recitation little girl I was, from the age of seven or so, fighting not to be" ("On 'Dear' "). She told The Paris Review, "The tenderness I feel now for my mother, I didn't feel for a long time" ("Alice"). At the same time, Munro leaves out of "Boys and Girls" one of the things that made her real-life mother's life particularly "sad and unfair," which was the fact that she had Parkinson's disease. By not giving her fictional mother that kind of illness or even a name, for that matter, Munro makes her more like all women, just as she makes her story about boys versus girls (period) by not giving the protagonist what she had in real life—a sister and a brother.

In the story, the protagonist's full initiation into womanhood doesn't really involve a change in her relationship to her mother. (Late in the story she does think about confiding in her, but she doesn't [par. 51].) Instead, it involves changes in the way she relates to her father, animals, and her brother. That change begins with the scene where she and Laird secretly witness their father and Henry shooting the horse, Mack. We can tell that what she sees disturbs her partly because her legs shake and partly because she suddenly mentions a memory of Laird that makes her feel “the sadness of unexorcized guilt” (par. 37). But the question is why, since she and her brother have watched their father killing and skinning other animals and, unlike their mother, weren’t bothered by that or the gross smells it produced (par. 2)? Or, as she herself explains,

I did not have any great feeling of horror and opposition, such as a city child might have had. I was used to seeing the death of animals as a necessity by which we lived. Yet I felt a little ashamed, and there was a new wariness, a sense of holding-off, in my attitude to my father and his work. (par. 43)

There are many possible reasons for her reaction, but one might be that even before this point the girl begins to identify with the horses in a way she never does with the foxes. It is when—in her life and in the story—she is beginning to feel most pressured about being a girl and first expresses a wish to remain “free” that she remembers to mention how the foxes were fed at all and to describe, in detail, the two particular horses, Mack and Flora, and the different ways they respond to their similarly unfree situation (par. 22). (Mack is “slow and easy to handle”; Flora rears and kicks at people and fences [par. 20, 23].) That identification might explain why she might suddenly have a new “wariness” of her father and his work after seeing one of the horses killed (par. 43).

That feeling might be compounded, too, by the way Henry behaves, especially the fact that he laughs about Mack being shot in the same ways he’s already laughed at her more than once in the story (par. 2, 21). But her sense of being “ashamed” about the shooting seems to come from seeing how she in a way acted like him long ago when she endangered her little brother’s life just “for excitement” (par. 43, 37). As Goldman argues, Bailey’s laughter [when “the horse kicks its legs in the air”] is particularly unnerving because it fully exposes his delight in power based on sheer inequality.

The narrator recognizes this as an abuse of power . . . as a result of her own experience. She, too, lorded power over an innocent victim. . . .

It doesn’t seem surprising, then, that when the narrator has the chance to save Flora ten days later, even just temporarily, she just does it without “mak[ing] any decision” or even “understand[ing] why” (par. 48, 50). By doing that, in Ventura’s words, “the girl vicariously achieves her own temporary liberation” (84), and, in Goldman’s words, “she radically breaks from her male-identified position.” As the narrator points out, she disobeys her father for the very first time in her life and in a way she knows will change their relationship forever (par. 50). Rather than helping him as she's always wanted to do before, she "make[s] more work for" him by letting Flora go (par. 50). Worse, she knows that once he figures out what she's done he won't "trust me any more," but "would know that I was not entirely on his side. I was on Flora's side . . ." (par. 50). Her change of "side[s]," though, isn't complete or recognized by other people until dinner. When the truth about how she let Flora go is revealed, her father responds in a way that "absolved and dismissed [her] for good" by repeating the words the salesman used earlier, "She's only a girl" (par. 64). More important, the narrator doesn't "protest . . . , even in [her] heart" (par. 65). Like Mack and unlike the foxes and Flora, she now silently accepts her fate.

By putting the narrator’s characterizations of Mack’s and Flora’s different reactions to their imprisonment in parentheses, Roberts substantiates her claim about the narrator’s detailed descriptions, while staying focused on this paragraph’s main topic—the narrator’s feelings about the horses.

Here, as throughout the essay, Roberts never substitutes the claim of a source for the textual evidence necessary to substantiate and develop it.

Just as important, though, is the way she separates herself from her brother. At the exact same time that the narrator permanently separates herself from her father, by letting Flora out, she also separates herself from Laird in a way that seems ironic, given that it was in a way sympathy with Laird or guilt about him that started the change in her in the first place. At any rate, when Henry and her father go off to get Flora, Laird goes with them, but the narrator doesn't. When she says, "I shut the gate after they were all gone," it seems like the first time in the story that Henry, the father, and Laird become a "they" that doesn't include her (par. 49). At least it seems like a far cry from the "we" she and Laird are early in the story. Importantly, though, it isn't really true that, as Ventura claims, the narrator "is not allowed aboard the bouncing truck" because she, unlike Laird, never actually asks to go (86). That change in her relationship to Laird is confirmed by the way, in between Flora's escape and the dinner that ends the story, the narrator mentions their bedroom one more time. In addition to decorating her part of the room, she "planned to put up some kind of barricade between [her] bed and Laird's, to keep my section separate from his" (par. 52).

As Goldman argues, though, Laird's very different initiation and behavior are significant:

As they lift him into the truck, the little boy becomes a man: he joins the hunting party. Upon his return, he brandishes the streak of blood on his arm. . . . [T]he mark of blood and the domination of the Other continues to function as a crucial element in the rites of manhood. The boy cements his alliance with the father on the basis of their mutual triumph over nature.

In fact, that "alliance" isn't "cemented" until that night, when Laird, "look[ing] across the table at" her "proudly, distinctly" tells her secret to everyone (par. 56). In a weird way, he reverses the roles they each play in the memory that sparks her change—now he's the powerful one who leaves her figuratively hanging.

To reinforce her claim about the narrator's development over the course of the story and connect the earlier parts of her essay with the later ones, Roberts briefly alludes to evidence and a point she made earlier.

Here, though, is where the male and female initiations in this one story differ in a way that totally accords with Ginsberg's argument. Laird becomes a man in relationship to other men, grown-ups of his own gender, but in a way that has nothing to do with actual sex. Like the protagonists of most female initiation stories, according to Ginsberg, however, the protagonist of this one "seem[s] to see [her] future rol[e] as [a] wom[a]n . . . in relation to men" in a way that involves "sexual experience" (31). We see this in the stories she tells herself at night. Where the stories she makes up at the beginning of the story are all adventure stories in which she does things like shoot animals (just as Laird actually ends up doing by the end of this story), the stories she makes up at the end of the story are more like romances featuring boys she knows from school or one of her male teachers (par. 52).

If we go back to Marcus's question, "What is an initiation story?" then, "Boys and Girls" shows us that Ginsberg is right to say that the answer can depend most on whether the story features boys, girls, or "boys and girls." Or at least it once did, because here is where it might matter that Munro's story was published in 1968 and is set much earlier. In interviews, Munro expresses the idea that things were, in real life, changing even in her generation, which is also, as Nischik points out, her protagonist's. "If I had been a farm girl of a former generation," she says in one interview, "I wouldn't have had a chance" to go to college or be a writer, for example." Instead, her only option would have been to become a farm wife like her own mother or her protagonist's mother. "But in the generation that I was, there were scholarships. Girls were not encouraged to get them, but you could. I could imagine, from an early age, that I would be a writer" ("Interview" 183). Even if her protagonist never explicitly imagines herself some day being a writer, she is writing stories in her head every night. And that doesn't change over the course of the story, even if the kinds of stories she tells do. Even if at the end of the story the protagonist ends up accepting the idea that she is "only a girl" and not saying anything, the fact that she keeps telling herself stories and that she is, in fact, narrating her story to us as an adult suggests that the end of the story isn't the end of the story. Girls don't have to grow up to be "only" one thing after all. They can grow up to tell both their stories and their brothers. They can even win Nobel Prizes for it.

Roberts opens her conclusion by referring us back to the "frame" she established in the beginning—the different views of two sources (Marcus and Ginsberg).

Critical Approaches

Few human abilities are more remarkable than the ability to read and interpret literature. A computer program or a database can't perform the complex process of reading and interpreting—not to mention writing about—a literary text, although computers can easily exceed human powers of processing codes and information. Readers follow the sequence of printed words and as if by magic recreate a scene between characters in a novel or play, or they respond to the almost inexpressible emotional effect of a poem's figurative language. Experienced readers can pick up on a multitude of literary signals all at once. With rereading and some research, readers can draw on information such as the author's life or the time period when this work and others like it were first published. Varied and complex as the approaches to literary criticism may be, they are not difficult to learn. For the most part schools of criticism and theory have developed to address questions that any reader can begin to answer.

There are essentially three participants in what could be called the literary exchange or interaction: the text, the source (the author and other factors that produce the text), and the receiver (the reader and other aspects of reception). All the varieties of literary analysis concern themselves with these aspects of the literary exchange in varying degrees and with varying emphases. Although each of these elements has a role in any form of literary analysis, systematic studies of literature and its history have defined approaches or methods that focus on the different elements and circumstances of the literary interaction. The first three sections below—"Emphasis on the Text," "Emphasis on the Source," and "Emphasis on the Receiver"—describe briefly those schools or modes of literary analysis that have concentrated on one of the three participants while de-emphasizing the others. These different emphases, plainly speaking, are habits of asking different kinds of questions. Answers or interpretations will vary according to the questions we ask of a literary work. In practice the range of questions can be—and to some extent should be—combined whenever we develop a literary interpretation. Such questions can always generate the thesis or argument of a critical essay.

Although some approaches to literary analysis treat the literary exchange (text, source, receiver) in isolation from the world surrounding that exchange (the world of economics, politics, religion, cultural tradition, and sexuality—in other words, the world in which we live), most contemporary modes of analysis acknowledge the importance of that world to the literary exchange. These days, even if literary scholars want to focus on the text or its source or receiver, they will often incorporate some of the observations and methods developed by theorists and critics who have turned their attention toward the changing world surrounding the formal conventions of literature, the writing process and writer's career, and the reception or response to literature. We describe the work of such theorists and critics in the fourth section below, "Historical and Ideological Criticism."

Before expanding on the kinds of critical approaches within these four categories, let's consider one example in which questions concerning the text, source, and receiver, as well as a consideration of historical and ideological questions, would contribute to a richer interpretation of a text. To begin as usual with preliminary questions about the text: What is “First Fight. Then Fiddle.”? Printed correctly on a separate piece of paper, the text would tell us at once that it is a poem because of its form: rhythm, repeating word sounds, lines that leave very wide margins on the page. Because you are reading this poem in this book, you know even more about its form (in this way, the publication source gives clues about the text). By putting it in a section with other poetry, we have told you it is a poem worth reading, rereading, and thinking about. (What other ways do you encounter poems, and what does the medium in which a poem is presented tell you about it?)

You should pursue other questions focused on the text. What kind of poem is it? Here we have helped you, especially if you are not already familiar with the sonnet form, by grouping this poem with other sonnets (in The Sonnet: An Album). Classifying “First Fight. Then Fiddle.” as a sonnet might then prompt you to interpret the ways that this poem is or is not like other sonnets. Well and good: You can check off its fourteen lines of (basically) iambic pentameter and note its somewhat unusual rhyme scheme and meter in relation to the rules of Italian and English sonnets. But why does this experiment with the sonnet form matter?

To answer questions about the purpose of form, you need to answer some basic questions about source, such as When was this sonnet written and published? Who wrote it? What do you know about Gwendolyn Brooks, about 1949, about African American women and/or poets in the United States at that time? A short historical and biographical essay answering such questions might help put the “sonnetness” of “First Fight. Then Fiddle.” in context. But assembling all the available information about the source and original context of the poem, even some sort of documented testimony from Brooks about her intentions or interpretation of it, would still leave room for other questions leading to new interpretations.

What about the receiver of “First Fight. Then Fiddle.”? Even within the poem a kind of audience exists. This sonnet seems to be a set of instructions addressed to “you.” (Although many sonnets are addressed by a speaker, “I,” to an auditor, “you,” such address rarely sounds like a series of military commands, as it does here.) This internal audience is not of course to be confused with real people responding to the poem, and it is the latter who are its receivers. How did readers respond to it when it was first published? Can you find any published reviews, or any criticism of this sonnet published in studies of Gwendolyn Brooks?

Questions about the receiver, like those about the author and other sources, readily connect with questions about historical and cultural context. Would a reader or someone listening to this poem read aloud respond differently in the years after World War II than in an age of global terrorism? Does it make a difference if the audience addressed by the speaker inside the poem is imagined as a group of African American men and women or as a group of European American male commanders? (The latter question could be regarded as an inquiry involving the text and the source as well as the receiver.) Does a reader need to identify with any of the particular groups the poem fictitiously addresses, or would any reader, from any background, respond to it the same way? Even the formal qualities of the text could be examined through historical lenses: The sonnet form has been associated with prestigious European literature, and with themes of love and mortality, since the Renaissance. It is significant that a twentieth-century African American poet chose this traditional form to twist “threadwise” into a poem about conflict.

The above are only some of the worthwhile questions that might help illuminate this short, intricate poem. (We will develop a few more thoughts about it in illustrating different approaches to the text and to the source.) Similarly, the complexity of critical approaches far exceeds our four categories. While a great deal of worthwhile scholarship and criticism borrows from a range of theories and methods, below we give necessarily simplified descriptions of various critical approaches that have continuing influence. We cannot trace a history of the issues involved, or the complexity and controversies within these movements. Instead think of what follows as a road map to the terrain of literary analysis. Many available resources describe the entire landscape of literary analysis in more precise detail. If you are interested in learning more about these or any other analytical approaches, consult the works listed in the bibliography at the end of this chapter.

EMPHASIS ON THE TEXT

This broad category encompasses approaches that de-emphasize questions about the author/source or the reader/reception in order to focus on the work itself. In a sense any writing about literature presupposes recognition of form, in that it deems the object of study to be a literary work that belongs to a genre or subgenre of literature, as Brooks's poem belongs with sonnets. Moreover, almost all literary criticism notes some details of style or structure, some intrinsic features such as the relation between dialogue or narration, or the pattern of rhyme and meter. But formalist approaches go further by foregrounding the design of the text itself above all or most other considerations.

Some formalists, reasonably denying the division of content from form (since the form is an aspect of the content or meaning), have more controversially excluded any discussion of extrinsic or contextual (versus textual) matters such as the author's biography or questions of psychology, sociology, or history. This has led to accusations that formalism, in avoiding relevance to actual authors and readers or to the world of economic power or social change, also avoids political issues or commitments. Some historical or ideological critics have therefore argued that formalism supports the powers that be, since it precludes protest. Conversely, some formalists charge that any extrinsic—that is, historical, political, ideological, as well as biographical or psychological—interpretations of literature reduce the text to a set of more or less cleverly encoded messages or propaganda. A formalist might maintain that the inventive wonders of art exceed any practical function it serves. In practice, influential formalists have generated modes of close reading that balance attention to form, significance, and social context, with some acknowledgment of the political implications of literature. In the early twenty-first century the formalist methods of close reading remain influential, especially in classrooms. Indeed, The Norton Introduction to Literature adheres to these methods in its presentation of elements and interpretation of form.

New Criticism

One strain of formalism, loosely identified as the New Criticism, dominated literary studies from approximately the 1920s to the 1970s. New Critics rejected both of the approaches that prevailed then in the relatively new field of English studies: the dry analysis of the development of the English language, and the misty-eyed appreciation and evaluation of "Great Works." Generally, New Criticism minimizes consideration of both the source and the receiver, emphasizing instead the intrinsic qualities of a unified literary work. Psychological or historical information about the author, the intentions or feelings of authors or readers, and any philosophical or socially relevant “messages” derived from the work all are out of bounds in a New Critical reading. The text in a fundamental way refers to itself: Its medium is its message. Although interested in ambiguity and irony as well as figurative language, a New Critical reader considers the organic unity of the unique work. Like an organism, the work develops in a synergetic relation of parts to whole.

A New Critic might, for example, publish an article titled “A Reading of ‘First Fight. Then Fiddle.’” (The method works best with lyric or other short forms because it requires painstaking attention to details such as metaphors or alliteration.) Little if anything would be said of Gwendolyn Brooks or the poem’s relation to Modernist poetry. The critic’s task is to give credit to the poem, not the poet or the period, and if it is a good poem, then—implicitly—it can’t be merely “about” World War II or civil rights. New Criticism presumes that a good literary work symbolically embodies universal human themes and may be interpreted objectively on many levels. These levels may be related more by tension and contradiction than harmony, yet that relation demonstrates the coherence of the whole.

Thus the New Critic’s essay might include some of the following observations. The title—which reappears as half of the first line—consists of a pair of two-word imperative sentences, and most statements in the poem paraphrase these two sentences, especially the first of them, “First fight.” Thus an alliterative two-word command, “Win war” (line 12), follows a longer version of such a command: “But first to arms, to armor” (9). Echoes of this sort of exhortation appear throughout. We, as audience, begin to feel “bewitch[ed], bewilder[ed]” (4) by a buildup of undesirable urgings, whether at the beginning of a line (“Be deaf,” 11) or the end of a line (“Be remote,” 7; “Carry hate,” 9) or in the middle of a line (“Rise bloody,” 12). It’s hardly what we would want to do. Yet the speaker makes a strong case for the practical view that a society needs to take care of defense before it can “devote” itself to “silks and honey” (6–7), that is, the soft and sweet pleasures of art. But what kind of culture would place “hate / In front of . . . harmony” and try to ignore “music” and “beauty” (9–11)? What kind of people are only “remote / A while from malice and from murdering” (6–7)? A society of warlike heroes would rally to this speech. Yet on rereading, many of the words jar with the tone of heroic battle cry.

The New Critic examines not only the speaker’s style and words but also the order of ideas and lines in the poem. Ironically, the poem defies the speaker’s command; it fiddles first, and then fights, as the octave (first eight lines) concern art, and the sestet (last six) concern war. The New Critic might be delighted by the irony that the two segments of the poem in fact unite, in that their topics—octave on how to fiddle, sestet on how to fight—mirror each other. The beginning of the poem plays with metaphors for music and art as means of inflicting “hurting love” (line 3) or emotional conquest, that is, ways to “fight.” War and art are both, as far as we know, universal in all human societies. The poem, then, is an organic whole that explores timeless concerns.

Later critics have pointed out that New Criticism, despite its avoidance of extrinsic questions, had a political context of its own. The affirmation of unity for the artwork and humanities in general should be regarded as a strategy adapted during the Cold War as a counterbalance to the politicization of art in fascist and communist regimes. New Criticism also provided a program for literary reading that is accessible to beginners regardless of their social background, which was extremely useful at a time when more women, minorities, and members of the working class than ever before were entering college. By the 1970s these same groups had helped generate two sources of opposition to New Criticism's ostensible neutrality and transparency: critical studies that emphasized the politics of social differences (e.g., feminist criticism), and theoretical approaches, based on linguistics, philosophy, and political theory, that effectively distanced nonspecialists once more.

Structuralism

Whereas New Criticism was largely a British and American phenomenon, structuralism and its successor, poststructuralism, derive primarily from French theorists. Strains of structuralism also emerged in the Soviet Union and in Prague. Each of these movements was drawn to scientific objectivity and at the same time wary of political commitment. Politics, after all, had been the rallying cry for censorship of science, art, and inquiry throughout centuries and in recent memory.

Structuralist philosophy, however, was something rather new. Influenced by the French linguist Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913), structuralists sought an objective system for studying the principles of language. Saussure distinguished between individual uses of language, such as the sentences you or I might have just spoken or written (parole), and the sets of rules of English or any language (langue). Just as a structuralist linguist would study the interrelations of signs in the langue rather than the variations in specific utterances in parole, a structuralist critic of literature or culture would study shared systems of meaning, such as genres or myths that pass from one country or period to another, rather than a certain poem in isolation (the favored subject of New Criticism).

Another structuralist principle derived from Saussure is the emphasis on the arbitrary association between a word and what it is said to signify—that is, between the signifier and the signified. The word “horse,” for example, has no divine, natural, or necessary connection to that four-legged, domesticated mammal, which is named by other combinations of sounds and letters in other languages. Any language is a network of relations among such arbitrary signifiers, just as each word in the dictionary must be defined using other words in that dictionary. Structuralists largely attribute the meanings of words to rules of differentiation from other words. Such differences may be phonetic (as among the words “cat” and “bat” and “hat”) or they may belong to conceptual associations (as among the words “dinky,” “puny,” “tiny,” “small,” “miniature,” “petite,” “compact”). Structuralist thought has particularly called attention to the way that opposites or dualisms such as “night” and “day” or “feminine” and “masculine” define each other through their differences from each other rather than in direct reference to objective reality. For example, the earth's motion around the sun produces changing exposure to sunlight daily and seasonally, but by linguistic convention we call it “night” between, let's say, 8 p.m. and 5 a.m., no matter how light it is. (We may differ in opinions about “evening” or “dawn.” But our “day” at work may begin or end in the dark.) The point is that arbitrary labels divide what in fact is continuous.

Structuralism's linguistic insights have greatly influenced literary studies. Like New Criticism, structuralism shows little interest in the creative process or in authors, their intentions, or their circumstances. Similarly, structuralism discounts the idiosyncrasies of particular readings; it takes texts to represent interactions of words and ideas that stand apart from individual human identities or sociopolitical commitments. Structuralist approaches have applied less to lyric poetry than to myths, narratives, and cultural practices, such as sports or fashion. Although structuralism tends to affirm a universal humanity just as New Critics do, its work in comparative mythology and anthropology challenged the absolute value that New Criticism tended to grant to time-honored canons of great literature.

The structuralist would regard a text not as a self-sufficient icon but as part of a network of conventions. A structuralist essay on “First Fight. Then Fiddle.” might ask why the string is plied with the “feathery sorcery” (line 2) of the “bow” (7). These words suggest the art of a Native American trickster or primitive sorcerer, while at the same time the instrument is a disguised weapon: a stringed bow with feathered arrows (the term “muzzle” is a similar pun, suggesting an animal’s snout and the discharging end of a gun). Or is the fiddle—a violin played in musical forms such as bluegrass—a metaphor for popular art or folk resistance to official culture? In many folk tales a hero is taught to play the fiddle by the devil or tricks the devil with a fiddle or similar instrument. Further, a structuralist reading might attach great significance to the sonnet form as a paradigm that has shaped poetic expression for centuries. The classic “turn” or reversal of thought in a sonnet may imitate the form of many narratives of departure and return, separation and reconciliation. Brooks’s poem repeats in the numerous short reversing imperatives, as well as in the structure of octave versus sestet, the eternal oscillation between love and death, creation and destruction.

Poststructuralism

By emphasizing the paradoxes of dualisms and the ways that language constructs our awareness, structuralism planted the seeds of its own destruction or, rather, deconstruction. Dualisms (e.g., masculine/feminine, mind/body, culture/nature) cannot be separate-but-equal; rather, they take effect as differences of power in which one dominates the other. Yet as the German philosopher of history Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831) insisted, the relations of the dominant and subordinate, of master and slave readily invert themselves. The master is dominated by his need for the slave’s subordination; the possession of subordinates defines his mastery. As Brooks’s poem implies, each society reflects its own identity through an opposing “they,” in a dualism of civilized/barbaric. The instability of the speaker’s position in this poem (is he or she among the conquerors or the conquered?) is a model of the instability of roles throughout the human world. There is no transcendent ground—except on another planet, perhaps—from which to measure the relative positions of the polar opposites on Earth. Roland Barthes (1915–80) and others, influenced by the radical movements of the 1960s and the increasing complexity of culture in an era of mass consumerism and global media, extended structuralism into more profoundly relativist perspectives.

Poststructuralism is the broad term used to designate the philosophical position that attacks the objective, universalizing claims of most fields of knowledge since the eighteenth century. Poststructuralists, distrusting the optimism of a positivist philosophy that suggests the world is knowable and explainable, ultimately doubt the possibility of certainties of any kind, since language signifies only through a chain of other words rather than through any fundamental link to reality. This argument derives from structuralism, yet it also criticizes structuralist universalism and avoidance of political issues. Ideology is a key conceptual ingredient in the poststructuralist argument against structuralism. Ideology is a slippery term that can broadly be defined as a socially shared set of ideas that shape behavior; often it refers to the values that legitimate the ruling interests in a society, and in many accounts it is the hidden code that is officially denied. (We discuss kinds of “ideological” criticism later.) Poststructuralist theory has played a part in a number of critical schools introduced below, not all of them focused on the text. But in literary criticism, poststructuralism has marshaled most forces under the banner of deconstruction.

Deconstruction

Deconstruction insists on the logical impossibility of knowledge that is not influenced or biased by the words used to express it. Deconstruction also claims that language is incapable of representing any sort of reality directly. As practiced by its most famous proponent, the French philosopher Jacques Derrida (1930–2004), deconstruction endeavors to trace the way texts imply the contradiction of their explicit meanings. The deconstructionist delights in the sense of dizziness as the grounds of conviction crumble away; aporia, or irresolvable doubt, is the desired, if fleeting, end of an encounter with a text. Deconstruction threatens humanism, or the worldview that is centered on human values and the self-sufficient individual, because it denies that there is an ultimate, solid reality on which to base truth or the identity of the self. All values and identities are constructed by the competing systems of meaning, or discourses. This is a remarkably influential set of ideas that you will meet again as we discuss other approaches.

The traditional concept of the author as creative origin of the text comes under fire in deconstructionist criticism, which emphasizes instead the creative power of language or the text, and the ingenious work of the critic in detecting gaps and contradictions in writing. Thus, like New Criticism, deconstruction disregards the author and concentrates on textual close reading, but unlike New Criticism, it features the role of the reader as well. Moreover, the text need not be respected as a pure and coherent icon. Deconstructionists might “read” many kinds of writing and representation in other media in much the same way that they might read Milton’s Paradise Lost, that is, irreverently. Indeed, when deconstruction erupted in university departments of literature, traditional critics and scholars feared the breakdown of the distinctions between literature and criticism and between literature and many other kinds of texts. Many attacks on literary theory have particularly lambasted deconstructionists for apparently rejecting all the reasons to care about literature in the first place and for writing in a style so flamboyantly obscure that no one but specialists can understand. Yet in practice Derrida and others have carried harmony before them, to paraphrase Brooks; their readings can delight in the play of figurative language, thereby enhancing rather than debunking the value of literature.

A deconstructionist might read “First Fight. Then Fiddle.” in a manner somewhat similar to the New Critic’s, but with even more focus on puns and paradoxes and on the poem’s resistance to organic unity. For instance, the two alliterative commands, “fight” and “fiddle,” might be opposites, twins, or inseparable consequences of each other. The word “fiddle” is tricky. Does it suggest that art is trivial? Does it allude to a dictator who “fiddles while Rome burns,” as the saying goes? Someone who “fiddles” is not performing a grand, honest, or even competent act: One fiddles with a hobby, with the books, with car keys in the dark. The artist in this poem defies the orthodoxy of the sonnet form, instead making a kind of harlequin patchwork out of different traditions, breaking the rhythm, intermixing endearments and assaults.

To the deconstructionist the recurring broken antitheses of war and art, art and war cancel each other out. The very metaphors undermine the speaker's summons to war. The command "Be deaf to music and to beauty blind," which takes the form of a chiasmus, or X-shaped sequence (adjective, noun; noun, adjective), is a kind of miniature version of this chiasmic poem. (We are supposed to follow a sequence, fight then fiddle, but instead reverse that by imagining ways to do violence with art or to create beauty through destruction.) The poem, a lyric written but imagined as spoken or sung, puts the senses and the arts under erasure; we are somehow not to hear music (by definition audible), not to see beauty (here a visual attribute). "Maybe not too late" comes rather too late: At the end of the poem it will be too late to start over, although "having first to civilize a space / Wherein to play your violin with grace" (lines 12–14) comes across as a kind of beginning. These comforting lines form the only heroic couplet in the poem, the only two lines that run smoothly from end to end. (All the other lines have caesuras, enjambments, or balanced pairs of concepts, as in "from malice and from murdering" [8].) But the violence behind "civilize," the switch to the high-art term "violin," and the use of the Christian term "grace" suggest that the pagan erotic art promised at the outset, the "sorcery" of "hurting love" that can "bewitch," will be suppressed.

Like other formalisms, deconstruction can appear apolitical or conservative because of its skepticism about the referential connection between literature and the world of economics, politics, and other social forms. Yet poststructuralist linguistics provides a theory of difference that clearly pertains to the rankings of status and power in society, as in earlier examples of masculine/feminine, master/slave. The Other, the negative of the norm, is always less than an equal counterpart. Deconstruction has been a tool for various poststructuralist thinkers—including the historian Michel Foucault (1926–84), the feminist theorist and psychoanalyst Julia Kristeva (b. 1941), and the psychoanalytic theorist Jacques Lacan (1901–81).

Narrative Theory

Before concluding the discussion of text-centered approaches, we should mention the schools of narratology and narrative theory that have shaped study of the novel and other kinds of narrative. Criticism of fiction has been in a boom period since the 1950s, but the varieties of narrative theory per se have had more limited effect than the approaches we have discussed above. Since the 1960s different analysts of the forms and techniques of narrative, most notably the Chicago formalists and the structuralist narratologists, have developed terminology for the various interactions of author, implied author, narrator, and characters; of plot and the treatment of time in the selection and sequence of scenes; of voice, point of view, or focus and other aspects of fiction. As formalisms, narrative theories tend to exclude the author's biography, individual reader response, and the historical context of the work or its actual reception.

Narratology began by presenting itself as a structuralist science; its branches have grown from psychoanalytic theory or extended to reader-response criticism.

In recent decades studies of narrative technique and form have responded to Marxist, feminist, and other ideological criticism that insists on the political contexts of literature. One important influence on this shift has been the revival of the work of the Russian literary theorist Mikhail Bakhtin (1895–1975), which considers the novel as a dialogic form that pulls together the many discourses and voices of a culture and its history. Part of the appeal of Bakhtin's work has been the fusion of textual close reading with attention to material factors such as economics and class, and a sense of the open-endedness and contradictoriness of writing (in the spirit of deconstruction more than of New Criticism). Like other Marxist-trained European formalists, Bakhtin sought to place the complex literary modes of communication in the light of politics and history.

EMPHASIS ON THE SOURCE

As the examples above suggest, a great deal can be drawn from a text without any reference to its source or its author. For millennia many anonymous works were shared in oral or manuscript form, and even after printing spread in Europe few thought it necessary to know the author's name or anything about him or her. Yet criticism from its beginnings in ancient Greece has been interested in the designing intention "behind" the text. Even when no evidence remained about the author, a legendary personality has sometimes been invented to satisfy readers' curiosity. From the legend of blind Homer to the latest debates about biographical evidence and portraits of William Shakespeare, literary criticism has been accompanied by interest in the author's life.

Biographical Criticism

This approach reached its height in an era when humanism prevailed in literary studies (roughly the 1750s to the 1960s). At this time there was widely shared confidence in the ideas that art and literature were the direct expressions of the artist's or writer's genius and that criticism of great works supported veneration of the great persons who created them. The lives of some famous writers became the models that aspiring writers emulated. Criticism at times was skewed by social judgments of personalities, as when John Keats was put down as a "Cockney" poet, that is, London-bred and lower-class. Many writers have struggled to get their work taken seriously because of mistaken biographical criticism. Women or minorities have at times used pseudonyms or published anonymously to avoid having their work put down or having it read only through the expectations, negative or positive, of what a woman or person of color might write. Biographical criticism can be diminishing in this respect. Others have objected to reading literature as a reflection of the author's personality. Such critics have supported the idea that the highest literary art is pure form, untouched by gossip or personal emotion. In this spirit some early twentieth-century critics as well as Modernist writers such as T. S. Eliot, James Joyce, and Virginia Woolf tried to dissociate the text from the personality or political commitments of the author. (The theories of these writers and their actual practices did not always coincide.)

In the early twentieth century, psychoanalytic interpretations placed the text in light of the author's emotional conflicts, and other interpretations relied heavily on the author's stated intentions. (Although psychoanalytic criticism entails more than analysis of the author, we will introduce it as an approach that primarily concerns the human source[s] of literature; it usually has less to say about the form and receiver of the text.) Author-based readings can be reductive. All the accessible information about a writer's life cannot definitively explain the writings. As a young man D. H. Lawrence might have hated his father and loved his mother, but all men who hate their fathers and love their mothers do not write fiction as powerful as Lawrence's. Indeed, Lawrence himself cautioned that we should "trust the tale, not the teller."

Any kind of criticism benefits to some extent, however, from being informed by knowledge of the writer's life and career. Certain critical approaches, devoted to recognition of separate literary traditions, make sense only in light of supporting biographical evidence. Studies that concern traditions such as Irish literature, Asian American literature, or literature by Southern women require reliable information about the writers' birth and upbringing and even some judgment of the writers' intentions to write as members of such traditions. (We discuss feminist, African American, and other studies of distinct literatures in the "Historical and Ideological Criticism" section that follows, although such studies recognize the biographical "source" as a starting point.)

A reading of "First Fight. Then Fiddle." can become rather different when we know more about Gwendolyn Brooks. An African American, she was raised in Chicago in the 1920s. These facts begin to provide a context for her work. Some of the biographical information has more to do with her time and place than with her race and sex. Brooks began in the 1940s to associate with Harriet Monroe's magazine, Poetry, which had been influential in promoting Modernist poetry. Brooks early received acclaim for books of poetry that depict the everyday lives of poor, urban African Americans; in 1950 she was the first African American to win a Pulitzer Prize. In 1967 she became an outspoken advocate for the Black Arts movement, which promoted a separate tradition rather than integration into the aesthetic mainstream. But even before this political commitment, her work never sought to "pass" or to distance itself from the reality of racial difference, nor did it become any less concerned with poetic tradition and form when she published it through small, independent black presses in her "political" phase.

It is reasonable, then, to read "First Fight. Then Fiddle.," published in 1949, in relation to the role of a racial outsider mastering and adapting the forms of a dominant tradition. Perhaps Brooks's speaker addresses an African American audience in the voice of a revolutionary, calling for violence to gain the right to express African American culture. Perhaps the lines "the music that they wrote / Bewitch, bewilder. Qualify to sing / Threadwise" (lines 3–5) suggest the way that the colonized may transform the empire's music rather than the other way around. Ten years before the poem was published, a famous African American singer, Marian Anderson, had more than "qualif[ied] to sing" opera and classical concert music, but had still encountered the color barrier in the United States. Honored throughout Europe as the greatest living contralto, Anderson was barred in 1939 from performing at Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C., because of her race. Instead she performed at the Lincoln Memorial on Easter Sunday to an audience of seventy-five thousand people. It was not easy to find a "space" in which to practice her art. Such a contextual reference, whether or not intended, relates biographically to Brooks's role as an African American woman wisely reweaving classical traditions "threadwise" rather than straining them into "hempen" (5) ropes. Beneath the manifest reference to the recent world war, this poem refers to the segregation of the arts in America. (Questions of source and historical context often interrelate.)

Besides readings that derive from biographical and historical information, there are still other ways to read aspects of the source rather than the text or the receiver. The source of the work extends beyond the life of the person who wrote it to include not only the writer's other works but also the circumstances of contemporary publishing; contemporary literary movements; the history of the composition, editing, and publication of this particular text, with all the variations; and other contributing factors. While entire schools of literary scholarship have been devoted to each of these matters, any analyst of a particular work should bear in mind what is known about the circumstances of writers at that time, the material conditions of the work's first publication, and the means of dissemination ever since. It makes a difference in our interpretation to know that a certain sonnet circulated in manuscript in a small courtly audience or that a particular novel was serialized in a weekly journal cheap enough for the masses to read it.

Psychoanalytic Criticism

With the development of psychology and psychoanalysis toward the end of the nineteenth century, many critics were tempted to apply psychological theories to literary analysis. Symbolism, dreamlike imagery, emotional rather than rational logic, and a pleasure in language all suggested that literature profoundly evoked a mental and emotional landscape, often one of disorder or abnormality. From mad poets to patients speaking in verse, imaginative literature might be regarded as a representation of shared irrational structures within all psyches (i.e., souls) or selves. While psychoanalytic approaches have developed along with structuralism and poststructuralist linguistics and philosophy, they rarely focus on textual form. Rather, they attribute latent or hidden meaning to unacknowledged desires in some person, usually the author or source behind the character in a narrative or drama. A psychoanalytic critic can also focus on the response of readers and, in recent decades, usually accepts the influence of changing social history on the structures of sexual desire represented in the work. Nevertheless, psychoanalysis has typically aspired to a universal, unchanging theory of the mind and personality, and criticism that applies it has tended to emphasize the authorial source.

FREUDIAN CRITICISM

For most of the twentieth century, the dominant school of psychoanalytic critics was the Freudian, based on the work of Sigmund Freud (1856–1939). Many of its practitioners assert that the meaning of a literary work exists not on its surface but in the psyche (some would even claim, in the neuroses) of the author. Classic psychoanalytic criticism read works as though they were the recorded dreams of patients; interpreted the life histories of authors as keys to the works; or analyzed characters as though they, like real people, have a set of repressed childhood memories. (In fact, many novels and most plays leave out information about characters' development from infancy through adolescence, the period that psychoanalysis especially strives to reconstruct.)

A well-known Freudian reading of Hamlet, for example, insists that Hamlet suffers from an Oedipus complex, a Freudian term for a group of repressed desires and memories that corresponds with the Greek myth that is the basis of Sophocles's play Oedipus the King. In this view Hamlet envies his uncle because the son unconsciously wants to sleep with his mother, who was the first object of his desire as a baby. The ghost of Hamlet Sr. may then be a manifestation of Hamlet's unconscious desire or of his guilt for wanting to kill his father, the person who has a right to the desired mother's body. Hamlet's madness is not just acting but the result of this frustrated desire; his cruel mistreatment of Ophelia is a deflection of his disgust at his mother's being "unfaithful" in her love for him. Some Freudian critics stress the author's psyche and so might read Hamlet as the expression of Shakespeare's own Oedipus complex. In another mode psychoanalytic critics, reading imaginative literature as symbolic fulfillment of unconscious wishes much as an analyst would interpret a dream, look for objects, spaces, or actions that appear to relate to sexual anatomy or activity. Much as if tracing out the extended metaphors of an erotic poem by John Donne or a blues or Motown lyric, the Freudian reads containers, empty spaces, or bodies of water as female; tools, weapons, towers or trees, trains or planes as male.

JUNGIAN AND MYTH CRITICISM

Just as a Freudian assumes that all human psyches have similar histories and structures, the Jungian critic assumes that we all share a universal or collective unconscious (just as each has a racial and an individual unconscious). According to Carl Gustav Jung (1875–1961) and his followers, the unconscious harbors universal patterns and forms of human experiences, or archetypes. We can never know these archetypes directly, but they surface in art in an imperfect, shadowy way, taking the form of archetypes—the snake with its tail in its mouth, rebirth, the mother, the double, the descent into hell. In the classic quest narrative, the hero struggles to free himself (the gender of the pronoun is significant) from the Great Mother to become a separate, self-sufficient being (combating a demonic antagonist), surviving trials to gain the reward of union with his ideal other, the feminine anima. In a related school of archetypal criticism, influenced by Northrop Frye (1912–91), the prevailing myth follows a seasonal cycle of death and rebirth. Frye proposed a system for literary criticism that classified all literary forms in all ages according to a cycle of genres associated with the phases of human experience from birth to death and the natural cycle of seasons (e.g., Spring/Romance).

These approaches have been useful in the study of folklore and early literatures as well as in comparative studies of various national literatures. While most myth critics focus on the hero's quest, there have been forays into feminist archetypal criticism. These emphasize variations on the myths of Isis and Demeter, goddesses of fertility or seasonal renewal, who take different forms to restore either the sacrificed woman (Persephone's season in the underworld) or the sacrificed man (Isis's search for Osiris and her rescue of their son, Horus). Many twentieth-century poets were drawn to the heritage of archetypes and myths. Adrienne Rich's "Diving into the Wreck," for example, self-consciously rewrites a number of gendered archetypes, with a female protagonist on a quest into a submerged world.

Most critics today, influenced by poststructuralism, have become wary of universal patterns. Like structuralists, Jungians and archetypal critics strive to compare and unite the ages and peoples of the world and to reveal fundamental truths. Rich, as a feminist poet, suggests that the "book of myths" is an eclectic anthology that needs to be revised. Claims of universality tend to obscure the detailed differences among cultures and often appeal to some idea of biological determinism.

Such determinism diminishes the power of individuals to design alternative life patterns and even implies that no literature can really surprise us.

LACANIAN CRITICISM

As it has absorbed the indeterminacies of poststructuralism under the influence of thinkers such as Jacques Lacan and Julia Kristeva, psychological criticism has become increasingly complex. Few critics today are direct Freudian analysts of authors or texts, and few maintain that universal archetypes explain the meaning of a tree or water in a text. Yet psychoanalytic theory continues to inform many varieties of criticism, and most new work in this field is affiliated with Lacanian psychoanalysis. Lacan's theory unites poststructuralist linguistics with Freudian theory. The Lacanian critic, like a deconstructionist, focuses on the text that defies conscious authorial control, foregrounding the powerful interpretation of the critic rather than the author or any other reader. Accepting the Oedipal paradigm and the unconscious as the realm of repressed desire, Lacanian theory aligns the development and structure of the individual human subject with the development and structure of language. To simplify a purposefully dense theory: The very young infant inhabits the Imaginary, in a preverbal, undifferentiated phase dominated by a sense of union with the Mother. Recognition of identity begins with the Mirror Stage, ironically with a disruption of a sense of oneness. For when one first looks into a mirror, one begins to recognize a split or difference between one's body and the image in the mirror. This splitting prefigures a sense that the object of desire is Other and distinct from the subject. With difference or the splitting of subject and object comes language and entry into the Symbolic Order, since we use words to summon the absent object of desire (as a child would cry "Mama" to bring her back). But what language signifies most is the lack of that object. The imaginary, perfectly nurturing Mother would never need to be called.

As in the biblical Genesis, the Lacanian "genesis" of the subject tells of a loss of paradise through knowledge of the difference between subject and object or Man and Woman (eating of the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil leads to the sense of shame that teaches Adam and Eve to hide their nakedness). In Lacanian theory the Father governs language or the Symbolic Order; the Word spells the end of a child's sense of oneness with the Mother. Further, the Father's power claims omnipotence, the possession of male prerogative symbolized by the Phallus, which is not the anatomical difference between men and women but the idea or construction of that difference. Thus it is language or culture rather than nature that generates the difference and inequality between the sexes. Some feminist theorists have adopted aspects of Lacanian psychoanalytic theory, particularly the concept of the gaze. This concept notes that the masculine subject is the one who looks, whereas the feminine object is to be looked at.

Another influential concept is abjection. The Franco-Bulgarian psychoanalyst Julia Kristeva's theory of abjection most simply reimagines the infant's blissful sense of union with the mother and the darker side of such possible union. To return to the mother's body would be death, as metaphorically we are buried in Mother Earth. Yet according to the theory, people both desire and dread such loss of boundaries. A sense of self or subjectivity and hence of independence and power depends on resisting abjection. The association of the maternal body with abjection or with the powerlessness symbolized by the female's Lack of the Phallus can help explain negative cultural images of women. Many narrative genres seem to split the images of women between an angelic and a witchlike type. Lacanian or Kristevan theory has been well adapted to film criticism and to fantasy and other popular forms favored by structuralism or archetypal criticism.

Psychoanalytic literary criticism today—as distinct from specialized discussion of Lacanian theory, for example—treads more lightly than in the past. In James Joyce's "Araby," a young Dublin boy, orphaned and raised by an aunt and uncle, likes to haunt a back room in the house; there the "former tenant, . . . a priest, had died" (par. 2). (Disused rooms at the margins of houses resemble the unconscious, and a dead celibate "father" suggests a kind of failure of the Law, conscience, or in Freudian terms, superego.) The priest had left behind a "rusty bicycle-pump" in the "wild garden" with "a central apple tree" (these echoes of the garden of Eden suggesting the impotence of Catholic religious symbolism). The boy seems to gain consciousness of a separate self—or his subjectivity is constructed—through his gaze upon an idealized female object, Mangan's sister, whose "name was like a summons to all my foolish blood" (par. 4). Though he secretly watches and follows her, she is not so much a sexual fantasy as a beautiful art object (par. 9). He retreats to the back room to think of her in a kind of ecstasy that resembles masturbation. Yet it is not masturbation: It is preadolescent, dispersed through all orifices—the rain feels like "incessant needles . . . playing in the sodden beds"; and it is sublimated, that is, repressed and redirected into artistic or religious forms rather than directly expressed by bodily pleasure: "All my senses seemed to desire to veil themselves" (par. 6).

It is not in the back room but on the street that the girl finally speaks to the hero, charging him to go on a quest to Araby. After several trials the hero carrying the talisman arrives in a darkened hall "girdled at half its height by a gallery," an underworld or maternal space that is also a deserted temple (par. 25). The story ends without his grasping the prize to carry back, the "chalice" or holy grail (symbolic of female sexuality) that he had once thought to bear "safely through a throng of foes" (par. 5).

Such a reading seems likely to raise objections that it is overreading: You're seeing too much in it; the author didn't mean that. This has been a popular reaction to psychoanalysis for over a hundred years, but it is only a heightened version of a response to many kinds of criticism. This sample reading pays close attention to the text, but does not really follow a formal approach because its goal is to explain the psychological implications or resonance of the story's details. We have mentioned nothing about the author, though we could have used this reading to forward a psychoanalytic reading of Joyce's biography.

EMPHASIS ON THE RECEIVER

In some sense critical schools develop in reaction to the excesses of other critical schools. By the 1970s, in a time of political upheaval that placed a high value on individual expression, a number of critics felt that the various routes toward objective criticism had proved to be dead ends. New Critics, structuralists, and psychoanalytic or myth critics had sought objective, scientific systems that disregarded changing times, political issues, or the reader's personal response. New Critics and other formalists tended to value a literary canon made up of works that were regarded as complete, unchanging objects to be interpreted according to ostensibly timeless standards.

Reader-Response Criticism

Among critics who challenge New Critical assumptions, reader-response critics regard the work not as what is printed on the page but as what is experienced temporally through each act of reading. According to such critics, the reader effectively performs the text into existence the way a musician performs music from a score. Reader-response critics ask not what a work means but what a work does to and through a reader. Literary texts especially leave gaps that experienced readers fill according to expectations or conventions. Individual readers differ, of course, and gaps in a text provide space for different readings or interpretations. Some of these lacunae are temporary—such as the withholding of the murderer's name until the end of a mystery novel—and are closed by the text sooner or later, though each reader will in the meantime fill them differently. But other lacunae are permanent and can never be filled with certainty; they result in a degree of uncertainty or indeterminacy in the text.

The reader-response critic observes the expectations aroused by a text, how they are satisfied or modified, and how the reader comprehends the work when all of it has been read, and when it is reread in whole or in part. Such criticism attends to the reading habits associated with different genres and to the shared assumptions of a cultural context that seem to furnish what is left unsaid in the text.

Beyond theoretical formulations about reading, there are other approaches to literary study that concern the receiver rather than the text or source. A critic might examine specific documents of a work's reception, from contemporary reviews to critical essays written across the generations since the work was first published. Sometimes we have available diaries or autobiographical evidence about readers' encounters with particular works. Just as there are histories of publishing and of the book, there are histories of literacy and reading practices. Poetry, fiction, and drama often directly represent the theme of reading as well as writing. Many published works over the centuries have debated the benefits and perils of reading works such as sermons or novels. Different genres and particular works construct different classes or kinds of readers in the way they address them or supply what they are supposed to want. Some scholars have found quantitative measures for reading, from sales and library lending rates to questionnaires.

Finally, the role of the reader or receiver in the literary exchange has been portrayed from a political perspective. Literature helps shape social identity, and social status shapes access to different kinds of literature. Feminist critics adapted reader-response criticism, for example, to note that girls often do not identify with many American literary classics as boys do, and thus girls do not simply accept the stereotype of women as angels, temptresses, or scolds who should be abandoned for the sake of all-male adventures. Studies of African American literature and other ethnic literatures have often featured discussion of literacy and of the obstacles for readers who cannot find their counterparts within the texts or who encounter negative stereotypes of their group. Thus, as we will discuss below, most forms of historical and ideological criticism include some consideration of the reader.

HISTORICAL AND IDEOLOGICAL CRITICISM

The approaches to the text, the author, and the reader outlined above may each take some note of historical contexts, including changes in formal conventions, the writer's milieu, or audience expectations. In the nineteenth century, historical criticism took the obvious facts that a work is created in a specific historical and cultural context and that the author is a part of that context as reasons to treat literature as a reflection of society. Twentieth-century formalists rejected the reflectivist model of art in the old historical criticism, that is, the assumption that literature and other arts straightforwardly express the collective spirit of the society at a given time. But as we have remarked, formalist rules for isolating the work of art from social and historical context met resistance in the last decades of the twentieth century. In a revival of historical approaches, critics have replaced the reflectivist model with a constructivist model, whereby literature and other cultural discourses are seen to help construct social relations and roles rather than merely reflect them. In other words, art is not just the frosting on the cake but an integral part of the recipe's ingredients and instructions. A society's ideology, its system of representations (ideas, myths, images), is inscribed in literature and other cultural forms, which in turn help shape identities and social practices.

Since the 1980s, historical approaches have regained great influence in literary studies. Some critical schools have been insistently materialist, that is, seeking causes more in concrete conditions such as technology, production, and distribution of wealth. Such criticism usually owes an acknowledged debt to Marxism. Other historical approaches have been influenced to a degree by Marxist critics and cultural theorists, but work within the realm of ideology, textual production, and interpretation, using some of the methods and concerns of traditional literary history. Still others emerge from the civil rights movement and the struggles for recognition of women and racial, ethnic, and sexual constituencies.

Feminist studies, African American studies, gay and lesbian studies, and studies of the cultures of different immigrant and ethnic populations within and beyond the United States have each developed along similar theoretical lines. These schools, like Marxist criticism, adopt a constructivist position: Literature is not simply a reflection of prejudices and norms; it also helps define social identities, such as what it means to be an African American woman. Each of these schools has moved through stages of first claiming equality with the literature dominated by white Anglo American men, then affirming the difference of their own separate culture, and then theoretically questioning the terms and standards of such comparisons. At a certain point in the thought process, each group rejects essentialism, the notion of innate or biological bases for the differences between the sexes, races, or other groups. This rejection of essentialism is usually called the constructivist position, in a somewhat different but related sense to our definition above. Constructivism maintains that identity is socially formed rather than biologically determined. Differences of anatomical sex, skin color, first language, parental ethnicity, and eventual sexual preferences have great impact on how one is classified, brought up, and treated socially, and on one's subjectivity or conception of identity. Constructivists maintain that these differences, however, are more constructed by ideology and the resulting behaviors than by any natural programming.

Marxist Criticism

The most insistent and vigorous historical approach through the twentieth century to the present has been Marxism, based on the work of Karl Marx (1818–83). With roots in nineteenth-century historicism, Marxist criticism was initially reflectivist. Economics, the underlying cause of history, was thus the base, and culture, including literature and the other arts, was the superstructure, an outcome or reflection of the base. Viewed from the Marxist perspective, the literary works of a period were economically determined; they would reflect the state of the struggle between classes in any place and time. History enacted recurrent three-step cycles, a pattern that Hegel had defined as dialectic (Hegel was cited above on the interdependence of master and slave). Each socioeconomic phase, or thesis, is counteracted by its antithesis, and the resulting conflict yields a synthesis, which becomes the ensuing thesis, and so on. As with early Freudian criticism, early Marxist criticism was often preoccupied with labeling and exposing illusions or deceptions. A novel might be read as a thinly disguised defense of the power of bourgeois industrial capital; its appeal on behalf of the suffering poor might be dismissed as an effort to fend off class rebellion.

As a rationale for state control of the arts, Marxism was abused in the Soviet Union and in other totalitarian states. In the hands of sophisticated critics, however, Marxism has been richly rewarding. Various schools that unite formal close reading and political analysis developed in the early twentieth century under Soviet communism and under fascism in Europe, often in covert resistance. These schools in turn have influenced critical movements in North America; New Criticism, structuralist linguistics, deconstruction, and narrative theory have each borrowed from European Marxist critics.

Most recently, a new mode of Marxist theory has developed, largely guided by the thinking of Walter Benjamin (1892–1940) and Theodor Adorno (1903–69) of the Frankfurt School in Germany, Louis Althusser (1918–90) in France, and Raymond Williams (1921–98) in Britain. This work has generally tended to modify the base/superstructure distinction and to interrelate public and private life, economics and culture. Newer Marxist interpretation assumes that the relation of a literary work to its historical context is overdetermined—the relation has multiple determining factors rather than a sole cause or aim. This thinking similarly acknowledges that neither the source nor the receiver of the literary interaction is a mere tool or victim of the ruling powers or state. Representation of all kinds, including literature, always has a political dimension, according to this approach; conversely, political and material conditions such as work, money, or institutions depend on representation.

Showing some influence of psychoanalytic and poststructuralist theories, recent Marxist literary studies examine the effects of ideology by focusing on the works' gaps and silences: Ideology may be conveyed in what is repressed or contradicted. In many ways Marxist criticism has adapted to the conditions of consumer rather than industrial capitalism and to global rather than national economies. The worldwide revolution that was to come when the proletariat or working classes overthrew the capitalists has never taken place; in many countries industrial labor has been swallowed up by the service sector, and workers reject the political Left that would seem their most likely ally. Increasingly, Marxist criticism has acknowledged that the audience of literature may be active rather than passive, just as the text and source may be more than straightforward instructions for toeing a given political line. Marxist criticism has been especially successful with the novel, since that genre more than drama or short fiction is capable of representing numerous people from different classes as they develop over a significant amount of time.

Feminist Criticism

Like Marxist criticism and the schools discussed below, feminist criticism derives from a critique of a history of oppression, in this case the history of women's inequality. Feminist criticism has no single founder like Freud or Marx; it has been practiced to some extent since the 1790s, when praise of women's cultural achievements went hand in hand with arguments that women were rational beings deserving equal rights and education. Contemporary feminist criticism emerged from a "second wave" of feminist activism, in the 1960s and 1970s, associated with the civil rights and antiwar movements. One of the first disciplines in which women's activism took root was literary criticism, but feminist theory and women's studies quickly became recognized methods across the disciplines.

Feminist literary studies began by denouncing the misrepresentation of women in literature and affirming the importance of women's writings, before quickly adopting the insights of poststructuralist theory; yet the early strategies continue to have their use. At first, feminist criticism in the 1970s, like early Marxist criticism, regarded literature as a reflection of patriarchal society's sexist base; the demeaning images of women in literature were symptoms of a system that had to be overthrown. Feminist literary studies soon began, however, to claim the equal but distinctive qualities of writings by women and men. Critics such as Elaine Showalter (b. 1941), Sandra M. Gilbert (b. 1936), and Susan Gubar (b. 1944) explored canonical works by women, relying on close reading with some aid from historical and psychoanalytic methods.

Yet by the 1980s it was widely recognized that a New Critical method would leave most of the male-dominated canon intact and most women writers still in obscurity, because many women had written in different genres and styles, on different themes, and for different audiences than had male writers. To affirm the difference of female literary traditions, some feminist studies claimed women's innate or universal affinity for fluidity and cycle rather than solidity and linear progress. Others concentrated on the role of the mother in human psychological development. According to this argument, girls, not having to adopt a gender role different from that of their first object of desire, the mother, grow up with less rigid boundaries of self and a relational rather than judgmental ethic.

The dangers of these intriguing generalizations soon became apparent. If the reasons for women's differences from men were biologically based or were due to universal archetypes, there was no solution to women's oppression, which many cultures worldwide had justified in terms of biological reproduction or archetypes of nature. At this point in the debate, feminist literary studies intersected with poststructuralist linguistic theory in questioning the terms and standards of comparison. French feminist theory, articulated most prominently by Hélène Cixous (b. 1937) and Luce Irigaray (b. 1932), deconstructed the supposed archetypes of gender written into the founding discourses of Western culture. We have seen that deconstruction helps expose the power imbalance in every dualism. Thus man is to woman as culture is to nature or mind is to body, and in each case the second term is held to be inferior or Other. The language and hence the worldview and social formations of our culture, not nature or eternal archetypes, constructed woman as Other. This insight was helpful in avoiding essentialism or biological determinism.

Having reached a theoretical criticism of the terms on which women might claim equality or difference from men in the field of literature, feminist studies also confronted other issues in the 1980s. Deconstructionist readings of gender difference in texts by men as well as women could lose sight of the real world, in which women are paid less and are more likely to be victims of sexual violence. With this in mind, some feminist critics pursued links with Marxist or African American studies; gender roles, like those of class and race, were interdependent systems for registering the material consequences of people's differences. It no longer seemed so easy to say what the term "women" referred to, when the interests of different kinds of women had been opposed to each other. African American women asked if feminism was really their cause, when white women had so long enjoyed power over both men and women of their race. In a classic Marxist view, women allied with men of their class rather than with women of other classes. It became more difficult to make universal claims about women's literature, as the horizon of the college-educated North American feminists expanded to recognize the range of conditions of women and of literature worldwide. Feminist literary studies have continued to consider famous and obscure women writers; the way women and gender are portrayed in writings by men as well as women; feminist issues concerning the text, source, or receiver in any national literature; theoretical and historical questions about the representation of differences such as gender, race, class, and nationality, and the way these differences shape each other.

Gender Studies and Queer Theory

From the 1970s, feminists sought recognition for lesbian writers and lesbian culture, which they felt had been even less visible than male homosexual writers and gay culture. Concurrently, feminist studies abandoned the simple dualism of male/female, part of the very binary logic of patriarchy that seemed to cause the oppression of women. Thus feminists recognized a zone of inquiry, the study of gender, as distinct from historical studies of women, and increasingly they included masculinity as a subject of investigation. As gender studies turned to interpretation of the text in ideological context regardless of the sex or intention of the author, it incorporated the ideas of Michel Foucault's History of Sexuality (1976). Foucault helped show that there was nothing natural, universal, or timeless in the constructions of sexual difference or sexual practices. Foucault also introduced a history of the concept of homosexuality, which had once been regarded in terms of taboo acts and in the later nineteenth century became defined as a disease associated with a personality type. Literary scholars began to study the history of sexuality as a key to the shifts in modern culture that had also shaped literature.

By the 1980s gender had come to be widely regarded as a discourse that imposed binary social norms on human beings' diversity. Theorists such as Donna Haraway (b. 1944) and Judith Butler (b. 1956) insisted further that sex and sexuality have no natural basis; even the anatomical differences are representations from the moment the newborn is put in a pink or blue blanket. Moreover, these theorists claimed that gender and sexuality are performative and malleable positions, enacted in many more than two varieties. From cross-dressing to surgical sex changes, the alternatives chosen by real people have influenced critical theory and generated both writings and literary criticism about those writings. Perhaps biographical and feminist studies face new challenges when identity seems subject to radical change and it is less easy to determine the sex of an author.

Gay and lesbian literary studies have included practices that parallel those of feminist criticism. At times critics identify oppressive or positive representations of homosexuality in works by men or women, gay, lesbian, or straight. At other times critics seek to establish the equivalent stature of a work by a gay or lesbian writer or, because these identities tended to be hidden in the past, to reveal that a writer was gay or lesbian. Again stages of equality and difference have yielded to a questioning of the terms of difference, in this case what has been called queer theory. The field of queer theory hopes to leave everyone guessing rather than to identify gay or lesbian writers, characters, or themes. One of its founding texts, Between Men (1985), by Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick (1950–2009), drew on structuralist insight into desire as well as anthropological models of kinship to show that, in canonical works of English literature, male characters form “homosocial” (versus homosexual) bonds through their rivalry for and exchange of a woman. Queer theory, because it rejects the idea of a fixed identity or innate or essential gender, likes to discover resistance to heterosexuality in unexpected places. Queer theorists value gay writers such as Oscar Wilde, but they also find queer implications regardless of the author’s acknowledged identity. This approach emphasizes not the surface signals of the text but the subtler meanings an audience or receiver might detect. It encompasses elaborate close reading of many varieties of literary work; characteristically, a leading queer theorist, D. A. Miller (b. 1948), has written in loving detail about both Jane Austen and Broadway musicals.

African American and Ethnic Literary Studies

Critics sought to define an African American literary tradition as early as the turn of the twentieth century. A period of literary success in the 1920s, known as the Harlem Renaissance, produced some of the first classic essays on writings by African Americans. Criticism and histories of African American literature tended to ignore and dismiss women writers, while feminist literary histories, guided by Virginia Woolf’s classic A Room of One’s Own (1929), neglected women writers of color. Only after feminist critics began to succeed in the academy and African American studies programs were established did the whiteness of feminist studies and the masculinity of African American studies become glaring; both fields have for some time corrected this narrowness of vision, in part by learning from each other. The study of African American literature followed the general pattern that we have noted, first striving to claim equality, on established aesthetic grounds, of works such as Ralph Ellison’s magnificent Invisible Man (1952). Then in the 1960s the Black Arts or Black Aesthetic emerged. Once launched in the academy, however, African American studies has been devoted less to celebrating an essential racial difference than to tracing the historical construction of a racial Other and a subordinated literature. The field sought to recover neglected genres such as slave narratives and traced common elements in fiction or poetry to the conditions of slavery and segregation. By the 1980s, feminist and poststructuralist theory had an impact in the work of some African American critics such as Henry Louis Gates Jr. (b. 1950), Houston A. Baker Jr. (b. 1943), and Hazel V. Carby (b. 1948), while others objected that the doubts raised by “theory” stood in the way of political commitment. African Americans’ cultural contributions to America have gained much more recognition than before. New histories of American culture have been written with the view that racism is not an aberration but inherent to the guiding narratives of national progress. Many critics now regard race as a discourse with only slight basis in genetics but with weighty investments in ideology. This poststructuralist position coexists with scholarship that takes into account the race of the author or reader or that focuses on African American characters or themes.

In recent years a series of fields has arisen in recognition of the literatures of other American ethnic groups, large and small: Asian Americans, Native Americans, Latinos, and Chicanos. Increasingly, such studies avoid romanticizing an original, pure culture or assuming that these literatures by their very nature undermine the values and power of the dominant culture. Instead, critics emphasize the hybridity of all cultures in a global economy. The contact and intermixture of cultures across geographical borders and languages (translations, “creole” speech made up of native and acquired languages, dialects) may be read as enriching literature and art, despite being caused by economic exploitation. In method and in aim these fields have much in common with African American studies, though each cultural and historical context is very different. Each field deserves the separate study that we cannot offer here.

Not so very long ago, critics might have been charged with a fundamental misunderstanding of the nature of literature if they pursued matters considered the business of sociologists, matters—such as class, race, and gender—that seemed extrinsic to the text. The rise of the above-noted fields has made it standard practice that a critic will address questions about class, race, and gender to place a text, its source, and its reception in historical and ideological context. One brief example might illustrate the way Marxist, feminist, queer, and African American criticism can contribute to a literary reading.

Tennessee Williams's A Streetcar Named Desire was first produced in 1947 and won the Pulitzer Prize in 1948. Part of its acclaim was likely due to its fashionable blend of naturalism and symbolism: The action takes place in a shabby tenement on an otherworldly street, Elysian Fields—in an “atmosphere of decay” laced with “lyricism,” as Williams's stage directions put it (1.1). After the Depression and World War II, American audiences welcomed a turn away from world politics into the psychological core of human sexuality. This turn to ostensibly individual conflict was a kind of alibi for at least two sets of issues that Williams and the middle-class theatergoers in New York and elsewhere sought to avoid. First are racial questions that relate to ones of gender and class: What is the play's attitude to race, and what is Williams's attitude? Biography seems relevant, though not the last word on what the play means. Williams's family had included slaveholding cotton growers, and he chose to spend much of his adult life in the South, which he saw as representing a beautiful but dying way of life. He was deeply attached to women in his family who might be models for the brilliant, fragile, cultivated Southern white woman, Blanche DuBois. Blanche (“white” in French), representative of a genteel, feminine past that has gambled, prostituted, dissipated itself, speaks some of the most eloquent lines in the play when she mourns the faded Delta plantation society. Neither the playwright nor his audience wished to deal with segregation in the South, a region that since the Civil War had stagnated as a kind of agricultural working class in relation to the dominant North—which had its racism, too.

The play scarcely notices race. The main characters are white. The cast includes a “Negro Woman” as servant, and a blind Mexican woman who offers artificial flowers to remember the dead, but these figures seem more like props or symbols than fully developed characters. Instead, racial difference is transposed as ethnic and class difference in the story of a working-class Pole intruding into a family clinging to French gentility. Stella warns Blanche that she lives among “heterogeneous types” and that Stanley is “a different species” (1.1). The play thus transfigures contemporary anxieties about miscegenation, as the virile (black) man dominates the ideal white woman and rapes the spirit of the plantation South. A former soldier who works in a factory, Stanley represents as well the defeat of the old, agricultural economy by industrialization.

The second set of issues that neither the playwright nor his audience confronts directly is the disturbance of sexual and gender roles that would in later decades lead to movements for women’s and gay rights. It was well known in New Orleans at least that Williams was gay. In the 1940s he lived with his lover, Pancho Rodriguez y Gonzales, in the French Quarter. Like many homosexual writers in other eras, Williams recasts homosexual desire in heterosexual costume. Blanche, performing femininity with a kind of camp excess, might be a fading queen pursuing and failing to capture younger men. Stanley, hypermasculine, might caricature the object of desire of both men and women as well as the anti-intellectual, brute force in post-war America. His conquest of women (he had “the power and pride of a richly feathered male bird among hens” [1.1]) appears to be biologically determined. By the same token it seems natural that Stanley and his buddies go out to work and that their wives become homemakers in the way now seen as typical of the 1950s. In this world, artists, homosexuals, or unmarried working women like Blanche would be both vulnerable and threatening. Blanche after all has secret pleasures—drinking and sex—that Stanley indulges in openly. Blanche is the one who is taken into custody by the medical establishment, which in this period diagnosed homosexuality as a form of insanity.

New Historicism

Three interrelated schools of historical and ideological criticism have been important innovations in the past two decades. These are part of the swing of the pendulum away from formal analysis of the text and toward historical analysis of context. New historicism has less obvious political commitments than Marxism, feminism, or queer theory, but it shares their interest in the power of discourse to shape ideology. Old historicism, in the 1850s–1950s, confidently told a story of civilization’s progress from the point of view of a Western nation; a historicist critic would offer a close reading of the plays of Shakespeare and then locate them within the prevailing Elizabethan “worldview.” “New Historicism,” labeled in 1982 by Stephen Greenblatt (b. 1943), rejected the technique of plugging samples of a culture into a history of ideas. Influenced by poststructuralist anthropology, New Historicism tried to offer a multilayered impression or “thick description” of a culture at one moment in time, including popular as well as elite forms of representation. As a method, New Historicism belongs with those that deny the unity of the text, defy the authority of the source, and license the receiver—much like deconstructionism. Accordingly, New Historicism doubts the accessibility of the past, insisting that all we have is discourse. One model for New Historicism was the historiography of Michel Foucault, who insisted on the power of discourses, that is, not only writing but all structuring myths or ideologies that underlie social relations. The New Historicist, like Foucault, is interested in the transition from the external powers of the state and church in the feudal order to modern forms of power. The rule of the modern state and middle-class ideology is enforced insidiously by systems of surveillance and by each individual’s internalization of discipline (not unlike Freud’s idea of the superego).

No longer so “new,” the New Historicists have had a lasting influence on a more narrative and concrete style of criticism even among those who espouse poststructuralist and Marxist theories. A New Historicist article begins with an anecdote, often a description of a public spectacle, and teases out the many contributing causes that brought disparate social elements together in that way. It usually applies techniques of close reading to forms that would not traditionally have received such attention. Although it often concentrates on events several hundred years ago, in some ways it defies historicity, flouting the idea that a complete objective impression of the entire context could ever be achieved.

Cultural Studies

Popular culture often gets major attention in the work of New Historicists. Yet today most studies of popular culture would acknowledge their debt instead to cultural studies, as filtered through the now-defunct Center for Contemporary Cultural Studies, founded in 1964 by Stuart Hall (1932–2014) and others at the University of Birmingham in England. Method, style, and subject matter may be similar in New Historicism and cultural studies: Both attend to historical context, theoretical method, political commitment, and textual analysis. But whereas the American movement shares Foucault’s paranoid view of state domination through discourse, the British school, influenced by Raymond Williams and his concept of “structures of feeling,” emphasizes the possibility that ordinary people, the receivers of cultural forms, may resist dominant ideology. The documents examined in a cultural-studies essay may be recent, such as artifacts of tourism at Shakespeare’s birthplace, rather than sixteenth-century maps. Cultural studies today influences history, sociology, communications and media, and literature departments; its studies may focus on television, film, romance novels, and advertising, or on museums and the art market, sports and stadiums, New Age religious groups, or other forms and practices.

The questions raised by cultural studies would encourage a critic to place a poem like Marge Piercy’s “Barbie Doll” in the context of the history of that toy, a doll whose slender, impossibly long legs, tiptoe feet (not unlike the bound feet of Chinese women of an earlier era), small nose, and torpedo breasts epitomized a 1950s ideal for the female body. A critic influenced by cultural studies might align the poem with other works published around 1973 that express feminist protest concerning cosmetics, body image, consumption, and the objectification of women, while she or he would draw on research into the founding and marketing of Mattel toys. The poem reverses the Sleeping Beauty story: This heroine puts herself into the coffin rather than waking up. The poem omits any hero—Ken?—who would rescue her. “Barbie Doll” protests the pressure a girl feels to fit into a heterosexual plot of romance and marriage; no one will buy her if she is not the right toy or accessory.

Indeed, accessories such as “GE stoves and irons” (line 3) taught girls to plan their lives as domestic consumers, and Barbie’s lifestyle is decidedly middle-class and suburban (everyone has a house, car, pool, and lots of handbags). The whiteness of the typical “girlchild” (1) goes without saying. Although Mattel produced Barbie’s African American friend, Christie, in 1968, Piercy’s title makes the reader imagine Barbie, not Christie. In 1997 Mattel issued Share a Smile Becky, a friend in a wheelchair, as though in answer to the humiliation of the girl in Piercy’s poem, who feels so deformed, in spite of her “strong arms and back, / abundant sexual drive and manual dexterity” (8–9), that she finally cripples herself. The icon, in short, responds to changing ideology. Perhaps responding to generations of objections like Piercy's, Barbies over the years have been given feminist career goals, yet women's lives are still plotted according to physical image.

In this manner a popular product might be "read" alongside a literary work. The approach would be influenced by Marxist, feminist, gender, and ethnic studies, but it would not be driven by a desire to destroy Barbie as sinister, misogynist propaganda. Piercy's kind of protest against indoctrination has gone out of style. Girls have found ways to respond to such messages and divert them into stories of empowerment. Such at least is the outlook of cultural studies, which usually affirms popular culture. A researcher could gather data on Barbie sales and could interview girls or videotape their play in order to establish the actual effects of the dolls. Whereas traditional anthropology examined non-European or preindustrial cultures, cultural studies may direct its "field work," or ethnographic research, inward, at home. Nevertheless, many contributions to cultural studies rely on methods of textual close reading or Marxist and Freudian literary criticism developed in the mid-twentieth century.

Postcolonial Criticism and Studies of World Literature

In the middle of the twentieth century, the remaining colonies of the European nations struggled toward independence. French-speaking Frantz Fanon (1925–61) of Martinique was one of the most compelling voices for the point of view of the colonized or exploited countries, which like the feminine Other had been objectified and denied the right to look and talk back. Edward Said (1935–2003), in Orientalism (1978), brought a poststructuralist analysis to bear on the history of colonization, illustrating the ways that Western culture feminized and objectified the East. Postcolonial literary studies developed into a distinct field in the 1990s in light of globalization and the replacement of direct colonial power with international corporations and "NGOs" (nongovernmental agencies such as the World Bank). In general this field cannot share the optimism of some cultural studies, given the histories of slavery and economic exploitation of colonies and the violence committed in the name of civilization's progress. Studies by Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak (b. 1942) and Homi K. Bhabha (b. 1949) have further mingled Marxist, feminist, and poststructuralist theory to reread both canonical Western works and the writings of marginalized peoples. Colonial or postcolonial literatures may include works set or published in countries during colonial rule or after independence, or they may feature texts produced in the context of international cultural exchange, such as a novel in English by a woman of Chinese descent writing in Malaysia.

Like feminist studies and studies of African American or other literatures, the field is inspired by recovery of neglected works, redress of a systematic denial of rights and recognition, and increasing realization that the dualisms of opposing groups reveal interdependence. In this field the stage of difference came early, with the celebrations of African heritage known as Négritude, but the danger of that essentialist claim was soon apparent: The Dark Continent or wild island might be romanticized and idealized as a source of innate qualities of vitality long repressed in Enlightened Europe. Currently, most critics accept that the context for literature in all countries is hybrid, with immigration and educational intermixing. Close readings of texts are always linked to the author's biography and literary influences and placed within the context of contemporary international politics as well as colonial history. Many fiction writers, from Salman Rushdie to Jhumpa Lahiri, make the theme of cultural mixture or hybridity part of their work, whether in a pastiche of Charles Dickens or a story of an Indian family growing up in New Jersey and returning as tourists to their supposed “native” land. Poststructuralist theories of trauma, and theories of the interrelation of narrative and memory, provide explanatory frames for interpreting writings from Afghanistan to Zambia.

Studies of postcolonial culture retain a clear political mission that feminist and Marxist criticism have found difficult to sustain. Perhaps this is because the scale of the power relations is so vast, between nations rather than the sexes or classes within those nations. Imperialism can be called an absolute evil, and the destruction of local cultures a crime against humanity. Today some of the most exciting literature in English emerges from countries once under the British Empire, and all the techniques of criticism will be brought to bear on it. If history is any guide, in later decades some critical school will attempt to read the diverse literatures of the early twenty-first century in pure isolation from authorship and national origin, as self-enclosed form. The themes of hybridity, indeterminacy, trauma, and memory will be praised as universal. It is even possible that readers’ continuing desire to revere authors as creative geniuses in control of their meanings will regain respectability among specialists. The elements of the literary exchange—text, source, and receiver—are always there to provoke questions that generate criticism, which in turn produces articulations of the methods of that criticism. It is an ongoing discussion well worth participating in.

Glossary

Boldface words within definitions are themselves defined in the glossary.

action any event or series of events depicted in a literary work; an event may be verbal as well as physical, so that saying something or telling a story within the story may be an event. See also climax, complication, falling action, inciting incident, plot, and rising action.

allegory a literary work in which characters, actions, and even settings have two connected levels of meaning. Elements of the literal level signify (or serve as symbols for) a figurative level that often imparts a lesson or moral to the reader. One of the most famous English-language allegories is John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, in which a character named Christian has to make his way through obstacles such as the Valley of Humiliation to get to the Celestial City.

alliteration the repetition of usually initial consonant sounds through a sequence of words—for example, “While I *n*odded, *n*early *n*apping” in Edgar Allan Poe’s “The Raven.”

allusion a brief, often implicit and indirect reference within a literary text to something outside the text, whether another text (e.g., the Bible, a myth, another literary work, a painting, or a piece of music) or any imaginary or historical person, place, or thing. Many of the footnotes in this book explain allusions found in literary selections.

amphitheater a theater consisting of a stage area surrounded by a semicircle of tiered seats.

analogy like a metaphor, a representation of one thing or idea by something else; in this case, often a simpler explanation that gets at the gist of the more complicated example (e.g., “the brain is like a computer”).

anapestic referring to a metrical form in which each foot consists of two unstressed syllables followed by a stressed one—for example, “There are mán- | y who sáy | that a dóg | has his dáy” (Dylan Thomas, “The Song of the Mischievous Dog”). A single foot of this type is called an anapest.

antagonist a character or a nonhuman force that opposes or is in conflict with the protagonist.

antihero a protagonist who is in one way or another the very opposite of a traditional hero. Instead of being courageous and determined, for instance, an antihero might be timid, hypersensitive, and indecisive to the point of paralysis. Antiheroes are especially common in modern literary works; examples might include the speaker of T. S. Eliot’s “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” or the protagonist of Franz Kafka’s The Metamorphosis.

apostrophe a figure of speech in which a speaker or narrator addresses an abstraction, an object, or a dead or absent person. An example occurs at the end of Melville’s “Bartleby, the Scrivener.” “Ah, Bartleby! Ah, Humanity!”

archetype a character, ritual, symbol, or plot pattern that recurs in the myth and literature of many cultures; examples include the scapegoat or trickster (character type), the rite of passage (ritual), and the quest or descent into the underworld (plot pattern). The term and our contemporary understanding of it derive from the work of psychologist Carl Jung (1875–1961), who argued that archetypes emerge from—and give us a clue to the workings of—the “collective unconscious,” a reservoir of memories and impulses that all humans share but aren’t consciously aware of.

arena stage a stage design in which the audience is seated all the way around the acting area; actors make their entrances and exits through the auditorium.

assonance the repetition of vowel sounds in a sequence of words with different endings—for example, “The death of the poet was kept from his poems” in W. H. Auden’s “In Memory of W. B. Yeats.”

aubade a poem in which the coming of dawn is either celebrated or denounced as a nuisance, as in John Donne’s “The Sun Rising.”

auditor an imaginary listener within a literary work, as opposed to the actual reader or audience outside the work.

author the actual or real author of a work is the historical person who actually wrote it and the focus of biographical criticism, which interprets a work by drawing on facts about the author's life and career. The implied author is the vision of the author's personality and outlook implied by the work as a whole. Thus when we make a claim about the author that relies solely on evidence from the work rather than from other sources, our subject is the implied author; for example, "In Dubliners, James Joyce heavily criticizes the Catholic church."

author time see time.

autobiography see biography.

ballad a verse narrative that is, or originally was, meant to be sung. Ballads were originally a folk creation, transmitted orally from person to person and age to age and characterized by relatively simple diction, meter, and rhyme scheme; by stock imagery; and by repetition; and often by a refrain (a recurrent phrase or series of phrases). An example is "Sir Patrick Spens."

ballad stanza a common stanza form, consisting of a quatrain that alternates four-foot and three-foot lines; lines 1 and 3 are unrhymed iambic tetrameter (four feet), and lines 2 and 4 are rhymed iambic trimeter (three feet), as in "Sir Patrick Spens."

bildungsroman literally, "education novel" (German), a novel that depicts the intellectual, emotional, and moral development of its protagonist from childhood into adulthood; also sometimes called an apprenticeship novel. This type of novel tends to envision character as the product of environment, experience, nurture, and education (in the widest sense) rather than of nature, fate, and so on. Charlotte Brontë's Jane Eyre is a famous example.

biography a work of nonfiction that recounts the life of a real person. If the person depicted in a biography is also its author, then we instead use the term autobiography. An autobiography that focuses only on a specific aspect of, or episode in, its author's life is a memoir.

blank verse the metrical verse form most like everyday human speech; blank verse consists of unrhymed lines in iambic pentameter. Many of Shakespeare's plays are in blank verse, as is John Milton's Paradise Lost and Alfred Tennyson's Ulysses.

caesura a short pause within a line of poetry; often but not always signaled by punctuation. Note the two caesuras in this line from Poe's "The Raven": "Once upon a midnight dreary, while I pondered, weak and weary."

canon the range of works that a consensus of scholars, teachers, and readers of a particular time and culture consider "great" or "major."

carpe diem literally, "seize the day" in Latin, a common theme of literary works that emphasize the brevity of life and the need to make the most of the present. Andrew Marvell's poem "To His Coy Mistress" is a well-known example.

central consciousness a character whose inner thoughts, perceptions, and feelings are revealed by a third-person limited narrator who does not reveal the thoughts, perceptions, or feelings of other characters.

character an imaginary personage who acts, appears, or is referred to in a literary work. Major or main characters are those that receive most attention, minor characters least. Flat characters are relatively simple, have a few dominant traits, and tend to be predictable. Conversely, round characters are complex and multifaceted and act in a way that readers might not expect but accept as possible. Static characters do not change; dynamic characters do. Stock characters represent familiar types that recur frequently in literary works, especially of a particular genre (e.g., the "mad scientist" of horror fiction and film or the fool in Renaissance, especially Shakespearean, drama).

characterization the presentation of a fictional personage. A term like "a good character" can, then, be ambiguous—it may mean that the personage is virtuous or that he or she is well presented regardless of his or her characteristics or moral qualities. In fiction, direct characterization occurs when a narrator explicitly tells us what a character is like. Indirect characterization occurs when a character's traits are revealed implicitly, through his or her speech, behavior, thoughts, appearance, and so on.

chorus a group of actors in a drama who comment on and describe the action. In classical Greek theater, members of the chorus often wore masks and relied on song, dance, and recitation to make their commentary.

classical unities as derived from Aristotle's Poetics, the three principles of structure that require a play to have one plot (unity of action) that occurs in one place (unity of place) and within one day (unity of time); also called the dramatic unities. Susan Glaspell's Trifles and Sophocles's Antigone observe the classical unities.

climax the third part of plot, the point at which the action stops rising and begins falling or reversing; also called turning point or (following Aristotle) peripeteia. See also crisis.

colloquial diction see diction.

comedy a broad category of literary, especially dramatic, works intended primarily to entertain and amuse an audience. Comedies take many different forms, but they share three basic characteristics: (1) the values that are expressed and that typically cause conflict are determined by the general opinion of society (as opposed to being universal and beyond the control of humankind, as in tragedy); (2) characters in comedies are often defined primarily in terms of their social identities and roles and tend to be flat or stock characters rather than highly individualized or round ones; (3) comedies conventionally end happily with an act of social reintegration and celebration such as marriage. William Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream is a famous example.

The term high or verbal comedy may refer either to a particular type of comedy or to a sort of humor found within any literary work that employs subtlety and wit and usually represents high society. Conversely, low or physical comedy is a type of either comedy or humor that involves burlesque, horseplay, and the representation of unrefined life. See also farce.

coming-of-age story see initiation story.

complication in plot, an action or event that introduces a new conflict or intensifies the existing one, especially during the rising action phase of plot.

conclusion also called resolution, the fifth and last phase or part of plot, the point at which the situation that was destabilized at the beginning becomes stable once more and the conflict is resolved.

concrete poetry poetry in which the words on the page are arranged to look like an object; also called shaped verse. George Herbert's "Easter Wings," for example, is arranged to look like two pairs of wings.

conflict a struggle between opposing forces. A conflict is external when it pits a character against something or someone outside himself or herself—another character or characters or something in nature or society. A conflict is internal when the opposing forces are two drives, impulses, or parts of a single character.

connotation what is suggested by a word, apart from what it literally means or how it is defined in the dictionary. See also denotation.

consonance the repetition of certain consonant sounds in close proximity, such as mish-mash. Especially prominent in Middle English poetry, such as Beowulf.

controlling metaphor see metaphor.

convention in literature, a standard or traditional way of presenting or expressing something, or a traditional or characteristic feature of a particular literary genre or subgenre. Division into lines and stanzas is a convention of poetry. Conventions of the type of poem known as the epic include a plot that begins in medias res and frequent use of epithets and extended similes.

cosmic irony see irony.

couplet two consecutive lines of verse linked by rhyme and meter; the meter of a heroic couplet is iambic pentameter.

crisis in plot, the moment when the conflict comes to a head, often requiring the character to make a decision; sometimes the crisis is equated with the climax or turning point and sometimes it is treated as a distinct moment that precedes and prepares for the climax.

criticism see literary criticism.

cycle see sequence.

dactylic referring to the metrical pattern in which each foot consists of a stressed syllable followed by two unstressed ones—for example, "Flashed all their/sábres bare" (Tennyson, "Charge of the Light Brigade"). A single foot of this type is called a dactyl.

denotation a word's direct and literal meaning, as opposed to its connotation.

dénouement literally, "untying" (as of a knot) in French; a plot-related term used in three ways: (1) as a synonym for falling action, (2) as a synonym for conclusion or resolution, and (3) as the label for a phase following the conclusion in which any loose ends are tied up.

destabilizing event see inciting incident.

deus ex machina literally, "god out of the machine" (Latin); any improbable, unprepared-for plot contrivance introduced late in a literary work to resolve the conflict. The term derives from the ancient Greek theatrical practice of using a mechanical device to lower a god or gods onto the stage to resolve the conflicts of the human characters.

dialogue (1) usually, words spoken by characters in a literary work, especially as opposed to words that come directly from the narrator in a work of fiction; (2) more rarely, a literary work that consists mainly or entirely of the speech of two or more characters; examples include Thomas Hardy's poem "The Ruined Maid" and Plato's treatise Republic.

diction choice of words. Diction is often described as either informal or colloquial if it resembles everyday speech, or as formal if it is instead lofty, impersonal, and dignified. Tone is determined largely through diction.

discriminated occasion a specific, discrete moment portrayed in a fictional work, often signaled by phrases such as "At 5:05 in the morning . . .," "It was about dusk, one evening during the supreme madness of the carnival season . . .," or "the day before Maggie fell down. . . ."

drama a literary genre consisting of works in which action is performed and all words are spoken before an audience by an actor or actors impersonating the characters. (Drama typically lacks the narrators and narration found in fiction.) Closet drama, however, is a subgenre of drama that has most of these features yet is intended to be read, either silently by a single reader or out loud in a group setting. Verse drama is drama written in verse rather than prose.

dramatic irony see irony.

dramatic monologue a type or subgenre of poetry in which a speaker addresses a silent auditor or auditors in a specific situation and setting that is revealed entirely through the speaker's words; this kind of poem's primary aim is the revelation of the speaker's personality, views, and values. For example, Alfred Tennyson's "Ulysses" consists of an aged Ulysses's words to the mariners whom he hopes to convince to return to sea with him; most of Robert Browning's best-known poems, such as "My Last Duchess," are dramatic monologues.

dramatic poem a poem structured so as to present a scene or series of scenes, as in a work of drama. See also dramatic monologue.

dramatic unities see classical unities.

dramatis personae literally, "persons of the drama" (Latin); the list of characters that appears either in a play's program or at the top of the first page of the written play.

dynamic character see character.

elegy (1) since the Renaissance, usually a formal lament on the death of a particular person, but focusing mainly on the speaker's efforts to come to terms with his or her grief; (2) more broadly, any lyric in sorrowful mood that takes death as its primary subject. An example is W. H. Auden's "In Memory of W. B. Yeats."

end-stopped line a line of verse that contains or concludes a complete clause and usually ends with a punctuation mark. See also enjambment.

English sonnet see sonnet.

enjambment in poetry, the technique of running over from one line to the next without stop, as in the following lines by William Wordsworth: "My heart leaps up when I behold / A rainbow in the sky." The lines themselves would be described as enjambéd.

epic a long narrative poem that celebrates the achievements of mighty heroes and heroines, usually in founding a nation or developing a culture, and uses elevated language and a grand, high style. Other epic conventions include a beginning in medias res, an invocation of the muse, a journey to the underworld, battle scenes, and a scene in which the hero arms himself for battle. Examples include Beowulf and Homer's Iliad. A mock epic is a form of satire in which epic language and conventions are used to depict characters, actions, and settings utterly unlike those in conventional epics, usually (though not always) with the purpose of ridiculing the social milieu or types of people portrayed in the poem. A famous example is Alexander Pope's The Rape of the Lock.

epigram a very short, usually witty verse with a quick turn at the end.

epigraph a quotation appearing at the beginning of a literary work or of one section of such a work; not to be confused with epigram.

epilogue (1) in fiction, a short section or chapter that comes after the conclusion, tying up loose ends and often describing what happens to the characters after the resolution of the conflict; (2) in drama, a short speech, often addressed directly to the audience, delivered by a character at the end of a play.

epiphany a sudden revelation of truth, often inspired by a seemingly simple or commonplace event. The term, originally from Christian theology, was first popularized by the Irish fiction writer James Joyce, though Joyce also used the term to describe the individual short stories collected in his book Dubliners.

episode a distinct action or series of actions within a plot.

epistolary novel see novel.

epithet a characterizing word or phrase that precedes, follows, or substitutes for the name of a person or thing, such as slain civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., or Zeus, the god of trophies; not to be confused with epitaph. Epics conventionally make frequent use of epithets.

epitaph an inscription on a tombstone or grave marker; not to be confused with epigram, epigraph, or epithet.

eponymous having a name used in the title of a literary work. For example, Lemuel Gulliver is the eponymous protagonist of Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels.

expectation like foreshadowing, a set up for something believed to occur later on in a work of literature.

exposition the first phase or part of plot, which sets the scene, introduces and identifies characters, and establishes the situation at the beginning of a story or play. Additional exposition is often scattered throughout the work.

extended metaphor see metaphor.

external conflict see conflict.

external narration or narrator see narrator.

fable an ancient type of short fiction, in verse or prose, illustrating a moral or satirizing human beings. The characters in a fable are often animals that talk and act like human beings. The fable is sometimes treated as a - specific type of folktale and sometimes as a fictional subgenre in its own right. An example is Aesop's "The Two Crabs."

- fairy tale see tale.
- falling action the fourth of the five phases or parts of plot, in which the conflict or conflicts move toward resolution.
- fantasy a genre of literary work featuring strange settings and characters and often involving magic or the supernatural; though closely related to horror and science fiction, fantasy is typically less concerned with the macabre or with science and technology. J. R. R. Tolkien's The Hobbit is a well-known example.
- farce a literary work, especially drama, characterized by broad humor, wild antics, and often slapstick, pratfalls, or other physical humor. See also comedy.
- fiction any narrative, especially in prose, about invented or imagined characters and action. Today, we tend to divide fiction into three major subgenres based on length—the short story, novella, and novel. Older, originally oral forms of short fiction include the fable, legend, parable, and tale. Fictional works may also be categorized not by their length but by their handling of particular elements such as plot and character. Detective and science fiction, for example, are subgenres that include both novels and novellas such as Frank Herbert's Dune and short stories such as Edgar Allan Poe's "The Murders at the Rue Morgue" or Isaac Asimov's "I, Robot." See also gothic fiction, historical fiction, nonfiction, and romance.
- figurative language language that uses figures of speech.
- figure of speech any word or phrase that creates a "figure" in the mind of the reader by effecting an obvious change in the usual meaning or order of words, by comparing or identifying one thing with another; also called a trope. Metaphor, simile, metonymy, overstatement, oxymoron, and understatement are common figures of speech.
- first-person narrator see narrator.
- flashback a plot-structuring device whereby a scene from the fictional past is inserted into the fictional present or is dramatized out of order.
- flashforward a plot-structuring device whereby a scene from the fictional future is inserted into the fictional present or is dramatized out of order.
- flat character see character.

- foil a character that serves as a contrast to another.
- folktale see tale.
- foot the basic unit of poetic meter, consisting of any of various fixed patterns of one to three stressed and unstressed syllables. A foot may contain more than one word or just one syllable of a multisyllabic word. In scansion, breaks between feet are usually indicated with a vertical line or slash mark, as in the following example (which contains five feet): "One com- | mon note | on ei- | ther lyre | did strike" (Dryden, "To the Memory of Mr. Oldham"). For specific examples of metrical feet, see anapestic, dactylic, iambic, pyrrhic, spondee, and trochaic.
- foreshadowing a hint or clue about what will happen at a later moment in the plot.
- formal diction see diction.
- frame narrative see narrative.
- free verse poetry characterized by varying line lengths, lack of traditional meter, and non-rhyming lines.
- Freytag's pyramid a diagram of plot structure first created by the German novelist and critic Gustav Freytag (1816–95).
- general setting see setting.
- genre a type or category of works sharing particular formal or textual features and conventions; especially used to refer to the largest categories for classifying literature—fiction, poetry, drama, and nonfiction. A smaller division within a genre is usually known as a subgenre, such as gothic fiction or epic poetry.
- gothic fiction a subgenre of fiction conventionally featuring plots that involve secrets, mystery, and the supernatural (or the seemingly supernatural) and large, gloomy, and usually antiquated (especially medieval) buildings as settings. Examples include Horace Walpole's The Castle of Otranto and Edgar Allan Poe's "The Fall of the House of Usher."
- haiku a poetic form, Japanese in origin, that consists of seventeen syllables arranged in three unrhymed lines of five, seven, and five syllables, respectively.
- hero/heroine a character in a literary work, especially the leading male/female character, who is especially virtuous, usually larger than life, sometimes almost godlike. See also antihero, protagonist, and villain.
- heroic couplet see couplet.
- hexameter a line of poetry with six feet: "She comes, | she comes | again, | like ring | dove frayed | and fled" (Keats, The Eve of St. Agnes). See alexandrine.
- high (verbal) comedy see comedy.
- historical fiction a subgenre of fiction, of whatever length, in which the temporal setting, or plot time, is significantly earlier than the time in which the work was written (typically, a period before the birth of the author). Conventionally, such works describe the atmosphere and mores of the setting in vivid detail and explore the influence of historical factors on the characters and action; though focusing mainly on invented or imaginary characters and events, historical fiction sometimes includes some characters and action based on actual historical personages and events. The historical novel is a type of historical fiction pioneered by nineteenth-century Scottish writer Walter Scott in works such as Rob Roy and Ivanhoe.

hyperbole see overstatement. (See also understatement.)

iambic referring to a metrical form in which each foot consists of an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed one; this type of foot is an iamb. The most common poetic meter in English is iambic pentameter—a metrical form in which most lines consist of five iambs: “One cóm- | mon nóte | on éi- | ther lýre | did strike” (Dryden, “To the Memory of Mr. Oldham”).

image/imagery broadly defined, any sensory detail or evocation in a work; more narrowly, the use of figurative language to evoke a feeling, to call to mind an idea, or to describe an object. Imagery may be described as auditory, tactile, visual, or olfactory depending on which sense it primarily appeals to—hearing, touch, vision, or smell. An image is a particular instance of imagery.

implied author see author.

inciting incident an action that sets a plot in motion by creating conflict; also called destabilizing event.

informal diction see diction.

initiation story a kind of short story in which a character—often a child or young person—first learns a significant, usually life-changing truth about the universe, society, people, or himself or herself; also called a coming-of-age story. James Joyce’s “Araby” is a notable example.

in medias res “in the midst of things” (Latin); refers to opening a plot in the middle of the action, and then filling in past details by means of exposition and/or flashback.

interior monologue see monologue.

internal conflict see conflict.

internal narration or narrator see narrator.

intrusive narration or narrator see narrator.

inversion a change in normal syntax such as putting a verb before its subject. Common in poetry, the technique is also famously used by Star Wars’ Yoda, as in “when 900 years old you reach, look as good, you will not.”

irony a situation or statement characterized by a significant difference between what is expected or understood and what actually happens or is meant. Verbal irony occurs when a word or expression in context means something different from, and usually the opposite of, what it appears to mean; when the intended meaning is harshly critical or satiric, verbal irony becomes sarcasm. Situational irony occurs when a character holds a position or has an expectation that is reversed or fulfilled in an unexpected way. When there is instead a gap between what an audience knows and what a character believes or expects, we have dramatic irony; when this occurs in a tragedy, dramatic irony is sometimes called tragic irony. Finally, the terms cosmic irony and irony of fate are sometimes used to refer to situations in which situational irony is the result of fate, chance, the gods, or some other superhuman force or entity.

Italian sonnet see sonnet.

legend a type of tale conventionally set in the real world and in either the present or historical past, based on actual historical people and events and offering an exaggerated or distorted version of the truth about those people and events. American examples might include stories featuring Davy Crockett or Johnny Appleseed or the story about George Washington chopping down the cherry tree. British examples are the legends of King Arthur or Robin Hood.

limerick a light or humorous poem or subgenre of poems consisting of mainly anapestic lines of which the first, second, and fifth are of three feet; the third and fourth lines are of two feet; and the rhyme scheme is aabba.

limited narrator see narrator.

limited point of view see point of view.

lines in a poem, a discrete organization of words; the length and shape of a line can communicate meaning in a poem, and can be a formal element characterizing a poem, such as the fourteen lines that make up a sonnet.

literary criticism the mainly interpretive (versus evaluative) work written by readers of literary texts, especially professional ones (who are thus known as literary critics). It is “criticism” not because it is negative or corrective but rather because those who write criticism ask probing, analytical, “critical” questions about the works they read.

litotes a form of understatement in which one negates the contrary of what one means. Examples from common speech include “Not bad” (meaning “good”) and “a novelist of no small repute” (meaning “a novelist with a big reputation”), and so on.

low (physical) comedy see comedy.

lyric originally, a poem meant to be sung to the accompaniment of a lyre; now, any relatively short poem in which the speaker expresses his or her thoughts and feelings in the first person rather than recounting a narrative or portraying a dramatic situation.

magic realism a type of fiction that involves the creation of a fictional world in which the kind of familiar, plausible action and characters one might find in more straightforwardly realist fiction coexist with utterly fantastic ones straight out of myths or dreams. This style of realism is associated especially with modern Latin American writers such as Gabriel García Márquez and Jorge Luis Borges. But the label is also sometimes applied to works by other contemporary writers from around the world, including Italo Calvino and Salman Rushdie.

metafiction a subgenre of works that playfully draw attention to their status as fiction in order to explore the nature of fiction and the role of authors and readers.

metaphor a figure of speech in which two unlike things are compared implicitly—that is, without the use of a signal such as the word like or as—as in “Love is a rose, but you better not pick it.” See also simile.

An extended metaphor is a detailed and complex metaphor that stretches across a long section of a work. If such a metaphor is so extensive that it dominates or organizes an entire literary work, especially a poem, it is called a controlling metaphor. In Linda Pastan’s “Marks,” for example, the controlling metaphor involves the use of “marks” or grades to talk about the speaker’s performance of her familial roles. A mixed metaphor occurs when two or more usually incompatible metaphors are entangled together so as to become unclear and often unintentionally humorous, as in “Her blazing words dripped all over him.”

meter the more or less regular pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables in a line of poetry. This is determined by the kind of foot (iambic or dactylic, for example) and by the number of feet per line (e.g., five feet = pentameter, six feet = hexameter).

metonymy a figure of speech in which the name of one thing is used to refer to another associated thing. When we say, “The White House has promised to veto the bill,” for example, we use the White House as a metonym for the president and his administration. Synecdoche is a specific type of metonymy.

minor character see character.

mock epic see epic.

monologue (1) a long speech, usually in a play but also in other genres, spoken by one person and uninterrupted by the speech of anyone else, or (2) an entire work consisting of this sort of speech. In fiction, an interior monologue takes place entirely within the mind of a character rather than being spoken aloud. A soliloquy is a particular type of monologue occurring in drama, while a dramatic monologue is a type of poem.

moral a rule of conduct or a maxim for living (that is, a statement about how one should live or behave) communicated in a literary work. Though fables often have morals such as “Don’t count your chickens before they hatch,” more modern literary works instead tend to have themes.

motif a recurrent device, formula, or situation within a literary work. For example, the sound of the breaking harp string is a motif of Anton Chekhov’s play The Cherry Orchard.

motive the animating impulse for an action, the reason why something is done or attempted.

myth (1) originally and narrowly, a narrative explaining how the world and humanity developed into their present form and, unlike a folktale, generally considered to be true by the people who develop it. Many, though not all, myths feature supernatural beings and have a religious significance or function within their culture of origin. Two especially common types of myth are the creation myth, which explains how the world, human beings, a god or gods, or good and evil came to be (e.g., the myth of Adam and Eve), and the explanatory myth, which explains features of the natural landscape or natural processes or events (e.g., “How the Leopard Got His Spots”); (2) more broadly and especially in its adjectival form (mythic), any narrative that obviously seeks to work like a myth in the first and more narrow sense, especially by portraying experiences or conveying truths that it implies are universally valid regardless of culture or time.

narration (1) broadly, the act of telling a story or recounting a narrative; (2) more narrowly, the portions of a narrative attributable to the narrator rather than words spoken by characters (that is, dialogue).

narrative a story, whether fictional or true and in prose or verse, related by a narrator or narrators (rather than acted out onstage, as in drama). A frame narrative is a narrative that recounts and thus “frames” the telling of another narrative or story. An example is Samuel Taylor Coleridge’s “The Rime of the Ancient Mariner,” in which an anonymous third-person narrator recounts how an old sailor comes to tell a young wedding guest the story of his adventures at sea.

narrative poem a poem in which a narrator tells a story.

narrator someone who recounts a narrative or tells a story. Though we usually instead use the term speaker when referring to poetry as opposed to prose fiction, narrative poems include at least one speaker who functions as a narrator. See also narrative.

A narrator or narration is said to be internal when the narrator is a character within the work, telling the story to an equally fictional auditor or listener; internal narrators are usually first- or second-person narrators (see below). A narrator or narration is instead said to be external when the narrator is not a character.

A first-person narrator is an internal narrator who consistently refers to himself or herself using the first-person pronouns I or we. A second-person narrator consistently uses the second-person pronoun you (a very uncommon technique). A third-person narrator uses third-person pronouns such as she, he, they, it, and so on; third-person narrators are almost always external narrators. Third-person narrators are said to be omniscient (literally, “all-knowing”) when they describe the inner thoughts and feelings of multiple characters; they are said to be limited when they relate the thoughts, feelings, and perceptions of only one character (the central consciousness). If a work encourages us to view a narrator’s account of events with suspicion, the narrator (usually first-person) is called unreliable. An intrusive narrator is a third-person narrator who occasionally disrupts his or her narrative to speak directly to the reader or audience in what is sometimes called direct address.

narrator time see time.

nonfiction a work or genre of prose works that describe actual, as opposed to imaginary or fictional, characters and events. Subgenres of nonfiction include biography, memoir, and the essay. See also fiction.

novel a long work of fiction (approximately 40,000+ words), typically published (or at least publishable) as a stand-alone book; though most novels are written in prose, those written as poetry are called verse novels. A novel (as opposed to a short story) conventionally has a complex plot and, often, at least one subplot, as well as a fully realized setting and a relatively large number of characters. One important novelistic subgenre is the epistolary novel—a novel composed entirely of letters written by its characters. Another is the bildungsroman.

novella a work of prose fiction that falls somewhere in between a short story and a novel in terms of length, scope, and complexity. Novellas can be, and have been, published either as books in their own right or as parts of books that include other works. Franz Kafka’s The Metamorphosis is an example.

octameter a line of poetry with eight feet: “Once u- | pon a | midnight | dreary | while I | pondered | weak and | weary.”

octave eight lines of verse linked by a pattern of end rhymes, especially the first eight lines of an Italian, or Petrarchan, sonnet. See also sestet.

ode a lyric poem characterized by a serious topic and formal tone but without a prescribed formal pattern in which the speaker talks about, and often to, an especially revered person or thing. Examples include Keats’s odes and Shelley’s “Ode to the West Wind.”

oeuvre all of the works verifiably written by one author.

omniscient narrator see narrator.

omniscient point of view see point of view.

onomatopoeia a word capturing or approximating the sound of what it describes; buzz is a good example.

orchestra in classical Greek theater, a semi-circular area used mostly for dancing by the chorus.

ottava rima literally, “octave (eighth) rhyme” (Italian); a verse form consisting of eight-line stanzas with an abababcc rhyme scheme and iambic meter (usually pentameter). W. B. Yeats’s “Sailing to Byzantium” is written in ottava rima.

overplot especially in Shakespearean drama, a subplot that resembles the main plot but stresses the political implications of the depicted action and situation.

overstatement exaggerated language; also called hyperbole.

oxymoron a figure of speech that combines two apparently contradictory elements, as in wise fool.

parable a short work of fiction that illustrates an explicit moral but that, unlike a fable, lacks fantastic or anthropomorphic characters. Especially familiar examples are the stories attributed to Jesus in the Bible—about the prodigal son, the good Samaritan, and so on.

parody any work that imitates or spoofs another work or genre for comic effect by exaggerating the style and changing the content of the original; parody is a subgenre of satire. Examples include Scary Movie, which parodies horror films; The Colbert Report, which spoofs conservative talk shows; and Tom Stoppard’s Real Inspector Hound, a parody of detective fiction and drama.

particular setting see setting.

pastoral literature a work or category of works—whether fiction, poetry, drama, or nonfiction—describing and idealizing the simple life of country folk, usually shepherds who live a painless life in a world full of beauty, music, and love. An example is Christopher Marlowe’s “The Passionate Shepherd to His Love.”

pentameter a line of poetry with five feet: “Nuns fret | not at | their con- | vent’s nar- | row room.”

persona the voice or figure of the author who tells and structures the work and who may or may not share the values of the actual author. See also author.

personification a figure of speech that involves treating something nonhuman, such as an abstraction, as if it were a person by endowing it with humanlike qualities, as in “Death entered the room.”

Petrarchan sonnet see sonnet.

plot the arrangement of the action. The five main parts or phases of plot are exposition, rising action, climax or turning point, falling action, and conclusion or resolution. See also subplot, overplot.

plot summary a brief recounting of the principal action of a work of fiction, drama, or narrative poetry, usually in the same order in which the action is recounted in the original work rather than in chronological order.

plot time see time.

poetry one of the three major genres of imaginative literature, which has its origins in music and oral performance and is characterized by controlled patterns of rhythm and syntax (often using meter and rhyme); compression and compactness and an allowance for ambiguity; a particularly concentrated emphasis on the sensual, especially visual and aural, qualities and effects of words and word order; and especially vivid, often figurative language.

point of view the perspective from which people, events, and other details in a work of fiction are viewed; also called focus, though the term point of view usually includes both focus and voice. See narrator.

prop in drama, an object used on the stage.

proscenium arch an arch over the front of a stage; the proscenium serves as a “frame” for the action onstage.

prose the regular form of spoken and written language, measured in sentences rather than lines, as in poetry.

protagonist the most neutral and broadly applicable term for the main character in a work, whether male or female, heroic or not heroic. See also antagonist, antihero, and hero/heroine.

psychological realism see realism.

pyrrhic a rarely used metrical foot consisting of two unstressed syllables.

quatrain a four-line unit of verse, whether an entire poem, a stanza, or a group of four lines linked by a pattern of rhyme (as in an English or Shakespearean sonnet).

reader time see time.

realism (1) generally, the practice in literature, especially fiction and drama, of attempting to describe nature and life as they are without idealization and with attention to detail, especially the everyday life of ordinary people. See also verisimilitude.

Just as notions of how life and nature differ widely across cultures and time periods, however, so do notions of what is “realistic.” Thus, there are many different kinds of realism. Psychological realism refers, broadly, to any literary attempt to accurately represent the workings of the human mind and, more specifically, to the practice of a particular group of late-nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century writers including Joseph Conrad, Henry James, James Joyce, and Virginia Woolf, who developed the stream of consciousness technique of depicting the flow of thought. See also magic realism.

(2) more narrowly and especially when capitalized, a mid- to late-nineteenth-century literary and artistic movement, mainly in the U.S. and Europe, that championed realism in the first, more general sense, rejected what its proponents saw as the elitism and idealism of earlier literature and art, and emphasized settings, situations, action, and (especially middle- and working-class) characters ignored or belittled in earlier literature and art. Writers associated with the movement include Gustave Flaubert and Emile Zola (in France), George Eliot and Thomas Hardy (in Britain), and Theodore Dreiser (in the United States).

resolution see conclusion.

rhetoric the art and scholarly study of effective communication, whether in writing or speech. Many literary terms, especially those for figures of speech, derive from classical and Renaissance rhetoric.

rhyme repetition or correspondence of the terminal sounds of words (“How now, brown cow?”). The most common type, end rhyme, occurs when the last words in two or more lines of a poem rhyme with each other. Internal rhyme occurs when a word within a line of poetry rhymes with another word in the same or adjacent lines, as in “The Dew drew quivering and chill” (Dickinson). An eye rhyme or sight rhyme involves words that don't actually rhyme but look like they do because of their similar spelling ("cough" and "bough"). Off, half, near, or slant rhyme is rhyme that is slightly "off" or only approximate, usually because words' final consonant sounds correspond, but not the vowels that proceed them ("phases" and "houses"). When two syllables rhyme and the last is unstressed or unaccented, they create a feminine rhyme ("ocean" and "motion"); masculine rhyme involves only a single stressed or accented syllable ("cat" and "hat"). See also rhyme scheme.

rhyme scheme the pattern of end rhymes in a poem, often noted by small letters, such as abab or abba.

rhythm the modulation of weak and strong (or stressed and unstressed) elements in the flow of speech. In most poetry written before the twentieth century, rhythm was often expressed in meter; in prose and in free verse, rhythm is present but in a much less predictable and regular manner.

rising action the second of the five phases or parts of plot, in which events complicate the situation that existed at the beginning of a work, intensifying the initial conflict or introducing a new one.

romance (1) originally, a long medieval narrative in verse or prose written in one of the Romance languages (French, Spanish, Italian, etc.) and depicting the quests of knights and other chivalric heroes and the vicissitudes of courtly love; also known as chivalric romance; (2) later and more broadly, any literary work, especially a long work of prose fiction, characterized by a nonrealistic and idealizing use of the imagination; (3) commonly today, works of prose fiction aimed at a mass, primarily female, audience and focusing on love affairs (as in Harlequin Romance).

sarcasm see irony.

satire a literary work—whether fiction, poetry, or drama—that holds up human failings to ridicule and censure. Examples include Jonathan Swift's novel Gulliver's Travels and Stanley Kubrick's film Dr. Strangelove.

scansion the process of analyzing (and sometimes also marking) verse to determine its meter, line by line.

scapegoat in a work of literature, the character or characters that take the blame for others' actions; usually an innocent party or only tangentially responsible, their punishment lets others off the hook.

scene a section or subdivision of a play or narrative that presents continuous action in one specific setting.

second-person narrator see narrator.

sequence (1) the ordering of action in a fictional plot; (2) a closely linked series or cycle of individual literary works, especially short stories or poems, designed to be read or performed together, as in the sonnet sequences of William Shakespeare and Edna St. Vincent Millay.

sestet six lines of verse linked by a pattern of rhyme, as in the last six lines of the Italian, or Petrarchan, sonnet. See also octave.

sestina an elaborate verse structure written in blank verse that consists of six stanzas of six lines each followed by a three-line stanza. The final words of each line in the first stanza appear in variable order in the next five stanzas and are repeated in the middle and at the end of the three lines in the final stanza. Elizabeth Bishop's "Sestina" is an example.

set the design, decoration, and scenery of the stage during a play; not to be confused with setting.

setting the time and place of the action in a work of fiction, poetry, or drama. The spatial setting is the place or places in which action unfolds, the temporal setting is the time. (Temporal setting is thus the same as plot time.) It is sometimes also helpful to distinguish between general setting—the general time and place in which all the action unfolds—and particular settings—the times and places in which individual episodes or scenes take place. The film version of Gone with the Wind, for example, is generally set in Civil War–era Georgia, while its opening scene takes place on the porch of Tara, Scarlett O'Hara's family home, before the war begins.

Shakespearean sonnet see sonnet.

shaped verse see concrete poetry.

short short story see short story.

short story a relatively short work of prose fiction (approximately 500 to 10,000 words) that, according to Edgar Allan Poe, can be read in a single sitting of two hours or less and works to create "a single effect." Two types of short story are the initiation story and the short short story. (Also sometimes called microfiction, a short short story is, as its name suggests, a short story that is especially brief; examples include Linda Brewer's "20/20" and Jamaica Kincaid's "Girl.") simile a figure of speech involving a direct, explicit comparison of one thing to another, usually using the words like or as to draw the connection, as in "My love is like a red, red rose." An analogy is an extended simile. See also metaphor.

situation the basic circumstances depicted in a literary work, especially when the story,

- play, or poem begins or at a specific later moment in the action. In John Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale," for example, the situation involves a man (the speaker) sitting under a tree as he listens to a nightingale's song.
- situational irony see irony.
- skene a low building in the back of the stage area in classical Greek theaters. It represented the palace or temple in front of which the action took place.
- soliloquy a monologue in which the character in a play is alone onstage and thinking out loud, as in the famous Hamlet speech that begins "To be or not to be."
- sonnet a fixed verse form consisting of fourteen lines usually in iambic pentameter. An Italian sonnet consists of eight rhyme-linked lines (an octave) plus six rhyme-linked lines (a sestet), often with either an abbaabba cdecde or abbaabba cdecde rhyme scheme. This type of sonnet is also called the Petrarchan sonnet in honor of the Italian poet Petrarch (1304–74). An English or Shakespearean sonnet instead consists of three quatrains (four-line units) and a couplet and often rhymes abab cdcd efef gg.
- spatial setting see setting.
- speaker (1) the person who is the voice of a poem; (2) anyone who speaks dialogue in a work of fiction, poetry, or drama.
- Spenserian stanza a stanza consisting of eight lines of iambic pentameter (five feet) followed by a ninth line of iambic hexameter (six feet). The rhyme scheme is ababbcbcc. The stanza form takes its name from Edmund Spenser (ca. 1552–99), who used it in The Faerie Queene.
- spondee a metrical foot consisting of a pair of stressed syllables ("Déad sèt").
- stage directions the words in the printed text of a play that inform the director, crew, actors, and readers how to stage, perform, or imagine the play. Stage directions are not spoken aloud and may appear at the beginning of a play, before any scene, or attached to a line of dialogue; they are often set in italics. The place and time of the action, the design of the set itself, and at times the characters' actions or tone of voice are given through stage directions and interpreted by the group of people who put on a performance.
- stanza a section of a poem, marked by extra line spacing before and after, that often has a single pattern of meter and/or rhyme. Conventional stanza forms include ballad stanza, Spenserian stanza, ottava rima, and terza rima. See also verse paragraph.
- static character see character.
- stock character see character.
- stream of consciousness a type of third-person narration that replicates the thought processes of a character without much or any intervention by a narrator. The term was originally coined by the nineteenth-century American psychologist William James (brother of novelist Henry James) to describe the workings of the human mind and only later adopted to describe the type of narration that seeks to replicate this process. The technique is closely associated with twentieth-century fiction writers of psychological realism such as Virginia Woolf, James Joyce, and William Faulkner, who were all heavily influenced by early psychologists such as William James and Sigmund Freud.
- style a distinctive manner of expression; each author's style is expressed through his or her diction, rhythm, imagery, and so on.
- subgenre see genre.
- subplot a secondary plot in a work of fiction or drama. See also overplot and underplot.
- symbol a person, place, thing, or event that figuratively represents or stands for something else. Often the thing or idea represented is more abstract and general, and the symbol is more concrete and particular. A traditional symbol is one that recurs frequently in (and beyond) literature and is thus immediately recognizable to those who belong to a given culture. In Western literature and culture, for example, the rose and snake traditionally symbolize love and evil, respectively. Other symbols such as the scarlet letter in Nathaniel Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter instead accrue their complex meanings only within a particular literary work; these are sometimes called invented symbols.
- symbolic poem a poem in which the use of symbols is so pervasive and internally consistent that the reference to the outside world being symbolized becomes secondary. William Blake's "The Sick Rose" and W. B. Yeats's "Second Coming" are examples.
- synecdoche a type of metonymy in which the part is used to name or stand in for the whole, as when we refer to manual laborers as hands or say wheels to mean a car.
- syntax word order; the way words are put together to form phrases, clauses, and sentences.
- tale a brief narrative with a simple plot and characters, an ancient and originally oral form of storytelling. Unlike fables, tales typically don't convey or state a simple or single moral. An especially common type of tale is the folktale, the conventions of which include a formulaic beginning and ending ("Once upon a time . . .," ". . . And so they lived happily ever after.”); a setting that is not highly particularized in terms of time or place; flat and often stock characters, animal or human; and fairly simple plots. Though the term fairy tale is often and broadly used as a synonym for folktale, it more narrowly and properly designates a specific type of folktale featuring fairies or other fantastic creatures such as pixies or ogres.

temporal setting see setting.

terza rima literally, “third rhyme” (Italian); a verse form consisting of three-line stanzas in which the second line of each stanza rhymes with the first and third of the next. Percy Bysshe Shelley’s “Ode to the West Wind” is written in terza rima.

tetrameter a line of poetry with four feet: “The Grass | divides | as with | a comb” (Dickinson).

theme (1) broadly and commonly, a topic explored in a literary work (e.g., “the value of all life”); (2) more narrowly and properly, the insight about a topic communicated in a work (e.g., “All living things are equally precious”). Most literary works have multiple themes, though some people reserve the term theme for the central or main insight and refer to others as subthemes. Usually, a theme is implicitly communicated by the work as a whole rather than explicitly stated in it, though fables are an exception. See also moral.

thesis the central debatable claim articulated, supported, and developed in an essay or other work of expository prose.

third-person narrator see narrator.

thrust stage a stage design that allows the audience to sit around three sides of the major acting area.

time in literature, at least four potentially quite different time frames are at issue: (1) author time, when the author originally created or published a literary text; (2) narrator time, when the narrator in a work of fiction supposedly narrated the story; (3) plot time, when the action depicted in the work supposedly took place (in other words, the work’s temporal setting); and (4) reader (or audience) time, when an actual reader reads the work or an actual audience sees it performed.

In some cases, author, narrator, plot, and reader time will be roughly the same—as when, for example, in 2008 we read Sherman Alexie’s “Flight Patterns,” a story published in 2003; set some time after September 11, 2001; and presumably narrated not long after the action ends. But in some cases, some or all of these time frames might differ. Walter Scott’s novel Rob Roy, for example, was written and published in the early nineteenth century (1817); this is its author time. But the novel (a work of historical fiction) is set one hundred years earlier (1715); this is its plot time. The novel’s narrator is a character supposedly writing down the story of his youthful adventures in his old age and long after the deaths of many of the principal characters; this is the narrator time. Were you to read the novel today, reader time would be almost two hundred years later than author time and almost three hundred years later than plot time.

tone the attitude a literary work takes toward its subject, especially the way this attitude is revealed through diction.

traditional symbol see symbol.

tragedy a work, especially of drama, in which a character (traditionally a good and noble person of high rank) is brought to a disastrous end in his or her confrontation with a superior force (fortune, the gods, human nature, universal values), but also comes to understand the meaning of his or her deeds and to accept an appropriate punishment. In some cases, the protagonist’s downfall can be direct result of a fatal but common character flaw. Examples include Sophocles’s Antigone, William Shakespeare’s Hamlet, and Wole Soyinka’s Death and the King’s Horseman.

trimeter a line of poetry with three feet: “Little | lamb, who | made thee?” (Blake).

trochaic referring to a metrical form in which the basic foot is a trochee—a metrical foot consisting of a stressed syllable followed by an unstressed one (“Hómer”).

trope see figure of speech.

turning point see climax.

underplot a particular type of subplot, especially in Shakespeare’s plays, that is a parodic or highly romantic version of the main plot. A good example would be the subplot in A Midsummer Night’s Dream that features the character Bottom. See also overplot.

understatement language that makes its point by self-consciously downplaying its real emphasis, as in “Final exams aren’t exactly a walk in the park”; litotes is one form of understatement. See also overstatement.

unity of action see classical unities.

unity of place see classical unities.

unity of time see classical unities.

unlimited point of view see point of view.

unreliable narrator see narrator.

verbal irony see irony.

verisimilitude from the Latin phrase veri similes (“like the truth”); the internal truthfulness, lifelikeness, and consistency of the world created within any literary work when we judge that world on its own terms rather than in terms of its correspondence to the real world. Thus, even a work that contains utterly fantastic or supernatural characters or actions (and doesn't aim at realism) may very well achieve a high degree of verisimilitude.

verse drama see drama.

verse novel see novel.

verse paragraph though sometimes used as a synonym for stanza, this term technically designates passages of verse, often beginning with an indented line, that are unified by topic (as in a prose paragraph) rather than by rhyme or meter.

villain a character who not only opposes the hero or heroine (and is thus an antagonist) but also is characterized as an especially evil person or "bad guy."

villanelle a verse form consisting of nineteen lines divided into six stanzas—five tercets (three-line stanzas) and one quatrain (four-line stanza). The first and third lines of the first tercet rhyme with each other, and this rhyme is repeated through each of the next four tercets and in the last two lines of the concluding quatrain. The villanelle is also known for its repetition of select lines. An example is Dylan Thomas's "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night."

voice the verbal aspect of point of view, the acknowledged or unacknowledged source of a story's words; the speaker; the "person" telling the story and that person's particular qualities of insight, attitude, and verbal style. See also focus.
